Hard. By the hand of my body I believe his impudence is infectious! Didn't I see him seize your hand? Didn't I see him haul you about like a milkmaid? and now you talk of his respect and his modesty, forsooth!

Miss H. But if I shortly convince you of his modesty, that he has only the faults that will pass off with time, and the virtues that will improve with age, I hope you'll forgive him.

Hard. The girl would actually make one run mad; I tell you I'll not be convinced. I am convinced. He has scarcely been three hours in the house, and he has already encroached on all my prerogatives. You may like his impudence and call it modesty. But my son-in-law, Madam, must have very different qualifications.

Miss H. Sir, I ask but this night to convince you.

Hard. You shall not have half the time; for I have thoughts of turning him out this very hour.

Miss H. Give me that hour then, and I hope to satisfy you.

Hard. Well, an hour let it be then. But I'll have no trifling with your father. All fair and open, do you mind me. [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—An old-fashioned House.

Enter MARLOW, followed by a SERVANT.

Mar. I wonder what Hastings could mean by sending me so valuable a thing as a casket to keep for him, when he knows the only place I have is the seat of a post-coach at an inn-door. Have you deposited the casket with the landlady, as I ordered you? Have you put it into her own hands?

Serv. Yes, your honour.

Mar. She said she'd keep it safe, did she?

Serv. Yes, she said she'd keep it safe enough; she asked me how I came by it? and she said she had a great mind to make me give an account of myself. [Exit.]

Mar. Ha, ha, ha! They're safe, however. What an unaccountable set of beings have we got amongst! This little bar-maid, though, runs in my head most strangely, and drives out the absurdities of all the rest of the family. She's mine, she must be mine, or I'm greatly mistaken.

Enter HASTINGS.

Hast. Bless me! I quite forgot to tell her that I intended to prepare at the bottom of the garden, Marlow here, and irspirits too!

Mar. Give me joy, George! Crown me, shadow me with laurels! Well, George, after all, we modest fellows don't want for success among the women.

Hast. Some women, you mean. But what success has your honour's modesty been crowned with now, that it grows so insolent upon us?

Mar. Didn't you see the tempting, brisk, lovely, little thing that runs about the house with a bunch of keys to its girdle?

Hast. Well! and what then?

Mar. She's mine, you rogue you. Such fire, such motion, such eyes, such lips—but, egad! she would not let me kiss them though.

Hast. But are you so sure, so very sure of her?

Mar. Why, man, she talked of showing me her work above stairs, and I'm to improve the pattern.

Hast. But how can you, Charles, go about to rob a woman of her honour?

Mar. Pshaw! pshaw! We all know the honour of the bar-maid of an inn. I don't intend to rob her, take my word for it; there's nothing in this house I sha'n't honestly pay for.

Hast. I believe the girl has virtue.

Mar. And if she has, I should be the last man in the world that would attempt to corrupt it.

Hast. You have taken care, I hope, of the casket I sent you to lock up? It's in safety?

Mar. Yes, yes. It's safe enough. I have taken care of it. But how could you think the seat of a post-coach at an inn-door a place of safety? Ah, numskull! I have taken better precautions for you than you did for yourself—I have—

Hast. What!

Mar. I have sent it to the landlady to keep for you.

Hast. To the landlady!

Mar. The landlady.

Hast. You did?

Mar. I did. She's to be answerable for its forthcoming, you know.

Hast. Yes, she'll bring it forth, with a witness.

Mar. Wasn't I right? I believe you'll allow that I acted prudently upon this occasion.

Hast. He must not see my uneasiness. [Aside.]

Mar. You seem a little disconcerted though, methinks. Sure nothing has happened?

Hast. No, nothing. Never was in better spirits in all my life. And so you left it with the landlady, who, no doubt, very readily undertook the charge!

Mar. Rather too readily. For she not only kept the casket, but, through her great precaution, was going to keep the messenger too. Ha, ha, ha!

Hast. He, he, he! They're safe, however.

Mar. As a guinea in a miser's purse.

Hast. So now all hopes of fortune are at an end, and we must set off without it. [Aside.]

Well, Charles, I'll leave you to your meditations on the pretty bar-maid, and, he, he, he! may you be as successful for yourself as you have been for me. [Exit.]

Mar. Thank ye, George; I ask no more. Ha, ha, ha!

Enter HARDCASTLE.

Hard. I no longer know my own house. It's turned all topsy-turvy. His servants have got drunk already. I'll bear it no longer; and yet from my respect for his father, I'll be calm. [Aside.] Mr. Marlow, your servant, I'm your humble servant.

[Bowing low.]
Mar. Sir, your humble servant.—What's to be the wonder now?

[Aside.]
Hard. I believe, Sir, you must be sensible, Sir, that no man alive ought to be more welcome than your father's son, Sir. I hope you think so.

Mar. I do from my soul, Sir. I don't want much entreaty. I generally make my father's son welcome wherever he goes.

Hard. I believe you do, from my soul, Sir. But though I say nothing to your own conduct, that of your servants is insufferable. Their manner of drinking is setting a very bad example in this house, I assure you.

Mar. I protest, my very good Sir, that's no fault of mine. If they don't drink as they ought, they are to blame: I order'd them not to spare the cellar; I did, I assure you. [To the side Scene.] Here, let one of my servants come up. [To HARD.] My positive directions were, that as I did not drink myself, they should make up for my deficiencies below.

Hard. Then they had your orders for what they do! I'm satisfied.

Mar. They had, I assure you: you shall hear from one of themselves.

Enter SERVANT, drunk.

You, Jeremy! Come forward, sirrah! What were my orders? Were you not told to drink freely, and call for what you thought fit, for the good of the house?

Hard. I begin to lose my patience. [Aside.]

Jer. Please your honour, liberty and Fleet-street for ever, though I'm but a servant, I'm as good as another man; I'll drink for no man before supper, Sir, damme! Good liquor will sit upon a good supper, but a good supper will not sit upon—hiccup—upon my conscience, Sir.

Mar. You see, my old friend, the fellow is as drunk as he can possibly be. I don't know what you'd have more, unless you'd have the poor devil soused in a beer barrel.

Hard. Zounds! he'll drive me distracted if I contain myself any longer. [Aside.] Mr. Marlow, Sir, I have submitted to your insolence for more than four hours, and I see no likelihood of its coming to an end. I'm now resolved to be master here, Sir, and I desire that you and your drunken pack may leave my house directly.

Mar. Leave your house!—Sure you jest, my good friend? What, when I'm doing what I can to please you?

Hard. I tell you, Sir, you don't please me; so I desire you'll leave my house.

Mar. Sure you cannot be serious. At this time o'night, and such a night? You only mean to banter me.

Hard. I tell you, Sir, I'm serious; and, now that my passions are roused, I say this house is mine, Sir; this house is mine, and I command you to leave it directly.

Mar. Ha, ha, ha! A puddle in a storm. I sha'n't stir a step, I assure you. [In a serious tone.] This your house, fellow! It's my house. This is my house. Meanwhile I choose to stay. What right have you to bid me leave this house, Sir? I never met with such impudence, curse me, never in my whole life before.

Hard. Nor I, confound me if I ever did. To come to my house, to call for what he likes, to turn me out of my own chair, to insult the family, to order his servants to get drunk, and then to tell me, this house is mine, Sir. By all that's impudent it makes me laugh. Ha, ha, ha! Pray, Sir, [Bantering.] as you take the house, what think you of taking the rest of the furniture? There's a pair of silver candlesticks, and there's a firescreen, and a pair of bellows, perhaps you may take a fancy to them?

Mar. Bring me your bill, Sir, bring me your bill, and let's make no more words about it.

Hard. There are a set of prints too. What think you of the Rake's Progress for your own apartment?

Mar. Bring me your bill, I say; and I'll leave you and your infernal house directly.

Hard. Then there's a bright, brazen warming-pan, that you may see your own brazen face in.

Mar. My bill, I say.

Hard. I had forgot the great chair, for your own particular slumbers, after a hearty meal.

Mar. Zounds! bring me my bill, I say, and let's hear no more on't.

Hard. Young man, young man, from your father's letter to me, I was taught to expect a well-bred, modest man, as a visitor here, but now I find him no better than a coxcomb and a bully; but he will be down here presently, and shall hear more of it. [Exit.]

Mar. How's this? sure I have not mistaken the house! Every thing looks like an inn. The servants cry, coming! The attendance is awkward; the bar-maid too to attend us. But she's here, and will further inform me. Whither so fast, child? a word with you.

Enter MISS HARDCASTLE.

Miss H. Let it be short then; I'm in a hurry.—

I believe he begins to find out his mistake, but it's too soon quite to undeceive him. [Aside.]

Mar. Pray, child, answer me one question. What are you, and what may your business in the house be?

Miss H. A relation of the family, Sir.

Mar. What, a poor relation?

Miss H. Yes, Sir. A poor relation appointed to keep the keys, and to see that the guests want nothing in my power to give them.

Mar. That is, you act as the bar-maid of this inn.

Miss H. Inn! O law!—What brought that in your head? One of the best families in the county to keep an inn. Ha, ha, ha! Old Mr. Hardcastle's house an inn!

Mar. Hardcastle's house! Is this house Mr. Hardcastle's house, child?

Miss H. Ay, Sir, whose else should it be?

Mar. So then all's out, and I have been damnably imposed on. O, confound my stupid head, I shall be laughed at over the whole town. I shall be stuck up in caricatura in all the print shops. The Dulcissimo Maccaroni. To mistake this house of all others for an inn, and my father's old friend for an inn-keeper. What a swaggering puppy must he take me for. What a silly puppy do I find myself. There again, may I be hanged, my dear, but I mistook you for the bar-maid.

Miss H. Dear me! dear me! I am sure there's nothing in my behaviour to put me on a level with one of that stamp.

Mar. Nothing, my dear, nothing. But I was in for a list of blunders, and could not help making you a subscriber. My stupidity saw every thing the wrong way. I mistook your assiduity for assurance, and your simplicity for allurements. But it's over.—This house I no more show my face in.

Miss H. I hope, Sir, I have done nothing to disoblige you. I am sure I should be sorry to affront any gentleman who has been so polite, and said so many civil things to me. I am sure I should be sorry [Pretending to cry.] if he left the family upon my account. I am sure I should be sorry people said any thing amiss, since I have no fortune but my character.

Mar. By Heaven, she weeps. This is the first mark of tenderness I ever had from a modest woman, and it touches me. [Aside.]

Miss H. I am sure my family is as good as Miss Hardcastle's, and though I am poor, that is no great misfortune to a contented mind, and until this moment I never thought that it was bad to want fortune.

Mar. And why now, my pretty simplicity?

Miss H. Because it puts me at a distance from one, that, if I had a thousand pounds, I would give it all to.

Mar. This simplicity bewitches me, so that if I stay I am undone. I must make one bold effort, and leave her. [Aside.] Excuse me, my lovely girl, you are the only part of the family I leave with reluctance. But to be plain with you, the difference of our birth, fortune, and education make an honourable connexion impossible; and I can never harbour a thought of bringing ruin upon one, whose only fault was being too lovely. [Exit.]

Miss H. I never knew half his merit till now. He shall not go, if I have power or art to detain him. I will still preserve the character in which I stooped to conquer, bu will undeceive my papa, who perhaps may laugh him out of his resolution. [Exit.]

Enter TONY and MISS NEVILLE.

Tony. Ay, you may steal for yourselves the next time; I have done my duty. She has got the jewels again, that is a sure thing; but she believes it was all a mistake of the servants.

Miss N. But, my dear cousin, sure you wont forsake us in this distress. If she in the least suspects that I am going off, I shall certainly be locked up, or sent to my aunt Pedigree's, which is ten times worse.

Tony. To be sure, aunts of all kinds are damned bad things. But what can I do? I have got you a pair of horses that will fly like Whistle-jacket, and I am sure you cannot say but I have courted you nicely before her face. Here she comes; we must court a bit or two more for fear she should suspect us. [Seem to fondle.]

Enter MRS. HARDCASTLE.

Mrs. H. Well, I was greatly fluttered, to be sure. But my son tells me it was all a mistake of the servants. I sha'n't be easy, however, till they are fairly married, and then let her keep her own fortune. But what do I see? Fondling together, as I am alive. I never saw Tony so sprightly before. Ah! have I caught you, my pretty doves! What, billing, exchanging stolen glances, and broken murmurs? Ah!

Tony. As for murmurs, mother, we grumble a little now and then, to be sure. But there's no love lost between us.

Mrs. H. A mere sprinkling, Tony, upon the flame, only to make it burn brighter?

Miss N. Cousin Tony promises to give us more of his company at home. Indeed, he sha'n't leave us any more. It wont leave us, cousin Tony, will it?

Tony. O! it's a pretty creature. No, I'd sooner leave my horse in a pond, than leave you when you smile upon one so. Your laugh makes you so becoming.

Miss N. Agreeable cousin! who can help admiring that natural humour, that pleasant, broad, red, thoughtless—[Patting his cheek.] Ah! it's a bold face.

Mrs. H. Pretty innocence!

Tony. I am sure I always loved cousin Con's hazel eyes, and her pretty long fingers, that she twists this way and that over the harpsicholls, like a parcel of bobbins.

Mrs. H. Ah, he would charm a bird from the tree. I was never so happy before. My boy takes after his father, poor Mr. Lumpkin, exactly. The jewels, my dear Con, shall be yours incontinently. You shall have them. Isn't he a sweet boy, my dear? You shall be married to-morrow, and we'll put off the rest of his education, like Dr. Drowsy's sermons, to a fitter opportunity.

Enter DIGGORY.

Digg. Where's the 'squire? I have got a letter for your worship.

Tony. Give it to my mamma. She reads all my letters first.

Digg. I had orders to deliver it into your own hands.

Tony. Who does it come from?

Digg. Your worship mun ask that o'the letter itself.

Tony. I could wish to know, though.

[Turning the letter, and gazing on it.]
Miss N. [Aside.] Undone, undone. A letter to him from Hastings. I know the hand. If my aunt sees it, we are ruined for ever. I'll keep her employed a little, if I can. [To MRS. HARDCASTLE.] But I have not told you, Madam, of my cousin's smart answer just now to Mr. Marlow. We so laughed—You must know, Madam—this way a little, for he must not hear us.

[They confer.]

Tony. [Still gazing.] A damned cramped piece of penmanship as ever I saw in my life. I can read your print-hand very well. But here there are such handles, and shanks, and dashes, that one can scarce tell the head from the tail. [To ANTHONY LUMPKIN, Esq.] It's very odd, I can read the outside of my letters, where my own name is, plain enough. But when I come to open it, it is all—buz. That's hard, very hard; for the inside of the letter is always the cream of the correspondence.

Mrs. H. Ha ha ha! Very well, very well. And so my son was too hard for the philosopher.

Miss N. Yes, Madam; but you must hear the rest, Madam. A little more this way, or he may hear us. You'll hear how he puzzled him again.

Mrs. H. He seems strangely puzzled now himself, methinks.

Tony. [Still gazing.] A damned up and down hand, as if it was disguised in liquor. [Reading.] Dear Sir, Ay, that's that. Then there's an M, and a T, and an S, but whether the next be an izzard or an R, confound me, I cannot tell.

Mrs. H. What's that, my dear? Can I give you any assistance?

Miss N. Pray, aunt, let me read it. Nobody reads a cramp hand better than I. [Twitching the letter from her.] Do you know who it is from?

Tony. Can't tell, except from Dick Ginger, the feeder.

Miss N. Ay, so it is [Pretending to read.] Dear 'squire, hoping that you're in health, as I am at this present. The gentlemen of the Shake-bag club has cut the gentlemen of the Goose-green quite out of feather. The odds—um—old battle—um—long fighting—um—here, here, it's all about cocks, and fighting; it's of no consequence, here, put it up, put it up. [Thrusting the crumpled letter upon him.]

Tony. But I tell you, Miss, it's of all the consequence in the world. I would not lose the rest of it for a guinea. Here, mother, do you make it out. Of no consequence!

[Giving Mrs. HARDCASTLE the letter.]

Mrs. H. How's this? [Reads.]

Dear 'Squire,—I'm now waiting for Miss Neville, with a post chaise and pair, at the bottom of the garden; but I find my horses yet unable to perform the journey. I expect you'll assist me with a pair of fresh horses, as you promised. Dispatch is necessary, as the hag 'y, the hag, your mother, will otherwise suspect us. Yours, HASTINGS.

Grant me patience. I shall run distracted. My rage chokes me.

Miss N. I hope, Madam, you'll suspend your resentment for a few moments, and not impute to me any impertinence, or sinister design that belongs to another.

Mrs. H. [Courtesying very low.] Fine spoken,

Madam, you are most miraculously polite and engaging, and quite the very pink of courtesy and circumspection, Madam. [Changing her tone.] And you, you great ill-fashioned oaf, with scarce sense enough to keep your mouth shut, were you too joined against me? But I'll defeat all your plots in a moment. As for you, Madam, since you have got a pair of fresh horses ready, it would be cruel to disappoint them. So, if you please, instead of running away with your spark, prepare, this very moment, to run off with me. Your old aunt Pedigree will keep you secure, I'll warrant me. You too, Sir, may mount your horse, and guard us upon the way. Here, Thomas, Roger, Diggory; I'll show you, that I wish you better than you do yourselves. [Exit.]

Miss N. So now I am completely ruined.

Tony. Ay, that's a sure thing.

Miss N. What better could be expected from being connected with such a stupid fool, and after all the nods and signs I made him?

Tony. By the laws, Miss, it was your own cleverness, and not my stupidity, that did your business. You were so nice and so busy with your Shake-bags and Goose-greens, that I thought you could never be making believe.

Enter HASTINGS.

Hast. So, Sir, I find by my servant, that you have shown my letter, and betrayed us. Was this well done, young gentleman?

Tony. Here's another. Ask Miss there who betrayed you. Ecod, it was her doing, not mine.

Enter MARLOW.

Mar. So, I have been finely used here among you. Rendered contemptible, driven into ill-manners, despised, insulted, laughed at.

Tony. Here's another. We shall have old Bedlam broke loose presently.

Miss N. And there, Sir, is the gentleman to whom we all owe every obligation.

Mar. What can I say to him, a mere booby, an idiot, whose ignorance and age are a protection.

Hast. A poor, contemptible booby, that would but disgrace correction.

Miss N. Yet with cunning and malice enough to make himself merry with our embarrassments.

Hast. An insensible cub.

Mar. Replete with tricks and mischief.

Tony. Baw! damme, but I'll fight you both, one after the other—with baskets.

Mar. As for him, he's below resentment. But your conduct, Mr. Hastings, requires an explanation. You knew of my mistakes, yet would not undeceive me.

Hast. Tortured as I am with my own disappointments, is this a time for explanations? It is not friendly, Mr. Marlow.

Mar. But, Sir—

Miss N. Mr. Marlow, we never kept on your mistake, till it was too late to undeceive you. Be pacified.

Enter SERVANT.

Serv. My mistress desires you'll get ready immediately, Madam. The horses are putting to. Your hat and things are in the next room. We are to go thirty miles before morning. [Exit.]

Miss N. I come. O, Mr. Marlow! if you knew what a scene of constraint and ill nature lies before me, I'm sure it would convert your resentment into pity.

Mrs. H. [Within.] Miss Neville. Constance why, Constance, I say.

Miss N. I'm coming. Well, constancy. Remember, constancy is the word. [Exit.]

Hast. My heart, how can I support this? To be so near happiness, and such happiness!

Mar. [To TONY.] You see now, young gentleman, the effects of your folly. What might be amusement to you, is here disappointment, and even distress.

Tony. [From a reverie.] Ecod, I have hit it. It's here. Your hands. Yours and yours, my poor Sulky. Meet me two hours hence at the bottom of the garden; and if you don't find Tony Lumpkin a more good natur'd fellow than you thought for, I'll give you leave to take my best horse, and Bet Bouncer into the bargain. Come along. [Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—An old-fashioned House.

Enter SIR CHARLES MARLOW and HARDCASTLE.

Hard. Ha, ha, ha! The peremptory tone in which he sent forth his sublime commands.

Sir C. And the reserve with which I suppose he treated all your advances.

Hard. And yet he might have seen something in me above a common innkeeper, too.

Sir C. Yes, Dick, but he mistook you for an uncommon innkeeper, ha, ha, ha!

Hard. Well, I'm in too good spirits to think of any thing but joy. Yes, my dear friend, this union of our families will make our personal friendships hereditary; and though my daughter's fortune is but small—

Sir C. Why, Dick, will you talk of fortune to me? My son is possessed of more than a competence already, and can want nothing but a good, virtuous girl to share his happiness, and increase it. If they like each other, as you say they do—

Hard. If, man. I tell you they do like each other. My daughter as good as told me so.

Sir C. But girls are apt to flatter themselves, you know.

Hard. I saw him grasp her hand in the warmest manner myself; and here he comes to put you out of your ifs, I warrant him.

Enter MARLOW.

Mar. I come, Sir, once more, to ask pardon for my strange conduct. I can scarce reflect on my insolence without confusion.

Hard. Tut, boy, a trifle. You take it too gravely. An hour or two's laughing with my daughter will set all to rights again.—She'll never like you the worse for it.

Mar. Sir, I shall be always proud of her approbation.

Hard. Approbation is but a cold word, Mr. Marlow; if I am not deceived, you have something more than approbation thereabouts. You take me?

Mar. Really, Sir, I have not that happiness.

Hard. Come, boy, I'm an old fellow, and know what's what, as well as you that are younger. I know what has passed between you; but mum.

Mar. Sure, Sir, nothing has passed between us but the most profound respect on my side, and the most distant reserve on hers. You don't think, Sir, that my impudence has been passed upon all the rest of the family.

Hard. Impudence! No, I don't say that—Not quite impudence.—Girls like to be played with, and rumbled too sometimes. But she has told no tales, I assure you.

Mar. May I die, Sir, if I ever—

Hard. I tell you, she don't dislike you; and as I'm sure you like her,—

Mar. Dear Sir, I protest, Sir—

Hard. I see no reason why you should not be joined as fast as the parson can tie you.

Mar. But why won't you hear me? By all that's just and true, I never gave Miss Hardcastle the slightest mark of my attachment, or even the most distant hint to suspect me of affection. We had but one interview, and that was formal, modest, and uninteresting.

Hard. This fellow's formal, modest impudence is beyond bearing. [Aside.]

Sir C. And you never grasp'd her hand, or made any protestations?

Mar. As Heaven is my witness, I came down in obedience to your commands. I saw the lady without emotion, and parted without reluctance. I hope you'll exact no further proofs of my duty, nor prevent me from leaving a house in which I suffer so many mortifications. [Exit.]

Sir C. I'm astonished at the air of sincerity with which he parted.

Hard. And I'm astonished at the deliberate intrepidity of his assurance.

Sir C. I dare pledge my life and honour upon his truth.

Hard. Here comes my daughter, and I would stake my happiness upon her veracity.

Enter MISS HARDCASTLE.

Kate; come hither, child. Answer me sincerely, and without reserve; has Mr. Marlow made you any professions of love and affection?

Miss H. The question is very abrupt, Sir; but since you require unreserved sincerity, I think he has.

Hard. [To Sir C.] You see.

Sir C. And pray, Madam, have you and my son had more than one interview?

Miss H. Yes, Sir, several.

Hard. [To Sir C.] You see.

Sir C. But did he profess any attachment?

Miss H. A lasting one.

Sir C. Did he talk of love?

Miss H. Much, Sir.

Sir C. Amazing! and all this formally?

Miss H. Formally.

Hard. Now, my friend, I hope you are satisfied.

Sir C. And how did he behave, Madam?

Miss H. As most professed admirers do.—Said some civil things of my face, talked much of his want of merit, and the greatness of mine; mentioned his heart, gave a short tragedy speech, and ended with pretended rapture.

Sir C. Now I'm perfectly convinced, indeed. I know his conversation among women to be modest and submissive. This forward, canting, ranting manner by no means describes him, and I'm confident he never sat for that picture.

Miss H. Then what, Sir, if I should convince you to your face of my sincerity? If you and my papa, in about half an hour, will place yourselves behind that screen, you shall hear him declare his passion to me in person.

Sir C. Agreed. And if I find him what you describe, all my happiness in him must have an end. [Exit.]

Miss H. And if you don't find him what I describe—I fear my happiness must never have a beginning. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—The back of a Garden.

Enter HASTINGS.

Hast. What an idiot am I, to wait here for a fellow, who probably takes delight in mortifying me. He never intended to be punctual, and I'll wait no longer. What do I see? It is he, and perhaps with news of my Constance.

Enter TONY, booted and spattered.

My honest 'squire! I now find you a man of your word. This looks like friendship.

Tony. Ay, I'm your friend, and the best friend you have in the world, if you knew but all. This riding, by night, by the by, is cursedly tiresome. It has shook me worse than the basket of a stage coach.

Hast. But how? Where did you leave your fellow travellers? Are they in safety? Are they housed?

Tony. Five and twenty miles in two hours and a half, is no such bad driving. The poor beasts have smoked for it. Rabbit me, but I'd rather ride forty miles after a fox, than ten with such varment.

Hast. Well, but where have you left the ladies? I die with impatience.

Tony. Left them! Why, where should I leave them, but where I found them?

Hast. This is a riddle.

Tony. Riddle me this, then. What's that goes round the house, and round the house, and never touches the house?

Hast. I'm still astray.

Tony. Why, that's it, mon. I have led them astray. By jingo, there's not a pond or slough within five miles of the place, but they can tell the taste of.

Hast. Ha, ha, ha! I understand; you took them in a round, while they supposed themselves going forward. And so you have at last brought them home again.

Tony. You shall hear. I first took them down Feather-bed-lane, where we stuck fast in the mud.—I then rattled them crack over the stones of Up-and-down hill—I then introduced them to the gibbet on Heavy-tree-heath—and from that with a circumdendibus, I fairly lodged them in the horsepond at the bottom of the garden.

Hast. But no accident, I hope.

Tony. No, no. Only mother is confoundedly frightened. She thinks herself forty miles off. She's sick of the journey, and the cattle can scarce crawl. So, if your own horses be ready, you may whip off with cousin, and I'll be bound that no soul here can budge a foot to follow you.

Hast. My dear friend, how can I be grateful.

Tony. Ay, now it's dear friend, noble 'squire. Just now, it was all idiot, cub, and run me through the guts. Damn your way of fighting, I say. After we take a knock in this part of the country, we shake hands and be friends. But if you had run me through the guts, then I should be dead, and you might go shake hands with the hangman.

Hast. The rebuke is just. But I must hasten to relieve Miss Neville! If you keep the old lady employed, I promise to take care of the young one.

[Exit.]

Tony. Never fear me. Here she comes. Vanish! She's got into the pond, and is dragged up to the waist like a mermaid.

Enter MRS. HARDCASTLE.

Mrs. H. Oh, Tony, I'm killed! Shook! Battered to death! I shall never survive it. That last jolt that laid us against the quickset-hedge has done my business.

Tony. Alack, mamma, it was all your own fault. You would be for running away by night, without knowing one inch of the way.

Mrs. H. I wish we were at home again. I never met so many accidents in so short a journey. Drenched in the mud, overturned in a ditch, stuck fast in a slough, jolted to a jelly, and at last to lose our way. Whereabouts do you think we are, Tony?

Tony. By my guess, we should be upon Crackskull-common, about forty miles from home.

Mrs. H. O lud! O lud! the most notorious spot in all the country. We only want a robbery to make a complete night on't.

Tony. Don't be afraid, mamma, don't be afraid. Two of the five that kept here are hanged, and the other three may not find us. Don't be afraid. Is that a man that's galloping behind us? No; it's only a tree. Don't be afraid.

Mrs. H. The fright will certainly kill me.

Tony. Do you see any thing like a black hat moving behind the thicket.

Mrs. H. O death!

Tony. No, it's only a cow. Don't be afraid, mamma! don't be afraid.

Mrs. H. As I'm alive, Tony, I see a man coming towards us. Ah! I am sure on't. If he perceives us, we are undone.

Tony. Father-in-law, by all that's unlucky, come to take one of his night walks. [Aside.] Ah, it's a highwayman with pistols as long as my arm. A damned ill-looking fellow.

Mrs. H. Good Heaven defend us! he approaches.

Tony. Do you hide yourself in that thicket, and leave me to manage him. If there be any danger, I'll cough and cry hem. When I cough be sure to keep close.

[MRS. HARDCASTLE hides behind a tree in the back scene.]

Enter HARDCASTLE.

Hard. I'm mistaken, or I heard the voices of people in want of help. O, Tony, is that you? I did not expect you so soon back. Are your mother and her charge in safety?

Tony. Very safe, Sir, at my aunt Pedigree's. Hem.

Mrs. H. [From behind.] Ah, death! I find there's danger.

Hard. Forty miles in three hours; sure, that's too much, my youngster.

Tony. Stout horses and willing minds make short journeys, as they say. Hem.

Mrs. H. [From behind.] Sure, he'll do the dear boy no harm.

Hard. But I heard a voice here; I should be glad to know from whence it came?

Tony. It was I, Sir, talking to myself, Sir. I was saying that forty miles in three hours was very good going. Hem. As to be sure it was. Hem. I have got a sort of a cold by being out in the air. We'll go in, if you please. Hem.

Hard. But if you talked to yourself, you did not answer yourself. I am certain I heard two voices, and am resolved [Raising his voice.] to find the other out.

Mrs. H. [Running forward from behind.] Oh lud, he'll murder my poor boy, my darling.—Here, good gentleman, whet your rage upon me. Take my money, my life, but spare that young gentleman, spare my child, if you have any mercy.

Hard. My wife! as I am a Christian. From whence can she come, or what does she mean?

Mrs. H. [Kneeling.] Take compassion on us, good Mr. Highwayman. Take our money, our watches, all we have, but spare our lives. We will never bring you to justice, indeed we wont, good Mr. Highwayman.

Hard. I believe the woman's out of her senses. What, Dorothy, don't you know me?

Mrs. H. Mr. Hardcastle, as I'm alive! My fears blinded me. But who, my dear, could have expected to meet you here, in this frightful place, so far from home?—What has brought you to follow us?

Hard. Sure, Dorothy, you have not lost your wits. So far from home, when you are within forty yards of your own door. [To TONY.] This is one of your old tricks, you graceless rogue you. [To Mrs. H.] Don't you know the gate and the mulberry-tree; and don't you remember the horse-pond, my dear?

Mrs. H. Yes, I shall remember the horsepond as long as I live; I have caught my death in it. [To TONY.] And is it to you, you graceless varlet, I owe all this? I'll teach you to abuse your mother, I will.

Tony. Ecod, mother, all the parish says you have spoiled me, and so you may take the fruits on't.

Mrs. H. I'll spoil you, I will. [Beats him off.]

Hard. Ha, ha, ha! [Exit.]

SCENE III.—A Parlour.

Enter SIR CHARLES MARLOW and MISS HARDCASTLE.

Sir C. What a situation am I in! If what you say appears, I shall then find a guilty son. If what he says be true, I shall then lose one that, of all others, I most wished for a daughter.

Miss H. I am proud of your approbation, and to show I merit it, if you place yourselves as I directed, you shall hear his explicit declaration. But he comes.

Sir C. I'll to your father, and keep him to the appointment. [Exit.]

Enter MARLOW.

Mar. Though prepared for setting out, I come once more to take leave; nor did I, till this moment, know the pain I feel in the separation.

Miss H. [In her own natural manner.] I believe these sufferings cannot be very great, Sir, which you can so easily remove. A day or two longer, perhaps, might lessen your uneasiness, by showing the little value of what you now think proper to regret.

Mar. This girl every moment improves upon me. [Aside.] It must not be, Madam. I have already trifled too long with my heart, and nothing can restore me to myself, but this painful effort of resolution.

Miss H. Then go, Sir. I'll urge nothing more to detain you. Though my family be as good as hers you came down to visit, and my education I hope not inferior, what are these advantages without equal affluence? I must remain contented with the slight approbation of imputed merit; I must have only the mockery of your addresses, while all your serious aims are fixed on fortune.

Enter HARDCASTLE and SIR CHARLES MARLOW from behind.

Mar. By Heavens, Madam, fortune was ever my smallest consideration. Your beauty at first caught my eye; for who could see that without emotion. But every moment that I converse with you, steals in some new grace, heightens the picture, and gives it stronger expression. What at first seemed rustic plainness, now appears refined simplicity. What seemed forward assurance, now strikes me as the result of courageous innocence, and conscious virtue. I am now determined to stay, Madam, and I have too good an opinion of my father's discernment, when he sees you, to doubt his approbation.

Miss H. Sir, I must entreat you'll desist. As our acquaintance began, so let it end, in indifference. I might have given an hour or two to levity, but seriously, Mr. Marlow, do you think I could ever submit to a connexion where I must appear mercenary, and you imprudent? Do you think I could ever catch at the confident addresses of a secure admirer?

Mar. [Kneeling.] Does this look like security? Does this look like confidence? No, Madam, every moment that shows me your merit, only serves to increase my diffidence and confusion. Here let me continue—

Sir C. I can hold it no longer. [Coming forward.] Charles, Charles, how hast thou deceived me! Is this your indifference, your uninteresting conversation?

Hard. Your cold contempt; your formal interview? What have you to say now?

Mar. That I'm all amazement! What can it mean?

Hard. It means that you can say and unsay things at pleasure. That you can address a lady in private, and deny it in public; that you have one story for us, and another for my daughter.

Mar. Daughter!—This lady your daughter?

Hard. Yes, Sir, my only daughter, my Kate. Whose else should she be?

Mar. Oh, the devil.

Miss H. Yes, Sir, that very identical, tall, squinting lady you were pleased to take me for. [Courtesying.] She that you addressed as the mild, modest, sentimental man of gravity, and the bold, forward, agreeable Rattle of the ladies' club, ha, ha, ha!

Mar. Zounds! there's no hearing this.

Miss H. In which of your characters, Sir, will you give us leave to address you? As the faltering gentleman, with looks on the ground, that speaks just to be heard, and hates hypocrisy; or the loud, confident creature, that keeps it up with Mrs. Mantrap, and old Mrs. Biddy Buckskin, till three in the morning, ha, ha, ha!

Mar. Oh, curse on my noisy head! I never attempted to be impudent yet, that I was not taken down. I must be gone.

Hard. By the hand of my body, but you shall not. I see it was all a mistake, and I am rejoiced to find it. You shall not, Sir, I tell you. I know she'll forgive you. Wont you forgive him, Kate? We'll all forgive you. Take courage, man.

[They retire, she teasing him.]

Enter MRS. HARDCASTLE and TONY.

Mrs. H. So, so, they're gone off. Let them go, I care not.

Hard. Who's gone?

Mrs. H. My dutiful niece and her gentleman, Mr. Hastings, from town; he who came down with our modest visitor here.

Sir C. Who, my honest George Hastings? As worthy a fellow as lives, and the girl could not have made a more prudent choice.

Hard. Then, by the hand of my body, I'm proud of the connexion.

Enter HASTINGS and MISS NEVILLE

Mrs. H. What! returned so soon? I begin not to like it. [Aside.]

Hast. [To HARDCASTLE.] For my late attempt to fly off with your niece, let my present confusion be my punishment. We are now come back, to appeal from your justice to your humanity. By her father's consent I first paid her my addresses, and our passions were first founded in duty.

Miss N. Since his death, I have been obliged to stoop to dissimulation to avoid oppression. In an hour of levity, I was ready even to give up my fortune to secure my choice. But I'm now recovered from the delusion, and hope from your tenderness what is denied me from a nearer connexion.

Hard. Be it what it will, I'm glad they are come back to claim their due. Come, hither, Tony, boy. Do you refuse this lady's hand, whom I now offer you?

Tony. What signifies my refusing? You know I can't refuse her till I'm of age, father.

Hard. While I thought concealing your age, boy, was likely to conduce to your improvement, I concurred with your mother's desire to keep it secret. But since I find she turns it to a wrong use, I must now declare you have been of age these three months.

Tony. Of age! Am I of age, father?

Hard. Above three months.

Tony. Then you'll see the first use I'll make of my liberty. [Taking MISS NEVILLE'S hand.] Witness all men by these presents, that I, Anthony Lumpkin, Esquire, of Blank-place, refuse you, Constantia Neville, spinster, of no place at all, for my true and lawful wife. So Constantia Neville may marry whom she pleases, and Tony Lumpkin is his own man again.

Sir C. O brave friend!

Hast. My worthy friend!

Mrs. H. My undutiful offspring!

Mar. Joy, my dear George, I give you joy sincerely. And could I prevail on my little tyrant here to be less arbitrary, I should be the happiest man alive, if you would return me the favour.

Hast. [To Miss HARDCASTLE.] Come, Madam, you are now driven to the very last scene of all your contrivances. I know you like him, I'm sure he loves you, and you must and shall have him.

Hard. [Joining their hands.] And I say so too. And, Mr. Marlow, if she makes as good a wife as she has a daughter, I don't believe you'll ever repent your bargain. So now to supper. To-morrow we shall gather all the poor of the parish about us, and the mistakes of the night shall be crowned with a merry morning; so, boy, take her: and as you have been mistaken in the mistress, my wish is, that you may never be mistaken in the wife. [Exeunt.]

BON TON:

OR,

HIGH LIFE ABOVE STAIRS.

A FARCE,

IN TWO ACTS.

BY DAVID GARRICK, Esq.

REMARKS.

This agreeable after-piece, which abounds with pleasantry, and possesses an excellent moral, was first performed at Drury Lane theatre, 1775, to recognise (in the words of the author) "the merit and integrity of Mr. Thomas King, by bringing it out for his benefit, as a token of regard."

It is an additional proof of Mr. Garrick's useful talents, and always commands a well-deserved applause.— "This is a well-timed satirical piece, in which the profligate fashions of the age, imported from France and Italy, and greedily swallowed by the high-born fools of London, are well contrasted with the plain downright manners of an honest country gentleman, who, by an accidental visit to the metropolis, discovers a most shocking metamorphosis in the morals of both sexes, and more especially exemplified among his own relations."

ACT I.

SCENE I.

Enter LADY MINIKIN and MISS TITTUP.

Lady M. It is not, my dear, that I have the least regard for my lord; I had no love for him before I married him, and, you know, matrimony is no breeder of affection; but it hurts my pride, that he should neglect me, and run after other women.

Miss T. Ha, ha, ha! how can you be so hypocritical, Lady Minikin, as to pretend to uneasiness at such trifles! but pray have you made any new discoveries of my lord's galantry?

Lady M. New discoveries! why, I saw him myself yesterday morning in a hackney-coach, with a minx in a pink cardinal; you shall absolutely burn yours, Tittup, for I shall never bear to see one of that colour again.

Miss T. Sure she does not suspect me! [Aside.] And where was your ladyship, pray, when you saw him?

Lady M. Taking the air with Colonel Tivy in his vis-a-vis.

Miss T. But, my dear Lady Minikin, how can you be so angry that my lord was hurting your pride, as you call it, in the hackney-coach, when you had him so much in your power, in the vis-a-vis?

Lady M. What, with my lord's friend, and my friend's lover! [Takes her by the hand.] O fie, Tittup!

Miss T. Pooh, pooh, love and friendship are very fine names to be sure, but they are mere visiting acquaintance; we know their names indeed, talk of 'em sometimes, and let 'em knock at our doors, but we never let 'em in, you know.

[Looking roguishly at her.
Lady M. I vow, Tittup, you are extremely polite.

Miss T. I am extremely indifferent in these affairs, thanks to my education. We must marry, you know, because other people of fashion marry; but I should think very meanly of myself, if, after I was married, I should feel the least concern at all about my husband.

Lady M. I hate to praise myself, and yet I may with truth aver, that no woman of quality ever had, can have, or will have, so consummate a contempt for her lord, as I have for my most honourable and puissant Earl of Minikin, Viscount Periwinkle, and Baron Titmouse—ha, ha, ha!

Miss T. But is it not strange, Lady Minikin, that merely his being your husband, should create such indifference; for certainly, in every other eye, his lordship has great accomplishments?

Lady M. Accomplishments! thy head is certainly turned; if you know any of 'em, pray let's have 'em; they are a novelty, and will amuse me.

Miss T. Imprimis, he is a man of quality.

Lady M. Which, to be sure, includes all the cardinal virtues—poor girl! go on!

Miss T. He is a very handsome man.

Lady M. He has a very bad constitution.

Miss T. He has wit.

Lady M. He is a lord, and a little goes a great way.

Miss T. He has great good nature.

Lady M. No wonder—he's a fool.

Miss T. And then his fortune, you'll allow—

Lady M. Was a great one—but he games, and if fairly, he's undone; if not, he deserves to be hanged—and so, exit my Lord Minikin—and now, let your wise uncle, and my good cousin, Sir John Trotley, baronet, enter: where is he, pray?

Miss T. In his own room, I suppose, reading pamphlets, and newspapers, against the enormities of the times; if he stays here a week longer, notwithstanding my expectations from him, I shall certainly affront him.

Lady M. I am a great favourite, but it is impossible much longer to act up to his very righteous ideas of things;—isn't it pleasant to hear him abuse every body, and every thing, and yet always finishing with a—you'll excuse me, cousin! ha, ha, ha!

Miss T. What do you think the Goth said to me yesterday? one of the knots of his tye hanging down his left shoulder, and his fringed cravat nicely twisted down his breast, and thrust through his gold button-hole, which looked exactly like my little Barbet's head in his gold collar—"Niece Tittup," cries he, drawing himself up, "I protest against this manner of conducting yourself, both at home and abroad." What are your objections, Sir John? answered I, a little pertly. "Various and manifold," replied he; "I have no time to enumerate particulars now, but I will venture to prophesy, if you keep whirling round in the vortex of Pantheons, Operas, Festinos, Coteries, Masquerades, and all the Devilades in this town, your head will be giddy, down you will fall, lose the name of Lucretia, and be called nothing but Tittup ever after—you'll excuse me, cousin"—and so he left me.

Lady M. O, the barbarian!

Enter GYMP.

Gymp. A card, your Ladyship, from Mrs. Pewitt.

Lady M. Poor Pewitt! if she can be but seen at public places, with a woman of quality, she's the happiest of plebeians. [Reads the card.

"Mrs. Pewitt's respects to Lady Minikin, and Miss Tittup; hopes to have the pleasure of attending them to Lady Filligree's ball this evening. Lady Daisey sees masks." We'll certainly attend her—Gymp, put some message cards upon my toilet, I'll send an answer immediately; and tell one of my footmen, that he must make some visits for me to-day again, and send me a list of those he made yesterday; he must be sure to call at Lady Pettitoes, and if she should unluckily be at home, he must say that he came to inquire after her sprained ankle.

Miss T. Ay, ay, give our compliments to her sprained ankle.

Lady M. That woman's so fat, she'll never get well of it, and I am resolved not to call at her door myself, till I am sure of not finding her at home. I am horribly low spirited to-day; do, send your colonel to play at chess with me,—since he belonged to you, Titty, I have taken a kind of liking to him; I like every thing that loves my Titty. [Kisses her.

Miss T. I know you do, my dear lady. [Kisses her.

Lady M. That sneer I don't like; if she suspects, I shall hate her: [Aside.] Well, dear Titty, I'll go and write my cards, and dress for the masquerade, and if that won't raise my spirits, you must assist me to plague my lord a little. [Exit.

Miss T. Yes, and I'll plague my lady a little, or I am much mistaken: my lord shall know every tittle that has passed: what a poor, blind, half-witted, self-conceited creature this dear friend and relation of mine is! and what a fine spirited gallant soldier my colonel is! my Lady Minikin likes him, he likes my fortune; and my lord likes me, and I like my lord; however not so much as he imagines, or to play the fool so rashly as he may expect. She must be very silly indeed, who can't flutter about the flame without burning her wings—what a great revolution in this family, in the space of fifteen months!—we went out of England, a very awkward, regular, good English family! but half a year in France, and a winter passed in the warmer climate of Italy, have ripened our minds to every refinement of ease, dissipation, and pleasure.

Enter COLONEL TIVY.

Col. T. May I hope, Madam, that your humble servant had some share in your last reverie?

Miss T. How is it possible to have the least knowledge of Colonel Tivy, and not make him the principal object of one's reflections!

Col. T. That man must have very little feeling and taste, who is not proud of a place in the thoughts of the finest woman in Europe.

Miss T. O fie, colonel!

[Courtesies and blushes.

Col. T. By my honour, Madam, I mean what I say.

Miss T. By your honour, colonel! why will you pass off your counters to me? don't I know that you fine gentlemen regard no honour but that which is given at the gaming table; and which indeed ought to be the only honour you should make free with.

Col. T. How can you, Miss, treat me so cruelly? have I not absolutely forsworn dice, mistress, every thing, since I dared to offer myself to you?

Miss T. Yes, colonel, and when I dare to receive you, you may return to every thing again, and not violate the laws of the present happy matrimonial establishment.

Col. T. Give me but your consent, Madam, and your life to come—

Miss T. Do you get my consent, colonel, and I'll take care of my life to come.

Col. T. How shall I get your consent?

Miss T. By getting me in the humour.

Col. T. But how to get you in the humour?

Miss T. O, there are several ways; I am very good natured.

Col. T. Are you in the humour now?

Miss T. Try me.

Col. T. How shall I?

Miss T. How shall I?—you a soldier, and not know the art military?—how shall I?—I'll tell you how;—when you have a subtle, treacherous, polite enemy to deal with, never stand shilly shally, and lose your time in treaties and parleys, but cock your hat, draw your sword;—march, beat drum—dub, dub, a dub—present, fire, piff-pauff—'tis done! they fly, they yield—victoria! victoria!

[Running off.]

Col. T. Stay, stay, my dear, dear angel!—

[Bringing her back.]

Miss T. No, no, no, I have no time to be killed now; besides, Lady Minikin is in the vapours, and wants you at chess, and my lord is low spirited, and wants me at piquet; my uncle is in an ill humour, and wants me to discard you, and go with him into the country.

Col. T. And will you, Miss?

Miss T. Will I?—no, I never do as I am bid? but you ought—so go to my lady.

Col. T. Nay, but Miss—

Miss T. Nay, but colonel, if you wont obey your commanding officer, you shall be broke, and then my maid wont accept of you; so march, colonel! lookye, Sir, I will command before marriage, and do what I please afterwards, or I have been well educated to very little purpose. [Exit.]

Col. T. What a mad devil it is!—now, if I had the least affection for the girl, I should be damnable vexed at this!—but she has a fine fortune, and I must have her if I can.—Tol, lol, lol, &c. [Exit singing.]

Enter SIR JOHN TROTLEY, and DAVY.

Sir J. Hold your tongue, Davy; you talk like a fool.

Davy. It is a fine place, your honour, and I could live here for ever!

Sir J. More shame for you:—live here for ever!—what, among thieves and pickpockets!—what a revolution since my time! the more I see, the more I've cause for lamentation; what a dreadful change has time brought about in twenty years! I should not have known the place again, nor the people; all the signs that made so noble an appearance, are all taken down;—not a bob or tyewig to be seen! all the degrees, from the parade in St. James' Park, to the stool and brush at the corner of every street, have their hair tied up—the mason laying bricks, the baker with his basket, the post-boy crying newspapers, and the doctors prescribing physic, have all their hair tied up; and that's the reason so many heads are tied up every month.

Davy. I shall have my head tied up to-morrow;—Mr. Whisp will do it for me—your honour and I look like Philistines among 'em.

Sir J. And I shall break your head if it is tied up; I hate innovation;—all confusion and no distinction!—the streets now are as smooth as a turnpike road! no rattling and exercise in the hackney-coaches; those who ride in 'em are all fast asleep; and they have strings in their hands, that the coachman must pull to waken 'em, when they are to be set down—what luxury and abomination!

Davy. Is it so, your honour? 'feckins, I liked it hugely.

Sir J. But you must hate and detest London.

Davy. How can I manage that, your honour, when there is every thing to delight my eye, and cherish my heart?

Sir J. 'Tis all deceit and delusion.

Davy. Such crowding, coaching, carting, and squeezing; such a power of fine sights, fine shops full of fine things, and then such fine illuminations all of a row! and such fine dainty ladies in the streets, so civil and so graceless—they talk of country girls, these here look more healthy and rosy by half.

Sir J. Sirrah, they are prostitutes, and are civil to delude and destroy you: they are painted Jezabels, and they who hearken to 'em, like Jezabel of old, will go to the dogs! If you dare to look at 'em, you will be tainted, and if you speak to 'em you are undone.

Davy. Bless us, bless us!—how does your honour know all this?—were they as bad in your time?

Sir J. Not by half, Davy—in my time, there was a sort of decency in the worst of women;—but the harlots now watch like tigers for their prey; and drag you to their dens of infamy—see, Davy, how they have torn my neckcloth.

Davy. If you had gone civilly, your honour, they would not have hurt you.

Sir J. Well, we'll get away as fast as we can.

Davy. Not this month, I hope, for I have not had half my bellyful yet.

Sir J. I'll knock you down, Davy, if you grow profligate; you sha'n't go out again to-night, and to-morrow keep in my room, and stay till I can look over my things, and see they don't cheat you.

Davy. Your honour then wont keep your word with me?

[Sulkily.]

Sir J. Why, what did I promise you?

Davy. That I should take sixpen'oth of one of the theatres to-night, and a shilling place at the other to-morrow.

Sir J. Well, well, so I did; is it a moral piece, Davy?

Davy. O yes, and written by a clergyman; it is called the Rival Canaanites, or the Tragedy of Braggadocia.

Sir J. Be a good lad, and I wont be worse than my word; there's money for you—[Gives him some.] but come straight home, for I shall want to go to bed.

Davy. To be sure, your honour—as I am to go soon, I'll make a night of it. [Aside, and exit.]

Sir J. This fellow would turn rake and macaroni if he was to stay here a week longer—bless me, what dangers are in this town at every step! O, that I were once settled safe again at Trotley-place!—nothing but to save my country should bring me back again: my niece, Lucretia, is so be-fashioned and be-devilled, that nothing, I fear, can save her; however, to ease my conscience, I must try; but what can be expected from the young women of these times, but sallow looks, wild schemes, saucy words, and loose morals!—they lie a-bed all day, sit up all night; if they are silent, they are gadding; and if they talk, 'tis either scandal or infidelity; and that they may look what they are, their heads are all feather, and round their necks are twisted rattlesnake tippets—O tempora, O mores!

SCENE II.

LORD MINIKIN discovered in his powdering gown, with JESSAMY and MIGNON.

Lord M. Pr'ythee, Mignon, don't plague me any more; dost think that a nobleman's head has nothing to do but be tortured all day under thy infernal fingers? give me my clothes.

Mig. Ven your loss your monee, my lor, you no goot humour; the devil may dress your cheveu for me!

Lord M. That fellow's an impudent rascal, but he's a genius, so I must bear with him. Our beef and pudding enrich their blood so much, that the slaves in a month forget their misery and soup-maigre—O, my head!—a chair, Jessamy!—I must absolutely change my wine-merchant: I can't taste his champagne, without disordering myself for a week!—heigho. [Sighs.]

Enter MISS TITTUP.

Miss T. What makes you sigh, my lord?

Lord M. Because you were so near me, child.

Miss T. Indeed! I should rather have thought my lady had been with you—by your looks, my lord, I am afraid Fortune jilted you last night.

Lord M. No, faith; our champagne was not good yesterday. I am vapoured like our English November; but one glance of my Tittup can dispel vapours like—like—

Miss T. Like something very fine, to be sure; but pray keep your smile for the next time;—and harkye—a little prudence will not be amiss; Mr. Jessamy will think you mad, and me worse.

[Half aside.]

Jes. O, pray don't mind me, Madam.

Lord M. Gadso, Jessamy, look out my domino, and I'll ring the bell when I want you.

Jes. I shall, my lord;—Miss thinks that every body is blind in the house but herself.

[Aside, and exit.]

Miss T. Upon my word, my lord, you must be a little more prudent, or we shall become the town talk.

Lord M. And so I will, my dear; and therefore to prevent surprise, I'll lock the door. [Looks it.]

Miss T. What do you mean, my lord?

Lord M. Prudence, child, prudence. I keep all my jewels under lock and key.

Miss T. You are not in possession yet, my lord; I can't stay two minutes; I only came to tell you, that Lady Minikin saw us yesterday in the hackney-coach; she did not know me, I believe; she pretends to be greatly uneasy at your neglect of her; she certainly has some mischief in her head.

Lord M. No intentions, I hope, of being fond of me?

Miss T. No, no, make yourself easy; she hates you most unalterably.

Lord M. You have given me spirits again.

Miss T. Her pride is alarmed, that you should prefer any of the sex to her.

Lord M. Her pride then has been alarmed ever since I had the honour of knowing her.

Miss T. But, dear my lord, let us be merry and wise; should she ever be convinced that we have a tendre for each other, she certainly would proclaim it, and then—

Lord M. We should be envied, and she would be laughed at, my sweet cousin.

Miss T. Nay, I would have her mortified too—for though I love her ladyship sincerely: I cannot say, but I love a little mischief as sincerely; but then if my uncle, Trotley, should know of our affairs, he is so old-fashioned, prudish, and out of the way, he would either strike me out of his will, or insist upon my quitting the house.

Lord M. My good cousin is a queer mortal, that's certain; I wish we could get him handsomely into the country again—he has a fine fortune to leave behind him.

Miss T. But then he lives so regularly, and never makes use of a physician, that he may live these twenty years.

Lord M. What can we do with the barbarian?

Miss T. I dont know what's the matter with me, but I am really in fear of him: I suppose, reading his formal books when I was in the country with him, and going so constantly to church, with my elbows stuck to my hips, and my toes turned in, has given me these foolish prejudices.

Lord M. Then you must affront him, or you'll never get the better of him.

SIR JOHN TROTLEY, knocking at the door.

Sir J. My lord, my lord, are you busy?

[Lord M. goes to the door, softly.]

Miss T. Heavens! 'tis that detestable brute, my uncle!

Lord M. That horrid dog, my cousin!

Miss T. What shall we do, my lord? [Softly]

Sir J. [At the door.] Nay, my lord, my lord, I heard you; pray let me speak with you.

Lord M. Ho, Sir John, is it you? I beg your pardon, I'll put up my papers, and open the door.

Miss T. Stay, stay, my lord, I would not meet him now for the world; if he sees me here alone with you, he'll rave like a madman; put me up the chimney; any where. [Alarmed.]

Lord M. I'm coming, Sir John! here, here, get behind my great chair; he sha'n't see you, and you may see all; I'll be short and pleasant with him. [Puts her behind the chair, and opens the door.]

Enter SIR JOHN.

During this scene LORD M. turns the chair, as

SIR JOHN moves, to conceal TITTUP.

Sir J. You'll excuse me, my lord, that I have broken in upon you; I heard you talking pretty loud; what, have you nobody with you? what were you about, cousin? [Looking about.]

Lord M. A particular affair, Sir John; I always lock myself up to study my speeches, and speak 'em aloud for the sake of the tone and action.

Sir J. Ay, ay, 'tis the best way; I am sorry I disturbed you;—you'll excuse me, cousin!

Lord M. I am obliged to you, Sir John; intense application to these things ruins my health; but one must do it for the sake of the nation.

Sir J. May be so, and I hope the nation will be the better for't—you'll excuse me!

Lord M. Excuse you, Sir John, I love your frankness; but why wont you be franker still? we have always something for dinner, and you will never dine at home.

Sir J. You must know, my lord, that I love to know what I eat;—I hate to travel, where I don't know my way; and since you have brought in foreign fashions and figarics, every thing and every body are in masquerade: your men and manners too are as much frittered and fricaseed, as your beef and mutton; I love a plain dish, my lord.

Miss T. I wish I was out of the room, or he at the bottom of the Thames. [Peeping.]

Sir J. But to the point;—I came, my lord, to open my mind to you about my niece Tittup; shall I do it freely?

Miss T. Now for it!

Lord M. The freer the better; Tittup's a fine girl, cousin, and deserves all the kindness you can show her.

[LORD MINIKIN and TITTUP make signs at each other.]

Sir J. She must deserve it though, before she shall have it; and I would have her begin with lengthening her petticoats, covering her shoulders, and wearing a cap upon her head.

Miss T. O, frightful! [Aside.]

Lord M. Don't you think a taper leg, falling shoulders, and fine hair, delightful objects, Sir John?

Sir J. And therefore ought to be concealed; 'tis their interest to conceal 'em; when you take from the men the pleasure of imagination, there will be a scarcity of husbands; and the taper legs, falling shoulders, and fine hair, may be had for nothing.

Lord M. Well said, Sir John; ha, ha!—your niece shall wear a horseman's coat and jack-boots to please you—ha, ha, ha!

Sir J. You may sneer, my lord, but for all that, I think my niece in a bad way; she must leave me and the country, forsooth, to travel and see good company and fashions; I have seen 'em too, and wish from my heart that she is not much the worse for her journey—you'll excuse me!

Lord M. But why in a passion, Sir John?

[LORD MINIKIN nods and laughs at MISS TITTUP, who peeps from behind.]

Don't you think that my lady and I shall be able and willing to put her into the road?

Sir J. Zounds! my lord, you are out of it yourself; this comes of your travelling; all the town know how you and my lady live together; and I must tell you—you'll excuse me!—that my niece suffers by the bargain; prudence, my lord, is a very fine thing.

Lord M. So is a long neckcloth nicely twisted into a button hole, but I don't choose to wear one—you'll excuse me!

Sir J. I wish that he who first changed long neckcloths for such things as you wear, had the wearing of a twisted neckcloth that I would give him

Lord M. Pr'ythee, baronet, don't be so horribly out of the way; prudence is a very vulgar virtue, and so incompatible with our present ease and refinement, that a prudent man of fashion is now as great a miracle as a pale woman of quality: we got rid of our mauvaise honte, at the time that we imported our neighbour's rouge, and their morals.

Sir J. Did you ever hear the like! I am not surprised, my lord, that you think so lightly, and talk so vainly, who are so polite a husband; your lady, my cousin, is a fine woman, and brought you a fine fortune, and deserves better usage.

Lord M. Will you have her, Sir John? she is very much at your service.

Sir J. Profligate! What did you marry her for, my lord?

Lord M. Convenience—Marriage is not now-a-days, an affair of inclination, but convenience; and they who marry for love and such old-fashioned stuff, are to me as ridiculous as those that advertise for an agreeable companion in a post-chaise.

Sir J. I have done, my lord; Miss Tittup shall either return with me into the country, or not a penny shall she have from Sir John Trotley, baronet. [Whistles and walks about.]

Miss T. I am frightened out of my wits!

[LORD MINIKIN sings and sits down.]

Sir J. Pray, my lord, what husband is this you have provided for her?

Lord M. A friend of mine; a man of wit, and a fine gentleman.

Sir J. May be so, and yet make a damned husband for all that. You'll excuse me!—What estate has he, pray?

Lord M. He's a colonel; his elder brother, Sir Tan Tivy, will certainly break his neck, and then my friend will be a happy man.

Sir J. Here's morals! a happy man, when his brother has broke his neck!—a happy man—mercy on me!

Lord M. Why, he'll have six thousand a year, Sir John—

Sir J. I don't care what he'll have, nor I don't care what he is, nor who my niece marries; she is a fine lady, and let her have a fine gentleman; I sha'n't hinder her; I'll away into the country to-morrow, and leave you to your fine doings; I have no relish for 'em, not I; I can't live among you, nor eat with you, nor game with you: I hate cards and dice; I will neither rob nor be robbed; I am contented with what I have, and am very happy, my lord, though my brother has not broke his neck—you'll excuse me! [Exit.]

Lord M. Ha, ha, ha! Come, fox, come out of your hole! ha, ha, ha!

Miss T. Indeed, my lord, you have undone me; not a foot shall I have of Trotley Manor, that's positive! but no matter, there's no danger of his breaking his neck, so I'll even make myself happy with what I have, and behave to him for the future, as if he was a poor relation.

Lord M. [Kneeling, smatching her hand, and kissing it.] I must kneel and adore you for your spirit, my sweet, heavenly Lucretia!

Re-enter SIR JOHN.

Sir J. One thing I had forgot. [Starts.]

Miss T. Ha! he's here again!

Sir J. Why, what the devil!—heigho, my niece Lucretia, and my virtuous lord, studying speeches for the good of the nation. Yes, yes, you have been making fine speeches, indeed, my lord; and your arguments have prevailed, I see. I beg your pardon, I did not mean to interrupt your studies—you'll excuse me, my lord!

Lord M. [Smiling, and mocking him.] You'll excuse me, Sir John!

Sir J. O yes, my lord, but I'm afraid the devil wont excuse you at the proper time—Miss Lucretia, how do you, child? You are to be married soon—I wish the gentleman joy, Miss Lucretia; he is a happy man to be sure, and will want nothing but the breaking of his brother's neck to be completely so.

Miss T. Upon my word, uncle, you are always putting bad constructions upon things; my lord has been soliciting me to marry his friend—and having that moment—extorted a consent from me—he was thanking—and—and—wishing me joy,—in his foolish manner. [Hesitating.]

Sir J. Is that all!—but how came you here, child? did you fly down the chimney, or in at the window? for I don't remember seeing you when I was here before.

Miss T. How can you talk so, Sir John? You really confound me with your suspicions; and then you ask so many questions, and I have so many things to do, that—that—upon my word, if I don't make haste, I sha'n't get my dress ready for the ball, so I must run—You'll excuse me, uncle! [Exit, running.]

Sir J. A fine, hopeful, young lady that, my lord!

Lord M. She's well bred, and has wit.

Sir J. She has wit and breeding enough to laugh at her relations, and bestow favours on your lordship; but I must tell you plainly, my lord—you'll excuse me—that your marrying your lady, my cousin, to use her ill, and sending for my niece, your cousin, to debauch her,—

Lord M. You're warm, Sir John, and don't know the world, and I never contend with ignorance and passion; live with me some time, and you'll be satisfied of my honour and good intentions to you and your family; in the mean time, command my house; I must away immediately to Lady Pilligree's—and I am sorry you wont make one with us—here, Jessamy, give me my domino, and call a chair; and don't let my uncle want for anything; you'll excuse me, Sir John; tol, lol, de rol, &c. [Exit, singing.]

Sir J. The world's at an end!—here's fine work! here are precious doings! this lord is a pillar of the state too: no wonder that the building is in danger with such rotten supporters;—heigh ho!—and then my poor Lady Minikin, what a friend and husband she is blessed with!—let me consider!—should I tell the good woman of these pranks? I may only make more mischief, and may hap go near to kill her, for she's as tender as she's virtuous; poor lady! I'll e'en go and comfort her directly, and endeavour to draw her from the wickedness of this town into the country, where she shall have reading, fowling, and fishing; to keep up her spirits, and when I die, I will leave her that part of my fortune, with which I intended to reward the virtues of Miss Lucretia Tittup, with a plague to her! [Exit.]

SCENE III. —LADY MINIKIN'S Apartment.

LADY MINIKIN and COLONEL TIVY discovered.

Lady M. Don't urge it, colonel; I can't think of coming home from the masquerade this evening; though I should pass for my niece, it would make an uproar among my servants; and perhaps from the mistake break off your match with Tittup.

Col. T. My dear Lady Minikin, you know my marriage with your niece is only a secondary consideration; my first and principal object is you—you, Madam!—therefore, my dear lady, give me your promise to leave the ball with me; you must, Lady Minikin; a bold young fellow and a soldier as I am, ought not to be kept from plunder when the town has capitulated.

Lady M. But it has not capitulated, and perhaps never will; however, colonel, since you are so furious, I must come to terms, I think. Keep your eyes upon me at the ball, I think I may expect that, and when I drop my handkerchief, 'tis your signal for pursuing; I shall get home as fast as I can, you may follow me as fast as you can; my lord and Tittup will be otherwise employed. Gymp will let us in the backway. No, no, my heart misgives me.

Col. T. Then I am miserable!

Lady M. Nay, rather than you should be miserable, colonel, I will indulge your martial spirit; meet me in the field; there's my gauntlet.

[Throws down her glove.]

Col. T. [Seizing it.] Thus I accept your sweet challenge; and, if I fail you, may I hereafter, both in love and war, be branded with the name of coward. [Kneels and kisses her hand.]

Enter SIR JOHN, opening the door.

Sir J. May I presume, cousin—

Lady M. Ha! [Squalls.]

Sir J. Mercy upon us, what are we at now?

[Looks astonished.]

Lady M. How can you be so rude, Sir John, to come into a lady's room without first knocking at the door? you have frightened me out of my wits.

Sir J. I am sure you have frightened me out of mine!

Col. T. Such rudeness deserves death!

Sir J. Death indeed! for I never shall recover myself again. All pigs of the same stye! all studying for the good of the nation!

Lady M. We must soothe him, and not provoke him. [Half aside to the Col.]

Col. T. I would cut his throat, if you'd permit me. [Aside to LADY MINIKIN.]

Sir J. The devil has got his hoof in the house, and has corrupted the whole family; I'll get out of it as fast as I can, lest he should lay hold of me too. [Going.]

Lady M. Sir John, I must insist upon your not going away in a mistake.

Sir J. No mistake, my lady, I am thoroughly convinced—mercy on me!

Lady M. I must beg you, Sir John, not to make any wrong constructions upon this accident; you must know, that the moment you was at the door—I had promised the colonel no longer to be his enemy in his designs upon Miss Tittup,—this threw him into such a rapture,—that upon my promising my interest with you—and wishing him joy—he fell upon his knees, and—and—[Laughing.] ha, ha, ha!

Col. T. Ha, ha, ha! yes, yes, I fell upon my knees, and—and—

Sir J. Ay, ay, fell upon your knees, and—and —ha, ha! a very good joke, faith; and the best of it is, that they are wishing joy all over the house upon the same occasion; and my lord is wishing joy; and I wish him joy, and you, with all my heart.

Lady M. Upon my word, Sir John, your cruel suspicions affect me strongly; and though my resentment is curbed by my regard, my tears cannot be restrained; 'tis the only resource my innocence has left.

[Exit, crying.]
Col. T. I reverence you, Sir, as a relation to that lady, but as her slanderer I detest you: her tears must be dried, and my honour satisfied; you know what I mean; take your choice;—time, place, sword, or pistol; consider it calmly, and determine as you please. I am a soldier, Sir John.

[Exit.]
Sir J. Very fine, truly! and so, between the crocodile and the bully, my throat is to be cut; they are guilty of all sorts of iniquity, and when they are discovered, no humility, no repentance!—the ladies have recourse to their tongues or their tears, and the gallants to their swords. That I may not be drawn in by the one, or drawn upon by the other, I'll hurry into the country while I retain my senses, and can sleep in a whole skin.

[Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.

Enter SIR JOHN AND JESSAMY.

Sir J. There is no bearing this! what a land are we in! upon my word, Mr. Jessamy, you should look well to the house, there are certainly rogues about it; for I did but cross the way just now to the pamphlet-shop, to buy a Touch of the Times, and they have taken my hanger from my side; ay, and had a pluck at my watch too; but I heard of their tricks, and had it sowed to my pocket.

Jes. Don't be alarmed, Sir John; 'tis a very common thing; and if you walk the streets without convoy, you will be picked up by privateers of all kinds; ha, ha!

Sir J. Not be alarmed when I am robbed!—why, they might have cut my throat with my own hanger! I sha'n't sleep a wink all night; so pray lend me some weapon of defence, for I am sure, if they attack me in the open street, they'll be with me at night again.

Jes. I'll lend you my own sword, Sir John; be assured there's no danger; there's robbing and murder cried every night under my window; but it no more disturbs me, than the ticking of my watch at my bed's head.

Sir J. Well, well, be that as it will, I must be upon my guard. What a dreadful place is this! but 'tis all owing to the corruption of the times; the great folks game, and the poor folks rob; no wonder that murder ensues; sad, sad, sad!—well, let me but get over to-night, and I'll leave this den of thieves to-morrow—how long will your lord and lady stay at this masking and nunnery before they come home?

Jes. 'Tis impossible to say the time, Sir; that merely depends upon the spirits of the company and the nature of the entertainment; for my own part, I generally make it myself till four or five in the morning.

Sir J. Why, what the devil! do you make one at these masqueradings?

Jes. I seldom miss, Sir; I may venture to say that nobody knows the trim and small talk of the place better than I do; I was always reckoned an incomparable mask.

Sir J. Thou art an incomparable coxcomb, I am sure.

[Aside.]

Jes. An odd, ridiculous accident happened to me at a masquerade three years ago; I was in tip-top spirits, and had drank a little too freely of the Champagne, I believe.

Sir J. You'll be hanged, I believe.

[Aside.]
Jes. Wit flew about—in short, I was in spirits—at last, from drinking and rattling, to vary the pleasure, we went to dancing, and who do you think I danced a minuet with? he, he! pray guess, Sir John!

Sir J. Danced a minuet with!

[Half aside.]

Jes. My own lady, that's all; the eyes of the whole assembly were upon us; my lady dances well; and I believe I am pretty tolerable: after the dance, I was running into a little coquetry and small talk with her.

Sir J. With your lady? Chaos is come again.

[Aside.]

Jes. With my lady—but upon my turning my hand thus [Conceitedly.]—egad, she caught me; whispered me who I was; I would fain have laughed her out of it, but it would not do;—no, no, Jessamy, says she, I am not to be deceived: pray wear gloves for the future; for you may as well go bare-faced, as show that hand and diamond ring.

Sir J. What a sink of iniquity!—Prostitution on all sides! from the lord to the pick-pocket.

[Aside.]
Jes. Pray, Mr. Jessamy, among your other virtues, I suppose you game a little, eh, Mr. Jessamy?

Jes. A little whist or so; but I am tied up from the dice; I must never touch a box again.

Sir J. I wish you was tied up somewhere else.

[Aside.]
Jes. I sweat from top to toe! Pray, lend me your sword, Mr. Jessamy; I shall go to my room; and let my lord and lady, and my niece Tittup, know, that I beg they will excuse ceremonies; that I must be up and gone before they go to bed; that I have a most profound respect and love for them, and—and—that I hope we shall never see one another again as long as we live.

Jes. I shall certainly obey your commands—what poor, ignorant wretches these country gentlemen are!

[Aside, and exit.]

Sir J. If I stay in this place another day, it would throw me into a fever!—Oh!—I wish it was morning! this comes of visiting my relations!

Enter DAVY, drunk.

So, you wicked wretch you—where have you been, and what have you been doing?

Davy. Merry-making, your honour.—London for ever!

Sir J. Did I not order you to come directly from the play, and not be idling and raking about?

Davy. Servants don't do what they are bid, in London.

Sir J. And did I not order you not to make a jackanapes of yourself, and tie your hair up like a monkey?

Davy. And therefore I did it—no pleasing the ladies without this—my lord's servants call you an old out-of-fashioned codger, and have taught me what's what.

Sir J. Here's an imp of the devil! he is undone, and will poison the whole country—sirrah, get every thing ready, I'll be going directly.

Davy. To bed, Sir?—I want to go to bed myself, Sir.

Sir J. Why, how now—you are drunk too, sirrah.

Davy. I am a little, your honour, because I have been drinking.

Sir J. That is not all—but you have been in bad company, sirrah?

Davy. Indeed your honour's mistaken, I never kept such good company in all my life.

Sir J. The fellow does not understand me—where have you been, you drunkard?

Davy. Drinking, to be sure, if I am a drunkard; and if you had been drinking too, as I have been, you would not be in such a passion with a body—it makes one so good natured.

Sir J. There is another addition to my misfortunes! I shall have this fellow carry into the country as many vices as will corrupt the whole parish.

Davy. I'll take what I can, to be sure, your worship.

Sir J. Get away, you beast you, and sleep off the debauchery you have contracted this fortnight, or I shall leave you behind, as a proper person to make one of his lordship's family.

Davy. So much the better—give me more wages, less work, and the key of the ale-cellar, and I am your servant; if not, provide yourself with another.

Sir J. Here's a reprobate!—this is the completion of my misery! but harkye, villain,—go to bed—and sleep off your iniquity, and then pack up the things, or I'll pack you off to Newgate, and transport you for life, you rascal you. [Exit.

Davy. That for you, old codger. [Snaps his fingers.] I know the law better than to be frightened with moonshine; I wish that I was to live here all my days,—this is the life indeed! a servant lives up to his eyes in clover; they have wages, and board wages, and nothing to do, but to grow fat and saucy—they are as happy as their master, they play for ever at cards, swear like emperors, drink like fishes, and go a wenching with as much ease and tranquillity, as if they were going to a sermon. Oh! 'tis a fine life!

[Exit, reclining.

SCENE II.—A Chamber in LORD MINIKIN'S House.

Enter LORD MINIKIN and MISS TITTUP in Masquerade Dresses, lighted by JESSAMY.

Lord M. Set down the candles, Jessamy; and should your lady come home, let me know—be sure you are not out of the way.

Jes. I have lived too long with your lordship to need the caution—who the devil have we got now? but that's my lord's business, and not mine.

[Exit.

Miss T. [Pulling off her mask.] Upon my word, my lord, this coming home so soon from the masquerade is very imprudent, and will certainly be observed—I am most inconceivably frightened, I can assure you—my uncle Trotley has a light in his room; the accident this morning will certainly keep him upon the watch—pray, my lord, let us defer our meetings till he goes into the country—I find that my English heart, though it has ventured so far, grows fearful, and awkward to practise the freedoms of warmer climes—[LORD M. takes her by the hand.] If you will not desist, my lord—we are separated for ever—the sight of the precipice turns my head; I have been giddy with it too long, and must turn from it while I can—pray, be quiet, my lord, I will meet you to-morrow.

Lord M. To-morrow! 'tis an age in my situation—let the weak, bashful, coyish whiner be intimidated with these faint alarms, but let the bold experienced lover kindle at the danger, and like the eagle in the midst of storms thus pounce upon his prey. [Takes hold of her.

Miss T. Dear Mr. Eagle, be merciful; pray let the poor pigeon fly for this once.

Lord M. If I do, my dove, may I be cursed to have my wife as fond of me, as I am now of thee.

[Offers to kiss her.

Jes. [Without, knocking at the door.] My lord, my lord!

Miss T. Ha!

[Screams.

Lord M. Who's there?

Jes. [Peeping.] 'Tis I, my lord; may I come in?

Lord M. Damn the fellow! What's the matter?

Jes. Nay, not much, my lord—only my lady's come home.

Miss T. Then I'm undone—what shall I do? I'll run into my own room.

Lord M. Then she may meet you—

Jes. There's a dark deep closet, my lord—Miss may hide herself there.

Miss T. For Heaven's sake, put me into it, and when her ladyship's safe, let me know, my lord.—What an escape have I had!

Lord M. The moment her evil spirit is laid, I'll let my angel out—[Puts her into the closet.]—lock the door on the inside—come softly to my room, Jessamy.

Jes. If a bary creaks, your lordship shall never give me a laced waistcoat again.

[Exit on tiptoes.

Enter GYMP, lighting in LADY MINIKIN and COLONEL TIVY, in Masquerade Dresses.

Gymp. Pray, my lady, go no farther with the colonel, I know you mean nothing but innocence, but I'm sure there will be bloodshed, for my lord is certainly in the house—I'll take my affidavit that I heard—

Col. T. It can't be, I tell you; we left him this moment at the masquerade—I spoke to him before I came out.

Lady M. He's too busy, and too well employed, to think of home—but don't tremble so, Gymp. There is no harm, I assure you—the colonel is to marry my niece, and it is proper to settle some matters relating to it—they are left to us.

Gymp. Yes, yes, madam, to be sure it is proper that you talk together—I know you mean nothing but innocence—but indeed there will be bloodshed.

Col. T. The girl's a fool. I have no sword by my side.

Gymp. But my lord has, and you may kill one another with that—I know you mean nothing but innocence, but I certainly heard him go up the back stairs into his room, talking with Jessamy.

Lady M. 'Tis impossible but the girl must have fancied this—Can't you ask Whisp, or Mignon, if their master is come in?

Gymp. Lord, my lady, they are always drunk before this, and asleep in the kitchen

Lady M. This frightened fool has made me as ridiculous as herself! hark!—Colonel, I'll swear there is something upon the stairs—now I am in the field I find I am a coward.

Gymp. There will certainly be bloodshed.

Col. T. I'll slip down with Gymp this back way then. [Going.]

Gymp. O dear, my lady, there is somebody coming up them too.

Col. T. Zounds! I've got between two fires!

Lady M. Run into the closet.

Col. T. [Runs to the closet.] There's no retreat—the door is locked!

Lady M. Behind the chimney-board, Gymp.

Col. T. I shall certainly be taken prisoner, [Gets behind the board.] you'll let me know when the enemy's decamped.

Lady M. Leave that to me—do you, Gymp, go down the back stairs, and leave me to face my lord, I think I can match him at hypocrisy.

[Sits down.]

Enter LORD MINIKIN.

Lord M. What, is your ladyship so soon returned from Lady Filligree's?

Lady M. I am sure, my lord, I ought to be more surprised at your being here so soon, when I saw you so well entertained in a tete-a-tete with a lady in crimson—such sights, my lord, will always drive me from my most favourite amusements.

Lord M. You find at least, that the lady, whoever she was, could not engage me to stay, when I found your ladyship had left the ball.

Lady M. Your lordship's sneering upon my unhappy temper may be a proof of your wit, but it is none of your humanity; and this behaviour is as great an insult upon me, as even your falsehood itself. [Pretends to weep.]

Lord M. Nay, my dear Lady Minikin, if you are resolved to play tragedy, I shall run away too, and pull out my cambric handkerchief.

Lady M. I think, my lord, we had better retire to our apartments; my weakness and your brutality will only expose us to our servants—Where is Tittup, pray?

Lord M. I left her with the colonel—a masquerade to young folks, upon the point of matrimony, is as delightful as it is disgusting to those who are happily married, and are wise enough to love home, and the company of their wives. [Takes hold of her hand.]

Lady M. False man! I had as lieve a toad touched me. [Aside.]

Lord M. She gives me the frisonne—I must propose to stay, or I shall never get rid of her. [Aside.]—I am aguish to-night,—he—he—do my dear, let us make a little fire here, and have a family tete-a-tete, by way of novelty. [Rings a bell.]

Enter JESSAMY.

Let 'em take away that chimney-board, and light a fire here immediately.

Lady M. What shall I do?—[Aside, and greatly alarmed.]—Here, Jessamy, there is no occasion—I am going to my own chamber, and my lord wont stay here by himself. [Exit JESSAMY.]

Lord M. How cruel it is, Lady Minikin, to deprive me of the pleasure of a domestic duetto—A good escape, faith! [Aside.]

Lady M. I have too much regard for Lord Minikin to agree to any thing that would afford him so little pleasure—I shall retire to my own apartment.

Lord M. Well, if your ladyship will be cruel, I must still, like the miser, starve and sigh, though possessed of the greatest treasure—[Bows.] I wish your ladyship a good night—[He takes one candle, and LADY MINIKIN the other.] May I presume— [Salutes her.]

Lady M. Your lordship is too obliging—nasty man! [Aside.]

Lord M. Disagreeable woman! [Aside.]

[Wipe their lips and exeunt different ways.]

Miss T. [Peeping out of the closet.] All's silent now, and quite dark; what has been doing here I cannot guess—I long to be relieved; I wish my lord was come—but I hear a noise! [She shuts the door.]

Col. T. [Peeping over the chimney-board.] I wonder my lady does not come—I would not have Miss Tittup know of this—'twould be ten thousand pounds out of my way, and I cannot afford to give so much for a little gallantry.

Miss T. [Comes forward.] What would my Colonel say, to find his bride, that is to be, in this critical situation?

Enter LORD MINIKIN at one door, in the dark.

Lord M. Now to release my prisoner.

[Comes forward.]

Enter LADY MINIKIN, at the other door.

Lady M. My poor colonel will be as miserable, as if we were besieged in garrison; I must release him.

Lord M. Hist! hist!

[Going towards the chimney.]

Miss T. Lord M. and Col. T. Here! here!

Lord M. This way.

Lady M. Softly.

[They all grope, till LORD MINIKIN has got LADY MINIKIN, and the COLONEL MISS TITTUP.]

Sir J. [Speaks without.] Lights this way, I say; I am sure there are thieves; get a blunderbuss.

Jes. Indeed you dream it, there is nobody but the family. [All stand and stare.]

Enter SIR JOHN in his night-cap, his hanger drawn, with JESSAMY.

Sir J. Give me the candle, I'll ferret 'em out, I warrant; bring a blunderbuss, I say: they have been skipping about that gallery in the dark this half hour; there must be mischief—I have watched them into this room—ho, ho, are you there?—If you stir, you are dead men—[They retire.]—and [Seeing the ladies.] women too!—egad—ha! what's this? the same party again! and two couple they are of as choice mortals as ever were hatched in this righteous town—you'll excuse me, cousins! [They all look confounded.]

Lord M. In the name of wonder, how comes all this about.

Sir J. Well, but harkye, my dear cousins, have you not got wrong partners?—here has been some mistake in the dark: I am mighty glad that I have brought you a candle to set all to rights again—you'll excuse me, gentlemen and ladies.

Enter GYMP, with a candle.

Gymp. What in the name of mercy is the matter?

Sir J. Why the old matter, and the old game,

Mrs. Gymp; and I'll match my cousins here at it against all the world, and I say done first.

Lord M. What is the meaning, Sir John, of all this tumult and consternation? may not Lady Minikin and I, and the colonel and your niece, be seen in my house together without your raising the family, and making this uproar and confusion?

Sir J. Come, come, good folks, I see you are all confounded, I'll settle this matter in a moment—as for you, colonel—though you have not deserved plain dealing from me, I will now be serious—you imagine this young lady has an independent fortune, besides expectations from me—'tis a mistake, she has no expectations from me, if she marry you; and if I don't consent to her marriage, she will have no fortune at all.

Col. T. Plain dealing is a jewel; and to show you, Sir John, that I can pay you in kind, I am most sincerely obliged to you for your intelligence; and I am, ladies your most obedient, humble servant—I shall see you, my lord, at the club to-morrow?

[Exit.]

Lord M. Sans doute, mon cher colonel—I'll meet you there, without fail.

Sir J. My lord, you'll have something else to do.

Lord M. Indeed! what is that, good Sir John?

Sir J. You must meet your lawyers and creditors to-morrow, and be told what you have always turned a deaf ear to—that the dissipation of your fortune and morals must be followed by years of parsimony and repentance—as you are fond of going abroad, you may indulge that inclination without having it in your power to indulge any other.

Lord M. The bumpkin is no fool, and is damned satirical.

[Aside.]

Sir J. This kind of quarantine for pestilential minds will bring you to your senses, and make you renounce foreign vices and follies, and return with joy to your country and property again—read that, my lord, and know your fate.

[Gives a paper.]

Lord M. What an abomination is this! that a man of fashion, and a nobleman, shall be obliged to submit to the laws of his country.

Sir J. Thank Heaven, my lord, we are in that country!—You are silent, ladies—if repentance has subdued your tongues, I shall have hopes of you—a little country air might perhaps do well—as you are distressed, I am at your service—what say you, my lady?

Lady M. However appearances have condemned me, give me leave to disavow the substance of those appearances. My mind has been tainted, but not profligate—your kindness and example may restore me to my former natural English constitution.

Sir J. Will you resign your lady to me, my lord, for a time?

Lord M. For ever, dear Sir John, without a murmur.

Sir J. Well, Miss, and what say you?

Miss T. Guilty, uncle.

[Courtesying.]

Sir J. Guilty! the devil you are? of what?

Miss T. Of consenting to marry one whom my heart does not approve; and coquetting with another, which friendship, duty, honour, morals, and every thing but fashion, ought to have forbidden.

Sir J. Thus then, with the wife of one under this arm, and the mistress of another under this, I sally forth a knight-errant, to rescue distressed damsels from those monsters, foreign vices, and Bon Ton, as they call it; and I trust that every English hand and heart here will assist me in so desperate an undertaking—You'll excuse me, Sirs!

THE ORPHAN:

OR,

THE UNHAPPY MARRIAGE.

A TRAGEDY,

IN FIVE ACTS.

BY THOMAS OTWAY.

REMARKS.

To the great merit of Miss O'Neil, in Monimia, we are indebted for the revival of this tragedy, which was originally played at the Duke's Theatre, in 1680; and long kept possession of the stage. The language of this play is poetical and tender, and the incidents affecting; but, amidst many beauties, there is great inconsistency.*

Dr. Johnson observes,—“This is one of the few pieces that has pleased for almost a century, through all the vicissitudes of dramatic fashion. Of this play, nothing new can easily be said. It is a domestic tragedy, drawn from middle life;—its whole power is upon the affections; for it is not written with much comprehension of thought, or elegance of expression. But, if the heart is interested, many other beauties may be wanting, yet not be missed.”

SCENE—Bohemia.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Garden.

Enter CASTALIO, POLYDORE, and PAGE.

Cas. Polydore, our sport
Has been to-day much better for the danger:
When on the brink the foaming boar I met,

And in his side thought to have lodg'd my spear,
The desperate savage rush'd within my force,
And bore me headlong with him down the rock.

Pol. But then——

Cas. Ay, then, my brother, my friend, Polydore,

Like Perseus mounted on his winged steed,

* Many readers will, probably, exclaim with the critic, when he first saw it,—“Oh! what an infinite deal of mischief would a farthing rush-light have prevented”

Came on, and down the dangerous precipice leap'd

To save Castalio.—'Twas a godlike act!

Pol. But when I came, I found you conqueror.
Oh! my heart danc'd, to see your danger past!
The heat and fury of the chase was cold,
And I had nothing in my mind but joy.

Cas. So, Polydore, methinks, we might in war

Rush on together; thou shouldst be my guard,
And I be thine. What is't could hurt us then?
Now half the youth of Europe are in arms,
How fulsome must it be to stay behind,
And die of rank diseases here at home!

Pol. No, let me purchase in my youth renown,
To make me loved and valued when I'm old;
I would be busy in the world, and learn,
Not like a coarse and useless dunghill weed,
Fix'd to one spot, and rot just as I grow.

Cas. Our father
Has ta'en himself a surfeit of the world,
And cries, it is not safe that we should taste it.
I own, I have duty very powerful in me:
And though I'd hazard all to raise my name,
Yet he's so tender, and so good a father,
I could not do a thing to cross his will.

Pol. Castalio, I have doubts within my heart,
Which you, and only you, can satisfy.

Will you be free and candid to your friend?

Cas. Have I a thought my Polydore should not know?

What can this mean?

Pol. Nay, I'll conjure you too,
By all the strictest bonds of faithful friendship,
To show your heart as naked in this point,
As you would purge you of your sins to Heaven.
And should I chance to touch it near, bear it
With all the sufferance of a tender friend.

Cas. As calmly as the wounded patient bears
The artist's hand, that ministers his cure.

Pol. That's kindly said.—You know our father's ward,

The fair Monimia:—is your heart at peace?
Is it so guarded, that you could not love her?

Cas. Suppose I should?

Pol. Suppose you should not, brother?

Cas. You'd say, I must not.

Pol. That would sound too roughly

'Twixt friends and brothers, as we two are.

Cas. Is love a fault?

Pol. In one of us it may be—

What, if I love her?

Cas. Then I must inform you

I lov'd her first, and cannot quit the claim;
But will preserve the birthright of my passion.

Pol. You will?

Cas. I will.

Pol. No more; I've done.

Cas. Why not?

Pol. I told you, I had done.

But you, Castalio, would dispute it.

Cas. No;

Not with my Polydore:—though I must own
My nature obstinate, and void of sufferance;
I could not bear a rival in my friendship,
I am so much in love, and fond of thee.

Pol. Yet you will break this friendship!

Cas. Not for crowns.

Pol. But for a toy you would, a woman's toy,
Unjust Castalio!

Cas. Pry thee, where's my fault?

Pol. You love Monimia.

Cas. Yes.

Pol. And you would kill me,

If I'm your rival?

Cas. No;—sure we're such friends,
So much one man, that our affections too
Must be united, and the same as we are.

Pol. I dote upon Monimia.

Cas. Love her still;

Win, and enjoy her.

Pol. Both of us cannot.

Cas. No matter

Whose chance it prove; but let's not quarrel for't.

Pol. You would not wed Monimia, would you?

Cas. Wed her!

No—were she all desire could wish, as fair
As would the vainest of her sex be thought,
With wealth beyond what woman's pride could waste,

She should not cheat me of my freedom.—Marry!

When I am old and weary of the world,

I may grow desperate,

And take a wife to mortify withal.

Pol. It is an elder brother's duty, so

To propagate his family and name.

You would not have yours die, and buried with you?

Cas. Mere vanity, and silly dotage, all:—

No, let me live at large, and when I die—

Pol. Who shall possess th' estate you leave?

Cas. My friend,

If he survive me; if not, my king,
Who may bestow't again on some brave man,
Whose honesty and services deserve one.

Pol. 'Tis kindly offer'd.

Cas. By yon heaven, I love

My Polydore beyond all worldly joys;

And would not shock his quiet, to be bless'd

With greater happiness than man e'er tasted.

Pol. And, by that heaven, eternally I swear

To keep the kind Castalio in my heart.

Whose shall Monimia be?

Cas. No matter whose.

Pol. Were you not with her privately last night?

Cas. I was; and should have met her here

The opportunity shall now be thine? [again.

But have a care, by friendship I conjure thee,

That no false play be offer'd to thy brother.

Urge all thy powers to make thy passion prosper?

But wrong not mine.

Pol. By Heaven, I will not.

Cas. If't prove thy fortune, Polydore, to conquer

(For thou hast all the arts of soft persuasion;)

Trust me, and let me know thy love's success,

That I may ever after stife mine.

Pol. Though she be dearer to my soul than

To weary pilgrims, or to miser's gold, [rest

To great men power, or wealthy cities' pride;

Rather than wrong Castalio, I'd forget her.

[Exeunt CASTALIO and POLYDORE.

Enter MONIMIA.

Mon. Pass'd not Castalio and Polydore this way?

Mon. Sure, some ill fate's upon me

Distrust and heaviness sit round my heart,

And apprehension shocks my tim'rous soul.

Why was I not laid in my peaceful grave

With my poor parents, and at rest as they are.

Instead of that, I'm wandering into cares.—

Castalio! O Castalio! hast thou caught
My foolish heart; and, like a tender child,
That trusts his plaything to another hand,
I fear its harm, and fain would have it back.
Come near, Cordelio; I must chide you, Sir.

Page. Why, Madam, have I done you any wrong?

Mon. I never see you now; you have been kinder;
Perhaps I've been ungrateful. Here 's money for you.

Page. Madam, I'd serve you with all my soul.

Mon. Tell me, Cordelio (for thou oft hast heard

Their friendly converse, and their bosom secrets,) Sometimes, at least, have they not talk'd of me?

Page. O Madam! very wickedly they have talk'd:

But I am afraid to name it: for, they say, Boys must be whipp'd, that tell their masters' secrets.

Mon. Fear not, Cordelio; it shall ne'er be known;

For I'll preserve the secret as 'twere mine.

Polydore cannot be so kind as I.

I'll furnish thee with all thy harmless sports,
With pretty toys, and thou shalt be so.

Page. And truly, Madam, I had rather be so.

Methinks you love me better than my lord;

For he was never half so kind as you are.

What must I do?

Mon. Inform me how thou'st heard

Castalio and his brother use my name.

Page. With all the tenderness of love,

You were the subject of their last discourse.

At first I thought it would have fatal prov'd;

But, as the one grew hot, the other cool'd,

And yielded to the frailty of his friend;

At last, after much struggling, 'twas resolv'd—

Mon. What, good Cordelio?

Page. Not to quarrel for you.

Mon. I would not have 'em, by my dearest hopes;

I would not be the argument of strife.

But surely my Castalio wont forsake me,

And make a mockery of my easy love!

Went they together?

Page. Yes, to seek you, Madam.

Castalio promised Polydore to bring him,

Where he alone might meet you,

And fairly try the fortune of his wishes.

Mon. Am I then grown so cheap, just to be made

A common stake, a prize for love in jest?

Was not Castalio very loth to yield it?

Or was it Polydore's unruly passion,

That heighten'd the debate?

Castalio play'd with love, and smiling show'd

The pleasure, not the pangs of his desire.

He said, no woman's smiles should buy his freedom;

And marriage is a mortifying thing. [Exit.]

Mon. Then I am ruin'd! if Castalio's false,

Where is there faith and honour to be found?

Ye gods, that guard the innocent, and guide

The weak, protect and take me to your care.

O, but I love him! There's the rock will wreck

me!

Why was I made with all my sex's fondness,

Yet want the cunning to conceal its follies!

I'll see Castalio, tax him with his falsehoods,

Be a true woman, rail, protest my wrongs,
Resolve to hate him, and yet love him still.

Re-enter CASTALIO and POLYDORE.

He comes.

Cas. Madam, my brother begs he may have leave

To tell you something that concerns you nearly.
I leave you, as becomes me, and withdraw.

Mon. My lord Castalio!

Cas. Madam!

Mon. Have you purpos'd

To abuse me palpably? What means this usage?

Why am I left with Polydore alone?

Cas. He best can tell you. Business of importance

Calls me away: I must attend my father.

Mon. Will you then leave me thus?

Cas. But for a moment.

Mon. It has been otherwise: the time has been,
When business might have stay'd, and I been heard.

Cas. I could for ever hear thee; but this time
Matters of such odd circumstances press me,

That I must go. [Exit.]

Mon. Then go, and if't be possible, for ever.

Well, my lord Polydore, I guess your business,

And read th' ill-natur'd purpose in your eyes.

Pol. If to desire you, more than misers wealth,

Or dying men an hour of added life;

If softest wishes, and a heart more true

Than ever suffer'd yet for love disdain'd,

Speak an ill-nature; you accuse me justly.

Mon. Talk not of love, my lord, I must not hear it.

Pol. Who can behold such beauty and be silent?
[ated,]

Desire first taught us words. Man, when crea-

At first alone long wander'd up and down

Forlorn, and silent as his vassal beasts:

But when a heaven-born maid, like you, appear'd,

Strange pleasures fill'd his eyes and fir'd his heart,

Unloos'd his tongue, and his first talk was love.

Mon. The first created pair indeed were bless'd;

They were the only objects of each other,

Therefore he courted her, and her alone;

But in this peopled world of beauty, where

There's roving room, where you may court, and ruin

A thousand more, why need you talk to me?

Pol. Oh! I could talk to thee for ever. Thus Eternally admiring, fix, and gaze,

On those dear eyes; for every glance they send

Darts through my soul.

Mon. How can you labour thus for my undoing?

I must confess, indeed, I owe you more

Than ever I can hope, or think, to pay.

There always was a friendship 'twixt our families

And therefore when my tender parents died,

Whose ruin'd fortunes too expir'd with them,

Your father's pity and his bounty took me,

A poor and helpless orphan, to his care.

Pol. 'Twas Heaven ordain'd it so, to make me happy.

Hence with this peevish virtue, 'tis a cheat;

And those who taught it first were hypocrites.

Come, these soft tender limbs were made for yielding.

Mon. Here, on my knees, by Heaven's bless'd power I swear, [Kneels.]

If you persist, I ne'er henceforth will see you,
But rather wander through the world a beggar,
And live on sordid scraps at proud men's doors;
For, though to fortune lost, I'll still inherit
My mother's virtues, and my father's honour.

Pol. Intolerable vanity! your sex
Was never in the right! y^e are always false,
Or silly; even your dresses are not more
Fantastic than your appetites: you think
Of nothing twice; opinion you have none.
To-day y^e are nice, to-morrow not so free;
Now smile, then frown; now sorrowful, then glad; [why!

Now pleas'd, now not: and all, you know not
Mon. Indeed, my lord,

I own my sex's follies; I have 'em all;
And, to avoid its fault, must fly from you.
Therefore, believe me, could you raise me high
As most fantastic woman's wish could reach,
And lay all nature's riches at my feet;
I'd rather run a savage in the woods,
Amongst brute beasts, grow wrinkled and de-form'd,

So I might still enjoy my honour safe,
From the destroying wiles of faithless men.

[Exit.
Pol. Who'd be that sordid thing call'd man?
I'll yet possess my love; it shall be so. [Exeunt.

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Saloon.

Enter ACASTO, CASTALIO, POLYDORE, and Attendants.

Acas. To-day has been a day of glorious sport;
When you, Castalio, and your brother, left me,
Forth from the thicket's rush'd another boar,
So large, he seem'd the tyrant of the woods,
With all his dreadful bristles rais'd up high.
They seem'd a grove of spears upon his back;
Foaming he came at me, where I was posted
Best to observe which way he'd lead the chase,
Whetting his huge, large tusks, and gaping wide,
As if he already had me for his prey!
Till, brandishing my well- pois'd javelin high,
With this bold executing arm I struck
The ugly brindled monster to the heart.

Cas. The actions of your life were always wondrous.

Acas. No flattery, boy! an honest man can't live by't;

It is a little, sneaking art, which knaves
Use to cajole and soften fools withal.
If thou hast flattery in thy nature, out with't,
Or send it to a court, for there 'twill thrive.

Cas. Your lordship's wrongs have been
So great, that you with justice may complain;
But suffer us, whose younger minds ne'er felt
Fortune's deceits, to court her, as she's fair:
Were she a common mistress, kind to all,
Her worth would cease, and half the world grow idle.

Methinks, I would be busy.

Pol. So would I,
Not loiter out my life at home, and know
No further than one prospect gives me leave.

Acas. Busy your minds then, study arts and men;

Learn how to value merit, though in rags,
And scorn a proud, ill-manner'd knave in office.

Enter SERINA.

Ser. My lord, my father!

Acas. Blessings on my child!

My little cherub, what hast thou to ask me?

Ser. I bring you, Sir, most glad and welcome news;

The young Chamont, whom you've so often wish'd for,

Is just arriv'd, and entering.

Acas. By my soul,

And all my honours, he 's most dearly welcome;
Let me receive him like his father's friend.

Enter CHAMONT.

Welcome, thou relic of the best lov'd man!

Welcome, from all the turmoils and the hazards
Of certain danger and uncertain fortune!

Welcome, as happy tidings after fears.

Cham. Words would but wrung the gratitude

I owe you!

Should I begin to speak, my soul 's so full,

That I should talk of nothing else all day.

Enter MONIMIA.

Mon. My brother!

Cham. O my sister, let me hold thee

Long in my arms: I've not beheld thy face

These many days; by night I've often seen thee

In gentle dreams, and satisfied my soul

With fancied joys, till morning cares awak'd me.

Another sister! sure, it must be so;

Though I remember well I had but one:

But I feel something in my heart that prompts,

And tells me, she has claim and interest there.

Acas. Young soldier, you've not only studied
war;

Courtship, I see, has been your practice too,

And may not prove unwelcome to my daughter.

Cham. Is she your daughter? then my heart told true,

And I'm at least her brother by adoption;

For you have made yourself to me a father,

And by that patent I have leave to love her.

Ser. Monimia, thou hast told me men are false,

Will flatter, feign, and make an art of love:

Is Chamont so? no, sure, he 's more than man;

Something that 's near divine, and truth dwells in him.

Acas. Thus happy, who would envy pompous power,

The luxury of courts, or wealth of cities?

Let there be joy through all the house this day!

In every room let plenty flow at large!

It is the birth-day of my royal master!

You have not visited the court, Chamont,

Since your return?

Cham. I have no business there;

I have not slavish temperance enough

T' attend a favourite's heels, and watch his

Bear an ill office done me to my face, [smiles,

And thank the lord that wrong'd me, for his favour.

Acas. This you could do.

[To his Sons.

Cas. I'd serve my prince.

Acas. Who'd serve him?

Cas. I would, my lord.

Pol. And I; both would.

Acas. Away!

He needs not any servants such as you.

Serve him! he merits more than man can do!

He is so good, praise cannot speak his worth;

So merciful, sure he ne'er slept in wrath!

So just, that, were he but a private man,

He could not do a wrong! How would you serve him?

Cas. I'd serve him with my fortune here at home,

And serve him with my person in his wars:
Watch for him, fight for him, bleed for him.

Pol. Die for him,

As every true-born, loyal subject ought.

Acas. Let me embrace ye both! now, by the souls

Of my brave ancestors, I'm truly happy!

For this, be ever bless'd my marriage day!

Bless'd be your mother's memory, that bore you;

And doubly bless'd be that auspicious hour

That gave ye birth?

Enter a SERVANT.

Serv. My lord, th' expected guests are just arriv'd.

Acas. Go you and give 'em welcome and reception.

[Exeunt CASTALIO and POLYDORE.]

Cham. My lord, I stand in need of your assistance,

In something that concerns my peace and honour.

Acas. Spoke like the son of that brave man I lov'd!

So freely, friendly, we convers'd together.

Whate'er it be, with confidence impart it;

Thou shalt command my fortune, and my sword.

Cham. I dare not doubt your friendship, nor your justice,

Your bounty shown to what I hold most dear,

My orphan sister, must not be forgotten!

Acas. Pr'ythee no more of that, it grates my nature.

Cham. When our dear parents died, they died together;

One fate surpris'd 'em, and one grave receiv'd 'em;

My father, with his dying breath, bequeath'd

Her to my love; my mother, as she lay

Languishing by him, call'd me to her side,

Took me in her fainting arms, wept, and embrac'd me;

Then press'd me close, and, as she observ'd my tears,

Kiss'd them away: said she, "Chamont, my son,

By this, and all the love I ever show'd thee,

Be careful of Monimia: watch her youth;

Let not her wants betray her to dishonour;

Perhaps, kind Heaven may raise some friend."

Then sigh'd,

Kiss'd me again; so bless'd us, and expir'd.

Pardon my grief.

Acas. It speaks an honest nature.

Cham. The friend Heaven rais'd was you; you took her up,

An infant, to the desert world expos'd,

And prov'd another parent.

Acas. I've not wrong'd her.

Cham. Far be it from my fears.

Acas. Then why this argument?

Cham. My lord, my nature 's jealous, and you'll bear it.

Acas. Go on.

Cham. Great spirits bear misfortunes hardly;

Good offices claim gratitude; and pride,

Where power is wanting, will usurp a little,

And make us (rather than be thought behind hand)

Pay over price.

Acas. I cannot guess your drift;
Distrust you me?

Cham. No, but I fear her weakness

May make her pay her debt at any rate:

And, to deal freely with your lordship's goodness,

I've heard a story lately much disturbs me.

Acas. Then first charge her; and if th' offence be found Within my reach, though it should touch my nature,

In my own offspring, by the dear remembrance

Of thy brave father, whom my heart rejoic'd in,
I'd prosecute it with severest vengeance. [Exit.]

Cham. I thank you, from my soul.

Mon. Alas, my brother! what have I done?

My heart quakes in me; in your settled face,

And clouded brow, methinks I see my fate.

You will not kill me?

Cham. Pr'ythee, why dost thou talk so?

Mon. Look kindly on me then; I cannot bear

Severity; it daunts, and does amaze me;

My heart 's so tender, should you charge me rough,

I should but weep, and answer you with sobbing;

But use me gently, like a loving brother,

And search through all the secrets of my soul.

Cham. Fear nothing, I will show myself a brother.

A tender, honest, and a loving brother.

You've not forgot our father?

Mon. I never shall.

Cham. Then you'll remember too he was a

That liv'd up to the standard of his honour,

And priz'd that jewel more than mines of wealth:

He'd not have done a shameful thing but once:

Though kept in darkness from the world, and hidden,

He could not have forgiven it to himself.

This was the only portion that he left us;

And I more glory in't than if possess'd

Of all that ever fortune threw on fools.

'T was a large trust, and must be manag'd nicely;

Now, if by any chance, Monimia,

You have soil'd this gem, and taken from its

How will you account with me? [value,

Mon. I challenge envy,

Malice, and all the practices of hell,

To censure all the actions of my past

Unhappy life, and taint me if they can!

Cham. I'll tell thee, then; three nights ago, as I

Lay musing on my bed, all darkness round me,

A sudden damp struck to my heart, cold sweat

Dew'd all my face, and trembling seiz'd my limbs:

My bed shook under me, the curtains started,

And to my tortur'd fancy there appear'd

The form of thee, thus beauteous as thou art;

Thy garments flowing loose, and in each hand

A wanton lover, who by turns caress'd thee

With all the freedom of unbounded pleasure.

I snatch'd my sword, and in the very moment

Darted it at the phantom; straight it left me;

Then rose, and call'd for lights, when, O dire omen!

I found my weapon had the arras pierc'd,

Just where that famous tale was interwoven,

How the unhappy Theban slew his father.

Mon. And for this cause my virtue is suspected!

Because in dreams your fancy has been ridden,

I must be tortur'd waking!

Cham. Have a care;

Labour not to be justified too fast:

Hear all, and then let justice hold the scale.

What follow'd was the riddle that confounds me.
Through a close lane, as I pursu'd my journey,
And meditating on the last night's vision,
I spy'd a wrinkled hag, with age grown double,
Picking dry sticks, and mumbling to herself;
Her eyes with scalding rheum were gall'd and red:

[wither'd.
Cold palsy shook her head, her hand seem'd
And on her crooked shoulders had she wrapp'd
The tatter'd remnant of an old striped hanging,
Which serv'd to keep her carcass from the cold:
So there was nothing of a piece about her.

Her lower weeds were all o'er coarsely patch'd
With different colour'd rags, black, red, white, yellow,

And seem'd to speak variety of wretchedness.
I ask'd her of my way, which she inform'd me;
Then crav'd my charity, and bade me hasten
To save a sister! at that word, I started!

Mon. The common cheat of beggars; every day

They flock about our doors, pretend to gifts
Of prophecy, and telling fools their fortunes.

Cham. Oh! but she told me such a tale, Mo-nimia,

As in it bore great circumstance of truth:
Castalio and Polydore, my sister.

Mon. Ha!

Cham. What, alter'd? does your courage fail
you?

Now, by my father's soul, the witch was honest.
Answer me, if thou hast not lost them
Thy honour at a sordid game?

Mon. I will.

I must, so hardly my misfortune loads me—
That both have offer'd me their love's most true.

Cham. And 'tis as true too they have both undone thee.

Mon. Though they both with earnest vows
Have press'd my heart, if e'er in thought I yielded
To any but Castalio—

Cham. But Castalio!

Mon. Still will you cross the line of my discourse.
Yes, I confess that he hath won my soul
By generous love and honourable vows,
Which he this day appointed to complete,
And make himself by holy marriage mine.

Cham. Art thou then spotless? hast thou still preserv'd

Thy virtue white, without a blot, untainted?

Mon. When I'm unchaste, may Heaven reject my prayers;

O more, to make me wretched, may you know it!

Cham. Oh, then, Monimia, art thou dearer to
me

Than all the comforts ever yet bless'd man.

But let not marriage bait thee to thy ruin.

Trust not a man; we are by nature false,

Dissembling, subtle, cruel, and inconstant:

When a man talks of love, with caution trust
him;

But if he swears, he'll certainly deceive thee.

I charge thee, let no more Castalio soothe thee;

Avoid it, as thou wouldst preserve the peace

Of a poor brother, to whose soul thou'rt precious.

Mon. I will.

Cham. Appear as cold, when next you meet,
as great ones,

When merit begs; then shalt thou see how soon

His heart will cool, and all his pains grow easy.

[Exit.

Mon. Yes, I will try him, torture him severely;

For, O, Castalio, thou too much hast wrong'd
me,

In leaving me to Polydore's ill usage.

He comes; and now, for once, O Love, stand neuter,

Whilst a hard part's performed; for I must tempt, Wound his soft nature, though my heart aches
for't.

Re-enter CASTALIO.

Cas. Monimia, my angel! 'twas not kind
To leave me here alone.

Re-enter POLYDORE, with PAGE, at the door.

Pol. Here place yourself, and watch my brother thoroughly;

Pass not one circumstance without remark.

[Apart to PAGE, and exit.

Cas. When thou art from me, every place is desert,

And I, methinks, am savage and forlorn:
Thy presence only 'tis can make me bless'd,
Heal my unquiet mind, and tune my soul.

Mon. O the bewitching tongues of faithless men!

'Tis thus the false hyena makes her moan,

To draw the pitying traveller to her den:

Your sex are so, such false dissemblers all;

With sighs and complaints y' entice poor women's hearts,

And all that pity you are made your prey.

Cas. What means my love? Oh, how have I deserv'd

This language from the sovereign of my joys?

Stop, stop these tears, Monimia, for they fall

Like baneful dew from a distemper'd sky:

I feel 'em chill me to my very heart.

Mon. Oh, you are false, Castalio, most for-sworn!

Attempt no further to delude my faith;

My heart is fix'd, and you shall shake't no more.

Cas. Who told you so; what hell-bred villain durst

Profane the sacred business of my love?

Mon. Your brother, knowing on what terms
I'm here,

Th' unhappy object of your father's charity,

Licentiously discours'd to me of love,

And durst affront me with his brutal passion.

Cas. 'Tis I have been to blame, and only I;

False to my brother, and unjust to thee.

For, oh! he loves thee too, and this day own'd it,

Tax'd me with mine, and claim'd a right above
me.

Mon. And was your love so very tame, to shrink?

Or, rather than lose him, abandon me?

Cas. I, knowing him precipitate and rash,

Seem'd to comply with his unruly will;

Lest he in rage might have our loves betray'd,

And I for ever had Monimia lost.

Mon. Could you then, did you, can you own it too?

'Twas poorly done, unworthy of yourself?

And I can never think you meant me fair.

Cas. Is this Monimia? Surely, no! till now

I ever thought her dove-like, soft, and kind.

Who trusts his heart with woman's surely lost.

You were made fair on purpose to undo us,

While greedily we snatch th' alluring bait,

And ne'er distrust the poison that it hides.

Mon. When love, ill-plac'd, would find a means to break—

Cas. It never wants pretences or excuse.

Mo. Man therefore was a lord-like creature made,

Rough as the winds, and as inconstant too:
A lofty aspect given him for command;
Easily soften'd when he would betray.
Like conquering tyrants, you our breasts invade;
But soon you find new conquests out, and leave
The ravag'd province ruin'd and waste.
If so, Castalio, you have serv'd my heart,
I find that desolation 's settled there,
And I shall ne'er recover peace again.

Cas. Who can hear this and bear an equal mind?

Since you will drive me from you, I must go:
But, O Monimia! when thou hast banish'd me,
No creeping slave, though tractable and dull,
As artful woman for her ends would choose,
Shall ever dote as I have done.

Mon. Castalio, stay! we must not part. I find
My rage ebbs out, and love flows in apace.
These little quarrels love must needs forgive.
Oh! charm me with the music of thy tongue,
I'm ne'er so bless'd as when I hear thy vows,
And listen to the language of thy heart.

Cas. Where am I? Surely, Paradise is round me!

Sweets planted by the hand of Heaven grow here,
And every sense is full of thy perfection.
Sure, framing thee, Heaven took unusual care;
As its own beauty it design'd thee fair,
And form'd thee by the best lov'd angel there.

[Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Garden.

Enter POLYDOR and PAGE.

Pol. Were they so kind? Express it to me all
In words; 'twill make me think I saw it too.

Page. At first I thought they had been mortal foes:

Monimia rag'd, Castalio grew disturb'd:
Each thought the other wrong'd; yet both so haughty,
They scorn'd submission, though love all the while

The rebel play'd, and scarce could be contain'd.

Pol. But what succeeded?

Page. Oh, 'twas wondrous pretty!

For of a sudden all the storm was past:
A gentle calm of love succeeded it:
Monimia sigh'd and blush'd; Castalio swore;
As you, my lord, I well remember, did
To my young sister, in the orange grove,
When I was first preferr'd to be your page.

Pol. Boy, go to your chamber, and prepare your lute. [Exit PAGE.]

Happy Castalio! now, by my great soul,
My ambitious soul, that languishes to glory,
I'll have her yet; by my best hopes, I will;
She shall be mine, in spite of all her arts.
But for Castalio, why was I refus'd?
Has he supplanted me by some foul play?
Traduc'd my honour? death! he durst not do't.
It must be so: we parted, and he met her,
Half to compliance brought by me; surpris'd
Her sinking virtue, till she yielded quite.
So poachers pick up tired game,
While the fair hunter 's cheated of his prey.
Boy!

Enter a SERVANT.

Serv. Oh, the unhappiest tidings tongue e'er told!

Pol. The matter?

Serv. Oh! your father, my good master,
As with his guests he sat in mirth rais'd high,
And chas'd the goblet round the joyful board,
A sudden trembling seiz'd on all his limbs;
His eyes distorted grew, his visage pale,
His speech forsook him, life itself seem'd fled,
And all his friends are waiting now about him.

Enter ACAS^TO and Attendants.

Acas. Support me, give me air, I'll yet recover.
'Twas but a slip decaying nature made;
For she grows weary near her journey's end.
Where are my sons? come near, my Polydore!
Your brother—where 's Castalio?

Serv. My lord,
I've search'd, as you commanded, all the house!
He and Monimia are not to be found.

Acas. Not to be found? then where are all my friends?

'Tis well—

I hope they'll pardon an unhappy fault
My unmanly infirmity has made!
Death could not come in a more welcome hour;
For I'm prepar'd to meet him; and, methinks,
Would live and die with all my friends about me.

Enter CASTALIO.

Cas. Angels preserve my dearest father's life!
Oh! may he live till time itself decay,
Till good men wish him dead, or I offend him!

Acas. Thank you, Castalio: give me both your hands.

So now, methinks,
I appear as great as Hercules himself,
Supported by the pillars he has rais'd.

Enter SERINA.

Ser. My father!

Acas. My heart's darling.

Ser. Let my knees

Fix to the earth. Ne'er let my eyes have rest,
But wake and weep, till Heaven restore my father Acas. Rise to my arms, and thy kind pray'rs are answer'd.

For thou't a wondrous extract of all goodness;
Born for my joy, and no pain 's felt when near Chamont! [thee.]

Enter CHAMONT.

Cham. My lord, may't prove not an unlucky omen!

Many I see are waiting round about you,
And I am come to ask a blessing too.

Acas. May'st thou be happy!

Cham. Where?

Acas. In all thy wishes.

Cham. Confirm me so, and make this fair one mine:

I am unpractis'd in the trade of courtship,
And know not how to deal love out with art:
Onsets in love seem best like those in war,
Pierce, resolute, and done with all the force;
So I would open my whole heart at once,
And pour out the abundance of my soul.

Acas. What says Serina? canst thou love a soldier?

One born to honour, and to honour bred?
One that has learn'd to treat e'en foes with kind ness, [self?]
To wrong no good man's fame, nor praise him-

Ser. Oh! name not love, for that 's allied to joy;
 And joy must be a stranger to my heart,
 When you're in danger. May Chamont's good fortune
 Render him lovely to some happier maid!
 Whilst I, at friendly distance, see him bless'd,
 Praise the kind gods, and wonder at his virtues.
Acas. Chamont, pursue her, conquer, and possess her,
 And, as my son, a third of all my fortune
 Shall be thy lot.
 Chamont, you told me of some doubts that press'd
 you:
 Are you yet satisfied that I'm your friend?
Cham. My lord, I would not lose that satisfaction,
 For any blessing I could wish for:
 As to my fears, already I have lost them:
 They ne'er shall vex me more, nor trouble you.
Acas. I thank you.
 My friends, 'tis late:
 Now my disorder seems all past and over,
 And I, methinks, begin to feel new health. [quite.
Cas. Would you but rest, it might restore you.
Acas. Yes, I'll to bed; old men must humour weakness.
 Good night, my friends! Heaven guard you all!
 Good night!
 To-morrow early we'll salute the day,
 Find out new pleasures, and renew lost time.
 [Exeunt all but CHAMONT and CHAPLAIN.
Cham. If you're at leisure, Sir, we'll waste an hour:
 'Tis yet too soon to sleep, and 'twill be charity
 To lend your conversation to a stranger.
Chap. Sir, you're a soldier?
Cham. Yes.
Chap. I love a soldier;
 And had been one myself, but that my parents
 Would make me what you see me.
Cham. Have you had long dependence on this family?
Chap. I have not thought it so, because my time 's
 Spent pleasantly. My lord 's not haughty nor imperious,
 Nor I gravely whimsical: he has good nature.
 His sons too are civil to me, because I do not pretend to be wiser than they are;
 I meddle with no man's business but my own,
 So meet with respect, and am not the jest of the family.
Cham. I'm glad you are so happy.
 A pleasant fellow this, and may be useful.
 [Aside.
 Knew you my father, the old Chamont?
Chap. I did: and was most sorry when we lost him.
Cham. Why, didst thou love him?
Chap. Every body loved him; besides, he was my patron's friend.
Cham. I could embrace thee for that very notion:
 If thou didst love my father, I could think
 Thou wouldst not be an enemy to me.
Chap. I can be no man's foe.
Cham. Then pry'thee, tell me;
 Think'st thou the lord Castalio loves my sister?
Chap. Love your sister?
Cham. Ay, love her.
Chap. Either he loves her or he much has wrong'd her.

Cham. How wrong'd her? have a care; for this may lay
 A scene of mischief to undo us all.
 But tell me, wrong'd her, saidst thou?
Chap. Ay, Sir, wrong'd her.
Cham. This is a secret worth a monarch's fortune:
 What shall I give thee for't? thou dear physician
 Of sickly wounds, unfold this riddle to me,
 And comfort mine—
Chap. I would hide nothing from you willingly.
Cham. By the reverenc'd soul
 Of that great honest man that gave me being,
 Tell me but what thou know'st concerns my honour,
 And, if I e'er reveal it to thy wrong,
 May this good sword ne'er do me right in battle!
 May I ne'er know that blessed peace of mind,
 That dwells in good and pious men like thee!
Chap. I see your temper's mov'd and I will trust you.
Cham. Will thou?
Chap. I will; but if it ever 'scape you—
Cham. It never shall.
Chap. Then, this good day, when all the house was busy,
 When mirth and kind rejoicing fill'd each room,
 As I was walking in the grove I met them.
Cham. What, met them in the grove together?
Chap. I, by their own appointment, met them there, [hands.
 Receiv'd their marriage vows, and join'd their Cham. How! married?
Chap. Yes, Sir.
Cham. Then my soul 's at peace:
 But why would you so long delay to give it?
Chap. Not knowing what reception it may find
 With old Acasto; may be, I was too cautious
 To trust the secret from me.
Cham. What 's the cause
 I cannot guess, though 'tis my sister's honour,
 I do not like this marriage, [ture;
 Huddled i' the dark, and done at too much vent—
 The business looks with an unlucky face.
 Keep still the secret: for it ne'er shall 'scape me,
 Not e'en to them, the new-match'd pair. Farewell!
 Believe the truth, and me for thy friend. [Exeunt.
 Re-enter CASTALIO, with MONIMIA.
Cas. Young Chamont and the chaplain! sure
 'tis they!
 No matter what 's contriv'd, or who consulted,
 Since my Monimia's mine; though this sad look
 Seems no good boding omen to our bliss;
 Else, pry'thee, tell me why that look cast down,
 Why that sad sigh, as if thy heart was breaking?
Mon. Castalio, I am thinking what we've done; [day;
 The heavenly powers were sure displeas'd to
 For, at the ceremony as we stood,
 And as your hand was kindly join'd with mine,
 As the good priest pronounc'd the sacred words,
 Passion grew big, and I could not forbear:
 Tears drown'd my eyes, and trembling seiz'd my soul.
 What should that mean?
Cas. O, thou art tender all!
 Gentle and kind as sympathising nature!
 Re-enter POLYDOR, unobserved.
 But wherefore do I dally with my bliss?
 The night 's far spent, and day draws on apace.
 To bed, my love, and wake till I come thither.

Mon. 'Twill be impossible:
You know your father's chamber's next to mine,
And the least noise will certainly alarm him.

Cas. No more, my blessing.
What shall be the sign?
When shall I come? for to my joys I'll steal,
As if I ne'er had paid my freedom for them.

Mon. Just three soft strokes upon the chamber door,
And at that signal you shall gain admittance:
But speak not the least word; for, if you should,
'Tis surely heard, and all will be betray'd.

Cas. Oh! doubt it not, Monimia; our joys
Shall be as silent as the ecstatic bliss
Of souls, that by intelligence converse.
Away, my love! first take this kiss. Now,
haste:

I long for that to come, yet grudge each minute past.

My brother wand'ring too so late this way!
[Exit MONIMIA.]

Pol. Castalio!

Cas. My Polydore, how durst thou?
How does our father? is he well recover'd?

Pol. I left him happily repos'd to rest:
He's still as gay as if his life was young.
But how does fair Monimia?

Cas. Doubtless, well:
A cruel beauty, with her conquest pleas'd, is always joyful, and her mind in health.

Pol. Is she the same Monimia still she was?
May we not hope she's made of mortal mould?

Cas. She's not woman else:
Though I'm grown weary of this tedious hoping;
We've in a barren desert stray'd too long.

Pol. Yet may relief be unexpected found,
And love's sweet manna cover all the field.
Met ye to-day?

Cas. No; she has still avoided me;
I wish I'd never meddled with the matter.
And would enjoin thee, Polydore—

Pol. To what?

Cas. To leave this peevish beauty to herself.

Pol. What, quit my love? as soon I'd quit my post

In fight, and like a coward run away.
No, by my stars, I'll chase her till she yields
To me, or meets her rescue in another.

Cas. But I have wondrous reasons on my side,
That would persuade thee, were they known.

Pol. Then speak 'em:
What are they? Came ye to her window here
To learn 'em now? Castalio, have a care;
Use honest dealing with a friend and brother.
Believe me, I'm not with my love so blinded,
But can discern your purpose to abuse me.
Quit your pretences to her.

You say you've reasons: why are they conceal'd?
Cas. To-morrow I may tell you.

Pol. Why not now?

Cas. It is a matter of such consequence,
As I must well consult ere I reveal.
But pry'thee cease to think I would abuse thee,
Till more be known.

Pol. When you, Castalio, cease
To meet Monimia unknown to me,
And then deny it slavishly, I'll cease
To think Castalio faithless to his friend.
Did I not see you part this very moment?

Cas. It seems you've watch'd me, then?

Pol. I scorn the office.

Cas. Pry'thee avoid a thing thou may'st repent.

Pol. That is, henceforward making league with you.

Cas. Nay, if ye're angry, Polydore, good night. [Exit.]

Pol. Good night, Castalio, if ye're in such haste.

He little thinks I've overheard th' appointment:
But to his chamber's gone to wait awhile,
Then come and take possession of my love.
This is the utmost point of all my hopes;
Or now she must, or never can be mine.
Oh, for a means now how to counterplot,
And disappoint this happy elder brother!
In every thing we do or undertake,
He soars above me, mount what height I can,
And keeps the start he got of me in birth.
Cordelio!

Re-enter PAGE.

Pol. Come hither, boy!

Thou hast a pretty, forward, lying face,
And may'st in time expect preferment. Canst thou

Pretend to secrecy, cajole and flatter
Thy master's follies, and assist his pleasures?

Page. My lord, I could do any thing for you,
And ever be a very faithful boy.
Command, whate'er's your pleasure I'll observe;
Be it to run, or watch, or to convey
A letter to a beautiful lady's bosom:
At least, I am not dull, and soon should learn.

Pol. 'Tis pity then thou shouldst not be employ'd.

Go to my brother, he's in his chamber now,
Undressing, and preparing for his rest;
Find out some means to keep him up awhile:
Tell him a pretty story, that may please
His ear; invent a tale, no matter what:
If he should ask of me, tell him I'm gone
To bed, and sent you there to know his pleasure,
Whether he'll hunt to-morrow.

But do not leave him till he's in his bed;
Or, if he chance to walk again this way,
Follow, and do not quit him, but seem fond
To do him little offices of service.
Perhaps at last it may offend him; then Retire, and wait till I come in. Away!
Succeed in this, and be employ'd again.

Page. Doubt not, my lord: he has been always kind

To me; would often set me on his knee,
Then give me sweetmeats, call me pretty boy,
And ask me what the maids talk'd of at nights.

Pol. Run quickly then, and prosp'rous be thy wishes. [Exit PAGE.]

Here I'm alone, and fit for mischief.
I heard the sign she order'd him to give.
"Just three soft strokes against the chamber door;
But speak not the least word, for, if you should,
It's surely heard, and we are both betray'd."
Bless'd Heaven, assist me but in this dear hour,
And, my kind stars, be but propitious now,
Dispose of me hereafter as you please.

Monimia! Monimia! [Gives the sign]

Flo. [At the window.] Who's there?

Pol. 'Tis I.

Flo. My lord Castalio?

Pol. The same.

How does my love, my dear Monimia?

Flo. Oh!

She wonders much at your unkind delay;

You've staid so long, that at each little noise
The wind but makes, she asks if you are coming.

Pol. Tell her I'm here, and let the door be open'd. [FLORELLA withdraws.

Now boast, Castalio, triumph now, and tell
Thyself strange stories of a promis'd bliss!

[Exit.

Re-enter CASTALIO and PAGE.

Page. Indeed, my lord, 'twill be a lovely morn-
Pray, let us hunt. [sing:

Cas. Go, you're an idle prattler:
I'll stay at home to-morrow; if your lord
Thinks fit, he may command my hounds. Go, leave me;

I must to bed.

Page. I'll wait upon your lordship,
If you think fit, and sing you to repose.

Cas. No, my kind boy.

Good night: commend me to my brother.

Page. Oh!

You never heard the last new song I learn'd:
It is the finest, prettiest, song indeed,
Of my lord and my lady, you know who, that were caught

Together, you know where. My lord, indeed it is.

Cas. You must be whipp'd, youngster, if you get such songs as those are.

What means this boy's impertinence to-night?

[Aside.

Page. Why, what must I sing, pray, my dear lord?

Cas. Psalms, child, psalms.

Page. O dear me! boys that go to school learn psalms;

But pages, that are better bred, sing lampoons.

Cas. Well, leave me; I'm weary.

Page. Indeed, my lord, I can't abide to leave
you.

Cas. Why, wert thou instructed to attend me?

Page. No, no, indeed, my lord, I was not.

But I know, what I know.

Cas. What dost thou know?—'Sdeath!
what can all this mean?

[Aside.

Page. Oh! I know who loves somebody.

Cas. What's that to me, boy?

Page. Nay, I know who loves you too.

Cas. That's a wonder! prythee, tell it me.

Page. 'Tis—'tis—I know who—but will

You give me the horse, then?

Cas. I will, my child.

Page. It is my lady Monimia, look you; but don't you tell her I told you: she'll give me no more play-things then. I heard her say so, as she lay abed, man. [delio?

Cas. Talk'd she of me when in her bed, Cor-
Page. Yes; and I sung her the song you made too; and she did so sigh, and look with her eyes!

Cas. Hark! what's that noise?

Take this; be gone, and leave me.

You knave, you little flatterer, get you gone.

[Exit PAGE.

Surely it was a noise, hist!—only fancy;

For all is hush'd, as nature were retir'd.

'Tis now, that, guided by my love, I go

To take possession of Monimia's arms.

Sure Polydore's by this time gone to bed. [Knocks.

She hears me not? sure, she already sleeps!

Her wishes could not brook so long delay,

And her poor heart has beat itself to rest.

Once more—

[Knocks.

Flo. [At the window.] Who's there,

VOL. I. . . 3 I 37

That comes thus rudely to disturb our rest?

Cas. 'Tis I.

Flo. Who are you? what's your name?

Cas. Suppose the Lord Castalio.

Flo. I know you not.

The Lord Castalio has no business here.

Cas. Ha! have a care! what can this mean?

Whoe'er thou art, I charge thee, to Monimia fly.

Tell her I'm here, and wait upon my doom.

Flo. Whoe'er you are, you may repent this outrage:

My lady must not be disturb'd. Good night!

Cas. She must! tell her, she shall; go, I'm in haste,

And bring her tidings from the state of love.

Flo. Sure the man's mad!

Cas. Or this will make me so,

Obey me, or, by all the wrongs I suffer,

I'll scale the window and come in by force,

Let the sad consequence be what it will!

This creature's trifling folly makes me mad!

Flo. My lady's answer is, you may depart.

She says she knows you: you are Polydore,

Sent by Castalio, as you were to-day,

T' affront and do her violence again.

Cas. I'll not believe't.

Flo. You may, Sir.

Cas. Curses blast thee!

Flo. Well, 'tis a fine cool ev'ning! and I hope
May cure the raging fever in your blood!

Good night.

Cas. And farewell all that's just in woman!

This is contriv'd, a study'd trick, to abuse

My easy nature, and torment my mind!

'Tis impudence to think my soul will bear it!

Let but to-morrow, but to-morrow come,

And try if all thy arts appease my wrong;

Till when, be this detested place my bed;

[Lies down.

Where I will ruminate on woman's ills,

Laugh at myself, and curse th' inconstant sex.

Faithless Monimia! O Monimia!

Enter ERNESTO.

Ern. Either

My sense has been deluded, or this way

I heard the sound of sorrow; 'tis late night, [now.

And none, whose mind 's at peace, would wander

Cas. Who's there?

Ern. Castalio!—My lord, why in this posture,

Stretch'd on the ground? your honest, true, old servant,

Your poor Ernesto, cannot see you thus. [vant

Rise, I beseech you.

Cas. Oh, leave me to my folly.

Ern. I can't leave you,

And not the reason know of your disorders.

Remember how, when young, I in my arms

Have often borne you, pleas'd you in your pleasures,

And sought an early share in your affection.

Do not discard me now, but let me serve you.

Cas. Thou canst not serve me.

Ern. Why?

Cas. Because my thoughts [them.

Are full of woman; thou, poor wretch, art past

Ern. I hate the sex.

Cas. Then I'm thy friend, Ernesto! [Rises.

I'd leave the world for him that hates a woman!

Woman, the fountain of all human frailty!

What mighty ills have not been done by woman?

Who was't betray'd the capitol!—a woman!

Who lost Mark Antony the world?—a woman!

Who was the cause of a long ten years' war,
 And laid at last old Troy in ashes?—Woman!
 Destructive, damnable, deceitful woman!
 Woman, to man first as a blessing given;
 When innocence and love were in their prime,
 Happy awhile in Paradise they lay;
 But quickly woman long'd to go astray:
 Some foolish new adventure needs must prove,
 And the first devil she saw, she chang'd her love;
 To his temptations lewdly she inclin'd
 Her soul, and for an apple damn'd mankind.

[Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Chamber.

Enter CASTALIO.

Cas. Wish'd morning's come! And now upon the plains,
 And distant mountains, where they feed their flocks,
 The happy shepherds leave their homely huts,
 And with their pipes proclaim the new-born day.
 There's no condition sure so curs'd as mine—
 Monimia! O Monimia!

Enter MONIMIA and FLORELLA.

Mon. I come!
 I fly to my ador'd Castalio's arms,
 My wishes' lord. May every morn begin
 Like this; and, with our days, our loves renew!

Cas. Oh—

Mon. Art thou not well, Castalio? Come, lean
 Upon my breast, and tell me where's thy pain.

Cas. 'Tis here—'tis in my head—'tis in my heart—

'Tis every where: it rages like a madness,
 And I most wonder how my reason holds.
 No more, Monimia, of your sex's arts:
 They're useless all—I'm not that pliant tool;
 I know my charter better—I am man,
 Obstinate man, and will not be enslav'd!

Mon. You shall not fear't; indeed, my nature's easy:

I'll ever live your most obedient wife!
 Nor ever any privilege pretend
 Beyond your will; for that shall be my law;—
 Indeed, I will not.

Cas. Nay, you shall not, Madam;
 By yon bright heaven, you shall not: all the day
 I'll play the tyrant, and at night forsake thee;
 Nay, if I've any too, thou shalt be made
 Subservient to my looser pleasures;
 For thou hast wrong'd Castalio.

Mon. Oh, kill me here, or tell me my offence!
 I'll never quit you else; but on these knees,
 Thus follow you all day, till they're worn bare,
 And hang upon you like a drowning creature.
 Castalio!—

Cas. Away!—Last night! last night!—Mon. It was our wedding night.Cas. No more!—Forget it!Mon. Why! do you then repent?Cas. I do.

Mon. O Heaven! [Florella!]
 And will you leave me thus?—Help! help!

[CASTALIO drags her to the door, breaks from her, and exits.]

Help me to hold this yet lov'd, cruel man!
 Castalio!—Oh! how often as he sworn,
 Nature should change—the sun and stars grow dark,

Ere he would falsify his vows to me!

Make haste, confusion, then! Sun, lose thy light
 And, stars, drop dead with sorrow to the earth,
 For my Castalio's false!
 False as the wind, the waters, or the weather!
 Cruel as tigers o'er their trembling prey!
 I feel him in my breast; he tears my heart,
 And at each sigh he drinks the gushing blood!
 Must I be long in pain?

Enter CHAMONT.Cham. In tears, Monimia!

Mon. Who'er thou art,
 Leave me alone to my belov'd despair!

Cham. Lift up thy eyes, and see who comes to cheer thee!

Tell me the story of thy wrongs, and then
 See if my soul has rest, till thou hast justice.

Mon. My brother!

Cham. Yes, Monimia, if thou think'st
 That I deserve the name, I am thy brother.

Mon. O Castalio!Cham. Ha!

Name me that name again! my soul's on fire
 Till I know all!—There's meaning in that name:
 I know he is thy husband; therefore, trust me
 With the following truth.

Mon. Indeed, Chamont,

There's nothing in it but the fault of nature:
 I'm often thus seiz'd suddenly with grief,
 I know not why.

Cham. You use me ill, Monimia;
 And I might think, with justice, most severely
 Of this unfaithful dealing with your brother.

Mon. Truly I'm not to blame. Suppose I'm fond, [other?]

And grieve for what as much may please an-
 Should I upbraid the dearest friend on earth
 For the first fault? You would not do so, would you?

Cham. Not if I'd cause to think it was a friend.

Mon. Why do you then call this unfaithful dealing?

I ne'er conceal'd my soul from you before:
 Bear with me now, and search my wounds no further;

For every probing pains me to the heart.

Cham. 'Tis sign there's danger in't, and must be prob'd.

Where's your new husband? Still that thought disturbs you—

What! only answer me with tears?—Castalio!
 Nay, now they stream:—

Cruel, unkind, Castalio!—Is't not so? [me,

Mon. I cannot speak;—grief flows so fast upon it chokes, and will not let me tell the cause.

Oh!—

Cham. My Monimia! to my soul thou'rt dear
 As honour to my name!

Why wilt thou not repose within my breast
 The anguish that torments thee?

Mon. Oh! I dare not.

Cham. I have no friend but thee. We must
 In one another.—I'wo unhappy orphans,

Alas! we are! and when I see thee grieve,
 Methinks it is a part of me that suffers.

Mon. Could you be secret?Cham. Secret as the grave.

Mon. But when I've told you, will you keep Within its bounds? Will you not do some rash

And horrid mischief? For, indeed, Chamont,
 You would not think how hardly I've been us'd
 From a dear friend—from one that has my soul

A slave, and therefore treats it like a tyrant.

Cham. I will be calm.—But has Castalio wrong'd thee?

Has he already wasted all his love? [bling
What has he done?—quickly! for I'm all trem-
With expectation of a horrid tale!

Mon. Oh! could you think it?

Cham. What?

Mon. I fear, he'll kill me!

Cham. Ha!

Mon. Indeed, I do: he's strangely cruel to me;
Which, if it last, I'm sure must break my heart!

Cham. What has he done?

Mon. Most barbarously us'd me.

Just as we met, and I, with open arms,
Ran to embrace the lord of all my wishes,
Oh then—

Cham. Go on!

Mon. He threw me from his breast,
Like a detested sin.

Cham. How!

Mon. As I hung too

Upon his knees, and begg'd to know the cause,
He dragg'd me, like a slave, upon the earth,
And had no pity on my cries.

Cham. How! did he

Dash thee disdainfully away, with scorn?

Mon. He did.

Cham. What! throw thee from him?

Mon. Yes, indeed he did!

Cham. So may this arm

Throw him to th' earth, like a dead dog despis'd.

Lameness and leprosy, blindness and lunacy,
Poverty, shame, pride, and the name of villain,
Light on me, if, Castalio, I forgive thee! [he is!

Mon. Nay, now, Chamont, art thou unkind as Didst thou not promise me thou wouldst be calm?
Keep my disgrace conceal'd?

Alas, I love him still; and though I ne'er

Clasp him again within these longing arms,
Yet bless him, bless him, gods, where'er he goes?

Enter ACASTO.

Acas. Sure some ill fate is tow'rd's me; in my house

I only meet with oddness and disorder.

Just this very moment—

I met Castalio too—

Cham. Then you met a villain.

Acas. Ha!

Cham. Yes, a villain!

Acas. Have a care, young soldier;

How thou'rt too busy with Acasto's fame.

I have a sword, my arm's good old acquaintance:—
Villain, to thee.

Cham. Curse on thy scandalous age,

Which hinders me to rush upon thy throat,

And tear the root up of that cursed bramble!

Acas. Ungrateful ruffian! sure my good old friend

Was ne'er thy father! Nothing of him's in thee!

What have I done, in my unhappy age,

To be thus us'd? I scorn to upbraid thee, boy!

But I could put thee in remembrance—

Cham. Do.

Acas. I scorn it.

Cham. No, I'll calmly hear the story;

For I would fain know all, to see which scale

Weights most.—Ha! is not that good old

Acasto?

What have I done?—Can you forgive this folly?

Acas. Why dost thou ask it?

Cham. 'Twas the rude o'erflowing
Of too much passion—Pray, my lord, forgive me. [Kneels.

Acas. Mock me not, youth! I can revenge a wrong. [mine.

Cham. I know it well—but for this thought of Pity a madman's frenzy, and forget it. [kind.

Acas. I will; but henceforth pry'thee be more
Whence came the cause? [Raises him.

Cham. Indeed, I've been to blame;

For you've been my father—

You've been her father too.

[Takes MONIMIA'S hand.

Acas. Forbear the prologue,
And let me know the substance of thy tale.

Cham. You took her up, a little tender flower,

Just sprouted on a bank, which the next frost

Had nipp'd; and with a careful, loving hand,

Transplanted her into your own fair garden,

Where the sun always shines: there long she flourish'd;

Grew sweet to sense, and lovely to the eye;

Till at the last a cruel spoiler came,

Cropp'd this fair rose, and rifled all its sweetness,

Then cast it like a loathsome weed away.

Acas. You talk to me in parables, Chamont:

You may have known that I'm no wordy man.

Fine speeches are the instruments of knaves,

Or fools, that use them when they want good

But honesty [sense.

Needs no disguise or ornament. Be plain.

Cham. Your son—

Acas. I've two; and both, I hope, have honour.

Cham. I hope so too; but—

Acas. Speak.

Cham. I must inform you,

Once more, Castalio!

Acas. Still Castalio!

Cham. Yes;

Your son Castalio has wrong'd Monimia!

Acas. Ha! wrong'd her?

Cham. Marry'd her.

Acas. I'm sorry for't.

Cham. Why sorry?

By yon bless'd heaven, there's not a lord

But might be proud to take her to his heart.

Acas. I'll not deny't.

Cham. You dare not; by the gods,

You dare not. All your family combin'd

In one damn'd falsehood, to outdo Castalio,

Dare not deny't.

Acas. How has Castalio wrong'd her?

Cham. Ask that of him. I say, my sister's

Monimia, my sister, born as high [wrong'd:

And noble as Castalio.—Do her justice,

Or, by the gods, I'll lay a scene of blood

Shall make this dwelling horrible to nature.

I'll do't.—Hark you, my lord, your son Castalio,

Take him to your closet, and there teach him

Acas. You shall have justice. [manners.

Cham. Nay, I will have justice!

Who'll sleep in safety that has done me wrong?

My lord, I'll not disturb you to repeat

The cause of this; I beg you (to preserve

Your house's honour) ask it of Castalio. [Exit.

Acas. Farewell, proud boy.—

Monimia:

Mon. My lord.

Acas. You are my daughter. [me.

Mon. I am, my lord, if you'll vouchsafe to own

Acas. When you'll complain to me, I'll prove a father. [Exit

Mon. Now I'm undone for ever! Who on
Is there so wretched as Monimia? [earth
First by Castalio cruelly forsaken;
I've lost Acasto now: his parting frowns
May well instruct me, rage is in his heart.
I shall be next abandon'd to my fortune,
Thrust out a naked wand'rer to the world,
And branded for the mischievous Monimia!
What will become of me? My cruel brother
Is framing mischiefs, too, for aught I know,
That may produce bloodshed and horrid murder!
I would not be the cause of one man's death,
To reign the empress of the earth; nay, more,
I'd rather lose for ever my Castalio,
My dear, unkind Castalio. [Sits down.

Enter POLYDORE.

Pol. Monimia weeping!
I come, my love, to kiss all sorrow from thee;
What means these sighs, and why thus beats thy heart?

Mon. Let me alone to sorrow; 'tis a cause
None e'er shall know; but it shall with me die.

Pol. Happy, Monimia, he to whom these sighs,
These tears, and all these languishings, are paid!
I know your heart was never meant for me;
That jewel's for an elder brother's price.

Mon. My lord!

Pol. Nay, wonder not; last night I heard
His oaths, your vows, and to my torment saw
Your wild embraces; heard the appointment made;
I did, Monimia, and I curs'd the sound.
Wilt thou be sworn, my love? wilt thou be ne'er
Unkind again?

Mon. Banish such fruitless hopes!
Have you sworn constancy to my undoing?
Will you be ne'er my friend again?

Pol. What means my love?

Mon. What meant my lord?
Last night?

Pol. Is that a question now to be demanded?

Mon. Was it well done

T' assault my lodging at the dead of night,
And threaten me if I denied admittance—
You said you were Castalio.

Pol. By those eyes,

It was the same: I spent my time much better.

Mon. Ha!—have a care!

Pol. Where is the danger near me? [quiet,

Mon. I fear you're on a rock will wreck your
And drown your soul in wretchedness for ever.
A thousand horrid thoughts crowd on my memory.
Will you be kind, and answer me one question?

Pol. I'd trust thee with my life; on that soft bosom

Breathe out the choicest secrets of my heart,
Till I had nothing in it left but love. [angels,

Mon. Nay, I'll conjure you, by the gods and
By the honour of your name, that's most concern'd,

To tell me, Polydore, and tell me truly,
Where did you rest last night?

Pol. Within thy arms.

Mon. 'Tis done. [Faints.

Pol. She faints!—no help!—who waits?—A curse

Upon my vanity, that could not keep
The secret of my happiness in silence!
Confusion! we shall be surpris'd anon;
And consequently all must be betray'd.
Monimia!—she breathes!—Monimia!

Mon. Well—

Let mischiefs multiply! let every hour
Of my loath'd life yield me increase of horror!
O let the sun, to these unhappy eyes,
Ne'er shine again, but be eclips'd for ever!
May every thing I look on seem a prodigy,
To fill my soul with terrors, till I quite Forget I ever had humanity,
And grow a curser of the works of nature!

Pol. What means all this?

Mon. O Polydore! if all

The friendship e'er you vow'd to good Castalio
Be not a falsehood; if you ever lov'd
Your brother, you've undone yourself and me.

Pol. Which way can ruin reach the man that's rich

As I am, in possession of thy sweetness?

Mon. Oh! I'm his wife!

Pol. What says Monimia?

Mon. I am Castalio's wife!

Pol. His married, wedded, wife?

Mon. Yesterday's sun

Saw it perform'd!

Pol. My brother's wife?

Mon. As surely as we both

Must taste of misery, that guilt is thine.

Pol. Oh! thou may'st yet be happy!

Mon. Couldst thou be Happy, with such a weight upon thy soul?

Pol. It may be yet a secret—I'll go try

To reconcile and bring Castalio to thee!

Whilst from the world I take myself away,

And waste my life in penance for my sin.

Mon. Then thou wouldst more undo me: heap
a load

Of added sin upon my wretched head!

Wouldst thou again have me betray thy brother,

And bring pollution to his arms?—Curs'd thought!

Oh! when shall I be mad indeed! [Exit.

Pol. Then thus I'll go;—

Full of my guilt, distracted where to roam:

I'll find some place where adders nest in winter,

Loathsome and venomous; where poisons hang

Like gums against the walls: there I'll inhabit,

And live up to the height of desperation.

Desire shall languish like a with'ring flower,

Horrors shall fright me from those pleasing harms,

And I'll no more be caught with beauty's charms. [Exit.

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Garden.

CASTALIO discovered lying on the ground;
soft music.

Cas. See where the deer trot after one another:

No discontent they know: but in delightful

Wildness and freedom, pleasant springs, fresh herbage,

Calm labours, lusty health, and innocence,

Enjoy their portion:—if they see a man,

How will they turn together all, and gaze

Upon the monster!

Once in a season, too, they taste of love:

Only the beast of reason is its slave:

And in that folly drudges all the year.

Enter ACASO.

Acas. Castalio! Castalio!

Cas. Who's there

So wretched but to name Castalio?

Acas. I hope my message may succeed.

Cas. My father!

'Tis joy to see you, though where sorrow's

Acas. Castalio, you must go along with me,
And see Monimia.

Cas. Sure my lord but mocks me :
Go see Monimia ?

Acas. I say, no more dispute. [her.

Complaints are made to me that you have wrong'd

Cas. Who has complain'd ? [wrong'd,

Acas. Her brother to my face proclaim'd her
And in such terms they've warm'd me.

Cas. What terms ? Her brother ! Heaven !

Where learn'd he that ?

What, does she send her hero with defiance ?

He durst not sure affront you ?

Acas. No, not much :

But—

Cas. Speak, what said he ?

Acas. That thou wert a villain :

Methinks I would not have thee thought a villain.

Cas. Shame on the ill-manner'd brute !

Your age secur'd him ; he durst not else have said.

Acas. By my sword,

I would not see thee wrong'd, and bear it vilely :

Though I have pass'd my word she shall have justice. [her.

Cas. Justice ! to give her justice would undo

Think you this solitude I now have chosen,—

Wish'd to have grown one piece

With this cold clay, and all without a cause ?

Enter CHAMONT.

Cham. Where is the hero, famous and renown'd
For wronging innocence, and breaking vows :

Whose mighty spirit, and whose stubborn heart,

No woman can appease, nor man provoke ?

Acas. I guess, Chamont, you come to seek

Castalio ?

Cham. I come to seek the husband of Monimia.

Cas. The slave is here.

Cham. I thought ere now to have found you

Atoning for the ills you've done Chamont :

For you have wrong'd the dearest part of him.

Monimia, young lord, weeps in this heart ;

And all the tears thy injuries have drawn

From her poor eyes, are drops of blood from hence.

Cas. Then you are Chamont ?

Cham. Yes, and I hope no stranger

To great Castalio.

Cas. I've heard of such a man,

That has been very busy with my honour.

I own I'm much indebted to you, Sir,

And here return the villain back again

You sent me by my father.

Cham. Thus I'll thank you. [Draws.

Acas. By this good sword, who first presumes to violence,

Makes me his foe. [Draws and interposes.

Cas. Sir, in my younger years with care you taught me

That brave revenge was due to injur'd honour :

Oppose not then the justice of my sword,

Lest you should make me jealous of your love.

Cham. Into thy father's arms thou fly'st for safety,

Because thou know'st that place is sanctified

With the remembrance of an ancient friendship.

Cas. I am a villain, if I will not seek thee,

Till I may be reveng'd for all the wrongs

Done me by that ungrateful fair thou plead'st for.

Cham. She wrong'd thee ? By the fury in my heart,

Thy father's honour's not above Monimia's ;

Nor was thy mother's truth and virtue fairer.

Acas. Boy, don't disturb the ashes of the dead
With thy capricious follies ; the remembrance
Of the lov'd creature that once fill'd these arms—

Cham. Has not been wrong'd.

Cas. It shall not.

Cham. No, nor shall

Monimia, though a helpless orphan, destitute

Of friends and fortune, though the unhappy sister

Of poor Chamont, whose sword is all his portion,

Be oppress'd by thee, thou proud, imperious traitor !

Cas. Ha ! set me free.

Cham. Come, both. [take

Cas. Sir, if you'd have me think you did not

This opportunity to show your vanity,

Let's meet some other time, when by ourselves

We fairly may dispute our wrongs together.

Cham. Till then I am Castalio's friend. [Exit.

Acas. Would I'd been absent when this boitrous brave

Came to disturb thee thus. I'm griev'd I hinder'd

Thy just resentment—But, Monimia—

Cas. Damn her !

Acas. Don't curse her.

Cas. Did I ?

Acas. Yes.

Cas. I'm sorry for't. [small,

Acas. Methinks, if, as I guess, the fault's but

It might be pardon'd.

Cas. No.

Acas. What has she done ? [forgive me.

Cas. That she's my wife, may Heaven and you

Acas. Be reconcil'd then.

Cas. No.

Acas. For my sake,

Castalio, and the quiet of my age. [starts at ?

Cas. Why will you urge a thing my nature

Acas. Prythee, forgive her.

Cas. Lightnings first shall blast me !

I tell you, were she prostrate at my feet,

Full of her sex's best dissembled sorrows

And all that wondrous beauty of her own,

My heart might break, but it should never soften.

Acas. Did you but know the agonies she feels—

She flies with fury over all the house ;

Through every room of each department, crying,

"Where's my Castalio ? Give me my Castalio !"

Except she sees you, sure she'll grow distracted !

Cas. Ha ! will she ? Does she name Castalio ?

And with such tenderness ? Conduct me quickly

To the poor, lovely mourner.

Acas. Then wilt thou go ? Blessings attend thy purpose !

Cas. I cannot hear Monimia's soul's in sadness,

And be a man : my heart will not forget her.

Acas. Delay not then ; but haste and cheer thy love.

Cas. Oh ! I will, throw my impatient arms about her ;

In her soft bosom sigh my soul to peace ;

Till through the panting breast she finds the way

To mould my heart, and make it what she will.

Monimia ! Oh ! [Exeunt.

SCENE II.—A Chamber.

Enter MONIMIA.

Mon. Stand off, and give me room ;

I will not rest till I have found Castalio.

My wish's lord, comely as the rising day.

I cannot die in peace, till I have seen him.

Enter CASTALIO.

Cas. Who talks of dying, with a voice so sweet

That life 's in love with it?

Mon. Hark! 'tis he that answers.

Where art thou?

Cas. Here, my love.

Mon. No nearer, lest I vanish. [while?]

Cas. Have I been in a dream then all this

And art thou but the shadow of Monimia:

Why dost thou fly me thus?

Mon. Oh! were it possible that we could drown
In dark oblivion but a few past hours,

We might be happy.

Cas. Is't then so hard, Monimia, to forgive
A fault, when humble love, like mine, implores thee?

For I must love thee, though it proves my ruin.
I'll kneel to thee, and weep a flood before thee.
Yet pry'thee, tyrant, break not quite my heart;
But when my task of penitence is done,
Heal it again, and comfort me with love.

Mon. If I am dumb, Castalio, and want words
To pay thee back this mighty tenderness,
It is because I look on thee with horror,
And cannot see the man I have so wrong'd.

Cas. Thou hast not wrong'd me.

Mon. Ah! alas, thou talk'st
Just as thy poor heart thinks. Have not I wrong'd thee?

Cas. No.

Mon. Still thou wander'st in the dark, Castalio;
But wilt, ere long, stumble on horrid danger.

Cas. My better angel, then do thou inform me
What danger threatens me, and where it lies;
Why wert thou (pr'y'thee, smile, and tell me why)
When I stood waiting underneath the window,
Deaf to my cries, and senseless of my pains?

Mon. Did I not beg thee to forbear inquiry?
Read'st thou not something in my face, that speaks

Wonderful change, and horror from within me?

Cas. If, lab'ring in the pangs of death,
Thou wouldst do any thing to give me ease,
Unfold this riddle ere my thoughts grow wild,
And let in fears of ugly form upon me.

Mon. My heart wont let me speak it; but remember,

Monimia, poor Monimia, tells you this:

We ne'er must meet again—

Cas. Ne'er meet again?

Mon. No, never.

Cas. Where 's the power
On earth, that dares not look like thee, and say so?
Thou art my heart's inheritance: I serv'd
A long and faithful slavery for thee;
And who shall rob me of the dear-bought blessing?

Mon. Time will clear all; but now let this content you:

Heaven has decreed, and therefore I've resolv'd
(With torment I must tell it thee, Castalio)
Ever to be a stranger to thy love,
In some far distant country waste my life,
And from this day to see thy face no more.

Cas. Why turn'st thou from me? I'm alone already.

Methinks I stand upon a naked beach,
Sighing to winds, and to the seas complaining,
Whilst afar off the vessel sails away,
Where all the treasure of my soul 's embark'd;

Wilt thou not turn?—Oh! could those eyes but speak,

I should know all, for love is pregnant in 'em;
They swell, they press their beams upon me still:
Wilt thou not speak? If we must part for ever.
Give me but one kind word to think upon,
And please myself withal, whilst my heart 's breaking.

Mon. Ah! poor Castalio! [Exit.

Cas. What means all this? Why all this stir to plague

A single wretch? If but your word can shake

This world to atoms, why so much ado

With me? think me but dead, and lay me so.

Enter POLYDORE.

Pol. To live, and live a torment to myself,
What dog would bear't, that knew but his condition? [ards,

We've little knowledge, and that makes us cow-
Because it cannot tell us what 's to come.

Cas. Who 's there?

Pol. Why, what art thou?

Cas. My brother Polydore?

Pol. My name is Polydore.

Cas. Canst thou inform me—

Pol. Of what?

Cas. Of my Monimia?

Pol. No. Good day!

Cas. In haste!

Methinks my Polydore appears in sadness

Pol. Indeed! and so to me does my Castalio.

Cas. Do I?

Pol. Thou dost.

Cas. Alas, I've wondrous reason!

I'm strangely alter'd, brother, since I saw thee.

Pol. Why?

Cas. I'll tell thee, Polydore; I would repose

Within thy friendly bosom all my follies;

For thou wilt pardon 'em, because they're mine.

Pol. Be not too credulous; consider first,
Friends may be false. Is there no friendship
false?

Cas. Why dost thou ask me that? Does this appear

Like a false friendship, when, with open arms

And streaming eyes, I run upon thy breast?

Oh! 'tis in thee alone I must have comfort!

Pol. I fear, Castalio, I have none to give thee.

Cas. Dost thou not love me then?

Pol. Oh, more than life;

I never had a thought of my Castalio,
Might wrong the friendship we had vow'd to-
Hast thou dealt so by me? [gether.

Cas. I hope I have.

Pol. Then tell me why, this morning, this disorder?

Cas. O Polydore, I know not how to tell thee;
Shame rises in my face, and interrupts
The story of my tongue.

Pol. I grieve, my friend

Knows any thing which he 's asham'd to tell me.

Cas. Oh, much too oft. Our destiny contriv'd
To plague us both with one unhappy love!

Thou, like a friend, a constant, generous friend,
In its first pangs didst trust me with thy passion,
Whilst I still smooth'd my pain with smiles before
thee,

And made a contract I ne'er meant to keep.

Pol. How!

Cas. Still new ways I studied to abuse thee,
And kept thee as a stranger to my passion,

Till yesterday I wedded with Monimia.

Pol. Ah! Castalio, was that well done?

Cas. No; to conceal't from thee was much a fault.

Pol. A fault! when thou hast heard The tale I'll tell, what wilt thou call it then?

Cas. How my heart throbs!

Pol. First from thy friendship, traitor, I cancel't thus: after this day I'll ne'er Hold trust or converse with the false Castalio! This, witness, Heaven.

Cas. What will my fate do with me? I've lost all happiness, and know not why! What means this, brother?

Pol. Perjur'd, treach'rous wretch, Farewell!

Cas. I'll be thy slave, and thou shalt use me Just as thou wilt, do but forgive me.

Pol. Never. [doing:
Cas. Oh! think a little what thy heart is How, from our infancy, we hand in hand Have trod the path of life in love together. One bed has held us, and the same desires, The same aversions, still employ'd our thoughts. Whene'er had I a friend that was not Polydore's, Or Polydore a foe that was not mine?

E'en in the womb we embrac'd; and wilt thou now, For the first fault, abandon and forsake me?

Leave me, amidst afflictions, to myself, Plung'd in the gulf of grief, and none to help me?

Pol. Go to Monimia; in her arms thou'lt find Repose; she has the art of healing sorrows.

Cas. What arts?

Pol. Blind wretch! thou husband? there's a question!

Is she not a—

Cas. What?

Pol. Where? I think that word needs no explaining.

Cas. Alas! I can forgive e'en this to thee; But let me tell thee, Polydore, I'm griev'd, To find thee guilty of such low revenge, To wrong that virtue which thou couldst not ruin.

Pol. It seems I lie, then!

Cas. Should the bravest man

That e'er wore conq'ring sword, but dare to whisper

What thou proclaim'st, he were the worst of liars. My friend may be mistaken.

Pol. Damn the evasion!

Thou mean'st the worst! and he's a base-born That said, I lied! [villain

Cas. A base-born villain!

Pol. Yes! thou never cam'st

From old Acasto's loins: the midwife put A cheat upon my mother; and, instead Of a true brother, in the cradle by me Plac'd some coarse peasant's cub, and thou art he!

Cas. Thou art my brother still.

Pol. Thou liest!

Cas. Nay, then—

Yet, I am calm. [Draws.

Pol. A coward's always so.

Cas. Ah!—ah!—that stings home! Coward!

Pol. Ay, base-born coward! villain!

Cas. This to thy heart, then, though my mother bore thee!

[They fight; POLYDORE runs on CAS- TALIO'S sword.

Pol. Now my Castalio is again my friend.

Cas. What have I done? my sword is in thy breast.

Pol. So would I have it be, thou best of men, Thou kindest brother, and thou truest friend!

Cas. Ye gods! we're taught that all your works are justice:

Ye're painted merciful, and friends to innocence. If so, then why these plagues upon my head?

Pol. Blame not the heavens, 'tis Polydore has wrong'd thee;

I've stain'd thy bed; thy spotless marriage joys Have been polluted by thy brother's lust.

Cas. By thee?

Pol. By me, last night, the horrid deed Was done, when all things slept but rage and incest.

Cas. Now, where's Monimia? Oh!

Enter MONIMIA.

Mon. I'm here! who calls me?

Methought I heard a voice Sweet as the shepherd's pipe upon the mountains, When all his little flock's at feed before him.

But what means this? here's blood!

Cas. Ay, brother's blood!

Art thou prepar'd for everlasting pains?

Pol. Oh! let me charge thee, by th' eternal justice,

Hurt not her tender life?

Cas. Not kill her?

Mon. That task myself have finish'd: I shall die

Before we part: I've drunk a healing draught For all my cares, and never more shall wrong thee.

Pol. Oh, she's innocent.

Cas. Tell me that story,

And thou wilt make a wretch of me, indeed.

Pol. Hadst thou, Castalio, us'd me like a friend,

This ne'er had happen'd; hadst thou let me know

Thy marriage, we had all now met in joy:

But, ignorant of that,

Hearing th' appointment made, enrag'd to think

Thou hadst undone me in successful love,

I, in the dark, went and supplied thy place;

Whilst all the night, midst our triumphant joys,

The trembling, tender, kind, deceiv'd Monimia,

Embrac'd, caress'd, and call'd me her Castalio.

[Dies

Mon. Now, my Castalio, the most dear of men, Wilt thou receive pollution to thy bosom,

And close the eyes of one that has betray'd you?

Cas. O, I'm the unhappy wretch, whose curs'd fate

Has weigh'd you down into destruction with him:

Why then thus kind to me!

Mon. When I'm laid down i' th' grave, and quite forgotten,

May'st thou be happy in a fairer bride!

But none can ever love thee like Monimia.

When I am dead, as presently I shall be,

(For the grim tyrant grasps my hand already,)

Speak well of me: and if thou find ill tongues

Too busy with my fame, don't hear me wrong'd;

'Twill be a noble justice to the memory

Of a poor wretch, once honour'd with thy love.

[Dies

Enter CHAMONT and ACASO.

Cham. Gape, earth, and swallow me to quick destruction,
If I forgive your house!
Ye've overpower'd me now!
But, hear me, Heaven!—Ah! here's a scene of death!

My sister, my Monimia, breathless!—Now,
Ye powers above, if ye have justice, strike!
Strike bolts through me, and through the curs'd
Castalio!

Cas. Stand off; thou hot-brain'd, boisterous, noisy, ruffian!
And leave me to my sorrows.

Cham. By the love
I bore her living, I will ne'er forsake her;
But here remain till my heart burst with sobbing.

Cas. Vanish, I charge thee! or—[Draws a dagger.]

Cham. Thou canst not kill me!
That would be a kindness, and against thy nature!

Acas. What means Castalio! Sure thou wilt not pull

More sorrows on thy aged father's head!
Tell me, I beg you, tell me the sad cause
Of all this ruin.

Cas. Thou, unkind Chamont,
Unjustly hast pursu'd me with thy hate,
And sought the life of him that never wrong'd
thee:

Now, if thou wilt embrace a noble vengeance,
Come join with me, and curse—

Cham. What?
Acas. Have patience.

Cas. Patience! preach it to the winds,
To roaring seas, or raging fires! for, curs'd
As I am now, 'tis this must give me patience:
Thus I find rest, and shall complain no more.

[Stabs himself.]
Chamont, to thee my birthright I bequeath:—
Comfort my mourning father—heal his griefs;

[Acaso faints into the arms of a Servant.]
For I perceive they fall with weight upon him—
And, for Monimia's sake, whom thou wilt find
I never wrong'd, be kind to poor Serina—
Now all I beg is, lay me in one grave
Thus with my love: farewell! I now am nothing. [Dies.]

Cham. Take care of good Acaso, whilst I go To search the means by which the fates have plagu'd us.

'Tis thus that heaven its empire does maintain:
It may afflict; but man must not complain.

[Exeunt.]

PROLOGUE.

To you, great judges, in this writing age,
The sons of wit, and patrons of the stage,

With all those humble thoughts, which still have sway'd

His pride much doubting, trembling and afraid
Of what is to his want of merit due,
And aw'd by every excellence in you,
The author sends to beg you will be kind,
And spare those many faults you needs must find.

You, to whom wit a common foe is grown,
The thing ye scorn and publicly disown.
Though now, perhaps, ye're here for other ends,
He swears to me ye ought to be his friends:
For he ne'er call'd ye yet insipid tools,
Nor wrote one line to tell ye you were fools:
But says of wit ye have so large a store,
So very much you never will have more.
He ne'er with libel treated yet the town,
The names of honest men bedaub'd and shown.
Nay, never once lampoon'd the harmless life
Of suburb virgin, or of city wife.

Satire's the effect of poetry's disease,
Which, sick of a lewd age, she vents for ease,
But now her only strife should be to please;
Since of ill fate the baneful cloud's withdrawn,
And happiness again begins to dawn,
Since back with joy and triumph he is come,
That always drew fears hence, ne'er brought 'em home.

oft has he plough'd the boist'rous ocean o'er,
Yet ne'er more welcome to the longing shore,
Not when he brought home victories before;
For then fresh laurels flourish'd on his brow;
And he comes crown'd with olive-branches now
Receive him—oh, receive him as his friends,
Embrace the blessing which he recommends:
Such quiet as your foes shall ne'er destroy;
Then shake off fears, and clap your hands for joy.

EPILOGUE.

SPOKEN BY SERINA.

You've seen one orphan ruin'd here; and I
May be the next, if old Acaso die:
Should it prove so, I'd fain amongst you find
Who 'tis would to the fatherless be kind.
To whose protection might I safely go?
Is there among you no good nature? No.
What shall I do? Should I the godly seek,
And go a conventicling twice a week?
Quit the lewd stage, and its profane pollution,
Affect each form and saint-like institution;
So draw the brethren all to contribution?
Or shall I (as I guess the poet may Within these three days) fairly run away?
No; to some city lodgings I'll retire;
Seem very grave, and privacy desire;
Till I am thought some heiress, rich in lands,
Fled to escape a cruel guardian's hands;
Which may produce a story worth the telling,
Of the next sparks that go a fortune stealing.

A NEW WAY TO PAY OLD DEBTS:

A COMEDY,

IN FIVE ACTS.

BY PHILIP MASSINGER.

REMARKS.

It has been said, that Massinger surpassed all the writers of the "olden time" in purity of style and delicacy of manners; many have considered him as second only to Shakspeare. The immoral conduct of the drama in that age renders such an admission of slight value now, but it may fairly be conceded, that the writer of this comedy, of the City Madam, (on which Sir J. Burgess has framed "Riches,") of the Fatal Dowry, and many others, possessed a mind of no ordinary or limited capability. Mr. Gifford, the able editor of Massinger, is of opinion that a real person was aimed at in Sir Giles Overreach: fortunately for mankind, such monstrous deviations from "nature and from nature's laws" do not often appear, but there can be little doubt of their reality. The variety of character and incident in this play, the strong and lively picture of domestic manners, the serious moral so distinctly deducible from it, are qualities sufficient to veil greater faults than can fairly be attached to this production.

The animated performance of the principal character by Mr. Cooke, and since by Mr. Kean with increased effect, have placed this comedy on the stock-list of our Royal Theatres.

SCENE.—Nottinghamshire.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—The outside of a Village Alehouse.

Enter WELLBORN, TAPWELL, and FROTH.

Well. No liquor! nor no credit?

Tap. None, Sir;

Not the remainder of a single can,
Left by a drunken porter.

Froth. Not the dropping of the tap for your morning's draught, Sir.

'Tis verity, I assure you.

Well. Verity, you brach!

The devil turn'd precisian? Rogue, what am I?

Tap. Troth! durst I trust you with a looking-glass,

To let you see your trim shape, you would quit me,

And take the name yourself.

VOL. I. . . . 3 K

Well. How! dog? [Raising his stick.]

Tap. Even so, Sir. Advance your Plymouth cloak; [worship,]

There dwells, and within call, if it please your

A potent monarch, call'd the constable,

That does command a citadel, call'd the stocks;

Such as with dexterity will haul

Your poor tatter'd—

Well. Rascal! slave!

Froth. No rage, Sir.

Tap. At his own peril! Do not put yourself

In too much heat, there being no water near

To quench your thirst; and sure for other liquor,

As mighty ale, or beer, they are things, I take it,

You must no more remember; not in a dream, Sir

Well. Why, thou unthankful villain, dar'st thou talk thus?

Is not thy house, and all thou hast, my gift?

Tap. I find it not in chalk, Sir; and Timothy Tapwell
Does keep no other register.

Well. Am I not he Whose riots fed and cloth'd thee? Wert thou not Born on my father's land, and proud to be
A drudge in his house?

Tap. What I was, Sir, it skills not;
What you are is apparent. Now for a farewell;
Since you talk of father, in my hope it will torment you,
I'll briefly tell your story. Your dead father,
Old Sir John Wellborn,
My quondam master, was a man of worship;
Bore the whole sway of the shire; kept a good house;

Reliev'd the poor, and so forth; but he dying,
And the twelve hundred a year coming to you,
Late master Francis, but now forlorn Wellborn—

Well. Slave, stop! or I shall lose myself.

Froth. Very hardly.
You cannot be out of your way. [gallant,

Tap. You were then a lord of acres, the prime
And I your under butler:—note the change now:
You had a merry time of't. Hawks and hounds,
With choice of running horses; mistresses,
And other such extravagances;
Which your uncle, Sir Giles Overreach, observing,
Resolving not to lose so fair an opportunity,
On foolish mortgages, statutes, and bonds,
For awhile supplied your lavishness, and then left
you. [mongrel,

Well. Some curate has penn'd this invective,
And you have studied it.

Tap. I have not done yet.
Your lands gone, and your credit not worth a token,
You grew the common borrower; no man 'scap'd
Your paper pellets, from the gentleman to the groom;

While I, honest Tim Tapwell, with a little stock,
Some forty pounds or so, bought a small cottage,
And humbled myself to marriage with my Froth
here.

Well. Hear me, ungrateful hell-hound! did not I
Make purses for you? then you lick'd my boots,
And thought your holiday cloak too coarse to clean 'em.

'Twas I, that when I heard thee swear, if ever
Thou couldst arrive at forty pounds, thou wouldst
Live like an emperor; 'twas I that gave it,
In ready gold. Deny this, wretch!

Tap. I must, Sir.

For from the tavern to the tap-house, all,
On forfeiture of their licence, stand bound
Never to remember who their best guests were,
If they grow poor like you.

Well. They are well rewarded
That beggar themselves to make such rascals rich.
Thou viper, thankless viper!
But since you are grown forgetful, I will help
Your memory, and beat thee into remembrance;
Nor leave one bone unbroken. [Beats him.

Tap. Oh, oh, oh!

Froth. Help! help!

Enter ALLWORTH.

Allw. Hold, for my sake, hold!
Deny me, Frank? they are not worth your anger.

Well. For once thou hast redeem'd them from this sceptre:
But let 'em vanish; [Shaking his cudgel.
For if they grumble, I revoke my pardon.

Froth. This comes of your prating husband;
you presum'd on your ambling wit, and must use your glib tongue, though you are beaten lame for't.

Tap. Patience, Froth,
There's law to cure our bruises.

[Exit TAPWELL and FROTH into the house.

Well. Sent for to your mother?

Allw. My lady, Frank, my patroness! my all!
She's such a mourner for my father's death,
And, in her love to him, so favours me,
That I cannot pay too much observance to her.
There are few such step-dames.

Well. 'Tis a noble widow,
And keeps her reputation pure, and clear
From the least taint of infamy; but Pr'ythee tell me, has she no suitors.

Allw. Even the best of the shire, Frank,
My lord excepted: such as sue and send,
And send and sue again; but to no purpose,
Yet she's so far from sullenness and pride,
That I dare undertake you shall meet from her
A liberal entertainment.

Well. I doubt it not.

Now, Allworth, mark my counsel. I am bound to give it.

Thy father was my friend; and that affection
I bore to him, in right descends to thee:
I will not see the least affront stick on thee,
If I, with any danger can prevent it.

Allw. I thank your noble care; but, pray you, in what

Do I run the hazard?

Well. Art thou not in love?

Put it not off with wonder.

Allw. In love, at my years? [transparent.

Well. You think you walk in clouds, but are
I have heard all, and the choice that you have made;
And, with my finger, can point out the north star
By which the loadstone of your folly's guided.
And to confirm this true, what think you of Fair Margaret, the only child and heir
Of cormorant Overreach? Dost blush and start,
To hear her only nam'd? Blush at your want
Of wit and reason.

Allw. Howe'er you have discover'd my intents,
You know my aims are lawful; and if ever
The queen of flowers, the glory of the spring,
Sprung from an envious briar, I may infer,
There's such disparity in their conditions
Between the goddess of my soul, the daughter,
And the base churl, her father.

Well. Grant this true,

As I believe it; canst thou ever hope
To enjoy a quiet bed with her, whose father
Ruin'd thy 'state.

Allw. And your's too.

Well. I confess it, Allworth;

I must tell you as a friend, and freely,
That, where impossibilities are apparent,
'Tis indiscretion to nourish hopes.
Or canst thou think (if self-love blind thee not)
That Sir Giles Overreach (that to make her great
In swelling titles, without touch of conscience,
Will cut his neighbour's throat; and I hope his own too)

Will e'er consent to make her thine? Give c'er,
And think of some course suitable to thy rank,
And prosper in it.

Allw. You have well advis'd me.

But, in the meanwhile, you, that are so studious
Of my affairs, wholly neglect your own.
Remember yourself, and in what plight you are.

Well. No matter, no matter.

Allw. Yes, 'tis much material:

You know my fortune and my means: yet something I can spare from myself, to help your wants.

[Offers money.]

Well. How's this?

Allw. Nay, be not angry.

Well. Money from thee?

From a boy? one that lives

At the devotion of a step-mother,

And the uncertain favour of a lord?

I'll eat my arms first. Howsoe'er blind Fortune

Hath spent the utmost of her malice on me;

Though I am thrust out of an alehouse,

And thus accoutred; know not where to eat,

Or drink, or sleep, but underneath this canopy;

Although I thank thee, I disdain thy offer.

And as I, in my madness, broke my state

Without th' assistance of another's brain,

In my right wits I'll piece it; at the worst,

Die thus, and be forgotten.

Allw. Fare thee well. [Exeunt severally.]

SCENE II.—A Room in LADY ALLWORTH'S House.

Enter ORDER, AMBLE, and FURNACE.

Order. Set all things right, or, as my name is Order,

Whoever misses in his function, [fast,
For one whole week makes forfeiture of his break-
And privilege in the wine cellar.

Amble. You are merry,
Good master steward.

Fur. Let him; I'll be angry.

Amble. Why, fellow Furnace, 'tis not twelve o'clock yet,

Nor dinner taking up; then 'tis allow'd,

Cooks; by their places, may be choleric.

Fur. You think you have spoken wisely, good-man Amble,

My lady's go-before.

Order. Nay, nay, no wrangling.

Fur. Twit me with the authority of the kitchen?

At all hours, and at all places, I'll be angry;

And, thus provok'd, when I am at my prayers

I will be angry.

Amble. There was no hurt meant.

Fur. I am friends with thee, and yet I will be angry.

Order. With whom?

Fur. No matter whom; yet, now I think on't, I'm angry with my lady.

Amble. Heaven forbid, man.

Order. What cause has she given thee?

Fur. Cause enough, master steward;

I was entertain'd by her to please her palate,

And, till she forswore eating, I perform'd it.

Now since our master, noble Allworth, died,

Though I crack my brain to find out tempting

When I am three parts roasted, [sauces,

And the fourth part parboiled, to prepare her viands,

She keeps her chamber, dines with a panada

Or water gruel; my sweat ne'er thought on.

Order. But your art is seen in the dining-room.

Fur. By whom?

By such as pretend to love her, but come

To feed upon her. Yet, of all the harpies

That do devour her, I am out of charity

With none so much as the thin-gutted 'squire,
That's stolen into commission.

Order. Justice Greedy?

Fur. The same, the same. Meat's cast away upon him;

It never thrives. He holds this paradox,
"Who eats not well, can ne'er do justice well."
His stomach's as insatiate as the grave.

[A knocking.]

Amble. One knocks.

Enter ALLWORTH.

Order. Our late young master.

Amble. Welcome, Sir.

Fur. Your hand.

If you have a stomach, a cold bake-meat's ready.

Order. His father's picture in little.

Fur. We are all your servants.

Allw. At once, my thanks to all;

This is some comfort. Is my lady stirring?

Enter LADY ALLWORTH.

Order. Her presence answers for us.

Lady A. I'll take the air alone.

And, as I gave directions, this morning

I am visited by any, entertain 'em

As heretofore; but say, in my excuse,

I am indispos'd.

Order. I shall, Madam.

Lady A. Do, and leave me.

[Exit ORDER, AMBLE, &c.]

Nay, stay you, Allworth.

How is it with your noble master?

Allw. Ever like himself;

No scruple lessen'd in the full weight of honour.

He did command me, (pardon my presumption),

As his unworthy deputy, to kiss

Your ladyship's fair hands.

Lady A. I am honour'd in His favour to me. Does he hold his purpose

For the Low Countries?

Allw. Constantly, good Madam;

But he will in person first present his service.

Lady A. What say you to his purpose? You are Like virgin parchment, capable of any

Inscription, vicious or honourable.

I will not force your will, but leave you free

To your own election.

Allw. Any form you please

I will put on; but, might I make my choice,

With humble emulation I would follow

The path my lord marks to me.

Lady A. 'Tis well answer'd,

And I commend your spirit. You had a father

(Bless'd be his memory!) that, some few hours

Before the will of Heaven took him from me,

Did commend you, by the dearest ties

Of perfect love between us, to my care;

And therefore what I speak you are bound to hear,

With such respect as if he liv'd in me.

Allw. I have found you,

Most honour'd Madam, the best mother to me;

And with my utmost strength of care and service

Will labour, that you never may repent

Your bounties shower'd upon me.

Lady A. I much hope it.

These were your father's words: "If e'er my son

Follow the war, tell him it is a school

In which all the principles tending to honour

Are taught, if truly follow'd; but for such

As repair thither as a place in which

They do presume they may with license practise

Their lawless riots, they shall never merit.
The noble name of soldiers.—
To obey their leaders, and shun mutinies;
To dare boldly
In a fair cause, and for the country's safety
To run upon the cannon's mouth undaunted;
To bear with patience the winter's cold
And summer's scorching heat;
Are the essentials to make up a soldier,
Not swearing, dice, or drinking."

Allw. There's no syllable
You speak, but is to me an oracle,
Which but to doubt were impious.

Lady A. To conclude:—
Beware ill company; for often men
Are like to those with whom they do converse:
And from one man I warn you, and that's Well-
born:—

Not 'cause he's poor—that rather claims your pity;
But that he's in his manners so depriv'd,
And hath in vicious courses lost himself.
'Tis true your father lov'd him, while he was Worthy the loving; but if he had liv'd
To have seen him as he is, he had cast him off,
Which you must do.

Allw. I shall obey in all things.

Lady A. Follow me to my chamber; you shall have gold

To furnish you like my son, and still supplied
As I hear from you.

Allw. I am still bound to you. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—A Hall in LADY ALLWORTH'S
House.

Enter SIR GILES OVERREACH, JUSTICE GREEDY,
ORDER, AMBLE, FURNACE, and MARRALL.

Just. Gr. Not to be seen?

Sir G. Still cloister'd up? Her reason,
I hope, assures her, though she make herself
Close prisoner ever for her husband's loss,
'Twill not recover him.

Order. Sir, it is her will,
Which we, that are her servants, ought to serve,
And not dispute. Howe'er, you are nobly welcome;—

And if you please to stay, that you may think so,
There came, not six days hence, from Hull, a pipe
Of rich Canary, which shall spend itself
For my lady's honour.

Just. Gr. Is it of the right sort?

Order. Yes, Mr. Greedy.

Amble. How his mouth runs o'er! [Apart.]

Fur. I'll make it run and run. [Apart.] Save your good worship!

Just. Gr. Honest Mr. Cook, thy hand—again!
How I love thee!

Are the good dishes still in being? speak, boy.

Fur. If you have a mind to feed, there is a chine
'of beef well season'd.

Just. Gr. Good.

Fur. A pheasant larded.

Just. Gr. That I might now give thanks for't!

Fur. Besides, there came last night, from the forest of Sherwood,

The fattest stag I ever cook'd.

Just. Gr. A stag, man?

Fur. A stag, Sir; part of it is prepar'd for dinner,
And bak'd in puff-paste.

Just. Gr. Puff-paste too, Sir Giles!

A pound'ron chine of beef! a pheasant larded!
And red deer too, Sir Giles, and bak'd in puffpaste!

All business set aside, let us give thanks here.

Sir G. You know we cannot.

Mar. Your worships are to sit on commission,
And if you fail to come you lose the cause.

Just. Gr. Cause me no causes: I'll prove't, for such a dinner,

We may put off a commission; you shall find it
Henrici decimo quarto.

Sir G. Fie, Mr. Greedy,

Will you lose me a thousand pounds for a dinner?
No more, for shame! We must forget the belly,
When we think of profit.

Just. Gr. Well, you shall overrule me.

I could even now cry. Do you hear, master Cook?
Send but a corner of that immortal pasty,
And I in thankfulness will, by your boy,
Send you a brace of threepences.

Fur. Will you be so prodigal?

Sir G. Remember me to your lady.

Enter WELLBORN.

Who have we here?

Well. You know me.

Sir G. I did once, but now I will not;
Thou art no blood of mine. Avaunt, thou begger!
If ever thou presume to cross me more,
I'll have thee cag'd and whipp'd.

Just. G. I'll grant the warrant.

Think of pie-corner, Furnace.
[Exeunt SIR GILES OVERREACH, JUSTICE
GREEDY, and MARRALL.]

Amble. Will you out, Sir?

I wonder how you durst creep in.

[To WELLBORN]

Order. This is rudeness,
And saucy impudence.

Amble. Cannot you stey?

To be serv'd among your fellows from the basket
But you must press into the hall?

Fur. P'rythee, vanish

Into some out-house, though it be the pig-stye
My scullion shall come to thee.

Enter ALLWORTH.

Well. This is rare,

Oh, here is Tom Allworth!—Tom!

Allw. We must be strangers;

Nor would I have you seen here for a million.

[Exit.]

Well. Better and better. He contemns me too.

Fur. Will you know your way.

Amble. Or shall we teach it you,
By the head and shoulders?

Well. No, I will not stir:

Do you mark, I will not. Let me see the wretch
That dares attempt to force me. Why, you slaves,
Created only to make legs and cringe,
To carry in a dish and shift a trencher,
That have not souls only to hope a blessing
Beyond your master's leavings—who advances?
who

Shows me the way?

[Beats the m.]

All the Servants. Help, help!

Order. Here comes my lady.

LADY ALLWORTH enters.

Lady A. What noise is this?

Well. Madam, my designs bear me to you.

Lady A. To me?

Well. And though I have met with
But ragged entertainment from your grooms here,
I hope from you to receive that noble usage,

As may become the true friend of your husband ;
And then I shall forget these.

Lady A. I am amaz'd

To see and hear this rudeness. Dar'st thou think,
Though sworn, that it can ever find belief,
That I, who to the first men of this country
Denied my presence since my husband's death,
Can fall so low as to change words with thee ?

Well. Scorn me not, good lady ;

But, as in form you are angelical,
Imitate the heavenly natures, and vouchsafe
At least awhile to hear me. You will grant
The blood that runs in this arm is as noble
As that which fills your veins. Your swelling titles,
Equipage, and fortune, your men's observance,
And women's flattery, are in you no virtues ;
Nor these rags, with my poverty, in me vices.
You have a fair name, and I know deserve it ;
Yet, lady, I must say in nothing more
Than in the pious sorrow you have shown
For your late noble husband.

Order. There he touch'd her. [Aside.]

Well. That husband, Madam, was once in his fortune

Almost as low as I. Want, debts, and crosses,
Lay heavy on him : let it not be thought
A boast in me, though I say I reliev'd him.
'Twas I did give him fashion ; mine the sword
That did on all occasions second his ;
I brought him on and off with honour, lady :
And when in all men's judgments he was sunk,
And in his own hopes not to be buoy'd up,
I stepp'd unto him, took him by the hand,
And brought him to the shore.

Fur. Are we not base rogues
That could forget this ? [Aside.]

Well. I confess you made him
Master of your estate ; nor could your friends,
Though he brought no wealth with him, blame
you for't :

For he had a shape, and to that shape a mind
Made up of all parts, either great or noble ;
So winning a behaviour, not to be Resisted, Madam.

Lady A. 'Tis most true, he had.

Well. For his sake then, in that I was his friend,
Do not contemn me.

Lady A. For what's past, excuse me ;
I will redeem it. [Offers him her pocket-book.]

Well. Madam, on no terms ;

I will not beg nor borrow sixpence of you ;
But be supplied elsewhere, or want thus ever.
Only one suit I make : pray give me leave.

[LADY ALLWORTH signs to the Servants to retire.]

I will not tire your patience with relation
Of the bad arts my uncle Overreach
Still forg'd, to strip me of my fair possessions ;
Nor how he shuts the door upon my want.

Would you but vouchsafe
To your dead husband's friend, such seeming grace
As might begot opinion in Sir Giles
Of a true passion toward me, you would see,

In the mere thought to prey on me again,
He'd turn my friend,
Quit all my owings, set me trimly forth,
And furnish'd well with gold ; which I should use,
I trust, to your no shame, lady, but live
Ever a grateful debtor to your gentleness.

Lady A. What, nothing else ?

Well. Nothing, unless you please to charge your servants

To throw away a little respect upon me.

Lady A. What you demand is yours.
Respect this gentleman as 'twere myself.

[To the Servants.]

Adieu, dear master Wellborn ;
Pray let me see you with your off'nest means.

Well. Your honour's servant.

[Kisses her hand ; exit LADY ALLWORTH.
Now, what can be wrought out of such a suit
Is yet in supposition. [Servants bow to WELL.]

Nay, all's forgotten ;
And, for a lucky omen to my project,
Shake hands, and end all quarrels in the cellar.

Order. Agreed, agreed.

Fur. Still merry, Mr. Wellborn.

[Exeunt Servants.]

Well. Faith, a right worthy and a liberal lady,
Who can at once so kindly meet my purposes,
And crave the flouts of censure, to redeem
Her husband's friend ! When by this honest plot
The world believes she means to heal my wants
With her extensive wealth, each noisy creditor
Will be struck mute, and I be left at large
To practise on my uncle Overreach.
Here I may work the measure, to redeem
My mortgag'd fortune, which he stripp'd me of
When youth and dissipation quell'd my reason.
The fancy pleases,—if the plot succeed,
'Tis a new way to pay old debts, indeed. [Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Landscape near LADY ALL-WORTH'S Park.

Enter SIR GILES OVERREACH and MARRALL.

Sir G. He's gone, I warrant thee ; this commission crush'd him.

Mar. Your worship has the way on't, and ne'er miss

To squeeze these unthrifths into air ; and yet
The chop-fall'n justice did his part, returning
For your advantage the certificate,
Against his conscience and his knowledge too,
(With your good favour,) to the utter ruin
Of the poor farmer.

Sir G. 'Twas for these good ends
I made him a justice. He that bribes his belly
Is certain to command his soul.

Mar. I wonder

Why, your worship having
The power to put this thin gut in commission,
You are not in't yourself.

Sir G. Thou art a fool ;

In being out of office, I am out of danger ;
Where, if I were a justice, besides the trouble,
I might, or out of wilfulness or error,
Run myself finely into a preunire ;
And so become a prey to the informer.
No, I'll have none of't : 'tis enough I keep Greedy at my devotion : so he serve
My purposes, let him hang, or damn, I care not ;
Friendship is but a word.

Mar. You are all wisdom.

Sir G. I would be worldly wise ; for the other wisdom,

That does prescribe us a well-govern'd life,
And to do right to others as ourselves ;
I value not an atom.

Mar. What course take you
(With your good pleasure) to hedge in the manor
Of your good neighbour, Mr. Frugal ? As 'tis said

He will not sell, nor borrow, nor exchange;
And his land, lying in the midst of your many
Is a foul blemish. [lordships,

Sir G. I have thought on't, Marrall,
And it shall take. I must have all men sellers,
And I the only purchaser.

Mar. 'Tis most fit, Sir.

Sir G. I'll therefore buy some cottage near his manor;
Which done, I'll make my men break ope' his fences,

Ride o'er his standing corn, and in the night
Set fire to his barns, or break his cattle's legs.
These trespasses draw on suits, and suits expenses;
Which I can spare, but will soon beggar him.
When I have hurried him thus two or three years,
Though he sued forma pauperis, in spite
Of all his thrift and care, he'll grow behind-hand.

Mar. The best I ever heard. I could adore you.

Sir G. Then, with the favour of my man of law,
I will pretend some title; want will force him
To put it to arbitrement; then, if he sell
For half the value, he shall have ready money,
And I possess the land.

Mar. Wellborn was apt to sell, and needed not These fine arts to hook him in.

Sir G. Well thought on. [me
This varlet, Wellborn, lives too long, to upbraid
With my close cheat put upon him. Will not cold
Nor hunger kill him?

Mar. I know not what to think on't.
I have us'd all means; and yesterday I caus'd
His host, the tapster, to turn him out of doors;
And have been since with all your friends and tenants,

And, on the forfeit of your favour, charg'd them,
Though a crust of mouldy bread would keep him from starving,

Yet they should not relieve him. This is done, Sir.

Sir G. That was something, Marrall; but thou must go farther,
And suddenly, Marrall.

Mar. Where and when you please, Sir.

Sir G. I would have thee seek him out; and, if thou canst,

Persuade him that 'tis better steal than beg.
Then, if I prove he has but robb'd a hen-roost,
Not all the world shall save him from the gallows.
Do any thing to work him to despair,
And 'tis thy masterpiece.

Mar. I will do my best, Sir.

Sir G. I am now on my main work with the Lord Lovell,

The gallant-minded, popular, Lord Lovell;
The minion of the people's love. I hear
He's come into the country; and my aims are
To insinuate myself into his knowledge,
And then invite him to my house.

Mar. I have you.

This points at my young mistress.
Sir G. She must part with
That humble title, and be honourable;
Right honourable, Marrall; my right honourable
daughter;

If all I have, or e'er shall get, will do it.
I will have her well attended: there are ladies
Of errant knights decay'd, and brought so low,
That for cast clothes and meat will gladly serve her;
And 'tis my glory, though I come from the city,
To have their issue, whom I have undone,
To kneel to mine as bond slaves.

Mar. 'Tis fit state, Sir.

Sir G. And, therefore, I'll not have a chamber maid

That ties her shoes, or any meaner office,
But such whose fathers were right worshipful.
'Tis a rich man's pride I there having ever been
More than a feud, a strange antipathy,
Between us and true gentry.

Enter WELLBORN.

Mar. See! who's here, Sir.

Sir G. Hence, monster, prodigy!

Well. Call me what you will, I am your nephew, Sir,
Your sister's son.

Sir G. Avoid my sight; thy breath 's infectious, rogue!

I shun thee as a leprosy, or the plague.
Come hither, Marrall, this is the time to work him. [Apart to MARRALL, and exit.

Mar. I warrant you, Sir.

Well. By this light, I think he 's mad. [self,
Mar. Mad! had you took compassion on your-
You long since had been mad.

Well. You have ta'en a course,
Between you and my venerable uncle,
To make me so.

Mar. The more pale spirited you,
That would not be instructed. I swear deeply—

Well. By what?

Mar. By my religion.

Well. Thy religion!

The devil's creed. But what would you have done?

Mar. Before, like you, I had outliv'd my fortunes,
A withe had serv'd my turn to hang myself.
I am zealous in your cause: pray you hang yourself;

And presently, as you love your credit.

Well. I thank you.

Mar. Will you stay till you die in a ditch?
Or, if you dare not do the feat yourself,
But that you'll put the state to charge and trouble,
Is there no purse to be cut? house to be broken?
Or market woman with eggs, that you may murder,
And so despatch the business?

Well. Here 's variety,

I must confess; but I'll accept of none

Of all your gentle offers, I assure you.

Mar. If you like not hanging, drown yourself;
take some course

For your reputation.

Well. 'Twill not do, dear tempter,
With all the rhetoric the fiend hath taught you;
I am as far as thou art from despair.
Nay, I have confidence, which is more than hope,
To live, and suddenly, better than ever.

Mar. Ha, ha! these castles you build in the air
Will not persuade me to give or lend
A token to you.

Well. I'll be more kind to thee;

Come, thou shalt dine with me.

Mar. With you?

Well. Nay, more, dine gratis.

Mar. Under what hedge, I pray you, or at whose cost?

Are they padders, or gipsies, that are your consorts?

Well. Thou art incredulous; but thou shalt dine,
Not alone at her house, but with a gallant lady;
With me, and with a lady.

Mar. Lady! what lady?

With the lady of the lake, or queen of fairies?

For I know it must be an enchanted dinner.

Well. With the Lady Allworth, knave.

Mar. Now there's hope
Thy brain is crack'd.

Well. Mark thee with what respect
I am entertain'd.

Mar. With choice, no doubt, of dog-whips.
Why, dost thou ever hope to pass her porter?

Well. 'Tis not far off, go with me; trust thine own eyes.

Mar. Troth, in my hope, or my assurance, rather,
[blanket,

To see thee curvet and mount, like a dog, in a lf ever thou presume to pass her threshold,
I will endure thy company.

Well. Come along, then. [Exeunt.

SCENE II.—A Hall in LADY ALLWORTH'S
House.

Enter ALLWORTH, ORDER, AMBLE, and FURNACE.

Allw. Your courtesies overwhelm me; I much grieve [comfort;

To part from such true friends, and yet I find
My attendance on my honourable lord
Will speedily bring me back. [Knocking.

Mar. [Within.] Dar'st thou venture farther?
Well. [Within.] Yes, yes, and knock again.

Order. 'Tis he; disperse. [Knocks:

Amble. Perform it bravely. [Exit.

Fur. I know my cue; ne'er doubt me. [Exit.

Enter MARRALL and WELLBORN.

Order. Most welcome;
You were long since expected.

Well. Say so much

To my friend, I pray you.

Order. For your sake, I will, Sir. [Exit.

Mar. For his sake! [Aside.

Well. Mum; this is nothing. [Aside.

Mar. More than ever
I would have believ'd, though I had found it in my primer. [Aside.

Allw. When I have given you reasons for my late harshness,

You'll pardon and excuse me; for, believe me,
Though now I part abruptly, in my service
I will deserve it.

Mar. Service! with a vengeance! [Aside.

Well. I am satisfied; farewell, Tom.

Allw. All joy stay with you. [Exit.

Re-enter AMBLE.

Amble. You are happily encounter'd; I never Presented one so welcome, as I know [yet

You will be to my lady.

Mar. This is some vision;
Or sure these men are mad to worship a dunghill;
It cannot be a truth. [Aside.

Well. Be still a pagan,

An unbelieving infidel; be so, miscreant!

And meditate on blankets and on dog-whips.
[To MARRALL.

Re-enter FURNACE.

Fur. I am glad you are come; until I know your pleasure,

I knew not how to serve up my lady's dinner.

Mar. His pleasure! is it possible? [Aside.

Well. What's thy will?

Fur. Marry, Sir, I have some grouse and turkey-chicken, [ask you

Some rails and quails; and my lady will'd me to

What kind of sauces best affect your palate,
That I may use my utmost skill to please it.

Mar. The devil's enter'd this cook; sauce for his palate, [month,

That, on my knowledge, for almost this twelve-Durst wish but cheese-parings and brown bread on Sundays! [Aside.

Well. That way I like them best.

Fur. It shall be done, Sir. [Exit.

Well. What think you of the hedge we shall dine under?

Shall we feed gratis? [To MARRALL.

Mar. I know not what to think;

Pray you, make me not mad.

Re-enter ORDER.

Order. This place becomes you not;

Pray you walk, Sir, to the dining room.

Well. I am well here,

Till her ladyship quits her chamber.

Mar. Well here, say you?

'Tis a rare change! but yesterday you thought

Yourself well in a barn, wrapp'd up in pease-straw. [Aside.

Enter TABITHA and ABIGAIL.

Tab. O! you're much wish'd for, Sir.

Abi. Last night my lady [ing

Dream'd of you; and her first command this morn-
Was to have notice, Sir, of your arrival.

Order. Sir, my lady. [Exit.

Enter LADY ALLWORTH.

Lady A. I come to meet you, and languish'd till I saw you.

This first kiss for form; I allow a second

As a token of my friendship. [please

Well. I am wholly yours; yet, Madam, if you

To grace this gentleman with a salute.

[Handing MARRALL.

Mar. Salute me at his bidding! [Aside.

Well. I shall receive it

As a most high favour.

Lady A. Sir, your friends are welcome to me.

Well. Run backward from a lady! and such a lady?

Mar. To kiss her foot is to poor me a favour.

I am unworthy of— [Offers to kiss her foot.

Lady A. Nay, pray you, rise;

And since you are so humble, I'll exalt you;

You shall dine with me to-day, at mine own table.

Mar. Your ladyship's table? I am not good

To sit at your steward's board. [enough

Lady A. You are too modest;

I will not be denied.

Re-enter ORDER.

Order. Dinner is ready for your ladyship.

Lady A. Your arm, Mr. Wellborn;

Nay, keep us company.

Mar. I never was so grac'd. [Exeunt.

Re-enter FURNACE.

Order. So, we have play'd our parts, and are come off well;

But if I know the mystery, why my lady

Consented to it, may I perish.

Fur. Would I had

The roasting of his heart that cheated him,

And forces the poor gentleman to these shifts.

By fire! (for cooks are Persians, and swear by it,)

Of all the griping and extorting tyrants

I ever heard or read of, I never met
A match to Sir Giles Overreach.

Order. What will you take
To tell him so, fellow Furnace?

Fur. Just as much

As my throat is worth, for that would be the price on't.

To have a usurer that starves himself
To grow rich, is too common:
But this Sir Giles feeds high, keeps many servants,
Rich in his habit; vast in his expenses;
Yet he, to admiration, still increases
In wealth and lordships.

Order. He frights men out of their estates;
And breaks through all law-nets, made to curb ill men, [him.]

As they were cobwebs. No man dare reprove
Such a spirit to dare, and power to do, were never Lodged so unluckily.

Re-enter AMBLE.

Ambie. Ha, ha! I shall burst.

Order. Contain thyself, man.

Fur. Or make us takers
Of your sudden mirth.

Ambie. Ha, ha! my lady has got
Such a guest at her table: this term-driver Mar-
This snip of an attorney. [rall,

Fur. What of him, man?

Ambie. The knave feeds so slovenly.

Fur. Is this all?

Ambie. My lady
Drank to him for fashion's sake, or to please Mr.
Wellborn.

As I live, he rises, and takes up a dish,
In which there were some remnants of a boil'd
And pledges her in white broth. [capon,

Fur. Nay, 'tis like
The rest of his tribe.

Ambie. And when I brought him wine,
He leaves his chair, and, after a leg or two,
Most humbly thanks my worship; my worship!

All. Ha, ha, ha!

Order. Risen already!

Fur. My lady frowns.

Ambie. I shall be chid.

Re-enter LADY ALLWORTH, WELLBORN, and MARRALL.

Lady A. You attended us well!

Let me have no more of this; I observed your jeering.

Sirrah, I'll have you know, whom I think worthy
To sit at my table, is not your companion.

[To Ambie.

Order. Nay, she'll preserve what's due to her.

[Aside.

Lady A. You are master
Of your own will. I know so much of manners,
As not to inquire your purposes; in a word,
To me you are ever welcome, as to a house
That is your own. [To WELLBORN.

Well. Mark that.

Mar. With reverence, Sir,
An it like your worship.

Well. Trouble yourself no further,
Dear Madam; my heart's full of zeal and service,
However in my language I am sparing.

Come, Mr. Marrall.

Mar. I attend your worship.

[Exeunt WELLBORN and MARRALL.

Lady A. I see in your looks you are sorry, and you know me

An easy mistress: be merry! I have forgot all.
Order and Furnace, come with me; I must give Further directions. [you

Order. What you please.

Fur. We are ready. [Exeunt.

SCENE III.—The Country.

Enter WELLBORN and MARRALL.

Well. I think I am in a good way.

Mar. Good, Sir! the best way;

The certain best way.

Well. These are casualties

That men are subject to.

Is't for your ease you keep your hat off?

Mar. Ease, an it like your worship?

I hope Jack Marrall shall not live so long,

To prove himself such an unmannerly beast,

Though it hail hazel-nuts, as to be cover'd

When your worship's present.

Well. Is not this a true rogue,

That, out of mere hope of a future coz'nage,

Can turn thus suddenly? 'Tis rank already.

[Aside.

Mar. I know your worship's wise, and needs

no counsel;

Yet if, in my desire to do you service,

I humbly offer my advice, (but still Under correction,) I hope I shall not

Incur your high displeasure.

Well. No; speak freely.

Mar. Then, in my judgment, Sir, my simple judgment, [you

(Still with your worship's favour,) I could wish

A better habit, for this cannot be

But much distasteful to the noble lady

That loves you. I have twenty pounds here,

Which, out of my true love, I presently

Lay at your worship's feet; 'twill serve to buy you

A riding suit.

Well. But where's the horse?

Mar. My gelding

Is at your service; nay, you shall ride me,

Before your worship shall be put to the trouble

To walk a-foot. Alas! when you are lord

Of this lady's manor, (as I know you will be,)

You may, with the lease of glebe land, call'd

Knave's acre,

A place I would manure, requite your vassal.

Well. I thank thy love; but must make do use of it.

What's twenty pounds?

Mar. 'Tis all that I can make, Sir.

Well. Dost thou think, though I want clothes,

I could not have 'em,

For one word to my lady?

Mar. As I know not that—

Well. Come, I'll tell thee a secret, and so leave

thee.

I'll not give her the advantage, though she be

A gallant-minded lady, after we are married,

To hit me in the teeth, and say she was forc'd

To buy my wedding-clothes;

No, I'll be furnish'd something like myself.

And so, farewell: for thy suit, touching Knave's acre,

When it is mine, 'tis thine. [Exit.

Mar. I thank your worship.

How was I cozen'd in the calculation

Of this man's fortune! my master cozen'd too,

Whose pupil I am in the art of undoing men;

For that is our profession. Well, well, Mr. Wellborn, [cheated;
You are of a sweet nature, and fit again to be Which, if the fates please, when you are possess'd Of the land and lady, you sans question shall be. I'll presently think of the means.

[Walks about, musing.]

Enter SIR GILES OVERREACH.

Sir G. Sirrah, order my carriage round; I'll walk to get me an appetite. 'Tis but a mile, And exercise will keep me from being pursy. Ha! Marrall! is he conjuring? Perhaps The knave has wrought the prodigal to do Some outrage on himself, and now he feels Compunction in his conscience for't; no matter, So it be done. Marrall! Marrall!

Mar. Sir.

Sir G. How succeed we In our plot on Wellborn?

Mar. Never better, Sir.

Sir G. Has he hang'd or drown'd himself?

Mar. No, Sir, he lives;

Lives, once more to be made a prey to you, And greater prey than ever.

Sir G. Art thou in thy wits?

If thou art, reveal this miracle, and briefly.

Mar. A lady, Sir, is fallen in love with him.

Sir G. With him? what lady?

Mar. The rich Lady Allworth.

Sir G. Thou dolt! how dar'st thou speak this?

Mar. I speak truth;

And I do so but once a year, unless It be to you, Sir. I din'd with her ladyship, I thank his worship.

Sir G. His worship!

Mar. As I live, Sir,

I din'd with him at the great lady's table, [him; Simple as I stand here, and saw when she kiss'd And would at his request, have kiss'd me too.

Sir G. Why, thou rascal,

To tell me of these impossibilities; Dine at her table! and kiss him, or thee! Impudent varlet! Have not I myself, To whom great countesses' doors have oft flown open,

Ten times attempted, since her husband's death, In vain to see her, though I came—a suitor? And yet your good solicitorship, and rogue Wellborn,

Were brought into her presence, feasted with her— But that I know thee a dog that cannot blush, This most incredible lie would call up one On thy buttermilk cheeks.

Mar. Shall I not trust my eyes, Sir, Or taste? I feel her good cheer in my belly.

Sir G. You shall feel me, if you give not over, sirrah.

Recover your brains again, and be no more gull'd With a beggar's plot, assisted by the aids Of serving men and chambermaids, (for, beyond these, Thou never saw'st a woman,) or I'll quit you From my employments.

Mar. Will you credit this yet?

On my confidence of their marriage, I offer'd Wellborn

(I would give a crown now, I durst say his worship,) [Aside.]

My nag, and twenty pounds.

Sir G. Did you so, idiot? [Strikes him down.] Was this the way to work him to despair,

VOL. I. . . 3 L.

38*

Or rather to cross me? [Strikes him again.]

Mar. Will your worship kill me?

Sir G. No, no; but drive the lying spirit out of you.

Mar. He's gone.

Sir G. I have done then. Now, forgetting

Your late imaginary feast and lady, Know, my Lord Lovell dines with me to-morrow; Be careful nought be wanting to receive him; And bid my daughter's women trim her up; Though they paint her, so she catch the lord, I'll thank 'em.

There's a piece for my late blows.

Mar. I must yet suffer;

But there may be a time—

[Aside.]

Sir G. Do you grumble?

Mar. No, Sir.

[Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The Country.

Enter LORD LOVELL and ALLWORTH.

Lord L. Drive the carriage down the hill, something in private I must impart to Allworth.

Allw. O, my Lord!

What danger, though in ne'er so horrid shapes, Nay, death itself, though I should run to meet it, Can I, and with a thankful willingness, suffer; But still the retribution will fall short Of your bounties shower'd upon me.

Lord L. Nay, good youth,

Till what I purpose be put into act, Do not o'erprize it; since you have trusted me With your soul's nearest, nay her dearest, secret, Rest confident, 'tis in a cabinet lock'd Treachery shall never open. I have found you More zealous in your love and service to me, Than I have been in my rewards.

Allw. Still great ones,

Above my merit. You have been More like a father to me than a master. Pray you, pardon the comparison.

Lord L. I allow it,

And give you assurance I'm pleas'd in't. My carriage and demeanor to your mistress, Fair Margaret, shall truly witness for me, I can command my passion.

Allw. 'Tis a conquest

[Oh!]

Few lords can boast of when they are tempted.— Lord L. Why do you sigh? can you be doubtful of me?

By that fair name I in the wars have purchas'd, And all my actions hitherto untainted, I will not be more true to mine own honour, Than to thee, Allworth.

Allw. Were you to encounter with a single foe, The victory were certain: but to stand The charge of two such potent enemies, At once assaulting you, as wealth and beauty, And those two seconded with power, is odds Too great for Hercules.

Lord L. Speak your doubts and fears, Since you will nourish 'em, in plainer language, That I may understand 'em.

Allw. What's your will,

Though I lend arms against myself, (provided They may advantage you,) must be obey'd. My much-lov'd lord, were Margaret only fair, You might command your passion; But, when you feel her touch, or hear her talk,

Hippolitus himself would leave Diana,
To follow such a Venus.

Lord L. Love hath made you
Poetical, Allworth.

Altho. Grant all these beat off,
(Which, if it be in man to do, you'll do it.)
Mammon, in Sir Giles Overreach, steps in,
With heaps of ill-got gold, and so much land, as would tire

A falcon's wings, in one day, to fly over.
I here release your trust;

'Tis happiness enough for me to serve you,
And sometimes, with chaste eyes, to look on her.

Lord L. Why, shall I swear?

Altho. Oh, by no means, my lord

Lord L. Suspend

Your judgment till the trial. How far is it
To Overreach's house?

Altho. At the most, some half-hour's riding;
You'll soon be there.

Lord L. And you the sooner freed
From your jealous fears.

Altho. Oh that I durst but hope it! [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Hall in SIR GILES OVER-
REACH'S House.

Enter SIR GILES OVERREACH, JUSTICE GREEDY, and MARRALL.

Sir G. Spare for no cost, let my dressers crack with the weight
Of curious viands.

Just. Gr. Store indeed 's no sore, Sir.

Sir G. That proverb fits your stomach, Mr.
Greedy.

Just. Gr. It does indeed, Sir Giles;
I do not like to see a table ill spread,
Poor, meagre, just sprinkled o'er with salads,
Slic'd beef, giblets, and pig's petticoats.
But the substantials—Oh! Sir Giles, the sub-
The state of a fat turkey now, [stantials!
The decorum, the grandeur he marches in with.
O, I declare, I do much honour a chine of beef!
O, lord! I do reverence a loin of veal!

Sir G. And let no plate be seen but what's pure gold;

Or such whose workmanship exceeds the matter
That it is made of; lay my choicest linen;
Perfume the room; and, when we wash, the water
With precious powders mix, to please my lord,
That he may, with envy, wish to bathe so ever.

Mar. 'Twill be very chargeable.

Sir G. Avaunt! you drudge.

Now all my labour'd ends are at the stake,
Is't a time to think of thrift? Call in my daughter. [Exit MARRALL.]

And, master justice, since you love choice dishes,
And plenty of 'em—

Just. Gr. As I do, indeed, Sir,

Almost as much as to give thanks for 'em—

Sir G. I do confer that province, with my power
Of absolute command to have abundance,
To your best care.

Just. Gr. I'll punctually discharge it,
And give the best directions.

[SIR GILES OVERREACH retires.]

Now am I,

In my own conceit, a monarch; at the least
Arch-president of the boil'd, the roast, the bak'd; would not change my empire for the great Mogul's.

will eat often, and give thanks,

When my belly's brac'd up like a drum, and that's pure justice. [Exit.]

Sir G. It must be so. Should the foolish gir prove modest,

She may spoil all: she had it not from me,
But from her mother: I was ever forward,
As she must be, and therefore I'll prepare her.

Re-enter MARRALL, with MARGARET.

Alone, Margaret, and let your women wait without.

Marg. Your pleasure, Sir? [Exit MARRALL.]

Sir G. Ha, this is a neat dressing!
These orient pearls and diamonds well plac'd too!
The gown affects me not; it should have been Embroider'd o'er and o'er with flowers of gold;
But these rich jewels, and quaint fashion, help it.
How like you your new woman, the Lady Down-fall'n?

Marg. Well, for a companion;
Not as a servant.

Sir G. Is she humble, Meg?
And careful too, her ladyship forgotten?

Marg. I pity her fortune.
Sir G. Pity her! trample on her.

I took her up in an old tatter'd gown
(E'en starv'd for want of food) to serve thee;
And if I understand she but repines

To do thee any duty, though ne'er so servile,
I'll pack her to her knight, where I have lodg'd him, [ther.

Into the counter, and there let them howl toge-
Marg. You know your own ways; but, for me,
I blush

When I command her, that was once attended
With persons not inferior to myself
In birth.

Sir G. In birth! Why art thou not my daughter,
The bless'd child of my industry and wealth?
Part with these humble thoughts, and apt thyself
To the noble state I labour'd to advance thee;
Or, by my hopes to see thee honourable,
I will adopt a stranger to my heir,
And throw thee from my care; do not provoke me.

Marg. I will not, Sir; mould me which way you please.

Re-enter JUSTICE GREEDY.

Just. Gr. Sir Giles, Sir Giles,—

Sir G. How, interrupted?

Just. Gr. 'Tis matter of importance.

The cook, Sir, is self-will'd, and will not learn From my experience. There's a fawn brought in, Sir,

And, for my life, I cannot make him roast it
With a Norfolk dumping in the belly of it;
And, Sir, we wise men know, without the dump-
'Tis not worth threepence. [ling

Sir G. Would it were whole in thy belly,
To stuff it out; cook it any way; pry'thee, leave
me.

Just. Gr. Without order for the dumping?

Sir G. Let it be dumped
Which way thou wilt; or, tell him I will scald
In his own caldron. [him

Just. Gr. I had lost my stomach

Had I lost my dumping. [Exit.]

Sir G. But to our business, Meg; you have heard who dines here?

Marg. I have, Sir.

Sir G. 'Tis an honourable man;
A lord, Meg, and commands a regiment
Of soldiers; and, what's rare, is one himself;

A bold and understanding one : and to be
A lord and a good leader in one volume
Is granted unto few, but such as rise up
The kingdom's glory.

Re-enter JUSTICE GREEDY.

Just. Gr. I'll resign my office
If I be not better obey'd.

Sir G. 'Slight, art thou frantic ?

Just. Gr. Frantic ! 'twould make me frantic, and stark mad,
Were I not a justice of peace and quorum too,
Which the rebellious cook cares not a straw for.
There are a dozen of woodcocks—

Sir G. Make thyself thirteen, the baker's dozen.

Just. Gr. For which he has found out
A new device for sauce, and will not dish 'em
With toast and butter.

Sir G. Cook, rogue ! obey him. [self
I have given the word, pray you now remove your-
To a collar of brawn, and trouble me no farther.

Just. Gr. I will, and meditate what to eat for dinner. [Exit.

Sir G. And, as I said, Meg, when this gull disturb'd us,

This honourable lord, this colonel,
I would have thy husband.

Marg. There's too much disparity
Between his quality and mine, to hope it.

Sir G. I more than hope, and doubt not to effect it.

Be thou no enemy to thyself : my wealth
Shall weigh his titles down, and make you equals.
Now for the means to assure him thine, observe me :
Remember he's a courtier and a soldier,
And not to be trifled with ; and therefore, when
He comes to woo you, see you do not coy it.
This mincing modesty, hath spoil'd many a match,
By a first refusal, in vain after hop'd for.

Marg. You'll have me, Sir, preserve the distance that

Confines a virgin ?

Sir G. Virgin me no virgins !
I will have you lose that name, or you lose me.
I will have you private ; start not, I say private :
If you are my true daughter, not a bastard,
Thou wilt venture alone with one man, though he come

Like Jupiter to Semele, and come oft too ;
And therefore, when he kisses you, kiss close.

Marg. I have heard this is the wanton's fashion,
Which I must never learn. [Sir,

Sir G. Learn any thing,
And from any creature, to make thee great ;
E'en from the devil himself ;—stand not on form ;
Words are no substances.

Marg. Though you can dispense
With your honour, I must guard my own.
This is not the way to make me his wife.
My maiden honour, yielded up so soon,
Nay prostituted, cannot but assure him,
I, that am light to him, would not hold weight
When tempted by others ; so, in judgment,
When to his will I have given up my honour,
He must and will forsake me.

Sir G. How, forsake thee ?
Do I wear this sword for fashion ? or is this arm
Shrunk up, or wither'd ? Does there live a man
Of that large list I have encounter'd with,
Can truly say I e'er gave inch of ground,
Not purchas'd with his blood that did oppose me ?
Forsake thee ! he dares not.

Though all his captains, echoes to his will,
Stood armed by his side to justify the wrong,
And he himself in the head of his bold troop,
Spite of his lordship, I will make him render
A bloody and a strict account, and force him,
By marrying thee, to cure thy wounded honour.
I have said it.

Re-enter MARRALL.

Mar. Sir, the man of honour's come,
Newly alighted.

Sir G. In, without reply ;
And do as I command, or thou art lost.

[Exit MARGARET.
Is the loud music I gave order for,
Ready to receive him ?

Mar. 'Tis, Sir.

Sir G. Let 'em sound
A princely welcome. [Exit MARRALL.] Roughness, awhile leave me ;
For fawning now, a stranger to my nature,
Must make way for me. [Loud music.

Enter LORD LOVELL, ALLWORTH, and MARRALL.

Lord L. Sir, you meet your trouble.

Sir G. What you are pleased to style so, is an honour

Above my worth and fortunes.

Allw. Strange ! so humble. [Aside.

Re-enter JUSTICE GREEDY.

Sir G. A justice of the peace, my lord.

[Presents JUSTICE GREEDY to him.

Lord L. Your hand, good Sir.

Just. Gr. This is a lord ; and some think this a favour ;

But I had rather have my hand in my dumpling.
[Aside.

Sir G. Room for my lord.

Lord L. I miss, Sir, your fair daughter,
To crown my welcome.

Sir G. May it please my lord
To taste a glass of Greek wine first ; and suddenly
She shall attend, my lord.

Lord L. You'll be obey'd, Sir.

[Exeunt all but SIR GILES.

Sir G. 'Tis to my wish ; as soon as come, ask for her !

Why, Meg ! Meg Overreach !

Re-enter MARGARET.

How ! tears in your eyes ?

Ha ! dry 'em quickly, or I'll dig 'em out.
Is this a time to whimper ? meet that greatness
That flies into thy bosom ; think what 'tis
For me to say my honourable daughter.
No more ; but be instructed, or expect—
He comes.

Re-enter LORD LOVELL, JUSTICE GREEDY, MARRALL, and ALLWORTH.

A black-brow'd girl, my lord.

Lord L. As I live, a rare one ! [Kisses her

Allw. He's took already ! I am lost.

Sir G. That kiss

Came twanging off ; I like it ; quit the room.

[Exeunt ALLWORTH, MARRALL, and JUSTICE
GREEDY.

A little bashful, my good lord ; but you,
I hope, will teach her boldness.

Lord L. I am happy
In such a scholar ; but—

Sir G. I am past learning,
And therefore leave you to yourselves; remember— [Apart to MARGARET, and exit.]

Lord L. You see, fair lady, your father is solicitous

To have you change the barren name of virgin,
Into a hopeful wife.

Marg. His haste, my lord
Holds no power o'er my will.

Lord L. But o'er your duty—

Marg. Which, forc'd too much, may break.

Lord L. Bend rather, sweetest;
Think of your years.

Marg. Too few to match with yours.

Lord L. I can advance you.

Marg. To a hill of sorrow;

Where every hour I may expect to fall,
But never hope firm footing. You are noble;
I of low descent, however rich.

O! my good lord, I could say more, but that
I dare not trust these walls.

Lord L. Pray you, trust my ear, then.

[Whispering.]

Re-enter SIR GILES OVERREACH, listening.

Sir G. Close at it! whispering! this is excellent!
And, by their postures, a consent on both parts.

Re-enter JUSTICE GREEDY.

Just. Gr. Sir Giles! Sir Giles!

Sir G. The great fiend stop that clapper!

[Apart to JUSTICE GREEDY.]

Just. Gr. It must ring out, Sir, when my belly rings noon. [powder.]

The bak'd meats are run out, the roast turn'd
Sir G. Stop your insatiate jaws, or
I shall powder you. [Apart.]

Just. Gr. Beat me to dust, I care not;
In such a cause as this, I'll die a martyr. [Apart.]

Sir G. Disturb my lord when he is in discourse? [Apart.]

Just. Gr. Is't a time to talk,
When we should be munching? [Apart.]

Sir G. Peace, villain, peace! shall we break a
Almost made up? Vanish, I say. [bargain]

[Apart, thrusts him off.]

Lord L. Lady, I understand you;
Rest most happy in your choice. Believe it,

I'll be a careful pilot, to direct

Your yet uncertain bark to a port of safety.

Marg. So shall your honour save two lives, and bind us

Your slaves for ever.

Lord L. I am in the act rewarded,
Since it is good; how'er, you must put on An amorous carriage towards me, to delude your subtle father,

'Till our purpose be brought to the wish'd end.

Marg. I am bound to that.

Lord L. Now break we off our conference.—
Where is Sir Giles? [Sir Giles!]

Re-enter SIR GILES OVERREACH, JUSTICE GREEDY, ALLWORTH, and MARRALL.

Sir G. My noble lord; and how Does your lordship find her?

Lord L. Apt, Sir Giles, and coming;

And I like her the better.

Sir G. So do I too. [assault,

Lord L. Yet, should we take forts at the first
'Twere poor in the defendant. I must confirm her

With a love-letter or two, which I must have Deliver'd by my page, and you give way to't.

Sir G. With all my soul.—A tow'rly gentleman!

Your hand, good Mr. Allworth; know, my house
Is ever open to you.

Allw. 'Twas shut till now. [Aside.]

Sir G. Well done, well done, my honourable
daughter,

Thou'rt so already; know this gentle youth,
And cherish him, my honourable daughter.

Marg. I shall, with my best care.

[Noise without]

Sir G. What noise?

Just. Gr. More stops

Before we go to dinner! O my guts!

Enter LADY ALLWORTH and WELLBORN.

Lady A. If I find welcome,
You share in it; if not, I'll back again;
For I come arm'd for all
Can be objected.

Lord L. How! the Lady Allworth!

Sir G. And thus attended!

Mar. No, I am a dolt;

The spirit of lies hath enter'd me.

[*LORD LOVELL presents MARGARET to LADY
ALLWORTH.*]

Sir G. Peace, patch!

'Tis more than wonder, an astonishment
That does possess me wholly.

Lord L. Noble lady,

This is a favour, to prevent my visit,
The service of my life can never equal.

Lady A. My lord, I laid wait for you, and much hop'd

You would have made my poor house your first inn
And, therefore, doubting that you might forget me,

Or too long dwell here having such ample cause,

In this unequal'd beauty, for your stay;

And fearing to trust any but myself

With the relation of my service to you;

I borrow'd so much from my long restraint,

And took the air in person to invite you.

Lord L. Your bounties are so great, they rob
Me, Madam,

Of words to give you thanks.

Lady A. Good Sir Giles Overreach.

[Bows to him.]

How dost thou, Marrall?—Lik'd you my meat so

You'd dine no more with me? [ill,]

[To JUSTICE GREEDY.]

Just. Gr. I will when you please,

As it like your ladyship.

Lady A. When you please, Mr. Greedy;

If meat can do it you shall be satisfied.

And now, my lord, pray take into your knowledge

This gentleman: how'er his outside's coarse,

[Presents WELLBORN.]

His inward linings are as fine and fair

As any man's. Wonder not I speak at large;

And howsoe'er his humour carries him

To be thus accoutred, or what taint soe'er

For his wild life have stuck upon his fame,

He may ere long with boldness rank himself

With some that have contemn'd him. Sir Giles

If I am welcome, bid him so. [Overreach,

Sir G. My nephew!

He hath been too long a stranger; 'faith, you have.

Pray let it be mended.

[LORD L. confers with WELLBORN.]

Mar. Why, Sir, what do you mean?

This is rogue Wellborn, monster, prodigy,
That should hang or drown himself; no man of worship,

Much less your nephew. [Apart to SIR G.

Sir G. Well, sirrah, we shall reckon
For this hereafter. [Apart.

Mar. I'll not lose my jeer
Though I be beaten dead for it. [Aside.

Well. Let my silence plead
In my excuse, my lord, till better leisure
Offer itself to hear a full relation
Of my poor fortunes.

Lord L. I would hear and help 'em. [Bell rings.

Sir G. Your dinner waits you.

Lord L. Pray you lead; we follow.

Lady A. Nay, you are my guest.—Come, dear
Mr. Wellborn.

[Exeunt all but JUSTICE GREEDY.
Just. Gr. Dear Mr. Wellborn! so she said;
heaven! heaven! [nate

If my belly would give me leave, I could rumi-
All day on this: I have granted twenty warrants
To have him committed, from all prisons in the shire, [born,

To Nottingham jail! and now, dear Mr. Well-
And my good nephew!—But I play the fool
To stand here prating and forget my dinner.

Re-enter MARRALL.

Are they set, Marrall?

Mar. Long since. Pray you a word, Sir.

Just. Gr. No wording now.

Mar. In troth, I must; my master, [with you,
Knowing you are his good friend, makes bold
And does entreat you, more guests being come in
Than he expected, especially his nephew,
The table being too full, you would excuse him,
And sup with him on the cold meat.

Just. Gr. How! no dinner
After all my care?

Mar. 'Tis but a penance for
A meal; besides, you have broke your fast.

Just. Gr. That was [sion
But a bit to stay my stomach. A man in commis-
Give place to a tatterdemalion!

Mar. No big words, Sir;
Should his worship hear you—

Just. Gr. Lose my dumpling too,
And butter'd toasts and woodcocks?

Mar. Come, have patience;
If you will dispense a little with your justiceship,
And sit with the servants below, you'll have Woodcock, and butter'd toast, too. [dumpling,

Just. Gr. This revives me:
I will gorge there sufficiently.

Mar. This is the way, Sir. [Exeunt.

Re-enter SIR GILES OVERREACH, as from dinner.

Sir G. She's caught! O woman! she neglects my lord,

And all her compliments apply to Wellborn.
The garments of her widowhood laid by,
She now appears as glorious as the spring.
Her eyes fix'd on him; in the wine she drinks,
He being her pledge, she sends him burning kisses,
And sits on thorns till she be private with him.
She leaves my meat to feed upon his looks;
And, if in our discourse he be but nam'd,
From her a deep sigh follows.—But why grieve I

At this? It makes for me; if she prove his,
All that is hers is mine, as I will work him.

Re-enter MARRALL.

Mar. Sir, the whole board is troubled at your rising. [rall,

Sir G. No matter; I'll excuse it. Pr'ythee, Mar-
Watch an occasion to invite my nephew
To speak with me in private.

Mar. Who, the rogue
The lady scorn'd to look on?
Sir G. Sirrah! sirrah!

Re-enter LORD LOVELL, MARGARET, and ALL-WORTH.

My good lord, excuse my manners.

Lord L. There needs none, Sir Giles;
I may ere long say father, when it pleases
My dearest mistress to give warrant to it.

Sir G. She shall seal to it, my lord, and make me happy.

LADY ALLWORTH, &c. within.

Lady A. Nay, Mr. Wellborn. [out him.

Mar. See, see, she comes, and cannot be with-Sir G. Grosser and grosser.

Re-enter WELLBORN and LADY ALLWORTH.

Lady A. Provide my coach;
I'll instantly away. My thanks, Sir Giles,
For my entertainment.

Sir G. 'Tis your nobleness
To think it such.

Lady A. I must do you a further wrong,
In taking away your honourable guest.

Lord L. I wait on you, Madam. Farewell, good Sir Giles.

Lady A. Come, Mr. Wellborn,
I must not leave you behind, in sooth, I must not.

Sir G. Rob me not, Madam, of all joys at once.
Let my nephew stay behind: he shall have my coach,

And, after some small conference between us,
Soon overtake your ladyship.

Lady A. Stay not so long, Sir.

Lord L. 'Tis his parting kiss. You shall every day hear from me,

By my faithful page. [To MARGARET.

Altho' 'Tis a service I am proud of. [Exeunt.

Sir G. Daughter, to your chamber. [Exit MARGARET

You may wonder, nephew,
After so long an enmity between us,
I should desire your friendship.

Well. So I do, Sir;

'Tis strange to me.

Sir G. But I'll make it no wonder;

And, what is more, unfold my nature to you.
We worldly men, when we see friends and kins-
men,

Past hope, sunk in their fortunes, lend no hand
To lift 'em up, but rather set our feet
Upon their heads, to press 'em to the bottom;
As I must yield, with you I practis'd it:
But now I see you in a way to rise,
I can and will assist you. This rich lady
(And I am glad of't) is enamour'd of you.

Well. No such thing;

Compassion rather, Sir.

Sir G. Well, in a word,
Because your stay is short, I'll have you seen
No more in this base shape; nor shall she say
She married you like a beggar, or in debt.

Well. He'll run into the noose, and save my labour.

Sir G. You have a trunk of rich clothes, not far hence,

In pawn: I will redeem 'em; and, that no clamour May taint your credit for your debts, You shall have a thousand pounds to cut 'em off And go a freeman to the wealthy lady.

Well. This done, Sir, out of love, and no ends Sir G. As it is, nephew.

Well. Binds me still your servant.

Sir G. No compliments; you are staid for: ere you've supp'd,

You shall hear from me. My coach, knaves, for my nephew:

To-morrow I will visit you.

Well. Here's an uncle

In a man's extremes! how much they do belie you That say you are hard-hearted!

Sir G. My deeds, nephew,

Shall speak my love; what men report, I weigh not.

[Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Room in LADY ALLWORTH'S House.

LORD LOVELL and ALLWORTH discovered.

Lord L. 'Tis well, I now discharge you From further service. Mind your own affairs. I hope they will prove successful.

Allw. What is bless'd

With your good wish, my lord, cannot but prosper. Let after-times report, and to your honour, How much I stand engag'd; for I want language To speak my debt: yet, if a tear or two Of joy, for your much goodness, can supply My tongue's defects, I could—

Lord L. Nay do not melt;

This ceremonial of thanks to me's superfluous.

Sir G. [Within.] Is my lord stirring?

Lord L. 'Tis he! Oh, here's your letter! Let him in.

Enter SIR GILES OVERREACH, JUSTICE GREEDY, and MARALL.

Sir G. A good day to my lord.

Lord L. You are an early riser, Sir Giles!

Sir G. And reason, to attend your lordship!

Lord L. And you too, Mr. Greedy, up so soon?

Just. Gr. In troth, my lord, after the sun is up I cannot sleep; for I have a foolish stomach That croaks for breakfast. With your lordship's I have a serious question to demand [favour, Of my worthy friend, Sir Giles.

Lord L. Pray you, use your pleasure.

Just. Gr. How far, Sir Giles, and pray you answer me

Upon your credit, hold you it to be [worth's? From your manor-house to this of my Lady All-

Sir G. Why, some four miles.

Just. Gr. How! four miles, good Sir Giles?

Upon your reputation, think better;

For four miles riding

Could not have rais'd so huge an appetite

As I feel gnawing on me.

Mar. Whether you ride

Or go a-foot, you are that way still provided,

An it please your worship.

Sir G. How now, sirrah! prating

Before my lord? No deference? Go to my nephew See all his debts discharg'd, and help his worship To fit on his rich suit.

Mar. I may fit you too. [Aside, and exit.]

Lord L. I have writ this morning

A few lines to my mistress, your fair daughter.

Sir G. 'Twill fire her, for she's wholly your's already.

Sweet Mr. Allworth, take my ring; 'twill carry To her presence, I dare warrant you; and there plead

For my good lord, if you shall find occasion.

That done, pray ride to Nottingham; get a license, Still by this token. I'll have it despatch'd,

And suddenly, my lord: that I may say

My honourable, nay, right honourable daughter.

Just. Gr. Take my advice, young gentleman; get your breakfast,

'Tis unwholesome to ride fasting. I'll eat with you; And that abundantly.

Sir G. Some fury's in that gut:

Hungry again? Did you not devour, this morning, A shield of brawn, and a barrel of Colchester oysters?

Just. Gr. Why that was, Sir, only to scour my A kind of preparative. [Stomach,

Lord L. Hasten your return.

Allw. I will not fail, my lord.

Just. Gr. Nor I, to line

My Christmas coffer.

[Exeunt JUSTICE GREEDY and ALLWORTH.]

Sir G. To my wish, we're private.

I come not to make offer with my daughter

A certain portion; that were poor and trivial:

In one word, I pronounce all that is mine, In lands or leases, ready coin or goods, [have

With her, my lord, comes to you; nor shall you One motive to induce you to believe

I live too long; since every year I'll add Something unto the heap, which shall be yours too.

Lord L. You are a right kind father.

Sir G. You shall have reason

To think me such. How do you like this seat Of Lady Allworth?

It is well wooded, and well water'd; the acres Fertile and rich; would it not serve for change

To entertain your friends in a summer's progress? What thinks my noble lord?

Lord L. 'Tis a wholesome air, And a well-built pile; and she that's mistress of it Worthy the large revenue.

Sir G. She the mistress?

It may be so, for a time: but let my lord

Say only that he but like it, and would have it, I say, ere long, 'tis his.

Lord L. Impossible.

Sir G. You do conclude too fast, not knowing Nor the engines that I work by. 'Tis not alone The Lady Allworth's lands (for, those once Well-born's,

As, by her dotage on him, I know they will be)

Shall soon be mine; but point out any man's

In all the shire, and say they lie convenient

And useful for your lordship, and once more

I say aloud, they are yours.

Lord L. I dare not own

What's by unjust and cruel means extorted:

My fame and credit are more dear to me,

Than to expose 'em to be censur'd by

The public voice.

Sir G. You run, my lord, no hazard;

Your reputation shall still stand as fair

In all good men's opinions as now;
 For though I do condemn report myself,
 As a mere sound, I still will be so tender
 Of what concerns you in all points of honour,
 That the white integrity of your fame
 Shall ne'er be sullied with one taint or spot.
 All my ambition is to have my daughter
 Right honourable; which my lord can make her;
 And might I live to dance upon my knee
 A young Lord Lovell, born by her unto you,
 I write nil ultra to my proudest hopes.
 As for possessions and annual rents,
 Equivalent to maintain you in the port
 Your noble birth and present state require,
 I do remove that burden from your shoulders,
 And take it on mine own; for, though I ruin
 The country to supply your riotous waste, [you.
 The scourge of prodigals, want, shall never find
Lord L. Are you not mov'd with the imprecations

And curses of whole families, made wretched
 By these practices?

Sir G. Yes, as rocks are,

When foamy billows split themselves against
 Their flinty ribs; or, as the moon is mov'd,
 When wolves, with hunger pin'd, howl at her brightness.

Nay, when my ears are pierc'd with widows' cries,
 And undone orphans wash with tears my threshold,

I only think what 'tis to have my daughter
 Right honourable; and 'tis a powerful charm,
 Makes me insensible of remorse or pity
 Or the least sting of conscience.

Lord L. I admire

The toughness of your nature.

Sir G. 'Tis for you,

My lord, and for my daughter, I am marble:
 My haste commands me hence: in one word,
 Is it a match, my lord? [therefore,

Lord L. I hope that is past doubt, now.

Sir G. Then rest secure; not the hate of all mankind here,

Nor fear of what can fall on me hereafter,
 Shall make me study aught but your advancement
 One story higher. An ear! if gold can do it.
 Dispute not my religion, nor my faith,
 Though I am borne thus headlong by my will;
 You may make choice of what belief you please,
 To me they are equal; so, my lord, goodmorrow.

[Exit.

Lord L. He's gone; I wonder how the earth can bear

Such a monster! I, that have liv'd a soldier,
 And stood the enemy's violent charge undaunted,
 To hear this horrid beast, I'm bath'd all over
 In a cold sweat; yet, like a mountain, he
 Is no more shaken, than Olympus is,
 When angry Boreas loads his lofty head
 With sudden drifts of snow.

Enter LADY ALLWORTH.

Lady A. Save you, my lord
 Disturb I not your privacy?

Lord L. No, good Madam

For your own sake I am glad you came no sooner,
 Since this bold, bad man, Sir Giles Overreach,
 Made such a plain discovery of himself,
 And read this morning such devilish matins,
 That I should think it sin, next to his,
 But to repeat it.

Lady A. I never press'd, my lord,

On others' privacies; yet, against my will,
 Walking, for health's sake, in the gallery, I was made

(So loud and vehement he was) partaker
 Of his tempting offers. But,
 My good lord, if I may use my freedom,
 As to an honour'd friend—

Lord L. You lessen else
 Your favour to me.

Lady A. I dare then say thus:

However common men
 Make sordid wealth the object and sole end
 Of their industrious aims, 'twill not agree
 With those of noble blood, of fame and honour.

Lord L. Madam, 'tis confessed;
 But what infer you from it?

Lady A. This, my lord: I allow
 The heir of Sir Giles Overreach, Margaret,
 A maid well qualified, and the richest match
 Our northern part can boast of; yet she cannot,
 With all that she brings with her, stop their mouths,

That never will forget who was her father;—
 You may conceive the rest.

Lord L. I do, sweet Madam;

And long since have consider'd it.

And 'tis my resolution ne'er to wed
 With the rich Margaret, Overreach's daughter.

Lady A. I am glad to hear this— [Aside.

Why then, my lord, pretend you marriage to her?
 Dissimulation but ties false knots
 On that straight line, by which you hitherto
 Have measur'd all your actions.

Lord L. I make answer,

And aptly, with a question. Wherefore have you,
 That since your husband's death have liv'd a strict
 And chaste nun's life, on the sudden given yourself [dam,

To visits and entertainments? Think you, Ma-
 'Tis not grown public conference? or the favours
 Which you too prodigally have thrown on Well-
 Incur not censure? [born,

Lady A. I am innocent here, and, on my life, I
 My ends are good. [swear

Lord L. On my soul, so are mine
 To Margaret; but leave both to the event:
 And since this friendly privacy doth serve
 But as an offer'd means unto ourselves
 To search each other further, you have shown
 Your care of me, I my respect to you;
 Deny me not, I dare not yet say more,
 An afternoon's discourse. [suit,

Lady L. Affected modesty might deny your
 But such your honour, I accept it, lord.
 My tongue unworthy can't belie my heart.
 I shall attend your lordship.

Lord L. My heart thanks you. [Revert.

SCENE II.—A Landscape before TAPWELL'S
 House.

Enter TAPWELL and FROTH.

Tap. Undone, undone! this was your counsel,
 Froth. [rail

Froth. Mine! I defy thee: did not Master Mar-
 (He has marr'd all, I am sure) strictly command us,
 On pain of Sir Giles Overreach's displeasure,
 To turn the gentleman out of doors?

Tap. 'Tis true;

But now he's his uncle's darling, and has got Master Justice Greedy (since he fill'd his belly,
 At his commandment, to do any thing,
 Wo, wo, to us!

Froth. He may prove merciful.

Tap. Froth, we do not deserve it at his hands.

Froth. Then he knew all the passages of our house,
As the receiving of stolen goods.
When he was rogue Wellborn, no man would believe him;

And then his information could not hurt us:
But now he is right worshipful again,
Who dares but doubt his testimony?

Tap. Undone! undone! methinks I see thee, Froth, already in a cart,
And my hand hissing, (if I 'scape the halter,)
With the letter R printed upon it.

Froth. What that were the worst!
That were but nine days' wonder: as for credit,
We have none to lose; but we shall lose the money
He owes us, and his custom; there's the plague on't.

Tap. He has summon'd all his creditors by the
And they swarm about him like so many soldiers
On the pay-day; and has found out such a new
To pay his old debts, as 'tis very likely, [way
He shall be chronicled for it.

Froth. But you are sure his worship
Comes this way to my lady's?

[Cry of brave WELLBORN!

Tap. Hark! I hear him.

Froth. Be ready with your petition and pre-
To his good grace. [sent it
[Drums within, cry of brave WELLBORN.

Enter WELLBORN, in a rich habit, GREEDY, MARRALL, CREDITORS, &c. TAPWELL, kneeling, delivers in his bill.

Well. How's this! petition'd too?
But note what miracles the payment of
A little trash, and a rich suit of clothes,
Can work upon these rascals. I shall be,
I think, prince Wellborn.

Mar. When your worship's married,
You may be. [Aside.] I know what I hope to see you.

Well. Then look thou for advancement.

Mar. To be known
Your worship's bailiff, is the mark I shoot at.

Well. And thou shalt hit it.

Mar. Pray you, Sir, despatch
These needy followers, and for my admittance
[TAPWELL and FROTH flatter and bribe JUSTICE GREEDY.

(Provided you'll defend me from Sir Giles, Whose service I am weary of,) I'll say something
You shall give thanks for.

Well. Fear him not.

Just. Gr. Who, Tapwell? I do remember thy wife brought me,

Last new year's tide, a couple of fat turkeys.

Tap. And shall do every Christmas, let your
But stand my friend now. [worship

Just. Gr. How! with Mr. Wellborn?
I can do any thing with him, on such terms—
See you this honest couple? they are good souls
As ever drew out spigot; have they not
A pair of honest faces?

Well. I o'erheard you,
And the bribe he promis'd; you are cozen'd in
'em;

For, of all the scum that grew rich by my riots,
This for a most unthankful knave, and this
For a base woman, have the worst deserv'd;
And therefore speak not for them. By your place,

You are rather to do me justice; lend me your ear,
Forget his turkeys, and call in his license.
And every season I will send you venison
To feast a mayor and corporation.

Just. Gr. I am changed on the sudden
In my opinion—Mum!
I fry like a burn'd marrowbone. [Aside.] Come nearer, rascal;
And now I view him better, did you e'er see
One look so like an arch knave? his very countenance, [him,

Should an understanding judge but look upon
Would hang him though he were innocent.

Tap. Froth. Worshipful Sir!
Just. Gr. No; though the great Turk came instead of turkeys,

To beg my favour, I am inexorable.
Thou hast an ill name; I here do damn thy license,
Forbidding thee ever to tap or draw;
For instantly will I in mine own person,
Command the constable to pull down thy sign.

Froth. No mercy!

Just. Gr. Vanish!

If I show any, may my promis'd venison choke me.

Tap. Unthankful knaves are ever so rewarded.
[Exeunt TAPWELL and FROTH.

Well. Speak; what are you?
1st Cred. A decayed vintner, Sir,
That might have thriv'd, but that your worship broke me

With trusting you with muscadine and eggs,
And five-pound suppers, with your after-drinkings,
When you lodg'd upon the Bankside.

Well. I remember.
1st Cred. I have not been hasty, nor e'er laid
And therefore, Sir— [to arrest you;

Well. Thou art an honest fellow;
I'll set thee up again; see his bill paid.
[To MARRALL.

What are you?

2d Cred. A tailor once, but now mere botcher.
I gave you credit for a new suit of clothes,
Which was all my stock; but, you failing in payment,

I was remov'd from the shop-board, and confin'd
Under a stall.

Well. See him paid; and botch no more.

2d Cred. I ask no interest, Sir.

Well. Such tailors need not.
If their bills are paid in one and twenty years,
They are seldom losers—See these men discharg'd;

And, since old debts are clear'd by a new way,
A little bounty will not misbecome me;
There's something for you all,

[Throws them a purse.
And I am able to spare it.

All the Cred. Brave Mr. Wellborn!
[Exeunt CREDITORS.

Well. Pray you, on before;
I'll attend you at dinner.

Just. Gr. For heaven's sake, don't stay long;
It is almost ready.

[Exeunt all but WELLBORN and MARRALL.
Well. Now, Mr. Marrall, what's the weighty
You promis'd to impart? [secret

Mar. Sir, time nor place
Allow me to relate each circumstance:
This only in a word; I know Sir Giles
Will come upon you for security
For his thousand pounds; which you must not consent to.

As he grows in heat, (as I am sure he will),

Be you but rough, and say he's in your debt
Ten times the sum, upon sale of your land:
I had a hand in't (I speak it to my shame)
When you were cozen'd of it.

Well. That's forgiven. [duce

Mar. I shall deserve it then; urge him to pro-
The deed in which you pass'd it over to him,
Which I know he'll have ready to deliver
To the Lord Lovell. I'll instruct you further,
As I wait on your worship; if I play not my part
To your full content, and your uncle's much vex-
Hang up Jack Marrall. [ation,

Well. I rely upon thee. [Exeunt.

SCENE III.—A Room in SIR GILES OVER-
REACH'S HOUSE.

ALLWORTH and MARGARET (with a Letter in her hand) enter.

Allw. Whether to yield the first praise to my lord's [ness,
Unequall'd temperance, or your constant sweet-
I yet rest doubtful.

Marg. Give it to Lord Lovell;
For what in him was bounty, in me is duty.
I make but payment of a debt, to which
My vows, in that high office register'd,
Are faithful witnesses.

Allw. 'Tis true, my dearest;
Yet when I call to mind how many fair ones
Make wilful shipwreck of their faiths and oaths
To God and man, to fill the arms of greatness;
And you, with matchless virtue, thus to hold out
Against the stern authority of a father,
And spurn at honour when it comes to court you;
I am so tender of your good, that I can hardly Wish myself that right you are pleas'd to do me.

Marg. To me what's title, when content is Or wealth, when the heart pines, [wanting?
In being dispospos'd of what it longs for?
Or the smooth brow
Of a pleas'd sire, that slaves me to his will?
And, so his vain ambition may be feasted
By his obedience, and he see me great,
Leaves to my soul nor faculties nor power
To make her own election.

Allw. But the dangers
That follow the repulse.
Marg. To me they are nothing:
Let Allworth love, I cannot be unhappy.
Suppose the worst, that in his rage he kill me,
A tear or two by you dropp'd on my hearse,
In sorrow for my fate, will call back life
So far as but to say, that I die yours;
I then shall rest in peace.

Allw. Heaven avert
Such trials of your true affection to me!
Nor will it unto you, that are all mercy,
Show so much rigour. But since we must run
Such desperate hazards, let us do our best
To steer between 'em.

Marg. Lord Lovell is your friend;
And, though but a young actor, second me
In doing to the life what he has plotted.

Enter SIR GILES OVERREACH.

The end may yet prove happy. Now, my All-worth. [Apart to ALLWORTH.

Allw. To your letter, and put on a seeming anger. [Apart.

Marg. I'll pay my lord all debts due to his title;
And when with terms not taking from his honour

He does solicit me, I shall gladly hear him;
But in this peremptory, nay, commanding way,
To fix a time and place without my knowledge;
A priest, to tie the knot can ne'er be undone
'Till death unloose it; is a confidence
In his lordship that will deceive him.

Allw. I hope better, good lady.
Marg. Hope, Sir, what you please; for me,
I must take a safe and secure course. I have
A father, and without his full consent,
Though all the lords i' the land kneel'd for my
I can grant nothing. [favour,

Sir G. I like this obedience.
But whatsoever my lord writes must and shall be Accepted and embrac'd. [Aside.]—Sweet Mr.
Allworth,

You show yourself a true and faithful servant
To your good lord; he has a jewel of you.
How! frowning, Meg? are these looks to receive A messenger from my lord? What's this? give me it. [scriptions.

Marg. A piece of arrogant paper, like th' in-
SIR GILES reads the letter.

*Fair Mistress, from your servant learn, all joys
That we can hope for, if deferr'd, prove toys;
Therefore this instant, and in private, meet
A husband, that will gladly at your feet
Lay down his honours, tend'ring them to you
With all content, the church being paid her due.*

Is this the arrogant piece of paper? fool!
Will you still be one? In the name of madness, what

Could his good honour write more to content you?
Is there aught else to be wish'd after these two
That are already offer'd? Marriage first,
And lawful pleasure after: what would you more?

Marg. Why, Sir, I would be married like your daughter,

Not hurried away i' the night, I know not whither,
Without all ceremony; no friends invited,
To honour the solemnity.

Allw. An't please your honour,
(For so before to-morrow I must style you,)
My lord desires this privacy in respect
His honourable kinsmen are far off,
And his desires to have it done brook not
So long delay as to expect their coming;
And yet he stands resolv'd, with all due pomp,
To have his marriage at court celebrated,
When he has brought your honour up to London.

Sir G. He tells you true, 'tis the fashion, on my knowledge;

Yet the good lord, to please your peevishness,
Must put it off, forsooth.

Marg. I could be contented
Were you but by me to do a father's part,
And give me in the church.

Sir G. So my lord have you,
What do I care who gives you? since my lord
Does purpose to be private, I'll not cross him.
I know not, Mr. Allworth, how my lord
May be provided, and therefore there's a purse
Of gold; 'twill serve this night's expense; to-morrow

I'll furnish him with any sums. In the meantime, Use my ring to my chaplain; [Offers it.] he is benefic'd [do;

At my manor of Gotham, and call'd parson Well.
'Tis no matter for a license, I'll bear him out in't.

Marg. With your favour, Sir, what warrant is your ring?

He may suppose I got that twenty ways,
Without your knowledge? and then to be refus'd,
Were such a stain upon me: if you please, Sir,
Your presence would do better.

Sir G. Still perverse?

I say again, I will not cross my lord;
Yet I'll prevent you too—Paper and ink there.

Allw. Sir, it's ready here.

Sir G. I thank you; I can write then to my chaplain.

[Writes.]

Allw. Sir Giles, you may, if you please, leave out the name of my lord,

In respect he would be private, and only write, Marry her to this gentleman.

Sir G. Well advis'd;

'Tis done; away—[Gives ALLWORTH the paper.]
my blessing, girl? thou hast it.

[MARGARET kneels.]

Nay, no reply—Begone, good Mr. Allworth,
This shall be the best night's work you ever made.

Allw. I hope so, Sir.

[Exeunt ALLWORTH and MARGARET.]

Sir G. Now all's cock-sure.

Methinks, I hear already knights and ladies

Say, Sir Giles Overreach, how is it with Your honourable daughter?

My ends, my ends, are compass'd!—Then for Wellborn

[dow—]

And the lands? were he once married to the wi-

I have him here—I can scarce contain myself,

I am so full of joy; nay, joy all over. [Exit.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Room in LADY ALLWORTH'S House.

Enter LORD LOVELL and LADY ALLWORTH.

Lady A. By this, you know how strong the motives were

That did, my lord, induce me to dispense

A little with my gravity, to advance

The plots and projects of the down-trod Wellborn.

Lord L. What you intended, Madam,

For the poor gentleman, hath found good success;

For, as I understand, his debts are paid,

And he once more furnish'd for fair employment.

But all the arts that I have us'd to raise

The fortunes of your joy and mine, young Allworth,

Stand yet in supposition, though I hope well.

For the young lovers are in wit more pregnant

Than their years can promise; and for their desires,

On my knowledge, they are equal.

Lady A. Though my wishes

Are with yours, my lord, yet give me leave to fear

The building, though well-grounded. To deceive

Sir Giles (that's both a lion and a fox

In his proceedings) were a work beyond

The strongest undertakers; not the trial

Of two weak innocents.

Lord L. Despair not, Madam;

Hard things are compass'd oft by easy means.

The cunning statesman, that believes he fathoms

The counsels of all kingdoms on the earth,

Is by simplicity oft overreach'd.

Lady A. May he be so.

The young ones have my warmest wishes.

Lord L. O, gentle lady, prove as kind to me;

Now grant my honest suit.

And if you may be won to make me happy,

But join your hand to mine, and that shall be

A solemn contract.

Lady A. I were blind to my own good
Should I refuse it; yet, my lord, receive me
As such a one, the study of whose whole life
Shall know no other object but to please you.

Lord L. If I return not, with all tenderness,
Equal respect to you, may I die wretched!

Lady A. There needs no protestation, my lord,
To her that cannot doubt.

Enter WELLEORN.

You're welcome, Sir:

Now you look like yourself.

Well. And will continue

Such in my free acknowledgment, that I am

Your creature, Madam, and will never hold

My life mine own, when you please to demand it.

Lord L. It is a thankfulness that well becomes you.

Lady A. For me, I am happy

That my endeavours prosper'd. Saw you of late Sir Giles, your uncle?

Well. I heard of him, Madam,

By his minister, Marrall: he's grown into strange passions

About his daughter. This last night he look'd for

Your lordship at his house: but, missing you,

And Margaret not appearing, his wise head

Is much perplex'd and troubled.

Lord L. I hope my project took.

Lady A. I strongly hope it.

Sir G. [Without.] Ha! find her, booby! thou huge lump of nothing!

I'll bore thine eyes out else.

Well. May it please your lordship,

For some ends of mine own, but to withdraw

A little out of sight, though not of hearing,

You may perhaps have sport.

Lord L. You shall direct me. [Steps aside.]

SIR GILES OVERREACH, with distracted looks, enters, driving in MARRALL.

Sir G. Idiot! booby!

Mar. Sir, for what cause

Do you use me thus?

Sir G. Cause, slave? why I am angry,

And thou a subject only fit for beating;

And so to cool my choler. Look to the writing;

Let but the seal be broke upon the box

That has slept in my cabinet these three years,

I'll rack thy soul for't.

Mar. I may yet cry quittance,

Though now I suffer, and dare not resist.

[Aside.]

Sir G. Lady, by your leave, did you see my daughter, Lady? [house?]

And the lord, her husband? Are they in your

If they are, discover, that I may bid 'em joy;

And, as an entrance to her place of honour,

See your ladyship on her left hand, and make court'sies

When she nods on you; which you must receive
As a special favour.

Lady A. When I know, Sir Giles,

Her state requires such ceremony, I shall pay it;

But in the mean time

I give you to understand, I neither know

Nor care where her honour is.

Sir G. When you once see her

Supported, and led by the lord her husband,

You'll be taught better.—Nephew!

Well. Well?

Sir G. No more?

Well. 'Tis all I owe you.
Sir G. Have your redeem'd rags
 Made you thus insolent?
Well. Insolent to you? [In scorn.]
 Why, what are you, Sir, unless in years more than myself?
Sir G. His fortune swells him;
 'Tis rank; he's married. [Aside.]
Lady A. This is excellent. [Aside.]
Sir G. Sir, in calm language (though I seldom use it)
 I am familiar with the cause that makes you
 Bear up thus bravely; there's a certain buzz,
 Of a stol'n marriage; do you hear? of a stol'n marriage; [zen'd.]
 In which, 'tis said, there's somebody hath been co-
 I name no parties.

[LADY ALLWORTH turns away.]
Well. Well, Sir, and what follows?
Sir G. Marry, this: since you are peremptory, remember,
 Upon mere hope of your great match, I lent you
 A thousand pounds; put me in good security,
 And suddenly, by mortgage or by statute,
 Of some of your new possessions, or I'll have you Dragg'd in your lavender robes to the gaol: you know me,
 And therefore do not trifle.

Well. Can you be
 So cruel to your nephew, "now he's in
 The way to rise?" Was this the courtesy
 You did me "in pure love and no ends else?"
Sir G. End me no ends; engage the whole estate,

And force your spouse to sign it; you shall have Three or four thousand more to roar and swagger,
 And revel in taverns.
Well. And beg after.

Mean you not so?
Sir G. My thoughts are mine, and free.
 Shall I have security?
Well. No indeed, you shall not;
 Nor bond, nor bill, nor bare acknowledgment.
 Your great looks fright not me.

Sir G. But my deeds shall—
 [They both draw.]
Lady A. Help! murder! murder!
 AMBLE, ORDER, and FURNACE, enter, with drawn swords.

Sir G. Out-braved!
Well. Let him come on,
 With all his wrongs and injuries about him,
 Arm'd with his cut-throat practices to guard him;
 The right that I bring with me will defend me,
 And punish his extortion.

Sir G. That I had thee
 But single in the field!
Lady A. You may; but make not
 My house your quarrelling scene.
Sir G. Wert in a church,
 By heaven and hell I'll do't!

Mar. Now put him to
 The showing of the deed. [To WELLBORN.]

Well. This rage is vain, Sir;
 For fighting, fear not, you shall have your hands
 Upon the least incitement; and whereas— [full
 You charge me with a debt of a thousand pounds,
 If there be law, (howe'er you have no conscience)
 Either restore my land, or I'll recover
 A debt that's truly due to me from you,
 In value ten times more than what you challenge.

Sir G. I in thy debt? oh, impudence! did I not purchase
 The land left by thy father? that rich land
 That had continued in Wellborn's name
 Twenty descents; which, like a riotous fool,
 Thou didst make sale of?

Two SERVANTS enter with a box.

O, you're come at last. Is not here enclos'd
 The deed that does confirm it mine?

Mar. Now, now! [Aside.]
Well. I do acknowledge none; I ne'er pass'd
 Such land: I grant, for a year or two, [o'er
 You had it in trust; which, if you do discharge,
 Surrendering the possession, you shall ease
 Yourself and me of chargeable suits in law;
 Which, if you prove not honest (as I doubt it)
 Must of necessity follow.

Lady A. In my judgment,
 He does advise you well.

Sir G. Good, good! conspire
 With your new husband, lady; second him
 In his dishonest practices; but, when
 This manor is extended to my use,
 You'll speak in humbler key, and sue for favour.

Lady A. Never; do not hope it.
Well. Let despair first seize me.

Sir G. Yet, to shut up thy mouth, and make thee give

Thyself the lie, the loud lie, I draw out
 The precious evidence; if thou canst, forswear
 Thy hand and seal, and make a forfeit of [Opens the box, and takes out the deed.]

 Thy ears to the pillory.—See, here's that will My interest clear.—Ha! [make

Lady A. A fair skin of parchment!
Well. Indented, I confess, and labels too;
 But neither wax nor words. How! thunderstruck.
 Is this your precious evidence; is this that "makes
 Your interest clear?"

Sir G. I am o'erwhelm'd with wonder!
 What prodigy is this? what subtle devil
 Hath raz'd out the inscription? the wax
 Turn'd into dust—the rest of my deeds whole
 As when they were deliver'd; and this only
 Made nothing!—Do you deal with witches, rascal?
 There is a statute for you, which will bring Your neck in a hempen circle; yes, there is.—
 And now 'tis better thought; for, cheater, know
 This juggling shall not save you.

Well. To save thee
 Would beggar the stock of mercy.

Sir G. Marrall!
Mar. Sir.

Sir G. Though the witnesses are dead,
 [Flatters him.]

Your testimony—
 Help with an oath or two; and for thy master,
 Thy liberal master, my good honest servant,
 I know you will swear any thing to dash
 This cunning slight: the deed being drawn too
 By thee, my careful Marrall, and deliver'd
 When you were present, will make good my title.
 Wilt thou not swear this?

Mar. I! no, I assure you.—
 I have a conscience, not sear'd up like yours:
 I know no deeds.

Sir G. Wilt thou betray me?
Mar. Keep him

From using his hands, I'll use my tongue
 To his no little torment.

Sir G. Mine own varlet
Rebel against me?

Mar. Yes, and uncase you too.

The idiot; the patch; the slave; the booby;
The property, fit only to be beaten
For your morning exercise; your foot-ball, or
Th' unprofitable lump of flesh; your drudge;—
Can now anatomize you, and lay open
All your black plots, level with the earth
Your hill of pride, and shake,
Nay pulverize, the walls you think defend you.

Lady A. How he foams at the mouth with rage!

Sir G. O that I had thee in my gripe, I would Joint after joint! [tear thee]

Mar. I know you are a tearer.

But I'll have first your fangs par'd off, and then Come nearer to you; when I have discover'd,
And made it good before the judge, what ways
And devilish practices you us'd to cozen with.

Sir G. But that I will live, rogue, to torture
thee,

And make thee wish, and kneel in vain, to die;
These swords that keep thee from me should fix
here,

Although they made my body but one wound,
But I would reach thee.—
I play the fool, and make my anger but ridiculous.
There will be a time and place, there will be,
When you shall feel what I dare do. [cowards!]

Well. I think so:

You dare do any ill, yet want true valour
To be honest and repent.

Sir G. They are patients I know not,
Nor e'er will learn. Patience, the beggar's virtue,
Shall find no harbour here.

Lady A. Whom have we here?

Sir G. My chaplain comes.—

PARSON WELLD0 enters, with a letter in his hand, and LOVELL behind.

Welcome, most welcome:

There's comfort in thy looks; is the deed done?
Is my daughter married? say but so, my chaplain,
And I am tame.

Well0. Married? yes, I assure you.

Sir G. Then vanish all sad thoughts!
My doubts and fears are in the titles drown'd
Of my honourable, my right honourable daughter.

Mar. What think you, Sir; was it not wisely
To turn his wicked arts upon himself? [done
[To WELLBORN.

Sir G. Instantly be here!

[Whispering to WELLD0.

To my wish, to my wish. Now you that plot against me, [me;
And hop'd to trip my heels up; that contemn'd Think on't, and tremble. [Loud music.] They come, I hear the music.

A lane there for my lord.

Well. This sudden heat

May yet be cool'd, Sir. [Music.

Sir G. Make way there for my lady and my lord.

Enter ALLWORTH and MARGARET.

Marg. Sir, first your pardon, then your blessing, with

Your full allowance of the choice I have made.

Not to dwell too long on words, [Kneels.

This is my husband.

Sir G. How?

Allw. So, I assure you; all the rites of marriage,
With every circumstance, are past.

Sir G. Devil! are they married?

Well0. Do a father's part, and say, heaven give 'em joy.

Sir G. Confusion and ruin! speak, and speak quickly,

Or thou art dead. [Seizes WELLD0.

Well0. They are married.

Sir G. Thou hadst better

Have made a contract with the king of fiends

Than these.—My brain turns:

Well0. Why this rage to me?

Is not this your letter, Sir? and these the words—
"Marry her to this gentleman?"

Sir G. It cannot;

Nor will I e'er believe it: 'sdeath! I will not.

That I, that in all passages I touch'd

At worldly profit have not left print

Where I have trod, for the most curious search

To trace my footsteps, should be gull'd by children!

Baffled and fool'd, and all my hopes and labours

Defeated and made void.

Well. As it appears,

You are so, my grave uncle.

Sir G. Village nurses

Revenge their wrongs with curses: I'll not waste

A syllable; but thus I take the life

Which, wretch! I gave to thee.

[Offers to kill MARGARET.

Lord L. Hold, for your own sake!

Though charity to your daughter hath quite left
you.

Will you do an act, though in your hopes lost here,

Can leave no hope for peace or rest hereafter?

Sir G. Lord! thus I spit at thee,

And at thy counsel; and again desire thee,

As thou art a soldier, if thy valour

Dare show itself where multitude and example

Lead not the way, let's quit the house, and change

Six words in private.

Lord L. I am ready.

Well. You'll grow like him,

Should you answer his vain challenge.

Sir G. Are you pale?

Borrow his help, though Hercules call it odds,

I'll stand against both, as I am hemm'd in thus.

Say, they were a squadron [mounted

Of pikes, lin'd through with shot, when I am

Upon my injuries, shall I fear to charge 'em?

No, I'll through the battalia, and that routed,

I'll fall to execution.

[Attempts to draw his sword.

Ha! I am feeble:

Some undone widow sits upon my arm,

And takes away the use of't! and my sword,

Glud to my scabbard with wrong'd orphans' tears,

Will not be drawn.

[Falls into his Servants' arms.

Ha! what are these? Sure, hangmen,

That come to bind my hands, and then drag me

Before the judgment seat!—Now they are new shapes,

And do appear like furies, with steel whips,

To scourge my ulcerous soul! Shall I then fall

Ingloriously, and yield? No, spite of fate,

I will be forc'd to hell like to myself.

Though you were legions of accursed spirits,

Thus would I fly among you!

[Servants carry him off.

Mar. Was it not a rare trick,

An't please your worship, to make the deed no-

Certain minerals I us'd, [thing?

Incorporated with the ink and wax.

Besides, he gave me nothing, but still fed me
With hopes and blows; and that was the induce-
To this conundrum. [ment

Well. You are a rascal. He, that dares be false
To a master, though unjust, will ne'er be true
To any other. Look not for reward
Or favour from me; I will shun thy sight
As I would do a basilisk's. Thank my pity,
If thou keep thy ears; howe'er, I will take order
Your practice shall be silenc'd.

Just. Gr. I'll commit him,
If you will have me, Sir.

Well. That were to little purpose;
His conscience be his punishment.—Not a word,
But instantly be gone. [Exit MARRALL.

Marg. Oh, my poor father!

Altho. Nay, weep not, dearest, though it shows your pity.

What is decreed by Heaven we cannot alter:
And Heaven here gives a precedent, to teach us
That, when we leave religion and turn atheists,
Their own abilities leave them.

Lord L. Pray you, take comfort;
I will endeavour you shall be his guardian
In his distraction: and for your land, Mr. Well-
I'll be an umpire [born,
Between you and this the undoubted heir
Of Sir Giles Overreach. For me, here's the anchor

That I must fix on.

[Takes LADY ALLWORTH'S hand
Altho. What you shall determine,
My lord, I will allow of.

Well. 'Tis the language
That I speak too; but there is something else,
Beside the possession of my land
And payment of my debts, that I must practise.

I had a reputation, but 'twas lost
In my loose course; and, till I redeem it
Some noble way, I am but half made up.
It is a time of action; if your lordship

Will please to confer a company upon me
In your command, I doubt not, in my service
To my king and country, but I shall do some-
That may make me right again. [thing

Lord L. Your suit is granted,
And you lov'd for the motion.

Well. Nothing wants then,
[Addressing himself to the audien. e.

But your allowance—and in that our all
Is comprehended; it being known, nor we,
Nor he that wrote the comedy, can be free
Without your manumission; which, if you
Grant willingly, as a fair favour due
To the poet's and our labours (as you may,
For we despair not, gentlemen, of the play)—
We jointly shall profess, your grace hath might
To teach us action, and him how to write.

[Exeunt.

THE DOCTOR AND THE APOTHECARY: A MUSICAL ENTERTAINMENT,

IN TWO ACTS.

BY JAMES COBB, Esq.

REMARKS.

THIS pleasant antidote to dullness was well received during its run, and still maintains a place among the stock of the national theatres. The author will have occasion to mention hereafter, in the Remarks on his "First Floor;" and this piece will not diminish his credit as a dramatic writer.

Mrs. Inchbald's farce of "Animal Magnetism," (intended to ridicule the absurd reveries of that doctrine,) appears to have been laid under contribution by our Author; but the characters are combined in a pleasing manner. This piece first introduced Mr. Storace to the public as a composer; and his excellent music contributed to its success.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—The outside of THOMASO'S House. A view of distant hills, with the sun setting behind them.

Enter STURMWALD, GUZMAN, ANNA, ISABELLA, and THERESA.

TRIO.—ANNA, ISABELLA, and GUZMAN.

Now the sun so faintly glancing
 O'er the western hills his ray;
 Evening shadows, quick advancing,
 Triumph o'er the fading day.

DUET.—ANNA and ISABELLA.
 Timorous love, at day affrighted,
 Blushing, courts the silver moon;

Star. Bacchus' sons are now delighted,
 Night's the jolly fellow's noon.

TRIO.

Evening thus our joys uniting,
 To her power due homage pay;
 Mirth, to dance and song inviting,
 Bids us hail the close of day.

Enter THOMASO.

Tho. What, moping yet, my friend Guzman?
 —For shame, you a sailor, and carry sorrow aboard! Zounds! if I had lost a mistress,—nay, had it been my wife,—

The. Well, Sir?

Tho. I think I could have comforted myself.
 Ah, captain, how far preferable are the charms of peace and a country life, to all the bustle and danger of a campaign!

Star. It may be so to you, Signor Thomaso, who slumber in the inglorious lap of peace: but war is my element; glory is my mistress; and I have courted her amid the cannon's thunder.

Tho. Many men of many minds, captain; for my part, I always preferred a more quiet kind of courtship; but if faith, you are a man of true gallantry, to remain so partial to your mistress, after having lost the use of a leg and an eye, in her service.

Star. A leg and an eye! Psha,—trifles! while my honour, a soldier's vital spark, has escaped unhurt.—You may be a very good apothecary,

Signor Thomaso, and may understand lotions and potions; but as to a soldier's honour—

The. Ah, very true, captain. He is a most provoking man, though he is my husband. For shame, after our good friend, Captain Sturmwald, has come all the way from Germany to marry our daughter Anna.

Tho. Nay, I'm sure, the captain knows I mean no harm.—Anna, come hither, child. [Aside to ANNA.] Why don't you smile upon your husband, that is to be?

Anna. Do not, my dear father, persist in this cruel solicitation.

Tho. [Aside to her.] Psha! how can you be so obstinate!—though the captain is not very handsome, he is very rich. 'Tis true, he is rather old; but then you know you have the better chance of being a widow soon; and as to his having but one eye, it ought to be his recommendation, for you'll have no trouble in discovering his blind side.

The. Lookye, Anna, you know my way of arguing, and so does your father. It is my pleasure that you marry Captain Sturmwald; and nave him you shall.

Guz. Have a little patience with her, my dear Madam.

Anna. Then you are resolved to render me miserable!

On Love's bless'd altar burns the flame,
Whence Hymen's torch should kindle bright
To bliss, which boasts fair virtue's name;
It casts its pure and radiant light.

But, ah! should avarice interpose,
With sordid and unhallow'd fires,
The prospect which their light bestows,
Repentance and despair inspires.

[Exeunt ANNA, ISABELLA, and GUZMAN, into the house.]

The. Anna's reluctance is certainly owing to that impertinent slut, her cousin. I'm sure she does not inherit her obstinacy from me. When my mother proposed a husband to me, I gave my consent without a moment's hesitation. Didn't I, my dear?

Tho. True, my love; but then I had not lost any of my limbs in pursuit of glory, like the captain. [Aside to her.]

Stur. I was thinking whether I had not better talk to the young lady myself.

The. To be sure; how the deuce else are you to gain her consent?

Stur. P'faith, I will. She'll find me very entertaining. I'll breakfast with her to-morrow, and give her the history of my last campaign. I'll come early in the morning, that I may finish the story before dinner.

The. Ha! ha, ha! [Exit THERESA.]

Tho. Well, captain, now my wife is gone, I want to have a little talk with you about my new-invented miraculous drops, as I call them, that cure all disorders.

Stur. Do they cure gun-shot wounds?

Tho. Every thing.

Stur. I wish then I had had a bottle in that engagement where I was wounded by a French dragoon in the shoulder. I'll tell you how it happened.

Tho. Unfortunate man that I am! He'll talk like my wife. [Aside.]

Stur. We were fording a river, and I was about the middle of the stream—

Tho. [Aside.] He wont be out of water this half hour.

Stur. A scoundrel French dragoon, upon a black horse—

Tho. A gray horse.

Stur. Black—black as jet.

Tho. I beg your pardon, captain, it was a gray horse. I have heard you tell the story twenty times, and you always said the horse was gray. So much for that. Now you must know, my drops—

Stur. You have heard me tell the story then?

Tho. Often—So my drops—

Stur. And what d'ye think of it?

Tho. One of the best stories I ever heard in my life. So—

Stur. I'm very glad you like it. I'll tell you another.

Tho. Curse his stories. [Aside.] To-morrow, captain, I shall be happy to hear it.

Stur. Well; if you are tired of my company, I'll go and get a bottle of good wine, to make me sleep soundly; and so adieu, my dear father-in-law.

Tho. Adieu, my dear son-in-law. [Aside.] What a cursed bore he is for talking. [Exit.]

Stur. A good kind of a man enough; but can't bear to hear any body talk, except himself. [Exit.]

The sun sets, and THOMASO'S shop is lighted up.

Enter CARLOS.

Car. When wilt thou cease, thou pleasing pain,
With cruel sway to rend my heart?

Yet, though of torment I complain,
Alas! I fear to cure the smart.

Enter JUAN, with a guitar.

Juan. Sighing never gains a maid!

I'll tell you what is better far;

Call good humour to your aid,

And play the lass a tune upon the sweet guitar.

If a heart has nature dealt her,
Music's charms will surely melt her;
But should the gipsy answer, No,
Sing toi de roi, and let her go.

Car. [Aside.] Zounds! I see some one at the door. A rival, perhaps!

[They approach, each with his hand on his sword, till CARLOS perceives it to be JUAN.]

Juan!

Juan. Carlos! my dear boy, how d'ye do?

Car. I'm heartily glad to see you—no, p'faith, now I think again, I am not glad to see you, till I know what brought you hither.

Juan. I was going to tell you, I have an appointment with a very pretty girl in this house—

Car. Ah! my fears. [Aside.]

Juan. So I am sure you will be complaisant enough to wish me a good night.

Car. Faith, I am sorry to deny you. But I happen to have an assignation here myself. You perceive a light in that window?

Juan. That light is my signal.

Car. Egad, 'tis my signal too! So I'm sure you will be complaisant enough to wish me a good night.

Juan. Sir, this insult—

Car. Insult, Sir!

[Laying their hands on their swords.]

Juan. Though, now I recollect myself, perhaps we are going to cut throats without any cause. There are two fair damsels in that house. What is the name of your mistress?

Car. Anna, the daughter of old Thomaso, the apothecary; and your mistress is—

Juan. Isabella! her laughing little cousin.

Car. Then I am glad to see you, after all; and yet I am an unlucky dog, Juan. They are going to marry my dear Anna to old Sturmwald, the German captain. I dare not acquaint my father of my passion for her; you know he and Thomaso are the bitterest enemies. The only resource left is, to carry her off; and I have, for this week past, in vain sought an opportunity of seeing her.

Juan. Oh, the devil! Old Thomaso's man, to shut the shop up. Stand aside—

[THOMASO'S man shuts up the shop, while they talk aside.]

Give me your hand, Carlos—you shall see Anna, speak to her, and carry her off this night.

Car. My dear Juan, how is this to be accomplished?

Juan. The first thing is to get the old fellow out of the house.

Car. And how is that to be managed?

Juan. Very easily—as thus: I'll act an old woman, and bring him down, I'll warrant you. [Knocks.] Say nothing, and stand aside.

[Knocks louder.]

[THOMASO opens the window and looks out.]

Tho. What the devil is all that noise for?

Juan. [In a feigned voice.] Pray, is this Signor Thomaso's?

Tho. Why, what do you want with Signor Thomaso; good woman?

Juan. The sick gentleman, Signor, at the next inn, is much worse.

Tho. I'm sorry for it; I wish the gentleman had been much worse an hour ago; because then I could have attended him; but at present I'm going to bed.

Juan. Dear Signor, you wont leave the poor man to the mercy of an ignorant physician?

Tho. Why, who attends him?

Juan. Dr. Bilioso.

Tho. Then I give him over. Good night to you, good woman. [Shuts the window.]

Car. Our plot is ruined.

Juan. Not yet, Carlos.

[Knocks again, still louder.]

Tho. [Again opens the window.] Zounds! what's the matter with the woman? Go about your business.

Juan. [Again in a female voice.] The sick man has heard wonders related of your famous drops, Signor.

Tho. Eh! what!—Oh ho! he has heard of my drops. Well, Madam?

Juan. And he wishes you would come to him directly, and bring a bottle in your pocket.

Tho. Aye, that I will—poor soul! poor soul!—I'll cure him in spite of his physician. [Calls within.] Halloo! Pedro! [To JUAN.] I'll go with you, good woman; and as we walk, I'll tell you some of the cures I have performed. I'll wait on you instantly. [Shuts the window.]

Car. This is a prosperous beginning, Juan.

Juan. Hush, not a word—we must retire. [They retire.]

[Enter THOMASO, from the house.]

Tho. And so, good woman, you say,—Hey day, she is gone! The poor gentleman's case is urgent, I suppose—so I'll lose no time. What a pleasure it is to attend sensible patients! I dare say, he is a shrewd fellow, by his wishing to try my drops. [Exit THOMASO.]

Juan. Ha, ha, ha! The old fox is fairly un-kennel'd.

Car. But how are we to get into the house?

Juan. The door is fast. Eh! i'faith this shutter is unbolted. [Opens part of the shutter.] So we will e'en get in at the shop window.

Car. My best friend!

[Going to climb in at the window.]

Juan. Hold! let me reconnoitre first. I know every part of the house—follow me.

Car. Kind Cupid light us on our way!

Juan. Psha! Zounds! a lantern would light us much better. So, rot your heroics, and follow me.

[Gets in at the window, and CARLOS follows.]

[Enter STURMWALD, drunk.]

Stur. Tol de rol, de rol—halt! Stand to your arms, Captain Sturmwald. Do my eyes deceive me, or have the enemy besieged my father-in-law's house, and made a practicable breach in the shop-window? Who the devil are they?—Thieves! No, i'faith, that can't be—Who'd think of stealing any thing out of an apothecary's shop! Perhaps they are gallants—have at you, my boys; I must enter and defend my father-in-law.

[Going to climb in at the window, he stops.] But hold! a prudent general should know what force he has to contend with—besides, I forget—old Bolus is not at home—I remember I met him just now—

Egad, I'll go and fetch him, and we'll surprise the enemy together.—How lucky it is that I am sober! If I had taken the other bottle, my senses might have been confused; but now I am cool and collected. Ah! there is nothing like drinking in moderation. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—The inside of THOMASO'S Shop.

[Enter JUAN and CARLOS.]

Car. Hush! tread softly, for your life.

Juan. Why, what are you afraid of?

Car. If Thomaso should return! and then, perhaps—

Juan. Perhaps what? Why, your whole conversation is composed of ifs—buts—perhappes—and supposes—a mere vocabulary of doubts.

Car. Hark! I hear Anna's voice—the sound transports me. Oh, Juan, I scarcely know where I am!

Juan. Why, then, I'll tell you.—This is an apothecary's shop; it is dark, and you are surrounded with phials, therefore take care you break none—Those are stairs before us, and lead to the room where our dear girls are—I shall go up first, and you may follow, unless you prefer staying here—I have now given you full information, and so come along. [Exeunt]

SCENE III.—A Room in THOMASO'S House. The Moon is seen through a window.

DUET.—ANNA and ISABELLA.

Two maidens sat complaining,

And mourn'd their hapless lot

The pangs of absence paining,

Each by her love forgot.

On every former token

Of love, while fancy hung,

Of vows so sweet, yet broken,

They, deeply sighing, sung.

At every sound they hear,
With fond alarm they start;
Alternate hope and fear,
Now joy, now pain, impart.
But by each sound misguided,
Alas, they only find
Their tears, their sighs, derided,
By mocking rain and wind.

On every former, &c.

Anna. Isabella, 'tis a whole week since I saw my Carlos. How can he say he loves me, and yet suffer them to marry me to this hateful German officer?

The. [Within.] Anna, why don't you go to your chamber, child?

Isa. Heavens! your mother is not gone to bed yet.

Anna. And do you think my Carlos has really forsaken me? My Carlos, did I say—Yes, I will repeat it—My heart yields to the fond delusion of my tongue; and I think I love him better every time I call him mine. [Exit.]

ISABELLA alone.

Poor Anna! I love her sincerely, and yet I am not sorry she is gone—I think Juan must be here soon—and—and perhaps our conversation would be very uninteresting to her.

Re-enter ANNA.

Anna. Oh, Isabella, I'm frightened out of my wits. Two men have got into the house; and I think it is your lover and mine.

Isa. Well, my dear, and what is there so alarming in all that?

Enter CARLOS and JUAN.

Car. My dear Anna!

Anna. Ah! [Screams.]

Juan. My dear Isabella!

Isa. Hush! you'll wake your mother.

[CARLOS shows ANNA a marriage-contract.
The. [Within.] Anna! what's the matter, child?

Isa. My cousin was frightened at something; but I am sure there was no reason to be afraid.

Anna. Do you know, Isabella, this unreasonable creature has brought me a marriage-contract, and would have me seize this moment to elope with him!

Car. [To ISABELLA.] And do you know, Madam, this unreasonable creature hesitates, though she promised me long ago to elope, whenever I could find an opportunity.

Juan. Psha! Marry first, and dispute afterwards; that would be much more in the common order of things.—Come, my dear Isabella, let us set them a good example; leave dissimulation to knaves and coquettes, and lead up the dance of Hymen as first couple.

Isa. Why, if I were sure you would never wish to change partners—

Car. Consider, my dear Anna, the moments fly.

Isa. [Peeping through the key-hole.] I vow, your mother is not in bed yet—[To ANNA.] Away, away instantly, and leave me to keep her quiet; I'll follow you directly. [Exit ANNA, CARLOS, and JUAN.] I'll sing, that she may suspect nothing.

Ye hours that part my love and me,

And slow with envy creep,

The dawn of bliss obscured by clouds

Of doubt, in vain ye keep.

VOL. I...3 N

Still I through Sorrow's tedious night,
Hope's friendly star discern;
On that I fix my anxious eye
Until my love return.

By Jealousy's pernicious power,
Untainted are my sighs;
Confiding in my Juan's truth,
My fondest wishes rise.

Still I through Sorrow's, &c.

Tho. [Without.] Hey, Guzman! Pedro! where the devil are ye?

Re-enter CARLOS, JUAN, and ANNA.

Anna. Oh, Isabella, my father is come home! all the doors are locked.

Car. And our retreat cut off.

Isa. Then we are lost.

Juan. No, faith, I'm afraid we are all found.

Where can we hide ourselves?

Isa. Go into our chamber.

Anna. My father is now at the chamber-door.

Car. In here, then.

[Going into THERESA'S chamber.]

Anna. That's my mother's room.

Isa. We are in luck. My uncle, in his hurry to visit his patient, has left the door of his study open. In, in, directly. [Exit ANNA, CARLOS, and JUAN into the closet.] Here comes your father.

Enter THOMASO and STURMWALD.

Tho. Anna! Theresa! Isabella! there are thieves in the house.

Anna. Thieves! bless me, Sir, what shall we do?

Stur. Take 'em, to be sure; take 'em, dead or alive.

Enter THERESA.

The. What's that you say.—Thieves in our house?

Tho. The captain saw them get in. He'll tell you the whole story.

Stur. That I will, with a great deal of pleasure. As I was coming from the tavern, where I had been drinking a glass in moderation, as sober as I am now—I saw two men getting into my father-in-law's house. What's to be done, thought I; for this was enough to stagger me, you may suppose—

Tho. Oh! certainly. [Aside.] That you had enough to stagger you, I believe.

The. [Taking the contract from ANNA'S pocket.] Yes, and here is enough to stagger us all. This paper explains to me, that these thieves are of Cupid's gang; gentlemen who commit sentimental robberies on the hearts of young ladies. There, Thomaso, read that! [Gives the contract.]

Tho. What do I see! a contract of marriage between my daughter and Carlos?

Stur. Carlos! What the devil! the enemy surprise us in our own camp! Egad, we'll hold a council of war immediately; I have something in my head—

Tho. [Aside.] Yes, rather more than you ought to have.

The. I tell you, I am sure young Carlos is in the house.

Stur. Is he? Why, then, we'll break up the council.—Bella! horrida bella! is our resolve; and so let us search for the enemy.

[Going to open THERESA'S chamber-door.]

The. Bless me, Captain Sturmwald—do you know that is my chamber?

Stur. Well, my dear mother-in-law; and is not a lady's chamber the most likely place to find a man of gallantry? However, I'll wheel to the right about, if you please.

[Goes to THOMASO'S closet-door.

Tho. Stop, captain; no person ever enters that closet but myself—'Tis there where I compose my miraculous drops.

Stur. Ay, ay, I understand you—'Tis your hocus pocus shop.

Tho. No, Sir, 'tis my miracle shop.

Stur. Your magazine for the destructive ammunition of physic.

Tho. My laboratory for the arcana of the Materia Medica. 'Tis the Temple of Health; and the rosy Goddess herself presides over my pestle and mortar.

Stur. A small room for the Temple of Health, I think, and rather dark.—Suppose, father-in-law, instead of confining the poor Goddess of Health to her room, you were to let her visit some of your patients?

Tho. You may sneer as you please, Captain Sturmwald; I have the key of that closet in my pocket, and there it shall remain—So let us finish a foolish adventure, by wishing each other a good night.

The. I shall take you with me, young ladies, to prevent further accidents. Captain Sturmwald, where will you sleep?

Stur. Nowhere, Madam—I suspect the enemy is in ambushade. I will be the centinel of the night—Rest securely, while I guard you—Here I take my post, and shall be on the watch, in case the enemy should make a sally.

Tho. Well, captain, I have no objection. Here is the key of the house, in case you choose to refresh yourself with a walk in the morning.

[Hangs up the key.

QUINTET.—ANNA, ISABELLA, THERESA, STURMWALD, and GUZMAN.

But see the moon, ascending high,
Reigns the empress of the sky;
And, in the zenith of her power,
Preside's o'er midnight's solemn hour.

The. You must bid adieu— [To ANNA.
Yes, Miss, so must you—

[To ISABELLA.

Anna & Isa. Must we bid adieu?
Wherefore should we part?
Spare my aching heart.

Tho. Come, let's go to bed;
Spare my aching head.

Stur. Let him go to bed;
Spare his aching head.

All. Bid adieu!
[Exit THER. with ANNA and ISA.

[Exit THOMASO and GUZMAN at the door in the middle of the Scene, and STURMWALD places himself on a couch, before THOMASO'S closet door.

Stur. Come on, my boys, now I'm commander,
Though you're as brave as Alexander,
—Heigho! [Yawning.]

—You lie.
On my guard here am I.
I fear no ambush, no entrapping;
No one shall catch old Sturmwald napping.
[Falls asleep.

JUAN and CARLOS come out of the closet.

Car. Softly, softly—First let us secure the key of the shop-door, to let ourselves out.

[Takes the key.

Juan. That this old remnant of mortality should think of rivalling a young fellow, with his five senses in perfection!

Car. But to our plot, good Juan—our plot. We have no time to lose.

Juan. Faith, that's very true—So in you must go, my old commander.

[They wheel the couch into THOMASO'S closet

Car. Bacchus now his nap is taking;
But his power can ne'er subdue
Watchful Love, who, ever waking,
Bids the sleeping sot adieu.

Bacchus should, on Venus waiting,
Hold the cup with bended knee;
None but fools, his worth o'er-rating,
With the servant make too free.

[JUAN comes out of the closet, and brings with him STURMWALD'S cloak, hat, and patch.

DUST.—CARLOS and JUAN.

Bacchus now his nap is taking;
But his power can ne'er subdue
Watchful Love, who, ever waking,
Bids the sleeping sot adieu. [Exit.

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The outside of DR. BILIOSO'S House.

Enter GUZMAN and PEREZ.

Guz. But pray, Perez, is Doctor Bilioso informed of his son's attachment to my cousin Anna?
Per. Oh, dear, no. My old master hates Signor Thomaso to that degree, that he would rather see his son hanged, than married into the family.

Guz. Though unacquainted with poor Carlos, I sympathize with him—had my Leonora lived—

Per. Ah! but she is gone—and your honour has been doleful and dumpish, as one may say ever since you came home from sea. Oh, I love to hear you talk of old stories—you make me so melancholy and so happy, that I cry by the hour together.

Guz. Poor fellow!

Per. And pray, good Signor Guzman, when you was voyaging about on the stormy main, and fighting the Algerines, was not you now and then frightened too much to think of your love?

Guz. No, Perez—pure love purifies the soul from every base alloy.

Let angry Ocean to the sky,
In proud despite his billows roll;
Let thunders to his threats reply,
Fear is a stranger to my soul.

Within the heart which Love illumines,
And blesses with his sacred rays,
If meaner passion e'er presumes,
It fades before the hallowed blaze.

Though War with sullen aspect lower,
And crimson o'er the troubled wave,
And emulate the lightning's power,
The dangers of the fight I brave,

Within the heart, &c. [Exit.

Per. Here comes my master—and as cross as usual.

Enter DR. BILIOSO.

Dr. Bil. What a cursed neighbourhood is this for a physician to live in! No such thing as an asthma, or a fit of the gout, to be met with from year's end to year's end. All the villagers are such a set of damn'd, vulgar, healthy dogs—never have the pleasure of seeing a meagre, bilious gentleman-like man within ten miles of the place.—How comfortable it would be to live at Constanti-nople, where the plague rages all the year?—And then people laugh more here than in all Spain besides.—Ah! I don't like laughing. Well Perez—any body ill this morning?

Per. [Sighing.] No, Sir, all well.

Dr. Bil. Ay—and will remain so as long as this plaguy fine weather lasts—no chance of another influenza—I, who am the physician, am the only sick man in the parish.

Per. Yes, your worship seems stuck up here by way of a medical scarecrow, to frighten away sickness.

Dr. Bil. Or rather, like an electrical conductor, I save the neighbourhood from danger, by attract-ing it to myself.—Ah! I lost the only good patient I had, in my friend Alvarez—as fine a corpulent—inactive subject as a physician would wish for. What with repetition, and want of exercise, the good soul was always ailing. I had great expecta-tions from him—but he grew stingy as he grew rich—avarice produced abstinence, and he starved away the only hopes I had left.

Per. There's the traveller who was taken ill at the next inn.

Dr. Bil. Ay, the only person I have at present under my care, and he is a foreigner—no native would have behaved so civilly as to be taken ill—Not got well, I hope?

Per. Yes, so they say—the apothecary, Tho-maso, was sent for to him last night.

Dr. Bil. What! send for my enemy—my an-tagonist, Thomaso, the apothecary? A man of honour would have sooner died under his physi-cian's hands, than have played him such a trick.

Per. And he took some of Thomaso's quack medicine.

Dr. Bil. O curse his quack medicine—I hate all violent remedies—they make an end of a busi-ness so soon. They either kill or cure; and then, either way, one loses the patient.

Per. And so Thomaso—

Dr. Bil. Oh rot him—I'll go to the rascally quack directly; my patients are my property—and shall I tamely suffer my property to be taken from me? I'll trounce the dog. No, no; if a doc-tor's patients are permitted to slip through his fingers, and get well by stealth, there's an end to all law and justice. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Room in THOMASO'S House.

Enter THOMASO.

Tho. Ah ha! the captain off already—I didn't expect he had shaken off the effects of last night's dose quite so soon. I can hardly reconcile it to myself to sacrifice poor Anna to such a sot. My conscience revolts against it, and whispers aye—but then my wife talks so much louder than my conscience; and so there's an end of the matter.

Enter JUAN [behind,] disguised as STURMWALD, and CARLOS disguised as a notary, who listens at the corner of the scene.

Juan. [In a hoarse voice.] Father-in-law, good morning to you.

Tho. Eh! what! bless my soul, son-in-law, how do ye do? There seems to be a wonderful change in your voice.

Juan. All the effects of last night.

Tho. I suppose so—a violent cold, no doubt—my drops are remarkably good for the voice.

Juan. No, no, never mind—I'll tell you a story—

Tho. I'd rather you'd let it alone. Come, now—one spoonful will be enough.—'Tis a most wonderful remedy—I have it here in this closet.

Juan. Curse your drops.—I am sure the lovers of your daughter and niece are now in the house.

Tho. Well, captain, perhaps you know best—but, upon my soul, I don't believe a word of the matter. Now, let me fetch a bottle of drops.

Juan. My jealousy is alarm'd, Sir—and I must be your son-in-law this morning, or not at all—No reply! I have brought this gentleman with me; he is my notary, and has drawn up a mar-riage-contract. So call your wife and the bride; let us sign and seal, and then to church immedi-ately.

Tho. Well, but Captain—

Juan. I'm commanding officer to-day; so no more words, father-in-law. [Exit THOMASO.] Ha, ha, ha! Well, Carlos, how have I imitated the old German captain?

Car. To a miracle. I wish I may play my part half so well.

Juan. Psha! what difficulty is there in it—the old folks will take you for the notary who has pre-pared the contract of marriage between Anna and Sturmwald; instead of that, you will substitute the other contract, in which your own name is inserted. But here they come.

Enter THOMASO, THERESA, and ANNA.

Anna. No, nothing shall shake my constancy—every obstacle you raise, serves but to increase my affection.

The summer heats, bestowing

Their influence on the rose,

Perfect its charms when blowing,

And every sweet disclose.

Yet summer suns denying

The zephyr and the shower;

Their fervid glow applying,

Destroy their fav'rite flower.

The love-sick heart requiring

The sunshine of success;

Continual bliss desiring,

Yet sickens with excess.

The fond, the secret tear,

Soft passion keeps alive;

The breath of doubt and fear,

Like zephyrs, bids it thrive.

Juan. Well, Signor Thomaso, have you look'd over the contract?

Tho. I have; and find it perfectly right.

Juan. Very well; but where's Isabella?

Tho. Oh, I'll call her.—Isabella!—but I assure you I would not trust her with any body else.

Enter ISABELLA.

Isa. My dear Juan, what means—

Juan. [Aside to her.] Hush, my love—ask no questions—persuade Anna to sign that paper— it is a contract of marriage between her and Carlos, who you see personates the notary.

[CARLOS offers the contract to ANNA, who puts it aside.]

Anna. No, nothing shall induce me to sign this dated paper. Oh, Carlos, why are you not here to snatch me from impending ruin?

Tho. Daughter, do not oblige me to exert my authority.

The. Let her beware of my authority, which is much greater.

Juan. Psha, psha! persuasion is better than authority. Let her cousin talk to her. [ISABELLA whispers ANNA.] These girls know the way to each other's hearts; there—mother-in-law, you see, she hangs out a smile of truce already.

The. My dear daughter, you transport me!

Juan. Come, sign your consent to the marriage.

The. Sign it—aye, that I will—Come, husband. [ANNA and THERESA sign the contract.

Tho. Egad, captain, I don't understand that notary's whispering my daughter, I—

Juan. 'Tis his way—come, sign your name.

Tho. No, Sir—[To CARLOS.] I insist upon knowing what you mean?

Car. What I mean!

Juan. If you put him in a passion, take care of yourself; he is the most choleric fellow—you had better sign at once.

Car. This marriage article, [To THOMASO. In every particle, Is free from flaw, Sir; I know what's law, Sir.

Zounds, Sir, my character none shall accuse! Behold this artifice, true love's devising,

Your Carlos thus to all but you disguising; Witness—Thomaso my skill dares abuse.

My only chance I see, is pique pretending;

On that alone success is now depending.

Throughout this nation, [To THOMASO.

High my reputation,

For law precision is,

And expedition is,

In bonds, conveyances, d'y'e mind,

And instruments of any kind.

Kind fortune see, at length, our prayers heeding,

Relenting, gives us promise of succeeding.

In this transaction [To ANNA, aside.

The law is my friend;

I'll bring my action,

Which you must defend.

[THOMASO, frightened, signs the contract.

Juan. Come, come, now all's finished, let us away to church.

The. Well, I'll be with you in a moment.

Car. [Aside to JUAN.] For heaven's sake, Juan, let us be gone. If Sturmwald should wake, we are ruined.

Juan. [Aloud.] I beg your pardon for detaining you. Mr. Notary, conduct these ladies to my house, and I'll follow you immediately.

[Exit ANNA, ISABELLA, and CARLOS.

Tho. Stop! stay—What, without my wife's leave?

Stur. [In the closet.] Halloo! death and fury! where am I?

Tho. Eh, what's that?

Stur. Thieves! thieves!

Tho. I'm lost in amazement.

Juan. Did not I tell you one of the rogues was hid there! I'll run and fetch an alguazil.

Tho. You run?—Why, you forget you are lame!

Juan. [In his natural voice.] Egad, so I do—but I am so interested in this business.

Tho. And you have recovered your voice too!

Juan. [Resuming his hoarse voice.] No, faith, I think I'm as hoarse as ever.

Stur. Thomaso! Signor Thomaso!

Tho. 'Tis the captain's voice. Egad, I'll fetch an alguazil myself, and make sure of one of ye.

[Exit.

Stur. Signor Thomaso!

Juan. Have a little patience. [Aside.] What's to be done! If I attempt the door, I meet the alguazil. I must e'en try this chamber-window.

[Pulls off STURMWALD'S hat, cloak, and patch; throws them down at the closet-door, and then goes into THERESA'S chamber.

Re-enter THOMASO.

Tho. An alguazil will be here presently, and then, Mr. Scoundrel!—[Sees the cloak and patch.] Hey-day! what's all this? [Takes them up.

Stur. [In the closet.] Will nobody hear me!

Tho. It is Sturmwald! Oh, my mind misgives me.

[Going to the door. [He hears the noise of phials breaking in the closet, and rushes in.

Re-enter THOMASO and STURMWALD.

Tho. All my phials of drops broken! Let me tell you, Captain Sturmwald.

Stur. Zounds! Sir, you shall tell me nothing but what I desire to know. I say, Sir, how did I come in that closet?

Tho. That's the very question I want to ask you: and, if we both ask the same question, how the devil are we to get an answer?

Stur. Why, you dirty scrap of an apothecary, how dare you laugh at me thus?

Tho. I laugh! Look at the bottles you've broke—I believe I shall never laugh again.

Stur. You are all in the plot—'tis a trick to abuse me; but I'll be revenged. 'Sblood and thunder! to make a jest of me, who have fought in sixteen different battles! Did you know that?

Tho. Yes, you have often told me the names of them all. But do you hear me, captain.

Stur. I'll hear nothing but revenge. To cram me up in a dark closet, among pickled snakes, and stuffed alligators; me, who have lived amidst fire and smoke, who have fought for every prince in Europe by turns, and always had the honour to be wounded! Who, to this hour, bear the trophies of war in every limb, and rejoice in the aches, the cramps, and the twinges of glory!

THERESA enters, and THOMASO explains to her, in dumb show, what has passed.

The. I am sure, captain, I don't wonder at your being angry with my husband—he's a poor blundering creature, as I often tell him.

Tho. Nay, the captain knows, I never mean to offend him. I've done all I can—

The. Psha! so you always say. Go, get an alguazil, and seek for the rogues that have stolen our two girls, do. [Exit THOMASO.] Come, captain, suppose you and I follow him? For my sake, be patient. The brave never refuse the requests of the fair.

Stur. Never; and to prove it, I'll tell you a story of what happened when I was in Germany.

[Exeunt.]

JUAN comes softly out of THERESA'S room, in woman's clothes.

Juan. This confounded window is too closely barred even for a mouse to creep through. However, in this disguise, I think I shall get off undiscovered;—or, if I should be questioned, I'll pass for a patient come to ask Thomaso's advice.

Dr. Bil. [Speaking to a Servant as he comes on.] Don't tell me—I say he is at home, and I will see him.

Juan. Who comes here?—Dr. Bilioso himself!

Enter DR. BILIOSO, seeing JUAN.

Dr. Bil. But I beg pardon; you want advice, I presume;—let me feel your pulse.

[Attempting to take JUAN'S hand.]

Juan. [Struggling.] Zounds! I shall be discovered. [Aside.] Dear Sir, pray let me alone—my nerves are so weak, and you agitate me so.

Dr. Bil. Why, really, Madam, you have rather agitated me. I think I never yet met with a lady so strong in the arm. Pray, what is your complaint, Ma'am?

Juan. My complaint is against Thomaso, who has killed a poor friend of mine.

Dr. Bil. Oh, he has done worse than that—he has taken a patient away from me, after I had given him over. So, if he recovers the man, he ruins my reputation. There's an unfeeling scoundrel for you!

Juan. Ah, you and I mean the same person—the poor gentleman at the next inn.—But Thomaso's drops have done for him—my poor friend is no more.

Dr. Bil. I'm heartily glad of it—very sorry for it, I mean. I thank you for the news, however. Now I have that rogue Thomaso in my gripe.

Juan. Lose no time, Sir, but get an officer immediately, and secure Thomaso.

Dr. Bil. That I will.—Ay, ay— [Going.]

Juan. Surely, Sir, you will have the gallantry to conduct me safe out of this house—if I should be insulted,

Dr. Bil. Insulted! Lord, Ma'am, there's no danger of that. Nature has furnished you with such powers of defence; united the charms of your sex to the strength of ours. You are a glass of Nature's choicest cordial, Madam; sweet and strong at the same time.

[Exit, leading JUAN off.]

SCENE III.—A Wood; a Village seen through the Trees.

Enter ANNA and CARLOS.

Car. Consider, my dear Anna, we have your father's signature to our contract of marriage.

Anna. But will he give his voluntary consent to what has been procured by artifice?

Car. Fear nothing, my dear; trust to me.

Am I beloved? Can you refuse?

Alas! my heart for pity sues.

That heart whose constancy you've known;

That heart you've fondly call'd your own.

Every moment, as it flies,

Warns us where our danger lies.

Ah! there's ruin in delay;

Lovely Anna! let's away.

40

Enter ISABELLA.

Car. Well, Isabella, any news of Juan?

Isa. Alas! none—Every human being that passed at a distance, did my pliant fancy conjure up into a likeness of Juan.

Car. The rising ground, on the left hand, commands a prospect of the road.—Let me try whether friendship cannot see more clearly than love.

Anna. Are not we a couple of wild girls, Isabella?

Isa. Not incorrigible, my dear cousin, however; we have pursued a very effectual mode of taming ourselves,—by getting married.

Anna. To be sure, we have uttered the fatal yes.

Isa. The fatal yes! Why, my dear, do you think our lovers are such fools, as to think the better or the worse of our affection for them, because we have said yes?

How mistaken is the lover,

Who on words builds hopes of bliss!

And fondly thinks we love discover,

If perchance we answer Yes.

Prompted often by discretion

Is the seeming kind expression,

When the tongue, the heart belying,

Dares not venture on denying;

But, in spite of discontent,

Gives the semblance of consent.

How mistaken, &c.

Ah! how vain is art's profession,

Though the faltering tongue comply!

What avails the cold confession,

If the averted eyes deny!

Happier far, the experienced swain

Knows he triumph must attain,

When in vain successful trial,

Language gives the faint denial;

While the eyes betray the fiction

In delightful contradiction;

And the cheeks with blushes glow.

And the tongue still falters No.

How mistaken, &c.

Enter CARLOS.

Car. Here is Juan—So all we have to do, is to mount our horses, and gallop off.

Enter JUAN.

Juan. Hold! you're mistaken—You've something else to do, I assure you. We have certainly been traced from the village—Dr. Bilioso and Signor Thomaso are both coming up the hill different ways, and will most likely meet at this spot—But they are here.

[ANNA, ISABELLA, CARLOS, and JUAN, retire up the Stage.]

Enter DR. BILIOSO and THOMASO, meeting, each with an Alguazil.

Dr. Bil. Oh, you vile quack! Where's my patient?

Tho. Where is my daughter, you old rogue! You have assisted your son to run away with her. Lay hold of him, Alguazil.

Dr. Bil. What! why, I brought an officer to seize you. Here, do your duty.

[To the Alguazil.]

Juan. [Coming forward.] Dear gentlemen, what's the matter?

Dr. Bil. Why, Sir, that fellow is a quack, and has killed one of my patients.

Tho. That's impossible; for, though he calls himself a physician, he has no patients to kill.

Dr. Bil. What! do you forget the poor gentleman at the inn?

Tho. Well, he was fair game. You had given him over.

Dr. Bil. Zounds, Sir, what does that signify? I have given over fifty people in my time, who have recovered afterwards.

Juan. [Aside.] My plot has taken, I perceive; they believe him dead yet. [To THOMASO.] F'faith, this is a serious affair. You had better compound this business.

Tho. He wont agree to it; he hates me so.

Juan. [Aside to THOMASO.] Let me talk to him.—[Aside to DR. BILIOSO.] Sir, when I see so valuable a life as yours in danger—

Dr. Bil. My life in danger!

Juan. From that bloody-minded apothecary. I find your son has eloped with his daughter, and he is resolved to be revenged, by assassinating you and your whole family. See, how he looks at you!

Dr. Bil. Ratsbane and arsenic in his countenance!

Juan. [Aside to THOMASO.] Did you ever see such a determined dog. He is resolved to hang you!

Tho. I dare say he has the rope in his pocket. Pray, mollify him.

Dr. Bil. [Aside to JUAN.] F'faith, I don't half like him. Tell him I'll forgive him.

Juan. Dismiss your alguazils.—[Exeunt Alguazils.] You bind yourselves to stand by my determination?

Dr. Bil. and Tho. We do.

Juan. Then, I believe, all parties are satisfied.—Appear, appear.

ANNA, CARLOS, and ISABELLA, come forward.

Anna. My dear father!

Tho. Zounds, what is all this!

Enter THREESA, STURMWALD, and GUZMAN.

Stur. A general muster of the whole corps, egad; deserters and all. You are my prisoner, Madam. [To ANNA.]

Car. No, Sir, not while I can defend her.

Anna. [To STUR.] Oh, Sir, hear me! the brave are ever generous: do not attempt a life so dear to me—

Stur. Bullets and gunpowder! why, don't you love me then? I thought you told me, mother-in-law, it was all maiden coyness in her.

The. Stuff and nonsense! Take her, Captain Sturmwald, she is yours. Defend your honour.

Stur. And that my honour may be worth defending, I'll take care it shall not be tarnished by an unjust action. Anna, your mother says you are mine. If so, I dispose of what is mine—thus:—[Giving her hand to CARLOS.] Come, come, we have by mistake opposed the union of hearts on their march to form a junction, and we are defeated. So much the better; who would wish to conquer in a bad cause? You must consent to unite these turtles. [To THOMASO.]

Tho. Has my wife any objection?

The. I'll have nothing to do with it; so, act as you please.

Tho. Why then, give me your hand, doctor [To DR. BILIOSO.] and here's an end of all quarrels. Take my daughter, young man, [To CARLOS.] and you take my niece, [To JUAN.] and you [To STURMWALD.] take my wife, if you will. Egad, I am in such a good humour, I could give away any thing.

FINALE.

'Tis joy inspires the vocal lay,
And animates the choral song;
Of love we sing the gentle sway,
May constancy the theme prolong!
Old Time with joys unceasing,
Shall add to Hymen's store;
Our friendship still increasing,
When youth shall be no more.

[Exeunt.]

THE GAMESTER:

A TRAGEDY,

IN FIVE ACTS.

BY EDWARD MOORE

REMARKS.

WHEN this tragedy was shown in manuscript to Dr. Young, he remarked, that "Gaming wanted such a caustic as the concluding scene presented." It is certainly the best drama produced by Mr. Moore; but, although its merits are considerable, the audience of 1753 did not bestow that perfect approbation it has since uniformly received. The language is nervous and pathetic; the plot artful, yet clearly conducted; and the catastrophe truly tragic. Beverley has been a successful character of several of our most eminent actors; of Garrick, Young, Kemble, &c.: the late Mr. John Palmer was so superior in Stukely, that the character is said to have died with him. Mrs. Siddons and Miss O'Neil have, also, acquired additional claims to the public regard in their delineation of the heroine.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—BEVERLEY'S Lodgings.

MRS. BEVERLEY and CHARLOTTE discovered.

Mrs. B. Be comforted, my dear, all may be well yet. And now, methinks, the lodging begins to look with another face. Oh, sister! sister! if these were all my hardships; if all I had to complain of were no more than quitting my house, servants, equipage, and show, your pity would be weakness.

Char. Is poverty nothing, then?

Mrs. B. Nothing in the world, if it affected only me. While we had a fortune, I was the happiest of the rich; and now 'tis gone, give me but a bare subsistence and my husband's smiles, and I shall be the happiest of the poor. Why do you look at me?

Char. That I may hate my brother.

Mrs. B. Don't talk so, Charlotte.

Char. Has he not undone you?—Oh, this pernicious vice of gaming! but methinks his usual hours of four or five in the morning might have contented him. Need he have staid out all night?—I shall learn to detest him.

Mrs. B. Not for the first fault. He never slept from me before.

Char. Slept from you! No, no, his nights have nothing to do with sleep. How has this one vice driven him from every virtue!—Nay, from his affections too!—The time was, sister—

Mrs. B. And is. I have no fear of his affections. 'Would I knew that he were safe!

Char. From ruin and his companions. But that 's impossible.—His poor little boy, too! what must become of him?

Mrs. B. Why, want shall teach him industry. From his father's mistakes he shall learn prudence, and from his mother's resignation, patience. Poverty has no such terrors in it as you imagine. There 's no condition of life, sickness and pain excepted, where happiness is excluded. The husbandman, who rises early to his labour, enjoys more welcome rest at night fort. His bread is sweeter to him; his home happier; his family dearer; his enjoyments surer. The sun that rouses him in the morning, sets in the evening to release him. All situations have their comforts, if sweet contentment dwell in the heart. But my poor Beverley has none. The thought of having ruined those he loves is misery for ever to him. Would I could ease his mind of that!

Char. If he alone were ruined, 'twere just he should be punished. He is my brother, 'tis true; but when I think of what he has done—of the fortune you brought him—of his own large estate too, squandered away upon this vilest of passions, and among the vilest of wretches! oh, I have no patience!—My own little fortune is untouched, he says. 'Would I were sure on't.

Mrs. B. And so you may—'twould be a sin to doubt it.

Char. I will be sure on't—'twas madness in me to give it to his management. But I'll demand it from him this morning. I have a melancholy occasion for it.

Mrs. B. What occasion?

Char. To support a sister.

Mrs. B. No; I have no need on't. Take it, and reward a lover with it.—The generous Lewson deserves much more.—Why wou't you make him happy?

Char. Because my sister's miserable.

Mrs. B. You must not think so. I have my jewels left yet. And when all's gone, these hands shall toil for our support. The poor should be industrious.—Why those tears, Charlotte?

Char. They flow in pity for you.

Mrs. B. All may be well yet. When he has nothing to lose, I shall fetter him in these arms again: and then what is it to be poor?

Char. Cure him but of this destructive passion, and my uncle's death may retrieve all yet.

Mrs. B. Ay, Charlotte, could we cure him!—But the disease of play admits no cure but poverty; and the loss of another fortune would but increase his shame and his affliction.—Will Mr. Lewson call this morning?

Char. He said so last night. He gave me hints, too, that he had suspicions of our friend Stukely.

Mrs. B. Not of treachery to my husband? That he loves play, I know, but surely he's honest.

Char. He would fain be thought so;—therefore I doubt him. Honesty needs no pains to set itself off.

Enter LUCY.

Lucy. Your old steward, Madam. I had not the heart to deny him admittance, the good old man begged so hard for't. [Exit.]

Enter JARVIS.

Mrs. B. Is this well, Jarvis? I desired you to avoid me.

Jar. Did you, Madam? I am an old man, and had forgot. Perhaps, too, you forbade my tears; but I am old, Madam, and age will be forgetful.

Mrs. B. The faithful creature! how he moves me! [To CHARLOTTE.]

Jar. I have forgot these apartments too. I remember none such in my young master's house; and yet I have lived in it these five and twenty years. His good father would not have dismissed me.

Mrs. B. He had no reason, Jarvis.

Jar. I was faithful to him while he lived, and when he died he bequeathed me to his son. I have been faithful to him too.

Mrs. B. I know it, I know it, Jarvis.

Jar. I have not a long time to live. I asked but to have died with him, and he dismissed me.

Mrs. B. Pr'ythee, no more of this! 'Twas his poverty that dismissed you.

Jar. Is he indeed so poor, then?—Oh! he was the joy of my old heart—But must his creditors have all?—And have they sold his house too? His father built it when he was but a prating boy. The times that I have carried him in these arms! And, Jarvis, says he, when a beggar has asked charity of me, why should people be poor? You sha'n't be poor, Jarvis; if I were a king, nobody should be poor. Yet he is poor. And then he was so brave!—Oh, he was a brave little boy! and yet so merciful, he'd not have killed the gnat that stung him.

Mrs. B. Speak to him, Charlotte, for I cannot.

Jar. I have a little money, Madam; it might have been more, but I have loved the poor. All that I have is yours.

Mrs. B. No, Jarvis; we have enough yet. I thank you though, and I will deserve your goodness.

Jar. But shall I see my master? And will he let me attend him in his distresses? I'll be no expense to him; and 'twill kill me to be refused.—Where is he, Madam?

Mrs. B. Not at home, Jarvis. You shall see him another time.

Char. To-morrow, or the next day—Oh, Jarvis! what a change is here!

Jar. A change indeed, Madam! my old heart aches at it. And yet, methinks—But here's somebody coming.

Re-enter LUCY, with STUKELY.

Lucy. Mr. Stukely, Madam. [Exit.]

Stuke. Good morning to you, ladies. Mr. Jarvis, your servant. Where's my friend, Madam? [To MRS. BEVERLEY.]

Mrs. B. I should have asked that question of you. Have you seen him to-day?

Stuke. No, Madam.

Char. Nor last night?

Stuke. Last night! did he not come home then?

Mrs. B. No.—Were you not together?

Stuke. At the beginning of the evening, but not since.—Where can he have staid?

Char. You call yourself his friend, Sir—why do you encourage him in his madness of gaming?

Stuke. You have asked me that question before, Madam; and I told you my concern was that I could not save him; Mr. Beverley is a man, Madam; and if the most friendly entreaties have no effect upon him, I have no other means. My purse has been his, even to the injury of my fortune. If that has been encouragement, I deserve censure; but I meant it to retrieve him.

Mrs. B. I don't doubt it, Sir, and I thank you—But where did you leave him last night?

Stuke. At Wilson's, Madam, if I ought to tell, in company I did not like. Possibly he may be there still. Mr. Jarvis knows the house, I believe.

Jar. Shall I go, Madam?

Mrs. B. No; he may take it ill.

Char. He may go as from himself.

Stuke. And if he pleases, Madam, without naming me I am faulty myself, and should conceal the errors of a friend. But I can refuse nothing here.

[Bowing to the ladies.]

Jar. I would fain see him, methinks.

Mrs. B. Do so then, but take care how you upbraid him—I have never upbraided him.

Jar. 'Would I could bring him comfort! [Exit.]

Stuke. Don't be too much alarmed, Madam. All men have their errors, and their times of seeing them. Perhaps my friend's time is not come yet. But he has an uncle; and old men don't live for ever. You should look forward, Madam; we are taught how to value a second fortune by the loss of the first.

[Knocking at the door.]

Mrs. B. Hark!—No—that knocking was too rude for Mr. Beverley. Pray heaven he be well!

Stuke. Never doubt it, Madam. You shall be well too—Every thing shall be well.

[Knocking again.]

Mrs. B. The knocking is a little loud though—Who waits there? Will none of you answer?—None of you, did I say?—Alas, what was I thinking of! I had forgot myself.

Char. I'll go, sister—but don't be alarmed so.

[Exit.]

Stuke. What extraordinary accident have you o' fear, Madam?

Mrs. B. I beg your pardon; but 'tis ever thus with me in Mr. Beverley's absence. No one knocks at the door, but I fancy it is a messenger of ill news.

Stuke. You are too fearful, Madam; 'twas but one night of absence; and if ill thoughts intrude (as love is always doubtful,) think of your worth and beauty, and drive them from your breast.

Mrs. B. What thoughts? I have no thoughts that wrong my husband.

Stuke. Such thoughts indeed would wrong him. The world is full of slander; and every wretch that knows himself unjust, charges his neighbour with like passions; and by the general frailty hides his own—If you are wise, and would be happy, turn a deaf ear to such reports. 'Tis ruin to believe them.

Mrs. B. Ay, worse than ruin. 'Twould be to sin against conviction. Why was it mentioned?

Stuke. To guard you against rumour. The sport of half mankind is mischief; and for a single error they make men devils; if their tales reach you, disbelieve them.

Mrs. B. What tales? by whom? why told? I have heard nothing—or, if I had, with all his errors, my Beverley's firm faith admits no doubt—it is my safety, my seat of rest and joy, while the storm threatens round me. I'll not forsake it. [Stukely sighs, and looks down.] Why turn you, Sir, away? and why that sigh?

Stuke. I was attentive, Madam; and sighs will come, we know not why. Perhaps I have been too busy—if it should seem so, impute my zeal to friendship, that meant to guard you against evil tongues. Your Beverley is wronged, slandered most vilely—My life upon his truth.

Mrs. B. And mine too. Who is't that doubts it? but no matter—I am prepared, Sir—Yet why this caution?—You are my husband's friend; I think you mine too; the common friend of both. [Pauses.] I had been unconcerned else.

Stuke. For Heaven's sake, Madam, be so still! I meant to guard you against suspicion, not to alarm it.

Mrs. B. Nor have you, Sir. Who told you of suspicion? I have a heart it cannot reach.

Vol. I. . . . 3 O

Stuke. Then I am happy—I would say more—but am prevented.

Enter CHARLOTTE.

Char. What a heart has that Jarvis!—A creditor sister. But the good old man has taken him away—"Don't distress his wife—don't distress his sister," I could hear him say. "'Tis cruel to distress the afflicted."—And when he saw me at the door, he begged pardon that his friend had knocked so loud.

Stuke. I wish I had known of this. Was it a large demand, Madam.

Char. I heard not that; but visits such as these we must expect often—Why so distressed, sister? This is no new affliction.

Mrs. B. No, Charlotte; but I am faint with watching—quite sunk and spiritless—Will you excuse me, Sir? I'll to my chamber, and try to rest a little. [Exit.]

Stuke. Good thoughts go with you, Madam. My bait has taken then. [Aside.]—poor Mrs. Beverley! How my heart grieves to see her thus.

Char. Cure her, and be a friend then.

Stuke. How cure her, Madam?

Char. Reclaim my brother.

Stuke. Ay; give him a new creation, or breathe another soul into him. I'll think on't, Madam. Advice, I see is thankless.

Char. Useless I am sure it is, if, through mistaken friendship, or other motives, you feed his passion with your purse, and sooth it by example. Physicians, to cure fevers, keep from the patient's thirsty lip the cup that would inflame him. You give it to his hands. [A knocking.] Hark, Sir!—These are my brother's desperate symptoms—Another creditor!

Stuke. One not so easily got rid of—What, Lewson!

Enter LEWSON.

Lew. Madam, your servant—Yours, Sir. I was inquiring for you at your lodgings.

Stuke. This morning! You had business then?

Lew. You'll call it by another name, perhaps. Where's Mr. Beverley, Madam?

Char. We have sent to inquire for him.

Lew. Is he abroad then? he did not use to go out so early.

Char. No, nor stay out so late.

Lew. Is that the case? I am sorry for it. But Mr. Stukely, perhaps, may direct you to him.

Stuke. I have already, Sir. But what was your business with me?

Lew. To congratulate you upon your late success at play. Poor Beverley!—But you are his friend; and there's a comfort in having successful friends.

Stuke. And what am I to understand by this?

Lew. That Beverley's a poor man with a rich friend; that's all.

Stuke. Your words would mean something, I suppose. Another time, Sir, I shall desire an explanation.

Lew. And why not now? I am no dealer in long sentences. A minute or two will do for me.

Stuke. But not for me, Sir.—I am slow of apprehension, and must have time and privacy. A lady's presence engages my attention. Another morning I may be found at home.

Lew. Another morning, then, I'll wait upon you.

Stuke. I shall expect you, Sir. Madam, your servant. [Exit.]

Char. What mean you by this?

Lew. To hint to him that I know him.

Char. How know him? Mere doubt and supposition!

Lew. I shall have proof soon.

Char. And what then? Would you risk your life to be his punisher?

Lew. My life, Madam! Don't be afraid. But let it content you that I know this Stukely.—'Twould be as easy to make him honest as brave.

Char. And what do you intend to do?

Lew. Nothing, till I have proof. But methinks, Madam, I am acting here without authority. Could I have leave to call Mr. Beverley brother, his concerns would be my own. Why will you make my services appear officious?

Char. You know my reasons, and should not press me. But I am cold, you say; and cold I will be, while a poor sister's destitute.—But let us change this subject: your business here this morning is with my sister. Misfortunes press too hard upon her; yet, till to-day, she has borne them nobly.

Lew. Where is she?

Char. Gone to her chamber. Her spirits failed her.

Lew. I hear her coming. Let what has passed with Stukely be a secret.—She has already too much to trouble her.

Enter MRS. BEVERLEY.

Mrs. B. Good morning, Sir; I heard your voice, and, as I thought, inquiring for me. Where's Mr. Stukely, Charlotte?

Char. This moment gone. You have been in tears, sister; but here's a friend shall comfort you.

Lew. Or, if I add to your distresses, I'll beg your pardon, Madam. The sale of your house and furniture was finished yesterday.

Mrs. B. I know it, Sir. I know too your generous reason for putting me in mind of it. But you have obliged me too much already.

Lew. There are trifles, Madam, which I know you have set a value on: those I have purchased, and will deliver; I have a friend too that esteems you. He has bought largely; and will call nothing his, till he has seen you. If a visit to him would not be painful, he has begged it may be this morning.

Mrs. B. Not painful in the least: my pain is from the kindness of my friends. Why am I to be obliged beyond the power of return?

Lew. You shall repay us at your own time. I have a coach waiting at the door. Shall we have your company, Madam? [To CHARLOTTE.]

Char. No: my brother may return soon. I'll stay and receive him.

Mrs. B. He may want a comforter, perhaps. But don't upbraid him, Charlotte. We sha'n't be absent long. Come, Sir, Since I must be so obliged.

Lew. 'Tis I that am obliged. An hour, or less, will be sufficient for us. We shall find you at home, Madam!

[To CHARLOTTE; exit with MRS. B.]

Char. Certainly.

[Exit.]

SCENE II.—STUKELY'S Lodgings.

Enter STUKELY.

Stuke. That Lewson suspects me, 'tis too plain. Yet why should he suspect me? I appear the friend of Beverley, as much as he. But I am rich, it seems, and so I am!—thanks to another's folly and my own wisdom. To what use is wisdom, but to take advantage of the weak? This Beverley's my fool; I cheat him, and he calls me friend. But more business must be done yet. His wife's jewels are unsold: so is the reversion of his uncle's estate. I must have these too. And then there's a treasure above all—I love his wife. Before she knew this Beverley I loved her; but, like a cringing fool, bowed at a distance, while he stepped in and won her—Never, never, will I forgive him for it. Those hints, this morning, were well thrown in—Already they have fastened on her. If jealousy should weaken her affections, want may corrupt her virtue—These jewels may do much. He shall demand them of her; which, when mine, shall be converted to special purposes.

Enter BATES.

What now, Bates?

Bates. Is it a wonder then to see me? The forces are all in readiness, and only wait for orders. Where's Beverley?

Stuke. At last night's rendezvous, waiting for me. Is Dawson with you?

Bates. Dressed like a nobleman; with money in his pocket, and a set of dice that shall deceive the devil.

Stuke. That fellow has a head to undo a nation: but for the rest, they are such low-mannered, ill-looking dogs, I wonder Beverley has not suspected them.

Bates. No matter for manners and looks. Do you supply them with money, and they are gentlemen by profession. The passion of gaming casts such a mist before the eyes, that the nobleman shall be surrounded with sharpers, and imagine himself in the best company.

Stuke. There's that Williams, too—It was he, I suppose, that called at Beverley's, with the note, this morning. What directions did you give him?

Bates. To knock loud, and be clamorous. Did not you see him?

Stukes. No; the fool sneaked off with Jarvis. Had he appeared within doors, as directed, the note had been discharged. I waited there on purpose. I want the women to think well of me; for Lewson's grown suspicious.—He told me so himself.

Bates. What answer did you make him?

Stuke. A short one;—that I would see him soon, for further explanation.

Bates. We must take care of him. But what have we to do with Beverley?—Dawson and the rest are wondering at you.

Stuke. Why, let them wonder: I have designs above their narrow reach. They see me lend him money, and they stare at me. But they are fools. I want him to believe me beggared by him.

Bates. And what then.

Stuke. Ay, there's the question; but no matter: at night you may know more. He waits for me at Wilson's.—I told the women where to find him.

Bates. To what purpose?

Stuke. To save suspicion. It looked friendly, and they thanked me.—Old Jarvis was despatched to him.

Bates. And may entreat him home—

Stuke. No; he expects money from me, but I'll have none. His wife's jewels must go.—Women are easy creatures, and refuse nothing where they love. Follow to Wilson's—Come, Sir.

Let drudging fools by honesty grow great;
The shorter road to riches is deceit. [Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Gaming-house, with a Table,
Box, Dice, &c.

BEVERLEY discovered, sitting.

Bev. Why, what a world is this! The slave that digs for gold receives his daily pittance, and sleeps contented; while those, for whom he labours, convert their good to mischief, making abundance the means of want. What had I to do with play? I wanted nothing.—My wishes and my means were equal.—The poor followed me with blessing, love scattered roses on my pillow, and morning waked me to delight. Oh, bitter thought, that leads to what I was, by what I am! I would forget both.—Who's there?

Enter a WAITER.

Wait. A gentleman, Sir, inquires for you.

Bev. He might have used less ceremony. Stukeley, I suppose?

Wait. No, Sir, a stranger.

Bev. Well, show him in. [Exit WAITER.] A messenger from Stukeley, then; from him that has undone me! yet all in friendship—And now he lends me his little, to bring back fortune to me.

Enter JARVIS.

Jarvis!—Why this intrusion?—Your absence had been kinder.

Jar. I came in duty, Sir. If it be troublesome—

Bev. It is. I would be private—hid even from myself. Who sent you hither?

Jar. One that would persuade you home again. My mistress is not well; her tears told me so.

Bev. Go with thy duty there then.—Prythee begone; I have no business for thee.

Jar. Yes, Sir; to lead you from this place. I am your servant still. Your prosperous fortune blessed my old age. If that has left you, I must not leave you.

Bev. Not leave me!—Recall past time then; or, through this sea of storms and darkness, show me a star to guide me.—But what canst thou?

Jar. The little that I can, I will. You have been generous to me—I would not offend you, Sir, but—

Bev. No: think'st thou I'd ruin thee, too? I have enough of shame already.—My wife! my wife!—Wouldst thou believe it, Jarvis? I have not seen her all this long night—I, who have loved her so, that every hour of absence seemed as a gap in life. But other bonds have held me.—Oh! I have played the boy! dropping my counters in the stream, and reaching to redeem them, lost myself!

Jar. For pity's sake, Sir!—I have no heart to see this change.

Bev. Nor I to bear it.—How speaks the world of me, Jarvis?

Jar. As of a good man dead. Of one who, walking in a dream, fell down a precipice. The world is sorry for you.

Bev. Ay, and pities me—Says it not so? But I was born to infamy. I'll tell thee what it says.—It calls me villain; a treacherous husband; a cruel father; a false brother; one lost to nature and her charities: or, to say all in one short word, it calls me—gamester. Go to thy mistress, I'll see her presently.

Jar. And why not now? Rude people press upon her; loud bawling creditors; wretches who know no pity. I met one at the door; he would have seen my mistress. I wanted means of present payment, so promised it to-morrow. But others may be pressing; and she has grief enough already. Your absence hangs too heavy on her.

Bev. Tell her I'll come then. I have a moment's business. But what hast thou to do with my distresses? thy honesty has left thee poor, and age wants comfort.—Keep what thou hast; lest, between thee and the grave, misery steal in. I have a friend shall counsel me.—This is that friend.

Enter STUKELEY.

Stuke. How fares it, Beverley? Honest Mr. Jarvis, well met. That viper, Williams! was it not he that troubled you this morning?

Jar. My mistress heard him, then; I am sorry that she heard him.

Bev. And Jarvis promised payment.

Stuke. That must not be.—Tell him I'll satisfy him.

Jar. Will you, Sir? Heaven will reward you for it.

Bev. Generous Stukeley! Friendship like yours, had it ability like will, would more than balance the wrongs of fortune.

Stuke. You think too kindly of me.—Make haste to Williams; his clamours may be rude else. [To JARVIS.]

Jar. And my master will go home again.—Alas! Sir, we know of hearts there breaking for his absence. [Exit.]

Bev. Would I were dead!

Stuke. Ha, ha, ha! Prythee, be a man, and leave dying to disease and old age.—Fortune may be ours again; at least we'll try for't.

Bev. No; it has fooled us on too far.

Stuke. Ay, ruined us; and therefore we'll sit down contented. These are the despondings of men without money; but let the shining ore chink in the pocket, and folly turns to wisdom. We are fortune's children.—True, she's a fickle mother; but shall we droop because she's peevish?—No; she has smiles in store, and these her frowns are meant to brighten them.

Bev. Is this a time for levity?—But you are single in the ruin, and therefore may talk lightly of it; with me 'tis complicated misery.

Stuke. You censure me unjustly; I but assumed these spirits to cheer my friend: Heaven knows, he wants a comforter.

Bev. What new misfortune?

Stuke. I would have brought you money; but lenders want securities. What's to be done?—All that was mine is yours already.

Bev. And there's the double weight that sinks me. I have undone my friend too; one who, to save a drowning wretch, reached out his hand, and perished with him.

Stuke. Have better thoughts.

Bev. Whence are they to proceed! I have nothing left.

Stuke. [Sighing.] Then we're indeed undone. What, nothing? no moveables, nor useless trinkets? baubles locked up in caskets to starve their owners?—I have ventured deeply for you.

Bev. Therefore this heart-ache; for I am lost beyond all hope.

Stuke. No; means may be found to save us.

Jarvis is rich.—Who made him so? This is no time for ceremony.

Bev. And is it for dishonesty? The good old man! Shall I rob him too? My friend would grieve for't. No; let the little that he has buy food and clothing for him.

Stuke. Good morning, then. [Going.]

Bev. So hasty! Why then, good morning.

Stuke. And when we meet again, upbraid me. Say it was I that tempted you. Tell Lewson so; and tell him I have wronged you. He has suspicions of me, and will thank you.

Bev. No; we have been companions in a rash voyage, and the same storm has wrecked us both. Mine shall be self-upbraidings.

Stuke. And will they feed us? You deal unkindly by me. I have sold and borrowed for you while land or credit lasted; and now, when fortune should be tried, and my heart whispers me success, I am deserted, turned loose to beggary, while you have hoards.

Bev. What hoards? Name them, and take them.

Stuke. Jewels.

Bev. And shall this thriftless hand seize them too? My poor, poor wife! must she lose all? I would not wound her so.

Stuke. Nor I, but from necessity. One effort more, and fortune may grow kind. I have unusual hopes.

Bev. Think of some other means, then.

Stuke. I have, and you rejected them.

Bev. Pr'ythee, let me be a man.

Stuke. Ay, and your friend a poor one: but I have done. And, for those trinkets of a woman, why, let her keep them to deck out pride with, and show a laughing world that she has finery to starve in.

Bev. No; she shall yield him up all: my friend demands it. But need we have talked lightly of her? The jewels that she values are truth and innocence.—Those will adorn her for ever; and, for the rest, she wore them for a husband's pride, and to his wants will give them. Alas! you know her not. Where shall we meet?

Stuke. No matter; I have changed my mind. Leave me to a prison; 'tis the reward of friendship.

Bev. Perish mankind first! Leave you to a prison! No! fallen as you see me, I'm not that wretch: nor would I change this heart, o'ercharged as 'tis with folly and misfortune, for one most prudent and most happy, if callous to a friend's distress.

Stuke. You are too warm.

Bev. In such a cause, not to be warm is to be frozen. Farewell.—I'll meet you at your lodgings.

Stuke. Reflect a little.—The jewels may be lost.—Better not hazard them.—I was too pressing.

Bev. And I ungrateful.—Reflection takes up time. I have no leisure for't.—Within an hour expect me. [Exit.]

Stuke. The thoughtless, shallow prodigal! We shall have sport at night, then—but hold.—The jewels are not ours yet.—The lady may refuse them.—The husband may relent too. 'Tis more than probable.—I'll write a note to Beverley, and the contents shall spur him to demand them.—But am I grown this rogue through avarice? No; I have warmer motives, love and revenge.—Ruin the husband, and the wife's virtue may be bid for.

Enter BATES.

Look to your men, Bates; there's money stirring.

We meet to-night upon this spot.—Hasten, and tell them.—Hasten, I say, the rogues will scatter else.

Bates. Not till their leader bids them.

Stuke. Give them the word, and follow me; I must advise with you—This is a day of business. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—BEVERLEY'S Lodgings.

Enter BEVERLEY and CHARLOTTE.

Char. Your looks are changed too; there's wildness in them. My wretched sister! How will it grieve her to see you thus!

Bev. No, no; a little rest will ease me. And for your Lewson's kindness to her, it has my thanks; I have no more to give him.

Char. Yes: a sister and her fortune. I trifle with him, and he complains.—My looks, he says, are cold upon him. He thinks too—

Bev. That I have lost your fortune.—He dares not think so.

Char. Nor does he. You are too quick at guessing. He cares not if you had. That care is mine. I lent it you to husband, and now I claim it.

Bev. You have suspicions, then?

Char. Cure them, and give it me.

Bev. To stop a sister's chiding?

Char. To vindicate her brother.

Bev. How if it needs no vindication?

Char. I would fain hope so.

Bev. Ay, would and cannot. Leave it to time, then; 'twill satisfy all doubts.

Char. Mine are already satisfied.

Bev. 'Tis well. And when the subject is renewed, speak to me like a sister, and I will answer like a brother.

Char. To tell me I'm a beggar. Why, tell it now. I, that can bear the ruin of those dearer to me,—the ruin of a sister and her infant, can bear that too.

Bev. No more of this—you ring my heart.

Char. Would that the misery were all your own! But innocence must suffer. Unthinking rioter! whose home was heaven to him! an angel dwell there, and a little cherub, that crowned his days with blessings. How has he lost this heaven, to league with devils!

Bev. Forbear, I say; reproaches come too late;—they search, but cure not. And, for the fortune you demand, we'll talk to-morrow on't—our tempers may be milder.

Char. Or, if 'tis gone, why farewell all. I claimed it for a sister. But I'll upbraid no more. What heaven permits, perhaps it may ordain. Yet, that the husband, father, brother, should be its instruments of vengeance!—'Tis grievous to know that.

Bev. If you are my sister, spare the remembrance—it wounds too deeply. To-morrow shall clear all; and when the worst is known, it may be better than your fears. Comfort my wife; and for the pains of absence, I'll make atonement.

Char. See where she comes!—Look cheerfully upon her. Affections such as hers are prying, and lend those eyes that read the soul.

Enter MRS. BEVERLEY and LEWSON.

Mrs. B. My life!

Bev. My love! how fares it? I have been a truant husband.

Mrs. B. But we meet now, and that heals all.

—Doubts and alarms have I had, but in this dear embrace I bury and forget them. My friend here [Pointing to LEWSON.] has been indeed a friend. Charlotte, 'tis you must thank him: your brother's thanks and mine are of too little value.

Bev. Yet what we have we'll pay. I thank you, Sir, and am obliged. I would say more, but that your goodness to the wife upbraids the husband's follies. Had I been wise, she had not trespassed on your bounty.

Lew. Nor has she trespassed. The little I have done acceptance overpays.

Char. So friendship thinks—

Mrs. B. And doubles obligations, by striving to conceal them.—We'll talk another time on't. You are too thoughtful, love.

Bev. No, I have reason for these thoughts.

Char. And hatred for the cause.—'Would you had that too!

Bev. I have.—The cause was avarice.

Char. And who the tempter.

Bev. A ruined friend;—ruined by too much kindness.

Lew. Ay, worse than ruined; stabbed in his fame, mortally stabbed. Riches can't cure him.

Bev. Or if they could, those I have drained him of.—Something of this he hinted in the morning.—That Lewson had suspicions of him.—Why these suspicions? [Angrily.]

Lew. At school we knew this Stukely. A cunning, plodding boy he was, sordid and cruel, slow at his task, but quick at shifts and tricking. He schemed out mischief, that others might be punished; and would tell his tale with so much art, that for the lash he merited, rewards and praise were given him. Show me a boy with such a mind, and time, that ripens manhood in him, shall ripen vice too.—I'll prove him, and lay him open to you:—till then, be warned. I know him, and therefore shun him.

Bev. As I would those that wrong him. You are too busy, Sir.

Mrs. B. No, not too busy. Mistaken, perhaps.—That had been milder.

Lew. No matter, Madam. I can bear this, and praise the heart that prompts it. Pity such friendship should be so placed!

Bev. Again, Sir! but I'll bear too. You wrong him, Lewson, and will be sorry for it.

Char. Ay, when 'tis proved he wrongs him. The world is full of hypocrites.

Bev. And Stukely one,—so you would infer, I think. I'll hear no more of this; my heart aches for him. I have undone him.

Lew. The world says otherwise.

Bev. The world is false then.—I have business with you, love. [To Mrs. B.] We'll leave them to their rancour. [Going.]

Char. No; we shall find room within for't.—Come this way, Sir. [To LEWSON.]

Lew. Another time my friend will thank me; that time is hastening too.

[Exit LEW. and CHAR.]

Bev. They hurt me beyond bearing.—Is Stukely false? Then honesty has left us. 'Twere sinning against Heaven to think so.

Mrs. B. I never doubted him.

Bev. No; you are charity. Meekness and ever-during patience live in that heart, and love that knows no change. Why did I ruin you?

Mrs. B. You have not ruined me. I have no wants when you are present, nor wishes in your absence, but to be bless'd with your return. But be resigned to what has happened, and I am rich beyond the dreams of avarice.

Bev. My generous girl!—But memory will be busy; still crowding on my thoughts, to sour the present by the past. I have another pang, too.

Mrs. B. Tell it, and let me cure it.

Bev. That friend, that generous friend, whose fame they have traduced—I have undone him too. While he had means, he lent me largely; and now a prison must be his portion.

Mrs. B. No; I hope otherwise.

Bev. To hope must be to act. The charitable wish feeds not the hungry.—Something must be done.

Mrs. B. What?

Bev. In bitterness of heart he told me, just now he told me, I had undone him. Could I hear that, and think of happiness! No; I have disclaimed it, while he is miserable.

Mrs. B. The world may mend with us, and then we may be grateful. There's comfort in that hope.

Bev. Ay, 'tis the sick man's cordial, his promised cure; while, in preparing it, the patient dies.—What now?—

Enter LUCY.

Lucy. A letter, Sir. [Delivering it, and exit.]

Bev. The hand is Stukely's.

[Opens it, and reads it to himself.]

Mrs. B. And brings good news—at least I hope so. What says he, love?

Bev. Why this—too much for patience. Yet he directs me to conceal it from you. [Reads.] Let your haste to see me be the only proof of your esteem for me. I have determined, since we parted, to bid adieu to England: choosing rather to forsake my country, than owe my freedom in it to the means we talked of. Keep this a secret at home, and hasten to the ruined

R. STUKELY.

Ruined by friendship! I must relieve or follow him.

Mrs. B. Follow him, did you say? Then I am lost indeed!

Bev. O this infernal vice! how has it sunk me! a vice, whose highest joy was poor to my domestic happiness. Yet how have I pursued it! turned all my comforts to bitterest pangs, and all my smiles to tears! Damned, damned infatuation!

Mrs. B. Be cool, my life! What are the means the letter talks of? Have you—have I, those means? Tell me, and ease me. I have no life while you are wretched.

Bev. No, no; it must not be. 'Tis I alone have sinned; 'tis I alone must suffer. You shall reverse those means to keep my child and his wronged mother from want and wretchedness.

Mrs. B. What means?

Bev. I came to rob you of them—but cannot dare not. Those jewels are your sole support. I should be more than monster to request them.

Mrs. B. My jewels! Trifles, not worth speaking of, if weighed against a husband's peace: but let them purchase that, and the world's wealth is of less value.

Bev. How little do I seem before such virtues!

Mrs. B. No more, my love. I kept them till occasion called to use them; now is the occasion, and I'll resign them cheerfully.

Bev. Why, we'll be rich in love then. But this excess of kindness melts me. Yet, for friend, one would do much. He has denied me nothing.

Mrs. B. Come to my closet. But let him manage wisely. We have no more to give him.

Bev. Where learned my love this excellence?—'Tis Heaven's own teaching; that Heaven, which to an angel's form has given a mind more lovely. I am unworthy of you, but will deserve you better.

Henceforth my follies and neglects shall cease,
And all to come be penitence and peace;
Vice shall no more attract me with her charms,
Nor pleasure reach me, but in these dear arms.

[Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—STUKELY'S Lodgings.

Enter STUKELY and BATES.

Stuke. So runs the world, Bates. Fools are the natural prey of knaves: nature designed them so, when she made lambs for wolves. The laws, that fear and policy have framed, nature disclaims; she knows but two; and those are force and cunning. The nobler law is force, but then there's danger in't: while cunning, like a skilful miner, works safely and unseen.

Bates. And therefore wisely. Force must have nerves and sinews; cunning wants neither. The dwarf that has it shall trip the giant's heels up.

Stuke. And bind him to the ground. Why, we'll erect a shrine for nature, and be her oracles. Conscience is weakness; fear made it, and fear maintains it. The dread of shame, inward reproaches, and fictitious burnings, swell out the phantom. Nature knows none of this; her laws are freedom.

Bates. Sound doctrine, and well delivered!

Stuke. We are sincere too, and practise what we teach. Let the grave pedant say as much. But now to business. The jewels are disposed of; and Beverley again worth money. If my design succeeds, this night we finish with him. Go to your lodgings, and be busy.—You understand conveyances, and can make ruin sure.

Bates. Better stop here. The sale of this reversion may be talked of: there's danger in it.

Stuke. No, 'tis the mark I aim at. We'll thrive and laugh. You are the purchaser, and there's the payment. [Giving a pocket-book.] He thinks you rich; and so you shall be. Inquire for titles, and deal hardly; 'twill look like honesty.

Bates. How, if he suspects us?

Stuke. Leave it to me. I study hearts, and when to work upon them. Go to your lodgings; and if we come, be busy over papers. Talk of a thoughtless age, of gaming and extravagance; you have a face for't.

Bates. A feeling too that would avoid it. We push too far; but I have cautioned you. If it ends ill, you'll think of me—adieu. [Exit.]

Stuke. This fellow sins by halves; his fears are conscience to him. I'll turn these fears to use. Rogues that dread shame, will still be greater rogues to hide the guilt. Lewson grows troublesome.—We must get rid of him.—He knows too much. I have a tale for Beverley; part of it is truth too—He shall call Lewson to account—If it succeeds, 'tis well; if not, we must try other means—But here he comes. I must dissemble.

Enter BEVERLEY.

Look to the door there. [In a seeming fright.]—My friend! I thought of other visitors.

Bev. No: these shall guard you from them— [Offering notes.] Take them, and use them cautiously—The world deals hardly by us.

Stuke. And shall I leave you destitute? No: your wants are the greatest. Another climate may treat me kinder. The shelter of to-night takes me from this.

Bev. Let these be your support then.—Yet is there need of parting? I may have means again; we'll share them, and live wisely.

Stuke. No; I should tempt you on. Habit is nature in me; ruin can't cure it. Even now I would be gaming. Taught by experience as I am, and knowing this poor sum is all that's left us, I am for venturing still.—And say I am to blame.—Yet will this supply our wants? No, we must put it out to usury. Whether 'tis madness in me, or some restless impulse of good fortune, I yet am ignorant; but—

Bev. Take it, and succeed then. I'll try no more.

Stuke. 'Tis surely impulse; it pleads so strongly—But you are cold. We'll e'en part here then. And for this last reserve, keep it for better uses; I'll have none on't. I thank you though, and will seek fortune singly. One thing I had forgot—

Bev. What is it?

Stuke. Perhaps 'twere best forgotten. But I am open in my nature, and zealous for the honour of my friend—Lewson speaks freely of you.

Bev. Of you I know he does.

Stuke. I can forgive him for't; but for my friend, I'm angry.

Bev. What says he of me?

Stuke. That Charlotte's fortune is embezzled—He talks on't loudly.

Bev. He shall be silenced then—How heard you of it?

Stuke. From many. He questioned Bates about it. You must account with him, he says.

Bev. Or he with me—and soon too.

Stuke. Speak mildly to him. Cautions are best.

Bev. I'll think on't—But whither go you?

Stuke. From poverty and prisons—No matter whither. If fortune changes, you may hear from me.

Bev. May these be prosperous then. [Offering the notes, which he refuses.] Nay, they are yours. I have sworn it, and will have nothing—Take them and use them.

Stuke. Singly I will not. My cares are for my friend: for his lost fortune and ruined family. All separate interest I disclaim. Together we have fallen, together we must rise. My heart, my honour, and affections, all will have it so.

Bev. I am weary of being fooled.

Stuke. And so am I. Here let us part, then. These bodings of good fortune shall all be stified; call them folly, and forget them. This one embrace, and then farewell. [Offering to embrace.]

Bev. No; stay a moment—How my poor heart's distracted! I have the bodings too; but whether caught from you, or prompted by my good or evil genius, I know not—The trial shall determine—And yet, my wife—

Stuke. Ay, ay, she'll chide.

Bev. No; my chidings are all here.

[Pointing to his heart.]

Stuke. I'll not persuade you.

Bev. I am persuaded; by reason too; the strongest reason, necessity. Oh! could I but regain the height I have fallen from, Heaven should forsake me in my latest hour, if I again mixed in these scenes, or sacrificed the husband's peace, his joys, and best affections, to avarice and infamy.

Stuke. I have resolved like you; and since our motives are so honest, why should we fear success?

Bev. Come on, then—Where shall we meet?

Stuke. At Wilson's—Yet if it hurts you, leave me; I have misled you often.

Bev. We have misled each other—But come! fortune is fickle, and may be tired with plaguing us—There let us rest our hopes.

Stuke. Yet think a little—

Bev. I cannot—thinking but distracts me.

When desperation leads, all thoughts are vain. Reason would lose what rashness may obtain.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—BEVERLEY'S Lodgings.

Enter MRS. BEVERLEY and CHARLOTTE.

Char. 'Twas all a scheme; a mean one; unworthy of my brother.

Mrs. B. No, I am sure it was not—Stukely is honest too; I know he is. This madness has undone them both.

Char. My brother irrecoverably—You are too spiritless a wife—A mournful tale, mixed with a few kind words, will steal away your soul. The world's too subtle for such goodness. Had I been by, he should have asked your life sooner than those jewels.

Mrs. B. He should have had it then. [Warmly.] I live but to oblige him. She who can love, and is beloved, like me, will do as much. Men have done more for mistresses, and women for a base deluder; and shall a wife do less? Your chidings hurt me, Charlotte.

Char. And come too late: they might have saved you else. How could he use you so?

Mrs. B. 'Twas friendship did it. His heart was breaking for a friend.

Char. The friend that has betrayed him.

Mrs. B. Pr'ythee, don't think so.

Char. To-morrow he accounts with me.

Mrs. B. And fairly—I will not doubt it.

Char. Unless a friend has wanted!—I have no patience—Sister! sister! we are bound to curse this friend.

Mrs. B. My Beverley speaks nobly of him.

Char. And Lewson truly—But I displease you with this talk—To-morrow will instruct us.

Mrs. B. Stay till it comes then—I would not think so hardly.

Char. Nor I, but from conviction—Yet we have hope of better days. My uncle is infirm, and of an age that threatens hourly—Or, if he lives, you never have offended him; and for distresses so unmerited he will have pity.

Mrs. B. I know it, and am cheerful. We have no more to lose; and for what's gone, if it brings prudence home, the purchase was well made.

Char. My Lewson will be kind too. While he and I have life and means, you shall divide with us—And see, he's here!

Enter LEWSON.

We were just speaking of you.

Lew. 'Tis best to interrupt you then. Few characters will bear a scrutiny; and where the bad outweighs the good, he's safest that's least talked of. What say you, Madam?

[To CHARLOTTE.]

Char. That I hate scandal, though a woman therefore talk seldom of you.

Mrs. B. Or, with more truth, that though a woman, she loves to praise—therefore talks always of you. I'll leave you to decide it. [Exit.]

Lew. How good and amiable! I came to talk in private with you, of matters that concern you.

Char. What matters?

Lew. First answer me sincerely to what I ask.

Char. Propose your question.

Lew. 'Tis now a tedious twelvemonth since, with an open and kind heart, you said you loved me. And when, in consequence of such sweet words, I pressed for marriage, you gave a voluntary promise that you would live for me.

Char. You think me changed then? [Angrily.]

Lew. I did not say so. Time and a near acquaintance with my faults, may have brought change. If it be so, or for a moment if you have wished this promise were unmade, here I acquit you of it. This is my question, then; and with such plainness as I ask it, I shall entreat an answer.—Have you repented of your promise?

Char. Why am I doubted?

Lew. My doubts are of myself. I have my faults, and you have observation. If, from my temper, my words, or actions, you have conceived a thought against me, or even a wish for separation, all that has passed is nothing.

Char. Why, now I'll answer you. Your doubts are prophecies. I am really changed.

Lew. Indeed!

Char. I could torment you now, as you have me, but it is not in my nature.—That I am changed, I own, for what at first was inclination is now grown reason in me; and from that reason, had I the world, nay, were I poorer than the poorest, and you too wanting bread, with but a hovel to invite me to—I would be yours, and happy.

Lew. My kindest Charlotte! [Taking her hand.] thanks are too poor for this—and words too weak! but, if we love so, why should our union be delayed?

Char. For happier times. The present are too wretched.

Lew. I may have reasons that press it now.

Char. What reasons?

Lew. The strongest reasons; unanswerable ones.

Char. Be quick, and name them.

Lew. First promise, that, to-morrow or the next day, you will be mine for ever.

Char. I do—though misery should succeed.

Lew. Thus then I seize you! and with you every joy on this side heaven!

Char. Now, Sir, your secret.

Lew. Your fortune's lost.

Char. My fortune lost! I'll study to be humble, then. But was my promise claimed for this? how nobly generous! where learnt you this sad news?

Lew. From Bates, Stukely's prime agent. I have obliged him, and he's grateful. He told it me in friendship, to warn me from my Charlotte.

Char. 'Twas honest in him, and I'll esteem him for it.

Lew. He knows much more than he has told.

Char. For me it is enough. And for your generous love, I thank you from my soul. If you'd oblige me more, give me a little time.

Lew. Why time? it robs us of our happiness.

Char. I have a task to learn first. The little pride this fortune gave me must be subdued. Once we were equal; and might have met, obliging and obliged. But now 'tis otherwise; and for a life of obligations, I have not learned to bear it.

Lew. Mine is that life. You are too noble.

Char. Leave me to think on't.

Lew. To-morrow then you'll fix my happiness!

Char. All that I can, I will.

Lew. It must be so; we live but for each other. Keep what you know a secret; and when we meet to-morrow, more may be known. Farewell.

[Exit.

Char. My poor, poor sister! how would this wound her! but I'll conceal it, and speak comfort to her.

[Exit.

SCENE III.—A Room in the Gaming House.

Enter BEVERLEY and STUKELY.

Bev. Whither would you lead me? [Angrily. Stuke. Where we may vent our curses.

Bev. Ay, on yourself, and those damned counsels that have destroyed me. A thousand fiends were in that bosom, and all let loose to tempt me—I had resisted else.

Stuke. Go on, Sir.—I have deserved this from you.

Bev. And curses everlasting—Time is too scanty for them—

Stuke. What have I done?

Bev. What the arch-devil of old did—soothed with false hopes, for certain ruin.

Stuke. Myself unhurt; nay, pleased at your destruction.—So your words mean. Why, tell it to the world. I am too poor to find a friend in't.

Bev. A friend? what's he! I had a friend.

Stuke. And have one still.

Bev. Ay; I'll tell you of this friend. He found me happiest of the happy. Fortune and honour crowned me, and love and peace lived in my heart. One spark of folly lurked there; that too he found; and by deceitful breath blew it to flames that have consumed me. This friend were you to me.

Stuke. A little more, perhaps—The friend who gave his all to save you; and, not succeeding, chose ruin with you. 'But no matter; I have undone you, and am a villain.

Bev. No; I think not—the villains are within.

Stuke. What villains?

Bev. Dawson and the rest. We have been dupes to sharpers.

Stuke. How know you this? I have had doubts as well as you; yet still, as fortune changed, I blushed at my own thoughts.—But you have proofs, perhaps?

Bev. Ay, damned ones. Repeated losses—night after night, and no reverse. Chance has no hand in this.

Stuke. I think more charitably; yet I am peevish in my nature, and apt to doubt. The world speaks fairly of this Dawson; so does it of the rest. We have watched 'em closely too. But 'tis a right usurped by losers, to think the winners knaves. We'll have more manhood in us.

Bev. I know not what to think. This night has stung me to the quick—blasted my reputation too—I have bound my honour to these vipers; played meanly upon credit, 'till I tired 'em; and now they shun me to rifle one another. What's to be done?

Stuke. Nothing. My counsels have been fatal.

Bev. By Heaven, I'll not survive this shame. Traitor! 'tis you have brought it on me. [Taking hold of him.] Snow me the means to save me, or I'll commit a murder here, and next upon myself.

Stuke. Why, do it then, and rid me of ingratitude.

Bev. Pr'ythee, forgive this language; I speak I know not what. Rage and despair are in my heart, and hurry me to madness. My home is horror to me. I'll not return to't. Speak quickly; tell me if, in this wreck of fortune, one hope remains? name it, and be my oracle.

Stuke. To vent your curses on. You have bestowed 'em liberally. Take your own counsel; and, should a desperate hope present itself, 'twill suit your desperate fortune. I'll not advise you.

Bev. What hope? by Heaven! I'll catch at it however desperate. I am sunk in misery; it cannot lay me lower.

Stuke. You have an uncle.

Bev. Ay, what of him?

Stuke. Old men live long by temperance, while their heirs starve on expectation.

Bev. What mean you?

Stuke. That the reversion of his estate is yours, and will bring money to pay debts with. Nay, more, it may retrieve what's past.

Bev. Or leave my child a beggar.

Stuke. And what's his father? a dishonourable one; engaged for sums he cannot pay. That should be thought of.

Bev. It is my shame—the poison that inflames me. Where shall we go? To whom? I am impatient till all's lost.

Stuke. All may be yours again—Your man is Bates—He has large funds at his command, and will deal justly by you.

Bev. I am resolved. Tell 'em within, we'll meet 'em presently, and with full purses too. Come, follow me.

Stuke. No; I'll have no hand in this, nor do I counsel it. Use your discretion, and act from that. You'll find me at my lodgings.

Bev. Succeed what will, this night I'll dare the worst; 'Tis loss of fear to be completely curs'd.

[Exit BEVERLEY.

Stuke. Why, lose it then for ever—Fear is the mind's worst evil, and 'tis a friendly office to drive it from the bosom. Thus far has fortune crowned me. Yet Beverley is rich; rich in his wife's best treasure, her honour and affections. I would supplant him there too. Charlotte is sometimes absent. The seeds of jealousy are sown already. If I mistake not, they have taken root too. Now is the time to ripen them, and reap the harvest. The softest of her sex, if wronged in love, or thinking that she's wronged, becomes a tigress in revenge. I'll instantly to Beverley's—No matter for the danger. When beauty leads us on, 'tis indiscretion to reflect, and cowardice to doubt.

[Exit.

SCENE IV.—BEVERLEY'S Lodgings.

Enter MRS. BEVERLEY and LUCY.

Mrs. B. Did Charlotte tell you any thing?

Lucy. No, Madam.

Mrs. B. She looked confused, methought; said she had business with her Lewson; which, when I pressed to know, tears were her only answer.

Lucy. She seemed in haste too—Yet her return may bring you comfort.

Mrs. B. No, my kind girl!—I was not born for't. But why do I distress thee? Thy sympathizing heart bleeds for the ills of others. What pity that thy mistress can't reward thee! But there's a power above, that sees, and will remember all. [Knocks, g.] Hark! there's some one entering.

Lucy. Perhaps 'tis my master, Madam.

[Exit.]

Re-enter LUCY, with STUKELY.

Lucy. Mr. Stukely, Madam.

Stuke. To meet you thus alone, Madam, was what I wished. Unseasonable visits, when friendship warrants them, need no excuse—therefore I make none.

Mrs. B. What mean you, Sir? and where's your friend?

Stuke. Men may have secrets, Madam, which their best friends are not admitted to. We parted in the morning, not soon to meet again.

Mrs. B. You mean to leave us, then?—to leave your country, too? I am no stranger to your reasons, and pity your misfortunes.

Stuke. Your pity has undone you. Could Beverley do this? That letter was a false one; a mean contrivance to rob you of your jewels. I wrote it not.

Mrs. B. Impossible! whence came it then?

Stuke. Wronged as I am, Madam, I must speak plainly—

Mrs. B. Do so, and ease me. Your hints have troubled me. Reports, you say, are stirring—Reports of whom? You wished me not to credit them. What, Sir, are these reports?

Stuke. I thought them slander, Madam; and cautioned you in friendship, lest from officious tongues the tale had reached you with double aggravations.

Mrs. B. Proceed, Sir.

Stuke. It is a debt due to my fame, due to an injured wife, too.—We are both injured.

Mrs. B. How injured, and who has injured us?

Stuke. My friend, your husband.

Mrs. B. You would resent for both, then? But know, Sir, my injuries are my own, and do not need a champion.

Stuke. Be not too hasty, Madam. I come not in resentment, but for acquittance. You thought me poor, and to the feigned distresses of a friend gave up your jewels.

Mrs. B. I gave them to a husband.

Stuke. Who gave them to a—

Mrs. B. What? whom did he give them to?

Stuke. A mistress.

Mrs. B. No; on my life, he did not.

Stuke. Himself confessed it, with curses on her avarice.

Mrs. B. I'll not believe it.—He has no mistress; or, if he has, why is it told to me?

Stuke. To guard you against insults. He told me, that, to move you to a compliance, he forged that letter, pretending I was ruined, ruined by him too. The fraud succeeded; and what a trusting wife bestowed on pity, was lavished on a wanton.

Mrs. B. Then I am lost indeed! and my afflictions are too powerful for me.—His follies I have borne without upbraiding, and saw the approach of poverty without a tear.—My affections, my strong affections, supported me through every trial.

Stuke. Be patient, Madam.

Mrs. B. Patient! the barbarous, ungrateful man! And does he think that the tenderness of my heart is his best security for wounding it?

Vol. I. . . . 3 P

41

But he shall find that injuries such as these can arm my weakness for vengeance and redress.

Stuke. Ha! then I may succeed. [Aside.]

Redress is in your power.

Mrs. B. What redress?

Stuke. Forgive me, Madam, if, in my zeal to serve you, I hazard your displeasure. Think of your wretched state. Already, want surrounds you. Is it in patience to bear that? To see your helpless little one robbed of his birthright! A sister too, with unavailing tears, lamenting her lost fortune? No comfort left you, but ineffectual pity from the few, outweighed by insults from the many.

Mrs. B. Am I so lost a creature? Well, Sir, my redress?

Stuke. To be resolved is to secure it. The marriage vow, once violated, is in the sight of Heaven dissolved;—start not, but hear me. 'Tis now the summer of your youth; time has not cropped the roses from your cheek, though sorrow long has washed 'em—Then use your beauty wisely; and, freed by injuries, fly from the cruellest of men, for shelter with the kindest.

Mrs. B. And who is he?

Stuke. A friend to the unfortunate; a bold one, too; who, while the storm is bursting on your brow, and lightning flashing from your eyes, dares tell you that he loves you.

Mrs. B. Would that these eyes had Heaven's own lightning, that with a look thus I might blast thee! Am I then fallen so low? Has poverty so humbled me, that I should listen to a hellish offer, and sell my soul for bread? O villain! villain! But now I know thee, and thank thee for the knowledge.

Stuke. If you are wise, you shall have cause to thank me.

Mrs. B. An injured husband, too, shall thank thee.

Stuke. Yet know, proud woman, I have a heart as stubborn as your own; as haughty and imperious: and as it loves, so it can hate.

Mrs. B. Mean, despicable villain! I scorn thee and thy threats. Was it for this that Beverley was false! that his too credulous wife should in despair and vengeance give up her honour to a wretch? But he shall know it, and vengeance shall be his.

Stuke. Why, send him for defiance then. Tell him, I love his wife; but that a worthless husband forbids our union. I'll make a widow of you, and court you honourably.

Mrs. B. O coward! coward! thy soul will shrink at him. Yet, in the thoughts of what may happen, I feel a woman's fears. Keep thy own secret, and begone. [Rings a bell.] Who's there?

Enter LUCY.

Your absence, Sir, will please me.

Stuke. I'll not offend you, Madam.

[Exit with LUCY.]

Mrs. B. Why opens not the earth to swallow such a monster? Be conscience then his punisher, till Heaven, in mercy, gives him penitence, or dooms him in its justice.

[Exit.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—STUKELY'S Lodgings.

Enter STUKELY and BATES, meeting.

Bates. Where have you been?

Stuke. Fooling my time away—Playing my tricks, like a tame monkey, to entertain a woman—No matter where—I have been vexed and disappointed. Tell me of Beverley—How bore he his last shock?

Bates. Like one (so Dawson says) whose senses had been numbed with misery. When all was lost, he fixed his eyes upon the ground, and stood some time with folded arms, stupid and motionless.—Then, snatching his sword, that hung against the wainscot, he sat him down, and, with a look of fixed attention, drew figures on the floor.—At last he started up, looked wild, and trembled; and like a woman, seized with her sex's fits, laughed out aloud, while the tears trickled down his face—so left the room.

Stuke. Why this was madness.

Bates. The madness of despair.

Stuke. We must confine him then. A prison would do well. [A knocking at the door.] Hark! that knocking may be his. Go that way down. [Exit BATES.] Who's there?

Enter LEWSON.

Lew. An enemy, an open and avowed one.

Stuke. Why am I thus broke in upon? This house is mine, Sir, and should protect me from insult and ill manners.

Lew. Guilt has no place of sanctuary: wherever found, 'tis virtue's lawful game. The fox's hole and tiger's den are no security against the hunter.

Stuke. Your business, Sir?

Lew. To tell you that I know you. Why this confusion? that look of guilt and terror?—Is Beverley awake? Or has his wife told tales? The man that dares like you, should have a soul to justify his deeds, and courage to confront accusers,—not with a coward's fear to shrink beneath reproof.

Stuke. Who waits there?

Lew. By Heaven! he dies that interrupts us. [Shutting the door.] You should have weighed your strength, Sir: and then, instead of climbing to high fortune, the world had marked you for what you are, a little paltry villain.

Stuke. You think I fear you.

Lew. I know you fear me. This is to prove it. [Pulls him by the sleeve.] You wanted privacy! A lady's presence took up your attention! Now we are alone, Sir. Why, what a wretch! [Flinging him from him.] The vilest insect in creation will turn when trampled on; yet has this thing undone a man! By cunning and mean arts undone him! But we have found you, Sir; traced you through all your labyrinths. If you would save yourself, fall to confession. No mercy will be shown else.

Stuke. First prove me what you think me.—Till then your threatenings are in vain,—and for this insult vengeance may yet be mine.

Lew. Infamous coward! why take it now, then.—[Draws, and STUKELEY retires.] Alas! I pity thee.—Yet that a wretch like this should overcome a Beverley! It fills me with astonishment!—A wretch, so mean of soul, that even desperation cannot animate him to look upon his enemy. You should not have thus soared, Sir, unless, like others of your black profession, you had a sword to keep the fools in awe your villany has ruined.

Stuke. Villany! 'Twere best to curb this licence of your tongue; for know, Sir, while there are laws, this outrage on my reputation will not be borne with.

Lew. Laws! dar'st thou seek shelter from the laws? those laws, which thou and thy infernal crew live in the constant violation of? Talk'st thou of reputation, too? when under friendship's sacred name, thou hast betrayed, robbed, and destroyed?

Stuke. Ay, rail at gaming; 'tis a rich topic, and affords noble declamation. Go preach against it in the city; you'll find a congregation in every tavern. If they should laugh at you, fly to my lord, and sermonize it there. He'll thank you, and reform.

Lew. And will example sanctify a vice? no, wretch! the custom of my lord, or of the cit that apes him, cannot excuse a breach of law, or make the gamester's calling reputable.

Stuke. Rail on, I say.—But is this zeal for beggared Beverley? Is it for him that I am treated thus? No! he and his wife might both have groaned in prison, had but the sister's fortune escaped the wreck, to have rewarded the disinterested love of honest Mr. Lewson.

Lew. How do I detest thee for the thought! But thou art lost to every human feeling. Yet let me tell thee, and may it wring thy heart, that, though my friend is ruined by thy snares, thou hast unknowingly been kind to me.

Stuke. Have I? It was, indeed, unknowingly.

Lew. Thou hast assisted me in love; given me that merit that I wanted; since but for thee, my Charlotte had not known 'twas her dear self I sighed for, and not her fortune.

Stuke. Thank me, and take her then.

Lew. And as a brother to poor Beverley, I will pursue the robber that has stripped him, and snatch him from his gripe.

Stuke. Then know, imprudent man, he is within my gripe; and should my friendship for him be slandered once again, the hand that has supplied him shall fall and crush him.

Lew. Why, now there's spirit in thee; this is indeed to be a villain! But I shall reach thee yet.—Fly where thou wilt, my vengeance shall pursue thee.—And Beverley shall yet be saved; be saved from thee, thou monster! nor owe his rescue to his wife's dishonour. [Exit.]

Stuke. [Pausing.] Then ruin has inclosed me. Curse on my coward heart! I would be bravely villanous; but 'tis my nature to shrink at danger, and he has found me. Yet fear brings caution, and that security—More mischief must be done to hide the past. Look to yourself, officious Lewson—there may be danger stirring. How now, Bates?

Enter BATES.

Bates. What is the matter? 'Twas Lewson, and not Beverley, that left you—I heard him loud—You seem alarmed too.

Stuke. Ay, and with reason—we are discovered. Bates. I feared as much, and therefore cautioned you—but you were peremptory.

Stuke. Thus fools talk ever; spending their idle breath on what is past, and trembling at the future. We must be active. Beverley, at worst, is but suspicious; but Lewson's genius, and his hate to me, will lay all open. Means must be found to stop him.

Bates. What means?

Stuke. Despatch him. Nay, start not; desperate occasions call for desperate deeds. We live but by his death.

Bates. You cannot mean it?

Stuke. I do, by Heaven.

Bates. Good night, then.

[Going.]

Stuke. Stay—I must be heard, then answered. Perhaps the motion was too sudden, and human weakness starts at murder, though strong necessity compels it. I have thought long of this, and my first feelings were like yours; a foolish conscience awed me, which soon I conquered. The man that would undo me, nature cries out, undo. Brutes know their foes by instinct; and where superior force is given, they use it for destruction. Shall man do less? Lewson pursues us to our ruin; and shall we, with the means to crush him, fly from our hunter, or turn and tear him? 'Tis folly even to hesitate.

Bates. He has obliged me, and I dare not.

Stuke. Why, live to shame, then, to beggary and punishment. You would be privy to the deed, yet want the soul to act it. Nay more, had my designs been levelled at his fortune, you had stepped in the foremost.—And what is life without its comforts? Those you would rob him of; and, by a lingering death, add cruelty to murder. Henceforth, adieu to half-made villains—there's danger in them. What you have got is yours; keep it, and hide with it—I'll deal my future bounty to those that merit it.

Bates. What's the reward?

Stuke. Equal division of our gains. I swear it, and will be just.

Bates. Think of the means then.

Stuke. He's gone to Beverley's—Wait for him in the street—'Tis a dark night, and fit for mischief. A dagger would be useful.

Bates. He sleeps no more.

Stuke. Consider the reward! when the deed's done, I have other business with you. Send Dawson to me.

Bates. Think it already done—and so, farewell.

[Exit.]

Stuke. Why, farewell, Lewson then; and farewell to my fears. This night secures me. I'll wait the event within.

[Exit.]

SCENE II.—The Street.—Stage darkened.

Enter BEVERLEY.

Bev. How like an outcast do I wander! Loaded with every curse that drives the soul to desperation! The midnight robber, as he walks his rounds, sees, by the glimmering lamp, my frantic looks, and dreads to meet me. Whither am I going? My home lies there; all that is dear on earth it holds too; yet are the gates of death more welcome to me—I'll enter it no more—Who passes there? 'Tis Lewson.—He meets me in a gloomy hour; and memory tells me he has been meddling with my fame.

Enter LEWSON.

Lew. Beverley! well met. I have been busy in your affairs.

Bev. So I have heard, Sir; and now I must thank you as I ought.

Lew. To-morrow I may deserve your thanks. Late as it is, I go to Bates. Discoveries are making that an arch villain trembles at.

Bev. Discoveries are made, Sir, that you shall tremble at. Where is this boasted spirit, this high demeanour, that was to call me to account? You say, I have wronged my sister.—Now say as much. But, first be ready for defence, as I am for resentment.

[Draws.]

Lew. What mean you? I understand you not.
Bev. The coward's stale acquaintance! who, when he spreads foul calumny abroad, and dreads just vengeance on him, cries out, "What mean you? I understand you not."

Lew. Coward and calumny! Whence are those words? But I forgive and pity you.

Bev. Your pity had been kinder to my fame: but you have traduced it; told a vile story to the public ear, that I have wronged my sister.

Lew. 'Tis false! Show me the man that dares accuse me.

Bev. I thought you brave, and of a soul superior to low malice; but I have found you, and will have vengeance. This is no place for argument.

Lew. Nor shall it be for violence. Imprudent man! who, in revenge for fancied injuries, would pierce the heart that loves him! But honest friendship acts from itself, unmoved by slander or ingratitude: the life you thirst for shall be employed to serve you.—You know me not.

Bev. Yes; for the slander of my fame—who, under show of friendship, arraigns me of injustice; buzzing in every ear foul breach of trust, and family dishonour.

Lew. Have I done this? Who told you so?

Bev. The world—'Tis talked of every where.—It pleased you to add threats too—You were to call me to account—Why, do it now then; I should be proud of such an arbiter.

Lew. Put up your sword, and know me better. I never injured you. The base suggestion comes from Stukely; I see him and his aims.

Bev. What aims? I'll not conceal it; 'twas Stukely that accused you.

Lew. To rid him of an enemy—Perhaps of two—He fears discovery, and frames a tale of falsehood, to ground revenge and murder on.

Bev. I must have proof of this.

Lew. Wait till to-morrow then.

Bev. I will.

Lew. Good night—I go to serve you—Forget what's past, as I do; and cheer your family with smiles—To-morrow may confirm them, and make all happy.

[Exit.]

Bev. [Pausing.] How vile and how absurd is man! His boasted honour is but another name for pride, which easier bears the consciousness of guilt, than the world's just reproofs! But 'tis the fashion of the times; and in defiance of falsehood and false honour, men die martyrs. I knew not that my nature was so bad.— [Stands musing.]

Enter BATES and JARVIS.

Jar. This way the noise was; and yonder 's my poor master.

Bates. I heard him at high words with Lewson.

Jar. I heard him too. Misfortunes vex him.

Bates. Go to him, and lead him home.—I'll not be seen by him.

[Exit.]

Bev. [Starting.] What fellow's that? [Seeing JARVIS.] Art thou a murderer, friend? Come, lead the way—I have a hand as mischievous as thine; a heart as desperate too.—Jarvis! To bed, old man; the cold will chill thee.

Jar. Why are you wandering at this late hour?

—Your sword drawn too! For Heaven's sake, sheathe it, Sir: the sight distracts me.

Bev. Whose voice is that? [Wildly.]

Jar. 'Twas mine, Sir: let me entreat you to give the sword to me.

Bev. Ay, take it; quickly take it. Perhaps I am not so cursed, but Heaven may have sent thee at this moment to snatch me from perdition.

Jar. Then I am-blessed.

Bev. Continue so, and leave me; my sorrows are contagious. No one is blessed that's near me.

Jar. I came to seek you, Sir.

Bev. And now thou hast found me, leave me. My thoughts are wild, and will not be disturbed.

Jar. Such thoughts are best disturbed.

Bev. Who sent thee hither?

Jar. My weeping mistress.—Alas, forget your griefs, and let me lead you to her. The streets are dangerous.

Bev. Be wise, and leave me then. The night's black horrors are suited to my thoughts.—These stones shall be my resting-place. [Throws himself on the ground.] Here shall my soul brood o'er its miseries; till, with the fiends of hell and guilty of the earth, I start and tremble at the morning's light.

Jar. Let patience, not despair, possess you—Rise, I beseech you.—There's not a moment of your absence that my poor mistress does not mourn for.

Bev. Have I undone her, and is she still so kind? [Starting up.] It is too much—My brain can't hold it. Oh, Jarvis! how desperate is that wretch's state, which only death or madness can relieve!

Jar. Appease his mind, good Heaven, and give him resignation! Alas, Sir, could beings in the other world perceive the events of this, how would your parents' blessed spirits grieve for you, even in heaven!—Let me conjure you, by their honoured memories—by the sweet innocence of your yet helpless child, and by the ceaseless sorrows of my poor mistress, to rouse your manhood, and struggle with these griefs!

Bev. Thou virtuous, good, old man! Thy tears and thy entreaties have reached my heart, through all its miseries.

Jar. Be but resigned, Sir, and happiness may yet be yours. Hark! I hear voices.—Come this way: we may reach home unnoticed.

Bev. Unnoticed, didst thou say? Alas! I dread no looks but of those wretches I have made at home. Oh, had I listened to thy honest warnings, no earthly blessing had been wanting to me; but I have warred against the power that blessed me, and now am sentenced to the hell I merit.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—STUKELY'S Lodgings.

Enter STUKELY and DAWSON.

Stuke. Come hither, Dawson; my limbs are on the rack, and my soul shivers in me, till this night's business be complete.—Tell me thy thoughts; is Bates determined, or does he waver?

Daw. At first, he seemed irresolute; wished the employment had been mine, and muttered curses on his coward hand, that trembled at the deed.

Stuke. And did he leave you so?

Daw. No; we walked together; and, sheltered by the darkness, saw Beverley and Lewson in warm debate: but soon they cooled; and then I left them to hasten hither; but not till 'twas resolved Lewson should die.

Stuke. Thy words have given me life.—That quarrel, too, was fortunate; for, if my hopes deceive me not, it promises a rave to Beverley.

Daw. You misconceive me. Lewson and he were friends.

Stuke. But my prolific brain shall make them enemies. If Lewson falls, he falls by Beverley. Ask me no question, but do as I direct. This writ [Takes out a pocket-book.] for some days past I have treasured here, till a convenient time called for its use. That time is come: take it, and give it to an officer. It must be served this instant.

[Gives a paper.]

Daw. On Beverley?

Stuke. Look at it. It is for the sums that I have lent him.

Daw. Must he to prison then?

Stuke. I ask obedience, not replies. This night a gaol must be his lodging. 'Tis probable he is not gone home yet. Wait at his door, and see it executed.

Daw. Upon a beggar? He has no means of payment.

Stuke. Dull and insensible! If Lewson dies, who was it killed him? Why, he that was seen quarrelling with him; and I, that knew of Beverley's intents, arrested him in friendship.—A little late, perhaps; but it was a virtuous act, and men will thank me for it.—Now, Sir, you understand me.

Daw. Most perfectly; and will about it.

Stuke. Haste, then; and when it is done, come back and tell me.

Daw. Till then, farewell.

[Exit.]

Stuke. Now tell thy tale, fond wife! and Lewson, if again thou can'st, insult me.

Not avarice now, but vengeance fires my breast!
And one short hour must make me curs'd or bless'd. [Exit.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—STUKELY'S Lodgings.

Enter STUKELY, BATES, and DAWSON.

Bates. Poor Lewson!—But I told you enough last night. The thought of him is horrible to me.

Stuke. In the street did you say; and no one near him?

Bates. By his own door; he was leading me to his house. I pretended business with him, and stabbed him to the heart, while he was reaching at the bell.

Stuke. And did he fall so suddenly?

Bates. The repetition pleases you, I see.—I told you he fell without a groan.

Stuke. What heard you of him this morning?

Bates. That the watch found him in their rounds, and alarmed the servants. I mingled with the crowd just now, and saw him dead in his own house. The sight terrified me.

Stuke. A way with terrors, till his ghost rise and accuse us. We have no living enemy to fear, unless 'tis Beverley; and him we have lodged safe in prison.

Bates. Must he be murdered too?

Stuke. No; I have a scheme to make the law his murderer.—At what hour did Lewson fall?

Bates. The clock struck twelve as I turned to leave him. 'Twas a melancholy bell, I thought tolling for his death.

Stuke. The time was lucky for us.—Beverley was arrested at one, you say? [To Dawson.]

Daw. Exactly.

Stuke. Good! We'll talk of this presently.—The women were with him, I think.

Daw. And old Jarvis. I would have told you of them last night, but your thoughts were too busy. 'Tis well you have a heart of stone, the tale would melt it else.

Stuke. Out with it, then.

Daw. I traced him to his lodgings; and, pretending pity for his misfortunes, kept the door open while the officers seized him. 'Twas a damned deed—but no matter—I followed my instructions.

Stuke. And what said he?

Daw. He upbraided me with treachery; called you a villain; acknowledged the sums you had lent him; and submitted to his fortune.

Stuke. And the women?

Daw. For a few moments astonishment kept them silent. They looked wildly at one another, while the tears streamed down their cheeks. But rage and fury soon gave them words; and then, in the very bitterness of despair, they cursed me, and the monster that had employed me.

Stuke. And you bore it with philosophy?

Daw. Till the scene changed, and then I melted. I ordered the officers to take away their prisoner. The women shrieked, and would have followed him; but we forbade them. 'Twas then they fell upon their knees, the wife fainted, the sister raving, and both, with all the eloquence of misery, endeavouring to soften us. I never felt compassion till that moment; and, had the officers been moved like me, we had left the business undone, and fled with curses on ourselves. But their hearts were steeled by custom. The sighs of beauty, and the pangs of affection, were beneath their pity. They tore him from their arms, and lodged him in prison, with only Jarvis to comfort him.

Stuke. There let him lie, till we have further business with him.—But how to proceed will require time and thought.—Come along with me; the room within is fitted for privacy.—But no compassion, Sir. [To Dawson.] We want leisure for't.—This way. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—BEVERLEY'S Lodgings.

Enter MRS. BEVERLEY and CHARLOTTE.

Mrs. B. No news of Lewson yet?

Char. None. He went out early, and knows not what has happened.

Mrs. B. The clock strikes eight; I'll wait no longer. Oh, what a night was last night! I would not pass another such to purchase worlds by it.—My poor Beverley too! What must he have felt?—The very thought distracts me!—To have him torn at midnight from me! A loathsome prison his habitation! A cold damp rooin his lodging! The bleak winds, perhaps, blowing upon his pillow! No fond wife to lull him to his rest! and no reflections but to wound and tear him!—'Tis too horrible!—I wanted love for him, or they had not forced him from me.—They should have parted soul and body first.—I was too tame.

Char. You must not talk so. All that we could we did; and Jarvis did the rest. The faithful creature will give him comfort. See where he comes! His looks are cheerful too!

Enter JARVIS.

Mrs. B. Are tears then cheerful? Alas, he weeps! Speak to him, Charlotte.

Char. How does your master, Jarvis?

Jar. I am old and foolish, Madam; and tears will come before my words. But don't you weep; [To Mrs. BEVERLEY.] I have a tale of joy for you.

Mrs. B. Say but he's well, and I have joy enough.

Jar. All shall be well.—I have news for him, that will make his poor heart bound again. 'Tie upon old age! How childish it makes me! I have a tale of joy for you, and my tears drown it.

Mrs. B. What is it, Jarvis?

Jar. Your uncle, Madam, died yesterday.

Mrs. B. My uncle!—Oh Heavens!

Char. How heard you of his death?

Jar. His steward came express, Madam; I met him in the street, inquiring for your lodgings. I should not rejoice, perhaps—but he was old, and my poor master a prisoner. Now he shall I've again. Oh, 'tis a brave fortune! and 'twas death to me to see him a prisoner.

Char. How did he pass the night, Jarvis?

Jar. Like a man dreaming of death and horrors.—When they led him to his cell, he flung himself upon a wretched bed, and lay speechless till day-break. I spoke to him, but he would not hear me; and when I persisted, he raised his hand at me, and knit his brow so—I thought he would have struck me. I bid him be of comfort.—Be gone, old wretch, says he. My wife! my child! my sister! I have undone them all, and will know no comfort! Then, falling upon his knees, he imprecated curses upon himself.

Mrs. B. This is too horrible! But we have staid too long. Let us haste to comfort him, or die with him. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—A Prison.

BEVERLEY is discovered, sitting.

Bev. Why there's an end then; I have judged deliberately, and the result is death! How the self-murderer's account may stand I know not, but this I know—the load of hateful life oppresses me too much.—The horrors of my soul are more than I can bear [Offers to kneel.] Father of mercy!—I cannot pray—Despair has laid his iron hand upon me, and sealed me for perdition—Conscience! conscience! thy clamours are too loud!—Here's that shall silence thee. [Takes a vial out of his pocket, and looks at it.] Thou art most friendly to the miserable. Come then, thou cordial for sick minds—Come to my heart. [Drinks.] Oh, that the grave would bury memory as well as body! For if the soul sees and feels the sufferings of those dear ones it leaves behind, the Everlasting has no vengeance to torment it deeper—I'll think no more on't—Reflection comes too late—Once there was a time for't—but now 'tis past.—Who's there?

Enter JARVIS.

Jar. One that hoped to see you with better looks—Why do you turn so from me? I have brought comfort with me. And see who comes to give it welcome!

Bev. My wife and sister! Why 'tis but one pang more, and then, farewell, world!

Enter MRS. BEVERLEY and CHARLOTTE.

Mrs. B. Where is he? [Runs and embraces him.] Oh, I have him! I have him! And now they shall never part us more—I have news, love, to make you happy for ever. Alas, he hears us not!—Speak to me, love. I have no heart to see you thus.

Bev. This is a sad place!

Mrs. B. We come to take you from it—to tell you the world goes well again—that Providence has seen our sorrows, and sent the means to help them. Your uncle died yesterday.

Bev. My uncle!—No, do not say so!—Oh, I am sick at heart!

Mrs. B. Indeed! I meant to bring you comfort. Bev. Tell me he lives then—If you would bring me comfort, tell me he lives!

Mrs. B. And if I did—I have no power to raise the dead—He died yesterday.

Bev. And am I heir to him?

Jar. To his whole estate, Sir—But bear it patiently—pray, bear it patiently.

Bev. Well, well—[Pausing.] Why fame says I am rich then?

Mrs. B. And truly so—Why do you look so wildly?

Bev. Do I? The news was unexpected.—But has he left me all?

Jar. All, all, Sir. He could not leave it from you.

Bev. I am sorry for it.

Mrs. B. Why are you disturbed so?

Bev. Has death no terrors in it?

Mrs. B. Not an old man's death. Yet, if it troubles you, I wish him living.

Bev. And I, with all my heart, for I have a tale to tell, shall turn you into stone; or, if the power of speech remain, you shall kneel down and curse me.

Mrs. B. Alas! what tale is this? and why are we to curse you?—I'll bless you for ever.

Bev. No, I have deserved no blessings; the world holds not such another wretch. All this large fortune, this second bounty of Heaven, that might have healed our sorrows, and satisfied our utmost hopes, in a cursed hour I sold last night.

Char. Sold! how sold?

Mrs. B. Impossible!—it cannot be.

Bev. That devil Stukely, with all hell to aid him, tempted me to the deed. To pay false debts of honour, and to redeem past errors, I sold the reversion—Sold it for a scanty sum, and lost it among villains.

Char. Why, farewell all then.

Bev. Liberty and life. Come, kneel and curse me.

Mrs. B. Then hear me, Heaven! [Kneels.] Look down with mercy on his sorrows! give softness to his looks, and quiet to his heart! take from his memory the sense of what is past, and cure him of despair! On me! on me! if misery must be the lot of either, multiply misfortunes! I'll bear them patiently, so he is happy: these hands shall toil for his support, these eyes be lifted up for hourly blessings on him; and every duty of a fond and faithful wife be doubly done to cheer and comfort him!—So hear me! so reward me! [Rises.]

Bev. I would kneel too, but that offended Heaven would turn my prayers into curses; for I have done a deed, to make life horrible to you—

Jar. Ask him no questions, Madam. This last misfortune has hurt his brain: a little time will give him patience.

Enter STUKELY.

Bev. Why is this villain here?

Stuke. To give you liberty and safety. There, Madam, is his discharge. [Giving a paper to Mrs. BEVERLEY.] Let him fly this moment. The arrest last night was meant in friendship, but came too late.

Char. What mean you, Sir?

Stuke. The arrest was too late, I say; I would have kept his hands from blood—but was too late.

Mrs. B. His hands from blood—Whose blood?

Stuke. From Lewson's blood.

Char. No, villain! yet what of Lewson? Speak quickly.

Stuke. You are ignorant, then; I thought I heard the murderer at confession.

Char. What murderer!—And who is murdered? not Lewson!—Say he lives, and I'll kneel and worship you.

Stuke. In pity, so I would: but that the tongues of all cry murder: I came in pity, not in malice, to save the brother, not kill the sister. Your Lewson's dead.

Char. Oh, horrible!

Bev. Silence; I charge you—Proceed, Sir.

Stuke. No, justice may stop the tale—and here's an evidence.

Enter BATES.

Bates. The news, I see, has reached you; but take comfort, Madam. [To CHAR.] There's one without inquiring for you—Go to him, and lose no time.

Char. O misery! misery! misery! [Exit.]
Mrs. B. Follow her, Jarvis; if it be true that Lewson's dead, her grief may kill her.

Bates. Jarvis must stay here, Madam: I have some questions for him.

Stuke. Rather let him fly; his evidence may crush his master.

Bev. Why ay, this looks like management.

Bates. He found you quarrelling with Lewson in the street last night. [To BEV.]

Mrs. B. No, I am sure he did not.

Jar. Or if I did—

Mrs. B. 'Tis false, old man—They had no quarrel: there was no cause for quarrel.

Bev. Let him proceed, I say—Oh! I am sick! sick!—Reach me a chair. [He sits down.]

Mrs. B. If Lewson's dead, you killed him not.

Enter DAWSON.

Stuke. Who sent for Dawson?

Bates. 'Twas I—We have a witness too, you little think of—Without, there.

Stuke. What witness?

Bates. A right one. Look at him.

Enter LEWSON and CHARLOTTE.

Stuke. Lewson! O villains! villains!

[To BATES and DAWSON.]

Mrs. B. Risen from the dead! why, this is unexpected happiness!

Char. Or is it his ghost? [To STUKELY.]—That sight would please you, Sir.

Jar. What riddle's this?

Bev. Be quick and tell it. My minutes are but few.

Mrs. B. Alas! why so? you shall live long and happily.

Lew. While shame and punishment shall rack that viper. [Pointing to STUKELY.]—The tale is short—I was too busy in his secrets, and therefore doomed to die: Bates, to prevent the murder, undertook it. I kept aloof to give it credit.

Char. And gave me pangs unutterable.

Lew. I felt them all, and would have told you.—But vengeance wanted ripening. The villain's scheme was but half executed. The arrest by Dawson followed the supposed murder—And now, depending on his once wicked associates, he comes to fix the guilt on Beverley.

Mrs. B. Oh! execrable wretch!

Bates. Dawson and I are witnesses of this.

Lew. And of a thousand frauds; his fortune ruined by sharpers and false dice; and Stukely sole contriver and possessor of all.

Daw. Had he but stopped on this side murder, we had been villains still.

Mrs. B. Thus Heaven turns evil into good; and, by permitting sin, warns men to virtue.

Lew. Yet punishes the instrument: so shall our laws, though not with death: but death were mercy. Shame, beggary, and imprisonment: unpitied misery, the stings of conscience, and the curses of mankind, shall make life hateful to him—till at last his own hand end him. How does my friend? [To BEV.]

Bev. Why, well; who is he that asks me?

Mrs. B. 'Tis Lewson, love—Why do you look so at him?

Bev. They told me he was murdered. [Wildly.]

Mrs. B. Ay, but he lives to save us.

Bev. Lend me your hand—the room turns round.

Mrs. B. Oh! Heaven.

Lew. This villain here disturbs him: remove him from his sight—And for your lives see that you guard him. [STUKELY is taken off by Dawson and BATES.] How is it now, Sir?

Bev. 'Tis here—and here, [Pointing to his head and heart.] and now it tears me!

Mrs. B. You feel convulsed too—What is't disturbs you?

Bev. A furnace rages in this heart.—Down, restless flames!—[Laying his hand on his heart.] down to your native hell—there you shall rack me—Oh! for a pause from pain! Where's my wife? Can you forgive me, love?

Mrs. B. Alas! for what?

Bev. For meanly dying.

Mrs. B. No—do not say it.

Bev. As truly as my soul must answer it.—

Had Jarvis staid this morning, all had been well. But, pressed by shame—pent in a prison—tormented with my pangs for you—driven to despair and madness—I took the advantage of his absence, corrupted the poor wretch he left to guard me, and swallowed—poison.

Lew. O fatal deed!

Char. Dreadful and cruel!

Bev. Ay, most accursed—And now I go to my account.—Bend me and let me kneel. [They lift him from his chair, he kneels.] I'll pray for you too.—Thou Power that madest me, hear me; if, for a life of frailty, and this too hasty deed of death, thy justice dooms me, here I acquit the sentence. But if, enthroned in mercy where thou sittest, thy pity has beheld me, send me a gleam of hope, that in these last and bitter moments my soul may taste of comfort! and for these mourners here, O let their lives be peaceful, and their deaths happy! [They lift him to the chair.]

Mrs. B. Restore him, Heaven! Oh save him! save him! or let me die too.

Bev. No, live, I charge you.—We have a little one. Though I have left him, you will not leave him.—To Lewson's kindness I bequeath him—Is not this Charlotte? we have lived in love, though I have wronged you;—can you forgive me, Charlotte?

Char. Forgive you!—O, my poor brother!

Bev. Oh! for a few short moments, to tell you how my heart bleeds for you—that even now, thus dying as I am, dubious and fearful of hereafter, my bosom pang is for your miseries. Support her, Heaven!—And now, I go—Oh mercy, mercy! [Dies.]

Lew. Then all is over—How is it, Madam?

—My poor Charlotte, too!

Char. Her grief is speechless.

Lew. Remove her from this sight—Lead and support her. Some ministering angel bring her peace! [CHARLOTTE leads her off.] And thou poor, breathless corse, may thy departed soul have found the rest it prayed for! save but one error, and this last fatal deed, thy life was lovely. Let frailer minds take warning; and from example learn, that want of prudence is want of virtue.

*Follies, if uncontrolled, of every kind,
Grow into passions, and subdue the mind;
With sense and reason hold superior strife,
And conquer honour, nature, fame and life.*

THE SUSPICIOUS HUSBAND:

A COMEDY,

IN FIVE ACTS.

BY DR. HOADLY.

REMARKS.

This comedy arose at the time when a systematic opposition to new pieces placed the hapless authors in double peril; but, in the instance before us, all prejudice gradually subsided, and the Suspicious Husband continued to attract crowded houses as frequently as any modern comedy on the list. What Mr. Foote has said of this play is so just, that we shall transcribe it here.

"Most of the characters are real; the incidents are interesting; the catastrophe pleasing; and the language pure, spirited, and natural. Among the scenes in which the author designed to ridicule the absurdity of suspicion, is that where Mr. Strickland is desirous, and yet afraid, of engaging his domestics in the service of his passion. His perplexity, his resolutions, and hesitations, make up so natural and so comic a description of that disease of the mind, that the play, were there no other reason, deserves the highest commendation.

Mrs. Strickland's innocence, joined to her other amiable qualities, interests the audience in her favour.

The two fine gentlemen, Frankly and Bellamy, differ little from the fine gentlemen of other writers; they laugh, sing, say good things, and are in love.

"The rake is a lively portrait of that character in life; his errors arise from the want of reflection. A lively imagination, with a great flow of spirits, hurries him into all the follies of the town; but there is not the least shadow of wickedness or dishonour in any of his actions: he avoids both with the same care that he would a precipice. Our author was willing to try whether Italy could furnish a fool as ridiculous and diverting as our neighbours of France. But no sooner has Jack Meggot raised our attention, than he slips through our fingers like an eel, and we hear no more of him till the last scene. He does, in truth, survive the loss of his monkey, but is never tolerable company after." The Roman and English Comedy compared.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—RANGER's Chambers in the Temple.

A knocking is heard at the door for some time; when RANGER enters, having let himself in.

Ran. Once more I am got safe to the Temple. Let me reflect a little. I have sat up all night; I have my head full of bad wine, and the noise of oaths, dice, and the damned tingling of tavern bells; my spirits jaded, and my eyes sunk in my head; and all this for the conversation of a company of fellows I despise. Their wit lies only in obscenity, their mirth in noise, and their delight in a box and dice. Honest Ranger, take my word for it, thou art a mighty silly fellow.

Enter a SERVANT.

Where have you been, rascal? If I had not had the key in my pocket, I must have waited at the door in this dainty dress.

Serv. I was only below, brushing your honour's coat.

Ran. Well, get breakfast.—Why, how like a raking dog do you look, compared to that spruce sober gentleman. [Aside.] Go, you battered devil, and be made fit to be seen.

[Throwing his hat to the SERVANT.

Serv. 'Egad, my master's very merry this morning. [Exit.

Ran. And now for the law.

[Sits down and reads.

*Tell me no more, I am deceiv'd,
That Chloe's false and common;
By Heaven, I all along believ'd,
She was a very woman.
As such I liked, as such caress'd;
She still was constant when possess'd;
She could do more for no man.*

Honest Congreve was a man after my own heart.

Enter SERVANT.

Have you been for the money this morning, as I ordered you?

Serv. No, Sir; you bade me go before you was up; I did not know your honour meant before you went to bed.

Ran. None of your jokes, I pray; but to business. Go to the coffee-house, and inquire if there has been any letter or message left for me. [Exit.

Serv. I shall, Sir.

Ran. [Reads.] You think she's false, I'm sure she's kind,

*I take her body, you her mind;
Which has the better bargain?*

Oh that I had such a soft deceitful fair to lull my senses to their desired sleep. [Knocking at the door.] Come in.

Enter SIMON.

Oh, Master Simon, is it you? How long have you been in town?

Sim. Just come, Sir, and but for a little time neither; and yet I have as many messages as if we were to stay the whole year round. Here they are, all of them. [Pulls out a number of cards.] And among them one for your honour.

Ran. [Reads.] Clarinda's compliments to her cousin Ranger, and should be glad to see him for ever so little a time that he can be spared from the more weighty business of the law.— Ha, ha, ha! the same merry girl I ever knew her.

Sim. My lady is never sad, Sir.

[Knock at the door.

Ran. Pr'ythee, Simon, open the door.

Enter MILLINER.

Well, child—and who are you?

Mil. Sir, my mistress gives her service to you, and has sent you home the linen you bespoke.

VOL. I. . . . 3 d

Ran. Well, Simon, my service to your lady, and let her know I will most certainly wait upon her. I am a little busy, Simon—and so—

Sim. Ah, you're a wag, Master Ranger, you're a wag—but mum for that. [Exit.

Ran. I swear, my dear, you have the prettiest pair of eyes—the loveliest pouting lips—I never saw you before.

Mil. No, Sir! I was always in the shop.

Ran. Were you so? Well, and what does your mistress say?—The devil fetch me, child, you looked so prettily, that I could not mind one word you said.

Mil. Lard, Sir, you are such another gentleman! Why, she says she is sorry she could not send them sooner. Shall I lay them down?

Ran. No, child; give 'em to me—Dear, little, smiling angel— [Catches and kisses her.

Mil. I beg, Sir, you would be civil.

Ran. Civil! 'Egad, I think I am very civil.

[Kisses her.

Re-enter a SERVANT, with BELLAMY.

Serv. Sir, Mr. Bellamy. [Exit.

Ran. Damn your impertinence. [Aside.]—Oh, Mr. Bellamy, your servant.

Mil. What shall I say to my mistress?

Ran. Bid her make half a dozen more; but be sure you bring them home yourself. [Exit MILLINER.] Pshaw! Pox! Mr. Bellamy, how should you like to be served so yourself?

Bel. How can you, Ranger, for a minute's pleasure, give an innocent girl the pain of heart I am confident she felt?—There was a modest blush upon her cheek convinces me she is honest.

Ran. May be so. I was resolved to try, however, had not you interrupted the experiment.

Bel. Fie, Ranger, will you never think!

Ran. Yes, but I can't be always a thinking. The law is a damnable dry study, Mr. Bellamy, and without something now and then to amuse and relax, it would be too much for my brain, I promise ye—but I am a mighty sober fellow grown. Here have I been at it these three hours, but the wenches will never let me alone.

Bel. Three hours! Why, do you usually study in such shoes and stockings?

Ran. Rat your inquisitive eyes. Ex pede Herculeum. 'Egad, you have me. The truth is, I am but this moment returned from the tavern. What, Frankly here too!

Enter FRANKLY.

Frank. My boy, Ranger, I am heartily glad to see you; Bellamy, let me embrace you; you are the person I want; I have been at your lodgings, and was directed hither.

Ran. It is to him then I am obliged for this visit; but with all my heart. He is the only man to whom I don't care how much I am obliged.

Bel. Your humble servant, Sir.

Frank. You know, Ranger, I want no inducement to be with you. But—you look sadly—What—no merciless jade has—has she?

Ran. No, no: sound as a roach, my lac. I only got a little too much liquor last night, which I have not slept off yet.

Bel. Thus, Frankly, it is every day. All the morning his head aches; at noon he begins to clear up; towards evening he is good company, and all night he is carefully providing for the same course the next day.

Ran. Why, I must own, my ghostly father, I did relapse a little last night, just to furnish out a decent confession for the day.

Frank. And he is now doing penance for it. Were you his confessor, indeed, you could not well desire more.

Ran. Charles, he sets up for a confessor with the worst grace in the world. Here has he been reproving me for being but decently civil to my milliner. Plague! because the coldness of his constitution makes him insensible of a fine woman's charms, every body else must be so too.

Bel. I am no less sensible of their charms than you are, though I cannot kiss every woman I meet, or fall in love, as you call it, with every face which has the bloom of youth upon it. I would only have you a little more frugal of your pleasures.

Frank. My dear friend, this is very pretty talking! but let me tell you, it is in the power of the very first glance from a fine woman utterly to disconcert all your philosophy.

Bel. It must be from a fine woman then, and not such as are generally reputed so. And it must be a thorough acquaintance with her too, that will ever make an impression on my heart.

Ran. Would I could see it once! for, when a man has been all his life hoarding up a stock, without allowing himself common necessities, it tickles me to the soul to see him lay it all out upon a wrong bottom, and become bankrupt at last.

Bel. Well, I don't care how soon you see it. For the minute I find a woman capable of friendship, love, and tenderness, with good sense enough to be always easy, and good nature enough to like me, I will immediately put it to the trial, which of us shall have the greatest share of happiness from the sex, you or I.

Ran. By marrying her, I suppose? capable of friendship, love, and tenderness! ha, ha, ha! that a man of your sense should talk so. If she be capable of love, 'tis all I require of my mistress; and as every woman, who is young, is capable of love, I am very reasonably in love with every young woman I meet. My lord Coke, in a case I read this morning, speaks my sense.

Bel. Frank. My lord Coke?

Ran. Yes, my lord Coke. What he says of one woman, I say of the whole sex:

*I take their bodies, you their minds;
Which has the better bargain?*

Frank. There is no arguing with so great a lawyer. Suppose, therefore, we adjourn the debate to some other time. I have some serious business with Mr. Bellamy, and you want sleep, I am sure.

Ran. Sleep! mere loss of time and hinderance of business.—We men of spirit, Sir, are above it.

Bel. Whither shall we go?

Frank. Into the park. My chariot is at the door.

Bel. Then if my servant calls, you'll send him after us?

[Exit BELLAMY and FRANKLY.]

Ran. I will. [Looks on the card.]—Clarinda's compliments.—A pox of this head of mine! never once to ask where she was to be found. It's plain she is not one of us, or I should not have been so remiss in my inquiries. No matter; I shall meet her in my walks.

Re-enter a SERVANT.

Serv. There is no letter nor message, Sir.

Ran. Then my things, to dress.

[Exit SERVANT.]

*I take her body, you her mind;
Which has the better bargain?*

[Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Chamber.

Enter MRS. STRICTLAND and JACINTHA, meeting.

Mrs. S. Good morrow, my dear Jacintha.

Jac. Good morrow to you, Madam. I have brought my work, and intend to sit with you this morning. I hope you have got the better of your fatigue. Where is Clarinda? I should be glad if she would come and work with us.

Mrs. S. She work! she is too fine a lady to do any thing. She is not stirring yet—we must let her have her rest. People of her waste of spirits require more time to recruit again.

Jac. It is pity she should be ever tired with what is so agreeable to every body else. I am prodigiously pleased with her company.

Mrs. S. And when you are better acquainted, you will be still more pleased with her. You must rally her upon her partner at Bath; for I fancy part of her rest has been disturbed on his account.

Jac. Was he really a pretty fellow?

Mrs. S. That I can't tell; I did not dance myself, and so did not much mind him. You must have the whole story from herself.

Jac. Oh, I warrant ye, I get it all out. None are so proper to make discoveries in love, as those who are in the secret themselves.

Enter LUCETTA.

Luc. Madam, Mr. Strictland is inquiring for you. Here has been Mr. Buckle with a letter from his master, which has made him very angry.

Jac. Mr. Bellamy said indeed he would try him once more, but I fear it will prove in vain. Tell your master I am here. [Exit LUCETTA.] What signifies fortune, when it only makes us slaves to other people?

Mrs. S. Do not be uneasy, my Jacintha. You shall always find a friend in me; but as for Mr. Strictland, I know not what ill temper hangs about him lately—nothing satisfies him. You saw how he received us when we came off our journey. Though Clarinda was so good company, he was barely civil to her, and downright rude to me.

Jac. I cannot help saying, I did observe it.

Mrs. S. I saw you did. Hush! he's here.

Enter STRICTLAND.

Strict. Oh, your servant, Madam! Here, I have received a letter from Mr. Bellamy, wherein he desires I would once more hear what he has to say. You know my sentiment; nay, so does he.

Jac. For Heaven's sake, consider, Sir, this is no new affair, no sudden start of passion: we have known each other long. My father valued and loved him, and I am sure, were he alive, I should have his consent.

Strict. Don't tell me. Your father would not have you marry against his will, neither will I against mine. I am your father now.

Jac. And you take a fatherly care of me.

Strict. I wish I had never had any thing to do with you.

Jac. You may easily get rid of the trouble.

Strict. By listening, I suppose, to the young gentleman's proposals?

Jac. Which are very reasonable, in my opinion.

Strict. Oh, very modest ones truly; and a very modest gentleman he is that proposes them! A fool, to expect a lady of thirty thousand pounds fortune should, by the care and prudence of her guardian, be thrown away upon a young fellow not worth three hundred a year. He thinks being in love is an excuse for this; but I am not in love: what does he think will excuse me?

Mrs. S. Well; but, Mr. Strictland, I think the gentleman should be heard.

Strict. Well, well, seven o'clock 's the time; and if the man has had the good fortune, since I saw him last, to persuade somebody or other to give him a better estate, I give him my consent, not else. His servant waits below: you may tell him I shall be at home. [Exit JACINTHA.] But where is your friend, your other half, all this while? I thought you could not have breathed a minute without your Clarinda.

Mrs. S. Why the truth is, I was going to see what makes her keep her chamber so long.

Strict. Lookye, Mrs. Strictland, you have been asking for money this morning. In plain terms, not one shilling shall pass through these fingers, till you have cleared my house of this Clarinda.

Mrs. S. How can her innocent gayety have offended you? she is a woman of honour, and has as many good qualities—

Strict. As women of honour generally have. I know it, and therefore am uneasy.

Mrs. S. But, Sir—

Strict. But, Madam—Clarinda, nor e'er a rake of fashion in England, shall live in my family to debauch it.

Mrs. S. Sir, she treated me with so much civility in the country, that I thought I could not do less than invite her to spend as much time with me in town as her engagements would permit. I little imagined you could have been displeas'd at my having so agreeable a companion.

Strict. There was a time when I was company enough for leisure hours.

Mrs. S. There was a time when every word of mine was sure of meeting with a smile; but those happy days, I know not why, have long been over.

Strict. I cannot bear a rival even of your own sex. I hate the very name of female friends. No two of you can ever be an hour by yourselves, but one or both are the worse of it.

Mrs. S. Dear Mr. Strictland—

Strict. This I know, and will not suffer.

Mrs. S. It grieves me, Sir, to see you so much in earnest: but, to convince you how willing I am to make you easy in every thing, it shall be my request to her to remove immediately.

Strict. Do it—harkye—your request?—Why yours?—'tis mine—my command—tell her so. I will be master of my own family, and I care not who knows it.

Mrs. S. You fright me, Sir.—But it shall be as you please. [Exit, in tears.]

Strict. Ha! have I gone too far? I am not master of myself. Mrs. Strictland!

Re-enter MRS. STRICTLAND.

Understand me right. I do not mean, by what I have said, that I suspect your innocence; but by crushing this growing friendship all at once, I may prevent a train of mischief which you do not foresee. I was perhaps too harsh, therefore do it in your own way; but let me see the house fairly rid of her. [Exit.]

Mrs. S. His earnestness in this affair amazes me; I am sorry I made this visit to Clarinda; and yet I'll answer for her honour. What can I say to her? Necessity must plead in my excuse—for at all events Mr. Strictland must be obeyed. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—ST. JAMES'S Park.

Enter BELLAMY and FRANKLY.

Bel. Is love the secret Ranger is not fit to hear? In my mind, he would prove the more able counsellor. And is all the gay indifference of my friend at last reduced to love?

Frank. Even so.—Never was prude more resolute in chastity and ill nature, than I was fixed in indifference; but love has raised me from that inactive state above the being of a man.

Bel. Faith, Charles, I begin to think it has; but pray bring this rupture into order a little, and tell me regularly, how, where, and when.

Frank. If I was not more unreasonably in love, those horrid questions would stop my mouth at once; but as I am armed against reason—I answer—at Bath, on Tuesday, she danced and caught me.

Bel. Danced! and was that all? But who is she? what is her name? her fortune? where does she live?

Frank. Hold! hold! not so many hard questions; have a little mercy. I know but little of her, that's certain; but all I do know you shall have. That evening was the first of her appearing at Bath; the moment I saw her, I resolved to ask the favour of her hand; but the easy freedom with which she gave it, and her unaffected good humour during the whole night, gained such a power over my heart, as none of her sex could ever boast before. I waited on her home, and the next morning, when I went to pay the usual compliments, the bird was flown; she was set out for London two hours before, and in a chariot and six, you rogue.

Bel. But was it her own, Charles?

Frank. That I don't know; but it looks better than being dragged to town in the stage. That day and the next I spent in inquiries. I waited on the ladies who came with her; they knew no thing of her. So, without learning either her name or fortune, I e'en called for my boots, and rode post after her.

Bel. And how do you find yourself after your journey?

Frank. Why, as yet, I own I am but upon a cold scent: but a woman of her sprightliness and gentility cannot but frequent all public places and when once she is found, the pleasure of the chase will over-pay the pains of rousing her. Oh Bellamy! there was something peculiarly charming in her, that seemed to claim my further acquaintance; and if in the other more familiar parts of life she shines with that superior lustre, and at last I win her to my arms, how shall I bless my resolution in pursuing her!

Bel. But if at last she should prove unworthy—

Frank. I would endeavour to forget her.

Bel. Promise me that, Charles, [Takes his hand.] and I allow—But we are interrupted.

Enter JACK MEGGOT.

J. Meg. Whom have we here? My old friend, Frankly! thou art grown a mere antique since I saw thee. How hast thou done these five hundred years?

Frank. Even as you see me; well, and at your service ever.

J. Meg. Ha! who's that?

[Apart to FRANKLY.

Frank. A friend of mine. [Apart.] Mr. Bellamy, this is Jack Meggot, Sir, as honest a fellow as any in life.

J. Meg. Pho! pry'thee! pox! Charles—Don't be silly.—Sir, I am your humble: any one who is a friend of my Frankly's, I am proud of embracing.

Bel. Sir, I shall endeavour to deserve your civility.

J. Meg. Oh, Sir!—Well, Charles; what, dumb!—Come, come, you may talk, though you have nothing to say, as I do. Let us hear; where have you been?

Frank. Why, for this last week, Jack, I have been at Bath.

J. Meg. Bath! the most ridiculous place in life! amongst tradesmen's wives who hate their husbands, and people of quality that had rather go to the devil than stay at home—people of no taste, no gout; and for divertimenti, if it were not for the puppet-show, la vertu would be dead amongst you. But the news, Charles; the ladies—I fear your time hung heavy on your hands, by the small stay you made there.

Frank. Faith, and so it did, Jack; the ladies are grown such idiots in love. The cards have so debauched their five senses, that love, almighty love himself, is utterly neglected.

J. Meg. It is the strangest thing in life, but it is just so with us abroad. Faith, Charles, to tell you a secret which I don't care if all the world knows, I am almost surfeited with the service of the ladies; the modest ones, I mean. The vast variety of duties they expect, as dressing up to the fashion, losing fashionably, keeping fashionable hours, drinking fashionable liquors, and fifty other such irregular niceties, so ruin a man's pocket and constitution, that, 'fore gad, he must have the estate of a duke, and the strength of a gondolier, who would list himself into their service.

Frank. A free confession truly, Jack, for one of your coat.

Bel. The ladies are obliged to you.

Enter BUCKLE, with a letter to BELLAMY.

J. Meg. Oh lard, Charles! I have had the greatest misfortune in life since I saw you: poor Otho, that I brought from Rome with me is dead.

Frank. Well, well, get you another, and all will be well again.

J. Meg. No; the rogue broke me so much china, and gnawed my Spanish-leather shoes so filthily, that when he was dead, I began not to endure him.

Bel. Exactly at seven! Run back and assure him I will not fail. [Exit BUCKLE.] Dead! pray who was the gentleman?

J. Meg. This gentleman was my monkey, Sir; an odd sort of a fellow, that used to divert me, and pleased every one so at Rome, that he always made one in our conversations. But, Mr. Bellamy, I saw a servant; I have no engagement, for you two positively shall dine with me: I have the finest macaroni in life. Oblige me so far.

Bel. Sir, your servant; what say you, Frankly?

J. Meg. Pho! pox! Charles, you shall go. My aunts think you begin to neglect them; and old maids, you know, are the most jealous creatures in life.

Frank. Ranger swears they can't be maids, they are so good-natured. Well, I agree, on condition I may eat what I please, and go away just when I will.

J. Meg. Ay, ay, you shall do just what you will. But how shall we do? my post-chaise wont carry us all.

Frank. My chariot is here, and I will conduct Mr. Bellamy.

Bel. Mr. Meggot, I beg pardon, I can't possibly dine out of town; I have an engagement early in the evening.

J. Meg. Out of town! No, my dear, I live just by. I see one of the dilettanti I would not miss speaking to for the universe. And so I expect you at three. [Exit.]

Frank. Ha, ha, ha! and so you thought you had at least fifty miles to go post for a spoonful of macaroni?

Bel. A special acquaintance I have made to-day!

Frank. For all this, Bellamy, he has a heart worthy your friendship. He spends his estate freely; and you cannot oblige him more than by showing him how he can be of service to you.

Bel. Now you say something. It is the heart, Frankly, I value in a man.

Frank. Right—and there is a heart even in a woman's breast that is worth the purchase, or my judgment has deceived me. Dear Bellamy, I know your concern for me; see her first, and then blame me if you can.

Bel. So far from blaming you, Charles, that if my endeavours can be serviceable, I will beat the bushes with you.

Frank. That I am afraid will not do; for you know less of her than I; but if, in your walks, you meet a finer woman than ordinary, let her not escape till I have seen her. Wheresoever she is, she cannot long be hid. [Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—St. James' Park.

Enter CLARINDA, JACINTHA, and MRS. STRICTLAND.

Jac. Ay, ay, we both stand condemned out of our own mouths.

Cl. Why, I cannot but own I never had thought of any man that troubled me but him.

Mrs. S. Then I dare swear, by this time, you heartily repent your leaving Bath so soon.

Cl. Indeed, you are mistaken. I have not had one scruple since.

Jac. Why, what one inducement can he have ever to think of you again?

Cl. Oh, the greatest of all inducements, curiosity: let me assure you a woman's surest hold over a man is to keep him in uncertainty. As soon as ever you put him out of doubt, you put him out of your power: but, when once a woman has awaked his curiosity, she may lead him a dance of many a troublesome mile, without the least fear of losing him at last.

Jac. Now do I heartily wish he may have spirit enough to follow, and use you as you deserve. Such a spirit, with but a little knowledge of our sex, might put that heart of yours into a strange flutter.

Cl. I care not how soon. I long to meet with such a fellow. Our modern beaux are such joint-babies in love, they have no feeling; they are entirely insensible either of pain or pleasure but from their own dear persons; and according as we flatter or affront their beauty, they admire or forsake ours: they are not worthy even of our displeasure: and, in short, abusing them is but so much ill nature merely thrown away. But the man of sense, who values himself upon his high abilities, or the man of wit, who thinks a woman beneath his conversation—to see such the subjects of our power, the slaves of our frowns and smiles, is glorious indeed!

Mrs. S. No man of sense, or wit either, if he be truly so, ever did or ever can think a woman of merit beneath his wisdom to converse with.

Jac. Nor will such a woman value herself upon making such a lover uneasy.

Cl. Amazing! Why, every woman can give ease. You cannot be in earnest.

Mrs. S. I can assure you she is, and has put in practice the doctrine she has been teaching.

Cl. Impossible! Who ever heard the name of love mentioned without an idea of torment? But pray let us hear.

Jac. Nay, there is nothing to hear, that I know of.

Cl. So I suspected indeed. The novel is not likely to be long, when the lady is so well prepared for the denouement.

Jac. The novel, as you call it, is not so short as you may imagine. I and my spark have been long acquainted: as he was continually with my father, I soon perceived he loved me; and the manner of his expressing that love was what pleased and won me most.

Cl. Well, and how was it? the old bait, flattery; dear flattery, I warrant ye.

Jac. No, indeed; I had not the pleasure of hearing my person, wit, and beauty, painted out with forced praises; but I had a more sensible delight, in perceiving the drift of his whole behaviour was to make every hour of my time pass away agreeably.

Cl. The rustic! what did he never say a handsome thing of your person?

Mrs. S. He did, it seems, what pleased her better; he flattered her good sense, as much as a less cunning lover would have done her beauty.

Cl. On my conscience, you are well matched.

Jac. So well, that if my guardian denies me happiness (and this evening he is to pass his final sentence,) nothing is left but to break my prison, and fly into my lover's arms for safety.

Cl. Hey-day! o'my conscience, thou art a brave girl. Thou art the very first prude that ever had honesty enough to avow her passion for a man.

Jac. And thou art the first finished coquette who ever had any honesty at all.

Mrs. S. Come, come; you are both too good for either of those characters.

Cl. And my dear Mrs. Strictland here, is the first young married woman of spirit who has an ill-natured fellow for a husband, and never once thinks of using him as he deserves.—Good Heaven! If I had such a husband—

Mrs. S. You would be just as unhappy as I am!

Cl. But come now, confess—do not you long to be a widow?

Mrs. S. Would I were any thing but what I am!

Cl. Then go the nearest way about it. I'd break that stout heart of his in less than a fortnight. I'd make him know—

Mrs. S. Pray, be silent. You know my resolution.

Cl. I know you have no resolution.

Mrs. S. You are a mad creature, but I forgive you.

Cl. It is all meant kindly, I assure you. But since you wont be persuaded to your good, I will think of making you easy in your submission, as soon as ever I can. I dare say I may have the same lodging I had last year: I can know immediately.—I see my chair: and so, ladies both, adieu. [Exit.]

Jac. Come, Mrs. Strictland, we shall but just have time to get home before Mr. Bellamy returns.

Mrs. S. Let us return then to our common prison. You must forgive my ill nature, Jacintha, if I almost wish Mr. Strictland may refuse to join your hand where your heart is given.

Jac. Lord, Madam, what do you mean?

Mrs. S. Self-interest only, child. Methinks your company in the country would soften all my sorrows, and I could bear them patiently.

Re-enter CLARINDA.

Cl. Dear Mrs. Strictland.—I am so confused, and so out of breath—

Mrs. S. Why, what's the matter?

Jac. I protest, you fright me.

Cl. Oh! I have no time to recover myself, I am so frightened and so pleased. In short then, the dear man is here.

Mrs. S. Here—Lord—Where?

Cl. I met him this instant; I saw him at a distance, turned short, and ran hither directly. Let us go home.—I tell you he follows me.

Mrs. S. Why, had you not better stay, and let him speak to you.

Cl. Ay!—But then—he wont know where I live, without my telling him.

Mrs. S. Come then. Ha, ha, ha!

Jac. Ay, poor Clarinda!—Allons donc. [Exeunt.]

Enter FRANKLY.

Frank. Sure that must be she! her shape and easy air cannot be so exactly copied by another. Now, you young rogue, Cupid, guide me directly to her, as you would the surest arrow in your quiver. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Street before STRICTLAND'S door.

Enter CLARINDA, JACINTHA, and MRS. STRICTLAND.

Cl. Lord!—Dear Jacintha—for Heaven's sake make haste: he'll overtake us before we get in.

Jac. Overtake us! why, he is not in sight

Cl. Is he not? Ha! Sure I have not dropped my fan.—I would not have him lose sight of me neither.

Mrs. S. Here he is—

Cl. In—In—In, then.

Jac. [Laughing.] What, without your fan?

Cl. Pshaw! I have lost nothing.—In, in, I'll follow you.

[Exeunt into the house, CLARINDA last.]

Enter FRANKLY.

Frank. It is impossible I should be deceived. My eyes, and the quick pulses at the heart, assure me it is she. Ha! 'tis she, by Heaven! and the door left open too.—A fair invitation, by all the rules of love. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—An Apartment in STRICTLAND'S House.

Enter CLARINDA, FRANKLY following her.

Frank. I hope, Madam, you will excuse the boldness of this intrusion, since it is owing to your own behaviour that I am forced to it.

Cl. To my behaviour, Sir?

Frank. You cannot but remember me at Bath, Madam, where I so lately had the favour of your hand—

Cl. I do remember, Sir; but I little expected any wrong interpretation of my behaviour from one who had so much the appearance of a gentleman.

Frank. What I saw of your behaviour was so just, it would admit of no misrepresentation. I only feared, whatever reason you had to conceal your name from me at Bath, you might have the same to do it now; and though my happiness was so nearly concerned, I rather chose to venture thus abruptly after you, than be impertinently inquisitive.

Cl. Sir, there seems to be so much civility in your rudeness, that I can easily forgive it; though I don't see how your happiness is at all concerned.

Frank. No, Madam! I believe you are the only lady who could, with the qualifications you are mistress of, be insensible of the power they give you over the happiness of our sex.

Cl. How vain should we women be, if you gentlemen were but wise! If you did not all of you say the same things to every woman, we should certainly be foolish enough to believe some of you were in earnest.

Frank. Could you have the least sense of what I feel whilst I am speaking, you would know me to be in earnest, and what I say to be the dictates of a heart that admires you; may I not say that—

Cl. Sir, this is carrying the—

Frank. When I danced with you at Bath, I was charmed with your whole behaviour, and felt the same tender admiration: but my hope of seeing you afterwards kept in my passion till a more proper time should offer. You cannot therefore blame me now, if, after having lost you once, I do not suffer an inexcusable modesty to prevent my making use of this second opportunity.

Cl. This behaviour, Sir, is so different from the gaiety of your conversation then, that I am at a loss how to answer you.

Frank. There is nothing, Madam, which could take off from the gaiety with which your presence inspires every heart, but the fear of losing you. How can I be otherwise than as I am, when I know not, but you may leave London as abruptly as you did Bath.

Enter LUCETTA.

Luc. Madam, the tea is ready, and my mistress waits for you.

Cl. Very well, I come. [Exit LUCETTA] You see, Sir, I am called away; but I hope you will excuse it, when I leave you with an assurance, that the business which brings me to town will keep me here some time.

Frank. How generous it is in you thus to ease the heart that knew not how to ask for such a favour—I fear to offend—But this house I suppose is yours?

Cl. You will hear of me, if not find me, here.

Frank. I then take my leave. [Exit.]

Cl. I'm undone!—He has me!

Enter MRS. STRICTLAND.

Mrs. S. Well; how do you find yourself?

Cl. I do find—that if he goes on as he has begun, I shall certainly have him without giving him the least uneasiness.

Mrs. S. A very terrible prospect, indeed!

Cl. But I must tease him a little—Where is Jacintha? how will she laugh at me, if I become a pupil of hers, and learn to give ease! No; positively, I shall never do it.

Mrs. S. Poor Jacintha has met with what I feared from Mr. Strictland's temper, an utter denial. I know not why, but he really grows more and more ill-natured.

Cl. Well; now do I heartily wish my affairs were in his power a little, that I might have a few difficulties to surmount: I love difficulties; and yet, I don't know—it is as well as it is.

Mrs. S. Ha, ha, ha! Come, the tea waits.

[Exeunt.]

Enter STRICTLAND.

Strict. These doings in my house distract me. I met a fine gentleman; when I inquired who he was—why, he came to Clarinda. I met a footman too, and he came to Clarinda. I shall not be easy till she is decamped. My wife had the character of a virtuous woman—and they have not been long acquainted: but then they were by themselves at Bath—That hurts—that hurts—they must be watched, they must; I know them, I know all their wiles, and the best of them are but hypocrites—Ha!

Re-enter LUCETTA, who passes over the Stage.

Suppose I bribe the maid: she is of their council, the manager of their secrets: it shall be so; money will do it, and I shall know all that passes. Lucetta!

Luc. Sir.

Strict. Lucetta!

Luc. Sir.—If he should suspect, and search me now, I'm undone. [Aside.]

Strict. She is a sly girl, and may be serviceable. [Aside.]—Lucetta, you are a good girl, and have an honest face. I like it. It looks as if it carried no deceit in it—Yet, if she should be false, she can do me most harm. [Aside.]

Luc. Pray, Sir, speak out.

Strict. No; she is a woman, and it is the highest imprudence to trust her. [Aside.]

Luc. I am not able to understand you.

Strict. I am glad of it. I would not have you understand me

Luc. Then what did you call me for?—If he should be in love with my face, it would be rare sport.

Strict. Tester, ay, Tester is the proper person. [Aside.]

[Aside.] Lucetta, tell Tester I want him.

Luc. Yes, Sir.—Mighty odd, this! It gives me time, however, to send Buckle with this letter to his master.

Strict. Could I but be once well satisfied that my wife had really finished me, I believe I should be as quiet as if I were sure to the contrary: but whilst I am in doubt, I am miserable.

Enter TESTER.

Tes. Does your honour please to want me?

Strict. Ay, Tester—I need not fear. The honesty of his service, and the goodness of his look, make me secure. I will trust him. [Aside.]—Tester, I think I have been a tolerable good master to you.

Tes. Yes, Sir—very tolerable.

Strict. I like his simplicity well. It promises honesty. [Aside.] I have a secret, Tester, to impart to you: a thing of the greatest importance. Look upon me, and don't stand picking your fingers.

Tes. Yes, Sir.—No, Sir.

Strict. But will not his simplicity expose him the more to Lucetta's cunning? Yes, yes; she will worm the secret out of him. I had better trust her with it at once.—So—I will. [Aside.]

Tester, go send Lucetta hither.

Tes. Yes, Sir—Here she is.

Re-enter LUCETTA.

Lucetta, my master wants you.

Strict. Get you down, Tester.

Tes. Yes, Sir.

[Exit.]

Luc. If you want me, Sir, I beg you would make haste, for I have a thousand things to do.

Strict. Well, well; what I have to say will not take up much time, could I but persuade you to be honest.

Luc. Why, Sir, I hope you don't suspect my honesty?

Strict. Well, well; I believe you honest.

[Shuts the door.]

Luc. What can be at the bottom of all this?

[Aside.]

Strict. So; we cannot be too private. Come hither, hussy; nearer yet.

Luc. Lord, Sir! you are not going to be rude. I vow I will call out.

Strict. Hold your tongue—Does the baggage laugh at me? She does; she mocks me, and will reveal it to my wife; and her insolence upon it will be more insupportable to me than cuckoldom itself. [Aside.] I have not leisure now Lucetta—Some other time—Hush! Did not the bell ring? Yes, yes; my wife wants you. Go, go, go to her. [Pushes her out.] There is no hell on earth like being a slave to suspicion. [Exit.]

SCENE IV.—The Piazza, Covent Garden.

Enter BELLAMY and JACK MEGGOT.

Bel. Nay, nay; I would not put your family into any confusion.

J. Meg. None in life, my dear, I assure you. I will go and order every thing this instant for her reception.

Bel. You are too obliging, Sir; but you need not be in this hurry, for I am in no certainty when I shall trouble you; I only know that my Jacintha has taken such a resolution.

J. Meg. Therefore we should be prepared; for, when once a lady has such a resolution in her head, she is upon the rack till she executes it. Fore gad, Mr. Bellamy, this must be a girl of fire.

Enter FRANKLY.

Frank. Buxom and lively as the bounding doe—Fair as painting can express, or youthful poets fancy when they love. Toi de rol lol!

[Singing and dancing.]

Bel. Who is this you talk thus rapturously of?

Frank. Who should it be, but—I shall know her name to-morrow. [Sings and dances.]

J. Meg. What is the matter, ho! Is the man mad?

Frank. Even so, gentlemen; as mad as love and joy can make me.

Bel. But inform me whence this joy proceeds.

Frank. Joy! joy! my lads! she's found! my Perdita! my charmer!

J. Meg. 'Egad! her charms have bewitched the man, I think.—But who is she?

Bel. Come, come, tell us who is this wonder!

Frank. But will you say nothing?

Bel. Nothing, as I live.

Frank. Nor you?

J. Meg. I'll be as silent as the grave—

Frank. With a tombstone upon it, to tell every one whose dust it carries.

J. Meg. I'll be as secret as a debauched prude—

Frank. Whose sanctity every one suspects. Jack, Jack, 'tis not in thy nature; keeping a secret is worse to thee than keeping thy accounts. But to leave fooling, listen to me both, that I may whisper it into your ears, that echo may not catch the sinking sound.—I cannot tell who she is, faith.—Toi de rol lol—

J. Meg. Mad! mad! very mad!

Frank. All I know of her is, that she is a charming woman, and has given me liberty to visit her again.—Bellamy, 'tis she, the lovely she.

[Apart to BELLAMY.]

Bel. So I did suppose.

[Apart.]

J. Meg. Poor Charles! for Heaven's sake, Mr. Bellamy, persuade him to go to his chamber, whilst I prepare every thing for you at home. Adieu. [Aside to BELLAMY.] B'ye, Charles. Ha, ha, ha! [Exit.]

Frank. Oh, love! thou art a gift worthy of a god indeed! Dear Bellamy, nothing now could add to my pleasure, but to see my friend as deep in love as I am.

Bel. I show my heart is capable of love by the friendship it bears to you.

Frank. The light of friendship looks but dim before the brighter flame of love; love is the spring of cheerfulness and joy. Why, how dull and phlegmatic do you show to me now; whilst I am all life; light as feathered Mercury.—You, dull and cold as earth and water; I, light, and warm as air and fire.—These are the only elements in love's world! Why, Bellamy, for shame get thee a mistress, and be sociable.

Bel. Frankly, I am now going to—

Frank. Why that face now? Your humble servant, Sir. My flood of joy shall not be stopped by your melancholy fits, I assure you. [Going.]

Bel. Stay, Frankly, I beg you stay. What would you say now if I were really in love?

Frank. Why faith, thou hast such romantic notions of sense and honour, that I know not what to say.

Bel. To confess the truth then, I am in love.

Frank. And do you confess it as if it were a sin? Proclaim it aloud; glory in it—boast of it as your greatest virtue. Swear it with a lover's oath, and I will believe you.

Bel. Why then, by the bright eyes of her I love—

Frank. Well said!

Bel. By all that's tender, amiable, and soft, in woman—

Frank. Bravo!

Bel. I swear, I am as true an enamourato as ever tagged rhyme.

Frank. And art thou then thoroughly in love? Come to my arms, thou dear companion of my joys. [Embrace.]

Enter RANGER.

Ran. Why—Hey!—Is there never a wench to be got for love or money?

Bel. Pshaw! Ranger here?

Ran. Yes, Ranger is here, and perhaps does not come so impertinently as you may imagine. Faith! I think I have the knack of finding out secrets. Nay, never look so queer.—Here is a letter, Mr. Bellamy, that seems to promise you better diversion than your hugging one another.

Bel. What do you mean?

Ran. Do you deal much in these paper tokens?

Bel. Oh the dear, kind creature! it is from herself. [Apart to FRANKLY.]

Ran. What, is it a pair of laced shoes she wants? or have the boys broke her windows?

Bel. Hold your profane tongue!

Frank. Nay, pry'thee, Bellamy, don't keep it to yourself, as if her whole affections were contained in those few lines.

Ran. Pry'thee let him alone to his silent raptures. But it is as I always said—your grave men ever are the greatest whore-masters.

Bel. I cannot be disoblige now, say what you will: but how came this into your hands?

Ran. Your servant Buckle and I changed commissions; he went on my errand, and I came on his.

Bel. 'Sdeath! I want him this very instant.

Ran. He will be here presently; but I demand to know what I have brought you.

Frank. Ay, ay! out with it! you know we never blab, and may be of service.

Bel. Twelve o'clock! oh, the dear hour!

Ran. Why it is a pretty convenient time, indeed.

Bel. By all that's happy, she promises in this letter here—to leave her guardian this very night, and run away with me.

Ran. How is this?

Bel. Nay, I know not how myself—she says at the bottom—

Your servant has full instructions from Lucretia, how to equip me for my expedition. I will not trust myself home with you to-night, because I know it is inconvenient; therefore I beg you would procure me a lodging; it is no matter how far off my guardian's.—Yours, JACINTHA.

Ran. Carry her to a bagnio, and there you may lodge with her.

Frank. Why this must be a girl of spirit, faith!

Bel. And beauty equal to her sprightfulness. I love her, and she loves me. She has thirty thousand pounds to her fortune.

Ran. The devil she has!

Bel. And never plays at cards.

Ran. Nor does any one thing like any other woman, I suppose.

Frank. Not so, I hope, neither.

Bel. Oh, Frankly, Ranger, I never felt such ease before! the secret's out, and you don't laugh at me.

Frank. Laugh at thee for loving a woman with thirty thousand pounds? thou art a most unaccountable fellow.

Ran. How the devil could he work her up to this! I never could have had the face to have done it. But—I know not how—there is a degree of assurance in you modest gentlemen, which we impudent fellows never can come up to.

Bel. Oh! your servant, good Sir. You should not abuse me now, Ranger, but do all you can to assist me.

Ran. Why, look ye, Bellamy, I am a damnable unlucky fellow, and so will have nothing to do in this affair: I'll take care to be out of the way, so as to do you no harm; that's all I can answer for; and so—success attend you. [Going.] I cannot leave you quite to yourself neither; for if this should prove a round-house affair, as I make no doubt it will, I believe I may have more interest there than you; and so, Sir, you may hear of me at— [Whispers.]

Bel. For shame, Ranger! the most noted gaming-house in town.

Ran. Forgive me this once, my boy. I must go, faith, to pay a debt of honour to some of the greatest rascals in town. [Exit.]

Frank. But where do you design to lodge her?

Bel. At Mr. Meggot's—He is already gone to prepare for her reception.

Frank. The properest place in the world: his aunts will entertain her with honour.

Bel. And the newness of her acquaintance will prevent its being suspected.—Frankly, give me your hand; this is a very critical time.

Frank. Pho! none of your musty reflections now! When a man is in love, to the very brink of matrimony, what the devil has he to do with Plutarch and Seneca? Here is your servant, with a face full of business—I'll leave you together—I shall be at the King's Arms, where, if you want my assistance, you may find me. [Exit.]

Enter BUCKLE.

Bel. So, Buckle, you seem to have your hands full.

Buck. Not fuller than my head, Sir, I promise you. You have had your letter, I hope?

Bel. Yes, and in it she refers me to you for my instructions.

Buck. Why, the affair stands thus. As Mr. Strickland sees the door locked and barred every night himself, and takes the key with him, it is impossible for us to escape any way but through the window: for which purpose I have a ladder of ropes.

Bel. Good—

Buck. And because a hoop, as the ladies wear them now, is not the most decent dress to come down a ladder in, I have in this other bundle a suit of boy's clothes, which I believe will fit her; at least, it will serve the time she wants it.—You will soon be for pulling it off, I suppose.

Bel. Why, you are in spirits, you rogue.

Buck. These I am now to convey to Lucetta—Have you any thing to say, Sir?

Bel. Nothing, but that I will not fail at the hour appointed. Bring me word to Mr. Meggot's how you go on. Succeed in this, and it shall make your fortune. [Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The Street before Mr. STRICTLAND'S House.

Enter BELLAMY, in a Chairman's coat.

Bel. How tediously have the minutes passed these last few hours! and the envious rogues will fly, no lightning quicker, when we would have them stay.—Hold! let me not mistake—this is the house. [Pulls out his watch.] By Heaven it is not yet the hour!—I hear somebody coming. The moon's so bright—I had better not be here till the happy instant comes. [Exit.]

Enter FRANKLY.

Frank. Wine is no antidote to love, but rather feeds the flame; now am I such an amorous puppy, that I cannot walk straight home, but must come out of my way to take a view of my queen's palace by moonlight—Ay, here stands the temple where my goddess is adored—the door's open. [Retires.]

Enter LUCETTA.

Luc. [Under the window.] Madam, Madam, hist! Madam—How shall I make her hear?

JACINTHA in boy's clothes appears at the window.

Jac. Who is there? What's the matter?

Luc. It is I, Madam; you must not pretend to stir till I give the word; you'll be discovered if you do.

Frank. What do I see? A man! My heart misgives me. [Aside.]

Luc. My master is below, sitting up for Mrs. Clarinda. He raves as if he was mad about her being out so late.

Frank. Here is some intrigue or other. I must see more of this before I give further way to love. [Aside.]

Luc. One minute he is in the street: the next he is in the kitchen: now he will lock her out, and then he'll stay himself, and see what figure she makes when she vouchsafes to venture home.

Jac. I long to have it over: get me but once out of his house.

Frank. Cowardly rascal! would I were in his place! [Aside.]

Luc. If I can but fix him any where, I can let you out myself.—You have the ladder ready, in case of necessity?

Jac. Yes, yes. [Exit LUCETTA.]

Frank. The ladder! This must lead to some discovery; I shall watch you, my young gentleman, I shall. [Aside.]

Enter CLARINDA and SERVANT.

Cla. This whist is a most enticing devil. I am afraid I am too late for Mr. Strictland's sober hours.

Jac. Ha! I hear a noise!

Cla. No; I see a light in Jacinth's window.

VOL. I. . . . 3 R 42*

You may go home. [Gives the Servant money.]
I am safe. [Exit SERVANT.]

Jac. Sure it must be he! Mr. Bellamy—Sir.

Frank. Does he not call me? [Aside.]

Cla. Ha! who's that? I am frightened out of my wits—A man! [Aside.]

Jac. Is it you?

Frank. Yes, yes; 'tis I, 'tis I.

Jac. Listen at the door.

Frank. I will; 'tis open—There is no noise: all's quiet.

Cla. Sure it is my spark—and talking to Jacinth.

Frank. You may come down the ladder—quick.

Jac. Catch it then, and hold it.

Frank. I have it. Now I shall see what sort of mettle my young spark is made of. [Aside.]

Cla. With a ladder too! I'll assure you. But I must see the end of it. [Aside.]

Jac. Hark! did not somebody speak?

Frank. No, no; be not fearful—'Sdeath! we are discovered! [FRANKLY and CLARINDA retire.]

Re-enter LUCETTA.

Luc. Hist! hist! are you ready?

Jac. Yes. May I venture?

Luc. Now is your time. He is in high conference with his privy counsellor, Mr. Tester. You may come down the back stairs, and I'll let you out. [Exit.]

Jac. I will, I will; and am heartily glad of it. [Exit.]

Frank. [Advancing.] May be so; but you and I shall have a few words before you get off so cleanly.

Cla. [Advancing.] How lucky it was I came home at this instant. I shall spoil his sport, I believe. [Aside.] Do you know me, Sir?

Frank. I am amazed! You here! This was unexpected indeed!

Cla. Why, I believe I do come a little unexpectedly, but I shall amaze you more. I know the whole course of your amour: all the process of your mighty passion from its first rise.—

Frank. What is all this?

Cla. To the very conclusion, which you vainly hope to effect this night.

Frank. By Heaven, Madam, I know not what you mean! I came hither purely to contemplate on your beauties.

Cla. Any beauties, Sir, I find will serve your turn. Did I not hear you talk to her at the window?

Frank. Her?

Cla. Blush, blush, for shame; but be assured you have seen the last both of Jacinth and me. [Exit.]

Frank. Jacinth! Hear me, Madam—She is gone. This must certainly be Bellamy's mistress, and I have fairly ruined all his scheme. This it is to be in luck.

Re-enter BELLAMY, behind.

Bel. Ha! a man under the window! [Aside.]

Frank. No; here she comes, and I may convey her to him.

Re-enter JACINTHA, and runs to FRANKLY.

Jac. I have at last got to you. Let's haste away—Oh!

Frank. Be not frightened, lady.

Jac. Oh! I am abused, betrayed!

Bel. Betrayed!—Frankly!

Frank. Bellamy!

Bel. I can scarce believe it, though I see it.
Draw—

Frank. Hear me, Bellamy—Lady—

Jac. Stay—do not fight!

Frank. I am innocent; it is all a mistake!

Jac. For my sake, be quiet! We shall all be discovered! the family is alarmed!

Bel. You are obeyed. Mr. Frankly, there is but one way—

Frank. I understand you. Any time but now. You will certainly be discovered! To-morrow, at your chambers.

Bel. Till then farewell.

[Exit BELLAMY and JACINTHA.

Frank. Then, when he is cool, I may be heard; and the real, though suspicious account of this matter may be believed. Yet, amidst all this perplexity, it pleases me to find my fair incognita is jealous of my love.

Strict. [Within.] Where's Lucetta? Search every place.

Frank. Hark! the cry is up! I must be gone.

[Exit.

Enter STRICTLAND, TESTER, and SERVANTS.

Strict. She's gone! she's lost! I am cheated! pursue her! seek her!

Yes. Sir, all her clothes are in her chamber.

Serv. Sir, Mrs. Clarinda said she was in boy's clothes.

Strict. Ay, ay, I know it—Bellamy has her.—Come along—pursue her.

[Exit.

Enter RANGER.

Ran. Hark!—Was not the noise this way?—No, there is no game stirring. This same goddess Diana, shines so bright with her chastity, that 'egad, I believe the wenches are ashamed to look her in the face. Now I am in an admirable mood for a frolic—have wine in my head, and money in my pocket, and so am furnished out for the cannonading of any countess in Christendom. Ha! what have we here? a ladder!—this cannot be placed here for nothing—and a window open! Is it love or mischief now that is going on within? I care not which—I am in a right cue for either. Up I go, neck or nothing.—Stay—do I not run a greater chance of spoiling sport, than I do of making any? that I hate as much as I love the other. There can be no harm in seeing how the land lies—I'll up. [Goes up softly.] All is hush—Ha! a light, and a woman! by all that's lucky, neither old nor crooked! I'll in—Ha! she is gone again! I will after her. [Gets in at the window.] And for fear of the squalls of virtue, and the pursuit of the family, I will make sure of the ladder. Now, fortune be my guide.

SCENE II.—MRS. STRICTLAND'S Dressing-room.

Enter MRS. STRICTLAND, followed by LUCETTA.

Mrs. S. Well, I am in great hopes she will escape.

Luc. Never fear, Madam; the lovers have the start of him, and I warrant they'll keep it.

Mrs. S. Were Mr. Strictland ever to suspect my being privy to her flight, I know not what might be the consequence.

Luc. Then you had better be undressing. He may return immediately.

[As she is sitting at the toilet, enter RANGER, behind.

Ran. Young and beautiful. [Aside.

Luc. I have watched him pretty narrowly of late, and never once suspected till this morning—

Mrs. S. And who gave you authority to watch his actions, or pry into his secrets?

Luc. I hope, Madam, you are not angry! I thought it might have been of service to you to know my master was jealous.

Ran. And her husband jealous! If she does but send away the maid, I am happy. [Aside.

Mrs. S. Leave me. [Angrily.

Luc. This it is to meddle with other people's affairs. [Exit in anger.

Ran. What a lucky dog I am! I never made a gentleman a cuckold before. Now impudence assist me. [Aside.

Mrs. S. [Rises.] Provoking! I am sure I never have deserved it of him.

Ran. Oh, cuckold him by all means, Madam: I am your man! [She shrieks.] Oh, fie, Madam! if you squall so cursedly, you will be discovered.

Mrs. S. Discovered! What mean you, Sir? Do you come to abuse me?

Ran. I'll do my endeavour, Madam; you can have no more.

Mrs. S. Whence came you? How got you here?

Ran. Dear Madam, so long as I am here, what signifies how I got here, or whence I came? But that I may satisfy your curiosity, first, as to your "Whence came you?" I answer, out of the street; and to your "How got you here?" I say, in at the window; it stood so invitingly open, it was irresistible. But, Madam—you were going to undress. I beg I may not incommode you.

Mrs. S. This is the most consummate piece of impudence!—

Ran. For Heaven's sake have one drop of pity for a poor young fellow, who long has loved you.

Mrs. S. What would the fellow have?

Ran. Your husband's usage will excuse you to the world.

Mrs. S. I cannot bear this insolence! help! help!

Ran. Oh, hold that clamorous tongue, Madam!—Speak one word more, and I am gone, positively gone.

Mrs. S. Gone! so I would have you.

Ran. Lord, Madam, you are so hasty.

Mrs. S. Shall I not speak when a thief, a robber, breaks into my house at midnight? help! help!

Ran. Ha! no one hears. Now, Cupid, assist me! [Aside.] Lookye, Madam, I never could make fine speeches, and cringe, and bow, and fawn, and flatter, and lie; I have said more to you already, than I ever said to a woman in such circumstances in all my life. But since I find that you will yield to no persuasion to your good, I will gently force you to be grateful. [Throws down his hat and seizes her.] Come, come, un-bend that brow, and look more kindly on me.

Mrs. S. For shame, Sir! thus on my knees let me beg for mercy. [Kneels.

Ran. And thus on mine, let me beg the same. [Kneels, catches, and kisses her Strict. [Within.] Take away her sword! she'll hurt herself!

Mrs. S. Oh, Heavens! that is my husband's voice!

Ran. [Rises.] The devil it is!

Strict. [Within.] Take away her sword, I say, and then I can close with her.

Mrs. S. He is upon the stairs, now coming up! I am undone if he sees you.

Ran. Pox on him, I must decamp then. Which way?

Mrs. S. Through this passage to the next chamber.

Ran. And so into the street. With all my heart. You may be perfectly easy, Madam; mum's the word; I never blab.—I shall not leave off so, but wait till the last moment. [Aside, and exit.]

Mrs. S. So he's gone. What could I have said, if he had been discovered!

Enter MR. STRICTLAND, drives JACINTHA, LUCETTA follows.

Strict. Once more, my pretty masculine Madam, you are welcome home; and I hope to keep you somewhat closer than I have done; for eight o'clock to-morrow morning is the latest hour you shall stay in this lewd town.

Jac. Oh, Sir, when once a girl is equipped with a hearty resolution, it is not your worship's sagacity, nor the great chain at your gate, can hinder her from doing what she has a mind.

Strict. Oh, Lord, Lord! how this love improves a young lady's modesty.

Jac. Am I to blame to seek for happiness any where, when you are resolved to make me miserable here?

Strict. I have this night prevented your making yourself so, and will endeavour to do it for the future. I have you safe now, and the devil shall not get you out of my clutches again. I have locked the doors and barred them, I warrant you. So here, [Gives her a candle.] troop to your chamber, and to bed, whilst you are well. Go! [Treads on RANGER'S hat.] What's here? a hat! a man's hat in my wife's dressing-room!

Mrs. S. What shall I do? [Looks at the hat.]

Strict. [Takes up the hat and looks at Mrs. STRICTLAND.] Ha! by hell, I see, 'tis true!

Mrs. S. My fears confound me. I dare not tell the truth, and know not how to frame a lie!

[Aside.]

Strict. Mrs. Strictland, Mrs. Strictland, how came this hat into your chamber?

Luc. Are you that way disposed, my fine lady, and will not trust me? [Aside.]

Strict. Speak, wretch, speak!

Jac. I could not have suspected this. [Aside.]

Strict. Why dost thou not speak?

Mrs. S. Sir—

Strict. Guilt—'tis guilt that ties your tongue!

Luc. I must bring her off, however. [Aside.]

Strict. My fears are just, and I am miserable—thou worst of women!

Mrs. S. I know my innocence, and can bear this no longer.

Strict. I know you are false, and 'tis I who will bear my injuries no longer.

[Both walk about in a passion.]

Luc. [Apart to JACINTHA.] Is not the hat yours? Own it, Madam.

[Takes away JACINTHA'S hat, and exit.]

Mrs. S. What ground, what cause have you for jealousy, when you yourself can witness your leaving me was accidental, your return uncertain, and expected even sooner than it happened? The abuse is gross and palpable.

Strict. Why, this is true!

Mrs. S. Indeed, Jacintha, I am innocent.

Strict. And yet this hat must belong to somebody.

Jac. Dear Mrs. Strictland, be not concerned; when he has diverted himself a little longer with it—

Strict. Ha!—

Jac. I suppose he will give me my hat again.

Strict. Your hat?

Jac. Yes, my hat. You brushed it from my side yourself, and then trod upon it; whether on purpose to abuse this lady, or no, you best know yourself.

Strict. It cannot be—'tis all a lie.

Jac. Believe so still, with all my heart; but the hat is mine. Now, Sir, who does it belong to?

[Snatches it, and puts it on.]

Strict. Why did she look so?

Jac. Your violence of temper is too much for her. You use her ill, and then suspect her for that confusion which you yourself occasion.

Strict. Why did not you set me right at first?

Jac. Your hard usage of me, Sir, is a sufficient reason why I should not be much concerned to deceive you at all. 'Tis for your lady's sake I do it now; who deserves much better of you than to be thus exposed for every slight suspicion. See where she sits—go to her.

Mrs. S. [Rises.] Indeed, Mr. Strictland, I have a soul as much above—

Strict. Whew! Now you have both found your tongues, and I must bear with their eternal rattle.

Jac. For shame, Sir! go to her, and—

Strict. Well, well, what shall I say? I forgive—all is over. I, I, I forgive.

Mrs. S. Forgive! What do you mean?

Jac. Forgive her! is that all? Consider, Sir—

Strict. Hold, hold your confounded tongues, and I'll do any thing. I'll ask pardon—or forgive—or any thing. Good now, be quiet—I ask your pardon—there—[Kisses her.] For you, Madam, I am infinitely obliged to you, and I could find in my heart to make you a return in kind, by marrying you to a beggar, but I have more conscience. Come, come, to your chamber. Here, take this candle.

Re-enter LUCETTA, pertly.

Luc. Sir, if you please, I will light my young lady to bed.

Strict. No, no! no such thing, good Madam. She shall have nothing but her pillow to consult this night, I assure you. So in, in. [The ladies take leave; exit JACINTHA.] Good night, kind Madam.

Luc. Pox of the jealous fool! we might both have escaped out of the window purely. [Aside.]

Strict. Go, get you down; and, do you hear, order the coach to be ready in the morning at eight exactly. [Exit LUCETTA.] So she is safe till to-morrow, and then for the country; and when she is there, I can manage as I think fit.

Mrs. S. Dear Mr. Strictland—

Strict. I am not in a humour, Mrs. Strictland, fit to talk with you. Go to bed. I will endeavour to get the better of my temper; if I can, I'll follow you.—[Exit MRS. STRICTLAND.] How despicable have I made myself! [Exit.]

SCENE III.—Another Chamber.

Enter RANGER.

Ran. All seems hushed again, and I may venture out. I may as well sneak off whilst I am in a whole skin. And shall so much love and claret as I am in possession of only lull me to sleep, when it might so much better keep me waking? Forbid it, fortune, and forbid it, love. This is a chamber, perhaps, of some bewitching female, and I may yet be happy. Ha! a light! the door opens. A boy! pox on him! [Retires.]

Enter JACINTHA, with a candle.

Jac. I have been listening at the door, and from their silence, I conclude they are peaceably gone to bed together.

Ran. A pretty boy, faith; he seems uneasy.

Jac. [Sitting down.] What an unlucky night has this proved to me! every circumstance has fallen out unhappily.

Ran. He talks aloud. I'll listen. [Aside.]

Jac. But what most amazes me is, that Clarinda should betray me!

Ran. Clarinda! she must be a woman. Well, what of her? [Aside.]

Jac. My guardian else would never have suspected my disguise.

Ran. Disguise! Ha, it must be so! What eyes she has! what a dull rogue was I not to suspect this sooner! [Aside.]

Jac. Ha, I had forgot; the ladder is at the window still, and I will boldly venture by myself. [Rising briskly, she sees RANGER.] Ha! a man, and well dressed! Ha, Mrs. Strickland, are you then at last dishonest?

Ran. By all my wishes, she is a charming woman! lucky rascal! [Aside.]

Jac. But I will, if possible, conceal her shame, and stand the brunt of his impertinence.

Ran. What shall I say to her? No matter; any thing soft will do the business. [Aside.]

Jac. Who are you?

Ran. A man, young gentleman.

Jac. And what would you have?

Ran. A woman.

Jac. You are very free, Sir. Here are none for you.

Ran. Ay, but there is one, and a fair one too; the most charming creature nature ever set her hand to; and you are the dear little pilot that must direct me to her heart.

Jac. What mean you, Sir? It is an office I am not accustomed to.

Ran. You wont have far to go, however. I never make my errands tedious. It is to your own heart, dear Madam, I would have you whisper in my behalf. Nay, never start. Think you such beauty could ever be concealed from eyes so well acquainted with its charms?

Jac. What will become of me? If I cry out, Mrs. Strickland is undone. This is my last resort. [Aside.]

Ran. Pardon, dear lady, the boldness of this visit, which your guardian's care has forced me to. but I long have loved you, long doted on that beautiful face, and followed you from place to place, though perhaps unknown and unregarded.

Jac. Here's a special fellow. [Aside.]

Ran. Turn then an eye of pity on my sufferings; and by Heaven, one tender look from those piercing eyes, one touch of this soft hand—

[Takes her hand.]

Jac. Hold, Sir, no nearer.

Ran. Would more than repay whole years of pain.

Jac. Hear me; but keep your distance, or I raise the family.

Ran. Blessings on her tongue, only for prattling to me. [Aside.]

Jac. Oh, for a moment's courage, and I shall shame him from his purpose. [Aside.] If I were certain so much gallantry had been shown on my account only—

Ran. You wrong your beauty to think that any other could have power to draw me hither. By all the little loves that play about your lips, I swear—

Jac. You came to me, and me alone.

Ran. By all the thousand graces that inhabit there, you, and only you, have drawn me hither.

Jac. Well said—Could I but believe you—

Ran. By Heaven she comes! Ah, honest Ranger, I never knew thee fail. [Aside.]

Jac. Pray, Sir, where did you leave this hat?

Ran. That hat! that hat—'tis my hat—I dropped it in the next chamber as I was looking for yours.

Jac. How mean and despicable do you look now!

Ran. So, so! I am in a pretty pickle! [Aside.]

Jac. You know by this, that I am acquainted with every thing that has passed within; and how ill it agrees with what you have professed to me. Let me advise you, Sir, to be gone immediately: through that window you may easily get into the street. One scream of mine, the least noise at that door, will wake the house.

Ran. Say you so? [Aside.]

Jac. Believe me, Sir, an injured husband is not so easily appeased; and a suspected wife, that is jealous of her honour—

Ran. Is the devil, and so let's have no more of her. Look ye, Madam, [Getting between her and the door.] I have but one argument left, and that is a strong one. Look on me well. I am as handsome, a strong, well-made fellow as any about town; and since we are alone, as I take it, we have no occasion to be more private.

[Going to lay hold of her.]

Jac. I have a reputation, Sir, and will maintain it.

Ran. You have a bewitching pair of eyes.

Jac. Consider my virtue. [Struggling.]

Ran. Consider your beauty and my desires.

Jac. If I were a man, you dared not use me thus.

Ran. I should not have the same temptation.

Jac. Hear me, Sir, I will be heard. [Breaks from him.] There is a man who will make you repent this usage of me. Oh, Bellamy! where art thou now?

Ran. Bellamy!

Jac. Were he here, you durst not thus affront me.

Ran. His mistress, on my soul! [Aside.]—You can love, Madam; you can love, I find. Her tears affect me strangely. [Aside.]

Jac. I am not ashamed to own my passion for a man of virtue and honour. I love and glory in it.

Ran. Oh, brave! and you can write letters, you can. "I will not trust myself home with you this evening, because I know it is inconvenient."

Jac. Ha!

Ran. "Therefore I beg you would procure me a lodging; 'tis no matter how far off my guardian's. Yours, Jacintha."

Jac. The very words of my letter! I am amazed! [Aside.] Do you know Mr. Bellamy?

Ran. There is not a man on earth I have so great a value for: and he must have some value for me too, or he would never have shown me your pretty epistle; think of that, fair lady. The ladder is at the window; and so, Madam, I hope delivering you safe into his arms, will in some measure expiate the crime I have been guilty of to you.

Jac. Good Heaven! How fortunate is this!

Ran. I believe I make myself appear more wicked than I really am. For, damn me, if I do not feel more satisfaction in the thoughts of restoring you to my friend, than I could have pleasure in any favour your bounty could have bestowed. Let any other rake lay his hand upon his heart and say the same.

Jac. Your generosity transports me.

Ran. Let us lose no time then; the ladder's ready? Where was you to lodge?

Jac. At Mr. Meggot's.

Ran. At my friend Jacky's! better and better still.

Jac. Are you acquainted with him too?

Ran. Ay, ay; why, did I not tell you at first that I was one of your old acquaintance? I know all about you, you see; though the devil fetch me if ever I saw you before. Now, Madam, give me your hand.

Jac. And now, Sir, have with you.

Ran. Then thou art a girl of spirit. And though I long to hug you for trusting yourself with me, I will not beg a single kiss, till Bellamy himself shall give me leave. He must fight well that takes you from me. [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—The 1st Vazza.

Enter BELLAMY and FRANKLY.

Bel. Pshaw! what impertinent devil put it into your head to meddle with my affairs?

Frank. You know I went thither in pursuit of another.

Bel. I know nothing you had to do there at all.

Frank. I thought, Mr. Bellamy, you were a lover.

Bel. I am so; and therefore should be forgiven this sudden warmth.

Frank. And therefore should forgive the fond impertinence of a lover.

Bel. Jealousy, you know, is as natural an incident to love—

Frank. As curiosity. By one piece of silly curiosity I have gone nigh to ruin both myself and you; let not then your jealousy complete our misfortunes. I fear I have lost a mistress as well as you; then let us not quarrel. All may come right again.

Bel. It is impossible. She is gone, removed for ever from my sight: she is in the country by this time.

Frank. How d'd I lose her after we parted?

Bel. By too great confidence. When I got her to my chair, the chairmen were not to be found: And, safe as I thought in our disguise, I actually put her into the chair, when Mr. Strickland and his servants were in sight: which I had no sooner done, than they surrounded us, overpowered me, and carried her away.

Frank. Unfortunate indeed! Could you not make a second attempt?

Bel. I had designed it; but when I came to the door, I found the ladder removed; and hearing no noise, seeing no lights, nor being able to make any body answer, I concluded all attempts as impracticable as I now find them.—Ha! I see Lucetta coming. Then they may be still in town.

Enter LUCETTA.

Lucetta, welcome! what news of Jacintha?

Luc. News, Sir! you fright me out of my senses! Why, is she not with you?

Bel. What do you mean? With me! I have not seen her since I lost her last night.

Luc. Good Heaven! then she is undone for ever.

Frank. Why, what's the matter?

Bel. Speak out—I'm all amazement.

Luc. She is escaped, without any of us knowing how. Nobody missed her till morning. We all thought she went away with you. But Heaven knows now what may have happened.

Bel. Somebody must have accompanied her in her flight.

Luc. We know of nobody: we are all in confusion at home. My master swears revenge on you. My mistress says a stranger has her.

Bel. A stranger!

Luc. But Mrs. Clarinda—

Bel. Clarinda! Who is she?

Luc. The lady, Sir, who you saw at our house last night. [To FRANKLY.]

Frank. Ha! what of her?

Luc. She says, she is sure one Frankly is the man; she saw them together, and knows it to be true.

Frank. Damned fortune!

[Aside.]

Luc. Sure this is not Mr. Frankly.

Frank. Nothing will convince him now.

[Aside.]

Bel. [Looking at FRANKLY.] Ha! 'tis true!—I see it is true. [Aside.] Lucetta, run up to Buckle, and take him with you to search wherever you can. [Puts her out.] Now, Mr. Frankly, I have found you.—You have used me so ill, that you force me to forget you are my friend.

Frank. What do you mean?

Bel. Draw.

Frank. Are you mad? By Heavens I am innocent.

Bel. I have heard you, and will no longer be imposed on—Defend yourself.

Frank. Nay, if you are so hot, I draw to defend myself, as I would against a madman.

Enter RANGER.

Ran. What the devil, swords at noon-day! Have among you, faith! [Parts them.] What's here, Bellamy—Yes, 'gad, you are Bellamy, and you are Frankly; put up, put up, both of you—or else—I am a devilish fellow when once my sword is out.

Bel. We shall have a time—

Ran. [Pushing BELLAMY one way.] A time for what?

Frank. I shall always be as ready to defend my innocence as now.

Ran. [Pushing FRANKLY the other way.] Innocence! ay, to be sure—at your age—a mighty innocent fellow, no doubt. But what, in the name of common sense, is it that ails you both? are you mad? The last time I saw you, you were hugging and kissing; and now you are cutting one another's throats—I never knew any good come of one fellow beslaving another—But I shall put you into a better humour, I warrant you—Bellamy, Frankly, listen both of you—Such fortune—such a scheme—

Bel. Pr'ythee, leave fooling. What, art drunk?

Frank. He is always so, I think.

Ran. And who gave you the privilege of thinking? Drunk! no; I am not drunk. Topsy, perhaps, with my good fortune—merry, and in spirits—though I have not fire enough to run my friend through the body. Not drunk, though Jack Meggot and I have boxed it about—champaign was the word for two whole hours by Shrewsbury clock.

Bel. Jack Meggot! Why, I left him at one, going to bed.

Ran. That may be, but I made shift to rouse him and his family by four this morning. Ounds, I picked up a wench, and carried her to his house.

Bel. Ha!

Ran. Such a variety of adventures—nay, you shall hear. But, before I begin, Bellamy, you shall promise me half a dozen kisses beforehand: for the devil fetch me if that little jade, Jacintha, would give me one, though I pressed hard.

Bel. Who, Jacintha? press to kiss Jacintha?

Ran. Kiss her! ay, why not? is she not a woman, and made to be kissed?

Bel. Kiss her—I shall run distracted!

Ran. How could I help it, when I had her alone, you rogue, in her bedchamber, at midnight! if I had been to be sacrificed, I should have done it.

Bel. Bedchamber, at midnight! I can hold no longer—Draw!

Frank. Be easy, Bellamy. [Interposing.]

Bel. He has been at some of his damned tricks with her.

Frank. Hear him out.

Ran. 'Sdeath, how could I know she was his mistress? But I tell this story most miserably. I should have told you first, I was in another lady's chamber. By the Lord, I got in at the window by a ladder of ropes.

Frank. Ha! another lady?

Ran. Another: and stole in upon her whilst she was undressing; beautiful as an angel, blooming and young.

Frank. What, in the same house?

Bel. What is this to Jacintha? Ease me of my pain.

Ran. Ay, ay, in the same house, on the same floor. The sweetest little angel—but I design to have another touch with her.

Frank. 'Sdeath! but you shall have a touch with me first.

Bel. Stay, Frankly. [Interposing.]

Ran. Why, what strange madness has possessed you both, that nobody must kiss a pretty wench but yourselves?

Bel. What became of Jacintha?

Ran. Ounds! what have you done, that you must monopolize kissing?

Frank. Pr'ythee, honest Ranger, ease me of the pain I am in. Was her name Clarinda?

Bel. Speak in plain words, where Jacintha is, where to be found. Dear boy, tell me.

Ran. Ay, now it is honest Ranger; and, dear boy, tell me—and a minute ago, my throat was to be cut—I could find in my heart not to open my lips. But here comes Jack Meggot, who will let you into all the secret, though he designed to keep it from you, in half the time that I can, though I had ever so great a mind to tell it you.

Enter JACK MEGGOT.

J. Meg. So, save ye, save ye, lads! we have been frightened out of our wits for you. Not hearing of Mr. Bellamy, poor Jacintha is ready to sink for fear of any accident.

Bel. Is she at your house?

J. Meg. Why, did not you know that? We despatched Master Ranger to you three hours ago.

Ran. Ay, plague! but I had business of my own, so I could not come—Harkye, Frankly, is your girl maid, wife, or widow?

Frank. A maid, I hope.

Ran. The odds are against you, Charles—but mine is married, you rogue, and her husband jealous—The devil is in it, if I do not reap some reward for my last night's service.

Bel. He has certainly been at Mrs. Strickland herself. But, Frankly, I dare not look on you.

Frank. This one embrace cancels all thoughts of enmity. [Embracing him.]

Bel. Thou generous man!—but I must haste to ease Jacintha of her fears. [Exit.]

Frank. And I to make up matters with Clarinda. [Exit.]

Ran. And I to some kind wench or other, Jack. But where I shall find her, Heaven knows. And so, my service to your monkey.

J. Meg. Adieu, rattlepate. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—The Hall of Mr. STRICTLAND'S House.

Enter MRS. STRICTLAND and CLARINDA.

Mrs. S. But why in such a hurry, my dear? stay till your servants can go along with you.

Cla. Oh, no matter; they'll follow with my things. It is but a little way off, and my chair will guard me. After my staying out so late last night, I am sure Mr. Strickland will think every minute an age, whilst I am in his house.

Mrs. S. I am as much amazed at his suspecting your innocence as my own; and every time I think of it, I blush at my present behaviour to you.

Cla. No ceremony, dear child.

Mrs. S. No, Clarinda, I am too well acquainted with your good humour. But I fear, in the eye of a malicious world, it may look like a confirmation of his suspicion.

Cla. My dear, if the world will speak ill of me, for the little innocent gayety which I think the peculiar happiness of my temper, I know no way to prevent it, and am only sorry the world is so ill-natured: but I shall not part with my mirth, I assure them, so long as I know it innocent. I wish, my dear, this may be the greatest uneasiness your husband's jealousy ever gives you.

Mrs. S. I hope he never again may have such an occasion as he had last night.

Cla. You are so unfashionable a wife.—Why last night's accident would have made half the wives in London easy for life. Has not his jealousy discovered itself openly? And are not you innocent? There is nothing but your foolish temper that prevents his being absolutely in your power.

Mrs. S. Clarinda, that is too serious an affair to laugh at. Let me advise you; take care of Mr. Frankly, observe his temper well; and if he has the least taint of jealousy, cast him off, and never trust to keeping him in your power.

Cl. You will hear little more of Frankly, I believe. Here is Mr. Strickland.

Enter STRICTLAND and LUCETTA.

Strict. Lucetta says you want me, Madam.

Cl. I trouble you, Sir, only that I might return you thanks for the civilities I have received in your family, before I took my leave.

Strict. Keep them to yourself, dear Madam. As it is at my request that you leave my house, your thanks upon that occasion are not very desirable.

Cl. Oh, Sir, you need not fear. My thanks were only for your civilities. They will not overburden you. But I'll conform to your humour, Sir, and part with as little ceremony—

Strict. As we met.

Cl. The brute! [Aside.] My dear, good bye, we may meet again. [To Mrs. STRICTLAND.

Strict. If you dare trust me with your hand.

Cl. Lucetta, remember your instructions. Now, Sir, have with you.

[STRICTLAND leads CLARINDA out.

Mrs. S. Are her instructions cruel or kind, Lucetta? For I suppose they relate to Mr. Frankly.

Luc. Have you a mind to try if I can keep a secret as well as yourself, Madam? But I will show you I am fit to be trusted by keeping this, though it signifies nothing.

Mrs. S. This answer is not so civil, I think.

Luc. I beg pardon, Madam, I meant it not to offend.

Mrs. S. Pray let us have no more such. I neither desire nor want your assistance.

Re-enter STRICTLAND.

Strict. She is gone; I feel myself somewhat easier already. Since I have begun the day with gallantry, Madam, shall I conduct you up?

Mrs. S. There is something, Sir, which gives you secret uneasiness. I wish—

Strict. Perhaps so, Madam; and perhaps it may soon be no secret at all. [Leads her out.

Luc. Would I were once well settled with my young lady; for at present this is but an odd sort of a queer family. Last night's affair puzzles me. A hat there was that belonged to none of us, that's certain; Madam was in a fright, that is as certain; and I brought all off. Jacintha escaped, no one of us knows how. The good man's jealousy was yesterday groundless; yet, to-day, in my mind, he is very much in the right. Mighty odd, all this!—Somebody knocks. If this should be Clarinda's spark, I have an odd message for him too. [She opens the door.

Enter FRANKLY.

Frank. So, my pretty handmaid, meeting with you gives me some hopes—May I speak with Clarinda?

Luc. Whom do you want, Sir?

Frank. Clarinda, child. The young lady I was admitted to yesterday.

Luc. Clarinda!—no such person lives here, I assure you.

Frank. Where then?

Luc. I don't know indeed, Sir.

Frank. Will you inquire within?

Luc. Nobody knows in this house, Sir, you will find.

Frank. What do you mean? She is a friend of Jacintha's, your lady. I will take my oath she was here last night; and you yourself spoke of her being here this morning—Not know!

Luc. No; none of us know. She went away of a sudden—no one of us can imagine whither.

Frank. Why, faith, child, thou hast a tolerable face, and has delivered this denial very handsomely; but let me tell you, your impertinence this morning had liked to have cost me my life; now therefore make me amends. I come from your young mistress; I come from Mr. Bellamy; I come with my purse full of gold, that persuasive rhetoric, to win you to let me see and speak to this Clarinda once again.

Luc. She is not here, Sir.

Frank. Direct me to her.

Luc. No, I can't do that neither.

Re-enter STRICTLAND, behind.

Strict. I heard a knocking at the door, and a man's voice—Ha!

Frank. Deliver this letter to her. [Aside.

Strict. By all my fears, a letter! [Aside.

Luc. I don't know but I may be tempted to do that.

Frank. Take it then—and with it this.

[Kisses her and gives her money.

Strict. Um! there are two bribes in a breath! What a jade she is!

Luc. Ay, this gentleman understands reason. [Aside.

Frank. And be assured you oblige your mistress while you are serving me.

Strict. Her mistress!—Damned sex! and damned wife, thou art an epitome of that sex!

[Aside.

Frank. And if you can procure me an answer your fee shall be enlarged. [Exit.

Luc. The next step is to get her to read this letter.

Strict. [Snatches it.] No noise—but stand silent there whilst I read this. [Breaks it open, drops the case; reads.

Madam—The gayety of a heart, happy as mine was yesterday, may, I hope, easily excuse the unseasonable visit I made your house last night—

Death and the devil! confusion! I shall run distracted. It is too much!—There was a man then to whom the hat belonged; and I was gulled, abused, cheated, imposed on by a chit, a child—Oh, woman, woman!—But I will be calm, search it to the bottom, and have a full revenge.

Luc. So, here's fine work! He'll make himself very ridiculous though. [Aside.

Strict. [Reads.] I know my innocence will appear so manifestly, that I need only appeal to the lady who accompanied you at Bath;

Your very humble servant, good innocent, fine, Madam Clarinda.

And I do not doubt but her good nature will not let you persist in injuring your obedient humble servant,

CHARLES FRANKLY.

Now who can say my jealousy lacked foundation, or my suspicion of fine Madam's innocent gayety was unjust?—Gayety! why ay, 'twas gayety brought him hither.—My wife may be false in gayety. What a number of things become fashionable under the notion of gayety.—What, you received this epistle in gayety too; and were to deliver it to my wife, I suppose, when the gay fit came next upon her?—Why, you impudent young strumpet, do you laugh at me?

Luc. I would, if I dared, laugh heartily. Be pleased, Sir, only to look at that piece of paper that lies there.

Strict. Ha!

Luc. I have not touched it, Sir. It is the case that letter came in, and the direction will inform you whom I was to deliver it to.

Strict. This is directed to Clarinda?

Luc. Oh, is it so? Now read it over again, and all your foolish doubts will vanish.

Strict. I have no doubts at all. I am satisfied that you, Jacintha, Clarinda, my wife, all are—

Luc. Lud! lud! you will make a body mad.

Strict. Hold your impertinent tongue.

Luc. You'll find the thing to be just as I say, Sir.

Strict. Be gone. [Exit LUCETTA.] They must be poor at the work, indeed, if they did not lend one another their names. 'Tis plain, 'tis evident, and I am miserable. But for my wife, she shall not stay one night longer in my house. Separation, shame, contempt, shall be her portion. I am determined in the thing; and when once it is over, I may perhaps be easy. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—The Street.

CLARINDA brought in a chair, followed by RANGER.

Ran. Harkye, chairman! damn your confounded trot. Go slower.

Cha. Here, stop.

Ran. By Heavens! the monsters hear reason and obey.

Cha. [Letting down the window.] What troublesome fellow was that?

1 Chair. Some rake, I warrant, that cannot carry himself home, and wants us to do it for him.

Cha. There—And pray do you take care I be not troubled with him. [Goes in.]

Ran. That's as much as to say now, pray follow me. Madam, you are a charming woman, and I will do it—

1 Chair. Stand off, Sir.

Ran. Prythee, honest fellow—what—what writing is that? [Endeavouring to get in.]

2 Chair. You come not here.

Ran. Lodgings to be let: a pretty convenient inscription, and the sign of a good modest family. There may be lodgings for gentlemen as well as ladies. Harkye, rogues, I'll lay you all the silver I have in my pocket, there it is, I get in there in spite of your teeth, ye pimps. [Throws down the money and goes in.]

Cha. [Within.] Chair, chair, chair!

1 Chair. Who calls chair—What, have you let the gentleman in?

2 Chair. I'll tell you what, partner, he certainly slipped by whilst we were picking up the money. Come, take up. [Execunt.]

SCENE IV.—CLARINDA'S Lodgings.

Enter CLARINDA, followed by MAID.

Maid. Bless me, Madam, you seem disordered; what's the matter?

Cha. Some impertinent fellow followed the chair, and I am afraid they let him in. [A noise between RANGER and LANDLADY.] I should certainly know that voice. My madcap cousin Ranger, as I live. I am sure he does not know me.—If I could but hide my face now, what sport I should have! A mask! a mask! Run and see if you can find a mask.

Maid. I believe there is one above.

Cha. Run, run, and fetch it. [Exit MAID.] Here he comes.

Enter RANGER and LANDLADY.

How unlucky this is! [Turning from them.]

Land. What's your business here, unmanly Sir?

Ran. Well, let's see these lodgings that are to be let. 'Gad, a very pretty neat tenement—But harkye, is it real and natural; all that, or only patched up and new painted this summer season, against the town fills?

Land. What does the saucy fellow mean with his double tenders here? Get you down—

Re-enter MAID, with a mask.

Maid. Here is a very dirty one.

[Aside to CLARINDA.]

Cha. No matter. [Exit MAID.] Now we shall see a little what he would be at.

[Aside.]

Land. This is an honest house. For all your laced waistcoat, I'll have you thrown down neck and heels.

Ran. Pho! not in such a hurry, good old lady—A mask! nay, with all my heart, it saves a world of blushing. Have you ne'er a one for me. I am apt to be ashamed myself on these occasions.

Land. Get you down, I say—

Ran. Not if I guess right, old lady. Madam: [To CLARINDA, who makes sign to the LANDLADY to retire.] look ye there now! that a woman should live to your age, and know so little of the matter. Be gone. [Exit LANDLADY.] By her forwardness this should be a whore of quality. My boy, Ranger, thou art in luck to-day. She wont speak, I find—then I will. [Aside.] Delicate lodgings truly, Madam; and very neatly furnished—A very convenient room this, I must needs own, to entertain a mixed company. But, my dear charming creature, does not that door open to a more commodious apartment for the happiness of a private friend or so? The prettiest brass lock—Fast, um; that wont do. 'Sdeath, you are a beautiful woman, I am sure you are. Prythee let me see your face. It is your interest, child—the longer you delay, the more I shall expect. Therefore, [Takes her hand.] my dear, soft, kind, new acquaintance, thus let me take your hand, and whilst you gently, with the other, let day-light in upon me, let me softly hold you to me, that with my longing lips I may receive the warmest, best impression. [She un.masks.]—Clarinda!

Cha. Ha, ha! your servant, cousin Ranger.—Ha, ha, ha!

Ran. Oh, your humble servant, Madam. You had like to have been behelden to your mask, cousin.—I must brazen it out.

Cl. Ha, ha, ha! You were not so happy in your disguise, Sir. The pretty stagger in your gait, that happy disposition of your wig, the genteel negligence of your whole person, and those pretty flowers of modish gallantry, made it impossible to mistake you, my sweet coz. Ha, ha!

Ran. Oh, I knew you too; but I fancied you had taken a particular liking to my person, and had a mind to sink the relation under that little piece of black velvet; and 'egad, you never find me behind-hand in a frolic. But since it is otherwise, my merry, good-humoured cousin, I am as heartily glad to see you in town, as I should be to meet any of my old bottle acquaintance.

Cl. And on my side I am as happy in meeting your worship, as I should be in a rencounter with e'er a petticoat in Christendom.

Ran. And if you have any occasion for a dangle gallant to Yauxhall, Ranelagh, or even the poor neglected Park, you are so unlike the rest of your virtuous sisters of the petticoat, that I will venture myself with you.

Cl. Take care what you promise; for who knows but this face, you were pleased to say so many pretty things of before you saw it, may raise so many rivals among your kept mistresses and reps of quality—

Ran. Hold, hold! a truce with your satire, sweet coz; or, if scandal must be the topic of every virtuous woman's conversation, call for your tea-water, and let it be in its proper element. Come, your tea, your tea.

Cl. With all my heart. Who's there?

Re-enter MAID.

Get tea—[Exit MAID.] upon condition that you stay till it comes.

Ran. That is according as you behave, Madam.

Cl. Oh, Sir, I am very sensible of the favour.

Ran. Nay, you may, I assure you; for there is but one woman of virtue besides yourself I would stay with ten minutes (and I have not known her above these twelve hours;) the insipidity, or the rancour of their discourse, is insufferable—'Sdeath! I had rather take the air with my grandmother.

Cl. Ha, ha, ha! the ladies are highly obliged to you, I vow.

Ran. I tell you what; the lady I speak of was obliged to me, and the generous girl is ready to own it.

Cl. And pray when was it you did virtue this considerable service!

Ran. But this last night, the devil fetch me! A romantic whim of mine conveyed me into her chamber, where I found her, young and beautiful, alone, at midnight, dressed like a soft Adonis; her lovely hair all loose about her shoulders—

Cl. In boy's clothes! this is worth attending to.

Ran. 'Gad, I no more suspected her being a woman, than I did your being my cater-cousin.

Cl. How did you discover it at last?

Ran. Why, faith, she very modestly dropped me a hint of it herself.

Cl. Herself! if this should be Jacintha!

[Aside.]

Ran. Ay, 'fore 'gad, did she: which I imagined a good sign at midnight, ay, cousin! So I e'en invented a long story of a passion I had for her, though I had never seen her before—you know my old way—and said so many, such tender things—

Cl. As you said to me just now.

Ran. Pho! quite in another style, I assure you. It was midnight, and I was in a right cue.

Cl. Well, and what did she answer to all these protestations?

Ran. Why, instead of running into my arms at once, as I expected—

Cl. To be sure.

Ran. 'Gad, like a free-hearted, honest girl, she frankly told me she liked another better than she liked me; that I had something in my face that showed I was a gentleman, and she would e'en trust herself with me, if I would give her my word I would convey her to her spark.

Cl. Oh, brave! and how did you bear this?

Ran. Why curse me, if I am ever angry with a woman for not having a passion for me.

Cl. No?

Ran. Never. I only hate your sex's vain pretence of having no passion at all. 'Gad, I loved the good-natured girl for it, took her at her word, stole her out of the window, and this morning made a very honest fellow happy in the possession of her.

Cl. And her name is Jacintha?

Ran. Ha!

Cl. Your amours are no secrets, Sir. You see you might as well have told me all the whole of last night's adventure; for you find I know.

Ran. All! Why, what do you know?

Cl. Nay, nothing. I only know that a gentleman's hat cannot be dropped in a lady's chamber—

Ran. The devil!

Cl. But a husband is such an odd, impertinent, awkward creature, that he will be stumbling over it.

Ran. Here hath been fine work. [Aside.] But how, in the name of wonder, should you know all this?

Cl. By being in the same house.

Ran. In the same house?

Cl. Ay, in the same house, a witness of the confusion you have made.

Ran. Frankly! Clarinda, by all that's fortunate! It must be so!

[Aside.]

Cl. And let me tell you, Sir, that even the dull, low-spirited diversions you ridicule in us tame creatures, are preferable to the romantic exploits that only wine can raise you to.

Ran. Yes, cousin.—But I'll be even with you.

[Aside.]

Cl. If you reflect, cousin, you will find a great deal of wit in shocking a lady's modesty, disturbing her quiet, tainting her reputation, and ruining the peace of a whole family!

Ran. To be sure.

Cl. These are the high-metled pleasures of you men of spirit, that the insipidity of the virtuous can never arrive at. And can you in reality think your Burgundy and your Bacchus, your Venus and your loves, an excuse for all this? Fie, cousin, fie.

Ran. No, cousin.

Cl. What, dumb? I am glad you have modesty enough left not to go about to excuse yourself.

Ran. It is as you say; when we are sober, and reflect but ever so little on the follies we commit, we are ashamed and sorry; and yet the very next minute we run again into the same absurdities.

Cl. What! moralizing, cousin? ha, ha, ha.

Ran. What you know is not half, not a hundredth part of the mischief of my last night's frolic; and yet the very next petticoat I saw this morning, I must follow it, and be damned to me; though, for aught I know, poor Frankly's life may depend upon it.

Cl. Whose life, Sir?

Ran. And here do I stand prating to you now.

Cl. Pray, good cousin, explain yourself.

Ran. Good cousin! she has it. [Aside.] Why, whilst I was making off with the wench, Bellamy and he were quarrelling about her; and though Jacintha and I made all the haste we could, we did not get to them before—

Cl. Before what? I'm frightened out of my wits.

Ran. Not that Frankly cared three-halfpence for the girl.

Cl. But there was no mischief done, I hope?

Ran. Pho! a slight scratch; nothing at all, as the surgeon said: though he was but a queer-looking son of a bitch of a surgeon neither.

Cl. Good God! why, he should have the best that can be found in London.

Ran. Ay, indeed, so he should; that was what I was going for when I saw you. [Sits down.] They are all at Jack Meggot's, hard by, and you will keep me here.

Cl. I keep you here! For Heaven's sake, begone!

Ran. Your tea is a damned while a coming.

Cl. You shall have no tea now, I assure you.

Ran. Nay, one dish!

Cl. No, positively you shall not stay.

Ran. Your commands are absolute, Madam.

[Going.]

Cl. Then Frankly is true, and I only am to blame.

Ran. [Returns.] But I beg ten thousand pardons, cousin, that I should forget—

Cl. Forget what?

Ran. Forget to salute you.

Cl. Pshaw! how can you trifle at such a time as this?

Ran. A trifle! wrong not your beauty.

Cl. Lord, how teasing you are! There.

Ran. [Kisses her.] Poor thing, how uneasy she is! [Aside.] Nay, no ceremony; you shall not stir a step with me. [Exit.]

Cl. I do not intend it. This is downright provoking. [Exit.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Room in MR. STRICTLAND'S House.

MR. and MRS. STRICTLAND; she weeping, he writing.

Mrs. S. Heigh ho!

Strict. What can possibly be the occasion of that sigh, Madam? you have yourself agreed to a maintenance, and a maintenance no duchess need be ashamed of.

Mrs. S. But the extremities of provocation that drove me to that agreement—

Strict. Were the effect of your own follies. Why do you disturb me? [Writes.]

Mrs. S. I would not willingly give you a moment's uneasiness; I but desire a fair and equal hearing; and if I satisfy you not in every point, then abandon me, discard me to the world, and its malicious tongues.

Strict. What was it you said? Damn this pen.

Mrs. S. I say, Mr. Strictland, I would only—

Strict. You would only—you would only repeat what you have been saying this hour, I am innocent; and when I showed you the letter I had taken from your maid, what was then your poor evasion, but that it was to Clarinda, and you were innocent.

Mrs. S. Heaven knows, I am innocent.

Strict. But I know your Clarinda, your woman of honour, is your blind, your cover, your— But why do I distract myself about a woman I have no longer any concerns with? Here, Madam, is your fate—a letter to your brother in the country.

Mrs. S. Sir—

Strict. I have told him what a sister he is to receive, and how to bid her welcome.

Mrs. S. Then my ruin is complete. My brother!

Strict. I must vindicate my own honour, else what will the world say?

Mrs. S. That brother was my only hope, my only ground of patience. In his retirement I hoped my name might have been safe, and slept, till by some happy means you might at length have known me innocent, and pitied me.

Strict. Retirement! pretty soul! no, no, that face was never made for retirement; it is another sort of retiring you are fittest for. Ha! hark! What's that? [A knocking at the door.] Two gentle taps—and why but two? was that the signal, Madam? Stir not, on your life!

Mrs. S. Give me resolution, Heaven, to bear this usage, and keep it secret from the world.

[Aside.]

Strict. I will have no signs, no items, no hem to tell him I am here. [A knock.] Ha, another tap! The gentleman is in haste, I find.

[Opens the door.]

Enter TESTER.

Tester! Why did you not come in, rascal? [Beats him.] All vexations meet to cross me.

Tes. Lard, Sir! what do you strike me for? my mistress ordered me never to come in where she was, without first knocking at the door.

Strict. Oh, cunning devil! Tester is too honest to be trusted.

Mrs. S. Unhappy man! will nothing deceive him?

Tes. Sir, here is a letter.

Strict. To my wife?

Tes. No, Sir, to you. The servant waits below.

Strict. Art sure it is a servant?

Tes. Sir! it is Mr. Buckle, Sir.

[Stares.]

Strict. I am mad; I know not what to say, or do, or think. But let's read—

[Reads to himself.]

Sir—We cannot bear to reflect that Mrs. Strictland may possibly be ruined in your esteem, and in the voice of the world, only by the confusion which our affairs have made in your family, without offering all within our power to clear the misunderstanding between you. If you will give yourself the trouble but to step to Mr. Meggot's, where all parties will be, we doubt not but we can entirely satisfy your most flagrant suspicions, to the honour of Mrs. Strickland, and the quiet of your lives.

JACINTHA. JOHN BELLAMY.

Hey! here is the whole gang witnessing for one another. They think I am an ass, and will be led by the nose to believe every thing. [Aside.] Call me a chair. [Exit TESTER.] Yes, I will go to this rendezvous of enemies—I will—and find out all her plots, her artifices, and contrivances; it will clear my conduct to her brother and all her friends.

[Aside, and exit.]

Mrs. S. Gone so abruptly! What can that letter be about? no matter; there is no way left to make us easy but by my disgrace, and I must learn to suffer; time and innocence will teach me to bear it patiently.

Enter LUCETTA.

Luc. Mrs. Bellamy, Madam (for my young lady is married) begs you would follow Mr. Strickland to Mr. Meggot's. She makes no doubt but she shall be able to make you and my master easy.

Mrs. S. But how came she to know any thing of the matter?

Luc. I have been with them, Madam; I could not bear to see so good a lady so ill treated.

Mrs. S. I am indeed, Lucetta, ill treated; but I hope this day will be the last of it.

Luc. Madam Clarinda and Mr. Frankly will be there, and the young gentleman, Madam, who was with you in this room last night.

Mrs. S. Ha! if he is there, there may be hopes; and it is worth the trying.

Luc. Dear lady, let me call a chair.

Mrs. S. I'll go with you, I cannot be more wretched than I am. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Room in JACK MEGGOT'S House.

Enter FRANKLY, RANGER, BELLAMY, JACINTHA, and JACK MEGGOT.

Frank. Oh, Ranger, this is news indeed! your cousin, and a lady of such fortune?

Ran. I have done the business for you; I tell you she's your own. She loves you.

Frank. You make my heart dance with joy. Words are too faint to tell the joy I feel.

Ran. I have put that heart of hers into such a flutter, that I'll lay a hundred guineas, with the assistance which this lady has promised me, I fix her yours directly.

Jac. Ay, ay, Mr. Frankly, we have a design upon her which cannot fail. But you must obey orders.

Frank. Most willingly; but remember, dear lady, I have more than life at stake.

Jac. Away then into the next room; for she is this instant coming hither.

Frank. Hither! you surprise me more and more.

Jac. Here is a message from her, by which she desires leave to wait on me this afternoon.

Ran. Only for the chance of seeing you here, I assure ye.

Frank. Let me hug thee, though I know not how to believe it.

Ran. Pshaw! pry'thee don't stifle me! It is a busy day, a very busy day.

J. Meg. Thou art the most unaccountable creature in life.

Ran. But the most lucky one, Jack, if I succeed for Frankly as I have for Bellamy, and my heart whispers me I shall. Come in, most noble Mr. Buckle: and what have you to propose?

Enter BUCKLE.

Buck. A lady, Madam, in a chair, says her name is Clarinda.

Jac. Desire her to walk up.

Bel. How could you let her wait? [Exit BUCKLE.] You must excuse him, Madam; Buckle is a true bachelor's servant, and knows no manners.

Jac. Away, away Mr. Frankly, and stay till I call you. A rap with my fan shall be the signal. [Exit FRANKLY.] We make very free with your house, Mr. Meggot.

J. Meg. Oh, you could not oblige me more.

Enter CLARINDA.

Cl. Dear Mrs. Bellamy, pity my confusion, I am to wish you joy and ask your pardon all in a breath. I know not what to say; I am quite ashamed of my last night's behaviour.

Jac. Come, come Clarinda, it is all well; all is over and forgot. Mr. Bellamy— [Salute.]

Cl. I wish you joy, Sir, with all my heart; and should have been very sorry if any folly of mine had prevented it.

Bel. Madam, I am obliged to you.

Cl. I see nothing of Mr. Frankly! my mind misgives me. [Aside.]

Ran. And so, you came hither purely out of friendship, good nature, and humility.

Cl. Purely.

Ran. To confess your offences, to beg pardon, and to make reparation.

Cl. Purely. Is this any thing so extraordinary?

J. Meg. The most so of any thing in life, I think.

Ran. A very whimsical business for so fine a lady, and an errand you seldom went on before, I fancy, my dear cousin.

Jac. Never, I dare swear, if I may judge by the awkward concern she shows in delivering it.

Cl. Concern! Lard, well I protest you are all exceeding pretty company! Being settled for life, Jacinthia, gives an ease to the mind that brightens conversation strangely.

Jac. I am sorry, with all my heart, you are not in the same condition; for as you are, my dear, you are horridly chagriné.

Ran. But with a little of our help, Madam, the lady may recover, and be very good company.

Cl. Hum! what does he mean, Mr. Bellamy?

Bel. Ask him, Madam.

Cl. Indeed I shall not give myself the trouble.

Jac. Then you know what he means.

Cl. Something impertinent, I suppose, not worth explaining.

Jac. It is something you wont let him explain, I find.

Re-enter BUCKLE, and whispers JACK MEGGOT.

J. Meg. Very well. Desire him to walk into the parlour. Madam, the gentleman is below.

Jac. Then every one to your posts. You know your cues.

Ran. I warrant ye. [Exeunt Gentlemen.]

Cl. All gone! I am glad of it, for I want to speak to you.

Jac. And I, my dear Clarinda, have something which I do not know how to tell you: but it must be known sooner or later.

Cl. What 's the matter?

Jac. Poor Mr. Frankly—

Cl. You fright me out of my senses!

Jac. Has no wounds but what you can cure. Ha, ha, ha!

Cl. Pshaw! I am angry.

Jac. Pshaw! You are pleased; and will be more so, when I tell you this man, whom fortune has thrown in your way, is in rank and temper the man in the world who suits you best for a husband.

Cl. Husband! I say, husband indeed! where will this end? [Aside.]

Jac. His very soul is yours, and he only waits an opportunity of telling you so. He is in the next room. Shall I call him in?

Cl. My dear girl, hold!

Jac. How foolish is this coyness now, Clarinda! If the men were here indeed, something might be said—And so, Mr. Frankly—

Cl. How can you be so teasing?

Jac. Nay, I am in downright earnest; and to show how particular I have been in my inquiries, though I know you have a spirit above regarding the modish, paltry way of a Smithfield bargain—His fortune—

Cl. I don't care what his fortune is.

Jac. Don't you so; then you are further gone than I thought you were.

Cl. No, pshaw! Pr'ythee, I don't mean so neither.

Jac. I don't care what you mean; but you would like him the worse, I hope, for having a fortune superior to your own. Now shall I call him in!

Cl. Pho, dear girl—Some other time.

Jac. [Raps with her fan.] That's the signal, and here he is. You shall not stir: I positively will leave you together. [Exit.]

Cl. I tremble all over.

Enter FRANKLY.

Frank. Pardon this freedom, Madam; but I hope our having so luckily met with a common friend in Mrs. Bellamy—

Cl. Sir!

Frank. Makes any further apology for my behaviour last night absolutely unnecessary.

Cl. So far, Mr. Frankly, that I think the apology should be rather on my side, for the impertinent bustle I made about her.

Frank. This behaviour gives me hopes, Madam: pardon the construction—but from the little bustle you made about the lady, may I not hope you was not quite indifferent about the gentleman?

Cl. Have a care of being too sanguine in your hopes: might not a love of power, or the satisfaction of showing that power, or the dear pleasure of abusing that power; might not these have been foundation enough for more than what I did?

Frank. Charming woman! with most of your sex, I grant, they might, but not with you. Whatever power your beauty gives, your good nature will allow you no other use of it than to oblige.

Cl. This is the height of compliment, Mr. Frankly.

Frank. Not in my opinion, I assure you, Madam; and I am now going to put it to the trial.

Cl. What is he going to say now? [Aside.]

Frank. What is it that ails me, that I cannot speak? Pshaw! he here!

Enter RANGER.

Interrupted! impertinent! [Aside.]

Ran. There is no sight so ridiculous as a pair of your true lovers. Here are you two now, bowing and cringing, and keeping a passion secret from one another, that is no secret to all the house beside; and if you don't make the matter up immediately, it will be all over the town within these two hours.

Cl. What do you mean?

Frank. Ranger—

Ran. Do you be quiet, can't ye? [Apart to FRANKLY.] But it is over, I suppose, cousin, and you have given him your consent?

Cl. Sir, the liberties you are pleased to take with me—

Ran. Oh! in your airs still, are you? Why then, Mr. Frankly, there is a certain letter of yours, Sir, to this lady—

Cl. A letter to me?

Ran. Ay! to you, Madam.

Frank. Ha! what of that letter?

Ran. It is only fallen into Mr. Strickland's hands, that is all; and he has read it.

Frank. Read it!

Ran. Ay, read it to all his family at home, and to all the company below; and if some stop be not put to it, it will be read in all the coffee-houses in town.

Frank. A stop! this sword shall put a stop to it, or I will perish in the attempt.

Ran. But will that sword put a stop to the talk of the town?—Only make it talk the faster, take my word for it.

Cl. This is all a trick.

Ran. A trick! it is so? you shall soon see that, my fine cousin. [Exit.]

Frank. It is but too true, I fear. There is such a letter, which I gave Lucetta. Can you forgive me? Was I much to blame, when I could neither see nor hear of you?

Cl. [Tenderly.] You give yourself, Mr. Frankly, a thousand more uneasinesses than you need about me.

Frank. If this uneasiness but convinces you how much I love you—Interrupted again!

Cl. This is downright malice. [Aside.]

Re-enter RANGER, followed by JACINTHA, STRICTLAND, BELLAMY, and JACK MEGGOT.

Ran. Enter, enter, gentlemen and lady. Now you shall see whether this is a trick or no.

Cl. Mr. Strickland here! What is all this?

Jac. Do not be uneasy, my dear; we will explain it to you.

Frank. I cannot bear this trifling, Ranger, when my heart is on the rack.

Ran. Come this way, then, and learn.

[JACINTHA, CLARINDA, FRANKLY, and RANGER, retire. STRICTLAND, BELLAMY, and MEGGOT advance.]

Strict. Why, I know not well what to say. This has a face. This letter may as well agree with Clarinda as with my wife, as you have told the story; and Lucetta explained it so; but she, for a sixpenny piece, would have construed it the other way.

J. Meg. But, Sir, if we produce this Mr. Frankly to you, and he owns himself the author of this letter—

Bel. And if Clarinda likewise be brought before your face to encourage his addresses, there can be no further room for doubt.

Strict. No. Let that appear, and I shall, I think I shall, be satisfied—But yet it cannot be—Bel. Why not? Hear me, Sir.

[They talk; JACIN. CLARINDA. FRANKLY, and RAN. advance.

Jac. In short, Clarinda, unless the affair is made up directly, a separation, with all the obloquy on her side, must be the consequence.

Cl. Poor Mrs. Strictland! I pity her: but for him, he deserves all he feels, were it ten times what it is.

Jac. It is for her sake only, that we beg of you both to bear his impertinence.

Cl. With all my heart. You will do what you please with me.

Frank. Generous creature!

Strict. Ha! here she is, and with the very man I saw deliver the letter to Lucetta. I do begin to fear I have made myself a fool. Now for the proof. [Aside.] Here is a letter, Sir, which has given me great disturbance, and these gentlemen assure me it was wrote by you.

Frank. That letter, Sir, upon my honour, I left this morning with Lucetta, for this lady.

Strict. For that lady? and Frankly, the name at the bottom, is not feigned, but your real name?

Frank. Frankly is my name.

Strict. I see, I feel myself ridiculous. [Aside.]

Jac. Now, Mr. Strictland, I hope—

J. Meg. Ay, ay; a clear case.

Strict. I am satisfied, and will go this instant to Mrs. Strictland.

Ran. Why then the devil fetch me, if this would satisfy me.

Strict. What's that?

Ran. Nay, nothing; it is no affair of mine.

Bel. What do you mean, Ranger?

Strict. Ay, what do you mean? I will know before I stir.

Ran. With all my heart, Sir. Cannot you see that all this may be a concerted matter between them?

Frank. Ranger, you know I can resent.

Strict. Go on; I will defend you, let who will resent it.

Ran. Why then, Sir, I declare myself your friend: and were I as you, nothing but their immediate marriage should convince me.

Strict. Sir, you're right, and are my friend indeed. Give me your hand.

Ran. Nay, were I to hear her say—I, Clarinda, take thee, Charles, I would not believe them till I saw them a-bed together. Now resent it as you will.

Strict. Ay, Sir, as you will; but nothing less shall convince me; and so, my fine lady, if you are in earnest—

Cl. Sure, Mr. Strictland—

Strict. Nay, no flouncing; you cannot escape.

Ran. Why, Frankly, has't no soul?

Frank. I pity her confusion.

Ran. Pity her confusion!—the man's a fool—Here, take her hand.

Frank. Thus, on my knees, then, let me ravish with your hand, your heart.

Cl. Ravish it you cannot; for it is with all my heart I give it you.

Strict. I am satisfied.

Cl. And so am I, now it is once over.

Ran. And so am I, my dainty cousin; and I wish you joy of a man your whole sex would go to cuffs for, if they knew him but half so well as I do—Ha! she here; this is more than I bargained for. [Aside.]

Enter JACINTHA, leading in MRS. STRICTLAND.

Strict. [Embracing MRS. STRICTLAND.] Madam, reproach me not with my folly, and you shall never hear of it again.

Mrs. S. Reproach you! No! if ever you hear the least reflection pass my lips, forsake me in that instant; or, what would yet be worse, suspect again.

Strict. It is enough. I am ashamed to talk to thee. This letter, which I wrote to your brother, thus I tear in pieces, and with it part for ever with my jealousy.

Mrs. S. This is a joy, indeed! as great as unexpected. Yet there is one thing wanting to make it lasting.

Ran. What the devil is coming now. [Aside.]

Mrs. S. Be assured, every other suspicion of me was as unjust as your last; though perhaps you had more foundation for your fears.

Ran. She wont tell, sure, for her own sake. [Aside.]

Mrs. S. All must be cleared before my heart will be at ease.

Ran. It looks plaguy like it, though! [Aside.]

Strict. What mean you? I am all attention.

Mrs. S. There was a man, as you suspected, in my chamber, last night.

Strict. Ha! take care, I shall relapse.

Mrs. S. That gentleman was he—

Ran. Here is a devil for you! [Aside.]

Mrs. S. Let him explain the rest.

Ran. A frolic, a mere frolic, on my life.

Strict. A frolic! 'Zounds! [They interpose.]

Ran. Nay, don't let us quarrel the very moment you declared yourself my friend. There was no harm done, I promise you. Nay, never frown. After I have told my story, any satisfaction you are pleased to ask, I shall be ready to give.

Strict. Be quick then, and ease me of my pain.

Ran. Why then, as I was strolling about last night, upon the look out, I must confess, chance, and chance only, conveyed me to your house, where I espied a ladder of ropes most invitingly fastened to the window.

Jac. Which ladder, I had fastened for my escape.

Strict. Proceed.

Ran. Up mounted I, and up I should have gone, if it had been in the garret; it's all one to Ranger. I opened one door, and then another, and to my great surprise the whole house was silent; at last, I stole into a room where this lady was undressing.

Strict. 'Sdeath and the devil! you did not dare sure—

Ran. I don't know whether I had dared, or no, if I had not heard the maid say something of her master's being jealous. Oh, damn me, thought I, then the work is half done to my hands.

Jac. Do you mind that, Mr. Strictland?

Strict. I do—I do, most feelingly.

Ran. The maid grew saucy, and most conveniently to my wishes was turned out of the room; and if you had not the best wife in the world—

Strict. Ounds, Sir, but what right have you—

Ran. What right, Sir? if you will be jealous of your wife without a cause; if you will be out at this time of night, when you might have been so much better employed at home; we young fellows think we have a right—

Strict. No joking, I beseech you; you know not what I feel.

Ran. Then seriously, I was mad, or drunk enough, call it which you will, to be very rude to this lady, for which I ask both her pardon and yours. I am an odd sort of a fellow, perhaps; but I am above telling you or any man a lie, damn me, if I am not.

Strict. I must, I cannot but believe you; and for the future, Madam, you shall find a heart ready to love and trust you. No tears, I beg; I cannot bear them.

Mrs. S. I cannot speak, and yet there is a favour, Sir—

Strict. I understand you; and, as a proof of the sincerity with which I speak, I beg it as a favour, of this lady in particular, [To CLARINDA.] and of all the company in general, to return to my house immediately, where every thing, Mr. Bellamy, shall be settled to your entire satisfaction. No thanks; I have not deserved them.

Ran. Why, this is honest; continue but in this humour, and faith, Sir, you may trust me to run about your house like a spaniel. I cannot sufficiently admire the whimsicalness of my good fortune, in being so instrumental to this general happiness. Bellamy, Frankly, I wish you joy with all my heart, though I had rather you should be married than I, for all that. Never did matrimony appear to me with a smile upon her face till this instant.

Sure joys for ever wait each happy pair,
When sense the man, and virtue crowns the fair,

And kind compliance proves their mutual care.

[Exeunt.]

TOM THUMB THE GREAT:

A BURLESQUE TRAGEDY,

IN TWO ACTS

ALTERED, FROM FIELDING,

BY KANE O'HARA, Esq.

REMARKS.

THOUGH small in its subject, this "tragedy of tragedies" has engaged the attention of two dramatic writers, its original parent, Henry Fielding, our celebrated novelist, brought it on the Haymarket stage, in the year 1730, when it met with great success. This burlesque may be considered almost the best that ever appeared. It is, also, a proper sequel to the Duke of Buckingham's Rehearsal; as it embraces and satirises the absurdities of almost all the writers of tragedy from the period when that piece stops. The love-scenes, rage, marriage, battle, and catastrophe, are such forcible imitations of the rules observed by the tragic writers of that time, that the satire conveyed in them cannot escape the observation of any one conversant with the writers of the last century;* and to those who do not comprehend every turn of its humour, it will always appear agreeable.

In Mr. O'Hara's alteration of this piece of true burlesque, he has certainly, allowing for its compression, preserved the points of the original, and presented an entertainment that maintains its credit undiminished on the stage

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

Characters in Fielding's Original Piece, entitled, "The Tragedy of Tragedies; or, the Life and Death of Tom Thumb the Great;" as performed at the Haymarket, 1730.

KING ARTHUR, a passionate sort of King, husband to Queen Dollalolla, of whom he stands a little in fear; father to Huncamunca, whom he is very fond of; and in love with Glumdalca,	Mr. Mullart.
TOM THUMB THE GREAT, a little hero with a great soul, something violent in his temper, which is a little abated by his love for Huncamunca,	Young Verhuyck.
GHOST OF GAFFER THUMB, a whimsical sort of Ghost,	Mr. Lacy.
LORD GRIZZLE, extremely zealous for the liberty of the subject, very choleric in his temper, and in love with Huncamunca,	Mr. Jones.

 PRINCESS HUNCAMUNGA, Mrs. Taylor.
 GLUMDALCA, Miss Leserve.
 FRIZALETTA, Miss Vining.
 FLUMANTE, Mrs. Kendal.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Palace Yard.

Enter DOODLE on one side of the stage, and NOODLE on the other; after a long obeisance, they embrace.

DUET.

Dood. Sure such a day,
 So renown'd, so victorious—
 Such a day as this was never seen;
 Courtiers so gay,
 And the mob so uproarious—
 Nature seems to wear a universal grin.

Nood. Arthur to Doll
 Is grown bobbish and uxorious;
 While both she and Huncamunca tippie, talking tawdry;
 Even Mr. Sol,
 So tilted out, so glorious,
 Glitters like a beau in a new birth-day embroidery.

Dood. Oh, 'tis a day
 Of jubilee, cajollery;
 A day we never saw before;
 A day of fun and drollery.

Nood. That you may say,
 Their majesties may boast of it;
 And since it never can come more,
 'Tis fit they make the most of it.

Dood. Oh, 'tis a day, &c.
 Nood. That you may say, &c.
 Dood. Sure such a day, &c.
 Nood. Courtiers so gay, &c.

Dood. Yes, Noodle, yes;—to-day the mighty
 Thumb
 Returns triumphant.—Captive giants swarm
 Like bees behind his car. [Flourish of trumpets.
 Nood. These trumpets speak the king at levee
 —I go.
 Dood. And I also—to offer my petition.
 Nood. Doodle, do. [Exit.

SCENE II.—Inside of the Palace.

The KING and QUEEN seated on a throne.—
 LORD GRIZZLE, Courtiers, and Attendants.—
 DOODLE and NOODLE apart.

King. Let no face but a face of joy be seen!
 The man, who this day frowns, shall lose his head,
 That he may have no face to frown withal—
 Smile, Dollalolla! [Kisses her.

Dood. [Kneeling.] Dread liege,
 This petition—
 King. [Dashes it away.] Petition me no petitions, Sir, to-day;
 To-day it is our pleasure—to be drunk,
 And this our queen shall be as drunk as we.

Queen. Is't so? why then perdition catch the failers!
 Let's have a row, and get as drunk as tailors.

AIR.

What though I now am half seas o'er,
 I scorn to balk this bout,
 Of stiff rack-punch fetch bowls a score,
 'Fore George, I'll see them out.
 What though, &c.

But, Sir, your queen 'twould ill become,
 T' indulge in vulgar sips;
 No drop of brandy, gin, or rum,
 Should pass these royal lips.
 But, Sir, &c.

Chorus.—Rum ti iddity, row, row, row,
 If we'd a good sup, we'd take it now.

King. Though rack, in punch, ten shillings were a quart,
 And rum and brandy be but half-a-crown,
 Rather than quarrel, thou shalt have thy fill.

[Flourish of drums and trumpets.
 Nood. These martial sounds, my liege, announce the general.

King. Haste we to meet, and meetly to receive
 him.
 [Rises from the throne; martial music.

Enter TOM THUMB, Attendants, and GLUM-
 DALCA, in chains.

Welcome, thrice welcome, mighty Thomas
 Thumb!
 Thou tiny hero—pigmy giant queller!
 What gratitude can thank away the debt
 Thy valour puts upon us.

[Takes him up and embraces him.
 Queen. Oh! ye gods! [Aside.

Tom. When I'm not thank'd at all I'm thank'd enough—
 I've done my duty, and I've done no more [Bows.

 Queen. Was ever such a godlike creature seen?
 King. Thy modesty's a flambeau to thy merit;
 It shines itself, and shows thy merit too.
 O Tommy, Tommy Thumb! what to thy prowess do we owe!

Ask some reward—great as we can bestow.
 Tom. I ask not kingdoms, I can conquer those;
 I ask not money, money I've enough:
 If this be called a debt, take my receipt in full:
 I ask but this, to sun myself in Huncamunca's
 eyes,

King. [Aside.] Prodigious bold request!
 Queen. Be still, my soul!—
 King. [After a pause.] It is resolv'd.
 The princess is thy own! [To THUMB.
 Tom. O happy Tommy! super-happy Thumb
 Whisper, ye winds, that Huncamunca's mine!

The bloody bus'ness of grim war is o'er,
And beauty, heavenly beauty, crowns my toils.

AIR.

As when the chimney-sweeper
Has, all the live-long day,
Through darksome paths a creeper,
Pursued his sooty way:

At night, to wash in water
His hands and face he flies;
And, in his t'other tatter,
With his Brickdusta lies.

[Exit;—flourish of Trumpets.

King. [Looking fondly at GLUMDALCA.] I feel a sudden pain across my breast; [Aside.
Nor know I whether it proceeds from love
Or the wind-cholic—but time will show.—Huge-ous queen of hearts!

Sure thou wert form'd by all the gods in council;
Who, having made a lucky hit beyond their journey-work,

Cry'd out—"This is a woman!" [taken.

Glum. Then were the gods confoundedly mis-
We are a giantess—I tell thee, Arthur,
We yesterday were both a queen and wife;
One hundred thousand giants own'd our sway;
Twenty whereof were wedded to ourself.

Queen. Oh, bless'd prerogative of giantism!

King. Oh! vast queen!—Think our court thine own; [pay
Call for whatever thou lik'st—there's nought to Nor art thou captive, but thy captive we.

Queen. [Aside.] Ha! Arthur faithless!
This gag my rival, too, in dear Tom Thumb!

Revenge!—but I'll dissemble—
Madam, believe that with a woman's eye
I view your loss—take comfort—for, to-morrow
Our grenadiers shall be called out, then choose
As many husbands as you think you'll want.

Glum. Madam, I rest your much obliged and very humble servant. [Exit.

Queen. Though greater yet Tom's boasted merit was,
He shall not have my daughter, that is pos.

[Advancing to the KING.

King. Ha! say'st thou?

Queen. Yes, I say he sha'n't.

King. How, sha'n't!
Now by our royal self, we swear—I'll be damn'd,
but he shall.

AIR.—QUEEN.

Then tremble all, who weddings ever made,
And tremble more who did this match persuade;
For, like a worried eat, I'll spit, I'll squall,
I'll scratch, I'll tear the eyes out of ye all.

[The KING throws his hat at the QUEEN.

[Exit QUEEN and LADIES.

Dood. Her majesty, the queen, is in a passion.
King. She may be damn'd. Who cares? We were indeed

A pretty king of clouts, were we to truckle
To all her maudlin humours.

AIR.—KING.

We kings, who are in our senses,
Mock our consorts violences;
Pishing at their moods and tenses,
Our own will we follow.

VOL. I. . . . 3 T

If the husband, once gives way
To his wife's capricious sway,
For his breeches he next day
May go whoop and hollow. [Exit

SCENE II.—Changes to the outside of the Palace.

Enter LORD GRIZZLE.

Griz. Arthur wrongs me!
Cheats me of my Huncamunca!
Rouse thee, Grizzle! 'Sblood, I'll be a rebel.
Alas! What art thou, honour?
A Monmouth-street laced coat, gracing to-day
My back; to-morrow glittering on another's—
To arms! to arms!

Enter QUEEN, in a rage.

Queen. Teach me to scold, O Grizzle!
Griz. Scold, would my queen!—Say, ah!
wherefore!

Queen. Wherefore!

Faggots and fire—my daughter to Tom Thumb!

Griz. I'll mince the atom into countless pieces.

Queen. Oh! no; prevent the match, but hurt not him—

Him!—thou!—thou kill the man

Who kill'd the giants?

Griz. Giants!—why, Madam, 'tis all flummery:

He made the giants first, and then he kill'd them.

Queen. How! hast thou seen no giants? Are there not

Now in our yard ten thousand proper giants?

Griz. Madam, shall I tell you what I am going to say? I do not positively know, but, as near as I can guess, I cannot tell; though I firmly do believe there is not one.

Queen. Out from my sight, base Pickthank, hie, begone!

By all my stars, thou envious Tom Thumb.

Griz. Yes, yes, I go; but, Madam, know
(Since your majesty's so pert)

That a flood of Tommy's blood,

To allay this storm shall spirt.

[Exit.

SCENE III.—An Antechamber.

The KING, on a Couch.

King. Methought
I heard a voice say, "Sleep no more!
Glumdalca exiles sleep—and therefore, Arthur
Can sleep no more.

The Ghost of GAFFER THUMB rises, with a blue lantern on a long staff.

Ghost. Oh! Arthur! Arthur! Arthur!

Soon shalt thou sleep enough.

King. Ah! what art thou?

Ghost. The ghost of Gaffer Thumb.

King. A ghost!—Stand off!

I'll have thee laid in the Red Sea.

Ghost. Oh, Arthur! take heed.

My thread is spun—list, list, oh, list!

AIR.

Pale death is prowling,
Dire omens, scowling,
Doom thee to slaughter,
Thee, thy wife, and daughter.
Furies are growling,
With horrid groans:
Grizzle's rebellion,

What need I tell you on ?
Or by a red cow,
Tom Thumb devoured ?
Hark ! the cock crowing. [Cock crows.]
I must be going,
I can no more. [Vanishes.]

King. No more ! and why no more, or why so much ?
Better quite ignorant, than half instructed.
By Jove, this bo-peep ghost makes game of us ;
Therefore, Fate, keep your secret to yourself.

AIR.

Such a fine king as I don't fear your threats of a rush,
Do show your sweet phiz again, and I'll quickly call up a blush,
For I am up, up, up,
But you are down, down, down,
Do pop up your nob agin,
And 'egad I'll crack your crown.
Who cares for you, Mr. Ghost ? or all that you can do ;
I laugh at your stupid threats, and your cock-a-doodle do ; [Cock crows.]
For I am up, up, up,
But you are down, down, down ;
Draw your sword like a man,
Or I'll box you for a crown.
Rum ti iddity, &c. [Scene closes.]

SCENE IV.—HUNCAMUNCA'S Dressing Room.

HUNCAMUNCA at her toilette, FRIZALETTA waiting.

Hunc. Give me some music,—see that it be sad.
[Band plays a strain.]
Oh, Tommy Thumb ! why art thou Tommy Thumb ?
Why had not mighty Bantam been thy father ?
Why not the king of Brentford, old or new ?
Friz. Madam, Lord Grizzle.

Enter LORD GRIZZLE.

Griz. [Kneeling.] Oh, Huncamunca ! Huncamunca, oh !

Hunc. This to my rank,—bold man !
Griz. Ah, beauteous princess !
Love levels rank,—lords down to cellar bears,
And bids the brawny porter walk up stairs.—
Nought is for love too high, nor aught too low—
Oh, Huncamunca ! Huncamunca, oh !

Hunc. My lord, in vain, a-suitoring you come,
For I'm engaged this instant to Tom Thumb.

Griz. Play not the fool ! that less than baby shun,

Or you will ne'er be brought to bed of one.

Hunc. Am I thus fobb'd ?—then I my words recal.

Griz. Shall I to Doctors' Commons ?

Hunc. Do so, pray—
I now am in the mood, and cannot stay.

AIR.—GRIZZLE.

In hurry post haste for a license,
In hurry ding dong I come back ;
For that you sha'n't need bid me twice hence,
I'll be there, and here, in a crack.
Hey ting,
My heart 's on the wing,
I now could leap over the moon,
Let the chaplain

Set us grap'ling,
And we'll stock a baby-house soon.
Hunc. Oh !
Griz. Ah !

[Exit.]

Enter TOM THUMB.

Tom. Where is my Huncamunca ? where 's my princess ?
Where those bright eyes, the card-matches of Cupid,

That light up all with love my waxen soul ?
Hunc. Put out the light, nor waste thy little taper.

Tom. Put out the light ? impossible !
As well Sir Solomon might put out his rush-light.

Hunc. I am to Lord Grizzle promis'd.
Tom. Promis'd !

Hunc. Too sure, 'tis enter'd in fate's journal.
Tom. Enter'd.

Zounds ! I'll tear out the leaf—I'll blot the page
—I'll burn the book.

I tell thee, princess, had I been thy help-mate,
We soon had peopled this whole realm with Thumbs.

Hunc. O fie ! I shudder at the gross idea !
Tom. Then go we to the king—let him decide,
Whether you shall be Grizzle's or my bride.

[Going out hand-in-hand, are met by GLUMBALGA.

Glum. Stop, brandy-nose ! hopest thou the wight,
Who once hath worn my easy chains, will toil in thine ?

Hunc. Easy, no doubt, by twenty husbands worn.

Tom. In the balcony which o'erhangs the stage,

I've seen one wench two 'prentices engage :
This half-a-crown doth in his fingers hold,
That just lets peep a little bit of gold.
Miss, the half-guinea wisely doth purloin,
And scorns the bigger, and the baser, coin.

TRIO.

Glum. Oh ! the vixen pigmy brat,
Of inches scarce half six ;
To slight me for a chit like that,
Ah ! Mr. Tom, are these your tricks ?

Hunc. Oh ! the coarse salacious trull,
Who giant paramours twice ten
To bed can pull,
With hugs can lull,
Yet still would gull
Young gentlemen.

Tom. Little though I be,
I scorn the sturdy strum ;
Nor ever she,
My dear from thee
Shall debauch thy own Tom Thumb.

Glum. Oh ! the vixen, &c.

Hunc. Oh ! the coarse, &c.

Tom. Little though I be, &c. [Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The Court of the Palace.

Enter NOODLE.

Nood. Sure, Nature means to unhinge the solid globe !
Chaos is come again—all's topsy-turvy.

AIR.

King Arthur in love ancle deep—speed the Glumdalca will soon be his punk-a; [plough,
The Queen Dollalolla's as drunk as a sow,
In bed with Tom Thumb, Huncamunca.

Enter LORD GRIZZLE, hastily.

Griz. If this be true, all women kind are damn'd.

Nood. If it be not, may I be damn'd myself.
[Exit.

Griz. Then, get out, patience! oh, I'm whirlwind all;

Havoc, let loose the dogs of war, halloo! [Exit.

SCENE II.—A Chamber in the Palace.

Enter QUEEN.

Queen. Ah! wherefore from his Dollalolla's
Doth Arthur steal? Why all alone, [arms
And in the dark, leave her, whose feeble nerves
He knows are harrow'd up with fears of spirits?

Enter KING.

King. We hop'd the fumes, sweet queen, of last night's punch,
Had glued thy lovely eyes; but, ah! we find
There is no power in drams to quiet wives.

Enter NOODLE.

Nood. Long life to both your majesties,—if life
Be worth a fig—Lord Grizzle, at the head
Of a rebellious rout, invests the palace;
He swears—unless the princess straight
Be yielded up, with Tom Thumb's pate,
About your ears he will beat down the gate.

King. The devil he will!—but see the princess!

Enter HUNCAMUNCA.

Say, where's the mighty Thumb, our sword and buckler? [gods:
Though 'gainst us men and giants league with Yet Thumb alone is equal to more odds.

Hunc. About an hour and a half ago
Tom sallied forth to meet the foe,
And soon, who's who, he'll make them know.

King. Oh! oh!
Come, Dollalolla: Huncamunca, come;
Within, we'll wait in whole skins for Tom Thumb. [Exit

SCENE III.—A Plain.

Enter LORD GRIZZLE, NOODLE, and Rebels.
[A March.]

Griz. Thus far with victory our arms are crown'd; [found
For, though we have not fought, yet have we
No enemy to fight withal.

[Drums and Trumpets.

Enter THUMB, DOODLE, and Soldiers.

Tom. Art thou the man, whom men fam'd Grizzle call?

Griz. Art thou the much more fam'd Tom Thumb the small?

Tom. The same.

Griz. The same.

Tom. His prowess now each prove.

Griz. For liberty I stand.

Tom. And I for love.

[A battle between the two armies; they fight off.

Enter GLUMDALCA, and meets GRIZZLE, while fighting THUMB.

Glum. Turn, coward, turn! nor from a woman fly!

Griz. Thou art unworthy of my arm.

Glum. Am I?

Have at thy heart then!

[Thrusts at, but misses him.

Griz. Rampant queen of sluts!
Now have at thine. [Strikes.

Glum. [Falling.] You've run me through the guts.

Griz. Then there's an end of one. [Going.
[Is met by TOM THUMB, who runs him through.

Tom. An end of two,

Thou hast it.

[Exit.

Griz. Oh, Tom Thumb! [Falls.] thy soul beshrew!

I die—Ambition! the fates have made their tour,
And the black cart is waiting at the door

AIR.

My body is a bankrupt's shop,
My cruel creditor, grim Death;
Who puts to life's brisk trade a stop,
And will be paid with my last breath—
Oh! Oh! Oh! [Dies.

Enter TOM THUMB and Attendants.

Tom. Bear off the carcasses; lop off his knob,
'Twill witness to the king Tom Thumb's good job:

Rebellion's dead, and now—I'll go to breakfast.

[Exit.

[Attendants lay hold of GRIZZLE.

Griz. Why dost thou call me from the peaceful grave?

Attend. Sir, we came to bear your body off.

Griz. Then I'll bear it off myself. [Exit.

SCENE IV.—The Presence-chamber.

Enter KING, QUEEN, HUNCAMUNCA, DOODLE
PLUMANTE, FRIZALETTA, and Attendants.

King. Open the prisons, set the wretched free
And bid our treasurer disburse five guineas
To pay their debts.—Let our arch necromancer,
Sage Merlin, straight attend us:—we the while
Will view the triumph of our son-in-law.

Hunc. Take note, Sir, that on this our wedding-day

Two victories hath my gallant husband won.

Enter NOODLE.

Nood. Oh, monstrous, dreadful, terrible! oh! oh!

King. What means the blockhead?

Nood. But to grace my tale with decent horror:
Tom Thumb is no more!

A huge red cow, larger than the largest size, just now i'the open street,

Before my eyes, devour'd the great Tom Thumb.

[A general groan.

King. Shut, shut again the prisons:
Let our treasurer
Not issue out three farthings. Hang all the cul'
And bid the schoolmasters whip all their little boys.

Nood. Her majesty the queen is in a swoon

Queen. Not so much in a swoon, but to have still

Strength to reward the messenger of ill.

[QUEEN kills NOODLE

Friz. My lover kill'd—
His death I thus revenge. [Kills the QUEEN.

Hunc. Kill my mamma!
O base assassin! there! [Kills FRIZALETTA.

Dood. For that, take this! [Kills HUNCA.

Plum. And thou, take that. [Kills DOODLE.

King. Die, murderess vile! [Kills PLUM.

Ah, Death makes a feast to-day,
And but reserves ourselves for his bon bouche.
So when the boy, whom nurse from danger guards,
Sends Jack for mustard with a pack of cards;
Kings, queens, and knaves, tip one another down,
Till the whole pack lie scatter'd and o'erthrown.
Thus all our pack upon the floor is cast,
And my sole boast is, that I will die the last.
[Stabs himself;—they all lie on the stage, dead.

MERLIN rises.—Thunder and lightning.

Merlin. Blood, what a scene of slaughter's here!
But I'll soon shift it, never fear.
Gallants, behold! one touch of Merlin's magic,
Shall to gay comic change this dismal tragic.
[Waves his wand.

Scene changes, and discovers the Cow.

First, at my word, thou horned cannibal,
Return again our England's Hannibal.

[Thunder.
[THUMB is thrown out of the Cow's mouth, and starts fiercely.]

Next to you, king, queen, lords, and commons,
I issue my hell-bilking summons.

INCANTATION.

Arise, ye groupes of drunken sots!
Who deal out deaths, you know not why;
No more of porter pots, or plots,
Your senseless jealousy lay by.
Your souls cannot as yet be far
Upon their way to dreary night:
My power remands them.

[They all start up as MERLIN touches them.

Enter GLUMDALCA and GRIZZLE.

Here ends jar,
Live, love, and all this will be right.

King. [To the QUEEN.] One kind buss, my Dolly Queen;
When we two last parted,
We scarce hop'd to buss again;
My heart! lord, how it smarted!

QUEEN. [To the KING.] Dear King Atty, pitty, patty,
Mine too went a fleeting;
Now we in a nipperkin
May toast this merry meeting.

Tom. [To HUNC.] Come, my Hunky, come, my Love's in haste, don't stay him; [pet,
Deep we are in Hymen's debt,
And 'tis high time we pay him.

Hunc. [To TOM.] Have, dear Tommy,
Pity on me;
I am by shame restricted;
Yet I obey,
So take your way,
I must not contradict it.

Griz. [To GLUM.] Grandest Glum, in my behoof,
To love's law be pliant;
Me you'll find a man of proof,
Although not quite a giant.

Glum. [To GRIZ.] Indeed, Lord Griz,
Though for that phiz
Few amorous queens would choose you;
Yet thus bereft,
Not one ehum left,
I think I can't refuse you.

Merlin. Now love and live, and live and love.

All. Sage Merlin's in the right on't;

Merlin. Each couple prove like hand in glove;

All. Agreed.

Queen. Fore George, we'll make a night on't.

All. Let discord cease,
Let all in peace
Go home and kiss their spouses;
Join hat and cap
In one loud clap,
And wish us crowded houses.

[Exeunt.

PERCY:
A TRAGEDY,
 IN FIVE ACTS.
 BY MRS. HANNAH MORE.

REMARKS.

This tragedy, in which Mrs. Hannah More is supposed to have been assisted by Garrick, was produced at Covent Garden Theatre, in 1778, with success; and revived, in 1818, at the same theatre.

The feuds of the rival houses of Percy and of Douglas have furnished materials for this melaucholy tale, in which Mrs. More* has embodied many judicious sentiments and excellent passages, producing a forcible lesson to parental tyranny. The victim of her husband's unreasonable jealousy, Elwina's virtuous conflict is pathetic and interesting; while Percy's sufferings, and the vain regret of Earl Raby, excite and increase our sympathy.

Enter EDRIC and BIRTHA.

Bir. What may this mean? Earl Douglas has enjoin'd thee

To meet him here in private?

Edr. Yes, my sister,

And this injunction I have oft receiv'd;

But when he comes, big with some painful secret,

He starts, looks wild, then drops ambiguous hints,

Frowns, hesitates, turns pale, and says 'twas

nothing;

Then feigns to smile, and by his anxious care

To prove himself at ease, betrays his pain.

Bir. Since my short sojourn here, I've mark'd this earl,

And though the ties of blood unite us closely,

I shudder at his haughtiness of temper,

Which not his gentle wife, the bright Elwina,

Can charm to rest. Ill are their spirits pair'd;

His is the seat of frenzy, hers of softness,

His love is transport, hers is trembling duty;

Rage in his soul is as the whirlwind fierce,

While hers ne'er felt the power of that rude passion.

Edr. Perhaps the mighty soul of Douglas mourns,

Because inglorious love detains him here,

While our bold knights, beneath the Christian standard,

Press to the bulwarks of Jerusalem.

Bir. Though every various charm adorns Elwina,

* Of this estimable lady, a cotemporary writer says, "This lady has for many years flourished in the literary world, which she has richly adorned by a variety of labours, all possessing strong marks of excellence. In the cause of religion and society, her labours are original and indefatigable; and the industrious poor have been at once enlightened by her instructions, and supported by her bounty."
 As a dramatic writer, Mrs. More is known by her "Search after Happiness," pastoral drama; "The Inflexible Captive,"—"Percy," and "Fatal Falsehood," tragedies; and by her "Sacred Dramas."

And though the noble Douglas dotes to madness,
Yet some dark mystery involves their fate:
The canker grief devours Elwina's bloom,
And on her brow meek resignation sits,
Hopeless, yet uncomplaining.

Edr. 'Tis most strange.

Bir. Once, not long since, she thought herself alone;

'Twas then the pent-up anguish burst its bounds;
With broken voice, clasp'd hands, and streaming eyes,

She call'd upon her father, call'd him cruel,
And said her duty claim'd far other recompense.

Edr. Perhaps the absence of the good Lord Raby,

Who, at her nuptials, quitted this fair castle,
Resigning it to her, may thus afflict her.

Hast thou e'er question'd her, good Birtha?

Bir. Often,

But hitherto in vain; and yet she shows me
The endearing kindness of a sister's love;
But if I speak to Douglas—

Edr. See! he comes.

It would offend him should he find you here.

Enter DOUGLAS.

Dou. How! Edric and his sister in close conference?

Do they not seem alarm'd at my approach?

And see, how suddenly they part! Now Edric, [Exit BIRTHA.

Was this well done? or was it like a friend,
When I desir'd to meet thee here alone,
With all the warmth of trusting confidence,
'To lay my bosom naked to thy view,
And show thee all its weakness, was it well
'To call thy sister here, to let her witness
'Thy friend's infirmity?—perhaps to tell her—

Edr. My lord, I nothing know; I came to learn.

Dou. Nay then thou dost suspect there's something wrong?

Edr. If we were bred from infancy together,
If I partook in all thy youthful griefs,
And every joy thou knew'st was doubly mine,
'Then tell me all the secret of thy soul:

Or have these few short months of separation,
The only absence we have ever known,
Have these so rent the bands of love asunder,
'That Douglas should distrust his Edric's truth?

Dou. My friend, I know thee faithful as thou'rt brave,

And I will trust thee—but not now, good Edric.
'Tis past, 'tis gone, it is not worth the telling,
'Twas wrong to cherish what disturb'd my peace;
I'll think of it no more.

Edr. Transporting news!

I fear'd some hidden trouble vex'd your quiet.
In secret I have watch'd—

Dou. Ha! watch'd in secret?

A spy, employ'd, perhaps, to note my actions.
What have I said? Forgive me, thou art noble:
Yet do not press me to disclose my grief,
For when thou know'st it, I perhaps shall hate thee
As much, my Edric, as I hate myself
For my suspicions—I am ill at ease.

Edr. How will the fair Elwina grieve to hear it!

Dou. Hold, Edric, hold—thou hast touch'd the fatal string

That wakes me into madness. Hear me then,
But let the deadly secret be secured
With bars of adamant in thy close breast.
Think on the curse which waits on broken oaths;

A knight is bound by more than vulgar ties,
And perjury in thee were doubly damn'd.
Well then, the king of England—

Edr. Is expected

From distant Palestine.

Dou. Forbid it, Heaven!

For with him comes—

Edr. Ah! who?

Dou. Peace, peace,

For see Elwina's here. Retire, my Edric;

When next we meet, thou shalt know all. Farewell. [Exit EDRIC.

Now to conceal with care my bosom's anguish,
And let her beauty chase away my sorrows!
Yes, I would meet her with a face of smiles—
But 'twill not be.

Enter ELWINA.

Elw. Alas, 'tis ever thus!

Thus ever clouded is his angry brow. [Aside.

Dou. I were too bless'd, Elwina, could I hope
You met me here by choice, or that your bosom
Shar'd the warm transports mine must ever feel
At your approach.

Elw. My lord, if I intrude, [giveness
The cause which brings me claims at least for
I fear you are not well, and come, unbidden,
Except by faithful duty, to inquire,
If haply in my power, my little power
I have the means to minister relief
To your affliction?

Dou. What unwonted goodness!
O I were bless'd above the lot of man,
If tenderness, not duty, brought Elwina;
Cold, ceremonious, and unfeeling duty,
That wretched substitute for love: but know,
The heart demands a heart; nor will be paid
With less than what it gives. E'en now, Elwina,
The glistening tear stands trembling in your eyes,
Which cast their mournful sweetness on the ground,

As if they fear'd to raise their beams to mine,
And read the language of reproachful love.

Elw. My lord, I hop'd the thousand daily proofs
Of my obedience—

Dou. Death to all my hopes! [ence]
Heart-rending word!—obedience! what's obedi-
'Tis fear, 'tis hate, 'tis terror, 'tis aversion,
'Tis the cold debt of ostentatious duty,
Paid with insulting caution, to remind me
How much you tremble to offend a tyrant
So terrible as Douglas.—O, Elwina—
While duty measures the regard it owes
With scrupulous precision and nice justice,
Love never reasons, but profusely gives,
Gives, like a thoughtless prodigal, its all,
And trembles then, lest it has done too little.

Elw. Indeed I'm most unhappy that my cares
And my solicitude to please, offend.

Dou. True tenderness is less solicitous,
Less prudent and more fond; the enamour'd heart
Conscious it loves, and bless'd in being lov'd,
Reposes on the object it adores,
And trusts the passion it inspires and feels. - Thou hast not learn'd how terrible it is
To feed a hopeless flame.—But hear, Elwina,
Thou most obdurate, hear me.—

Elw. Say, my lord,

For your own lips shall vindicate my fame,
Since at the altar I became your wife,
Can malice charge me with an act, a word,
I ought to blush at? Have I not still liv'd

As open to the eye of observation,
As fearless innocence should ever live?
I call attesting angels to be witness,
If in my open deed, or secret thought,
My conduct, or my heart, they've aught discern'd
Which did not emulate their purity.

Dou. This vindication ere you were accus'd,
This warm defence, repelling all attacks
Ere they are made, and construing casual words
To formal accusations, trust me, Madam,
Shows rather an alarm'd and vigilant spirit,
For ever on the watch to guard its secret,
Than the sweet calm of fearless innocence.
Who talk'd of guilt? Who testified suspicion?

Elw. Learn, Sir, that virtue, while 'tis free from blame,

Is modest, lowly, meek, and unassuming;
Not apt, like fearful vice, to shield its weakness
Beneath the studied pomp of boastful phrase
Which swells to hide the poverty it shelters;
But, when this virtue feels itself suspected,
Insulted, set at nought, its whiteness stain'd,
It then grows proud, forgets its humble worth,
And rates itself above its real value,

Dou. I did not mean to chide! but think, O think,

What pangs must rend this fearful doting heart,
To see you sink impatient of the grave,
To feel, distracting thought! to feel you hate me!

Elw. What if the slender thread by which I hold

'This poor precarious being soon must break,
Is it Elwina's crime, or Heaven's decree?
Yet I shall meet, I trust, the king of terrors,
Submissive and resign'd, without one pang,
One fond regret, at leaving this gay world.

Dou. Yes, Madam, there is one, one man ador'd,
For whom your sighs will heave, your tears will flow,

For whom this hated world will still be dear,
For whom you still would live——

Elw. Hold, hold my lord,
What may this mean?

Dou. Ah! I have gone too far.
What have I said?—Your father, sure, your father,
The good Lord Raby, may at least expect
One tender sigh.

Elw. Alas, my lord! I thought
The precious incense of a daughter's sighs
Might rise to heaven, and not offend its ruler.

Dou. 'Tis true; yet Raby is no more belov'd
Since he bestow'd his daughter's hand on Douglas:
That was a crime the dutiful Elwina
Can never pardon; and believe me, Madam,
My love's so nice, so delicate my honour,
I am ashamed to owe my happiness
To ties which make you wretched. [Exit DOUGLAS.]

Elw. Ah! how's this?

Though I have ever found him fierce and rash,
Full of obscure surmises and dark hints,
Till now he never ventur'd to accuse me.
"Yet there is one, one man belov'd, ador'd,
For whom your tears will flow"—these were his words——

And then the wretched subterfuge of Raby—
How poor th' evasion!—But my Birtha comes.

Enter BIRTHA.

Bir. Crossing the portico I met Lord Douglas,
Disorder'd were his looks, his eyes shot fire;
He call'd upon your name with such distraction
I fear'd some sudden evil had befallen you.

Elw. Not sudden: no; long has the storm been gathering,
Which threatens speedily to burst in ruin
On this devoted head.

Bir. I ne'er beheld
Your gentle soul so ruffled, yet I've marked you,
While others thought you happiest of the happy, Bless'd with whatever the world calls great, or good,

With all that nature, all that fortune gives,
I've mark'd you bending with a weight of sorrow.

Elw. O I will tell thee all! thou couldst not find
An hour, a moment in Elwina's life,

When her full heart so long'd to ease its burden,
And pour its sorrows in thy friendly bosom:

Hear then, with pity hear, my tale of woe,
And, O forgive, kind nature, filial piety,
If my presumptuous lips arraign a father!

Yes, Birtha, that belov'd, that cruel father,
Has doom'd me to a life of hopeless anguish,
To die of grief ere half my days are number'd;
Doom'd me to give my trembling hand to Douglas,
'T was all I had to give—my heart was—Percy's.

Bir. What do I hear?

Elw. My misery, not my crime.
Long since the battle 'twixt the rival houses
Of Douglas and of Percy, for whose hate
This mighty globe's too small a theatre,
One summer's morn, my father chas'd the deer
On Cheviot Hills, Northumbria's fair domain.

Bir. On that fam'd spot where first the feuds commenc'd

Between the earls?

Elw. The same. During the chace,
Some of my father's knights receiv'd an insult
From the Lord Percy's herdsmen, churlish foresters,

Unworthy of the gentle blood they serv'd.
My father, proud and jealous of his honour,
(Thou know'st the fiery temper of our barons,)
Swore that Northumberland had been concern'd
In this rude outrage, nor would hear of peace,
Or reconciliation, which the Percy offer'd;

But bade me hate, renounce, and banish him
O! 'twas a task too hard for all my duty:
I strove, and wept; I strove—but still I lov'd.

Bir. Indeed 'twas most unjust; but say what follow'd? [tale?]

Elw. Why should I dwell on the disastrous
Forbid to see me, Percy soon embark'd
With our great king against the Saracen.

Soon as the jarring kingdoms were at peace,
Earl Douglas, whom till then I ne'er had seen,
Came to this castle; 'twas my hapless fate
To please him.—Birtha! thou can'st tell what followed:

But who shall tell the agonies I felt?
My barbarous father forc'd me to dissolve
The tender vows himself had bid me form——
He dragg'd me trembling, dying, to the altar,
I sigh'd, I struggled, fainted, and complied.

Bir. Did Douglas know, a marriage had been Propos'd 'twixt you and Percy? [once]

Elw. If he did,
He thought, like you, it was a match of policy,
Nor knew our love surpass'd our fathers' prudence.

Bir. Should he now find he was the instrument

Of the Lord Raby's vengeance?

Elw. 'T were most dreadful!
My father lock'd this motive in his breast,
And feign'd to have forgot the chace of Cheviot.

Some moons have now completed their slow course
Since my sad marriage.—Percy still is absent.

Bir. Nor will return before his sov'reign comes.

Elw. Talk not of his return! this coward heart
Can know no thought of peace but in his absence.
How, Douglas here again? some fresh alarm!

Enter DOUGLAS, agitated, with letters in his hand.

Dou. Madam, your pardon—

Elw. What disturbs my lord? [cease.]

Dou. Nothing.—Disturb! I ne'er was more at These letters from your father give us notice
He will be here to-night:—He farther adds,
The king's each hour expected.

Elw. How? the king?
Said you, the king?

Dou. And 'tis Lord Raby's pleasure
That you among the foremost bid him welcome.
You must attend the court.

Elw. Must I, my lord?

Dou. Now to observe how she receives the news! [Aside.]

Elw. I must not,—cannot.—By the tender love
You have so oft profess'd for poor Elwina,
Indulge this one request—O let me stay!

Dou. Enchanting sounds! she does not wish to go— [Aside.]

Elw. The bustling world, the pomp which waits on greatness,
Ill suits my humble, unambitious soul;—
Then leave me here, to tread the safer path
Of private life; here, where my peaceful course
Shall be as silent as the shades around me;
Nor shall one vagrant wish be e'er allow'd
To stray beyond the bounds of Raby Castle.

Dou. O music to my ears! [Aside.] Can you resolve

To hide those wondrous beauties in the shade,
Which rival kings would cheaply buy with empire?
Can you renounce the pleasures of a court,
Whose roofs resound with minstrelsy and mirth?

Elw. My lord, retirement is a wife's best duty,
And virtue's safest station is retreat.

Dou. My soul's in transports! [Aside.] But can you forego

What wins the soul of woman—admiration?
A world, where charms inferior far to yours
Only presume to shine when you are absent!
Will you not long to meet the public gaze?
Long to eclipse the fair, and charm the brave?

Elw. These are delights in which the mind partakes not.

Dou. I'll try her farther. [Aside.]
[Takes her hand, and looks steadfastly at her as he speaks.]

But reflect once more:

When you shall hear that England's gallant peers,
Fresh from the fields of war, and gay with glory,
All vain with conquest, and elate with fame,
When you shall hear these princely youths contend,
In many a tournament, for beauty's prize;
When you shall hear of revelry and masking,
Of mimic combats and of festive halls,
Of lances shiver'd in the cause of love,
Will you not then repent, then wish your fate,
Your happier fate, had till that hour reserv'd you
For some plumed conqueror?

Elw. My fate, my lord,
Is now bound up with yours.

Dou. Here let me kneel— [der;
Yes, I will kneel, and gaze, and weep, and won-
Thou paragon of goodness!—pardon, pardon.
[Kisses her hand.]

I am convinc'd—I can no longer doubt,
Nor talk, nor hear, nor reason, nor reflect.
—I must retire, and give a loose to joy.

[Exit DOUGLAS]

Bir. The king returns.

Elw. And with him Percy comes!

Bir. You needs must go.

Elw. Shall I solicit ruin,
And pull destruction on me ere its time?
I, who have held it criminal to name him?
I will not go—I disobey thee, Douglas,
But disobey thee to preserve thy honour. [Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The Hall

Enter DOUGLAS, speaking.

See that the traitor instantly be seiz'd,
And strictly watch'd; let none have access to him.
—O jealousy, thou aggregate of woes!
Were there no hell, thy torments would create one
But yet she may be guiltless—may? she must.
How beautiful she look'd! pernicious beauty!
Yet innocent as bright seem'd the sweet blush
That mantled on her cheek. But not for me,
But not for me, those breathing roses blow!
And then she wept—What! can I bear her tears?
Well—let her weep—her tears are for another;
O did they fall for me, to dry their streams
I'd drain the choicest blood that feeds this heart,
Nor think the drops I shed were half so precious.
[He stands in a musing posture.]

Enter LORD RABY.

Raby. Sure I mistake—am I in Raby Castle?
Impossible; that was the seat of smiles;
And Cheerfulness and Joy were household gods.
I us'd to scatter pleasures when I came,
And every servant shar'd his lord's delight;
But now Suspicion and Distrust dwell here,
And Discontent maintains a sullen sway.
Where is the smile unfeign'd, the jovial welcome,
Which cheer'd the sad, beguill'd the pilgrim's pain,
And made Dependency forget its bonds?
Where is the ancient, hospitable hall,
Whose vaulted roof once rung with harmless mirth,
Where every passing stranger was a guest,
And every guest a friend? I fear me much,
If once our nobles scorn their rural seats,
Their rural greatness, and their vassals' love,
Freedom and English grandeur are no more.

Dou. [Advancing.] My lord, you are welcome.

Raby. Sir, I trust I am;
But yet methinks I shall not feel I'm welcome
Till my Elwina bless me with her smiles:
She was not wont with ling'ring step to meet me,
Or greet my coming with a cold embrace;
Now, I extend my longing arms in vain:
My child, my darling, does not come to fill them.
O they were happy days, when she would fly
To meet me from the camp, or from the chace,
And with her fondness overpay my toils!
How eager would her tender hands unbrace
The ponderous armour from my war-worn limbs,
And pluck the helmet which oppos'd her kiss!

Dou. O sweet delights, that never must be mine!

Raby. What do I hear?

Dou. Nothing: inquire no farther.

Raby. My lord, if you respect an old man's peace,
If e'er you doted on my much-lov'd child,
As 'tis most sure you made me think you did,

Then, by the pangs which you may one day feel,
When you, like me, shall be a fond, fond father,
And tremble for the treasure of your age,
Tell me what this alarming silence means?
You sigh, you do not speak, nay more, you hear not;

Your lab'ring soul turns inward on itself,
As there were nothing but your own sad thoughts
Deserv'd regard. Does my child live?

Dou. She does.

Raby. To bless her father!

Dou. And to curse her husband!

Raby. Ah! have a care, my lord, I'm not so old—

Dou. Nor I so base, that I should tamely bear it;
Nor am I so inur'd to infamy,
That I can say, without a burning blush,
She lives to be my curse!

Raby. How's this?

Dou. I thought

The lily opening to the heaven's soft dews,
Was not so fragrant, and was not so chaste.

Raby. Has she prov'd otherwise? I'll not believe it.

Who has traduc'd my sweet, my innocent child?
Yet she's too good to 'scape calumnious tongues.
I know that Slander loves a lofty mark:

It saw her soar a flight above her fellows,
And hurl'd its arrow to her glorious height,
To reach her heart, and bring her to the ground.

Dou. Had the rash tongue of Slander so pre-sum'd!

My vengeance had not been of that slow sort
'To need a prompter; nor should any arm,
No, not a father's, dare dispute with mine,
The privilege to die in her defence.

None dares accuse Elwina, but—

Raby. But who?

Dou. But Douglas.

Raby. [Puts his hand to his sword.] You?—
O spare my age's weakness!

You do not know what 'tis to be a father;
You do not know, or you would pity me,
The thousand tender throbs, the nameless feelings,

The dread to ask, and yet the wish to know,
When we adore and fear; but wherefore fear?
Does not the blood of Raby fill her veins?

Dou. Percy;—know'st thou that name?

Raby. How? What of Percy?

Dou. He loves Elwina, and, my curses on him!
He is belov'd again.

Raby. I'm on the rack!

Dou. Not the two Theban brothers bore each other

Such deep, such deadly hate as I and Percy.

Raby. But tell me of my child.

Dou. [Not minding him.] As I and Percy!
When at the marriage rites, O rites accur'd!
I seiz'd her trembling hand, she started back,
Cold horror thrill'd her veins, her tears flow'd fast.
Fool that I was, I thought 'twas maiden fear;
Dull, doting ignorance: beneath those terrors,
Hatred for me and love for Percy lurk'd.

Raby. What proof of guilt is this?

Dou. E'er since our marriage,
Our days have still been cold and joyless all;
Painful restraint, and hatred ill disguis'd,
Her sole return for all my waste of fondness.
This very morn I told her 'twas your will
She should repair to court; with all those graces,
Which first subdued my soul, and still enslave it,

VOL. I. . . 3 U

44*

She begg'd to stay behind in Raby Castle,
For courts and cities had no charms for her.
Curse my blind love! I was again ensnar'd,
And doted on the sweetness which deceiv'd me.
Just at the hour she thought I should be absent,
(For chance could ne'er have tim'd their guilt so well.)

Arriv'd young Harcourt, one of Percy's knights,
Strictly enjoin'd to speak to none but her;
I seiz'd the miscreant: hitherto he's silent,
But tortures soon shall force him to confess

Raby. Percy is absent—They have never met.

Dou. At what a feeble hold you grasp for succour!

Will it content me that her person's pure?

No, if her alien heart dotes on another,
She is unchaste, were not that other Percy.

Let vulgar spirits basely wait for proof,
She loves another—'tis enough for Douglas.

Raby. Be patient.

Dou. Be a tame convenient husband,
And meanly wait for circumstantial guilt?

No—I am nice as the first Cæsar was,
And start at bare suspicion. [Going.]

Raby. [Holding him.] Douglas, hear me:
Thou hast nam'd a Roman husband; if she's false,

I mean to prove myself a Roman father.

[Exit DOUGLAS.]
This marriage was my work, and thus I'm punish'd!

Enter ELWINA.

Elw. Where is my father? let me fly to meet
O let me clasp his venerable knees, [hjm,]
And die of joy in his belov'd embrace!

Raby. [Avoiding her embrace.] Elwina!

Elw. And is that all? so cold?

Raby. [Sternly.] Elwina!

Elw. Then I'm undone indeed! How stern his looks!

I will not be repuls'd, I am your child,
The child of that dear mother you ador'd;
You shall not throw me off, I will grow here,
And, like the patriarch, wrestle for a blessing.

Raby. [Holding her from him.] Before I take thee in these aged arms,

Press thee with transport to this beating heart.

And give a loose to all a parent's fondness,

Answer, and see thou answer me as truly

As if the dread inquiry came from Heaven,—

Does no interior sense of guilt confound thee?

Canst thou lay all thy naked soul before me?

Can thy unconscious eye encounter mine?

Canst thou endure the probe, and never shrink?

Can thy firm hand meet mine, and never tremble?

Art thou prepar'd to meet the rigid Judge?

Or to embrace the fond, the melting father?

Elw. Mysterious Heaven! to what am I re-serv'd!

Raby. Should some rash man, regardless of thy fame,

And in defiance of thy marriage vows,

Presume to plead a guilty passion for thee,

What wouldst thou do?

Elw. What honour bids me do.

Raby. Come to my arms! [They embrace]

Elw. My father!

Raby. Yes, Elwina,

Thou art my child—thy mother's perfect image

Elw. Forgive these tears of mingled joy and doubt:

For why that question? who should seek to please
The desolate Elwina?

Raby. But if any

Should so presume, canst thou resolve to hate him,
Whate'er his name, whate'er his pride of blood,
Whate'er his former arrogant pretensions?

Elw. Ha!

Raby. Dost thou falter? Have a care, Elwina.

Elw. Sir, do not fear me: am I not your daughter?

Raby. Thou hast a higher claim upon thy Thou art Earl Douglas' wife.

Elw. [Weeps.] I am, indeed!

Raby. Unhappy Douglas!

Elw. Has he then complain'd?

Has he presum'd to sully my white fame?

Raby. He knows that Percy——

Elw. Was my destin'd husband;

By your own promise, by a father's promise,
And by a tie more strong, more sacred still,
Mine, by the fast firm bond of mutual love.

Raby. Now, by my fears, thy husband told me truth.

Elw. If he has told thee, that thy only child
Was forc'd a helpless victim to the altar,
Torn from his arms who had her virgin heart,
And forc'd to make false vows to one she hated,
Then I confess that he has told the truth.

Raby. Her words are barbed arrows in my heart.

But 'tis too late. [Aside.] Thou hast appointed Harcourt

To see thee here by stealth in Douglas' absence?

Elw. No, by my life, nor knew I till this moment
That Harcourt was return'd. Was it for this
I taught my heart to struggle with its feelings?
Was it for this I bore my wrongs in silence?
When the fond ties of early love were broken,
Did my weak soul break out in fond complaints?
Did I reproach thee? Did I call thee cruel?
No—I endur'd it all; and wearied Heaven
To bless the father who destroy'd my peace.

Enter MESSENGER.

Mess. My lord, a knight, Sir Hubert as I think,
But newly landed from the holy wars,
Entreats admittance.

Raby. Let the warrior enter.

[Exit MESSENGER.]

All private interests sink at his approach;
All selfish cares be for a moment banish'd;
I've now no child, no kindred but my country.

Elw. Weak heart, be still, for what hast thou to fear?

Enter SIR HUBERT.

Raby. Welcome, thou gallant knight! Sir Hubert, welcome!

Welcome to Raby Castle!—In one word,
Is the king safe? Is Palestine subdu'd?

Sir H. The king is safe, and Palestine subdu'd.
Raby. Bless'd be the God of armies! Now, Sir
Hubert,

By all the saints, thou'rt a right noble knight.
O why was I too old for this crusade!
I think it would have made me young again,
Could I, like thee, have seen the hated crescent
Yield to the Christian cross.—How now, Elwina!
What! cold at news which might awake the dead?
If there's a drop in thy degenerate veins
That glows not now, thou art not Raby's daughter.
It is religion's cause, the cause of Heaven!

Elw. When policy assumes religion's name,
And wears the sanctimonious garb of faith
Only to colour fraud, and license murder
War then is tenfold guilt.

Raby. Blaspheming girl!

Elw. 'Tis not the crossier, nor the pontiff's robe
The saintly look, nor elevated eye,
Nor Palestine destroy'd, nor Jordan's banks
Deluged with blood of slaughter'd infidels;
No, nor the extinction of the eastern world,
Nor all the mad, pernicious, bigot rage
Of your crusades, can bribe that Power that sees
The motive with the act. O blind, to think
That cruel war can please the Prince of Peace!
He, who erects his altar in the heart,
Abhors the sacrifice of human blood,
And all the false devotion of that zeal
Which massacres the world he died to save.

Raby. O impious rage! If thou wouldst shun my curse, [Hubert,
No more, I charge thee.—Tell me, good Sir
Say, have our arms achiev'd this glorious deed,
(I fear to ask,) without much Christian blood-shed?

Elw. Now, Heaven support me! [Aside

Sir H. My good lord of Raby,
Imperfect is the sum of human glory!
Would I could tell thee that the field was won,
Without the death of such illustrious knights
As make the high-flush'd cheek of victory pale.

Elw. Why should I tremble thus? [Aside.

Raby. Who have we lost? [Grey.
Sir H. The noble Clifford, Walsingham, and Sir Harry Hastings, and the valiant Pembroke,
All men of choicest note.

Raby. O that my name
Had been enroll'd in such a list of heroes!
If I was too infirm to serve my country,
I might have prov'd my love by dying for her.

Elw. Were there no more?

Sir H. But few of noble blood.

But the brave youth who gain'd the palm of glory,
The flower of knighthood, and the plume of war,
Who bore his banner foremost in the field,
Yet conquer'd more by mercy than the sword,
Was Percy.

Elw. Then he lives! [Aside.

Raby. Did he? Did Percy?
O gallant boy, then I'm thy foe no more;
Who conquers for my country is my friend!
His fame shall add new glories to a house,
Where never maid was false, nor knight disloyal. [tears:

Sir H. You do embalm him, lady, with your
They grace the grave of glory where he lies—
He died the death of honour.

Elw. Said'st thou—died?

Sir H. Beneath the towers of Solyma he fell.

Elw. Oh!

Sir H. Look to the lady.

[ELWINA faints in her father's arms.]

Raby. Gentle knight, retire—
'Tis an infirmity of nature in her,
She ever mourns at any tale of blood;
She will be well anon—meantime, Sir Hubert,
You'll grace our castle with your friendly sojourn.

Sir H. I must return with speed—health to the lady. [Exit.

Raby. Look up, Elwina. Should her husband
Yet she revives not. [come!

Enter DOUGLAS.

Dou. Ha——Elwina fainting!

My lord, I fear you have too harshly chid her.
Her gentle nature could not brook your sternness.
She wakes, she stirs, she feels returning life.
My love!

[He takes her hand.]

Elw. O Percy!

Dou. [Starts.] Do my senses fail me?

Elw. My Percy, 'tis Elwina calls.

Dou. Hell, hell!

Raby. Retire awhile, my daughter.

Elw. Douglas here,

My father and my husband?—O for pity—

[Exit, casting a look of anguish on both.]

Dou. Now, now confess she well deserves my vengeance!

Before my face to call upon my foe!

Raby. Upon a foe who has no power to hurt Earl Percy's slain. [thee—

Dou. I live again.—But hold—

Did she not weep? she did, and wept for Percy.

If she laments him, he's my rival still,

And not the grave can bury my resentment.

Raby. The truly brave are still the truly generous.

Now, Douglas, is the time to prove thee both.

If it be true that she did once love Percy,

Thou hast no more to fear, since he is dead.

Release young Harcourt, let him see Elwina,

'Twill serve a double purpose, 'twill at once

Prove Percy's death, and thy unchang'd affection.

Be gentle to my child, and win her heart

By confidence and unrepublishing love.

Dou. By Heaven, thou counsel'st well! it shall be done.

Go set him free, and let him have admittance

To my Elwina's presence.

Raby. Farewell, Douglas.

Show thou believ'st her faithful, and she'll prove so. [Exit.]

Dou. Northumberland is dead—that thought is peace!

Her heart may yet be mine, transporting hope!

Percy was gentle, even a foe avows it,

And I'll be milder than a summer's breeze.

Yes, thou most lovely, most ador'd of women,

I'll copy every virtue, every grace,

Of my bless'd rival, happier even in death

To be thus lov'd, than living to be scorn'd. [Exit.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Garden at Raby Castle, with a Bower.

Enter PERCY and SIR HUBERT.

Sir H. That Percy lives, and is return'd in safety,

More joys my soul than all the mighty conquests
That sun beheld, which rose on Syria's ruin.

Per. I've told thee, good Sir Hubert, by what wonder

I was preserv'd, though number'd with the slain.

Sir H. 'Twas strange, indeed!

Per. 'Twas Heaven's immediate work!

But let me now indulge a dearer joy,

Talk of a richer gift of Mercy's hand;

A gift so precious to my dotting heart,

That life preserv'd is but a second blessing.

O Hubert, let my soul indulge its softness!

The hour, the spot, is sacred to Elwina.

This was her fav'rite walk; I well remember,

(For who forgets that loves as I have lov'd?)

'Twas in that very bower she gave this scarf,

Wrought by the hand of love! she bound it on,

And, smiling, cried, What'er befall us, Percy,

Be this the sacred pledge of faith between us.
I knelt, and swore, call'd every power to witness,
No time, nor circumstance, should force it from me,
But I would lose my life and that together—
Here I repeat my vow.

Sir H. Is this the man
Beneath whose single arm a host was crush'd?
He, at whose name the Saracen turn'd pale?
And when he fell, victorious armies wept,
And mourn'd a conquest they had bought so dear?
How has he chang'd the trumpet's martial note,
And all the stirring clangour of the war,
For the soft melting of the lover's lute!
Why are thine eyes still bent upon the bower?

Per. O Hubert, Hubert, to a soul enamour'd,
There is a sort of local sympathy,
Which, when we view the scenes of early passion,
Paints the bright image of the object lov'd
In stronger colours than remoter scenes
Could ever paint it; realizes shade,
Dresses it up in all the charms it wore,
Talks to it nearer, frames its answers kinder,
Gives form to fancy, and embodies thought.

Sir H. I should not be believ'd in Percy's camp,
If I should tell them that their gallant leader,
The thunder of the war, the bold Northumberland,
Renouncing Mars, dissolv'd in amorous wishes,
Loiter'd in shades, and pined in rosy bowers,
To catch a transient gleam of two bright eyes.

Per. Enough of conquest, and enough of war!
Ambition's cloy'd—the heart resumes its rights.
When England's king, and England's good requir'd,

This arm not idly the keen falchion brandish'd:
Enough—for vaunting misbecomes a soldier.
I live, I am return'd—am near Elwina! [her;
Seest thou those turrets? Yes, that castle holds
But wherefore tell thee this? for thou hast seen her.
How look'd, what said she? Did she hear the tale
Of my imagin'd death without emotion?

Sir H. Percy, thou hast seen the musk-rose, newly blown,
Disclose its bashful beauties to the sun,
Till an unfriendly, chilling storm descended,
Crush'd all its blushing glories in their prime,
Bow'd its fair head, and blasted all its sweetness;
So droop'd the maid beneath the cruel weight
Of my sad tale.

Per. So tender and so true!

Sir H. I left her fainting in her father's arms,
The dying flower yet hanging on the tree.
Even Raby melted at the news I brought,
And envy'd thee thy glory.

Per. Then I am bless'd!
His hate subdu'd, I've nothing more to fear.

Sir H. My embassy dispatch'd, I left the castle,
Nor spoke to any of Lord Raby's household,
For fear the king should chide the tardiness
Of my return. My joy to find you living
You have already heard.

Per. But where is Harcourt?
Ere this he should have seen her, told her all,
How I surviv'd, return'd—and how I love!
I tremble at the near approach of bliss,
And scarcely can sustain the joy which waits me.

Sir H. Grant, Heaven, the fair one prove but half so true!

Per. O she is truth itself!

Sir H. She may be chang'd,
Spite of her tears, her fainting, and alarms.
I know the sex, know them as nature made 'em
Not such as lovers wish, and poets feign.

Per. To doubt her virtue were suspecting Heaven—
 'Twere little less than infidelity! [ven,
 And yet I tremble. Why does terror shake
 These firm-strung nerves? But 'twill be ever thus,
 When fate prepares us more than mortal bliss,
 And gives us only human strength to bear it.

Sir H. What beam of brightness breaks through yonder gloom? [comes

Per. Hubert—she comes! by all my hopes, she
 'Tis she—the blissful vision is Elwina! [me!
 But ah! what mean those tears?—She weeps for
 O transport!—go.—I'll listen unobserv'd,
 And for a moment taste the precious joy,
 The banquet of a tear which falls for love.

[Exit SIR HUBERT, PERCY goes into the bower.

Enter ELWINA.

Shall I not weep? and have I then no cause?
 If I could break the eternal bands of death,
 And wrench the sceptre from his iron grasp;
 If I could bid the yawning sepulchre
 Restore to life its long committed dust;
 If I could teach the slaughtering hand of war
 To give me back my dear, my murder'd Percy,
 Then I indeed might once more cease to weep.

[PERCY comes out of the bower.

Per. Then cease, for Percy lives.

Elw. Protect me, Heaven!

Per. O joy unspeakable! My life, my love!
 End of my toils, and crown of all my cares!
 Kind as consenting peace, as conquest bright,
 Dearer than arms, and lovelier than renown!

Elw. It is his voice—it is, it is my Percy!
 And dost thou live?

Per. I never liv'd till now.

Elw. And did my sighs, and did my sorrows reach thee?

And art thou come at last to dry my tears?

How did'st thou 'scape the fury of the foe?

Per. Thy guardian genius hover'd o'er the field,
 And turn'd the hostile spear from Percy's breast,
 Lest thy fair image should be wounded there.
 But Harcourt should have told thee all my fate,
 How I surviv'd—

Elw. Alas! I have not seen him.

Oh! I have suffer'd much.

Per. Of that no more;

For every minute of our future lives
 Shall be so bless'd, that we will learn to wonder
 How we could ever think we were unhappy.

Elw. Percy—I cannot speak.

Per. Those tears how eloquent!

I would not change this motionless, mute joy,
 For the sweet strains of angels: I look down
 With pity on the rest of human kind,
 However great may be their fame of happiness,
 And think their niggard fate has given them
 nothing,
 Not giving thee; or, granting some small blessing,
 Demies them my capacity to feel it.

Elw. Alas! what mean you?

Per. Can I speak my meaning? [it;

'Tis of such magnitude that words would wrong
 But surely my Elwina's faithful bosom
 Should beat in kind responses of delight,
 And feel, but never question, what I mean.

Elw. Hold, hold, my heart, thou hast much more to suffer!

Per. Let the slow form, and tedious ceremony,
 Wait on the splendid victims of ambition.
 Love stays for none of these. Thy father's soften'd,

He will forget the fatal Cheviot chace;
 Raby is brave, and I have serv'd my country;
 I would not boast, it was for thee I conquer'd;
 Then come, my love.

Elw. O never, never!

Per. Am I awake? Is that Elwina's voice?

Elw. Percy, thou most ador'd, and most de-
 If ever fortitude sustain'd thy soul, [ceiv'd'
 When vulgar minds have sunk beneath the stroke,
 Let thy imperial spirit now support thee.—
 If thou canst be so wondrous merciful,
 Do not, O do not curse me!—but thou wilt,
 Thou must—for I have done a fearful deed,
 A deed of wild despair, a deed of horror.

I am, I am—

Per. Speak, say, what art thou?

Elw. Married!

Per. Oh!

Elw. Percy, I think I begg'd thee not to curse [me;

But now I do revoke the fond petition.
 Speak! ease thy bursting soul; reproach, upbraid,
 O'erwhelm me with thy wrongs—I'll bear it all.

Per. Open, thou' earth, and hide me from her sight!

Did'st thou not bid me curse thee?

Elw. Mercy! mercy!

Per. And have I 'scaped the Saracen's fell
 Only to perish by Elwina's guilt? [sword

I would have bared my bosom to the foe,
 I would have died, had I but known you wish'd it.

Elw. Percy, I lov'd thee most when most I
 wrong'd thee;

Yes, by these tears I did.

Per. Married! just Heaven!

Married! to whom? Yet wherefore should I know?

It cannot add fresh horrors to thy crime,
 Or my destruction.

Elw. Oh! 'twill add to both.

How shall I tell? Prepare for something dreadful.
 Hast thou not heard of—Douglas?

Per. Why, 'tis well!

Thou awful Power, why waste thy wrath on me?
 Why arm omnipotence to crush a worm?

I could have fallen without this waste of ruin.

Married to Douglas! By my wrongs, I like it;

'Tis perfidy complete, 'tis finish'd falsehood,

'Tis adding fresh perdition to the sin,
 And filling up the measure of offence!

Elw. Oh! 'twas my father's deed! he made his child

An instrument of vengeance on thy head.

He wept and threaten'd, sooth'd me, and commanded.

Per. And you complied, most duteously complied!

Elw. I could withstand his fury; but his tears,

Ah, they undid me! Percy dost thou know

The cruel tyranny of tenderness?

Hast thou e'er felt a father's warm embrace?

Hast thou e'er seen a father's flowing tears,

And known that thou could'st wipe those tears away?

If thou hast felt, and hast resisted these,
 Then thou may'st curse my weakness; but if not,
 Thou canst not pity, for thou canst not judge.

Per. Let me not hear the music of thy voice,
 Or I shall love thee still; I shall forget
 Thy fatal marriage and my savage wrongs.

Elw. Dost thou not hate me, Percy?

Per. Hate thee? Yes,

As dying martyrs hate the righteous cause

Of that bless'd power for whom they bleed—I hate thee.

[They look at each other with silent agony.]

Enter HARCOURT.

Har. Forgive, my lord, your faithful knight—

Per. Come, Harcourt,
Come, and behold the wretch who once was Percy.

Har. With grief I've learn'd the whole unhappy tale.

Earl Douglas, whose suspicion never sleeps—

Per. What, is the tyrant jealous?

Elw. Hear him, Percy.

Per. I will command my rage—Go on.

Har. Earl Douglas

Knew, by my arms and my accoutrements,

That I belong'd to you; he questioned much,

And much he menac'd me, but both alike

In vain; he then arrested and confin'd me. [it.

Per. Arrest my knight! The Scot shall answer

Elw. How came you now releas'd?

Har. Your noble father

Obtain'd my freedom, having learn'd from Hubert

The news of Percy's death. The good old lord,

Hearing the king's return, has left the castle

To do him homage.

[To PERCY.] Sir, you had best retire;

Your safety is endanger'd by your stay.

I fear should Douglas know—

Per. Should Douglas know!

Why what new magic 's in the name of Douglas?

That it should strike Northumberland with fear?

Go, seek the haughty Scot, and tell him—no—

Conduct me to his presence.

Elw. Percy, hold;

Think not 'tis Douglas—'tis—

Per. I know it well—

Thou mean'st to tell me 'tis Elwina's husband;

But that inflames me to superior madness.

This happy husband, this triumphant Douglas,

Shall not insult my misery with his bliss.

I'll blast the golden promise of his joys.

Conduct me to him—nay, I will have way—

Come, let us seek this husband.

Elw. Percy, hear me.

When I was robb'd of all my peace of mind,

My cruel fortune left me still one blessing,

One solitary blessing, to console me;

It was my fame.—'Tis a rich jewel, Percy,

And I must keep it spotless, and unsoil'd;

But thou wouldst plunder what e'en Douglasspar'd,

And rob this single gem of all its brightness.

Per. Go—thou wast born to rule the fate of Thou art my conqueror still. [Percy.

Elw. What noise is that?

[HARCOURT goes to the side of the stage.

Per. Why art thou thus alarm'd?

Elw. Alas! I feel

The cowardice and terrors of the wicked,

Without their sense of guilt.

Har. My lord, 'tis Douglas.

Elw. Fly, Percy, and for ever!

Per. Fly from Douglas?

Elw. Then stay, barbarian, and at once destroy

My life and fame.

Per. That thought is death. I go:

My honour to thy dearer honour yields.

Elw. Yet, yet thou art not gone!

Per. Farewell, farewell! [Exit PERCY.

Elw. I dare not meet the searching eye of Douglas.

[I must conceal my terrors.

DOUGLAS at the side with his sword drawn,
EDRIC holds him.

Dou. Give me way.

Edr. Thou shalt not enter. [no hell,

Dou. [Struggling with EDRIC.] If there were

It would defraud my vengeance of its edge,

And she should live.

[Breaks from EDRIC and comes forward.

Cursed chance! he is not here.

Elw. [Going.] I dare not meet his fury.

Dou. See she flies

With every mark of guilt.—Go, search the bower,

[Aside to EDRIC.

He shall not thus escape. Madam, return. [Aloud.

Now, honest Douglas, learn of her to feign. [Aside.

Alone, Elwina? who had just parted hence?

[With affected composure.

Elw. My lord, 'twas Harcourt; sure you must have met him. [else!

Dou. O exquisite dissembler! [Aside.] No one

Elw. My lord!

Dou. How I enjoy her criminal confusion!

[Aside.

You tremble, Madam.

Elw. Wherefore should I tremble?

By your permission Harcourt was admitted;

'Twas no mysterious, secret introduction.

Dou. And yet you seem alarm'd.—If Harcourt's presence

Thus agitates each nerve, makes every pulse

Thus wildly throb, and the warm tides of blood

Mount in quick rushing tumults to your cheek;

If friendship can excite such strong emotions,

What tremors had a lover's presence caus'd?

Elw. Ungenerous man!

Dou. I feast upon her terrors. [Aside

The story of his death was well contriv'd; [To her.

But it affects not me; I have a wife,

Compar'd with whom cold Dian was unchaste.

[Takes her hand.

But mark me well—though it concerns not you—

If there 's a sin more deeply black than others,

Distinguish'd from the list of common crimes,

A legion in itself, and doubly dear

To the dark prince of hell, it is—hypocrisy.

[Throws her from him, and exits.

Elw. Yes, I will bear this fearful indignation!

Thou melting heart, be firm as adamant;

Ye shatter'd nerves, be strung with manly force.

That I may conquer all my sex's weakness,

Nor let this bleeding bosom lodge one thought,

Cherish one wish, or harbour one desire,

That angels may not hear, and Douglas know

[Exit

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—The Hall.

Enter DOUGLAS, his sword drawn and bloody in one hand, in the other a letter. HARCOURT wounded.

Dou. Traitor, no more! this letter shows thy office.

Twice hast thou robb'd me of my dear revenge.

I took thee for thy leader.—Thy base blood

Would stain the noble temper of my sword;

But as the pander to thy master's lust,

Thou justly fall'st by a wrong'd husband's hand.

Har. Thy wife is innocent.

Dou. Take him away.

Har. Percy, revenge my fall!

[Guards bear HARCOURT in.

Dou. Now for the letter!
He begs once more to see her.—So 'tis plain
They have already met!—but to the rest—[Reads.] "In vain you wish me to restore the scarf;

Dear pledge of love, while I have life I'll wear it,
'Tis next my heart; no power shall force it thence;
When'er you see it in another's hand,
Conclude me dead."—My curses on them both!
How tamely I peruse my shame! but thus,
Thus let me tear the guilty characters
Which register my infamy; and thus,
Thus would I scatter to the winds of heaven
The vile complotters of my foul dishonour.

[Tears the letter in the utmost agitation.]

Enter EDRIC.

Edr. My lord—

Dou. [In the utmost fury, not seeing EDRIC.]
The scarf!

Edr. Lord Douglas.

Dou. [Still not hearing him.] Yes, the scarf!
Percy, I thank thee for the glorious thought!
I'll cherish it; 'twill sweeten all my pangs,
And add a higher relish to revenge!

Edr. My lord!

Dou. How! Edric here?

Edr. What new distress?

[shame,

Dou. Dost thou expect I should recount my Dwell on each circumstance of my disgrace,
And swell my infamy into a tale?
Rage will not let me—But—my wife is false.

Edr. Art thou convinc'd?

Dou. The chronicles of hell

Cannot produce a falsèr.—But what news

Of her cursèd paramour?

Edr. He has escap'd.

Dou. Hast thou examin'd every avenue?

Each spot? the grove? the bower, her favourite

Edr. I've search'd them all. [haunt?

Dou. He shall be yet pursued.

Set guards at every gate.—Let none depart

Or gain admittance here, without my knowledge.

Edr. What can their purpose be?

Dou. Is it not clear?

Harcourt has raised his arm against my life;
He fail'd; the blow is now reserv'd for Percy;

Then, with his sword fresh reeking from my heart,
He'll revel with that wanton o'er my tomb;

Nor will he bring her aught she'll hold so dear,
As the curs'd hand with which he slew her husband.

But he shall die! I'll drown my rage in blood,
Which I will offer as a rich libation

On thy infernal altar, black revenge! [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—The Garden.

Enter ELWINA.

Elw. Each avenue is so beset with guards,
And lynx-ey'd Jealousy so broad awake,
He cannot pass unseen. Protect him, Heaven!

Enter BIRTHA.

My Birtha, is he safe? has he escap'd? [to him,

Bir. I know not. I despatch'd young Harcourt

To bid him quit the castle, as you order'd,

Restore the scarf, and never see you more.

But how the hard injunction was receiv'd,

Or what has happen'd since, I'm yet to learn.

Elw. O when shall I be eas'd of all my cares,

And in the quiet bosom of the grave

Lay down this weary head!—I'm sick at heart!

Should Douglas intercept his flight!

Bir. Be calm;

Douglas this very moment left the castle,
With seeming peace.

Elw. Ah, then, indeed there's danger!

Birtha, when'er Suspicion feigns to sleep,

'Tis but to make its careless prey secure. [thee,

Bir. Should Percy once again entreat to see

'Twere best admit him; for thy lips alone

He will submit to hear his final doom

Of everlasting exile.

Elw. Birtha, no;

If honour would allow the wife of Douglas

To meet his rival, yet I durst not do it.

Percy! too much this rebel heart is thine;

Too deeply should I feel each pang I gave;

I cannot hate—but I will banish—thee.

Inexorable duty, O forgive,

If I can do no more!

Bir. If he remains,

As I suspect, within the castle walls,

'Twere best I sought him out.

Elw. Then tell him, Birtha,

But, Oh! with gentleness, with mercy, tell him,

That we must never, never meet again.

The purport of my tale must be severe,

But let thy tenderness embalm the wound

My virtue gives. O soften his despair;

But say—we meet no more.

Enter PERCY.

Rash man, he's here!

[She attempts to go, he seizes her hand.]

Per. I will be heard; nay, fly not; I will speak;

Lost as I am, I will not be denied

The mournful consolation to complain.

Elw. Percy, I charge thee, leave me.

Per. Tyrant, no:

I blush at thy obedience, blush to think

I left thee here alone, to brave the danger

I now return to share.

Elw. That danger's past

Douglas was soon appeas'd; he nothing knows.

Then leave me, I conjure thee, nor again

Endanger my repose. Yet, ere thou goest,

Restore the scarf.

Per. Unkind Elwina, never!

'Tis all that's left me of my buried joys,

All which reminds me that I once was happy.

My letter told thee I would ne'er restore it.

Elw. Letter! what letter?

Per. That I sent by Harcourt.

Elw. Which I ne'er receiv'd. Douglas per-

Who knows? [haps—

Bir. Harcourt, 't'elude his watchfulness,

May prudently retire.

Elw. Grant Heaven it prove so!

[ELWINA going, PERCY holds her.]

Per. Hear me, Elwina; the most savage honour

Forbids not that poor grace.

Elw. It bids me fly thee. [part,

Per. Then, ere thou goest, if we indeed must

To sooth the horrors of eternal exile,

Say but—thou pity'st me!

Elw. [Weeps.] O Percy—pity thee!

Imperious honour;—Surely I may pity him.

Yet, wherefore pity? no, I envy thee:

For thou hast still the liberty to weep,

In thee 'twill be no crime; thy tears are guiltless,

For they infringe no duty, stain no honour,

And blot no vow; but mine are criminal,

Are drops of shame which wash the cheek of guilt,

And every tear I shed dishonours Douglas.

Per. I swear my jealous love e'en grudges thee Thy sad pre-eminence in wretchedness.

Elw. Rouse, rouse, my slumbering virtue!
Percy hear me.

Heaven, when it gives such high-wrought souls as Still gives as great occasions to exert them.

If thou wast form'd so noble, great, and gen'rous,
'Twas to surmount the passions which enslave
The gross of human-kind.—Then think, O think,
She, whom thou once didst love, is now another's.

Per. Go on—and tell me that that other's Douglas.

Elw. Whate'er his name, he claims respect from His honour's in my keeping, and I hold
The trust so pure, its sanctity is hurt
E'en by thy presence.

Per. Thou again hast conquer'd.
Celestial virtue, like the angel spirit,
Whose flaming sword defended Paradise,
Stands guard on every charm.—Elwina, yes,
To triumph over Douglas, we'll be virtuous.

Elw. 'Tis not enough to be,—we must appear so:
Great souls disdain the shadow of offence,
Nor must their whiteness wear the stain of guilt.

Per. I shall retract—I dare not gaze upon thee;
My feeble virtue staggers, and again
The fiends of jealousy torment and haunt me.
They tear my heart-strings.—Oh!

Elw. No more;
But spare my injur'd honour the affront
To vindicate itself.

Per. But, love!
Elw. But, glory!

Per. Enough! a ray of thy sublimer spirit
Has warm'd my dying honour to a flame!
One effort and 'tis done. The world shall say,
When they shall speak of my disastrous love,
Percy deserv'd Elwina though he lost her.
Fond tears, blind me not yet! a little longer,
Let my sad eyes a little longer gaze,
And leave their last beams here.

Elw. [Turns from him.] I do not weep.
Per. Not weep? then why those eyes avoiding mine?

And why that broken voice? those trembling ac-
That sigh which rends my soul?

Elw. No more, no more.

Per. That pang decides it. Come—I'll die at Thou Power supreme! take all the length of days,
And all the blessings kept in store for me,
And add to her account.—Yet turn once more,
One little look, one last, short glimpse of day,
And then a long dark night.—Hold, hold my heart,
O break not yet, while I behold her sweetness;
For after this dear, mournful, tender moment,
I shall have nothing more to do with life.

Elw. I do conjure thee, go.
Per. 'Tis terrible to nature!

With pangs like these the soul and body part!
And thus, but oh, with far less agony,
The poor departing wretch still grasps at being,
Thus clings to life, thus dreads the dark unknown,
Thus struggles to the last to keep his hold;
And when the dire convulsive groan of death
Dislodges the sad spirit—thus it stays,
And fondly hovers o'er the form it lov'd.
Once and no more—farewell, farewell!

Elw. For ever!
[They look at each other for some time, then exit PERCY After a pause;

'Tis past—the conflict's past! retire, my Birtha,
I would address me to the throne of grace.

Bir. May Heaven restore that peace thy bosom wants!

Elw. [Kneels.] Look down, thou awful, heart inspecting Judge,

Look down with mercy on thy erring creature,
And teach my soul the lowliness it needs!
And if some sad remains of human weakness
Should sometimes mingle with my best resolves,
O breathe thy spirit on this wayward heart,
And teach me to repent th' intruding sin
In it's first birth of thought!

[Noise within.] What noise is that?
The clash of swords! should Douglas be return'd!

Enter DOUGLAS and PERCY, fighting.

Dou. Yield, villain, yield.
Per. Not till this good right arm
Shall fail its master.

Dou. This to thy heart, then.
Per. Defend thy own.

[They fight; PERCY disarms DOUGLAS.
Dou. Confusion, death, and hell!

Edr. [Without.] This way I heard the noise.

Enter EDRIC, and many Knights and Guards, from every part of the stage.

Per. Cursed treachery!
But dearly will I sell my life.

Dou. Seize on him.
Per. I'm taken in the toils.

[PERCY is surrounded by Guards, who take his sword.

Dou. In the cursed snare
Thou laidst for me, traitor, thyself art caught.

Elw. He never sought thy life.
Dou. Adulteress, peace!

The villain Harcourt too—but he's at rest.
Per. Douglas, I'm in thy power; but do not triumph,

[me.
Percy's betray'd, not conquer'd. Come, despatch
Elw. [To DOUGLAS.] O do not, do not kill him!

Per. Madam, forbear;
For by the glorious shades of my great fathers,
Their godlike spirit is not so extinct,
That I should owe my life to that vile Scot.
Though dangers close me round on every side,
And death besets me, I am Percy still.

Dou. Sorceress, I'll disappoint thee—I shall die,
Thy minion shall expire before thy face,
That I may feast my hatred with your pangs,
And make his dying groans, and thy fond tears,
A banquet for my vengeance.

Elw. Savage tyrant!
I would have fallen a silent sacrifice,

[thee.
So thou hadst spar'd my fame—I never wrong'd
Per. She knew not of my coming;—I alone
Have been to blame—Spite of her interdiction,
I hither came. She's pure as spotless saints.

Elw. I will not be excus'd by Percy's crime;
So white my innocence, it does not ask
The shade of others' faults to set it off;
Nor shall he need to sully his fair fame
To throw a brighter lustre round my virtue.

Dou. Yet he can only die—but death for honour!
Ye powers of hell, who take malignant joy
In human bloodshed, give me some dire means,
Wild as my hate, and desperate as my wrongs.

Per. Enough of words. Thou know'st I hate thee, Douglas;

'Tis steadfast, fix'd, hereditary hate,
As thine for me; our fathers did bequeath it
As part of our unalienable birthright,

Which nought but death can end.—Come, end it here.

Elw. [Kneels.] Hold, Douglas, hold!—not for myself I kneel,

I do not plead for Percy, but for thee:
Arm not thy hand against thy future peace,
Spare thy brave breast the tortures of remorse,—
Stain not a life of unpolluted honour,
For, oh! as surely as thou strik'st at Percy,
Thou wilt for ever stab the fame of Douglas.

Per. Finish the bloody work.

Dou. Then take thy wish.

Per. Why dost thou start?

[PERCY bares his bosom. DOUGLAS advances to stab him, and discovers the scarf.

Dou. Her scarf upon his breast!

The blasting sight converts me into stone;
Withers my powers like cowardice or age,
Curdles the blood within my shiv'ring veins,
And palsies my bold arm.

Per. [Ironically to the Knights.] Hear you, his friends!

Bear witness to the glorious, great exploit,
Record it in the annals of his race,
That Douglas, the renown'd—the valiant Douglas,
Fenc'd round with guards, and safe in his own castle,

Surpris'd a knight unarm'd, and bravely slew him.

Dou. [Throwing away his dagger.] 'Tis true
—I am the very stain of knight-hood.

How is my glory dimm'd!

Elw. It blazes brighter!

Douglas was only brave—he now is generous!

Per. This action has restor'd thee to thy rank,
And makes thee worthy to contend with Percy.

Dou. Thy joy will be as short as 'tis insulting.

[To ELWINA.

And thou, imperious boy, restrain thy boasting.
Thou hast sav'd my honour, not remov'd my hate,
For my soul loathes thee for the obligation.
Give him his sword.

Per. Now thou'rt a noble foe,
And in the field of honour I will meet thee,
As kind an encount'ring knight.

Elw. Stay, Percy, stay,
Strike at the wretched cause of all, strike here,
Here sheathe thy thirsty sword, but spare my husband. [me]

Dou. Turn, Madam, and address those vows to
To spare the precious life of him you love.
Even now you triumph in the death of Douglas;
Now your loose fancy kindles at the thought,
And, wildly rioting in lawless hope,
Indulges the adultery of the mind.
But I'll defeat that wish.—Guards, bear her in.
Nay, do not struggle. [She is borne in.

Per. Let our deaths suffice,
And reverence virtue in that form inshrind.

Dou. Provoke my rage no farther.—I have kindled

The burning torch of never-dying vengeance
At love's expiring lamp.—But mark me, friends,
If Percy's happier genius should prevail,
And I should fall, give him safe conduct hence,
Be all observance paid him.—Go, I follow thee.

[Aside to EDRIC.

Within I've something for thy private ear.

Per. Now shall this mutual fury be appeas'd!
These eager hands shall soon be drench'd in slaughter!

Yes—like two famish'd vultures snuffing blood,
And panting to destroy, we'll rush to combat;

Yet I've the deepest, deadliest cause of hate,
I am but Percy, thou'rt—Elwina's husband.

[Exeunt.

ACT V.

SCENE I.—ELWINA'S Apartment.

Elw. Thou who in judgment still remember'st mercy,

Look down upon my woes, preserve my husband!
Preserve my husband! Ah, I dare not ask it;
My very prayers may pull down ruin on me!
If Douglas should survive, what then becomes
Of—him—I dare not name? And if he conquers,
I've slain my husband. Agonizing state!
When I can neither hope, nor think, nor pray,
But guilt involves me. Sure to know the worst Cannot exceed the torture of suspense,
When each event is big with equal horror.

[Looks out.

What, no one yet? This solitude is dreadful!
My horrors multiply!

Enter BIRTHA.

Thou messenger of wo!

Bir. Of wo, indeed!

Elw. How, is my husband dead?

Oh, speak!

Bir. Your husband lives.

Elw. Then farewell, Percy!

He was the tenderest, truest!—Bless him, Heaven,
With crowns of glory and immortal joys!

Bir. Still are you wrong; the combat is not over.
Stay, flowing tears, and give me leave to speak.

Elw. Thou sayest that Percy and my husband
Then why this sorrow? [live;

Bir. What a task is mine!

Elw. Thou talk'st as if I were a child in grief,
And scarce acquainted with calamity.
Speak out, unfold thy tale, whate'er it be,
For I am so familiar with affliction,
It cannot come in any shape will shock me.

Bir. How shall I speak? Thy husband—

Elw. What of Douglas?

Bir. When all was ready for the fatal combat,
He call'd his chosen knights, then drew his sword,
And on it made them swear a solemn oath,
Confirm'd by every rite religion bids,
That they would see perform'd his last request,
Be it whate'er it would. Alas! they swore.

Elw. What did the dreadful preparation mean?

Bir. Then to their hands he gave a poison'd cup,
Compounded of the deadliest herbs and drugs;
Take this, said he, it is a husband's legacy;
Percy may conquer—and—I have a wife!
If Douglas falls, Elwina must not live.

Elw. Spirit of Herod! Why, 'twas greatly thought!

'Twas worthy of the bosom which conceiv'd it!

Yet 'twas too merciful to be his own.
Yes, Douglas, yes, my husband, I'll obey thee,
And bless thy genius which has found the means
To reconcile thy vengeance with my peace,
The deadly means to make obedience pleasant.

Bir. O spare, for pity spare, my bleeding heart:
Inhuman to the last! Unnatural poison!

Elw. My gentle friend, what is there in a name?
The means are little where the end is kind.
If it disturb thee, do not call it poison;
Call it the sweet oblivion of my cares,
My balm of wo, my cordial of affliction,
The drop of mercy to my fainting soul,
My kind dismissal from a world of sorrow,

My cup of bliss, my passport to the skies.

Bir. Hark! what alarm is that?

Elw. The combat 's over! [BIRTHA goes out.]

[ELWINA stands in a fixed attitude, her hands clasped.]

Now, gracious Heaven, sustain me in the trial,
And bow my spirit to thy great decrees!

Re-enter BIRTHA.

[ELWINA looks steadfastly at her without speaking.]

Bir. Douglas is fallen.

Elw. Bring me the poison.

Bir. Never.

[approach!]

Elw. Where are the knights? I summon you—

Draw near, ye awful ministers of fate,

Dire instruments of posthumous revenge!

Come—I am ready; but your tardy justice

Defrauds the injur'd dead.—Go, haste, my friend,

See that the castle be securely guarded,

Let every gate be barr'd—prevent his entrance.

Bir. Whose entrance?

Elw. His—the murderer of my husband.

Bir. He 's single, we have hosts of friends.

Elw. No matter;

Who knows what love and madness may attempt?

But here I swear by all that binds the good,

Never to see him more.—Unhappy Douglas!

O if thy troubled spirit still is conscious

Of our past woes, look down, and hear me swear,

That when the legacy thy rage bequeath'd me

Works at my heart, and conquers struggling

Ev'n in that agony I'll still be faithful. [nature,]

She who could never love, shall yet obey thee,

Weep thy hard fate, and die to prove her truth.

Bir. O unexampled virtue! [A noise without.]

Elw. Heard you nothing?

By all my fears the insulting conqueror comes.

O save me, shield me!

Enter DOUGLAS.

Heaven and earth, my husband!

Dou. Yes—

To blast thee with the sight of him thou hat'st,
Of him thou hast wrong'd, adulteress, 'tis thy husband. [mercy,]

Elw. [Kneels.] Bless'd be the fountain of eternal

This load of guilt is spar'd me! Douglas lives!

Perhaps both live! [To BIRTHA.] Could I be sure of that,

The poison were superfluous, joy would kill me.

Dou. Be honest now, for once, and curse thy stars;

Curse thy detested fate which brings thee back

A hated husband, when thy guilty soul

Revell'd in fond, imaginary joys

With my too happy rival: when thou flew'st,

To gratify impatient, boundless passion,

And join adulterous lust to bloody murder;

Then to reverse the scene! polluted woman!

Mine is the transport now, and thine the pang.

Elw. Whence sprung the false report that thou had'st fall'n?

Dou. To give thy guilty breast a deeper wound,

To add a deadlier sting to disappointment,
I rais'd it—I contriv'd—I sent it thee. [virtue.]

Elw. Thou seest me bold, but bold in conscious —That my sad soul may not be stain'd with blood,

That I may spend my few short hours in peace,

And die in holy hope of Heaven's forgiveness,

Relieve the terrors of my lab'ring breast,

Say I am clear of murder—say he lives,

VOL. I. . . 3 X

45

Say but that little word, that Percy lives,
And Alps and oceans shall divide us ever,
As far as universal space can part us.

Dou. Canst thou renounce him?

Elw. Tell me that he lives,

And thou shalt be the ruler of my fate,
For ever hide me in a convent's gloom,
From cheerful day-light, and the haunts of men,

Where sad austerity, and ceaseless prayer
Shall share my uncomplaining day between them.

Dou. O, hypocrite! now, Vengeance, to thy office.

I had forgot—Percy commends him to thee,

And by my hand—

Elw. How—by thy hand?

Dou. Has sent thee

This precious pledge of love.

[He gives her PERCY'S scarf.]

Elw. Then Percy 's dead! [mine!]

Dou. He is.—O great revenge, thou now art

See how convulsive sorrow rends her frame!

This, this is transport!—injur'd honour now

Receives its vast, its ample retribution.

She sheds no tears, her grief 's too highly wrought;

'Tis speechless agony.—She must not faint—

She shall not 'scape her portion of the pain.

No! she shall feel the fulness of distress,

And wake to keen perception of her loss.

Bir. Monster! Barbarian! leave her to her sorrows.

Elw. [In a low broken voice.] Douglas—think not I faint, because thou seest

The pale and bloodless cheek of wan despair.

Fall me not yet, my spirits; thou cold heart,

Cherish thy freezing current one short moment,

And bear thy mighty load a little longer.

Dou. Percy, I must avow it, bravely fought,—

Died as a hero should;—but, as he fell,

(Hear it, fond wanton!) call'd upon thy name,

And his last guilty breath sigh'd out—Elwina!

Come—give a loose to rage, and feed thy soul

With wild complaints, and womanish upbraidings.

Elw. [In a low solemn voice.] No.

The sorrow 's weak that wastes itself in words,

Mine is substantial anguish—deep, not loud;

I do not rave—Resentment 's the return

Of common souls for common injuries. [sion;]

Light grief is proud of state, and courts compas-

But there 's a dignity in cureless sorrow,

A sullen grandeur which disdains complaint;

Rage is for little wrongs—Despair is dumb.

[Exit ELWINA and BIRTHA.]

Dou. Why, this is well! her sense of wo is strong! [her,]

The sharp, keen tooth of gnawing grief devours

Feeds on her heart, and pays me back my pangs

Since I must perish, 'twill be glorious ruin:

I fall not singly, but, like some proud tower,

I'll crush surrounding objects in the wreck,

And make the devastation wide and dreadful.

Enter RABY.

Raby. O whether shall a wretched father turn,

Where fly for comfort? Douglas, art thou here

I do not ask for comfort at thy hands.

I'd but one little casket, where I lodged

My precious hoard of wealth, and, like an idiot,

I gave my treasure to another's keeping,

Who threw away the gem, nor knew its value.

But left the plunder'd owner quite a beggar.

Dou. What art thou come to see thy race dishonour'd?

And thy bright sun of glory set in blood?
I would have spar'd thy virtues, and thy age,
The knowledge of her infamy.

Raby. 'Tis false. [blood.]
Had she been base, this sword had drank her

Dou. Ha! dost thou vindicate the wanton?

Raby. Wanton?
Thou hast defam'd a noble lady's honour—
My spotless child—in me behold her champion:
The strength of Hercules will nerve this arm,
When lifted in defence of innocence.
The daughter's virtue for the father's shield,
Will make old Raby still invincible.

[Offers to draw.]

Dou. Forbear.
Raby. Thou dost disdain my feeble arm,
And scorn my age.

Dou. There will be blood enough;
Nor need thy wither'd veins, old lord, be drain'd,
To swell the copious stream.

Raby. Thou wilt not kill her?

Dou. Oh, 'tis a day of horror!

Enter EDRIC and BIRTHA.

Edr. Where is Douglas?
I come to save him from the deadliest crime
Revenge did ever meditate.

Dou. What meanest thou? [wife.]

Edr. This instant fly, and save thy guiltless

Dou. Save that perfidious—

Edr. That much-injur'd woman.

Bir. Unfortunate indeed, but O most innocent!

Edr. In the last solemn article of death,
That truth-compelling state, when even bad men
Fear to speak falsely, Percy clear'd her fame.

Dou. I heard him.—'Twas the guilty fraud of love.

The scarf, the scarf! that proof of mutual passion,
Given but this day to ratify their crimes!

Bir. What means my lord? This day? That fatal scarf

Was given long since, a toy of childish friendship;
Long ere your marriage, ere you knew Elwina.

Raby. 'Tis I am guilty.

Dou. Ha!

Raby. I,—I alone.

Confusion, honour, pride, parental fondness,
Distract my soul.—Percy was not to blame,
He was—the destin'd husband of Elwina!

He lov'd her—was below'd—and I approv'd.

The tale is long.—I chang'd my purpose since,
Forbade their marriage—

Dou. And confirm'd my mis'ry!

'Twice did they meet to-day—my wife and Percy.

Raby. I know it.

Dou. Ha! thou knew'st of my dishonour?

'Thou wast a witness, an approving witness,

At least a tame one!

Raby. Percy came, 'tis true,
A constant, tender, but a guiltless lover!

Dou. I shall grow mad indeed; a guiltless lover!
Percy, the guiltless lover of my wife?

Raby. He knew not she was married.

Dou. How? is't possible? [cent;]

Raby. Douglas, 'tis true; both, both were innocent of her marriage, she of his return. [vow'd]

Bir. But now, when we believ'd thee dead, she Never to see thy rival. Instantly,
Not in a state of momentary passion,
But with a martyr's dignity and calmness,
She bade me bring the poison

Dou. Had'st thou done it,

Despair had been my portion! Fly, good Birtha,
Find out the suffering saint—describe my penitence,

And paint my vast extravagance of fondness,
Tell her I love as never mortal lov'd—
Tell her I know her virtues, and adore them—
Tell her I come, but dare not seek her presence,
Till she pronounce my pardon.

Bir. I obey. [Exit BIRTHA.]

Raby. My child is innocent! ye choirs of saints,
Catch the bless'd sounds—my child is innocent!

Dou. O I will kneel, and sue for her forgiveness,
And thou shalt help me plead the cause of love,
And thou shalt weep—she cannot sure refuse
A kneeling husband and a weeping father.
Thy venerable cheek is wet already.

Raby. Douglas! it is the dew of grateful joy!
My child is innocent! I now would die,
Lest fortune should grow weary of her kindness,
And grudge me this short transport.

Dou. Where, where is she?

My fond impatience brooks not her delay;
Quick, let me find her, hush her anxious soul,
And sooth her troubled spirit into peace.

Enter BIRTHA.

Bir. O horror, horror, horror!

Dou. Ah! what mean'st thou?

Bir. Elwina—

Dou. Speak—

Bir. Her grief wrought up to frenzy,
She has, in her delirium, swallow'd poison!

Raby. Frenzy and poison!

Dou. Both a husband's gift;

But thus I do her justice.

As DOUGLAS goes to stab himself, enter ELWINA distracted, her hair dishevelled, PERCY'S scarf in her hand.

Elw. [Goes up to DOUGLAS.] What, blood again? We cannot kill him twice!

Soft, soft—no violence—he's dead already;—

I did it—Yes—I drown'd him with my tears;—

But hide the cruel deed! I'll scratch him out

A shallow grave, and lay the green sod on it;

Ay—and I'll bind the wild briar o'er the turf,

And plant a willow there, a weeping willow—

[She sits on the ground.]

But look you tell not Douglas, he'll disturb him;

He'll pluck the willow up—and plant a thorn.

He will not let me sit upon his grave,

And sing all day, and weep and pray all night.

Raby. Dost thou not know me?

Elw. Yes—I do remember

You had a harmless lamb.

Raby. I had indeed!

Elw. From all the flock you chose her out a

In sooth a fair one—you did bid her love it—

But while the shepherd slept the wolf devour'd it.

Raby. My heart will break. 'Tis this too much,
too much!

Elw. [Smiling.] O 'twas a cordial draught—I drank it all.

Raby. What means my child?

Dou. The poison! Oh the poison!

Thou dear wrong'd innocence—

Elw. Off—murderer, off!

Do not defile me with those crimson hands.

[Shows the scarf.]

This is his winding sheet—I'll wrap him in it—
I wrought it for my love—there—now I've dress'd
him.

How brave he looks! my father will forgive him,

He dearly lov'd him once—but that is over.
See where he comes—beware, my gallant Percy,
Ah! come not here, this is the cave of death,
And there's the dark, dark palace of Revenge!
See the pale king sits on his blood-stain'd throne!
He points to me—I come, I come, I come.

[She faints, they run to her, DOUGLAS takes up his sword and stabs himself.]

Dou. Thus, thus I follow thee.

Edr. Hold thy rash hand!

Dou. It is too late. No remedy but this Could medicine a disease so desperate.

Raby. Ah, she revives!

Dou. [Raising himself.] She lives! bear, bear me to her!

We shall be happy yet.

[He struggles to get to her, but sinks down.]

It will not be—

O for a last embrace—Alas! I faint—

She lives—Now death is terrible indeed—

Fair spirit, I lov'd thee—O—Elwina! [Dies.]

Elw. Where have I been? 'The damps of death are on me. [thus!]

Raby. Look up, my child! O do not leave me
Pity the anguish of thy aged father.

Hast thou forgot me?

Elw. No—you are my father;

O you are kindly come to close my eyes,

And take the kiss of death from my cold lips!

Raby. Do we meet thus?

Elw. We soon shall meet in peace.

I've but a faint remembrance of the past—

But something tells me—O those painful struggles!
Raise me a little—there—

[She sees the body of DOUGLAS.]

What sight is that? [der'd]

A sword, and bloody? Ah! and Douglas mur-

Edr. Convinc'd too late of your unequal'd virtues, [wrongs,]

And wrung with deep compunction for your
By his own hand the wretched Douglas fell.

Elw. This adds another, sharper pang to death.

O thou Eternal! take him to thy mercy,

Nor let this sin be on his head, or mine!

Raby. I have undone you all—the crime is mine!

O thou poor injur'd saint, forgive thy father,

He kneels to his wrong'd child.

Elw. Now you are cruel,

Come near, my father, nearer—I would see you,

But mists and darkness cloud my failing sight.

O death! suspend thy rights for one short moment,

Till I have ta'en a father's last embrace—

A father's blessing.—Once—and now 'tis over.

Receive me to thy mercy, gracious Heaven!

[She dies.]

Raby. She's gone! for ever gone! cold, dead and cold.

Am I a father? Fathers love their children—

I murder mine! With impious pride I snatch'd

The bolt of vengeance from the hand of Heaven.

My punishment is great—but oh! 'tis just.

My soul submissive bows. A righteous God

Has made my crime become my chastisement.

[Exeunt]

THE BELLE'S STRATAGEM:

A COMEDY,

IN FIVE ACTS.

BY MRS. CROWLEY.

REMARKS.

This successful play first appeared at Covent Garden in 1780, and was particularly patronised by the royal family, who frequently commanded its representation.

The Biographia Dramatica says: "To speak of it as a first-rate performance would be doing injustice to the piece, as it possesses little originality either in plot, character, or situation; it however always gives pleasure in the exhibition." A late editor has observed, that the mind must have been gifted with various powers that could produce such a comedy as this, and such a poem as the Siege of Acre."

ACT I.

SCENE I.—Lincoln's-inn.

Enter SAVILLE, followed by a SERVANT, at the top of the Stage, looking round as if at a loss.

Sav. Lincoln's-inn!—Well, but where to find him, now I am in Lincoln's-inn? Where did he say his master was?

Serv. He only said in Lincoln's-inn, Sir.

Sav. That's pretty!—And your wisdom never inquired at whose chambers?

Serv. Sir, you spoke to the servant yourself.

Sav. If I was too impatient to ask questions, you ought to have taken directions, blockhead!

Enter COURTALL, singing.

Ha, Courtall!—Bid him keep the horses in motion, and then inquire at all the chambers round. [Exit SERVANT.] What the devil brings you to this part of the town? Have any of the long robes handsome wives, sisters, or chambermaids?

Court. Perhaps they have; but I came on a different errand: and had thy good fortune brought thee here half an hour sooner, I'd have given thee such a treat! ha, ha, ha!

Sav. I'm sorry I miss'd it. What was it?

Court. I was informed, a few days since, that my cousins Fallow were come to town, and desired earnestly to see me at their lodgings, in Warwick-court, Holborn. Away drove I, painting them all the way as so many Hebes. They came from the farthest part of Northumberland; had never been in town, and in course were made up of rusticity, innocence, and beauty.

Sav. Well!

Court. After waiting thirty minutes, during which there was a violent bustle, in bounced five sallow damsels, four of them maypoles; the fifth, nature, by way of variety, had bent in the Æsop style.—But they all opened at once, like hounds, on a fresh scent.—Oh, cousin Courtall!—How do you do, cousin Courtall?—Lord, cousin, I am glad you are come! We want you to go with us to the Park, and the plays, and the opera, and Almack's, and all the fine places!—The devil, thought I, my dears, may attend you, for I'm sure I wont.—However, I heroically staid an hour with them, and discovered the virgins were all come to town with the hopes of leaving it wives—their heads full of knight-baronights, fops, and adventures.

Sav. Well, how did you get off?

Court. Oh, pleaded a million engagements.—However, conscience twitched me, so I breakfasted with them this morning, and afterwards squired them to the gardens here, as the most private place in town; and then took a sorrowful leave, complaining of my hard fortune, that obliged me to set off immediately for Dorsetshire.—Ha, ha, ha!

Sav. I congratulate your escape.—Courtall at Almack's, with five awkward, country cousins!—Ha, ha, ha!—Why, your existence, as a man of gallantry, could never have survived it.

Court. Death and fire! had they come to town, like the rustics of the last age, to see Paul's, the lions, and the waxwork—at their service; but the cousins of our days come up ladies—and, with the knowledge they glean from magazines and pocket-books, fine ladies—laugh at the bashfulness of their grandmothers, and boldly demand their entrees into the first circles.

Sav. Come, give me some news.

Court. Oh, enough for three gazettes!—The ladies are going to petition for a bill, that, during the war, every man may be allowed two wives.

Sav. 'Tis impossible they should succeed; for the majority of both houses know what it is to have one.

Court. But prythee, Saville, how came you to town?

Sav. I came to meet my friend Doricourt, who, you know, is lately arrived from Rome.

Court. Arrived! yes, faith, and has cut us all out!—His carriage, his liveries, his dress, himself, are the rage of the day!—His first appearance set the whole town in a ferment, and his valet is besieged by levees of tailors, habit-makers, and other ministers of fashion, to gratify the impatience of their customers for becoming a la mode de Doricourt.—Nay, the beautiful lady Frolic, t'other night, with two sister countesses, insisted upon his waistcoat for muffs; and their snowy arms now bear it in triumph about town, to the heart-rending affliction of all our beau garçons.

Sav. Indeed! Well, those little gallantries will soon be over—he's on the point of marriage.

Court. Marriage! Doricourt on the point of marriage! 'tis the happiest tidings you could have given, next to his being hanged.—Who is the bride elect?

Sav. I never saw her; but 'tis Miss Hardy, the rich heiress.—The match was made by the parents, and the courtship began on their nurses' knees; master used to crow at miss, and miss used to chuckle at master.

Court. Oh, then by this time they care no more for each other, than I do for my country cousins.

Sav. I don't know that; they have never met since thus high; and so probably have some regard for each other.

Court. Never met!—Odd!

Sav. A whim of Mr. Hardy's; he thought his daughter's charms would make a more forcible impression, if her lover remained in ignorance of them till his return from the continent.

Enter SAVILLE'S SERVANT.

Ser. Mr. Doricourt, Sir, has been at Counselor Pleadwell's, and gone about five minutes.

[Exit.]

Sav. Five minutes.—Zounds! I have been five minutes too late all my lifetime!—Good morrow, Courtall.—I must pursue him. [Going.]

Court. Promise to dine with me to-day; I have some honest fellows.

[Going off on the opposite side.]

Sav. Can't promise—perhaps I may.—See there, there's a bevy of female Patagonians, coming down upon us.

Court. By the Lord, then, it must be my strapping cousins.—I dare not look behind me.—Run, man, run! [Exeunt both on one side.]

SCENE II.—An Apartment in DORICOURT'S House.

Enter DORICOURT.

Dor. [To a servant behind.] I shall be too late for St. James'; bid him come immediately.

Enter FRENCHMAN and SAVILLE.

French. Monsieur Saville. [Exit.]

Dor. Most fortunate!—My dear Saville, let the warmth of this embrace speak the pleasure of my heart.

Sav. Well, this is some comfort, after the scurvy reception I met with in your hall.—I prepared my mind, as I came up stairs, for a bon jour, a grimace, and an adieu.

Dor. Why so?

Sav. Judging of the master from the rest of the family.—What the devil is the meaning of that flock of foreigners below, with their parchment faces, and snuff whisks?—What! can't an Englishman stand behind your carriage, buckle your shoe, or brush your coat?

Dor. Stale, my dear Saville, stale—Englishmen make the best soldiers, citizens, artizans, and philosophers, in the world, but the very worst footmen. I keep French fellows and Germans, as the Romans kept slaves; because their own countrymen had minds too enlarged and haughty to descend with a grace to the duties of such a station.

Sav. A good excuse for a bad practice.

Dor. On my honour, experience will convince you of its truth. A Frenchman neither hears, sees, nor breathes, but as his master directs; and his whole system of conduct is comprised in one short word—obedience! An Englishman reasons, forms opinions, cogitates, and disputes; he is the mere creature of your will: the other, a being conscious of equal importance in the universal scale with yourself, and is therefore your judge, whilst he wears your livery, and decides on your actions with the freedom of a censor.

Sav. And this is in defence of a custom I have heard you execrate, together with all the adventitious manners imported by our travelled gentry.

Dor. Ay, but that was at eighteen; we are always very wise at eighteen. But consider this point: we go into Italy, where the sole business of the people is to study and improve the powers of music: we yield to the fascination, and grow enthusiasts in the charming science: we travel over France, and see the whole kingdom composing ornaments, and inventing fashions: we condescend to avail ourselves of their industry, and adopt their modes: we return to England, and find the nation intent on the most important objects: polity, commerce, war, with all the liberal arts, employ her sons; the latent sparks glow afresh within our bosoms; the sweet follies of the continent imperceptibly slide away, whilst senators, statesmen, patriots, and heroes, emerge from the virtù of Italy, and the frippery of France.

Sav. I may as well give it up—You had always the art of placing your faults in the best light; and I can't help loving you, faults and all: so to start a subject which must please you—When do you expect Miss Hardy?

Dor. Oh, the hour of expectation is past—She is arrived, and I this morning had the honour of an interview at Pleadwell's. The writings were ready: and, in obedience to the will of Mr. Hardy, we met to sign and seal.

Sav. Has the event answered? Did your heart leap or sink, when you beheld your mistress?

Dor. Faith, neither one nor t'other:—she's a fine girl, as far as mere flesh and blood goes.—But—

Sav. But what?

Dor. Why, she's only a fine girl; complexion, shape, and features—nothing more.

Sav. Is not that enough?

Dor. No—she should have spirit; fire! L'air enjoué! that something, that nothing, which every body feels, and which nobody can describe, in the restless charmers of Italy and France.

Sav. Thanks to the parsimony of my father, that kept me from travel! I would not have lost my relish for true unaffected English beauty, to have been quarrelled for by all the belles of Versailles and Florence.

Dor. Pho! thou hast no taste!—English beauty! 'tis insipidity: it wants the zest, it wants poignancy, Frank! Why, I have known a Frenchwoman, indebted to nature for no one thing but a pair of decent eyes, reckon in her suit as many counts, marquesses, and petits mairres, as would satisfy three dozen of our first rate toasts. I have known an Italian marquizina make ten conquests in stepping from her carriage, and carry her slaves from one city to another, whose real intrinsic beauty would have yielded to half the little grissettes that pace your Mall on a Sunday.

Sav. And has Miss Hardy nothing of this?

Dor. If she has, she was pleased to keep it to herself. I was in the room half an hour before I could catch the colour of her eyes; and every attempt to draw her into conversation occasioned so cruel an embarrassment, that I was reduced to the necessity of news, French fleets, and Spanish captures, with her father.

Sav. So, Miss Hardy, with only beauty, modesty, and merit, is doomed to the arms of a husband who will despise her.

Dor. You are unjust. Though she has not inspired me with very violent passion, my honour secures her felicity.

Sav. Come, come, Doricourt, you know very well, that when the honour of a husband is locumtenens for his heart, his wife must be as indifferent as himself, if she is not unhappy.

Dor. Pho! never moralize without spectacles. But, as we are upon the tender subject, how did you bear Touchwood's carrying lady Frances?

Sav. You know I never looked up to her with hope; and Sir George is in every way worthy of her.

Dor. A la mode Angloise, a philosopher, even in love.

Sav. Come, I detain you. You seem dressed at all points, and of course have an engagement.

Dor. To St. James'. I dine at Hardy's, and accompany them to the masquerade in the evening—but breakfast with me to-morrow, and we'll talk of our old companions; for I swear to you, Saville, the air of the continent has not effaced one youthful prejudice or attachment.

Sav. With an exception to the case of ladies and servants.

Dor. True; there I plead guilty: but I have never yet found any man, whom I could cordially take to my heart and call friend, who was not born beneath a British sky, and whose heart and manners were not truly English.

[Exeunt DOR. and SAV.]

SCENE III.—An Apartment in MR. HARDY'S House.

VILLERS seated on a Sofa, reading.

Enter FLUTTER.

Flut. Ha, Villers, have you seen Mrs. Rackett?—Miss Hardy, I find, is out.

Vil. I have not seen her yet. I have made a voyage to Lapland since I came. [Flinging away the book.] A lady at her toilet is as difficult to be moved as a quaker. [Yawning.] What events have happened in the world since yesterday? have you heard?

Flut. Oh, yes; I stopped at Tattersall's, as I came by, and there I found Lord James Jessamy, Sir William Wilding, and Mr. —. But now I think on't, you sha'n't know a syllable of the matter; for I have been informed you never believe above one half of what I say.

Vil. My dear fellow, somebody has imposed upon you most egregiously! Half! Why, I never believe one tenth part of what you say: that is, according to the plain and literal expression; but, as I understand you, your intelligence is amusing.

Flut. That's very hard now, very hard. I never related a falsity in my life, unless I stumbled at it by mistake; and if it were otherwise, your dull matter-of-fact people are infinitely obliged to those warm imaginations which soar into fiction to amuse you; for, positively, the common events of this little, dirty world, are not worth talking about, unless you embellish them!—Ha! here comes Mrs. Rackett: adieu to weeds, I see! All life!

Enter MRS. RACKETT.

Enter, Madam, in all your charms! Villers has been abusing your toilet, for keeping you so long;

but I think we are much obliged to it, and so are you.

Mrs. R. How so, pray? Good morning t'ye both. Here, here 's a hand a-piece for you.

[Kiss her hands.]

Flut. How so! Because it hath given you so many beauties.

Mrs. R. Delightful compliment! What do you think of that, Villers?

Vil. That he and his compliments are alike—dowry, but wont bear examining.—So you brought Miss Hardy to town last night?

Mrs. R. Yes, I should have brought her before, but I had a fall from my horse, that confined me a week—I suppose in her heart she wished me aanged a dozen times an hour.

Flut. Why?

Mrs. R. Had she not an expecting lover in own all the time? She meets him this morning at the lawyer's.—I hope she'll charm him; she's the sweetest girl in the world.

Vil. Vanity, like murder, will out—You have convinced me you think yourself more charming.

Mrs. R. How can that be?

Vil. No woman ever praises another, unless she thinks herself superior in the very perfections she allows.

Flut. Nor no man ever rails at the sex, unless he is conscious he deserves their hatred.

Mrs. R. Thank ye, Flutter—I'll owe ye a bouquet for that. I am going to visit the new married Lady Frances Touchwood—Who knows her husband?

Flut. Every body.

Mrs. R. Is there not something odd in his character?

Vil. Nothing, but that he is passionately fond of his wife;—and so petulant is his love, that he opened the cage of a favourite bullfinch, and sent it to catch butterflies, because she rewarded its song with her kisses.

Mrs. R. Intolerable monster! Such a brute deserves—

Vil. Nay, nay, nay, nay, this is your sex now.

—Give a woman but one stroke of character, off she goes, like a ball from a racket; sees the whole man, marks him down for angel or a devil, and so exhibits him to her acquaintance.—This monster! this brute! is one of the worthiest fellows upon earth; sound sense, and a liberal mind; but dotes on his wife to such excess, that he quarrels with every thing she admires, and is jealous of her tippet and nosegay.

Mrs. R. Oh, less love for me, kind Cupid! I can see no difference between the torment of such an affection, and hatred.

Flut. Oh, pardon me, inconceivable difference, inconceivable; I see it as clearly as your bracelet. In the one case the husband would say, as Mr. Snapper said t'other day, Zounds! Madam, do you suppose that my table, and my house, and my pictures!—Apropos, des Bottes—there was the divinest Plague of Athens sold yesterday at Langford's! the dead figures so natural; you would have sworn they had been alive. Lord Primrose bid five hundred—Six, said Lady Carmine—A thousand, said Ingot the nabob.—Down went the hammer.—A rouleau for your bargain, said Sir Jeremy Jingle. And what answer do you think Ingot made him?

Mrs. R. Why, took the offer.

Flut. Sir, I would oblige you, but I buy this picture to place in the nursery: the children have already got Whittington and his cat! 'tis just his size, and they'll make good companions.

Mrs. R. Ha, ha, ha! Well, I protest that 's just the way now—the nabobs and their wives outbid one at every sale, and the creatures have no more taste—

Vil. There again! You forget this story is told by Flutter, who always remembers every thing but the circumstances and the person he talks about;—'twas Ingot who offered a rouleau for the bargain, and Sir Jeremy Jingle who made the reply.

Flut. 'Egad, I believe you are right—Well, the story is as good one way as t'other, you know. Good morning. I am going to Mrs. Crotchet's concert, and in my way back shall make my bow at Sir George's.

[Going.]
Vil. I'll venture every figure in your tailor's bill, you make some blunder there.

Flut. [Turning back.] Done! my tailor's bill has not been paid these two years; and I'll open my mouth with as much care as Mrs. Bridget Button, who wears cork plumpers in each cheek, and never hazards more than six words, for fear of showing them.

[Exit.]
Mrs. R. 'Tis a good-natured, insignificant creature! let in every where, and cared for no where.—There 's Miss Hardy returned from Lincoln's-inn: she seems rather chagrined.

Vil. Then I leave you to your communications.

Enter LETITIA, followed by her Maid.

Adieu! I am rejoiced to see you so well, Madam! but I must tear myself away.

Let. Don't vanish in a moment.

Vil. Oh, inhuman! you are two of the most dangerous women in town—Staying here to be cannonaded by four such eyes, is equal to a rencontre with Paul Jones, or a midnight march to Omoo!—They'll swallow the nonsense for the sake of the compliment.

[Aside; exit.]
Let. [Gives her cloak to her Maid.] Order Du Quesne never more to come again; he shall positively dress my hair no more. [Exit Maid.] And this odious silk, how unbecoming it is!—I was bewitched to choose it. [Throwing herself on a chair, and looking in a pocket glass; Mrs. RACKETT staring at her.] Did you ever see such a fright as I am to-day?

Mrs. R. Yes, I have seen you look much worse.

Let. How can you be so provoking? If I do not look this morning worse than ever I looked in my life, I am naturally a fright.—You shall have it which way you will.

Mrs. R. Just as you please; but pray what is the meaning of all this?

Let. [Rising.] Men are all dissemblers, flatterers, deceivers! Have I not heard a thousand times of my air, my eyes, my shape—all made for victory! and to-day, when I bent my whole heart on one poor conquest, I have proved that all those imputed charms amount to nothing; for Coricouff saw them unmoved.—A husband of fifteen months could not have examined me with more cutting indifference.

Mrs. R. Then do you retain it like a wife of fifteen months, and be as indifferent as he.

Let. Ay, there's the sting! The blooming boy, who left his image in my young heart, is at four and twenty improved in every grace that fixed him there. It is the same face that my memory and my dreams constantly painted to me; but its graces are finished, and every beauty heightened. How mortifying, to feel myself at the same moment his slave, and an object of perfect indifference to him!

Mrs. R. How are you certain that was the case? Did you expect him to kneel down before the lawyer, his clerks, and your father, to make oath of your beauty?

Let. No; but he should have looked as if a sudden ray had pierced him! he should have been breathless! speechless! for, oh! Caroline, all this was I!

Mrs. R. I am sorry you was such a fool. Can you expect a man, who has courted and been courted by half the fine women in Europe, to feel like a girl from a boarding-school? He is the prettiest fellow you have seen, and in course bewilders your imagination; but he has seen a million of pretty women, child, before he saw you; and his first feelings have been over long ago.

Let. Your raillery distresses me; but I will touch his heart, or never be his wife.

Mrs. R. Absurd and romantic! If you have no reason to believe his heart pre-engaged, be satisfied; if he is a man of honour, you'll have nothing to complain of.

Let. Nothing to complain of? Heavens! shall I marry the man I adore with such an expectation as that?

Mrs. R. And when you have fretted yourself pale, my dear, you'll have mended your expectation greatly.

Let. [Pausing.] Yet I have one hope. If there is any power whose peculiar care is faithful love, that power I invoke to aid me.

Enter MR. HARDY.

Har. Well, now, wasn't I right? Ay, Letty! Ay, cousin Rackett! wasn't I right? I knew 't would be so. He was all agog to see her before he went abroad; and, if he had, he'd have thought no more of her face, may be, than his own.

Mrs. R. May be, not half so much.

Har. Ay, may be so—but I see into things; exactly as I foresaw, to-day, he fell desperately in love with the wench, he, he!

Let. Indeed, Sir! how did you perceive it?

Har. That's a pretty question! How do I perceive every thing? How did I foresee the fall of corn, and the rise of taxes? How did I know that if we quarrelled with America, Norway deals would be dearer? How did I foretell that a war would sink the funds? How did I forewarn parson Homily, that if he didn't some Rubric, he'd lose the lectureship? How did I—But what the devil makes you so dull, Letitia? I thought to have found you popping about, as brisk as the jacks of your harpsichord.

Let. Surely, Sir, it was a very serious occasion.

Har. Pho, pho! girls should never be grave before marriage. How did you feel, cousin, beforehand, ay?

Mrs. R. Feel! why, exceeding full of cares.

Har. Did you?

Mrs. R. I could not sleep for thinking of my coach, my liveries, and my chairmen; the taste of clothes I should be presented in, distracted me for a week; and whether I should be married in white or lilac, gave me the most cruel anxiety.

Let. And is it possible you felt no other care?

Har. And pray, of what sort may your cares be, Mrs. Letitia? I begin to foresee now that you have taken a dislike to Doricourt.

Let. Indeed, Sir, I have not.

Har. Then what's all this melancholy about? An't you a going to be married? and what's more, to a sensible man? and, what's more to a young girl, to a handsome man? And what's all this melancholy for, I say?

Mrs. R. Why because he is handsome and sensible, and because she's over head and ears in love with him; all which, it seems, your foreknowledge had not told you a word of.

Let. Ey, Caroline!

Har. Well, come, do you tell me what's the matter then? If you don't like him, hang the signing and sealing, he sha'n't have ye—and yet I can't say that neither; for you know that estate, that cost his father and me upwards of fourscore thousand pounds, must go all to him if you wont have him: if he wont have you, indeed, 'twill be all yours. All that's clear, engrossed upon parchment, and the poor dear man set his hand to it whilst he was dying.—Ah! said I, foresee you'll never live to see them come together; but their first son shall be christened Jeremiah, after you, that I promise you.—But come, I say, what is the matter? Don't you like him?

Let. I fear, Sir—if I must speak—I fear I was less agreeable in Mr. Doricourt's eyes, than he appeared in mine.

Har. There you are mistaken; for I asked him, and he told me he liked you vastly; but they think he must have taken a fancy to her?

Mrs. R. Why really I think so, as I was not by.

Let. My dear Sir, I am convinced he has not; but, if there is spirit or invention in woman, he shall.

Har. Right, girl; go to your toilet.—

Let. It is not my toilet that can serve me: but a plan has struck me, if you will not oppose it, which flatters me with brilliant success.

Har. Oppose it! Not I, indeed! What is it?

Let. Why, Sir—it may seem a little paradoxical; but as he does not like me enough, I want him to like me still less, and will at our next interview endeavour to heighten his indifference into dislike.

Har. Who the devil could have foreseen that?

Mrs. R. Heaven and earth! Letitia, are you serious?

Let. As serious as the most important business of my life demands.

Mrs. R. Why endeavour to make him dislike you?

Let. Because 'tis much easier to convert a sentiment into its opposite, than to transform indifference into tender passion.

Mrs. R. That may be good philosophy, but I'm afraid you'll find it a bad maxim.

Let. I have the strongest confidence in it. I am inspired with unusual spirits, and on this hazard willingly stake my chance for happiness. I am impatient to begin my measures. [Exit.]

Har. Can you foresee the end of this, cousin?

Mrs. R. No, Sir; nothing less than your penetration can do that, I am sure; and I can't stay now to consider it. I am going to call on the Ogles, and then to Lady Frances Touchwood's, and then to an auction, and then—I don't know where—but I shall be at home time enough to witness this extraordinary interview. Good bye.

[Exit.]

Har. Well, 'tis an odd thing—I can't understand it—but I foresee Letty will have her way, and so I sha'n't give myself the trouble to dispute it.

[Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—SIR GEORGE TOUCHWOOD'S HOUSE.

Enter DORICOURT and SIR GEORGE TOUCHWOOD.

Dor. Married, ha, ha, ha! you, whom I heard in Paris say such things of the sex, are in London a married man.

Sir G. The sex is still what it has ever been, since la petite morale banished substantial virtues; and rather than have given my name to one of your high bred, fashionable dames, I'd have crossed the line in a fire-ship, and married a Japanese.

Dor. Yet you have married an English beauty; yea, and a beauty born in high life.

Sir G. True; but she has a simplicity of heart and manners, that would have become the fair Hebrew damsels toasted by the patriarchs.

Dor. Ha, ha! Why, thou art a downright matrimonial, Quixote. My life on't, she becomes as mere a town lady, in six months, as though she had been bred to the trade.

Sir G. Common—common—[Contemptuously.] No, Sir, Lady Frances despises high life so much from the ideas I have given her, that she'll live in it like a salamander in fire.

Dor. I'll send thee off to St. Evreux this night, drawn at full length, and coloured after nature.

Sir G. Tell him then, to add to the ridicule, that Touchwood glories in the name of husband; that he has found in one Englishwoman more beauty than Frenchmen ever saw, and more goodness than Frenchwomen can conceive.

Dor. Well—enough of description. Introduce me to this phoenix; I came on purpose.

Sir G. Introduce!—oh, ay, to be sure!—I believe Lady Frances is engaged just now—but another time.—How handsome the dog looks to-day!

[Aside.]

Dor. Another time!—but I have no other time.—'Sdeath! this is the only hour I can command this fortnight.

Sir G. I am glad to hear it, with all my soul! [Aside.] So then you can't dine with us to-day? That's very unlucky.

Dor. Oh, yes—as to dinner—yes, I can, I believe, contrive to dine with you to-day.

Sir G. Pshaw! I didn't think on what I was saying; I meant supper.—You can't sup with us?

Dor. Why, supper will be rather more convenient than dinner. But you are fortunate—if you had asked me any other night, I could not have come.

Sir G. To-night!—'Gad, now I recollect, we are particularly engaged to-night. But to-morrow night—

Dor. Why, lookye, Sir George, 'tis very plain you have no inclination to let me see your wife at all; so here I sit. [Throws himself on a sofa.] There's my hat, and here are my legs.—Now I sha'n't stir till I have seen her; and I have no engagements; I'll breakfast, dine, and sup, with you, every day this week.

VOL. I . . . 3 Y

Sir G. Was there ever such a provoking wretch! [Aside.] But to be plain with you, Doricourt, I and my house are at your service; but you are a damned agreeable fellow; and the women, I observe, always simper when you appear. For these reasons, I had rather, when Lady Frances and I are together, that you should forget that we are acquainted, farther than a nod, a smile, or a how d'ye?

Dor. Very well.

Sir G. It is not merely yourself, in propria persona, that I object to; but, if you are intimate here, you'll make my house still more the fashion than it is; and it is already so much so, that my doors are of no use to me. I married Lady Frances, to engross her to myself; yet, such is the blessed freedom of modern manners, that in spite of me, her eyes, thoughts, and conversation, are continually divided amongst all the fiirts and coxcombs of fashion.

Dor. To be sure, I confess that kind of freedom is carried rather too far. 'Tis hard one can have a jewel in one's cabinet, but the whole town must be gratified with its lustre.—He sha'n't preach me out of seeing his wife though. [Aside.]

Sir G. Well, now, that's reasonable. When you take time to reflect, Doricourt, I always observe you decide right; and therefore I ho—

Enter GIBSON.

Gib. Sir, my lady desires—

Sir G. I am particularly engaged.

Dor. Oh, Lord, that shall be no excuse in the world. [Leaping from the sofa.] Lead the way, John.—I'll attend your lady.

[Exit, following GIBSON.]

Sir G. What devil possessed me to talk about her! Here, Doricourt! [Running after him.] Doricourt!

Enter MRS. RACKETT and MISS OGLE, followed by a Servant.

Mrs. R. Acquaint your lady that Mrs. Rackett and Miss Ogle are here. [Exit Servant.]

Miss O. I shall hardly know Lady Frances, 'tis so long since I was in Shropshire.

Mrs. R. And I'll be sworn you never saw her out of Shropshire. Her father kept her locked up with his caterpillars and shells; and loved her beyond any thing but a blue butterfly and a petrified frog!

Miss O. Ha, ha, ha!—Well, 'twas a cheap way of breeding her: you know he was very poor, though a lord; and very high spirited, though a virtuoso. In town, her pantheons, operas, and robes de cour, would have swallowed his sea-weeds, moths, and monsters, in six weeks!—Sir George, I find, thinks his wife a most extraordinary creature: he has taught her to despise every thing like fashionable life, and boasts that example will have no effect on her.

Mrs. R. There's a great degree of impertinence in all that. I'll try to make her a fine lady, to humble him.

Miss O. That's just the thing I wish.

Enter LADY FRANCES TOUCHWOOD.

Lady F. I beg ten thousand pardons, my dear Mrs. Rackett—Miss Ogle, I rejoice to see you I should have come to you sooner, but I was detained in conversation by Mr. Doricourt.

Mrs. R. Pray make no apology; I am quit.

happy that we have your ladyship in town at last.—What stay do you make?

Lady F. A short one! Sir George talks with regret of the scenes we have left; and as the ceremony of presentation is over, will, I believe, soon return.

Miss O. Sure he can't be so cruel. Does your ladyship wish to return so soon?

Lady F. I have not the habit of consulting my own wishes; but I think, if they decide, we shall not return immediately. I have yet hardly formed an idea of London.

Mrs. R. I shall quarrel with your lord and master, if he dares to think of depriving us of you so soon. How do you dispose of yourself to-day?

Lady F. Sir George is going with me this morning to the mercer's, to choose a silk; and then—

Mrs. R. Choose a silk for you! Ha, ha, ha! Sir George chooses your laces too, I hope; your gloves, and your pincushions!

Lady F. Madam!

Mrs. R. I am glad to see you blush, my dear Lady Frances. These are strange homespun ways! If you do these things, pray keep them secret. Lord bless us! If the town should know your husband chooses your gowns!

Miss O. You are very young, my lady, and have been brought up in solitude. The maxims you learned among wood nymphs, in Shropshire, wont pass current here, I assure you.

Mrs. R. Why, my dear creature, you look quite frightened.—Come, you shall go with us to an exhibition and an auction.—Afterwards, we'll take a turn in the Park, and then drive to Kensington; so we shall be at home by four to dress; and in the evening I'll attend you to Lady Brilliant's masquerade.

Lady F. I shall be very happy to be of your party, if Sir George has no engagements.

Mrs. R. What! do you stand so low in your own opinion, that you dare not trust yourself without Sir George? If you choose to play Darby and Joan, my dear, you should have staid in the country;—'tis an exhibition not calculated for London, I assure you.

Miss O. What, I suppose, my lady, you and Sir George will be seen pacing it comfortably round the canal, arm in arm, and then go lovingly into the same carriage; dine tete-a-tete, spend the evening at piquet, and so go soberly to bed at eleven!—Such a snug plan may do for an attorney and his wife; but, for Lady Frances Touchwood, 'tis as unsuitable as linsey-woolsey, or a black bonnet at the opera.

Lady F. These are rather new doctrines to me!—But, my dear Mrs. Rackett, you and Miss Ogle must judge of these things better than I can. As you observe, I am but young, and may have caught absurd opinions.—Here is Sir George!

Re-enter SIR GEORGE TOUCHWOOD.

Sir G. 'Sdeath, another room full! [Aside.

Lady F. My love! Mrs. Rackett and Miss Ogle.

Mrs. R. 'Give you joy, Sir George—We came to rob you of Lady Frances for a few hours.

Sir G. A few hours.

Lady F. Oh, yes! I am going to an exhibition, and an auction, and the Park, and Kensington, and a thousand places!—It is quite ridiculous,

I find, for married people to be always together. We shall be laughed at!

Sir G. I am astonished!—Mrs. Rackett, what does the dear creature mean?

Mrs. R. Mean, Sir George!—What she says I imagine.

Miss O. Why, you know, Sir, as Lady Frances had the misfortune to be bred entirely in the country, she cannot be supposed to be versed in fashionable life.

Sir G. No; Heaven forbid she should!—If she had, Madam, she would never have been my wife.

Mrs. R. Are you serious?

Sir G. Perfectly so.—I should never have had the courage to have married a well-bred fine lady.

Miss O. Pray, Sir, what do you take a fine lady to be, that you express such fear of her?

[Sneeringly.

Sir G. A being easily described, Madam, as she is seen every where but in her own house. She sleeps at home, but she lives all over the town. In her mind, every sentiment gives place to the lust of conquest, and the vanity of being particular. The feelings of wife and mother are lost in the whirl of dissipation. If she continues virtuous, 'tis by chance—and if she preserves her husband from ruin, 'tis by her dexterity at the card table!—Such a woman I take to be a perfect fine lady.

Mrs. R. And you I take to be a slanderous cynic of two and thirty.—Twenty years hence, one might have forgiven such a libel!—Now, Sir, hear my definition of a fine lady:—she is a creature for whom nature has done much, and education more; she has taste, elegance, spirit, understanding. In her manner she is free, in her morals nice. Her behaviour is undistinguishingly polite to her husband and all mankind;—her sentiments are for their hours of retirement. In a word, a fine lady is the life of conversation, the spirit of society, the joy of the public!—Pleasure follows wherever she appears, and the kindest wishes attend her slumbers.—Make haste, then, my dear Lady Frances, commence fine lady, and force your husband to acknowledge the justness of my picture.

Lady F. I am sure 'tis a delightful one. How can you dislike it, Sir George? You painted fashionable life in colours so disgusting, that I thought I hated it; but, on a nearer view, it seems charming. I have hitherto lived in obscurity; 'tis time that I should be a woman of the world. I long to begin;—my heart pants with expectation and delight!

Mrs. R. Come, then, let us begin directly. I am impatient to introduce you to that society which you were born to ornament and charm.

Lady F. Adieu, my love!—We shall meet again at dinner. [Going.

Sir G. Sure, I am in a dream—Fanny!

Lady F. [Returning.] Sir George.

Sir G. Will you go without me?

Mrs. R. Will you go without me!—Ha, ha, ha! what a pathetic address! Why, sure you would not always be seen side by side, like two beans upon a stalk. Are you afraid to trust Lady Frances with me, Sir?

Sir G. Heaven and earth! with whom can a man trust his wife, in the present state of society? Formerly there were distinctions of character amongst ye; every class of females had its particular description! grandmothers were pious, aunts discreet, old maids censorious! but now, aunts, grandmothers, girls, and maiden gentlewomen, are all the same creature;—a wrinkle more or less is the sole difference between ye.

Mrs. R. That maiden gentlewomen have lost their censoriousness is surely not in your catalogue of grievances.

Sir G. Indeed it is—and ranked amongst the most serious grievances.—Things went well, Madam, when the tongues of three or four old virgins kept all the wives and daughters of a parish in awe. They were the dragons that guarded the Hesperian fruit; and I wonder they have not been obliged by act of parliament to resume their function.

Mrs. R. Ha, ha, ha! and pensioned, I suppose, for making strict inquiries into the lives and conversations of their neighbours.

Sir G. With all my heart, and empowered to oblige every woman to conform her conduct to her real situation. You, for instance, are a widow; your air should be sedate, your dress grave, your deportment matronly, and in all things an example to the young women growing up about you!—Instead of which, you are dressed for coquet, think of nothing but ensnaring hearts; are coquette, a wit, and a fine lady.

Mrs. R. Bear witness to what he says! A coquette, a wit, and a fine lady! Who would have expected an eulogy from such an ill-natured mortal?—Valour to a soldier, wisdom to a judge, or glory to a prince, is not more than such a character to a woman.

Miss O. Sir George, I see, languishes for the charming society of a century and a half ago; when a grave squire, and a still graver dame, surrounded by a sober family, formed a stiff group, in a mouldy old house, in the corner of a park.

Mrs. R. Delightful serenity! Undisturbed by any noise but the cawing of rooks, and the quarterly rumbling of an old family coach on a state visit; with the happy intervention of a friendly call from the parish apothecary, or a curate's wife.

Sir G. And what is the society of which you boast?—a mere chaos, in which all distinction of rank is lost in a ridiculous affectation of ease. In the same select party, you will often find the wife of a bishop and a sharper, of an earl and a fiddler. In short, 'tis one universal masquerade, all disguised in the same habits and manners.

Enter GIBSON.

Gib. Mr. Flutter.

[Exit.

Sir G. Here comes an illustration. Now I defy you to tell, from his appearance, whether Flutter is a privy councillor or a mercer, a lawyer or a grocer's apprentice.

Enter FLUTTER.

Flut. Oh, just which you please, Sir George; so you don't make me a lord mayor. Ah, Mrs. Rackett!—Lady Frances, your most obedient; you look—now hang me, if that's not provoking!—had your gown been of another colour, I should have said the prettiest thing you ever heard in your life.

Miss O. Pray, give it us.

Flut. I was yesterday at Mrs. Bloomer's. She was dressed all in green; no other colour to be seen but that of her face and bosom. "So," says

I, "My dear Mrs. Bloomer! you look like a carnation just bursting from its pod."

Sir G. Wasn't that pretty? And what said her husband?

Flut. Her husband! why, her husband laughed, and said, a cucumber would have been a better simile.

Sir G. But there are husbands, Sir, who would rather have corrected, than amended your comparison; I, for instance, should consider a man's complimenting my wife as an impertinence.

Flut. Why, what harm can there be in compliments? Sure they are not infectious; and if they were, you, Sir George, of all people breathing, have reason to be satisfied about your lady's attachment? every body talks of it: that little bird there, that she killed out of jealousy, the most extraordinary instance of affection that ever was given.

Lady F. I kill a bird through jealousy! heavens! Mr. Flutter, how can you impute such a cruelty to me?

Sir G. I could have forgiven you if you had.

Flut. Oh! what a blundering fool! No, no—now I remember—'twas your bird, Lady Frances—that's it, your bullfinch, which Sir George, in one of the refinements of his passion, sent into the wide world to seek its fortune.—He took it for a knight in disguise.

Lady F. Is it possible? Oh, Sir George, could I have imagined it was you who deprived me of a creature I was so fond of?

Sir G. Mr. Flutter, you are one of those busy, idle, meddling people, who, from mere vacuity of mind, are the most dangerous inmates in a family. You have neither feelings nor opinions of your own; but like a glass in a tavern, bear about those of every blockhead who gives you his;—and, because you mean no harm, think yourselves excused, though broken friendships, discords, and murders, are the consequences of your indiscretions.

Flut. [Taking out his tablets.] Vacuity of mind?—What was next? I'll write down this sermon: 'tis the first I have heard since my grandmother's funeral.

Miss O. Come, Lady Frances, you see what a cruel creature your loving husband can be; so let us leave him.

Sir G. Madam, Lady Frances shall not go.

Lady F. Shall not, Sir George?—This is the first time such an expression— [Weeping.

Sir G. My love! my life!

Lady F. Don't imagine I'll be treated like a child; denied what I wish, and then pacified with sweet words.

Miss O. [Apart.] The bullfinch! that's an excellent subject; never let it down.

Lady F. I see plainly you would deprive me of every pleasure, as well as of my sweet bird—out of pure love!—Barbarous man!

Sir G. 'Tis well, Madam;—your resentment of that circumstance proves to me, what I did not before suspect, that you are deficient both in tenderness and understanding.—Tremble to think the hour approaches, in which you would give worlds for such a proof of my love. Go, Madam, give yourself to the public; abandon your heart to dissipation, and see if, in the scenes of gayety and folly that await you, you can find a recompense for the lost affection of a doting husband. [Exit Flut. Lord, what a fine thing it is to have the gift of speech! I suppose Sir George practises at Coachmakers'-hall, or the Black-horse in Bond-street.

Lady F. He is really angry; I cannot go.

Mrs. R. Not go! foolish creature! you are arrived at the moment which, sometime or other, was sure to happen, and every thing depends on the use you make of it.

Miss O. Come, Lady Frances don't hesitate; the minutes are precious.

Lady F. I could find in my heart!—and yet I won't give up neither.—If I should in this instance, he'll expect it for ever.

[Exit with Mrs. RACKETT.]

Miss O. Now you act like a woman of spirit.

[Exit.]

Flut. A fair tug, by Jupiter—between duty and pleasure!—Pleasure boats, and off we go, Io triumphe!

[Exit.]

SCENE II.—An Auction Room: Busts, Pictures, &c.

SILVERTONGUE discovered, with Company, Puffers, &c.

1 Lady. Hey-day, Mr. Silvertongue! what, nobody here?

Sil. Oh, my lady, we shall have company enough in a trice; if your carriage is seen at my door, no other will pass it, I am sure.

1 Lady. Familiar monster! [Aside.] That's a beautiful Diana, Mr. Silvertongue; but, in the name of wonder, how came Actæon to be placed over the top of a house?

Sil. That's a David and Bathsheba, Ma'am.

1 Lady. Oh, I crave their pardon!—I remember the names, but know nothing of the story.

Enter more Company.

1 Gent. Was not that Lady Frances Touchwood, coming up with Mrs. Rackett?

2 Gent. I think so; yes, it is, faith—Let us go nearer.

Enter LADY FRANCES TOUCHWOOD, MRS. RACKETT, and MISS OGLE.

3 Gent. Any thing worth notice to-day?

Sil. Yes, Sir, this is to be the first lot:—the model of a city, in wax.

2 Gent. The model of a city. What city?

Sil. That I have not been able to discover; but call it Rome, Pekin, or London, 'tis still a city; you'll find in it the same jarring interests, the same passions, the same virtues, and the same vices, whatever the name.

Lady F. I wish Sir George was here.—This man follows me about, and stares at me in such a way, that I am quite uneasy.

[LADY FRANCES and MISS OGLE come forward, followed by COURTALL.]

Miss O. He has travelled, and is heir to an immense estate; so he is impertinent, by parent.

Court. You are very cruel, ladies. Miss Ogle—you will not let me speak to you. As to this little scornful beauty, she has frowned me dead fifty times.

Lady F. Sir—I am a married woman.

[Confused.]

Court. A married woman! a good hint. [Aside.] 'Twould be a shame if such a charming woman was not married. But I see you are a Daphne just come from your sheep and your meadows, your crook and your waterfalls. Pray now who is the happy Damon, to whom you have vowed eternal truth and constancy?

Miss O. 'Tis Lady Frances Touchwood, Mr. Courtall, to whom you are speaking.

Court. Lady Frances! By Heaven, that's Saville's old flame. [Aside.] I beg your ladyship's pardon. I ought to have believed, that such beauty could belong only to your name—a name I have long been enamoured of; because I knew it to be that of the finest woman in the world.

[Mrs. RACKETT comes forward.]

Lady F. [Apart.] My dear Mrs. Rackett, I am so frightened! Here's a man making love to me, though he knows I am married.

Mrs. R. Oh, the sooner for that, my dear; don't mind him.—Was you at the Cassino last night, Mr. Courtall?

Court. I looked in.—'Twas impossible to stay. Nobody there but antiques. You'll be at Lady Brilliant's to night, doubtless.

Mrs. R. Yes, I go with Lady Frances.

Lady F. Bless me! I did not know this gentleman was acquainted with Mrs. Rackett—I behaved so rude to him.

[To Miss OGLE.]

Mrs. R. Come, Ma'am; [Looking at her Watch.] 'tis past one. I protest, if we don't fly to Kensington, we sha'n't find a soul there.

Lady F. Wont this gentleman go with us?

Court. [Looking surprised.] To be sure; you make me happy, Madam, beyond description.

Mrs. R. Oh, never mind him—he'll follow.

[Exeunt LADY FRANCES, MRS. RACKETT, and MISS OGLE.]

Court. Lady Touchwood, with a vengeance! But 'tis always so; your reserved ladies are like ice, 'egad!—no sooner begin to soften than they melt!

[Following.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—MR. HARDY'S.

Enter LETITIA and MRS. RACKETT.

Mrs. R. Come, prepare, prepare; your lover is coming.

Let. My lover! confess now that my absence at dinner was a severe mortification to him.

Mrs. R. I can't absolutely swear it spoiled his appetite; he ate as if he was hungry, and drank his wine as though he liked it.

Let. What was the apology?

Mrs. R. That you were ill;—but I gave him a hint that your extreme bashfulness could not support his eye.

Let. If I comprehend him, awkwardness and bashfulness are the last faults he can pardon in a woman; so expect to see me transformed into the veriest malkin.

Mrs. R. You persevere then?

Let. Certainly. I know the design is a rash one, and the event important;—it either makes Doricourt mine by all the tenderest ties of passion, or deprives me of him for ever; and never to be his wife will afflict me less than to be his wife, and not be beloved.

Mrs. R. So you wont trust to the good old maxim,——Marry first, and love will follow?

Let. As readily as I would venture my last guinea, that good fortune might follow. The woman, that has not touched the heart of a man, before he leads her to the altar, has scarcely a chance to charm it, when possession and security turn their powerful arms against her.—But here he comes—'I'll disappear for a moment.—Don't spare me. [Exit.

Enter DORICOURT, not seeing MRS. RACKETT.

Dor. So! [Looking at a picture.] This is my mistress, I presume.—Ma foi! the painter has hit her off.—The downcast eye—the blushing cheek—timid—apprehensive—bashful—A tear and a prayer-book would have made her La Bella Magdalena—

Give me a woman, in whose touching mien
A mind, a soul, a polish'd art, is seen;
Whose motion speaks, whose poignant air can move;

Such are the darts, to wound with endless love.

Mrs. R. Is that an improptu?

[Touching him on the shoulder with her fan.

Dor. [Starting.] Madam!—Finesly caught!
[Aside.]—Not absolutely—it struck me during the desert, as a motto for your picture.

Mrs. R. Gallantly turned!—I perceive, however, Miss Hardy's charms have made no violent impression on you.—And who can wonder?—the poor girl's defects are so obvious.

Dor. Defects!

Mrs. R. Merely those of education.—Her father's indulgence ruined her.—Mauvaise honte, conceit, and ignorance, all unite in the lady you are to marry.

Dor. Marry! I marry such a woman!—Your picture, I hope, is overcharged.—I marry mauvaise honte, pertness, and ignorance!

Mrs. R. Thank your stars, that ugliness and ill temper are not added to the list.—You must think her handsome.

Dor. Half her personal beauty would content me;—but could the Medicean Venus be animated for me, and endowed with a vulgar soul, I should become the statue, and my heart transformed to marble.

Mrs. R. Bless us!—We are in a hopeful way, then!

Dor. There must be some envy in this. I see she is a coquette—[Aside.]—Ha, ha, ha! and you imagine I am persuaded of the truth of your character? ha, ha, ha! Miss Hardy, I have been assured, Madam, is elegant and accomplished—but one must allow for a lady's painting.

Mrs. R. I'll be even with him for that. [Aside.] Ha, ha, ha! and so you have found me out!—Well, I protest, I meant no harm; 'twas only to increase the eclat of her appearance, that I threw a veil over her charms.—Here comes the lady:—her elegance and accomplishments will announce themselves.

Enter LETITIA, running.

Let. La, cousin, do you know that our John.—Oh, dear heart!—I didn't see you, Sir.

[Hanging down her head, and dropping behind Mrs. R.

Mrs. R. Fy, Letitia.—Mr. Doricourt thinks you a woman of elegant manners. Stand forward and confirm his opinion.

Let. No, no; keep before me.—He's my sweetheart; and 'tis impudent to look one's sweetheart in the face you know.

Mrs. R. You'll allow in future for a lady's painting, Sir.—Ha, ha, ha!

Dor. I am astonished!

Let. Well, hang it, I'll take heart.—Why, he is but a man, you know, cousin—and I'll let him see, I wasn't born in a wood to be scared by an owl. [Half apart; advances, and looks at him through her fingers.] He, he, he! [Goes up to him, and makes a very stiff, formal courtesy; he bows.] You have been a great traveler, Sir, I hear. Then I wish you'd tell us about the fine sights you saw when you went over sea.—I have read in a book, that there are some countries, where the men and women are all horsea.—Did you see any of them?

Mrs. R. Mr. Doricourt is not prepared, my dear, for these inquiries—he is reflecting on the importance of the question—and will answer you—when he can.

Let. When he can! Why, he's as slow in speech as aunt Margery when she's reading Thomas Aquinas—and stands gaping like mummance.

Mrs. R. Have a little discretion.

Let. Hold your tongue!—Sure I may say what I please before I am married, if I can't afterwards.—D'ye think a body does not know how to talk to a sweetheart?—He is not the first I have had.

Dor. Indeed!

Let. Oh, lud, he speaks!—Why, if you must know—there was the curate at home.—When papa was a hunting, he used to come a suitoring, and make speeches to me out of books.—Nobody knows what a mort of fine things he used to say to me—and call me Venis, and Jubah, and Dinah.

Dor. And pray, fair lady, how did you answer him?

Let. Why, I used to say, "Look you, Mr. Curate, don't think to come over me with your flimflams, for a better man than ever trod in your shoes is coming over sea to marry me."—But, fags, I begin to think I was out.—Parson Dobbins was the sprightfuler man of the two.

Dor. Surely this cannot be Miss Hardy?

Let. Laws, why don't you know me?—You saw me to-day—but I was daunted before my father, and the lawyer, and all them; and did not care to speak out—so, may be, you thought I couldn't—but I can talk as fast as any body, when I know folks a little.—And now I have shown my parts, I hope you'll like me better.

Enter HARDY.

Har. I foresee this wont do—Mr. Doricourt, may be, you take my daughter for a fool, but you are mistaken—she's as sensible a girl as any in England.

Dor. I am convinced she has a very uncommon understanding, Sir—I did not think he had been such an ass! [Aside.]

Let. My father will undo the whole. [Aside.]—Laws, papa, how can you think he can take me for a fool?—when every body knows, I beat the 'pothecary at conundrums, last Christmas-time?—And didn't I make a string of names, all in riddles, for the Lady's Diary?—There was a little river and a great house.—That was Newcastle.—There what a lamb says, and three letters—that was ba, and k-e-r, ker, baker.—There was—

Har. Don't stand ba-ang there—you'll make me mad in a moment—I tell you, Sir, that, for all that, she's devilish sensible.

Dor. Sir, I give all possible credit to your assertions.

Let. Laws, papa, do come along. If you stand watching, how can my sweetheart break his mind, and tell me how he admires me!

Dor. That would be difficult, indeed, Madam.

Har. I tell you, Letty, I'll have no more of this—I see well enough—

Let. Laws, don't snub me before my husband—that is to be.—You'll teach him to snub me too—and, I believe, by his looks, he'd like to begin now. So let us go—cousin, you may tell the gentleman what a genius I have—how I can cut watch-papers, and work catgut—make quadrille baskets with pins, and take profiles in shade—ay, as well as the lady at No. 62, South Moulton-street, Grosvenor-square.

[Re-ent HAR. and LET.]

Mrs. R. What think you of my painting now?

Dor. Oh, mere water colours, Madam—the lady has caricatured your picture.

Mrs. R. And how does she strike you on the whole?

Dor. Like a good design; spoiled by the incapacity of the artist. Her faults are evidently the result of her father's weak indulgence. I observed an expression in her eye, that seemed to satirize the folly of her lips.

Mrs. R. But at her age, when education is fixed, and manner becomes nature, hopes of improvement—

Dor. Would be absurd.—Besides, I can't turn school-master.—Doricourt's wife must be capable of improvement—but it must be, because she's got beyond it.

Mrs. R. I am pleased your misfortune sits no heavier.

Dor. Your pardon, Madam—so mercurial was the hour in which I was born, that misfortunes always go plump to the bottom of my heart, like a pebble in water, and leave the surface unruffled. I shall certainly set off for Bath, or the other world, to-night—but whether I shall use a chaise, with four swift coursers, or go off in a tangent—from the aperture of a pistol, deserves consideration—so I make my adieux. [Going.]

Mrs. R. Oh, but I entreat you, postpone your journey till to-morrow—determine on which you will—you must be this night at the masquerade.

Dor. Masquerade!

Mrs. R. Why not?—If you are resolved to visit the other world, you may as well take one night's pleasure first in this, you know.

Dor. Faith, that's very true;—ladies are the best philosophers after all. Expect me at the masquerade. [Exit.]

Mrs. R. He's a charming fellow. I think Letitia sha'n't have him. [Going.]

Enter HARDY.

Har. What's he gone?

Mrs. R. Yes; and I am glad he is. You would have ruined us! Now, I beg, Mr. Hardy, you wont interfere in this business; it is a little out of your way. [Exit.]

Har. Hang me, if I dont, though—I foresee very clearly what will be the end of it, if I leave you to yourselves; so I'll e'en follow him to the masquerade, and tell him all about it. Let me see—what shall my dress be—A great mogul? No—A grenadier? No—no—that, I foresee, would make a laugh. Hang me, if I don't send to my favourite little Quick, and borrow his Jew Isaac's dress. I know the dog likes a glass of good wine; so I'll give him a bottle of my forty-eight, and he shall teach me. Ay, that's it.—I'll be cunning little Isaac. If they complain of my want of wit, I'll tell them, the cursed Duenna wears the breeches, and has spoiled my parts. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—COURTALL'S.

Enter COURTALL, SAVILLE, and three GENTLEMEN, from an Apartment in the back Scene. The last three tipsy.

Court. You sha'n't go yet.—Another catch and another bottle.

1 Gent. May I be a bottle, and an empty bottle, if you catch me at that!—Why; I am going to the masquerade; Jack—, you know who I mean, is to meet me, and we are to have a leap at the new lustre.

2 Gent. And I am going to—a pilgrim—[Hicksups.]—Am not I in a pretty pickle for a pilgrim?—And Tony, here—he is going in the disguise—in the disguise—of a gentleman!

1 Gent. We are all very disguised—so bid them draw up—D'ye hear?

[Re-ent the three GENTLEMEN.]

Sav. Thy skull, Courtall, is a lady's thimble:—no, an egg-shell.

Court. Nay, then you are gone too: you never aspire to similes, but in your cups.

Sav. No, no; I am steady enough—but the fumes of the wine pass directly through thy egg-shell, and leave thy brain as cool as—Hey! I am quite sober; my similes fail me.

Court. Then we'll sit down here, and have one sober bottle.

Enter DICK.

Bring a bottle and glasses. [Exit DICK.]

Sav. I'll not swallow another drop; no, though the juice should be the true Falernian.

Court. By the bright eyes of her you love, you shall drink her health.

*Re-ent*er DICK, with bottle and glasses.

Sav. Ah! [Sitting down.] Her I loved is gone—[Sighing.]—She's married!

[Exit DICK.]

Court. Then bless your stars you are not her husband! I would be husband to no woman in Europe, who was not devilish rich, and devilish ugly.

Sav. Wherefore ugly?

Court. Because she could not have the conscience to exact those attentions that a pretty wife expects; or, if she should, her resentments would be perfectly easy to me, nobody would undertake to revenge her cause.

Sav. Thou art a most licentious fellow!

Court. I should hate my own wife, that's certain; but I have a warm heart for those of other people; and so here's to the prettiest wife in England—Lady Frances Touchwood.

Sav. Lady Frances Touchwood! I rise to drink her. [Drinks.] How the devil came Lady Frances in your head? I never knew you give a woman of chastity before.

Court. That's odd, for you have heard me give half the women of fashion in England.—But, pray now, what do you take a woman of chastity to be?

[Sneeringly.
Sav. Such a woman as lady Frances Touchwood, Sir.

Court. Oh, you are grave, Sir; I remember you was an adorer of hers.—Why didn't you marry her?

Sav. I had not the arrogance to look so high.—Had my fortune been worthy of her, she should not have been ignorant of my admiration.

Court. Precious fellow! What, I suppose you would not dare tell now that you admire her?

Sav. No, nor you.

Court. By the Lord, I have told her so.

Sav. Have? Impossible!

Court. Ha, ha, ha!—Is it so?

Sav. How did she receive the declaration?

Court. Why, in the old way; blushed, and frowned, and said she was married.

Sav. What amazing things thou art capable of! I could more easily have taken the pope by the beard, than profaned her ears with such a declaration.

Court. I shall meet her at Lady Brilliant's to-night, where I shall repeat it; and I'd lay my life, under a mask, she'll hear it all without blush or frown.

Sav. [Rising.] 'Tis false, Sir!—She wont.

Court. She will! [Rising.] Nay, I'll venture to lay a round sum that I prevail on her to go out with me—only to taste the fresh air, I mean.

Sav. Preposterous vanity! From this moment I suspect that half the victories you have boasted are as false and slanderous as your pretended influence with Lady Frances.

Court. Pretended!—How should such a fellow as you now, who never soared beyond a cherry-cheeked daughter of a ploughman in Norfolk, judge of the influence of a man of my figure and habits? I could show thee a list, in which there are names to shake thy faith in the whole sex; and, to that list I have no doubt of adding the name of lady—

Sav. Hold, Sir! My ears cannot bear the profanation;—you cannot—dare not approach her! For your soul you dare not mention love to her! Her look would freeze the word, whilst it hovered on thy licentious lips.

Court. Whu! whu! Well, we shall see—this evening, by Jupiter, the trial shall be made. If I fail—I fail.

Sav. I think thou dar'st not! But my life, my honour, on her parity. [Exit.]

Court. Hot-headed fool! But since he has brought it to this point, by gad I'll try what can be done with her ladyship. [Musing—rings.] She's frost-work, and the prejudices of education yet strong; ergo, passionate professions will only inflame her pride, and put her on her guard. For other arts then!

Enter DICK.

Dick, do you know any of the servants at Sir George Touchwood's?

Dick. Yes, Sir; I knows the groom, and one of the housemaids; for the matter o'that, she's my own cousin; and it was my mother that helped her to the place.

Court. Do you know Lady Frances' maid?

Dick. I can't say as how I know she.

Court. Do you know Sir George's valet?

Dick. No, Sir; but Sally is very thick with Mr. Gibson, Sir George's gentleman.

Court. Then go there directly, and employ Sally to discover whether her master goes to Lady Brilliant's this evening; and, if he does, the name of the shop that sold his habit.

Dick. Yes, Sir.

Court. Be exact in your intelligence, and come to me at Boodel's. [Exit DICK.] If I cannot otherwise succeed, I'll beguile her as Jove did Alcmena, in the shape of her husband. The possession of so fine a woman—the triumph over Saville, are each a sufficient motive; and, united, they shall be resistless. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—The Street.

Enter SAVILLE.

Sav. The air has recovered me! what have I been doing! perhaps my petulance may be the cause of her ruin, whose honour I asserted: his vanity is piqued; and, where women are concerned, Courtall can be a villain.

Enter Dick; bows, and passes hastily.

Ha! that's his servant!—Dick!

Dick. [Returning.] Sir!

Sav. Where are you going, Dick?

Dick. Going! I am going, Sir; where my master sent me.

Sav. Well answered—but I have a particular reason for my inquiry, and you must tell me.

Dick. Why then, Sir, I am going to call upon a cousin of mine, that lives at Sir George Touchwood's.

Sav. Very well.—There, [Gives him money.] you must make your cousin drink my health.—What are you going about?

Dick. Why, Sir, I believe 'tis no harm, or elseways I am sure I would not blab—I am only going to ax if Sir George goes to the masquerade to-night, and what dress he wears?

Sav. Enough! now, Dick, if you will call at my lodgings in your way back, and acquaint me with your cousin's intelligence, I'll double the trifle I have given you.

Dick. Bless your honour, I'll call—never fear. [Exit.]

Sav. Surely the occasion may justify the means;—'tis doubly my duty to be Lady Frances' protector. Courtall, I see, is planning an artful scheme; but Saville shall outplot him. [Exit.]

SCENE IV.—SIR GEORGE TOUCHWOOD'S House.

Enter SIR GEORGE TOUCHWOOD and VILLERS.

Vil. For shame, Sir George! you have left Lady Frances in tears.—How can you afflict her?

Sir G. 'Tis I that am afflicted;—my dream of happiness is over—Lady Frances and I are disunited.

Vil. The devil! why, you have been in town but ten days: she can have made no acquaintance for a commons affair yet.

Sir G. Pho! 'tis our minds that are disunited: she no longer places her whole delight in-me; she has yielded herself up to the world!

Vil. Yielded herself up to the world! why did you not bring her to town in a cage? then she might have taken a peep at the world!—But, after all, what has the world done? a twelvemonth since you was the gayest fellow in it:—if any body asked who dresses best?—Sir George Touchwood.—Who is the most gallant man? Sir George Touchwood.—Who is the most wedded to amusement and dissipation? Sir George Touchwood. And now Sir George is metamorphosed into a sour censor; and talks of fashionable life with as much bitterness as the old crabbed fellow in Rome.

Sir G. The moment I became possessed of such a jewel as Lady Frances, every thing wore a different complexion; that society in which I lived with so much éclat, became the object of my terror; and I think of the manners of polite life as I do of the atmosphere of a pest-house.—My wife is already infected; she was set upon this morning by maids, widows, and bachelors, who carried her off in triumph, in spite of my displeasure.

Vil. Ay, to be sure; there would have been no triumph in the case, if you had not opposed it:—but I have heard the whole story from Mrs. Rackett; and I assure you, Lady Frances didn't enjoy the morning at all;—she wished for you fifty times.

Sir G. Indeed! Are you sure of that?

Vil. Perfectly sure.

Sir G. I wish I had known it:—my uneasiness at dinner was occasioned by very different ideas.

Vil. Here then she comes, to receive your apology; but if she is true woman, her displeasure will rise in proportion to your contrition;—and till you grow careless about her pardon she won't grant it:—however, I'll leave you.—Matrimonial duets are seldom set in the style I like. [Exit.]

Enter LADY FRANCES.

Sir G. The sweet sorrow that glitters in these eyes I cannot bear. [Embracing her.] Look cheerfully, you rogue.

Lady F. I cannot look otherwise, if you are pleased with me.

Sir G. Well, Fanny, to-day you made your entrée in the fashionable world; tell me honestly the impressions you received.

Lady F. Indeed, Sir George, I was so hurried from place to place, that I had not time to find out what my impressions were.

Sir G. That's the very spirit of the life you have chosen.

Lady F. Every body about me seemed happy—but every body seemed in a hurry to be happy somewhere else.

Sir G. And you like this?

Lady F. One must like what the rest of the world likes.

Sir G. Pernicious maxim!

Lady F. But, my dear Sir George, you have not promised to go with me to the masquerade.

Sir G. 'Twould be a shocking indecorum to be seen together, you know.

Lady F. Oh, no; I asked Mrs. Rackett, and she told me we might be seen together at the masquerade without being laughed at.

Sir G. Really!

Lady F. Indeed, to tell you the truth, I could wish it was the fashion for married people to be inseparable: for I have more heart-felt satisfaction in fifteen minutes, with you at my side, than fifteen days of amusement could give me without you.

Sir G. My sweet creature!—How that confession charms me!—Let us begin the fashion.

Lady F. O, impossible! we should not gain a single proselyte; and you can't conceive what spiteful things would be said of us.—At Kensington to-day a lady met us, whom we saw at court when we were presented; she lifted up her hands in amazement!—Bless me! said she to her companion, here's Lady Frances, without Sir Hurb Thrumbo!—My dear Mrs. Rackett, consider what an important charge you have! For Heaven's sake take her home again, or some enchanter on a flying dragon will descend and carry her off.—Oh, said another, I dare say Lady Frances has a clue at her heel, like the peerless Rosamond:—her tender swain would never have trusted her so far without such a precaution.

Sir G. Heaven and earth!—How shall innocence preserve its lustre amidst manners so corrupt.

Enter GIBSON.

Gib. Your honour talked, I thought, something about going to the masquerade?

Sir G. Well.

Gib. Hasn't your honour?—I thought your honour had forgot to order a dress.

Lady F. Well considered, Gibson.—Come, will you be Jew, Turk, or heretic; a Chinese emperor, or a ballad-singer; a rake, or a watchman?

Sir G. Oh, neither, my love; I can't take the trouble to support a character.

Lady F. You'll wear a domino then:—I saw a pink domino trimmed with blue, at the shop where I bought my habit.—Would you like it?

Sir G. Any thing, any thing.

Lady F. Then go about it directly, Gibson.—A pink domino, trimmed with blue.—Come, you have not seen my dress yet,—it is most beautiful; I long to have it on. [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Masquerade.

A party dancing cotillions: variety of characters, &c.

Enter MOUNTBANK.

Mount. Who'll buy my nostrums? who'll buy my nostrums? Here's a powder for projectors—'twill rectify the fumes of an empty stomach, dissipate their airy castles, and make them dream of beef and pudding.

Enter FOLLY, with cap and bells, on a hobby-horse.

Mask. Hey Tom Fool, what business have you here?

Folly. What, Sir, affront a prince in his own dominions?

Music.—Enter HARDY, in the dress of Isaac Mendoza.

Har. Why, isn't it a shame to see so many stout, well-built, young fellows, masquerading and cutting courantias, here at home—instead of making the French cut capers to the tune of our cannon—or sweating the Spaniards with an English fandango? I foresee the end of all this Mask. Why, thou little testy Israelite! back to Duke's-place, and preach your tribe into a subscription for the good of the land on whose milk and honey ye fatten.—Where are your Joshuas and your Gideons, ay? What! all dwindled into stock-brokers, pedlars, and rag-men?

Har. No, not all. Some of us turn Christians, and by degrees grow into all the privileges of Englishmen! In the second generation we are patriots, rebels, courtiers, and husbands.

[Points to his forehead.]

2 Mask. What, my little Isaac!—How the devil came you here? Where's your old Margaret?

Har. Oh, I have got rid of her.

2 Mask. How?

Har. Why, I persuaded a young Irishman that she was a blooming, plump beauty of eighteen; so they made an elopement, ha, ha, ha! and she is now the toast of Tipperary. Ha! there's cousin Rackett and her party; they sha'n't know me.

[Puts on his mask.]

Enter MRS. RACKETT, LADY FRANCES TOUCHWOOD, SIR GEORGE TOUCHWOOD, and FLUTTER.

Mrs. R. Look at this dumpling Jew; he must be a Levite by his figure. You have surely practised the flesh-hook a long time, friend, to have raised that goodly presence.

Har. About as long, my brisk widow, as you have been angling for a second husband; but my hook has been better baited than yours. You have only caught gudgeons, I see.

[Pointing to FLUTTER.]

Flut. Oh! this is one of the geniuses they hire to entertain the company with their accidental sallies.—Let me look at your commonplace book, friend. I want a few good things.

Har. I'd oblige you, with all my heart; but you'll spoil them in repeating—or if you should not, they'll give you no reputation—for nobody will believe they are your own.

Sir G. He knows you, Flutter;—the little gentleman fancies himself a wit, I see.

Har. There's no depending on what you see—the eyes of the jealous are not to be trusted.—Look to your lady.

Flut. He knows you, Sir George.

Sir G. What, am I the town talk?

Har. I can neither see Doricourt nor Letty.—I must find them out.

[Aside; exit.]

Mrs. R. Well, Lady Frances, is not all this charming? Could you have conceived such a brilliant assemblage of objects?

Lady F. Delightful! The days of enchantment are restored; the columns glow with sapphires and rubies: emperors and fairies, beauties and dwarfs, meet me at every step!

Sir G. How lively are first impressions on sensible minds! In four hours, vapidity and languor will take place of that exquisite sense of joy which flutters your little heart.

Mrs. R. What an inhuman creature! Fate has not allowed us these sensations above ten times in our lives; and would you have us shorten them by anticipation?

Flut. O Lord! your wise men are the greatest fools upon earth;—they reason about their enjoyments, and analyze their pleasures, whilst the essence escapes. Look, Lady Frances! D'ye see that figure strutting in the dress of an emperor? His father retails oranges in Botolph-lane. That gipsy is a maid of honour, and that rag-man a physician.

Lady F. Why, you know every body!

Flut. Oh, every creature. A mask is nothing at all to me. I can give you the history of half the people here. In the next apartment there's a whole family, who, to my knowledge, have lived on water-cresses this month, to make a figure here to-night!—but, to make up for that, they'll cram their pockets with cold ducks and chickens, for a carnival to-morrow.

Lady F. Oh, I should like to see this provident family.

Flut. Honour me with your arm.

[Exit FLUTTER and LADY FRANCES.]

Mrs. R. Come, Sir George, you shall be my beau.—We'll make the tour of the rooms, and meet them. Oh! your pardon, you must follow Lady Frances; or the wit and fine parts of Mr. Flutter may drive you out of her head. Ha, ha, ha!

[Exit.]

Sir G. I was going to follow her, and now I dare not. How can I be such a fool as to be governed by the fear of that ridicule which I despise.

[Exit.]

Music.—Enter DORICOURT, meeting a Mask.

Dor. Ha! my lord—I thought you had been engaged at Westminster on this important night.

Mask. So I am—I slipped out as soon as Lord Trope got upon his legs; I can badiner here an hour or two, and be back again before he is down.—There's a fine figure! I'll address her.

Enter LETITIA.

Charity, fair lady! Charity for a poor pilgrim.

Let. Charity! If you mean my prayers, Heaven grant thee wit, pilgrim.

Mask. That blessing would do from a devotee: from you I ask other charities;—such charities as beauty should bestow—soft looks—sweet words—and kind wishes.

Let. Alas! I am bankrupt of these, and forced to turn beggar myself.—There he is!—how shall I catch his attention?

[Aside.]

Mask. Will you grant me no favour?

Let. Yes, one.—I'll make you my partner—not for life, but through the soft mazes of a minuet.—Dare you dance?

Dor. Some spirit in that.

Mask. That, lady, is against my vow; but there is a man of the world.

Dor. Do you know her, my lord?

Mask. No. Such a woman as that, would formerly have been known in any disguise; but beauty is now common.—Venus seems to have given her cestus to the whole sex. [A Minuet.]

Dor. [During the Minuet.] She dances divinely! [When ended.] Somebody must know her? Let us inquire who she is.

[Recurt.]

Enter SAVILLE and KITTY WILLIS, habited like LADY FRANCES.

Sav. I have seen Courtall in Sir George's habit, though he endeavoured to keep himself concealed. Go, and seat yourself in the tea-room, and on no account discover your face:—remember too, Kitty, that the woman you are to personate is a woman of virtue.

Kitty. I am afraid I shall find that a difficult character; indeed I believe it is seldom kept up through a whole masquerade.

Sav. Of that you can be no judge.—Follow my directions, and you shall be rewarded.

[Exit KITTY.]

Enter DORICOURT.

Dor. Ha! Seville! Did you see a lady dance just now?

Sav. No.

Dor. Very odd. Nobody knows her.

Sav. Where is Miss Hardy?

Dor. Cutting watch-papers and making conundrums, I suppose.

Sav. What do you mean?

Dor. Faith, I hardly know. She's not here, however, Mrs. Rackett tells me.—I asked no further.

Sav. Your indifference seems increased.

Dor. 'Tis advanced thirty-two degrees towards hatred.

Sav. You are jesting?

Dor. Then it must be with a very ill grace, my dear Saville; for I never felt so seriously: do you know the creature's almost an idiot?

Sav. What!

Dor. An idiot. What the devil shall I do with her? 'Egad! I think I'll feign myself mad—and then Hardy will propose to cancel the engagements.

Sav. An excellent expedient! I must leave you; you are mysterious, and I can't stay to unravel you. I came here to watch over innocence and beauty.

Dor. The guardian of innocence and beauty at three and twenty! Is there not a cloven foot under that black gown, Saville?

Sav. No, faith. Courtall is here on a most detestable design. I found means to get a knowledge of the lady's dress, and have brought a girl to personate her, whose reputation cannot be hurt. You shall know the result to-morrow. Adieu.

[Exit.]

Dor. [Musing.] Yes, I think that will do. I'll feign myself mad, fee the doctor to pronounce me incurable, and when the parchments are destroyed—

[Musing.]

Enter LETITIA.

Let. You have chosen an odd situation for study. Fashion and taste preside in this spot. They throw their spells around you:—ten thousand delights spring up at their command; and you, a stoic—a being without senses, are wrapt in reflection.

Dor. And you, the most charming being in the world, awaken me to admiration. Did you come from the stars?

Let. Yes, and I shall re-ascend in a moment.

Dor. Pray show me your face before you go.

Let. Beware of imprudent curiosity; it lost Paradise.

Dor. Eve's curiosity was raised by the devil—'tis an angel tempts mine.—So your allusion is not in point.

Let. But why would you see my face?

Dor. To fall in love with it.

Let. And what then?

Dor. Why then; ay, curse it! there's the rub!

[Aside.]

Let. Your mistress will be angry;—but perhaps you have no mistress?

Dor. Yes, yes, and a sweet one it is!

Let. What! is she old?

Dor. No.

Let. Ugly?

Dor. No.

Let. What then?

Dor. Pho! don't talk about her; but show me your face.

Let. My vanity forbids it—'twould frighten you.

Dor. Impossible! your shape is graceful, your air bewitching, your bosom transparent, and your chin would tempt me to kiss it, if I did not see a pouting, red lip above it, that demands—

Let. You grow too free.

Dor. Show me your face then—only half a glance.

Let. Not for worlds!

Dor. What! you will have a little gentle force. [Attempts to seize her mask.]

Let. I am gone for ever! [Exit.]

Dor. 'Tis false—I'll follow to the end.

[Exit.]

Music; re-enter FLUTTER, LADY F. TOUCHWOOD, and SAVILLE.

Lady F. How can you be thus interested for a stranger?

Sav. Goodness will have interest; its home is heaven: on earth 'tis but a wanderer. Imprudent lady! why have you left the side of your protector? where is your husband?

Flut. Why, what's that to him?

Lady F. Surely it can't be merely his habit;—there's something in him that awes me.

Flut. Pho! 'tis only his gray beard. I know him; he keeps a lottery-office in Cornhill.

Sav. My province as an enchanter lays open every secret to me, lady! there are dangers abroad—Beware!

[Exit.]

Lady F. 'Tis very odd; his manner has made me tremble. Let us seek Sir George.

Flut. He's coming towards us.

Enter COURTALL, habited like SIR GEORGE TOUCHWOOD.

Court. There she is! If I can but disengage her from that fool, Flutter—crown me, ye schemers, with immortal wreaths!

Lady F. O, my dear Sir George: I rejoice to meet you—an old conjurer has been frightening me with his prophecies.—Where's Mrs. Rackett?

Court. In the dancing-room. I promised to send you to her, Mr. Flutter.

Flut. Ah! she wants me to dance. With all my heart.

[Exit.]

Lady F. Why do you keep on your mask?—'tis too warm.

Court. 'Tis very warm; I want air; let us go.

Lady F. You seem quite agitated.—Shan't we bid our company adieu?

Court. No, no—there's no time for forms. I'll just give directions to the carriage, and be with you in a moment. [Going, steps back.] Put on your mask; I have a particular reason for it.

[Exit.]

Re-enter SAVILLE, with KITTY.

Sav. Now, Kitty, you know your lesson. Lady Frances, [Takes off his mask.] let me lead you to your husband.

Lady F. Heavens! Is Mr. Saville the conjurer? Sir George is just stepped to the door, to give directions. We are going home immediately.

Sav. No, madam, you are deceived: Sir George is this way.

Lady F. This is astonishing!

Sav. Be not alarmed: you have escaped a snare, and shall be in safety in a moment.

[Exit SAVILLE and LADY FRANCES.]

Re-enter COURTALL, and seizes KITTY'S hand.

Court. Now.

Kitty. 'Tis pity to go so soon.

Court. Perhaps I may bring you back, my angel—but go now you must.

[Exeunt COURTALL and KITTY.]

Re-enter DORICOURT and LETITIA.

Dor. By heavens! I never was charmed till now. English beauty—French vivacity—wit—elegance.—Your name, my angel! tell me your name, though you persist in concealing your face.

Let. My name has a spell in it.

Dor. I thought so; it must be charming.

Let. But, if revealed, the charm is broke.

Dor. I'll answer for its force.

Let. Suppose it Harriot, or Charlotte, or Maria, or—

Dor. Hang Harriot, and Charlotte, and Maria—the name your father gave ye!

Let. That can't be worth knowing; 'tis so transient a thing.

Dor. How transient?

Let. Heaven forbid my name should be lasting till I am married.

Dor. Married! the chains of matrimony are too heavy and vulgar for such a spirit as yours. The flowery wreaths of Cupid are the only bands you should wear.

Let. They are the lightest, I believe: but 'tis possible to wear those of marriage gracefully. Throw them loosely round, and twist them in a true-lover's knot for the bosom.

Dor. An angel! But what will you be when a wife?

Let. A woman.—If my husband should prove a churl, a fool, or a tyrant, I'd break his heart, ruin his fortune, elope with the first pretty fellow that asked me—and return the contempt of the world with scorn, whilst my feelings preyed upon my life.

Dor. Amazing! [Aside.] What if you loved him, and he were worthy of your love?

Let. Why, then I'd be any thing—and all!—grave, gay, capricious—the soul of whim, the spirit of variety—live with him in the eye of fashion, or in the shade of retirement—change my country, my sex—feast with him in an Esquimaux hut, or a Persian pavilion—join him in the victorious war-dance on the borders of Lake Ontario, or sleep to the soft breathings of the flute in the cinnamon groves of Ceylon—dig with him in the mines of Golconda, or enter the dangerous precincts of the Mogul's seraglio—cheat him of his wishes, and overturn his empire, to restore the husband of my heart to the blessings of liberty and love.

Dor. Delightful wildness! oh, to catch thee, and hold thee for ever in this little cage!

[Attempting to clasp her.]

Let. Hold, Sir. Though Cupid must give the bait that tempts me to the snare, 'tis Hymen must spread the net to catch me.

Dor. 'Tis in vain to assume airs of coldness.—Fate has ordained you mine.

Let. How do you know?

Dor. I feel it here. I never met with a woman so perfectly to my taste; and I won't believe it formed you so, on purpose to tantalize me.

Let. This moment is worth a whole existence!

[Aside.]

Dor. Come, show me your face, and rivet my chains.

Let. To-morrow you shall be satisfied.

Dor. To-morrow, and not to-night?

Let. No.

Dor. Where then shall I wait on you to-morrow?—Where see you?

Let. You shall see me in an hour when you least expect me.

Dor. Why all this mystery?

Let. I like to be mysterious. At present be content to know that I am a woman of family and fortune.

Dor. Let me see you to your carriage.

Let. As you value knowing me, stir not a step. If I am followed, you never see me more. Adieu.

[Exit.]

Enter HARDY.

Har. Adieu! then I'm come in at the fag end!

[Aside.]

Dor. Barbarous creature! she's gone! what, and is this really serious?—Am I in love?—Pho! it can't be.

Enter FLUTTER.

O Flutter, do you know that charming creature?
Flut. What charming creature? I passed a thousand.

Dor. She went out that door as you entered.

Flut. Oh, yes;—I know her very well.

Dor. Do you, my dear fellow, who is she?

Flut. She's kept by Lord George Jennett.

Har. Impudent scoundrel!—I foresee I shall cut his throat!

[Aside.]

Dor. Cheer!

Flut. Yes; Colonel Gorget had her first;—then Mr. Lovell;—then—I forget exactly how many; and at last she's Lord George's.

[Talks to other Masks.]

Dor. I'll murder Gorget, poison Lord George, and shoot myself.

Har. Now's the time, I see to clear up the whole. Mr. Doricourt!—I say—Flutter was mistaken; I know who you are in love with.

Dor. A strange rencontre! Who?

Har. My Letty.

Dor. Oh! I understand your rebuke;—'tis too soon, Sir, to assume the father-in-law.

Har. Zounds! what do you mean by that? I tell you that the lady you admire is Letitia Hardy.

Dor. I am glad you are so well satisfied with the state of my heart.—I wish I was!

[Exit.]

Har. Stop a moment.—Stop, I say! what, you won't? very well—if I don't play you a trick for this, may I never be a grandfather! I'll plot with Letty now, and not against her; ay, hang me if I don't! There's something in my head, that shall tingle in his heart. He shall have a lecture upon impatience, that I foresee he'll be the better for as long as he lives.

[Exit.]

Re-enter SAVILLE, with Gentlemen.

Sav. Flutter, come with us; we're going to raise a laugh at Courtall's.

Flut. With all my heart. Live to live, was my father's motto. Live to laugh, is mine.

[Music; exeunt.]

SCENE II.—At COURTALL'S.

Enter KITTY and COURTALL.

Kitty. Where have you brought me, Sir George? This is not our home!

Court. 'Tis my home, beautiful Lady Frances! [Kneels, and takes off his mask.] Oh, forgive the ardency of my passion, which has compelled me to deceive you!

Kitty. Mr. Courtall! what will become of me?

Court. Oh, say but that you pardon the wretch who addresses you. Did you but know the agonizing tortures of my heart, since I had the felicity of conversing with you this morning—or the despair that now—

Kitty. Oh, I am undone! [Knock.]

Court. Louds! my dear Lady Frances! I am not at home! Rascal! do you hear? Let nobody in; I am not at home!

Serv. [Without.] Sir, I told the gentlemen so.

Court. Eternal curses! they are coming up. Step into this room, adorable creature! one moment; I'll throw them out of the window, if they stay there.

[Exit KITTY.]

Enter SAVILLE, FLUTTER, and GENTLEMEN.

Flut. O, gemini! beg the petticoat's pardon. Just saw a corner of it.

1 Gent. No wonder admittance was so difficult. I thought you took us for bailiffs.

Court. Upon my soul, I am devilish glad to see you; but you perceive how I am circumstanced. Excuse me at this moment.

2 Gent. Tell us who 'tis then.

Court. Oh, fy!

Flut. We wont blab.

Court. I can't, upon honour. Thus far—She's a woman of the first character and rank. Saville, [Taking him aside.] have I influence, or have I not?

Sav. Why, sure, you do not insinuate—

Court. No, not insinuate, but swear, that she's now in my bed-chamber; by gad, I don't deceive you. There's generalship, you rogue! such an humble, distant, sighing fellow as thou art, at the end of a six months siege, would have boasted of a kiss from her glove. I only give the signal, and—pop!—she's in my arms!

Sav. What Lady Fran—

Court. Hush! You shall see her name to-morrow morning in red letters at the end of my list. Gentlemen, you must excuse me now. Come and drink chocolate at twelve, but—

Sav. Ay, let us go, out of respect to the lady: 'tis a person of rank.

Flut. Is it? Then I'll have a peep at her.

[Runs to the door in the back scene.]

Court. This is too much.

[Trying to prevent him.]

1 Gent. By Jupiter, we'll all have a peep.

Court. Gentlemen, consider, for Heaven's sake—a lady of quality. What will be the consequences?

Flut. The consequences! Why, you'll have your throat cut, that's all, but I'll write your elegy. So now for the door! [Part open the door, whilst the rest hold COURTALL.] I beg your ladyship's pardon, whoever you are. [Leads her out.] Emerge from darkness, like the glorious sun, and bless the wond'ring circle with your charms.

[Takes off her mask]

Sav. Kitty Willis! ha, ha, ha!

Omnes. Kitty Willis! ha, ha, ha! Kitty Willis!

1 Gent. Why, what a fellow you are, Courtall, to attempt imposing on your friends in this manner. A lady of quality! an earl's daughter! Your ladyship's most obedient—Ha, ha, ha!

Sav. Courtall, have you influence, or have you not?

Flut. The man's moon-struck.

Court. Hell and ten thousand furies seize you all together!

Kitty. What, me too, Mr. Courtall? me, whom you have knelt to, prayed to, and adored?

Flut. That's right, Kitty; give him a little more.

Court. Disappointed and laughed at!

Sav. Laughed at, and despised. I have fulfilled my design, which was to expose your villainy, and laugh at your presumption. Adieu, Sir; remember how you again boast of your influence with women of rank; and when you next want amusement, dare not to look up to the virtuous and to the noble for a companion.

[Exit, leading KITTY.]

Flut. And, Courtall, before you carry a lady into your bed-chamber again, look under her mask; d'ye hear?

[Exit.]

Court. There's no bearing this! I'll set off for Paris directly.

[Exit.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—HARDY'S House.

Enter HARDY and VILLERS.

Vil. Whimsical enough! Dying for her, and hates her! Believes her a fool, and a woman of brilliant understanding!

Har. As true as you are alive; but when I went up to him, last night, at the Pantheon, out of downright good nature, to explain things—my gentleman whips round upon his heel, and snapped me as short as if I had been a beggar woman with six children, and he overseer of the parish.

Vil. Here comes the wonder-worker.

Enter LETTIA.

Here comes the enchantress, who can go to masquerades, and sing, and dance, and talk a man out of his wits! But pray, have we morning masquerades?

Let. Oh, no; but I am so enamoured of this all-conquering habit, that I could not resist putting it on the moment I had breakfasted. I shall wear it on the day I am married, and then lay it by in spices, like the miraculous robes of St. Bridget.

Vil. That's as most brides do. The charms that helped to catch the husband are generally laid by, one after another, till the lady grows a downright wife, and then runs crying to her mother, because she has transformed her lover into a downright husband.

Har. Listen to me. I han't slept to-night, for thinking of plots to plague Doricourt—and they drove one another out of my head so quick, that I was as giddy as a goose, and could make nothing of them: I wish to goodness you could contrive something.

Vil. Contrive to plague him! Nothing so easy. Don't undeceive him, Madam, till he is your husband. Marry him while he possesses the sentiments you laboured to give him of Miss Hardy; and when you are his wife—

Let. Oh, Heavens! I see the whole—that's the very thing. My dear Mr. Villers, you are the divinest man!

Vil. Don't make love to me, hussy.

Enter MRS. RACKETT.

Mrs. R. No, pray don't; for I design to have Villers myself in about six years. There's an oddity in him that pleases me. He holds women in contempt; and I should like to have an opportunity of breaking his heart for that.

Vil. And when I am heartily tired of life, I know no woman whom I would with more pleasure make my executioner.

Har. It cannot be; I foresee it will be impossible to bring it about. You know the wedding wasn't to take place this week, or more—and Letty will never be able to play the fool so long.

Vil. The knot shall be tied to-night. I have it all here; [Pointing to his forehead.] the license is ready. Feign yourself ill; send for Doricourt, and tell him you can't go out of the world in peace, except you see the ceremony performed.

Har. I feign myself ill! I could as soon feign myself a Roman ambassador. I was never ill in my life, but with the tooth-ache—when Letty's mother was a-breeding I had all the qualms.

Vil. Oh, I have no fears for you. But what says Miss Hardy? Are you willing to make the irrevocable vow before night?

Let. Oh, Heavens!—[I—]—'Tis so exceeding sudden, that really—

Mrs. R. That really she is frightened out of her wits, lest it should be impossible to bring matters about. But I have taken the scheme into my protection, and you shall be Mrs. Doricourt before night. Come, [To HARDY.] to bed directly: your room shall be crammed with vials, and all the apparatus of death—then, heigh presto! for Doricourt.

Vil. You go and put off your conquering dress, [To LETITIA.] and get all your awkward airs ready. And you practise a few groans. [To HARDY.] And you, if possible, an air of gravity. [To MRS. RACKETT.] I'll answer for the plot.

Let. Married in jest! 'Tis an odd idea! Well, I'll venture it.

[Exeunt LETITIA and MRS. RACKETT.]

Vil. Ay, I'll be sworn! [Looks at his watch.] 'Tis past three. The budget's to be opened this morning, I'll just step down to the house. Will you go?

Har. What! with a mortal sickness?

Vil. What a blockhead! I believe if half of us were to stay away with mortal sicknesses, it would be for the health of the nation. Good morning. I'll call and feel your pulse as I come back. [Exit.]

Har. You wou't find them over brisk, I fancy. I foresee some ill happening from this making believe to die before one's time. But hang it—a hem! I am a stout man yet; only fifty-six—What's that? In the last yearly bills there were three lived to above a hundred. Fifty-six! Fiddle-de-dee! I am not afraid, not I. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—DORICOURT'S Lodgings.

DORICOURT, in his robe de chambre; enter SAVILLE.

Sav. Undressed so late?

Dor. I didn't go to bed till late—'twas late before I slept—late when I rose. Do you know Lord George Jennett?

Sav. Yes.

Dor. Has he a mistress?

Sav. Yes.

Dor. What sort of a creature is she?

Sav. Why, she spends him three thousand a year with the ease of a duchess, and entertains his friends with the grace of a Ninon. Ergo, she is handsome, spirited, and clever. [DORICOURT walks about disordered.] In the name of caprice, what ails you?

Dor. You have hit it—Elle est mon caprice. The mistress of Lord George Jennett is my caprice. Oh, insufferable!

Sav. What, you saw her at the masquerade?

Dor. Saw her, loved her, died for her—without knowing her. And now, the curse is, I can't hate her.

Sav. Ridiculous enough! All this distress about a kept woman, whom any man may have, I dare swear, in a fortnight. They've been jarring some time.

Dor. Have her! The sentiment I have conceived for the witch is so unaccountable, that, in that line, I cannot bear her idea. Was she a woman of honour, for a wife, I could adore her—but I really believe, if she should send me an assignation, I should hate her.

Sav. Hey-day! this sounds like love. What becomes of poor Miss Hardy?

Dor. Her name has given me an ague! dear Saville, how shall I contrive to make old Hardy cancel the engagements? the moiety of the estate, which he will forfeit, shall be his the next moment by deed of gift.

Sav. Let me see—Can't you get it insinuated that you are a devilish wild fellow; that you are an infidel, and attached to wenching, gaming, and so forth?

Dor. Ay, such a character might have done some good two centuries back. But who the devil can it frighten now?—I believe it must be the mad scheme at last.—There, will that do for a grin!

Sav. Ridiculous!—But how are you certain that the woman who has so bewildered you belongs to Lord George?

Dor. Flutter told me so.

Sav. Then fifty to one against the intelligence.

Dor. It must be so. There was a mystery in her manner, for which nothing else can account. [A violent rap.] Who can this be?

Sav. [Looks out.] The proverb is your answer—'tis Flutter himself. Tip him a scene of the madman, and see how it takes.

Dor. I will—a good way to send it about town. Shall it be of the melancholy kind, or the raving?

Sav. Rant!—Rant!—Here he comes.

Dor. Talk not to me; who can pull comets by the beard, and overset an island!

Enter FLUTTER.

There! this is he!—this is he who hath sent my poor soul, without coat or breeches, to be tossed about in ether like a duck feather! villain, give me my soul again!

Flut. Upon my soul, I haven't got it.

Sav. Oh, Mr. Flutter, what a melancholy sight!—I little thought to have seen my poor friend reduced to this.

Flut. Mercy defend me! what, is he mad?

Sav. You see how it is. A cursed Italian lady—Jealousy—gave him a drug; and every full of the moon—

Dor. Moon! who dares talk of the moon? the patroness of genius—the rectifier of wits—the—Oh! here she is!—I feel her—she tugs at my brain—she has it—she has it—Oh!

Flut. Well, this is dreadful! exceeding dreadful, I protest. Have you had Munro?

Sav. Not yet. The worthy Miss Hardy—what a misfortune!

Flut. Ay, very true.—Do they know it?

Sav. Oh, no; the paroxysm seized him but this morning.

Flut. Adieu; I can't stay.

Sav. But you must stay, [Going in great haste. Holding him.] and assist me—perhaps he'll return again in a moment; and when he is in this way, his strength is prodigious.

Flut. Can't, indeed—can't, upon my soul.

Sav. Flutter—Don't make a mistake now—remember 'tis Doricourt that's mad.

Flut. Yes—you mad.

Sav. No, no; Doricourt.

Flut. 'Egad, I'll say you are both mad, and then I can't mistake.

SCENE III.—SIR GEORGE TOUCHWOOD'S HOUSE.

Enter SIR GEORGE and LADY FRANCES TOUCHWOOD.

Sir G. The bird is escaped—Courtall is gone to France.

Lady F. Heaven and earth! have you been to seek him?

Sir G. Seek him! Ay.

Lady F. How did you get his name? I should never have told it you.

Sir G. I learned it in the first coffee-house I entered.—Every body is full of the story.

Lady F. Thank Heaven he's gone!—But I have a story for you—The Hardy family are forming a plot upon your friend Doricourt, and we are expected in the evening to assist.

Sir G. With all my heart, my angel; but I can't stay to hear it unfolded. They told me Mr. Saville would be at home in half an hour, and I am impatient to see him. The adventure of last night—

Lady F. Think of it only with gratitude. The danger I was in has overset a new system of conduct, that perhaps I was too much inclined to adopt. But henceforward, my dear Sir George, you shall be my constant companion and protector. And when they ridicule the unfashionable monsters, the felicity of our hearts will make their satire pointless.

Sir G. Charming angel! You almost reconcile me to Courtall. Hark! here's company: [Stepping to the door.] 'tis your livery widow—I'll steu down the back stairs to escape her.

[Exit.]

Enter MRS. RACKETT.

Mrs. R. Oh, Lady Frances! I am shocked to death.—Have you received a card from us?

Lady F. Yes; within these twenty minutes.

Mrs. R. Ay, 'tis of no consequence.—'Tis all over—Doricourt's mad.

Lady F. Mad!

Mrs. R. My poor Letitia!—Just as we were enjoying ourselves with the prospect of a scheme that was planned for their mutual happiness, in came Flutter, breathless with the intelligence:—I flew here to know if you had heard it.

Lady F. No, indeed—and I hope it is one of Mr. Flutter's dreams.

Enter SAVILLE.

Apropos; now we shall be informed. Mr. Saville, I rejoice to see you, though Sir George will be disappointed: he's gone to your lodging.

Sav. I should have been happy to have prevented Sir George. I hope your ladyship's adventure last night did not disturb your dreams?

Lady F. Not at all; for I never slept a moment. My escape, and the importance of my obligations to you, employed my thoughts. But we have just had shocking intelligence—Is it true that Doricourt is mad?

Sav. So, the business is done. [Aside.] Madam, I am sorry to say that I have just been a melancholy witness of his ravings; he was in the height of a paroxysm.

Mrs. R. Oh, there can be no doubt of it! Flutter told us the whole history. Some Italian princess gave him a drug, in a box of sweetmeats, sent to him by her own page; and it renders him lunatic every month. Poor Miss Hardy! I never felt so much on any occasion in my life.

Sav. To soften your concern, I will inform you, Madam, that Miss Hardy is less to be pitied than you imagine.

Mrs. R. Why so, Sir?

Sav. 'Tis rather a delicate subject—but he did not love Miss Hardy.

Mrs. R. He did love Miss Hardy, Sir, and would have been the happiest of men.

Sav. Pardon me, Madam; his heart was not only free from that lady's chains, but absolutely captivated by another.

Mrs. R. No, Sir—no. It was Miss Hardy who captivated him. She met him last night at the masquerade, and charmed him in disguise. He professed the most violent passion for her: and a plan was laid this evening, to cheat him into happiness.

Sav. Ha, ha, ha!—Upon my soul, I must beg your pardon! I have not eaten of the Italian princess' box of sweetmeats, sent by her own page; and yet I am as mad as Doricourt, ha, ha, ha!

Mrs. R. So it appears. What can all this mean?

Sav. Why, Madam, he is at present in his perfect senses; but he'll lose them in ten minutes through joy. The madness was only a feint to avoid marrying Miss Hardy, ha, ha, ha!—I'll carry him the intelligence directly.

[Going.]

Mrs. R. Not for worlds. I owe him revenge now for what he has made us suffer. You must promise not to divulge a syllable I have told you; and when Doricourt is summoned to Mr. Hardy's, prevail on him to come—madness and all.

Lady F. Pray do. I should like to see him showing off, now I am in the secret.

Sav. You must be obeyed, though 'tis inhuman to conceal his happiness.

Mrs. R. I am going home; so I'll set you down at his lodgings, and acquaint you, by the way, with our whole scheme. Allons!

Sav. I attend you. [Leading her out.]

Mrs. R. You want fail us?

[Exeunt SAVILLE and MRS. RACKETT.]

Lady F. Depend on us. [Exit.]

SCENE IV.—DORICOURT'S Lodgings.

DORICOURT seated, reading.

Dor. [Flings away the book.] What effect can the morals of fourscore have on a mind torn with passion? [Musing.] Is it possible such a soul as hers can support itself in so humiliating a situation? A kept woman! [Rising.] Well, well—I am glad it is so—I am glad it is so!

Enter SAVILLE.

Sav. What a happy dog you are, Doricourt! I might have been mad, beggared, or pistol'd, myself, without its being mentioned—But you, forsooth! the whole female world is concerned for. I reported the state of your brain to five different women. The lip of the first trembled; the white bosom of the second heaved a sigh; the third ejaculated, and turned her eye to—the glass; the fourth blessed herself; and the fifth said, whilst she pinned a curl, Well, now perhaps he'll be an amusing companion: his native dulness was intolerable.

Dor. Envy! sheer envy, by the smiles of Hebe!—There are no less than forty pair of the brightest eyes in town will drop crystals, when they hear of my misfortune.

Sav. Well, but I have news for you.—Poor Hardy is confined to his bed; they say he is going out of the world by the first post, and he wants to give you his blessing.

Dor. Ill! so ill! I am sorry from my soul. He's a worthy little fellow—if he had not the gift of foreseeing so strongly.

Sav. Well, you must go and take leave.

Dor. What! to act the lunatic in the dying man's chamber?

Sav. Exactly the thing; and will bring your business to a short issue: for his last commands must be, that you are not to marry his daughter.

Dor. That's true, by Jupiter!—and yet, hang it, impose upon a poor fellow at so serious a moment!—I can't do it.

Sav. You must, faith. I am answerable for your appearance, though it should be in a strait waistcoat. He knows your situation, and seems the more desirous of an interview.

Dor. I don't like encountering Rackett.—She's an arch little devil, and will discover the cheat.

Sav. There's a fellow!—Cheated ninety-nine women, and now afraid of the hundredth.

Dor. And with reason—for that hundredth is a widow. [Exeunt.]

SCENE V.—HARDY'S.

Enter MRS. RACKETT and MISS OGLE.

Miss O. And so Miss Hardy is actually to be married to-night?

Mrs. R. If her fate does not deceive her. You are apprised of the scheme, and we hope it will succeed.

Miss O. Deuce take her! she's six years younger than I am. [Aside.] Is Mr. Doricourt handsome?

Mrs. R. Handsome, generous, young, and rich.—There's a husband for ye! Isn't he worth pulling caps for?

Miss O. I'my conscience, the widow speaks as though she'd give caps, ears, and all for him. [Aside.] I wonder you didn't try to catch this wonderful man, Mrs. Rackett?

Mrs. R. Really, Miss Ogle, I had not time. Besides, when I marry, so many stout young fellows will hang themselves, that, out of regard to society, in these sad times, I shall postpone it for a few years.—This will cost her a new lace.—I heard it crack. [Aside.]

Enter SIR GEORGE and LADY FRANCES.

Sir G. Well, here we are. But where's the knight of the woful countenance?

Mrs. R. Here soon, I hope—for a woful night it will be without him.

Sir G. Oh fy! do you condescend to pun?

Mrs. R. Why not? It requires genius to make a good pun—some men of bright parts can't reach it. I know a lawyer who writes them on the back of his briefs; and says they are of great use—in a dry cause.

Enter FLUTTER.

Flut. Here they come! Here they come!—Their coach stopped as mine drove off.

Sav. [Without.] Come, let me guide you!—This way, my poor friend! Why are you so furious?

Dor. [Without.] The house of death—to the house of death!

Enter DORICOURT and SAVILLE.

Ah! this is the spot!

Lady F. How wild and fiery he looks!

Miss O. Now, I think, he looks terrified!

Mrs. R. I never saw a madman before.—Let me examine him.—Will he bite?

Sav. Pray keep out of his reach, ladies. You don't know your danger. He's like a wild cat, if a sudden thought seizes him.

Mrs. R. You talk like a keeper of wild cats.—How much do you demand for showing the monster?

Dor. I don't like this—I must rouse their sensibility. [Aside.] There! there she starts through the air in liquid flames! Down again! Now I have her.—Oh, she burns! she scorches!—Oh! she eats into my very heart!

Omnès. Ha, ha, ha!

Dor. I am laughed at!

Mrs. R. Laughed at—ay, to be sure; why, I could play the madman better than you. There! there she is! Now I have her! Ha, ha, ha!

Dor. I'll leave the house:—I'm covered with confusion. [Going.]

Sir G. Stay, Sir.—You must not go. 'Twas poorly done, Mr. Doricourt, to affect madness rather than fulfil your engagements.

Dor. Affect madness! Saville, what can I do?

Sav. Since you are discovered, confess the whole.

Dor. Yes; since my designs have been so unaccountably discovered, I will avow the whole. I cannot love Miss Hardy, and I will never—

Sav. Hold, my dear Doricourt! What will the world say to such—

Dor. Damn the world! What will the world give me for the loss of happiness? Must I sacrifice my peace, to please the world?

Sir G. Yes, every thing, rather than be branded with dishonour.

Lady F. Though our arguments should fail, there is a pleader, whom you surely cannot withstand—the dying Mr. Hardy supplicates you not to forsake his child!

Sir G. The dying Mr. Hardy!

Flut. The dying Mr. Hardy!

Enter VILLERS.

Vil. The dying Mr. Hardy requests you to grant him a moment's conversation, Mr. Doricourt, though you should persist to send him miserable to the grave.—Let me conduct you to his chamber.

Dor. Oh, ay, any where; to the antipodes—to the moon.—Carry me.—Do with me what you will.

Mrs. R. I'll follow, and let you know what passes.

[Exeunt VIL, DOR, MRS. R. and MISS O.]

Flut. Ladies, ladies, have the charity to take me with you, that I may make no blunder in repeating the story. [Exit.]

Lady F. Sir George, you don't know Mr. Saville. [Exit.]

Sir G. Ten thousand pardons; I have been with the utmost impatience at your door twice to-day.

Sav. I am concerned you had so much trouble, Sir George.

Sir G. Trouble! what a word!—I hardly know how to address you; your having preserved Lady Frances in so imminent a danger,—start not, Saville; to protect Lady Frances was my right. You have wrested from me my dearest privilege.

Sav. I hardly know how to answer such a reproach.

Sir G. I do not mean to reproach you. I hardly know what I mean. There is one method by which you may restore peace to me. I have a sister, Saville, who is amiable; and you are worthy of her. You must go with us into Hampshire; and, if you see each other with the eyes I do, our felicity will be complete.

Sav. I will attend you to Hampshire with pleasure; but not on the plan of retirement. Society has claims on Lady Frances that forbid it.

Sir G. Claims, Saville?

Sav. Yes, claims; Lady Frances was born to be the ornament of courts. She is sufficiently alarmed not to wander beyond the reach of her protector; and, from the British court, the most tenderly anxious husband could not wish to banish his wife. Bid her keep in her eye the bright example who presides there; the splendour of whose rank yields to the superior lustre of her virtue.

Re-enter MRS. RACKETT, LADY FRANCES, MISS OGLE, and FLUTTER.

Mrs. R. Oh, Heavens! do you know—

Flut. Let me tell the story. As soon as Doricourt—

Mrs. R. I protest you sha'n't—said Mr. Hardy—

Flut. No, 'twas Doricourt spoke first—says he—No, 'twas the parson—says he—

Mrs. R. Stop his mouth, Sir George;—he'll spoil the tale.

Sir G. Never heed circumstances—the result—the result—

Mrs. R. No, no; you shall have it in form. Mr. Hardy performed the sick man like an angel. He sat up in bed, and talked so pathetically, that the tears stood in Doricourt's eyes.

Flut. Ay, stood; they did not drop, but stood. I shall in future be very exact: the parson seized the moment; you know they never miss an opportunity.

Mrs. R. "Make haste," said Doricourt; "if I have time to reflect, poor Hardy will die unhappy."

Flut. They were got as far as the day of judgment, when we slipped out of the room.

Sir G. Then, by this time, they must have reached amazement, which every body knows is the end of matrimony.

Mrs. R. Ay, the reverend fathers ended the service with that word, prophetically, to teach the bride what a capricious monster a husband is.

Sir G. I rather think it was sarcastically, to prepare the bridegroom for the unreasonable humours and vagaries of his helpmate.

Lady F. Here comes the bridegroom of to-night.

Re-enter DORICOURT and VILLERS: VILLERS whispers SAVILLE, who goes out.

Omnes. Joy! joy! joy!

Miss O. If he's a sample of bridegrooms, keep me single! A younger brother, from the funeral of his father, could not carry a more fretful countenance.

Flut. Oh! now he's melancholy mad, I suppose.

Lady F. You do not consider the importance of the occasion.

Vil. No; nor how shocking a thing it is for a man to be forced to marry one woman, whilst his heart is devoted to another.

Mrs. R. Well, now 'tis over, I confess to you, Mr. Doricourt, I think it was a most ridiculous piece of Quixotism, to give up the happiness of a whole life to a man who perhaps has but few moments to be sensible of the sacrifice.

Flut. So it appeared to me. But, thought I, Mr. Doricourt has travelled; he knows best.

Dor. Zounds! confusion! did ye not all set upon me? Didn't ye talk to me of honour, compassion, justice?

Sir G. Very true: you have acted according to their dictates, and I hope the utmost felicity of the married state will reward you.

Dor. Never, Sir George! To felicity I bid adieu; but I will endeavour to be content. Where is my—I must speak it—where is my wife?

Enter LETITIA, masked, led by SAVILLE.

Sav. Mr. Doricourt, this lady was pressing to be introduced to you.

Dor. Oh!

[Starting.]

Let. I told you last night you should see me at a time when you least expected me, and I have kept my promise.

Vil. Whoever you are, Madam, you could not have arrived at a happier moment. Mr. Doricourt is just married.

Let. Married! impossible! 'tis but a few hours since he swore to me eternal love: I believed him, gave him up my virgin heart, and now!—Ungrateful sex!

Dor. Your virgin heart! No, lady; my fate, thank Heaven! yet wants that torture. Nothing but the conviction that you was another's could have made me think one moment of marriage, to have saved the lives of half mankind. But this visit, Madam, is as barbarous as unexpected. It is now my duty to forget you, which, spite of your situation, I found difficult enough.

Let. My situation! what situation?

Dor. I must apologize for explaining it in this company; but, Madam, I am not ignorant that you are the companion of Lord George Jennett, and this is the only circumstance that can give me peace.

Let. I—a companion! ridiculous pretence! no, Sir, know, to your confusion, that my heart, my honour, my name, is unspotted as hers you have married; my birth equal to your own, my fortune large. That, and my person, might have been yours. But, Sir, farewell. [Going.]

Dor. Oh, stay a moment.—Rascal! is she not—

Flut. Who, she? O Lord! 'twas quite a different person that I meant. I never saw that lady before.

Dor. Then, never shalt thou see her more.

[Shakes FLUTTER.]

Mrs. R. Have mercy upon the poor man! Heavens! He'll murder him.

Dor. Murder him! Yes, you, yourself, and all mankind. Sir George—Saville—Villers—'twas you who pushed me on this precipice; 'tis you who have snatched me from joy, felicity, and life.

Mrs. R. There! now, how well he acts the madman! This is something like! I knew he would do it well enough, when the time came.

Dor. Hard-hearted woman! Enjoy my ruin—riot in my wretchedness.

Enter HARDY, hastily, in his night-cap and gown.

Har. This is too much. You are now the husband of my daughter; and how dare you show all this passion about another woman?

Dor. Alive again!

Har. Alive! ay, and merry. Here, wipe off the flour from my face. I was never in better health and spirits in my life. I foresaw 'twould do. Why, my illness was only a fetch, man, to make you marry Letty.

Dor. It was! base and ungenerous! Well, Sir, you shall be gratified. The possession of my heart was no object either with you or your daughter. My fortune and name was all you desired, and these—I leave ye. My native England I shall quit, nor ever behold you more. But, lady, that, in my exile, I may have one consolation, grant me the favour you denied last night; let me behold all that mask conceals, that your whole image may be impressed on my heart, and cheer my distant solitary hours.

Let. This is the most awful moment of my life. Oh, Doricourt, the slight action of taking off my mask stamps me the most bless'd or miserable of women!

Dor. What can this mean? Reveal your face, I conjure you.

Let. Behold it.

Dor. Rapture! transport! heaven!

Flut. Now for a touch of the happy madman.

Let. This little stratagem arose from my disappointment in not having made the impression on you I wished. The timidity of the English character threw a veil over me you could not penetrate. You have forced me to emerge, in some measure, from my natural reserve, and to throw off the veil that hid me.

Dor. I am yet in a state of intoxication. I cannot answer you.—Speak on, sweet angel!

Let. You see I can be any thing; choose then my character—your taste shall fix it. Shall I be an English wife? or, breaking from the bonds of nature and education, step forth to the world in all the captivating glare of foreign manners?

Dor. You shall be nothing but yourself—nothing can be captivating that you are not. I will not wrong your penetration, by pretending that you won my heart at the first interview; but you have now my whole soul;—your person, your face, your mind, I would not exchange for those of any other woman breathing.

Har. A dog! how well he makes up for past slights! Cousin Rackett, I wish you a good husband, with all my heart. Mr. Flutter, I'll believe every word you say this fortnight. Mr. Villers, you and I have managed this to a T. I never was so merry in all my life. 'Gad, I believe I can dance. [Footing.]

Dor. Charming, charming creature!

Let. Congratulate me, my dear friends! Can you conceive my happiness?

Har. No, congratulate me; for mine is the greatest.

Flut. No, congratulate me, that I have escaped with life, and give me some sticking plaster; this wild cat has torn the skin from my throat.

Har. Come into the next room; I have ordered out every drop of my forty-eight, and I'll invite the whole parish of St. George's, but we'll drink it out—except one dozen, which I shall keep under three double locks, for a certain christening that I foresee will happen within this twelve month.

Dor. My charming bride! It was a strange perversion of taste, that led me to consider the delicate timidity of your deportment as the mark of an uninformed mind, or inelegant manners. I feel now it is to that innate modesty, English husbands owe a felicity the married men of other countries are strangers to; it is a sacred veil to your own charms; it is the surest bulwark to your husbands' honour; and cursed be the hour, should it ever arrive, in which British ladies shall sacrifice to foreign graces the grace of modesty.

[Exeunt.]

THE CRITIC:

OR,

A TRAGEDY REHEARSED.

A DRAMATIC PIECE,

IN THREE ACTS.

BY R. B. SHERIDAN, Esq.

REMARKS.

This production, from the pen of the Rt. Hon. R. B. Sheridan, is one of those dramatical pieces which hold a high rank in the estimation of the public, and is perhaps the best effort of ridicule that has hitherto appeared against those who have imagined they possessed talents for theatrical composition. The character of Sir Fretful Plagiary is highly drawn, and his foibles and peculiarities are painted to the life. The various turns in his speeches are exceedingly natural for a person in his situation; and Dangle, with Sneer at his elbow, contrives to keep him in continual perturbation. The Puffs, too, of this scheming age, who were never more numerous or importunate, are justly lashed in the ridicule bestowed by our witty author.

The vein of original humour which pervades the whole piece, notwithstanding its acrimonious animadversions, cannot fail to raise a pleasant laugh; but the political and other allusions require alteration to adapt it for representation at different periods of time.

ACT I.

SCENE I.

MR. and MRS. DANGLE at breakfast, reading Newspapers.

Dang. [Reading.] "Brutus to Lord North."
—"Letter the second on the state of the army."
—Pshaw! "To the first L—dash D of the A—dash Y."—"Genuine extract of a letter from St.
Kit's."—"Coxheath intelligence."—"It is now confidently asserted that Sir Charles Hardy,"—

Pshaw!—Nothing but about the fleet and the nation!—and I hate all politics but theatrical politics.—Where's the Morning Chronicle?

Mrs. D. Yes, that's your Gazette.

Dang. So, here we have it; "Theatrical intelligence extraordinary.—We hear there is a new tragedy in rehearsal at Drury-lane Theatre, called the Spanish Armada, said to be written by Mr. Puff, a gentleman well known in the theatrical world. If we may allow ourselves to give credit to the report of the performers, who, truth to say, are in general but indifferent judges, this piece abounds with the most striking and received beauties of modern composition."—So!—I am very glad my friend Puff's tragedy is in such forwardness.—Mrs. Dangle, my dear, you will be very glad to hear that Puff's tragedy—

Mrs. D. Lord, Mr. Dangle, why will you plague me about such nonsense?—Now the plays are begun I shall have no peace.—Isn't it sufficient to make yourself ridiculous by your passion for the theatre, without continually teasing me to join you? Why can't you ride your hobby-horse without desiring to place me on a pillion behind you, Mr. Dangle?

Dang. Nay, my dear, I was only going to read—

Mrs. D. I have no patience with you!—haven't you made yourself the jest of all your acquaintance by your interference in matters where you have no business? Are not you called a theatrical Quindunc, and a mock Mæcnas to second-hand authors?

Dang. True; my power with the managers is pretty notorious; but is it no credit to have applications from all quarters for my interest?—From lords to recommend fiddlers, from ladies to get boxes, from authors to get answers, and from actors to get engagements.

Mrs. D. Yes, truly; you have contrived to get a share in all the plague and trouble of theatrical property, without the profit, or even the credit of the abuse that attends it.

Dang. I am sure, Mrs. Dangle, you are no loser by it, however; you have all the advantages of it;—mightn't you, last winter, have had the reading of the new pantomime a fortnight previous to its performance? And didn't my friend, Mr. Smatter, dedicate his last farce to you, at my particular request, Mrs. Dangle?

Mrs. D. Yes; but wasn't the farce damned, Mr. Dangle? And to be sure it is extremely pleasant to have one's house made the motley rendezvous of all the lackeys of literature:—The very high change of trading authors and jobbing critics!

Dang. Mrs. Dangle, you will not easily persuade me that there is no credit or importance in being at the head of a band of critics, who take upon them to decide for the whole town, whose opinion and patronage all writers solicit, and whose recommendation no manager dares refuse!

Mrs. D. Ridiculous!—Both managers and authors of the least merit, laugh at your pretensions.—The public is their critic—without whose fair approbation they know no play can rest on the stage, and with whose applause they welcome such attacks as yours, and laugh at the malice of them, where they can't at the wit.

Dang. Very well, Madam—very well.

Enter SERVANT.

Serv. Mr. Sneer, Sir, to wait on you.

Dang. O, show Mr. Sneer up. [Exit SERVANT.] Plague on't, now we must appear loving and affectionate, or Sneer will hitch us into a story.

Mrs. D. With all my heart; you can't be more ridiculous than you are.

Dang. You are enough to provoke—

Enter MR. SNEER.

—Ha! my dear Sneer, I am vastly glad to see you. My dear, here's Mr. Sneer. Mr. Sneer, my dear—my dear, Mr. Sneer.

Mrs. D. Good morning to you, Sir.

Dang. Mrs. Dangle and I have been diverting ourselves with the papers.—Pray, Sneer, wont you go to Drury-lane Theatre the first night of Puff's tragedy?

Sneer. Yes; but I suppose one sha'n't be able to get in. But here, Dangle, I have brought you two pieces, one of which you must exert yourself to make some of the managers accept, I can tell you that, for 'tis written by a person of consequence.

Dang. So! now my plagues are beginning.

Sneer. Ay, I am glad of it, for now you'll be happy. Why, my dear Dangle, it is a pleasure to see how you enjoy your volunteer fatigue, and your solicited solicitations.

Dang. It's a great trouble—yet, 'egad, it's pleasant too.—Why, sometimes of a morning, I have a dozen people call on me at breakfast time, whose faces I never saw before, nor ever desire to see again.

Sneer. That must be very pleasant indeed!

Dang. And not a week but I receive fifty letters, and not a line in them about any business of my own.

Sneer. An amusing correspondence!

Dang. [Reading.] "Bursts into tears, and exit." What, is this a tragedy.

Sneer. No, that's a genteel comedy, not a translation—only taken from the French; it is written in a style which they have lately tried to run down; the true sentimental, and nothing ridiculous in it from the beginning to the end.

Mrs. D. Well, if they had kept to that, I should not have been such an enemy to the stage: there was some edification to be got from those pieces, Mr. Sneer!

Sneer. I am quite of your opinion, Mrs. Dangle; the theatre, in proper hands, might certainly be made the school of morality; but now, I am sorry to say it, people seem to go there principally for their entertainment.

Mrs. D. It would have been more to the credit of the managers to have kept it in the other line.

Sneer. Undoubtedly, Madam; and hereafter perhaps to have had it recorded, that in the midst of a luxurious and dissipated age, they preserved two houses in the capital, where the conversation was always moral at least, if not entertaining!

Dang. But what have we here?—This seems a very odd—

Sneer. O that's a comedy, on a very new plan; replete with wit and mirth, yet of a most serious moral! You see it is called "The Reformed Housebreaker;" where, by the mere force of humour, housebreaking is put into so ridiculous a light, that if the piece has its proper run, I have no doubt but that bolts and bars will be entirely useless by the end of the season.

Dang. 'Egad, this is new indeed!

Sneer. Yes; it is written by a particular friend of mine, who has discovered that the follies and foibles of society are subjects unworthy the notice of the comic muse, who should be taught to stoop only at the greater vices and blacker crimes of humanity—gibbetting capital offences in five acts, and pillorying petty larcenies in two. In short, his idea is to dramatise the penal laws, and make the stage a court of ease to the Old Bailey.

Dang. It is truly moral.

Enter SERVANT.

Serv. Sir Fretful Plagiary, Sir.

Dang. Beg him to walk up.—[Exit SERVANT.] Now, Mrs. Dangle, Sir Fretful Plagiary is an author to your own taste.

Mrs. D. I confess he is a favourite of mine, because every body else abuses him.

Sneer. Very much to the credit of your charity, Madam, if not of your judgment.

Dang. But, 'egad, he allows no merit to any author but himself; that's the truth on't—though he's my friend.

Sneer. Never.—He is as envious as an old maid verging on the desperation of six and thirty: and then the insidious humility with which he seduces you to give a free opinion on any of his works, can be exceeded only by the petulant arrogance with which he is sure to reject your observations.

Dang. Very true, 'egad—though he's my friend.

Sneer. Then his affected contempt of all newspaper strictures; though, at the same time, he is the sorest man alive; and shrinks like scorched parchment from the fiery ordeal of true criticism.

Dang. There's no denying it—though he is my friend.

Sneer. You have read the tragedy he has just finished, haven't you?

Dang. O yes; he sent it to me yesterday.

Sneer. Well, and you think it execrable, don't you?

Dang. Why, between ourselves, 'egad, I must own—though he's my friend—that it is one of the most—He's here [Aside.—finished and most admirable perform—

Sir F. [Without.] Mr. Sneer with him, did you say?

Enter SIR FRETFUL.

Ah, my dear friend!—'Egad, we were just speaking of your tragedy.—Admirable, Sir Fretful, admirable!

Sneer. You never did any thing beyond it, Sir Fretful—never in your life.

Sir F. You make me extremely happy; for without a compliment, my dear Sneer, there isn't a man in the world whose judgment I value as I do yours—and Mr. Dangle's.

Mrs. D. They are only laughing at you, Sir Fretful; for it was but just now that—

Dang. Mrs. Dangle! Ah, Sir Fretful, you know Mrs. Dangle.—My friend Sneer was rallying just now—He knows how she admires you, and—

Sir F. O Lord, I am sure Mr. Sneer has more taste and sincerity than to—A damned double-faced fellow!

Dang. Yes, yes—Sneer will jest—but a better humoured—

Sir F. O, I know—

Dang. He has a ready turn for ridicule—his wit costs him nothing.—

Sir F. No, 'egad—or I should wonder how he came by it. [Aside.]

Dang. But, Sir Fretful, have you sent your play to the managers yet?—or can I be of any service to you?

Sir F. No, no, I thank you; I believe the piece had sufficient recommendation with it.—I thank you, though—I sent it to the manager of Covent-garden Theatre this morning.

Sneer. I should have thought now, that it might have been cast (as the actors call it) better at Drury-lane.

Sir F. O lud! no—never send a play there while I live—harkye!

Sneer. Writes himself!—I know he does—

Sir F. I say nothing—I take away from no man's merit—am hurt at no man's good fortune—I say nothing—But this I will say—through all my knowledge of life, I have observed—that there is not a passion so strongly rooted in the human heart as envy!

Sneer. I believe you have reason for what you say, indeed.

Sir F. Besides—I can tell you it is not always so safe to leave a play in the hands of those who write themselves.

Sneer. What, they may steal from them, hey, my dear Plagiary?

Sir F. Steal!—to be sure they may; and, 'egad, serve your best thoughts as gipsies do stolen children, disfigure them to make 'em pass for their own.

Sneer. But your present work is a sacrifice to Melpomene, and he, you know, never—

Sir F. That's no security.—A dexterous plagiarist may do any thing.—Why, Sir, for aught I know, he might take out some of the best things in my tragedy, and put them into his own comedy.

Sneer. That might be done, I dare be sworn.

Sir F. And then, if such a person gives you the least hint or assistance, he is devilish apt to take the merit of the whole—

Dang. If it succeeds.

Sir F. Ay,—but with regard to this piece, I think I can hit that gentleman, for I can safely swear he never read it.

Sneer. I'll tell you how you may hurt him more—

Sir F. How?—

Sneer. Swear he wrote it.

Sir F. Plague on't now, Sneer, I shall take it ill.—I believe you want to take away my character as an author!

Sneer. Then I am sure you ought to be very much obliged to me.

Sir F. Hey!—Sir!

Dang. O, you know, he never means what he says.

Sir F. Sincerely then—you do like the piece?

Sneer. Wonderfully!

Sir F. But come now, there must be something that you think might be mended, hey?—Mr. Dangle, has nothing struck you?

Dang. Why faith, it is but an ungracious thing for the most part to—

Sir F. With most authors it is just so; indeed; they are in general strangely tenacious!—But, for my part, I am never so well pleased as when a judicious critic points out any defect to me: for what is the purpose of showing a work to a friend, if you don't mean to profit by his opinion?

Sneer. Very true. Why then, though I seriously admire the piece upon the whole, yet there is one small objection; which, if you'll give me leave, I'll mention.

Sir F. Sir, you can't oblige me more.

Sneer. I think it wants incident.

Sir F. Good God!—you surprise me!—wants incident!—

Sneer. Yes; I own I think the incidents are too few.

Sir F. Good God!—Believe me, Mr. Sneer, there is no person for whose judgment I have a more implicit deference.—But I protest to you,

Mr. Sneer, I am only apprehensive that the incidents are too crowded.—My dear Dangle, how does it strike you?

Dang. Really I can't agree with my friend Sneer.—I think the plot quite sufficient; and the four first acts by many degrees the best I ever read or saw in my life. If I might venture to suggest any thing, it is that the interest rather falls off in the fifth.—

Sir F. Rises, I believe you mean, Sir.

Dang. No, I don't, upon my word.

Sir F. Yes, yes, you do, upon my soul—it certainly don't fall off, I assure you—No, no, it don't fall off.

Dang. Now, Mrs. Dangle, didn't you say it struck you in the same light?

Mrs. D. No, indeed, I did not—I did not see a fault in any part of the play from the beginning to the end.

Sir F. Upon my soul, the women are the best judges after all!

Mrs. D. Or, if I made any objection, I am sure it was to nothing in the piece! but that I was afraid it was, on the whole, a little too long.

Sir F. Pray, Madam, do you speak as to duration of time; or do you mean that the story is tediously spun out?

Mrs. D. O lud! no.—I speak only with reference to the usual length of acting plays.

Sir F. Then I am very happy—very happy, indeed—because the play is a short play, a remarkably short play: I should not venture to differ with a lady on a point of taste; but, on these occasions the watch, you know, is the critic.

Mrs. D. Then, I suppose, it must have been Mr. Dangle's drawing manner of reading it to me.

Sir F. O, if Mr. Dangle read it! that's quite another affair!—But I assure you, Mrs. Dangle, the first evening you can spare me three hours and a half, I'll undertake to read you the whole from beginning to end, with the prologue and epilogue, and allow time for the music between the acts.

Mrs. D. I hope to see it on the stage next.

Dang. Well, Sir Fretful, I wish you may be able to get rid as easily of the newspaper criticisms as you do of ours.—

Sir F. The newspapers! Sir, they are the most villainous—licentious—abominable—infernal—Not that I ever read them—No—I make it a rule never to look into a newspaper.

Dang. You are quite right—for it certainly must hurt an author of delicate feelings to see the liberties they take.

Sir F. No!—quite the contrary; their abuse is, in fact, the best panegyric—I like it of all things.—An author's reputation is only in danger from their support.

Sneer. Why that's true—and that attack now on you the other day—

Sir F. What? where?

Dang. Ay, you mean in a paper of Thursday; it was completely ill-natured to be sure.

Sir F. O, so much the better—Ha, ha, ha!—I wouldn't have it otherwise.

Dang. Certainly it is only to be laughed at; for—

Sir F. You don't happen to recollect what the fellow said, do you?

Sneer. Pray, Dangle—Sir Fretful seems a little anxious—

Sir F. O lud, no!—anxious,—not I,—not the least.—I—But one may as well hear, you know.

Dang. Sneer, do you recollect?—Make out something.

Sneer. I will. [To DANGLE.]—Yes, yes, I remember perfectly.

Sir F. Well, and pray now—Not that it signifies—what might the gentleman say?

Sneer. Why he roundly asserts that you have not the slightest invention or original genius whatever: though you are the greatest traducer of all other authors living.

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha!—very good!

Sneer. That as to comedy you have not one idea of your own, he believes, even in your common place-book, where stray jokes, and pilfered witticisms, are kept with as much method as the ledger of the lost-and-stolen-office.

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha!—very pleasant!

Sneer. Nay, that you are so unlucky as not to have the skill even to steal with taste.—But that you glean from the refuse of obscure volumes, where more judicious plagiarists have been before you; so that the body of your work is a composition of dregs and sediments—like a bad tavern's worst wine.

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha!

Sneer. In your more serious efforts, he says, your bombast would be less intolerable, if the thoughts were ever suited to the expression; but the homeliness of the sentiment stares through the fantastic encumbrance of its fine language, like a clown in one of the new uniforms.

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha!

Sneer. That your occasional tropes and flowers suit the general coarseness of your style, as tamber sprigs would a ground of linsey-woolsey; while your imitations of Shakspeare resemble the mimicry of Falstaff's page, and are about as near the standard of the original.

Sir F. Ha!—

Sneer. In short, that even the finest passages you steal are of no service to you; for the poverty of your own language prevents their assimilating! so that they lie on the surface like lumps of marl on a barren moor, encumbering what it is not in their power to fertilize!

Sir F. [After great agitation.]—Now another person would be vexed at this.

Sneer. Oh! but I wouldn't have told you, only to divert you.

Sir F. I know it—I am diverted.—Ha, ha, ha!—not the least invention!—Ha, ha, ha! very good!—very good!

Sneer. Yes—no genius! Ha, ha, ha!

Dang. A severe rogue! Ha, ha, ha! But you are quite right, Sir Fretful, never to read such nonsense.

Sir F. To be sure—for if there is any thing to one's praise, it is a foolish vanity to be gratified at it, and if it is abuse,—why one is always sure to hear of it from one damned good natured friend or another!

Enter SERVANT.

Serv. Mr. Puff, Sir, has sent word, that the last rehearsal is to be this morning, and that he'll call on you presently.

Dang. That's true—I shall certainly be at home. [Exit SERVANT.] Now, Sir Fretful, if you have a mind to have justice done you in the way of answer—'Egad, Mr. Puff's your man.

Sir F. Pshaw! Sir, why should I wish to have it answered, when I tell you I am pleased at it?

Dang. True, I had forgot that.—But I hope you are not fretted at what Mr. Sneer—

Sir F. Zounds! no, Mr. Dangle, don't I tell you these things never fret me in the least.

Dang. Nay, I only thought—

Sir F. And let me tell you, Mr. Dangle, 'tis damned affronting in you to suppose that I am hurt, when I tell you I am not.

Sneer. But why so warm, Sir Fretful?

Sir F. Gadslife! Mr. Sneer, you are as absurd as Dangle; how often must I repeat it to you, that nothing can vex me but your supposing it possible for me to mind the damned nonsense you have been repeating to me!—and let me tell you, if you continue to believe this, you must mean to insult me, gentlemen—and then your disrespect will affect me no more than the newspaper criticisms—and I shall treat it—with exactly the same calm indifference and philosophic contempt—and so your servant. [Exit.]

Sneer. Ha, ha, ha. Poor Sir Fretful! Now will he go and vent his philosophy in anonymous abuse of all modern critics and authors—But, Dangle, you must get your friend Puff to take me to the rehearsal of his tragedy.

Dang. I'll answer for't, he'll thank you for desiring it.—P'faith, Sneer, though, I am afraid we were a little too severe on Sir Fretful—though he is my friend.

Sneer. Why, 'tis certain, that unnecessarily to mortify the vanity of any writer, is a cruelty which mere dulness never can deserve; but where a base and personal malignity usurps the place of literary emulation, the aggressor neither deserves quarter nor pity.

Dang. That's true, 'egad!—though he's my friend!

Enter SERVANT.

Serv. Mr. Puff, Sir!

Dang. My dear Puff!

Enter PUFF.

Puff. My dear Dangle, how is it with you?

Dang. Mr. Sneer, give me leave to introduce Mr. Puff to you.

Puff. Mr. Sneer is this? Sir, he is a gentleman whom I have long panted for the honour of knowing—a gentleman whose critical talents and transcendent judgment—

Sneer. Dear Sir—

Dang. Nay, don't be modest, Sneer, my friend Puff only talks to you in the style of his profession.

Sneer. His profession!

Puff. Yes, Sir; I make no secret of the trade I follow—among friends and brother authors, Dangle knows I love to be frank on the subject, and to advertise myself viva voce.—I am, Sir, a practitioner in panegyric, or to speak more plainly—a professor of the art of puffing, at your service—or any body else's.

Sneer. Sir, you are very obliging!—I believe, Mr. Puff, I have often admired your talents in the daily prints.

Puff. Yes, Sir, I flatter myself I do as much business in that way as any six of the fraternity in town—Devilish hard work all the summer—Friend Dangle! never worked harder!—But harkye,—the winter managers were a little sore, I believe.

Dang. No—I believe they took it all in good part.

Puff. Ay!—Then that must have been affection in them; for, 'egad, there were some of the attacks which there was no laughing at.

Sneer. Ay, the humorous ones.—But I should think, Mr. Puff, that authors would in general be able to do this sort of work for themselves.

Puff. Why, yes—but in a clumsy way.—Besides, we look on that as an encroachment, and so take the opposite side.—I dare say now you conceive half the very civil paragraphs and advertisements you see, to be written by the parties concerned, or their friends.—No such thing—Nine out of ten, manufactured by me in the way of business.

Sneer. Indeed!—

Puff. Even the auctioneers now—the auctioneers, I say, though the rogues have lately got some credit for their language—not an article of the merit theirs!—take them out of their pulpits, and they are as dull as catalogues!—No, Sir;—'twas I first enriched their style—'twas I first taught them to crowd their advertisements with panegyrical superlatives, each epithet rising above the other—like the bidders in their own auction-rooms! From me they learned to inlay their phraseology with variegated chips of exotic metaphor: by me too their inventive faculties were called forth.—Yes, Sir, by me they were instructed to clothe ideal walls with gratuitous fruits—to insinuate obsequious rivulets into visionary groves—to teach courteous shrubs to nod their approbation of the grateful soil! or on emergencies to raise upstart oaks, where there never had been an acorn; to create a delightful vicinage without the assistance of a neighbour; or fix the temple of Hygeia in the fens of Lincolnshire!

Dang. I am sure you have done them infinite service; for now, when a gentleman is ruined, he parts with his house with some credit.

Sneer. But pray, Mr. Puff, what first put you on exercising your talents in this way?

Puff. 'Egad, Sir—sheer necessity—the proper parent of an art so nearly allied to invention: you must know, Mr. Sneer, that from the first time I tried my hand at an advertisement, my success was such, that for some time after, I led a most extraordinary life indeed!

Sneer. How, pray?

Puff. Sir, I supported myself two years entirely by my misfortunes.

Sneer. By your misfortunes?

Puff. Yes, Sir, assisted by long sickness, and other occasional disorders; and a very comfortable living I had of it.

Sneer. From sickness and misfortunes!

Puff. Harkye! By advertisements, "To the charitable and humane!" and "To those whom Providence hath blessed with affluence!"

Sneer. Oh,—I understand you.

Puff. And, in truth, I deserved what I got; for I suppose never man went through such a series of calamities in the same space of time.—Sir, I was five times made a bankrupt, and reduced from a state of affluence, by a train of unavoidable misfortune! then, Sir, though a very industrious tradesman, I was twice burnt out, and lost my little all, both times!—I lived upon those fires a month.—I soon after was confined by a most excruciating disorder, and lost the use of my limbs!—That told very well; for I had the case strongly attested, and went about collecting the subscriptions myself.

Dang. 'Egad, I believe that was when you first called on me—

Puff. What—in November last?—O no!—I was, when I called on you, a close prisoner in the Marshalsea, for a debt benevolently contracted to serve a friend!—I was afterwards twice tapped for a dropsy, which declined into a very profitable consumption!—I was then reduced to—O no—then, I became a widow with six helpless children,—after having had eleven husbands pressed, and being left every time eight months gone with child, and without money to get me into an hospital!

Sneer. And you bore all with patience, I make no doubt?

Puff. Why, yes,—though I made some occasional attempts at felo de se; but, as I did not find those rash actions answer, I left off killing myself very soon.—Well, Sir,—at last, what with bankruptcies, fires, gout, dropsies, imprisonments, and other valuable calamities, having got together a pretty handsome sum, I determined to quit a business which had always gone rather against my conscience, and in a more liberal way still to indulge my talents for fiction and embellishment, through my favourite channels of diurnal communication—and so, Sir, you have my history.

Sneer. Most obligingly communicative, indeed; and your confession, if published, might certainly serve the cause of true charity, by rescuing the most useful channels of appeal to benevolence from the cant of imposition.—But surely, Mr. Puff, there is no great mystery in your present profession?

Puff. Mystery! Sir, I will take upon me to say the matter was never scientifically treated, nor reduced to rule before.

Sneer. Reduced to rule?

Puff. O lud, Sir! you are very ignorant, I am afraid.—Yes, Sir,—Puffing is of various sorts:—the principal are, the Puff direct—the Puff preliminary—the Puff collateral—the Puff collusive—and the Puff oblique, or Puff by implication.—These all assume, as circumstances require, the various forms of Letter to the Editor—Occasional Anecdote—Impartial Critique—Observation from Correspondent,—or Advertisement from the Party.

Sneer. The Puff direct I can conceive.

Puff. O yes, that's simple enough,—for instance—A new comedy or farce is to be produced at one of the theatres (though by the bye they don't bring out half what they ought to do:—) the author, suppose Mr. Smatter, or Mr. Dapper—or any particular friend of mine—very well; the day before it is to be performed, I write an account of the manner in which it was received—I have the plot from the author,—and only add—Characters strongly drawn—highly coloured—hand of a master—rund of genuine humour—mine of invention—neat dialogue—attic salt! Then for the performance—Mr. Dodd was astonishingly great in the character of Sir Harry! That universal and judicious actor, Mr. Palmer, perhaps never appeared more advantage than in the colonel; but it is not in the power of language to do justice to Mr. King.—Indeed he more than merited those repeated bursts of applause which he drew from a most brilliant and judicious audience! As to the scenery—The miraculous powers of Mr. De Louthburgh's pencil are universally acknowledged!—In short, we are at a loss which to admire most,—the unrivalled genius of the author, the great attention and liberality of the managers —the wonderful abilities of the painter, or the incredible exertions of all the performers!—

Sneer. That's pretty well, indeed, Sir.

Puff. O cool—quite cool—to what I sometimes do.

Sneer. And do you think there are any who are influenced by this?

Puff. O, lud! yes, Sir;—the number of those who undergo the fatigue of judging for themselves is very small indeed!

Sneer. Well, Sir—the Puff preliminary?

Puff. O that, Sir, does well in the form of a caution.—In a matter of gallantry now—Sir Flimsy Gossimer wishes to be well with Lady Fanny Fete.—He applies to me—I open trenches for him with a paragraph in the Morning Post.—It is recommended to the beautiful and accomplished Lady F four stars F dash E to be on her guard against that dangerous character, Sir F dash G; who, however pleasing and insinuating his manners may be, is certainly not remarkable for the constancy of his attachments!—in Italics.—Here you see, Sir Flimsy Gossimer is introduced to the particular notice of Lady Fanny—who perhaps never thought of him before—she finds herself publicly cautioned to avoid him, which naturally makes her desirous of seeing him;—the observation of their acquaintance causes a pretty kind of mutual embarrassment, this produces a sort of sympathy of interest—which, if Sir Flimsy is unable to improve effectually, he at least gains the credit of having their names mentioned together, by a particular set, and in a particular way,—which, nine times out of ten, is the full accomplishment of modern gallantry.

Dang. 'Egad, Sneer, you will be quite an adept in business.

Puff. Now, Sir, the Puff collateral is much used as an appendage to advertisements, and may take the form of anecdote.—Yesterday, as the celebrated George Bon-Mot was sauntering down St. James' street, he met the lively Lady Mary Myrtle, coming out of the Park.—“Good God, Lady Mary, I'm surprised to meet you in a white jacket,—for I expected never to have seen you, but in a full trimmed uniform and a light-horse man's cap!”—“Heavens, George, where could you have learned that?”—“Why,” replied the wit, “I just saw a print of you in a new publication called the Camp Magazine, which by the bye is a devilish clever thing,—and is sold at No. 3 on the right-hand of the way, two doors from the printing-office, the corner of Ivy-lane, Paternoster-row, price only one shilling!”

Sneer. Very ingenious, indeed!

Puff. But the Puff collusive is the newest of any; for it acts in the disguise of determined hostility.—It is much used by bold booksellers and enterprising poets.—An indignant correspondent observes—that the new poem called Beelzebub's Cotillon, or Proserpine's Fete Champêtre, is one of the most unjustifiable performances he ever read! The severity with which certain characters are handled is quite shocking! And as there are many descriptions in it too warmly coloured for female delicacy, the shameful avidity with which this piece is bought by all people of fashion, is a reproach on the taste of the times, and a disgrace to the delicacy of the age!—Here you see the two strongest inducements are held forth;—First, that nobody ought to read it;—and, secondly, that every body buys it: on the strength of which, the publisher boldly prints the tenth edition, before he had sold ten of the first; and then establishes it by threatening himself with the pillory, or absolutely indicting himself for scan. mag.!

Dang. Ha, ha, ha!—'egad, I know it is so.

Puff. As to the Puff oblique, or Puff by implication, it is too various and extensive to be illustrated by an instance; it branches into so many varieties, that it is the last principal class of the art of puffing.—An art which I hope you will now agree with me, is of the highest dignity.—

Sneer. Sir, I am completely a convert both to the importance and ingenuity of your profession; and now, Sir, there is but one thing which can possibly increase my respect for you, and that is your permitting me to be present this morning at the rehearsal of your new tragedy—

Puff.—Hush, for Heaven's sake.—My tragedy!—'Egad, Langle, I take this very ill—you know how apprehensive I am of being known to be the author.

Dang. I 'faith I would not have told—but it's in the papers, and your name at length—in the Morning Chronicle.

Puff. Ah! those damned editors never can keep a secret!—Well, Mr. Sneer—no doubt you will do me great honour—I shall be infinitely happy—highly flattered—

Dang. I believe it must be near the time—shall we go together?

Puff. No; it will not be yet this hour, for they are always late at that theatre: besides, I must meet you there, for I have some little matters here to send to the papers, and a few paragraphs to scribble before I go. [Looking at memorandums.]—Here is "a Conscientious Baker, on the Subject of the Army Bread;" and "a Detester of visible Brick-work, in favour of the new invented Stucco;" both in the style of Junius, and promised for to-morrow.—The Thames Navigation too is at a stand.—Misonud or Anti-shoal must go to work again directly.—Here too are some political memorandums, I see; ay—to take Paul Jones, and get the Indiamen out of the Shannon—reinforce Byron—compel the Dutch to—so! I must do that in the evening papers, or reserve it for the Morning Herald, for I know that I have undertaken to-morrow, besides, to establish the unanimity of the fleet in the Public Advertiser, and to shoot Charles Fox in the Morning Post.—'egad, I ha'n't a moment to lose!

Dang. Well!—we'll meet in the green-room.

[Exeunt severally.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The Theatre.

DANGLE, PUFF, and SNEER, as before the curtain.

Puff. No, no, Sir; what Shakspeare says of actors may be better applied to the purpose of plays; they ought to be "the abstract and brief chronicles of the times." Therefore when history, and particularly the history of our own country, furnishes any thing like a case in point, to the time in which an author writes, if he knows his own interest, he will take advantage of it; so, Sir, I call my tragedy The Spanish Armada; and have laid the scene before Tilbury Fort.

Sneer. A most happy thought, certainly!

Dang. 'Egad it was—I told you so.—But pray now I don't understand how you have contrived to introduce any love into it.

Puff. Love!—Oh nothing so easy: for it is a received point among poets, that where history gives you a good heroic outline for a play, you may fill up with a little love at your own discretion: in doing which, nine times out of ten, you only make up a deficiency in the private history of the times. Now I rather think I have done this with some success.

Sneer. No scandal about queen Elizabeth, I hope?

Puff. O, lud! no, no.—I only suppose the governor of Tilbury Fort's daughter to be in love with the son of the Spanish admiral.

Sneer. O, is that all?

Dang. Excellent, i'faith! I see it at once.—But won't this appear rather improbable?

Puff. To be sure it will—but what the plague! a play is not to show occurrences that happen every day, but things just so strange, that though they never did, they might happen.

Sneer. Certainly nothing is unnatural, that is not physically impossible.

Puff. Very true—and for that matter Don Ferolo Whiskerandos—for that's the lover's name, might have been over here in the train of the Spanish ambassador; or Tilburina, for that is the lady's name, might have been in love with him, from having heard his character, or seen his picture; or from knowing that he was the last man in the world she ought to be in love with—or for any other good female reason.—However, Sir, the fact is, that though she is but a knight's daughter, 'egad! she is in love like any princess!—her poor susceptible heart is swayed to and fro, by contending passions like—

Enter UNDER PROMPTER.

Under Prom. Sir, the scene is set, and every thing is ready to begin, if you please.—

Puff. 'Egad; then we'll lose no time.

Under Prom. Though I believe, Sir, you will find it very short, for all the performers have profited by the kind permission you gave them.

Puff. Hey! what!

Under Prom. You know, Sir, you gave them leave to cut out or omit whatever they found heavy or unnecessary to the plot; and I must own they have taken very liberal advantage of your indulgence.

Puff. Well, well.—They are in general very good judges; and I know I am luxuriant.—Now, Mr. Hopkins, as soon as you please.

Under Prom. to Music. Gentlemen, will you play a few bars of something, just to—Puff. Ay, that's right,—for as we have the scenes and dresses, 'egad, we'll go to't, as if it was the first night's performance;—[Exit UNDER PROMPTER; Orchestra play; then the bell rings.] Soh! stand clear, gentlemen.—Now you know there will be a cry of down!—down!—hats off!—silence!—Then, up curtain,—and let 'a see what our painters have done for us.

SCENE II.—Tilbury Fort.

Two SENTINELS asleep.

Dang. Tilbury Fort!—very fine indeed!

Puff. Now, what do you think I open with?

Sneer. Faith, I can't guess—

Puff. A clock—

Sneer. A clock!

Puff. Hark!—[Clock strikes.] I open with a clock striking, to beget an awful attention in the audience—it also marks the time, which is four o'clock in the morning, and saves a description of the rising sun, and a great deal about gilding the eastern hemisphere.

Dang. But, pray, are the sentinels to be asleep?

Puff. Fast as watchmen.

Sneer. Isn't that odd though at such an alarming crisis?

Puff. To be sure it is,—but smaller things must give way to a striking scene at the opening; that's a rule.—And the case is, that two great men are coming to this very spot to begin the piece; now, it is not to be supposed they would open their lips, if these fellows were watching them; so, 'egad, I must either have sent them off their posts, or set them asleep.

Sneer. O that accounts for it!—But tell us, who are these coming?

Puff. These are they—Sir Walter Raleigh, and Sir Christopher Hatton.—You'll know Sir Christopher, by his turning out his toes—famous you know for his dancing. I like to preserve all the little traits of character.—Now attend.

“Enter SIR WALTER RALEIGH and SIR CHRISTOPHER HATTON.

“Sir C. True, gallant Raleigh!”

Dang. What, they had been talking before?

Puff. O yes; all the way as they came along.—I beg pardon, gentlemen, [To the Actors.] but these are particular friends of mine, whose remarks may be of great service to us.—Don't mind interrupting them whenever any thing strikes you. [To SNEER and DANGLE.]

“Sir C. True, gallant Raleigh!

But O, thou champion of thy country's fame, There is a question which I yet must ask; A question, which I never ask'd before— What mean these mighty armaments? This general muster? and this throng of chiefs?”

Sneer. Pray, Mr. Puff, how came Sir Christopher Hatton never to ask that question before?

Puff. What, before the play began? how the plague could he?

Dang. That's true, i'faith!

Puff. But you will hear what he thinks of the matter.

“Sir C. Alas, my noble friend—”

Puff. Sir Christopher, pray turn out your toes. Sir Christopher Hatton was famous for dancing well.

“Sir C. When I behold

Yon tented plains in martial symmetry Array'd—When I count o'er yon glittering lines Of crested warriors,—

When briefly all I hear or see bears stamp Of martial vigilance, and stern defiance, I cannot but surmise,—forgive me, friend, If the conjecture's rash—I cannot but surmise—the state some danger apprehends!”

Sneer. A very cautious conjecture that.

Puff. Yes, that's his character; not to give an opinion, but on secure grounds—now then.

“Sir W. O, most accomplish'd Christopher.—”

Puff. He calls him by his Christian name, to show that they are on the most familiar terms.

“Sir W. O, most accomplish'd Christopher, I Thy fears are just. [find]

“Sir C. But where? whence? when? and what The danger is—Methinks I fain would learn.

“Sir W. You know, my friends, scarce two revolving suns,

VOL. I. . . 4 B

And three revolving moons, have closed their course,

Since haughty Philip, in despite of peace, With hostile hand hath struck at England's trade.

“Sir C. I know it well.

“Sir W. Philip, you know is proud Iberia's

“Sir C. He is. [king!]

“Sir W. —His subjects in base bigotry And Catholic oppression held—while we, You know, the Protestant persuasion hold.

“Sir C. We do. [ment,

“Sir W. You know besides—his boasted armada—The fam'd armada—by the pope baptized,

With purpose to invade these realms—

“Sir C. —Is sailed,

Our last advices so report. [hope,

“Sir W. While the Iberian admiral's chief

His darling son, by chance a pris'ner hath been

And in this fort of Tilbury— [ta'en,

“Sir C. —Is now

Confin'd.

“Sir W. You also know—”

Dang. Mr. Puff, as he knows all this, why does Sir Walter go on telling him?

Puff. But the audience are not supposed to know any thing of the matter, are they?

Sneer. True, but I think you manage ill: for there certainly appears no reason why Sir Walter should be so communicative.

Puff. 'Egad, now, that is one of the most ungrateful observations I ever heard; for the less inducement he has to tell all this, the more, I think, you ought to be obliged to him; for I am sure you'd know nothing of the matter without.

Dang. That's very true, upon my word.

Puff. But you will find he was not going on.

“Sir C. Enough, enough—'tis plain—and I no Am in amazement lost!—” [more]

Puff. Here, now you see, Sir Christopher did not in fact ask any one question for his own information.

Sneer. No indeed;—his has been a most disinterested curiosity!

Dang. Really, I find, we are very much obliged to them both.

Puff. To be sure, you are. Now then for the commander-in-chief, the earl of Leicester! who, you know, was no favourite but of the queen's— We left off—“in amazement lost!”

“Sir C. Am in amazement lost.

But, see where noble Leicester comes! supreme In honours and command.”

Sneer. But who are these with him?

Puff. O! very valiant knights; one is the governor of the fort, the other the master of the horse.—And now, I think, you shall hear some better language: I was obliged to be plain and intelligible in the first scene, because there was so much matter of fact in it; but now, i'faith, you have trope, figure, and metaphor, as plenty as noun substantives.

“Enter EARL OF LEICESTER, the GOVERNOR, and others.

“Leic. How's this, my friend! is't thus your new-fledg'd zeal

And plumed valour moulds in roosted sloth?

Can the quick current of a patriot heart,

Thus stagnate in a cold and weedy converse,

Or freeze in tideless inactivity?

No! rather let the fountain of your valour

Spring through each stream of enterprise,

Each petty channel of conducive daring ;
Till the full torrent of your foaming wrath
O'erwhelm the flats of sunk hostility !

"Sir C. No more! the fresh'ning breath of thy rebuke

Hath fill'd the swelling canvass of our souls !
And thus, though fate should cut the cable of
Our topmost hopes, in friendship's closing line

[Take hands.]

We'll grapple with despair, and if we fall,
We'll fall in glory's wake.

"Leic. There spoke old England's genius !

Then, are we all resolved !

"All. We are—all resolved !

"Leic. To conquer—or be free ?

"All. To conquer—or be free.

"Leic. All ?

"All. All."

Dang. Nem. con. 'egad !

Puff. O yes, where they do agree on the stage, their unanimity is wonderful !

"Leic. Then, let's embrace—and now——"

Sneer. What the plague, is he going to pray ?

Puff. Yes, hush!—in great emergencies, there is nothing like a prayer !

"Leic. O mighty Mars!—"

Puff. Stop, my dear Sir, you don't expect to find Mars there. No, Sir, whenever you address the gods, always look into the one-shilling gallery.

"Leic. O mighty Mars!—"

Dang. Why should he pray to Mars ?

Puff. Hush !

"Leic. O mighty Mars! if in thy homage bred,
Each point of discipline, I've still observ'd,
Nor but by due promotion, and the right
Of service, to the rank of major-general
Have ris'n ; assist thy votary now !

"Gov. Yet do not rise——hear me !

"Master of Horse. And me !

"Knight. And me !

"Sir W. And me !

"Sir C. And me !"

Puff. And me ! Now, mind your hits, pray all together.

"All. Behold thy votaries submissive beg,
That thou wilt deign to grant them all they ask——"

Puff. Give 'em a longer all, next time.

"All. Assist them to accomplish all their ends,
And sanctify whatever means they use
To gain them !"

Sneer. A very orthodox quintetto !

Puff. Vastly well, gentlemen.—Is that well managed or not ? have you such a prayer as that on the stage ?

Sneer. Not exactly.

Leic. [To Puff.] But, Sir, you haven't settled how we are to get off here.

Puff. You could not get off kneeling, could you ?

Sir W. [To Puff.] O no, Sir ! impossible !

Puff. It would have a good effect, if faith, if you could exeunt praying!—Yes, and would vary the established mode of springing off with a glance at the pit. Just try.

Sneer. O never mind, so as you get them off,
I'll answer for it the audience wont care how.

Puff. Well then, repeat the last line standing, and go off the old way.

"All. And sanctify whatever means we use to gain them." [Exeunt.]

Dang. Bravo ! a fine exit.

Sneer. Stay a moment.—

[The SENTINELS get up.]

"1 Sent. All this shall to Lord Burleigh's ear.

"2 Sent. 'Tis meet it should.

[Exeunt SENTINELS.]

Dang. Hey, why I thought those fellows had been asleep.

Puff. Only a pretence, there's the art of it :
they were spies of Lord Burleigh's. Take care, my dear Dangle, the morning gun is going to fire.

Dang. Well, that will have a fine effect.

Puff. I think so, and helps to realize the scene.
—[Cannon three times.] What the plague!—

three morning guns!—there never is but one!—
ay, this is always the way at the theatre—give these fellows a good thing, and they never know when to have done with it. You have no more cannon to fire ?

Prom. [From within.] No, Sir.

Puff. Now then, for soft music.

Sneer. Pray what's that for ?

Puff. It shows that Tilburina is coming ; nothing introduces you a heroine like soft music.—
Here she comes.

Dang. And her confidante, I suppose ?

Puff. To be sure : here they are—inconsolable, to the minuet in Ariadne ! [Soft music.]

"Enter TILBURINA and CONFIDANTE.

"Til. Now flowers unfold their beauties to the sun, [them.]

And, blushing, kiss the beam he sends to wake
The striped carnation, and the guarded rose,
The vulgar wallflower, and smart gillyflower,
The polyanthus mean—the dapper daisy,
Sweet-William, and sweet marjoram,—and all
The tribe of single and of double pinks !
Now too, the feather'd warblers tune their notes Around, and charm the listening grove—The lark ! [greensfinch.]

The linnet! chaffinch! bullfinch! goldfinch!
—But, oh, to me, no joy can they afford !
Nor rose, nor wallflower, nor smart gillyflower,
Nor polyanthus mean, nor dapper daisy,
Nor William sweet, nor marjoram—nor lark,
Linnet, nor all the finches of the grove !"

Puff. Your white handkerchief, Madam—
Til. I thought, Sir, I wasn't to use that till "heart rending wo."

Puff. O yes, Madam—at "the finches of the grove," if you please.

"Til. Nor lark,

Linnet, nor all the finches of the grove ! [Weeps.]

Puff. Vastly well, Madam !

Dang. Vastly well, indeed !

"Til. For, O too sure, heart rending wo is The lot of wretched Tilburina !" [now]

Dang. O !—'tis too much.

Sneer. Oh !—it is indeed.

"Con. Be comforted, sweet lady—for who knows, [store.]

But Heaven has yet some milk-white day in
"Til. Alas, my gentle Nora,

Thy tender youth, as yet, hath never mourn'd
Love's fatal dart.

"Con. But see where your stern father comes ;
It is not meet that he should find you thus."

Puff. Hey, what the plague ! what a cut is here!—why, what is become of the description of her first meeting with Don Whiskerandos ? his gallant behaviour in the sea-fight, and the simile of the canary bird ?

Til. Indeed, Sir, you'll find they will not be miss'd.

Puff. Very well.—Very well!

Til. The cue, Ma'am, if you please.

Gov. It is not meet that he should find you thus

Til. Thou counsel'st right, but 'tis no easy For barefac'd grief to wear a mask of joy.

"Enter GOVERNOR.

Gov. How's this—in tears?—O Tilburina, shame!

Is this a time for maudling tenderness,
And Cupid's baby woes!—hast thou not heard
That haughty Spain's pope-consecrated fleet
Advances to our shores, while England's fate,
Like a clipp'd guinea, trembles in the scale!

Til. Then is the crisis of my fate at hand!

I see the fleet's approach,—I see—"

Puff. Now pray, gentlemen, mind.—This is one of the most useful figures we tragedy writers have, by which a hero or heroine, in consideration of their being often obliged to overlook things that are on the stage, is allowed to hear and see a number of things that are not.

Sneer. Yes—a kind of poetical second-sight!

Puff. Yes—now then, Madam.

Til. I see their decks

Are clear'd!—I see the signal made!
The line is form'd!—a cable's length asunder!
I see the frigates station'd in the rear;
And now I hear the thunder of the guns!
I hear the victor's shouts—I also hear
The vanquish'd groans!—and now 'tis smoke
—and now

I see the loose sails shiver in the wind!

I see—I see—what soon you'll see—

Gov. Hold, daughter! peace! this love hath turn'd thy brain:

The Spanish fleet thou canst not see—because——It is not yet in sight!"

Dang. 'Egad though, the governor seems to make no allowance for this poetical figure you talk of.

Puff. No, a plain matter-of-fact man—that's his character.

Til. But will you then refuse his offer?

Gov. I must—I will—I can—I ought—I do.

Til. His liberty is all he asks."

Sneer. All who asks, Mr. Puff? Who is—

Puff. 'Egad, Sir, I can't tell—Here has been such cutting and slashing, I don't know where they have got to, myself.

Til. Indeed, Sir, you will find it will connect very well.

Puff. Oh,—if they hadn't been so devilish free with their cutting here, you would have found that Don Whiskerandos has been tampering for his liberty—and now pray observe the conciseness with which the argument is conducted. 'Egad, the pro and con goes as smart as hits in a fencing match. It is indeed a sort of small-sword logic, which we have borrowed from the French.

Til. A retreat in Spain!

Gov. —Outlawry here!

Til. Your daughter's prayer!

Gov. —Your father's oath!

Til. My lover!

Gov. —My country!

Til. Tilburina!

Gov. —England!

Til. A title!

Gov. —Honour!

Til. A pension!

Gov. —Conscience!

Til. A thousand pounds!

Gov. Hah! thou hast touched me nearly!"

Puff. There you see—she threw in Tilburina. Quick, parry carte with England!—Hah! thrust in tierce, a title! parried by honour.—Hah! a pension over the arm! put by, by conscience.—Then flanconade with a thousand pounds—and a palpable hit, 'egad!

Til. Canst thou—

Reject the suppliant, and the daughter too?

Gov. No more; I would not hear thee plead in vain,

The father softens—but the governor

Is fix'd! [Exit.

Til. 'Tis well,—hence then, fond hopes,—fond passion, hence;

Duty, behold, I am all over thine— [my—

Whisk. [Without.] Where is my love—

Til. —Ha!

Whisk. [Entering.] My beauteous enemy—

My conquering Tilburina? How! is't thus
We meet? why are thy looks averse? what means
That falling tear—that frown of boding wo?

Hah! now indeed I am a prisoner!

Yes, now I feel the galling weight of these

Disgraceful chains—which, cruel Tilburina!

Thy doting captive gloried in before.—

But thou art false, and Whiskerandos is undone!

Til. O no; how little dost thou know thy Tilburina!

Whisk. Art thou then true? Be gone, cares, doubts, and fears,

I make you all a present to the winds;

And if the winds reject you—try the waves."

Puff. The wind, you know, is the established receiver of all stolen sighs, and cast-off griefs and apprehensions.

Til. Yet must we part?—stern duty seals
our doom: [witness,

Though here I call you conscious clouds to

Could I pursue the bias of my soul,

All friends, all right of parents, I'd disclaim,

And thou, my Whiskerandos, should be father,

And mother, brother, cousin, uncle, aunt,

And friend to me! [we part?

Whisk. O matchless excellence!—and must

Well, if—we must—we must—and in that

The less is said the better." [case

Puff. Hey-day! here's a cut!—What, are all the mutual protestations out?

Til. Now pray, Sir, don't interrupt us just here, you ruin our feelings.

Puff. Your feelings!—but zounds, my feelings,
Ma'am!

Whisk. One last embrace.—

Til. Now,—farewell, for ever.

Whisk. For ever!

Til. Ay, for ever. [Going.

Puff. 'Sdeath and fury!—Gads-life! Sir! Madam, if you go out without the parting look, you might as well dance out—Here, here!

Gov. But pray, Sir, how am I to get off here?

Puff. You, pshaw! what the devil signifies how you get off! edge away at the top, or where you will—[Pushes the CONFIDANTE off.] Now,
Ma'am, you see—

Til. We understand you, Sir.

Gov. —England!

Til. A title!

Gov. —England!

"Both. Oh!—"

[Turning back and exeunt; scene closes.

Dang. O charming!

Puff. Hey!—'tis pretty well, I believe—you see, I don't attempt to strike out any thing new—but I take it I improve on the established modes. So, now for the under plot.

Sneer. What the plague, have you another plot?

Puff. O Lord, yes—ever while you live, have two plots to your tragedy.—The grand point in managing them, is only to let your under plot have as little connexion with your main plot as possible.—Now, Mr. Hopkins, as soon as you please.

Enter UNDER PROMPTER.

Under Prom. Sir, the carpenter says it is impossible you can go to the park-scene yet.

Puff. The park-scene! No—I mean the description scene here, in the wood.

Under Prom. Sir, the performers have cut it out.

Puff. Cut it out?

Under Prom. Yes, Sir.

Puff. What! the whole account of queen Elizabeth?

Under Prom. Yes, Sir.

Puff. And the description of her horse and side-saddle?

Under Prom. Yes, Sir.

Puff. So, so, this is very fine indeed! Mr. Hopkins, how the plague could you suffer this?

Hop. [From within.] Sir, indeed, the pruning-knife—

Puff. The pruning-knife—zounds, the axe! why, here has been such lopping and topping, I sha'n't have the bare trunk of my play left presently.—Very well, Sir—the performers must do as they please; but, upon my soul, I'll print it every word.

Sneer. That I would, indeed.

Puff. So! this is a pretty dilemma, truly!—Gentlemen—you must excuse me, these fellows will never be ready, unless I go and look after them myself.

Sneer. O dear Sir—these little things will happen—

Puff. To cut out this scene!—but I'll print it—egad, I'll print it every word! [Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—Before the Curtain.

Enter PUFF, SNEER, and DANGLE.

Puff. Well, we are ready—now then for the justices.

Curtain rises; JUSTICES, CONSTABLES, &c. discovered.

Sneer. This, I suppose, is a sort of senate scene?

Puff. Yes.—What, gentlemen, do you mean to go at once to the discovery scene?

Just. If you please, Sir.

Puff. O very well—harkye, I don't choose to say any thing more, but, i'faith, they have mangled my play in a most shocking manner!

Dang. It's a great pity!

Puff. Now then, Mr. Justice, if you please.

Just. Are all the volunteers without?

Const. They are,

Some ten in fetters, and some twenty drunk.

Just. Attends the youth, whose most opprobrious fame [soldier?]

And clear convicted crimes have stamp'd him

Const. He waits your pleasure, eager to repay The bless'd reprieve that sends him to the fields Of glory, there to raise his branded hand In honour's cause.

Just. 'Tis well—

If 'tis your worship's pleasure, bid him enter.

Const. I fly, the herald of your will.

[Exit CONST.]

Puff. Quick, Sir!

Sneer. But, Mr. Puff, I think not only the justice, but the clown, seems to talk in as high a style as the first hero among them.

Puff. Heaven forbid they should not, in a free country!—Sir, I am not for making slavish distinctions, and giving all the fine language to the upper sort of people.

Dang. That's very noble in you, indeed.

Enter JUSTICE'S LADY.

Lady. Forgive this interruption, good my love;

But, as I just now pass'd a pris'n'er youth, Whom rude hands hither lead, strange bodings seiz'd

My fluttering heart, and to myself I said, An' if our Tom had liv'd, he'd surely been This stripling's height! [rects

Just. Ha! sure some powerful sympathy divides both—

Enter SON and CONSTABLE.

What is thy name? [I none; Son. My name's Tom Jenkins—alias, have Though orphan'd, and without a friend!

Just. Thy parents? [was,

Son. My father dwelt in Rochester—and As I have heard—a fishmonger—no more."

Puff. What, Sir, do you leave out the account of your birth, parentage, and education?

Son. They have settled it so, Sir, here.

Puff. Oh! oh!

Lady. Had he no other name?

Son. I've seen a bill

Of his, sign'd Tomkins, creditor.

Just. This does indeed confirm each circumstance the gipsy told!—Prepare! [stance

Son. I do.

Just. No orphan, nor without a friend, art thou—

I am thy father, here's thy mother, there Thy uncle—this thy first cousin, and those Are all your near relations!

Mother. O ecstasy of bliss!

Son. O most unlook'd for happiness!

[They faint alternately in each others' arms.]

Puff. There, you see relationship, like murder, will out.

Just. Now, let's revive—else were this joy too much!

But come—and we'll unfold the rest within, And thou, my boy, must needs want rest and food. Hence may each orphan hope, as chance directs, To find a father—where he least expects!

[Exeunt.]

Puff. What do you think of that?

Dang. One of the finest discovery scenes I ever saw.—Why, this under plot would have made a tragedy itself.

Sneer. Ay, or a comedy either.

Puff. And keeps quite clear, you see, of the other.

Enter SCENEMAN, taking away the seats.

Puff. The scene remains, does it ?

Scenem. Yes, Sir.

Puff. You are to leave one chair, you know.—But it is always awkward in a tragedy, to have you fellows coming in, in your playhouse liveries, to remove things—I wish that could be managed better.

“Enter a BEEFEATER.”

“Beef. Perdition catch my soul, but I do love thee.”

Sneer. Haven't I heard that line before ?

Puff. No, I fancy not—Where, pray ?

Dang. Yes, I think there is something like it in Othello.

Puff. 'Gad ? now you put me in mind on't, I believe there is—but that 's of no consequence—all that can be said is, that two people happened to hit on the same thought—and Shakspeare made use of it first, that 's all.

Sneer. Very true.

Puff. Now, Sir, your soliloquy—but speak more to the pit, if you please—the soliloquy always to the pit—that 's a rule.

“Beef. Though hopeless love finds comfort in despair,

It never can endure a rival's bliss!

But soft—I am observ'd. [Exit BEEFEATER.”

Dang. That 's a very short soliloquy.

Puff. Yes—but it would have been a great deal longer, if he had not been observed.

Sneer. A most sentimental beefeater that, Mr. Puff.

Puff. Harkye—I would not have you be too sure he is a beefeater.

Sneer. What, a hero in disguise ?

Puff. No matter—I only give you a hint—But now for my principal character—Here he comes—Lord Burleigh in person ! Pray, gentlemen, step this way—softly—if he is but perfect !

Enter BURLEIGH, goes slowly to the chair, and sits.

Sneer. Mr. Puff !

Puff. Hush ! vastly well, Sir ! vastly well ! a most interesting gravity !

Dang. What, isn't he to speak at all ?

Puff. 'Egad, I thought you'd ask me that—yes, it is a very likely thing—that a minister in his situation, with the whole affairs of the nation on his head, should have time to talk !—but, hush ! or you'll put him out.

Sneer. Put him out ! how the plague can that be, if he 's not going to say any thing ?

Puff. There 's a reason ! why his part is to think, and how the plague do you imagine he can think if you keep talking ?

Dang. That 's very true, upon my word !

[BURLEIGH comes forward, shakes his head, and exits.

Sneer. He is very perfect, indeed—Now, pray what did he mean by that ?

Puff. You don't take it ?

Sneer. No ; I don't, upon my soul.

Puff. Why, by that shake of the head, he gave you to understand that even though they had more justice in their cause, and wisdom in their measures—yet, if there was not a greater spirit shown on the part of the people—the country would at last fall a sacrifice to the hostile ambition of the Spanish monarchy.

Sneer. The devil !—did he mean all that by shaking his head ?

Puff. Every word of it—If he shook his head as I taught him.

Sneer. O, here are some of our old acquaintance.

“Enter HATTON and RALEIGH.”

“Sir C. My niece, and your niece too ?

By heaven ! there 's witchcraft in't—He could not else

Have gain'd their hearts. But see where they approach ;

Some horrid purpose low'ring on their brows !

“Sir W. Let us withdraw, and mark them.

[Withdraw.”

Sneer. What is all this ?

Puff. Ah ! here has been more pruning !—but the fact is, these two young ladies are also in love with Don Whiskerandos.—Now, gentlemen, this scene goes entirely for what we call situation and stage effect, by which the greatest applause may be obtained, without the assistance of language, sentiment, or character : pray, mark !

“Enter the two NIECES.”

“1 Niece. Ellena here !

But see the proud destroyer of my peace.

Revenge is all the good I've left. [Aside.

“2 Niece. He comes, the false disturber of my quiet.

Now, vengeance, do thy worst— [Aside.

“Enter WHISKERANDOS.”

“Whisk. O hateful liberty—if thus in vain I seek my Tilburina !

“Both Nieces. And ever shalt !

“[Sir C. and Sir W. come forward.] Hold ! we will avenge you.

“Whisk. Hold you—or see your nieces bleed.—

“[The two Nieces draw their two daggers to strike Whiskerandos, the two Uncles at the instant with their two swords drawn catch their two Nieces' arms, and turn the points of their swords to Whiskerandos, who immediately draws two daggers, and holds them to the two Nieces' bosoms.]”

Puff. There 's situation for you ! there 's an heroic group !—you see the ladies can't stab Whiskerandos—he durst not strike them for fear of their uncles—the uncles durst not kill him because of their nieces—I have them all at the dead lock !—for every one of them is afraid to let go first.

Sneer. Why, then they must stand there for ever.

Puff. So they would, if I hadn't a very fine contrivance for't—Now mind—

“Enter BEEFEATER, with his halberd.”

“Beef. In the queen's name, I charge you all to drop

Your swords and daggers !

[They drop their swords and daggers.”

Sneer. This is a contrivance indeed.

Puff. Ay—in the queen's name.

“Sir C. Come, niece !

“Sir W. Come, niece !

[Exeunt with the two NIECES

"Whisk. What's he, who bids us thus renounce our guard?"

"Beef. Thou must do more—renounce thy love!

"Whisk. Thou liest—base beefeater!

"Beef. Ha! Hell! the lie.

By Heaven, thou'st rous'd the lion in my heart!

Off, yeoman habit!—base disguise! off! off!

[Discovers himself, by throwing off his upper dress, and appearing in a very fine waistcoat.

Am I a beefeater now?

Or beams my crest as terrible, as when In Biscay's Bay I took thy captive sloop?"

Puff. There, egad! he comes out to be the very captain of the privateer who had taken Whiskerandos prisoner—and was himself an old lover of Tilburina's.

Dang. Admirably managed, indeed.

Puff. Now, stand out of the way.

"Whisk. I thank thee, fortune! that hast thus bestow'd

A weapon to chastise this insolent.

[Takes up one of the swords.

"Beef. I take thy challenge, Spaniard, and I thank Thee, fortune, too!—[Takes up the other sword.

"Whisk. Vengeance and Tilburina!

"Beef. Exactly so—

[They fight, and after the usual number of wounds given, WHISKERANDOS falls.

"Whisk. O cursed parry!—that last thrust in tierce

Was fatal!—Captain, thou hast fenced well!

And Whiskerandos quits this bustling scene

For all eter—

"Beef. —nity—he would have added, but stern death

Cut short his being, and the noun, at once!"

Puff. O my dear Sir, you are too slow; now mind me.—Sir, shall I trouble you to die again?

"Whisk. And Whiskerandos quits this bustling scene

For all eter—

"Beef. —nity—he would have added—"

Puff. No, Sir—that's not it—once more, if you please.

Whisk. I wish, Sir—you would practise this without me—I can't stay dying here all night.

Puff. Very well, we'll go over it by and by—I must humour these gentlemen.

[Exit WHISKERANDOS.

"Beef. Farewell—brave Spaniard, and when next—"

Puff. Dear Sir, you needn't speak that speech, as the body has walked off.

Beef. That's true, Sir—then I'll join the fleet.

Puff. If you please. [Exit BEEFEATER.] Now, enter Tilburina, stark mad, in white satin.

Sneer. Why in white satin?

Puff. O Lord, Sir—when a heroine goes mad, she always goes into white satin—don't she, Dangle?

Dang. Always—it's a rule.

Puff. Yes—here it is—[Looking at the book.] enter Tilburina, stark mad in white satin, and her confidante stark mad in white linen.

Enter TILBURINA and CONFIDANTE mad, according to custom.

Sneer. But what the deuce, is the confidante to be mad too?

Puff. To be sure, she is: the confidante is always to do whatever her mistress does; weep when she weeps, smile when she smiles, go mad when she goes mad.—Now, Madam Confidante—but keep your madness in the back ground, if you please.

"Til. The wind whistles—the moon rises—see

They have kill'd my squirrel in his cage!

Is this a grasshopper?—Ha! no, it is my Whiskerandos—you shall not keep him—I know you have him in your pocket—An oyster may be cross'd in love!—Who says A whale's a bird!—Ha! did you call, my love?—He's here! He's there!—He's every where!

Ah me! He's no where! [Exit TILBURINA.]

Puff. There, do you ever desire to see any body madder than that?

Sneer. Never, while I live! And pray what becomes of her?

Puff. She is gone to throw herself into the sea, to be sure—and that brings us at once to the scene of action, and so to my catastrophe—my sea-fight, I mean.

Sneer. What, you bring that in at last?

Puff. Yes—yes—you know my play is called the Spanish Armada, otherwise, 'egad, I have no occasion for the battle at all.—Now then for my magnificence,—my battle!—my noise!—and my procession!—You are all ready?

Prom. [Within.] Yes, Sir.

Puff. Is the Thames dressed?

"Enter THAMES, with two Attendants.

"Thames. Here I am, Sir."

Puff. Very well, indeed—See, gentlemen, there's a river for you!

Sneer. But, pray, who are these gentlemen in green with him?

Puff. Those?—those are his banks.

Sneer. His banks?

Puff. Yes, one crowned with alders, and the other with a villa!—you take the allusions? but, hey! what the plague! you have got both your banks on one side—Here, Sir, come round—Ever while you live, Thames, go between your banks. [Bell rings.]—There, soh! now for!—Stand aside, my dear friends!—away, Thames!

[Exit THAMES, between his banks.

[Flourish of drums, trumpets, cannon, &c. &c.—scene changes to the sea—the fleets engage—the music plays "Britons, strike Home."—Spanish fleet destroyed by fire ships, &c.—English fleet advances—music plays "Rule Britannia."—The procession of all the English rivers and their tributaries, with their emblems, &c. begins with Handel's water-music, ends with a chorus, to the march in Judas Maccabæus.—During this scene, Puff directs and applauds every thing—then Puff. Well, pretty well—but not quite perfect—so, ladies and gentlemen, if you please, we'll rehearse this piece again to-morrow.

O R O O N O K O :

A TRAGEDY,

IN FIVE ACTS.

BY THOMAS SOUTHERN.

REMARKS.

THE circumstance on which the better part of this drama is founded, is said to have actually occurred during the reign of Charles II. at Surinam, where an African prince, entrapped by the "mild subjects of a Christian king and a Christian government," was brought and sold to slavery.

Oroonoko excites the warmest sympathy of his auditors; his love for Imoinda is tender, manly, noble, and unpolled; his firmness and resolution, truly heroic.

The loose and trivial nature of the comic characters, in which Southern has unfortunately yielded to the corrupt taste of the age wherein he wrote, has hitherto prevented the attraction of this play; but the talents of Mr. Kean, and the judicious alterations now made, are likely to procure it an ample share of public favour

ACT I.

SCENE I.

Enter CHARLOTTE WELDON, in man's clothes, following LUCY.

Lucy. What will this come to? what can it end in? you have persuaded me to leave dear England, and dearer London, the place of the world most worthy living in, to follow you, a husband-hunting, into America: I thought husbands grew in these plantations.

Char. Why so they do, as thick as oranges ripening one under another. Week after week they drop into some woman's mouth. 'Tis but a little patience, spreading your apron in expectation, and one of 'em will fall into your lap at last.

Lucy. Ay, say you so, indeed?

Char. But you have left dear London, you say pray what have you left in London that was very dear to you, that had not left you before?

Lucy. Speak for yourself, sister.

Char. Nay, I'll keep you in countenance. The young fellows, you know, the dearest part of the town, and without whom London had been a wilderness to you and me, had forsaken us a great while.

Lucy. Forsaken us! I don't know that ever they had us.

Char. Forsaken us the worst way, child; that is, did not think us worth having; they neglected us, no longer designed upon us, they were tired of us. Women in London are like the rich silks they are out of fashion a great while before they wear out—

Lucy. The devil take the fashion, I say.

Char. You may tumble them over and over at their first coming up, and never disparage their price; but they fall upon wearing immediately, lower and lower in their value, till they come to the broker at last. To prevent which, with what youth and beauty, were left some experience, and the small remainder of fifteen hundred pounds a piece, which amounted to bare two hundred between us both, I persuaded you to bring your person for a venture to the Indies. Every thing has succeeded in our voyage: I pass for your brother; one of the richest planters here happening to die just as we landed, I have claimed kindred with him: so without making his will, he has left us the credit of his relation to trade upon: we pass for his cousins, coming here to Surinam chiefly upon his invitation; we live in reputation; have the best acquaintance in the place; and we shall see our account in't, I warrant you.

Lucy. I must rely upon you—

Enter WIDOW LACKITT.

Widow L. Mr. Weldon, your servant. Your servant, Mrs. Lucy, I am an ill visitor, but 'tis not too late, I hope, to bid you welcome to this side of this world. [Salutes LUCY.]

Char. 'Gad so, I beg your pardon, widow, I should have done the civilities of my house before: but, as you say, 'tis not too late, I hope—

[Going to kiss her.]

Widow L. What! you think now this was a civil way of begging a kiss; and by my troth, if it were, I see no harm in't; 'tis a pitiful favour indeed that is not worth asking for; though I have known a woman speak plainer before now, and not understood neither.

Char. Not under my roof. Have at you, widow—

Widow L. Why that's well said, spoke like a younger brother, that deserves to have a widow.— [Kisses her.] You're a younger brother, I know, by your kissing.

Char. How so, pray?

Widow L. Why, you kiss as if you expected to be paid for't. You stick so close, there's no getting rid of you.

Char. I am a-kin to a younger brother.

Widow L. So much the better: we widows are commonly the better for younger brothers.

Lucy. Better or worse, most of you. But you won't be much the better for him, I can tell you.

[Aside.]

Char. I was a younger brother; but an uncle of my mother's has maliciously left me an estate, and I'm afraid spoiled my fortune.

Widow L. No, no; an estate will never spoil your fortune; I have a good estate myself, thank Heaven, and a kind husband that left it behind him.

Char. Thank Heaven that took him away from it, widow, and left you behind him.

Widow L. Nay, Heaven's will must be done; 'e's in a better place.

Char. A better place for you, no doubt on't. Now you may look about you; choose for yourself, Mrs. Lackitt, that's your business; for I know you design to marry again.

Widow L. Nay, I'll do nothing rashly: I'll resolve against nothing. The devil, they say, is very busy upon these occasions, especially with the widows. But, if I am to be tempted, it must be with a young man, I promise you—Mrs. Lucy, your brother is a very pleasant gentleman: I came about business to him, but he turns every thing into merriment.

Char. Business, Mrs. Lackitt? Then I know you would have me to yourself. Pray, leave us together, sister. [Exit LUCY.] What am I drawing upon myself here? [Aside.] Widow L. You have taken a very pretty house here, every thing so neat about you already. I hear you are laying out for a plantation.

Char. Why, yes, truly, I like the country, and would buy a plantation, if I could, reasonably.

Widow L. O! by all means reasonably.

Char. If I could have one to my mind, I would think of settling among you.

Widow L. O! you can't do better. Indeed we can't pretend to have so good company for you as you had in England; but we shall make very much of you. For my own part, I assure you, I shall think myself very happy to be more particularly known to you.

Char. Dear Mrs. Lackitt, you do me too much honour.

Widow L. Then as to a plantation, Mr. Weldon, you know I have several to dispose of. Mr. Lackitt, I thank him, has left, though I say it, the richest widow upon the place; therefore I may afford to use you better than other people can. You shall have one upon any reasonable terms. Mr. Weldon: well, I like that name of yours exceedingly, Mr. Weldon.

Char. My name!

Widow L. O exceedingly! If any thing could persuade me to alter my own name, I verily believe nothing in the world would do it so soon, as to be called Mrs. Weldon.

Char. I'm glad you like my name.

Widow L. Of all things. But then there's the misfortune, one cannot change one's name without changing one's condition.

Char. You hardly think it worth that, I believe.

Widow L. Think it worth what, Sir? changing my condition! indeed, Sir, I think it worth every thing. But alas! Mr. Weldon, I have buried my poor dear husband but six weeks; poor dear creature, I loved him sincerely: 'tis too soon to think of changing one's condition yet; indeed it is: pray, don't desire it of me: not but that you may persuade me to any thing, sooner than any person in the world—

Char. Who, I, Mrs. Lackitt?

Widow L. Indeed you may, Mr. Weldon, sooner than any man living. Lord, there's a great deal in saving a decency: I never minded it before. Well, I am glad you spoke first, to excuse my modesty. Now I will own to you, (but I won't confess neither,) I have had a great respect for you a great while. I beg your pardon, Sir; and I must declare to you, indeed I must, if you desire to dispose of all I have in the world, in an honourable way, my fortune and person, if you won't understand me without telling you so, are both at your service, 'gad so! another time—

Enter STANMORE.

Stan. So, Mrs. Lackitt, your widowhood's wearing apace; I see which way 'tis going.

Weldon, you're a happy man. The women and their favours come home to you.

Widow L. A fiddle of favour, Mr. Stanmore; I am a lone woman, you know it, left in a great deal of business, and business must be followed or lost. I have several stocks and plantations upon my hands, and other things to dispose of, which Mr. Weldon may have occasion for.

Char. We were just upon the brink of a bargain, as you came in.

Stan. Let me drive it on for you.

Char. So you must, I believe, you or somebody for me.

Stan. I'll stand by you; I understand more of this business than you can pretend to.

Char. I don't pretend to it; 'tis quite out of my way indeed.

Stan. If the widow gets you to herself, she will certainly be too hard for you: I know her of old: she has no conscience in a corner; a very Jew in a bargain.

Char. Is this true, widow?

Widow L. Speak as you find, Mr. Weldon; I have offered you very fair! think upon't, and let me hear of you; the sooner the better, Mr. Weldon. [Exit.]

Stan. I assure you, my friend, she'll cheat you if she can.

Char. I don't know that, but I can cheat her if I will.

Stan. Cheat her! how?

Char. I can marry her; and then I am sure I have it in my power to cheat her.

Stan. Can you marry her?

Char. Yes, faith, so she says: her pretty person and fortune (which, one with the other, you know, are not contemptible) are both at my service.

Stan. Contemptible! very considerable, 'egad; very desirable; why, she's worth twenty thousand pounds, man; a clear estate: no charge upon't, but a boobily son: he indeed, was to have half; but his father begot him, and she breeds him up not to know or have more than she has a mind to.

Char. There's a great deal to be made of this— [Musing.]

Stan. A handsome fortune may be made on't, and I advise you to't by all means.

Char. To marry her! an old wanton witch! I hate her.

Stan. No matter for that: let her go to the devil for you. She'll cheat her son of a good estate for you; that's a perquisite of a widow's portion always.

Char. I have a design, and will follow her at least, till I have a pennyworth of the plantation.

Stan. I speak as a friend, when I advise you to marry her, for 'tis directly against the interest of my own family. My cousin Jack has be-laboured her a good while that way.

Char. What! honest Jack? I'll not hinder him. I'll give over the thoughts of her.

Stan. He'll make nothing on't; she does not care for him. I'm glad you have her in your power.

Char. I may be able to serve him.

Stan. Here's a ship come into the river; I was in hopes it had been from England.

Char. From England?

Stan. No; I was disappointed; I long to see this handsome cousin of yours: the picture you gave me of her has charmed me.

Char. You'll see whether it has flattered her or no, in a little time. If she be recovered of that illness that was the reason of her staying behind us, I know she will come with the first opportunity. We shall see her, or hear of her death.

Stan. We'll hope the best. The ships from England are expected every day.

Char. What ship is this?

Stan. A rover, a buccancer, a trader in slaves: that's the commodity we deal in, you know. If you have a curiosity to see our manner of marketting, I'll wait upon you.

Char. We'll take my sister with us. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—An open Place.

Enter LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR and BLANDFORD.

Lieut. There's no resisting your fortune, Blandford; you draw all the prizes.

Bland. I draw for our lord governor; you know his fortune favours me.

Lieut. I grudge him nothing this time; but if fortune had favoured me in the last sale, the fair slave had been mine; Clemene had been mine.

Bland. Are you still in love with her?

Lieut. Every day more in love with her.

Enter CAPTAIN DRIVER, teased and pulled about by WIDOW LACKITT and several PLANTERS, at one door; at another, CHARLOTTE WELDON, dressed in man's clothes, LUCY, STANMORE, and JACK STANMORE.

Widow L. Here have I six slaves in my lot, and not a man among them; all women and children; what can I do with 'em, captain?

1 Plan. I have all men in mine. Pray, captain, let the men and women be mingled together, for the good of the plantation.

2 Plan. Ay, ay, a man and a woman, captain, for the good of the plantation.

Capt. D. Let them mingle together, and be damned; what care I. Would you have me a pimp for the good of the plantation?

1 Plan. I am a constant customer, captain.

Widow L. I am always ready money to you, captain.

1 Plan. For that matter, mistress, my money is as ready as yours.

Widow L. Pray hear me, captain.

Capt. D. Look you, I have done my part by you; I have brought the number of slaves I bargained for; if your lots have not pleased you, you must draw again among yourselves.

3 Plan. I am contented with my lot.

4 Plan. I am very well satisfied.

3 Plan. We'll have no drawing again.

Widow L. Ay, but—

Capt. D. Do you hear, mistress? you may hold your tongue: for my part, I expect my money.

Widow L. Captain, nobody questions or scruples the payment: but I won't hold my tongue, 'tis too much to pray and pay too: one may speak for one's own, I hope.

Capt. D. Well, what would you say?

Widow L. I say, no more than I can make out.

Capt. D. Out with it, then.

Widow L. I say things have not been so fair carried as they might have been. How do I know but you have juggled together in my absence? You drew the lots before I came, I'm sure.

Capt. D. That's your own fault, mistress; you might have come sooner.

Widow L. Then here's a prince, as they say, among the slaves, and you set him down to go as a common man.

Capt. D. I'll warrant you.

Widow L. Sir, you're a scurvy fellow, to talk at this rate to me. If my husband were alive, gadsbodikins, you would not use me so. Marry come up here, who are you, I trow? You begin to think yourself a captain, forsooth, because we call you so. You forget yourself as fast as you can; but I remember you; I know you for a pitiful, paltry fellow, as you are, an upstart to prosperity; one that is but just come acquainted with cleanliness, and that never saw five shillings of your own without deserving to be hanged for 'em.

Lieut. She has given you a broadside, captain; you'll stand up to her.

Capt. D. Hang her, I'll come no nearer.

Widow L. By this good light, it would make a woman do a thing she never designed; marry again, though she were sure to repent it, and be revenged of such a—

Jack S. What's the matter, Mrs. Lackitt; can I serve you?

Widow L. No, no, you can't serve me: you are for serving yourself, I'm sure. Pray, go about your business. Lord! how can you be so troublesome; nay, so unconscionable, to think that every rich widow must throw herself away upon a young fellow that has nothing?

Star. Jack, you are answered, I suppose.

Jack S. I'll have another pluck at her.

Widow L. Mr. Weldon, I am a little disconcerted; but pray bring your sister to dine with me. 'Gads my life, I'm out of all patience with that pitiful fellow: my flesh rises at him; I can't stay in the place where he is. [Exit.]

Bland. Captain, you have used the widow very familiarly.

Capt. D. This is my way; I have no design, and therefore am not over civil. If she had ever a handsome daughter to wheedle her out of, or if I could make any thing of her booby son—

Char. I may improve that hint, and make something of him. [Aside.]

Lieut. She's very rich.

Capt. D. I am rich myself. She has nothing that I want; I have no leaks to stop. Old women are fortune-menders. I have made a good voyage, and would reap the fruits of my labour. We plough the deep, my masters, but our harvest is on shore. I am for a young woman.

Star. Look about, captain; there's one ripe, and ready for the sickle.

Capt. D. A woman, indeed. I will be acquainted with her: who is she?

Char. My sister, Sir.

Capt. D. Would I were a-kin to her; if she were my sister, she should never go out of the family.—What say you, mistress? you expect I should marry you, I suppose?

Lucy. I sha' n't be disappointed, if you don't. [Turns away.]

Char. She wont break her heart, Sir.

Capt. D. But I mean— [Follows her.]

Char. And I mean—[Goes between him and Lucy.] that you must not think of her without marrying.

Capt. D. I mean so too

Char. Why then your meaning's out.

Capt. D. You're very short.

Char. I will grow, and be taller for you.

Capt. D. I shall grow angry and swear.

Char. You'll catch no fish then.

Capt. D. I don't well know whether he designs to affront me or no.

Star. No, no, he's a little familiar; 'tis his way.

Capt. D. Say you so? nay, I can be as familiar as he, if that be it. Well, Sir, look upon me full. What say you? how do you like me for a brother-in-law?

Char. Why, yes, faith, you'll do my business, [Turning him about.] if we can agree about my sister's.

Capt. D. I don't know whether your sister will like me or not: I can't say much to her; but I have money enough: and if you are her brother, as you seem to be a-kin to her, I know that will recommend me to you.

Char. This is your market for slaves; my sister is a free woman, and must not be disposed of in public. You shall be welcome to my house, if you please; and, upon better acquaintance, if my sister likes you, and I like your offers—

Capt. D. Very well, Sir, I'll come and see her.

Lieut. Where are the slaves, captain? they are long a coming.

Bland. And who is this prince that's fallen to my lot for the lord-governor? Let me know something of him, that I may treat him accordingly: who is he?

Capt. D. He's the devil of a fellow, I can tell you; a prince every inch of him: you have paid dear enough for him for all the good he'll do you: I was forced to clap him in irons, and did not think the ship safe neither. You are in hostility with the Indians, they say; they threaten you daily: you had best have an eye upon him.

Bland. But who is he?

Lieut. And how do you know him to be a prince?

Capt. D. He is son and heir to the great king of Angola, a mischievous monarch in those parts, who, by his good will, would never let any of his neighbours be in quiet. 'Tis son was his general, a plaguy fighting fellow! I have formerly had dealings with him for slaves, which he took prisoners, and have got pretty roundly by him; but, the wars being at an end, and nothing more to be got by the trade of that country, I made bold to bring the prince along with me.

Lieut. How could you do that?

Bland. What! steal a prince out of his own country! impossible!

Capt. D. 'T was hard indeed; but I did it. You must know this Oroonoko—

Bland. Is that his name?

Capt. D. Ay, Oroonoko.

Lieut. Oroonoko.

Capt. D. Is naturally inquisitive about the men and manners of the white nations. Because I could give him some account of the other parts of the world, I grew very much into his favour: in return of so great an honour, you know, I could do no less, upon my coming away, than invite him on board me. Never having been in a ship, he appointed his time, and I prepared my entertainment. He came the next evening, as private as he could, with about some twenty along with rim. The punch went round, and as many of his attendants as would be dangerous, I sent dead drunk on shore; the rest we secured; and so you have the prince Oroonoko.

Bland. Unheard of villany!

Stan. Barbarous treachery!

Lieut. But, captain, methinks you have taken a great deal of pains for this prince Oroonoko; why did you part with him at the common rate of slaves?

Capt. D. Why, lieutenant-governor, I'll tell you, I did design to carry him to England, to have showed him there; but I found him troublesome upon my hands, and I'm glad I'm rid of him—Oh, oh, hark, they come.

Enter Black Slaves, men, women, and children, who pass across the Stage by two and two; ABOAN, and others of OROONOKO's attendants, two and two: OROONOKO last of all, in chains.

Lucy. Are all these wretches slaves?

Stan. All sold, they and their posterity, all slaves.

Lucy. O miserable fortune!

Bland. Most of them know no better; they were born so, and only change their masters. But a prince, born only to command, betrayed and sold, my heart drops blood for him.

Capt. D. Now, governor, here he comes; pray, observe him.

Oro. So, Sir, you have kept your word with me

Capt. D. I am a better Christian, I thank you, than to keep it with a heathen.

Oro. You are a Christian; be a Christian still. If you have any god that teaches you To break your word, I need not curse you more: Let him cheat you, as you are false to me. You faithful followers of my better fortune, We have been fellow-soldiers in the field;

[Embracing his friends.

Now we are fellow-slaves. This last farewell.

Be sure of one thing that will comfort us,

Whatever world we are next thrown upon

Cannot be worse than this.

[All the slaves go off, but OROONOKO.

Capt. D. You see what a horrible Pagan he is, governor; but I took care that none of his followers should be in the same lot with him, for fear they should undertake some desperate action, to the danger of the colony.

Oro. Live still in fear; it is the villain's curse, And will revenge my chains: fear even me, Who have no power to hurt thee. Nature abhors,

And drives thee out from the society, And commerce of mankind, for breach of faith.

Men live and prosper but in mutual trust,

A confidence of one another's truth:

That thou hast violated. I have done:

know my fortune, and submit to it.

Lieut. Sir, I am sorry for your fortune, and would help it if I could.

Bland. Take off his chains. You know your condition; but you are fallen into honourable lands: you are the lord-governor's slave, who will use you nobly: in his absence it shall be my care to serve you. [BLANDFORD applying to him.

Oro. I hear you, but I can believe no more.

Lieut. Captain, I'm afraid the world wont speak so honourably of this action of yours, as you would have them.

Capt. D. I have the money; let the world speak and be damned: I care not.

Oro. I would forget myself. Be satisfied.

[To BLANDFORD

I am above the rank of common slaves.

Let that content you. The Christian there that knows me,

For his own sake will not discover more.

Capt. D. I have other matters to mind. You have him, and much good may you do with your prince. [Exit; the PLANTERS pulling and staring at OROONOKO.

Bland. What would you have there? You stare as if you never saw a man before. Stand further off. [Turns them away.

Oro. Let them stare on.

I am unfortunate, but not ashamed

Of being so. No, let the guilty blush:

The white man that betray'd me. Honest black

Disdains to change its colour. I am ready:

Where must I go? Dispose me as you please.

I am not well acquainted with my fortune,

But must learn to know it better: so, I know you say,

Degrees make all things easy.

Bland. All things shall be easy.

Oro. Tear off this pomp, and let me know myself:

The slavish habit best becomes me now.

Hard fate, and whips, and chains, may overpower

The frail flesh, and bow my body down:

But there's another, nobler part of me,

Out of your reach, which you can never tame.

Bland. You shall find nothing of this wretchedness

You apprehend. We are not monsters all.

You seem unwilling to disclose yourself:

Therefore, for fear the mentioning your name

Should give you new disquiets, I presume

To call you Cæsar.

Oro. I am myself; but call me what you please.

Stan. A very good name, Cæsar.

Lieut. And very fit for his character.

Oro. Was Cæsar then a slave?

Lieut. I think he was; to pirates too. He was a great conqueror, but unfortunate in his friends—

Oro. His friends were Christians?

Bland. No.

Oro. No! that's strange.

Lieut. And murder'd by 'em.

Oro. I would be Cæsar then. Yet I will live.

Bland. Live to be happier.

Oro. Do what you will with me.

Bland. I will wait upon you, attend, and serve you. [Exit, with OROONOKO.

Lucy. Well, if the captain had brought this prince's country along with him, and would make me queen of it, I would not have him, after doing so base a thing.

Char. He's a man to thrive in the world, sister: he'll make you the better jointure.

Lucy. Hang him, nothing can prosper with him.

Stan. Inquire into the great estates, and you'll find most of them depend upon the same title of honesty; the men who raise them first, are most of the captain's principles.

Char. Ay, ay, as you say, let him be damned for the good of his family. Come, sister, we are invited to dinner.

Lieut. Stanmore, you dine with me. [Exeunt

ACT II.

SCENE I.—WIDOW LACKITT'S House.

Enter WIDOW LACKITT, and CHARLOTTE WELDON, in man's clothes.

Char. This is so great a favour, I don't know how to receive it.

Widow L. O dear Sir! you know how to receive, and how to return, a favour as well as any body, I don't doubt it; 'tis not the first you have had from our sex, I suppose.

Char. But this is so unexpected.

Widow L. Lord, how can you say so, Mr. Weldon? I wont believe you. Don't I know how handsome gentlemen expect every thing a woman can do for you? and by my troth you're in the right on't. I think one can't do too much for a handsome gentleman; and so you shall find it.

Char. I shall never have such an offer again, that's certain. What shall I do? I am mightily divided—Widow L. Divided, O dear! I hope not so, Sir. If I marry, truly, I expect to have you to myself.

Char. There's no danger of that, Mrs. Lackitt: I am divided in my thoughts: my father upon his death-bed obliged me to see my sister disposed of, before I married myself. 'Tis that sticks upon me.

Widow L. Is that all?

Char. All in all to me. The commands of a dying father, you know, ought to be obeyed.

Widow L. And so they may.

Char. Impossible, to do me any good.

Widow L. They sha'n't be your hindrance. You would have a husband for your sister, you say: he must be very well to pass too in the world, I suppose.

Char. I would not throw her away.

Widow L. Then marry her out of hand to the sea-captain you were speaking of.

Char. I was thinking of him, but 'tis to no purpose; she hates him.

Widow L. Does she hate him? nay, 'tis no matter, an impudent rascal as he is; I would not advise her to marry him.

Char. Can you think of nobody else?

Widow L. Let me see. Well, if I thought you would like of it, I have a husband for her. What do you think of my son?

Char. You don't think of it yourself.

Widow L. I protest but I do: I am in earnest, if you are: he shall marry her within this half hour, if you'll give your consent to it.

Char. I give my consent! I'll answer for my sister, she shall have him: you may be sure I shall be glad to get over the difficulty.

Widow L. No more to be said then, that difficulty is over: but I vow and swear you frightened me, Mr. Weldon. If I had not had a son now for your sister, what must I have done, do you think? Were not you an ill-natured thing, to boggle at a promise? I could break twenty for you.

Char. I am the more obliged to you; but this son will save all.

Widow L. He's in the house; I'll go and bring him myself. [Going.] You would do well to break the business to your sister. She's within, I'll send her to you— [Going again, comes back.]

Char. Pray do.

Widow L. But, d'you hear? perhaps she may stand upon her maidenly behaviour, and blush, and play the fool, and delay; but don't be answered so. What! she is not a girl at these years. Show your authority, and tell her roundly, she must be married immediately. I'll manage my son, I warrant you—

[Exit hastily] Char. The widow's in haste, I see: I thought! I had laid a rub in the road, about my sister; but she has stepped over that. She's making way for herself as fast as she can; but little thinks where she is going. I could tell her she is going to play the fool; but people don't love to hear of their faults: besides, that is not my business at present.

Enter LUCY.

So, sister, I have a husband for you—

Lucy. With all my heart. I don't know what confinement marriage may be to the men, but I'm sure the women have no liberty without it. I'm for any thing that will deliver me from the care of a reputation, which I begin to find impossible to preserve.

Char. I'll ease you of that care. You must be married immediately.

Lucy. The sooner the better; for I'm quite tired of setting up for a husband. The widow's foolish son is the man, I suppose?

Char. I considered your constitution, sister; and, finding you would have occasion for a fool, I have provided accordingly.

Lucy. I don't know what occasion I may have for a fool when I'm unmarried; but I find none but fools have occasion to marry.

Char. Since he is to be a fool then, I thought it better for you to have one of his mother's making than your own; 'twill save you the trouble.

Lucy. I thank you; you take a great deal of pains for me; but, pray, tell me what you are doing for yourself all this while?

Char. You are never true to your own secrets, and therefore I wont trust you with mine. Only remember this, I am your eldest sister, and consequently, laying my breeches aside, have as much occasion for a husband as you can have. I have a man in my eye, be satisfied.

Enter WIDOW LACKITT, with her son DANIEL.

Widow L. Come, Daniel, hold up thy head, child; look like a man: you must not take it as you have done. 'Gads my life! there's nothing to be done with twirling your hat, man.

Dan. Why, mother, what's to be done then?

Widow L. Why, look me in the face, and mind what I say to you.

Dan. Marry, who's the fool then? What shall I get by minding what you say to me?

Widow L. Mrs. Lucy, the boy is bashful, don't discourage him; pray come a little forward, and let him salute you.

[Going between LUCY and DANIEL.]

Lucy. A fine husband I am to have, truly.

[To CHARLOTTE.]

Widow L. Come, Daniel, you must be acquainted with this gentlewoman.

Dan. Nay, I'm not proud, that is not my fault: I am presently acquainted when I know the company; but this gentlewoman is a stranger to me.

Widow L. She is your mistress: I have spoke a good word for you; make her a bow, and go and kiss her.

Dan. Kiss her! have a care what you say; I warrant she scorns your words. Such fine folks are not used to be slopp'd and kiss'd. Do you think I don't know that, mother?

Widow L. Try her, try her, man. [DANIEL bows, she thrusts him forward.] Why, that's well done; go nearer her.

Dan. Is the devil in the woman? Why, so I can go nearer her, if you would let a body alone. [To his mother.] Cry your mercy, forsooth; my mother is always shaming one before company; she would have me as unmannerly as herself, and offer to kiss you. [To Lucy.]

Char. Why, wont you kiss her?

Dan. Why, pray, may I?

Char. Kiss her, kiss her, man.

Dan. Marry, and I will. [Kisses her.] Gad-zooks, she kisses rarely! An' please you, mistress, and seeing my mother will have it so, I don't much care if I kiss you again, forsooth.

[Kisses her again.]

Lucy. Well, how do you like me now?

Dan. Like you! marry, I don't know; you have bewitched me, I think: I was never so in my born days before.

Widow L. You must marry this fine woman, Daniel.

Dan. Hey-day! marry her! I was never married in all my life. What must I do with her then, mother?

Widow L. You must live with her, eat and drink with her, and sleep with her.

Dan. Nay, marry, I shall never sleep, that's certain; she'll break me of my rest, quite and clean, I tell you beforehand. As for eating and drinking with her, why I have a good stomach, and can play my part in any company. But how do you think I can go to bed to a woman I don't know?

Char. You shall know her better.

Dan. Say you so, Sir?

Char. Kiss her again. [DANIEL kisses LUCY.]

Dan. Nay, kissing I find will make us presently acquainted. We'll steal into a corner to practise a little, and then I shall be able to do any thing.

Char. The young man mends apace.

Dan. Mother, mother, if you'll stay in the room by me, and promise not to leave me, I don't care for once if I venture to go to bed with her.

Widow L. There's a good child, go in and put on thy best clothes; pluck up a spirit, I'll stay in the room by thee. She wont hurt thee, I warrant thee.

Dan. Nay, as to that matter, I'm not afraid of her. I'll give her as good as she brings. I have a Rowland for her Oliver, and so thou may tell her. [Exit.]

Widow L. Mrs. Lucy we sha' n't stay for you: you are in readiness, I suppose?

Char. She is always ready to do what I would have her, I must say that for my sister.

Widow L. 'Twill be her own another day, Mr. Weldon; we'll marry 'em out of hand, and then—

Char. And then Mrs. Lackitt, look to yourself— [Exit.]

Enter OROONOKO and BLANDFORD.

Oro. You know my story, and you say you are A friend to my misfortunes: that's a name Will teach you what you owe yourself and me.

Bland. I'll study to deserve to be your friend. When once our noble governor arrives, With him you will not need my interest; He is too generous not to feel your wrongs. But, be assur'd, I will employ my power, And find the means to send you home again.

Oro. I thank you, Sir.—My honest, wretched friends! [Sighing.]

Their chains are heavy: they have hardly found So kind a master. May I ask you, Sir, What is become of them? Perhaps I should not. You will forgive a stranger.

Bland. I'll inquire; And use my best endeavours, where they are, To have 'em gently us'd.

Oro. Once more I thank you. You offer every cordial that can keep My hopes alive, to wait a better day. What friendly care can do, you have applied: But, oh! I have a grief admits no cure.

Bland. You do not know, Sir—

Oro. Can you raise the dead? Pursue and overtake the wings of time? And bring about again the hours, the days, The years that made me happy?

Bland. That is not to be done.

Oro. No, there is nothing to be done for me.

[Kneels and kisses the earth.]

Thou God ador'd! thou ever-glorious sun! If she be yet on earth, send me a beam Of thy all-seeing power to light me to her; Or, if thy sister goodness has preferr'd Her beauty to the skies, to be a star, O, tell me where she shines, that I may stand Whole nights, and gaze upon her.

Bland. I am rude, and interrupt you.

Oro. I am troublesome: But pray give me your pardon. My swol'n heart Bursts out its passage, and I must complain, (O! can you think of nothing dearer to me; Dearer than liberty, my country, friends, Much dearer than my life?) that I have lost The tend'rest, best beloved, and loving wife.

Bland. Alas! I pity you.

Oro. Do pity me.

Pity's a-kin to love; and every thought Of that soft kind is welcome to my soul. I would be pitied here.

Bland. I dare not ask

More than you please to tell me; but, if you Think it convenient to let me know Your story, I dare promise you to bear A part in your distress, if not assist you.

Oro. Thou honest-hearted man! I wante! such,

Just such a friend as thou art, that would sit Still as the night, and let me talk whole days Of my Iminda. O! I'll tell thee all From first to last! and pray observe me well.

Bland. I will, most heedfully.

Oro. There was a stranger in my father's court,

Valu'd and honour'd much: he was a white, The first I ever saw of your complexion. He chang'd his god for ours, and so grew great; Of many virtues, and so fam'd in arms, He still commanded all my father's wars: I was bred under him. One fatal day, The armies joining, he before me stepp'd, Receiving in his breast a poison'd dart, Levell'd at me; he dy'd within my arms. I've tir'd you already.

Bland. Pray, go on.

Oro. He left an only daughter, whom he brought

An infant to Angola. When I came Back to the court, a happy conqueror,
Humanity oblig'd me to condole
With this sad virgin for a father's loss,
Lost for my safety. I presented her
With all the slaves of battle, to atone
Her father's ghost. But, when I saw her face,
And heard her speak, I offer'd up myself
To be the sacrifice. She bow'd and blush'd;
I wonder'd and ador'd. The sacred power,
That had subdu'd me, then inspir'd my tongue,
Inclin'd her heart, and all our talk was love.

Bland. Then you were happy.

Oro. Oh! I was too happy.

I married her: and, though my country's custom
Indulg'd the privilege of many wives,
I swore myself never to know but her.
O, my Imoinda! But it could not last.
Her fatal beauty reach'd my father's ears:
He sent for her to court, where, curs'd court!
No woman comes but for his amorous use.
He, raging to possess her, she was forc'd
To own herself my wife. The furious king
Started at incest; but, grown desperate,
Not daring to enjoy what he desir'd,
In mad revenge (which I could never learn)
He poison'd her, or sent her far, far off,
Far from my hopes ever to see her more.

Bland. Most barbarous of fathers! the sad tale
Has struck me dumb with wonder.

Oro. I have done.

I'll trouble you no further: now and then
A sigh will have its way; that shall be all.

Enter STANMORE.

Stan. Blandford, the lieutenant-governor is gone to your plantation. He desires you would bring the royal slave with you. The sight of his fair mistress, he says, is an entertainment for a prince. He would have his opinion of her.

Oro. Is he a lover?

Bland. So he says himself. He flatters a beautiful slave that I have, and calls her mistress.

Oro. Must he then flatter her, to call her mistress?

I pity the proud man, who thinks himself
Above being in love. What, though she be a slave,

She may deserve him.

Bland. You shall judge of that when you see her, Sir.

Oro. I go with you. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Plantation.

Enter IMOINDA, followed by the LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR.

Lieut. I have disturb'd you. I confess my faults

My fair Clemene; but begin again,
And I will listen to your mournful song,
Sweet as the soft complaining nightingale's.
Sing, sing again,
And let me wonder at the many ways
You have to ravish me.

Imo. Oh, I can weep

Enough for you and me, if that will please you.

Lieut. You must not weep: I come to dry your tears,

And raise you from your sorrow. I may take
This pretty hand: I know your modesty
Would draw it back: but you would take it ill
If I should let it go.

[She struggles, and gets her hand from him; then he offers to kiss her.]

Nay, if you struggle with me, I must take—

Imo. You may—my life, that I can part with freely. [Exit]

Enter BLANDFORD, STANMORE, and OROONOKO

Bland. So, governor, we don't disturb you, I hope?

Your mistress has left you. You were making love.

She's thankful for the honour I suppose.

Lieut. Quite insensible to all I say, and do.

When I speak to her, she sighs, or weeps,
But never answers me as I would have her.

Stan. There's something nearer than her slavery, that touches her.

Bland. What do her fellow-slaves say of her?
Can't they find the cause?

Lieut. Some of them, who pretend to be wiser than the rest, and hate her, I suppose, for being used better than they are, will needs have it that she is with child.

Bland. Poor wretch! if it be so, I pity her.
She has lost a husband, that perhaps was dear
To her, and then you cannot blame her.

Oro. If it be so, indeed, you cannot blame her.
[Sighing.]

Lieut. No, no, it is not so. If it be so,
I must still love her; and, desiring still,
I must enjoy her.

Bland. Try what you can do with fair means, and welcome.

Lieut. I'll give you ten slaves for her.

Bland. You know, she is our lord-governor's; but, if I could dispose of her, I would not now, especially to you.

Lieut. Why not to me?

Bland. I mean, against her will. You are in love with her;

And we all know what your desires would have.
Love stops at nothing but possession.

Were she within your power, you do not know
How soon you would be tempted to forget
The nature of the deed, and, may be, act
A violence you after would repent.

Oro. 'Tis godlike in you to protect the weak.

Lieut. Fly, fy, I would not force her. Though she be

A slave, her mind is free, and should consent.

Oro. Such honour will engage her to consent:
And then, if you're in love, she's worth the having.

Shall we not see the wonder?

Lieut. Have a care;

You have a heart, and she has conquering eyes.

Oro. I have a heart; but, if it could be false
To my first vows, ever to love again,
These honest hands should tear it from my breast,

And throw the traitor from me. O! Imoinda!
Living or dead, I can be only thine.

Bland. Imoinda was his wife; she's either dead,

Or, living, dead to him; forc'd from his arms

By an inhuman father. Another time

I'll tell you all. [To LIEUT. and STAN.; exeunt.]

SCENE III.

Slaves, men, women, and children, discovered upon the ground; some rise and dance.

During the entertainment, enter the LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR, BLANDFORD, STANMORE, and OROONOKO, as spectators; that ended, enter CAPTAIN DRIVER, JACK STANMORE, and several PLANTERS, with their swords drawn. Drums beat; bells ring.

Capt. D. Where are you, governor? Make what haste you can

To save yourself and the whole colony. I bid 'em ring the bell.

Lieut. What 's the matter?

Jack S. The Indians are come down upon us; they have plundered some of the plantations already, and are marching this way as fast as they can.

Lieut. What can we do against them?

Bland. We shall be able to make a stand till more planters come into us.

Jack S. There are a great many more without, if you would show yourself, and put us in order.

Lieut. There 's no danger of the white slaves, they'll not stir. Blandford and Stanmore, come you along with me. Some of you stay here to look after the black slaves.

[All go out but the CAPTAIN and six Planters, who all at once seize OROONOKO.]

1 Plan. Ay, ay, let us alone.

Capt. D. In the first place we secure you, Sir, as an enemy to the government.

Oro. Are you there, Sir? You are my constant friend.

1 Plan. You will be able to do a great deal of mischief.

Capt. D. But we shall prevent you: bring the irons hither. He has the malice of a slave in him, and would be glad to be cutting his masters' throats. I know him. Chain his hands and feet, that he may not run over to 'em. If they have him, they'll carry him on their backs, that I can tell 'em.

As they are chaining him, re-enter BLANDFORD, who runs to them.

Bland. What are you doing there?

Capt. D. Securing the main chance: this is a bosom enemy.

Bland. Away, you brutes: I'll answer with my life for his behaviour; so tell the governor.

Capt. D. & 1 Plan. Well, Sir, so we will.

[Exit CAPTAIN and PLANTERS.]

Oro. Give me a sword, and I'll deserve your trust.

A party of Indians enter, hurrying IMOINDA among the slaves; another party of Indians sustains them retreating, followed at a distance by the LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR, with the Planters: BLANDFORD and OROONOKO join them.

Bland. Hell and the devil! they drive away our slaves before our faces. Governor, can you stand tamely by, and suffer this? Clemene, Sir, your mistress, is among 'em.

Lieut. We throw ourselves away in the attempt to rescue them.

Oro. A lover cannot fall more glorious, Than in the cause of love. He, that deserves

His mistress' favour, will not stay behind. I'll lead you on; be bold, and follow me.

[OROONOKO, at the head of the Planters, falls upon the Indians, with a great shout, and beats them off.]

Enter IMOINDA.

Imo. I'm toss'd about by my tempestuous fate. And no where must have rest. Indians, or English!

Whoever has me, I am still a slave. No matter whose I am, since I'm no more My royal master's; since I'm his no more. O, I was happy! nay, I will be happy In the dear thought that I am still his wife, Though far divided from him. [Retires.]

Re-enter LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR, OROONOKO, BLANDFORD, STANMORE, and Planters.

Lieut. Thou glorious man! thou something greater sure

Than Cæsar ever was! that single arm Has sav'd us all: accept our general thanks.

[All bow to OROONOKO.]
And what can we do more to recompense Such noble services, you shall command. Clemene too shall thank you—she is safe— Look up, and bless your brave deliverer.

[Brings IMOINDA forward, looking down on the ground.]

Oro. Bless, me, indeed!

Bland. You start!

Oro. O all you gods,

Who govern this great world, and bring about Things strange and unexpected! can it be?

Lieut. What is't you stare at so?

Oro. Answer me some of you, you who have power,

And have your senses free: or are you all Struck through with wonder too?

[Looking still fixedly on IMOINDA.]

Bland. What would you know?

Oro. My soul steals from my body through my eyes;

All that is left of life I'll gaze away.

And die upon the pleasure.

Lieut. This is strange!

Oro. If you but mock me with her image here: If she be not Imoinda—

[She looks upon him and falls into a swoon; he runs to her.]

Ha! She faints!

Nay, then, it must be she: it is Imoinda!

My heart confesses her, and leaps for joy

To welcome her to her own empire here.

[Kisses her.]

Imoinda! Oh! thy Oroonoko calls.

Imo. [Coming to life.] My Oroonoko! Oh! I can't believe

What any man can say. But, if I am To be deceiv'd, there 's something in that name, That voice, that face— [Stares at him.]
O! if I know myself, I cannot be mistaken.

[Embraces him]

Oro. Never here:

You cannot be mistaken: I am yours,

Your Oroonoko, all that you would have,

Your tender, loving husband.

Imo. All indeed

That I would have: my husband! then I am

Alive, and waking to the joys I feel:

They were so great, I could not think 'em true.

For truth itself, and everlasting love,
Grows in this breast, and pleasure in these arms.

Oro. Take, take me all: inquire into my heart.
(You know the way to ev'ry secret there,)

My near, the sacred treasury of love:
And if, in absence, I have misemploy'd
A mite from the rich store; if I have spent
A wish, a sigh, but what I sent to you;
May I be curs'd to wish and sigh in vain,
And you not pity me.

Imo. O! I believe,
And know you by myself. If these sad eyes,
Since last we parted, have beheld the face
Of any comfort, or once wish'd to see
The light of any other heaven but you,
May I be struck this moment blind, and lose
Your blessed sight, never to find you more.

Oro. Imoinda! O! this separation
Has made you dearer, if it can be so,
Than you were ever to me. You appear
Like a kind star to my benighted steps,
To guide me on my way to happiness:
I cannot miss it now. Governor, friend,
You think me mad: but let me bless you all,
Who any way have been the instruments
Of finding her again. Imoinda's found!
And ev'ry thing that I would have in her.

[Embraces her, with the most passionate fondness.]

Stan. Where's your mistress now, governor?

Lieut. Why, where most men's mistresses are forced to be sometimes; with her husband, it seems.—But I won't lose her so. [Aside.]

Stan. He has fought lustily for her, and deserves her: I'll say that for him.

Bland. Sir, we congratulate your happiness:
I do most heartily.

Lieut. And all of us: but how it comes to pass—

Oro. That will require
More precious time than I can spare you now.
I have a thousand things to ask of her,
And she as many more to know of me.
But you have made me happier, I confess,
Acknowledge it, much happier, than I
Have words or power to tell you. Captain, you,
E'en you, who most have wrong'd me, I forgive.
I will not say you have betray'd me now:
I'll think you but the minister of fate,
To bring me to my lov'd Imoinda here. [worthy]

Imo. How, how shall I receive you? how be
Of such endearments, all this tenderness?
These are the transports of prosperity,
When fortune smiles upon us.

Oro. Let the fools
Who follow fortune, live upon her smiles;
All our prosperity is plac'd in love,
We have enough of that to make us happy.
This little spot of earth you stand upon,
Is more to me than the extended plains
Of my great father's kingdom. Here I reign
In full delights, in joys to power unknown:
Your love my empire, and your heart my throne.
[Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.

Enter ABOAN, with several SLAVES, and HOTMAN.

Hot. What! to be slaves to cowards! slaves to rascals, who can't defend themselves!

Abou. Who is this fellow? He talks as if he were acquainted with our design: is he one of us?

[Aside to his own gang.]
I Slave. Not yet; but he will be glad to make one, I believe.

Abou. He makes a mighty noise.

Hot. Go, sneak in corners, whisper out your griefs, [crouch]

For fear your masters hear you: cringe and
Under the bloody whip, like beaten curs,
That lick their wounds, and know no other cure.
All, wretches all! you feel their cruelty,
As much as I can feel, but dare not groan.
For my part, while I have a life and tongue,
I'll curse the authors of my slavery.

Abou. Have you been long a slave?

Hot. Yes, many years.

Abou. And do you only curse?

Hot. Curse! only curse! I cannot conjure,
To raise the spirits up of other men:
I am but one. O! for a soul of fire,
To warm and animate our common cause,
And make a body of us; then I would
Do something more than curse.

Abou. That body set on foot, you would be
A limb, to lend it motion? [one]

Hot. I would be

The heart of it; the head, the hand, and heart:
Would I could see the day!

Abou. You will do all yourself.

Hot. I would do more

Than I shall speak; but I may find a time—

Abou. The time may come to you; be ready for't.

Methinks he talks too much; I'll know him more
Before I trust him further. [Aside.]

I Slave. If he dares

Half what he says, he'll be of use to us.

Enter BLANDFORD.

Bland. If there be any one among you here
That did belong to Oroonoko, speak
I come to him.

Abou. I did belong to him; Abouan my name.

Bland. You are the man I want; pray come with me. [Exeunt.]

Enter OROONOKO and IMOINDA.

Oro. I do not blame my father for his love;
But when I think on his barbarity,
That could expose you to so many wrongs;
Driving you out to wretched slavery,
Only for being mine; then I confess
I wish I could forget the name of son,
That I might curse the tyrant.

Imo. I will bless him,
For I have found you here: heaven only knows
What is reserv'd for us: but, if we guess
The future by the past, our fortune must
Be wonderful; it must be in extremes:
Extremely happy, or extremely wretched.

Oro. 'Tis in our power to make it happy now.

Imo. But not to keep it so.

Re-enter BLANDFORD and ABOAN.

Bland. My royal lord!

I have a present for you.

Oro. Abouan!

Abou. Your lowest slave.

Oro. My tried and valued friend

[To BLANDFORD]
This worthy man always prevents my wants:

I only wish'd, and he has brought thee to me.
Thou art surpris'd: carry thy duty there,

[ABOAN goes to IMOINDA, and falls at her feet.]

While I acknowledge mine. How shall I thank you?
[To BLANDFORD.]

Bland. Believe me honest to your interest,
And I am more than paid. I have secur'd
That all your followers shall be gently us'd,
Shall wait upon your person, while you stay
Among us.

Oro. I owe every thing to you.

Bland. You must not think you are in slavery.

Oro. I do not find I am.

Bland. Kind Heaven has miraculously sent
Those comforts, that may teach you to expect
Its further care, in your deliverance.

Oro. I sometimes think myself Heaven is concern'd
For my deliverance.

Bland. It will be soon;
You may expect it. Pray, in the mean time,
Appear as cheerful as you can among us.
You have some enemies, that represent
You dangerous, and would be glad to find
A reason, in your discontent, to fear. [men
They watch your looks. But there are honest
Who are your friends: you are secur'd in them.

Oro. I thank you for your caution.

Bland. I will leave you:

And be assur'd I wish your liberty. [Exit.]

Aboan. He speaks you very fair.

Oro. He means me fair.

Aboan. If he should not, my lord?

Oro. If he should not?

I'll not suspect his truth: but, if I did,
What shall I get by doubting?

Aboan. You secure

Not to be disappointed: but, besides,
There's this advantage in suspecting him:
When you put off the hopes of other men,
You will rely upon your godlike self;
And then you may be sure of liberty.

Oro. Be sure of liberty? what dost thou mean,
Advising to rely upon myself?

I think I may be sure on't: we must wait:

'Tis worth a little patience.

[Turning to IMOINDA.]

Aboan. O, my lord!

Oro. What dost thou drive at?

Aboan. Sir, another time

You would have found it sooner: but I see Love has your heart, and takes up all your thoughts.

Oro. And canst thou blame me?

Aboan. Sir, I must not blame you.

But, as our fortune stands, there is a passion
(Your pardon, royal mistress, I must speak)
That would become you better than your love:—
A brave resentment; which, inspir'd by you,
Might kindle and diffuse a gen'rous rage
Among the slaves, to rouse and shake our chains,
And struggle to be free.

Oro. How can we help ourselves?

Aboan. I knew you when you would have found a way.

How help ourselves? the very Indians teach us:
We need but to attempt our liberty,
And we carry it. We have hands sufficient,
Double the number of our masters' force,
Ready to be employ'd. We want but you,
To head our enterprise, and bid us strike.

Vol. I. ... 4 D 49

Oro. What would you do?

Aboan. Cut our oppressors' throats.

Oro. And you would have me join in your design
Of murder?

Aboan. It deserves a better name.

But, be it what it will, 'tis justified
By self-defence, and natural liberty.
Oro. I'll hear no more on't.

Aboan. I'm sorry for't.

Oro. Nor shall you think of it.

Aboan. Not think of it?

Oro. No, I command you not.

Aboan. Remember, Sir,

You are a slave yourself, and to command
Is now another's right. Not think of it?
Since the first moment they put on my chains,
I've thought of nothing but the weight of 'em,
And how to throw 'em off. Can yours sit easy?

Oro. I have a sense of my condition,
As painful and as quick as yours can be.

I feel for my Imoinda and myself;
Imoinda! much the tend'rest part of me.
But, though I languish for my liberty,
I would not buy it at the Christian price
Of black ingratitude: they sha'not say
That we deserv'd our fortunes by our crimes.
Murder the innocent!

Aboan. The innocent!

Oro. These men are so, whom you would rize against.

If we are slaves, they did not make us slaves,
But bought us in an honest way of trade,
As we have done before 'em; bought and sold
Many a wretch, and never thought it wrong.
They paid our price for us, and we are now
Their property, a part of their estate,
To manage as they please. Mistake me not,
I do not tamely say that we should bear
All they could lay upon us: but we find
The load so light, so little to be felt (Considering they have us in their power,
And may inflict what grievances they please,)
We ought not to complain.

Aboan. My royal lord!

You do not know the heavy grievances,
The toils, the labours, weary drudgeries,
Which they impose; burdens more fit for beasts,
For senseless beasts, to bear, than thinking men.
Then if you saw the bloody cruelties
They execute on every slight offence;
Nay, sometimes in their proud, insulting sport,
How worse than dogs they lash their fellowcreatures;

Your heart would bleed for 'em. Oh! could you know

How many wretches lift their hands and eyes
To you for their relief!

Oro. I pity 'em,

And wish I could with honesty do more.

Aboan. You must do more, and may, with honesty.

O, royal Sir, remember who you are,
A prince, born for the good of other men;
Whose godlike office is to draw the sword
Against oppression, and set free mankind:
And this, I'm sure, you think oppression now.
What though you have not felt these miseries,
Never believe you are oblig'd to them:
They have their selfish reasons, may be, now,
For using of you well; but there will come
A time, when you must have your share of 'em.

Oro. You see how little cause I have to think so :

Favour'd in my own person, in my friends ;
Indulg'd in all that can concern my care,
In my Imoinda's soft society. [Embraces her.]

Aboan. And therefore would you lie contented down

In the forgetfulness and arms of love,
And get young princes for 'em ?

Oro. Say'st thou ? ha !

Aboan. Princes, the heirs of empire, and the last

Of your illustrious lineage, to be born
To pamper up their pride and be their slaves ?

Oro. Imoinda! save me, save me from that thought!

Aboan. I know you are persuaded to believe
The governor's arrival will prevent
Those mischiefs, and bestow your liberty :
But who is sure of that ? I rather fear
More mischief from his coming. He is young,
Luxurious, passionate, and amorous :
Such a complexion, and made bold by power,
To countenance all he is prone to do,
Will know no bounds, no law against his lusts.
If, in a fit of his intemperance,
With a strong hand he shall resolve to seize
And force my royal mistress from your arms,
How can you help yourself ?

Oro. Ha ! thou hast rotus'd
The lion in his den ; he stalks abroad,
And the wide forest trembles at his roar ;
I find the danger now. My spirits start
At the alarm, and from all quarters come
To man my heart, the citadel of love.
Is there a power on earth to force you from me,
And shall I not resist it, nor strike first,
To keep, to save you, to prevent that curse ?
This is your cause ; and shall it not prevail ?
Oh ! you were born always to conquer me.
Now am I fashion'd to thy purpose : speak,
What combination, what conspiracy,
Wouldst thou engage me in ? I'll undertake
All thou wouldst have me now for liberty,
For the great cause of love and liberty.

Aboan. Now, my great master, you appear yourself ;

And, since we have you join'd in our design,
It cannot fail us. I have muster'd up
The choicest slaves, men who are sensible
Of their condition, and seem most resolv'd :
They have their several parties.

Oro. Summon 'em,
Assemble 'em : I will come forth and show
Myself among them : if they are resolv'd,
I'll lead their foremost resolutions.

Aboan. I have provided those will follow you.

Oro. With this reserve in our proceedings still,
The means that lead us to our liberty,
Must not be bloody.

Aboan. You command in all.

We shall expect you, Sir.

Oro. You sha' not long.

[Exeunt OROONOKO and IMOINDA on one side, ABOAN at the other.]

Enter CHARLOTTE WELDON, dressed in man's clothes, followed by WIDOW LACKITT.

Widow L. These unmannerly Indians were something unreasonable to disturb us just in the nick, Mr. Weldon ; but I have the parson within call still, to do us the good turn.

Char. We had best stay a little, I think, to see things settled again, had not we ? Marriage is a serious thing, you know.

Widow L. What do you talk of a serious thing, Mr. Weldon ? I think you have found me sufficiently serious : I have married my son to your sister, to pleasure you : and now I come to claim your promise to me, you tell me marriage is a serious thing.

Char. Why, is it not ?

Widow L. Fiddle faddle, I know what it is : 'tis not the first time I have been married, I hope ; but I shall begin to think you don't design to do fairly by me, so I shall.

Char. Why, indeed, Mrs. Lackitt, I'm afraid I can't do so fairly as I would by you. 'Tis what you must know, first or last ; and I should be the worst man in the world to conceal it any longer ; therefore I must own to you that I am married already.

Widow L. Married ! You don't say so, I hope ? how have you the conscience to tell me such a thing to my face ? I would have you to know I understand better things than to ruin my son without a valuable consideration. If I can't have you, I can keep my money. Your sister sha'n't have the catch of him she expected : I wont part with a shilling to 'em.

Char. You made the match yourself, you know ; you can't blame me.

Widow L. Yes, yes, I can and do blame you : you might have told me before, you were married.

Char. I would not have told you now, but you followed me so close, I was forced to it : indeed I am married in England ; but 'tis as if I were not ; for I have been parted from my wife a great while, and, to do reason on both sides, we hate one another heartily. Now I did design, and will marry you still, if you'll have a little patience.

Widow L. A likely business truly.

Char. I have a friend in England that I will write to, to poison my wife, and then I can marry you with a good conscience.

Widow L. And will he do it, do you think ?

Char. At the first word, or he is not the man I take him to be.

Widow L. Well, you are a dear devil, Mr. Weldon : and would you poison your wife for me ?

Char. I would do any thing for you.

Widow L. Well, I am mightily obliged to you. But 'twill be a great while before you can have an answer of your letter.

Char. 'Twill be a great while, indeed.

Widow L. In the meantime, Mr. Weldon—

Char. Why, in the meantime—Here 's company. We'll settle that within ; I'll follow you. [Exit WIDOW LACKITT.]

Enter STANMORE.

Stan. So, Sir, you carry on your business swimmingly : you have stolen a wedding, I hear.

Char. Ay, my sister is married ; and I am very near being run away with myself.

Stan. The widow will have you then ?

Char. You come very seasonably to my rescue. Jack Stanmore is to be had, I hope ?

Stan. At half an hour's warning.

Char. I must advise with you. [Exeunt

ACT IV.

SCENE I.

Enter WIDOW LACKITT, and CHARLOTTE WELDON, dressed in man's clothes.

Char. Now, Mrs. Lackitt.

Widow L. Well, well, Lackitt, or what you will now; now I am married to you; I am very well pleased with what I have done, I assure you. Mr. Weldon, what must I call you? I must have some pretty fond name or other for you, it looks negligent, and is the fashion, you know.

Char. To be negligent of their husbands, it is indeed.

Widow L. Nay then I wont be in the fashion; for I can never be negligent of dear Mr. Weldon; and, to convince you, here 's something to encourage you not to be negligent of me. [Gives a purse and a little casket.] Five hundred pounds in gold in this; and jewels to the value of five hundred pounds more in this.

Char. [Opens the casket.] Ay, marry, this will encourage me, indeed.

Widow L. There are comforts in marrying an elderly woman, Mr. Weldon. Now a young woman would have fancied she had paid you with her person, or had done you the favour.

Char. What do you talk of young women? you are as young as any of 'em, in every thing but their folly and ignorance.

Widow L. And do you think me so? But I have reason to suspect you. Was not I seen at your house this morning, do you think?

Char. You may venture again: you'll come at night, I suppose?

Widow L. O dear, at night? so soon?

Char. Nay, if you think it so soon—

Widow L. O, no! 'tis not for that, Mr. Weldon; but—I will come to please you.

Char. To please yourself; own it.

Widow L. Well, well, to please myself then. You're the strangest man in the world, nothing can 'scape you.

Enter DANIEL, followed by LUCY.

Dan. What would you have? what do you follow me for?

Lucy. Why mayn't I follow you? I must follow you now all the world over.

Dan. Hold you, hold you there: not so far by a mile or two; I have enough of your company already, by'r lady, and something to spare; you may go home to your brother, an' you will; I have no further to do with you.

Widow L. Why, Daniel, child, thou art not out of thy wits sure, art thou?

Dan. Nay, marry, I don't know; out I am very near, I believe. I am altered for the worse mightily since you saw me; and she has been the cause of it there.

Widow L. How so, child?

Dan. I told you before what would come on't of putting me to bed to a strange woman; but you would not be said nay.

Widow L. She is your wife now, child, you must love her.

Dan. Why, so I did at first.

Widow L. But you must love her always.

Dan. Always! I loved her as long as I could, mother, and as long as loving was good, I believe; for I find now I don't care a fig for her.

Lucy. Why, you lubberly, slovenly block-head—I see all good nature is thrown away upon you—

Widow L. It was so with his father before him. He takes after him.

Lucy. And therefore I will use you as you deserve, you tony.

Widow L. Indeed, he deserves bad enough; but don't call him out of his name: his name is Daniel, you know.

Dan. Let her call me what she pleases, mother, 'tis not her tongue that I'm afraid of.

Lucy. I will make such a beast of thee!

Widow L. O, pray no, I hope; do nothing rashly, Mrs. Lucy.

Dan. I had rather be a beast than what you would make me in a week, I'm sure; I have no more manhood left in me already, than there is in one of my mother's old under-petticoats.

Widow L. Sirrah, sirrah, meddle with your wife's petticoats, and let your mother's alone, you ungracious bird you. [Beats him.]

Dan. Why, is the devil in the woman? What have I said now? Do you know if you were asked, I trow? But you are all of a bundle; e'en hang together: he that unties you makes a rod for himself; and so he will find it that has any thing to do with you.

Widow L. Ay, rogue enough, you shall find it; I have a rod for you still.

Dan. No wife, and I care not.

Widow L. I'll swinge you into better manners, you booby. [Beats him off, and exit.]

Char. You have consummated our project upon him.

Lucy. Nay, if I have a limb of the fortune, I care not who has the whole body of the fool.

Char. That you shall, and a large one, I promise you.

Lucy. Have you heard the news? They talk of an English ship in the river.

Char. I have heard on't; and am preparing to receive it as fast as I can.

Lucy. There's something the matter too with the slaves, some disturbance or other; I don't know what it is.

Char. So much the better still; we fish in troubled waters: we shall have fewer eyes upon us. Pray, go you home, and be ready to assist me in your part of the design.

Lucy. I can't fail in mine. [Exit.]

Char. The widow has furnish'd me, I thank her, to carry it on. Now I have got a wife, 'tis high time to think of getting a husband. I carry my fortune about me—a thousand pounds in gold and jewels. Let me see—'twill be a considerable trust: and I think I shall lay it out to advantage.

Enter STANMORE.

Stan. So, Weldon, Jack has told me his success; and his hopes of marrying the widow by your means.

Char. I have strained a point, Stanmore, upon your account, to be serviceable to your family.

Stan. I take it upon my account; and am very much obliged to you. But here we are all in an uproar.

Char. So they say. What's the matter?

Stan. A mutiny among the slaves. Oronoko is at the head of 'em. Our governor is gone out with his rascally militia against 'em. What it may come to nobody knows.

Char. For my part, I shall do as well as the rest; but I'm concerned for my sister and cousin, whom I expect in the ship from England.

Stan. There's no danger of 'em.

Char. I have a thousand pounds here, in gold and jewels, for my cousin's use, that I would more particularly take care of: 'tis too great a sum to venture at home: and I would not have her wrong'd of it; therefore to secure it, I think my best way will be to put it into your own keeping.

Stan. You have a very good opinion of my honesty. [Takes the purse and casket.]

Char. I have, indeed. If any thing should happen to me in this bustle, as nobody is secure of accidents, I know you will take my cousin into your protection and care. Pray see her married as soon as you can.

Stan. If she be as handsome as her picture, I can promise her a husband.

Char. If you like her when you see her, I wish nothing so much as to have you marry her yourself; for I always thought you worth making a friend.

Stan. You sha'n't find your good opinion thrown away upon me: I am in your debt, and shall think so as long as I live. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—The Country.

Enter on one side of the stage OROONOKO, ABOAN, and slaves; IMOINDA with a bow and quiver; the women, some leading, others carrying their children upon their backs.

Oro. The women with their children fall be-Imoinda, you must not expose yourself. [hind.]
Retire, my love: I almost fear for you.

Imo. I fear no danger; life, or death, I will enjoy with you.

Oro. My person is your guard.

Aboan. Now, Sir, blame yourself: if you had not prevented my cutting his throat, that coward there had not discovered us. He comes now to upbraid you.

Enter, on the other side, LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR, talking to HOTMAN, with his rabble.

Lieut. This is the very thing I would have wish'd.

Your honest service to the government

Shall be rewarded with your liberty. [To HOTMAN.]

Aboan. His honest service! call it what it is, His villany, the service of his fear. If he pretends to honest services, Let him stand out, and meet me like a man.

Oro. Hold, you: and you who come against us, hold:

I charge you in a general good to all;
And wish I could command you, to prevent
The bloody havoc of the murdering sword.
I would not urge destruction uncompell'd:
But if you follow fate, you find it here.
The bonds are set, the limits of our lives:
Between us lies the gaping gulf of death,
To swallow all. Who first advances dies.

Enter CAPTAIN DRIVER, with his crew.

Capt. D. Here, here, here they are, governor.
What, seize upon my ship!
Come, boys, fall on—

[Advancing first, OROONOKO kills him.]

Oro. Thou art fall'n indeed;
Thy own blood be upon thee.

Lieut. Rest it there;
He did deserve his death. Take him away.

[The body is removed.]
You see, Sir, you and those mistaken men
Must be our witnesses, we do not come
As enemies, and thirsting for your blood.
If we desir'd your ruin, the revenge
Of our companion's death had push'd it on.
But that we overlook, in a regard

To common safety and the public good. [men,]
Oro. Regard that public good; draw off your
And leave us to our fortune: we're resolv'd.

Lieut. Resolv'd! on what? your resolutions
Are broken, overturn'd, prevented, lost:
You see our numbers could with ease compel
What we request: and what do we request?
Only to save yourselves.

[The women with their children gather about the men.]

Oro. I'll hear no more.

Lieut. To those poor wretches, who have been seduc'd,

We offer a full pardon—

Oro. Then fall on. [Preparing to engage.]

Lieut. Lay hold upon't, before it be too late:
Pardon and mercy.

[The women clinging about the men, they leave OROONOKO, and fall upon their faces, crying out for pardon.]

Slaves. Pardon, mercy, pardon!

Oro. Let them go all. Now, governor, I see,
I own, the folly of my enterprise,
The rashness of this action, and must blush,
Quite through this veil of night, a whitely shame,
To think I could design to make those free,
Who were by nature slaves; wretches design'd
To be their masters' dogs, and lick their feet.
I would not live on the same earth with creatures,
That only have the faces of their kind.
Why should they look like men, who are not so,
When they put off their noble natures, for
The grovelling qualities of downcast beasts?
We were too few before for victory.
We're still enow to die.

[To IMOINDA and ABOAN.]

Enter BLANDFORD.

Lieut. Live, royal Sir:

Live, and be happy long on your own terms;
Only consent to yield, and you shall have
What terms you can propose for you and yours.

Oro. Consent to yield! shall I betray myself?

[BLANDFORD comes forward.]
Bland. I'm glad you have proceeded by fair means. [To LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR.]
I came to be a mediator.

Lieut. Try what you can to work upon him.

Oro. Are you come against me too?

Bland. Is this to come against you?

[Offering his sword to OROONOKO.]

Unarm'd, to put myself into your hands?

I come, I hope, to serve you.

Oro. You have serv'd me;

I thank you for't: and I am pleas'd to think
You were my friend while I had need of one:

But now 'tis past; this farewell, and be gone.

[Embraces him.]

Bland. It is not past, and I must serve you still,
Oro. I know what I have done, and I should
A child to think they ever can forgive. [be]

Forgive! were there but that, I would not live
To be forgiven: is there a power on earth,
That I can ever need forgiveness from?

Bland. You sha' not need it.

Oro. No, I wo' not need it.

Bland. You see he offers you your own confession, and yours. [ditions,

Oro. Must I capitulate?

Precariously compound, on stinted terms,
To save my life?

Bland. Sir, he imposes none.

You make 'em for your own security.

Lieut. He will rely on what you say to him.

[To BLANDFORD.

Offer him what you can; I will confirm
And make all good. Be you my pledge of trust.

Bland. I'll answer with my life for all he says.

Lieut. Ay, do, and pay the forfeit if you please.

[Aside.

Bland. Consider, Sir, can you consent to throw
That blessing from you, you so hardly found,
And so much valued once?

Oro. Imoinda! oh!

'Tis she that holds me on this argument
Of tedious life; I could resolve it soon,
Were this curs'd being only in debate.
But my Imoinda struggles in my soul;
She makes a coward of me, I confess;
I am afraid to part with her in death;
And more afraid of life to lose her here.

Bland. This way you must lose her. Think upon

The weakness of her sex, made yet more weak
With her condition, requiring rest,
And soft indulging ease, to nurse your hope,
And make you a glad father.

Oro. There I feel

A father's fondness, and a husband's love.
They seize upon my heart, strain all its strings,
To pull me to 'em from my stern resolve.
Husband and father! all the melting art
Of eloquence lives in those softening names.
Methinks I see the babe, with infant hands,
Pleading for life, and begging to be born.
Shall I forbid its birth, deny him light,
The heavenly comforts of all-cheering light,
And make the womb the dungeon of his death,
His bleeding mother his sad monument?
These are the calls of nature, that call loud;
They will be heard, and conquer in their cause:
He must not be a man, who can resist 'em.
No, my Imoinda! I will venture all
To save thee and that little innocent.
The world may be a better friend to him
Than I have found it. Now I yield myself.

[Gives up his sword.

The conflict's past, and we are in your hands.

[Several men seize ORO. and ABOAN.

Lieut. So you shall find you are. Dispose of them as I commanded you.

Bland. Good Heaven forbid. You cannot mean—

Lieut. This is not your concern.

[To BLANDFORD, who goes to ORO:

I must take care of you. [To IMOINDA.

Imo. I'm at the end

Of all my care: here will I die with him.

[Holding ORO.

Oro. You shall not force her from me.

[Holds her.

Lieut. Then I must.

[They force her from him.

49*

Try other means, and conquer force by force:
Break, cut off his hold, bring her away.

Imo. I do not ask to live, kill me but here.

Oro. O, bloody dogs! inhuman murderers!

[IMOINDA is forced out at one door by the

LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR and others;

ORO. and ABOAN hurried out at another;
exeunt.

ACT V.

SCENE I.

Enter STANMORE, CHARLOTTE WELDON, and LUCY.

Char. If I should consent to the fine things you can say to me, how would you look at last,
to find 'em thrown away on an old acquaintance?

Stan. An old acquaintance!

Char. Lord, how easy are you men to be imposed upon! I am no cousin newly arrived from England, not I; but the very Weldon you wot of.

Stan. Weldon!

Char. Not murdered, nor made away, as my sister would have you believe; but am, in very good health, your old friend in breeches that was,
and now your humble servant in petticoats.

Stan. I am glad we have you again. But what service can you do me in petticoats, pray?

Char. Can't you tell what?

Stan. Not I, by my troth. I have found my friend and lost my mistress, it seems; which I did not expect from your petticoats.

Char. Come, come, you have had a friend of your mistress long enough; 'tis high time now to have a mistress of your friend.

Stan. What do you say?

Char. I am a woman, Sir.

Stan. A woman?

Char. As arrant a woman as you would have had me but now, I assure you.

Stan. And at my service?

Char. If you have any for me in petticoats.

Stan. Yes, yes, I shall find you employment.

Char. I need not tell you, I made that little plot, and carried it on only for this opportunity.
I was resolved to see whether you liked me as a woman, or not: if I had found you indifferent, I would have endeavoured to have been so too; but you say you like me, and therefore I have ventured to discover the truth.

Stan. Like you! I like you so well, that I am afraid you wont think marriage a proof on't:
shall I give you any other?

Char. No, no, I'm inclined to believe you, and that shall convince me. At more leisure, I'll satisfy you how I came to be in man's clothes; for no ill, I assure you, though I have happened to play the rogue in 'em. They have assisted me in marrying my sister, and have gone a great way in befriending your cousin Jack with the widow. Can you forgive me for pimping for your family.

Enter JACK STANMORE.

Stan. So, Jack, what news with you?

Jack S. I am the forepart of the widow, you know she's coming after with the body of the family, the young 'squire in her hand, my son-in-law that is to be, with the help of Mr. Weldon.

Char. Say you so, Sir?

[Claps JACK S. upon the back.

Enter WIDOW LACKITT and her son DANIEL.

Widow L. So, Mrs. Lucy, I have brought him about again; I have chastised him. Will you ever rebel again? will you, sirrah? But come, come, down on your marrow-bones, and ask her forgiveness. [DANIEL kneels.] Say after me, pray, forsooth, wife.

Dan. Pray, forsooth, wife.

Lucy. Well, well, this is a day of good nature, and so I take you into favour: but first take the oath of allegiance. [He kisses her hand, and rises.] If ever you do so again—

Dan. Nay, marry if I do, I shall have the worst on't.

Lucy. Here's a stranger forsooth, would be glad to be known to you, a sister of mine; pray salute her. [WIDOW starts at CHARLOTTE.]

Widow L. Your sister, Mrs. Lucy! What do you mean? This is your brother, Mr. Weldon. Do you think I do not know Mr. Weldon?

Lucy. Have a care what you say; this gentleman's about marrying her: you may spoil all.

Widow L. Fiddle faddle; what, you would put a trick upon me.

Char. No, faith, widow, the trick is over; it has taken sufficiently; and now I will teach you the trick, to prevent your being cheated another time.

Widow L. How! cheated, Mr. Weldon?

Char. Why, ay, you will always take things by the wrong handle: I see you will have me, Mr. Weldon: I grant you I was Mr. Weldon a little while, to please you or so; but Mr. Stanmore here has persuaded me into a woman again.

Widow L. A woman! pray let me speak with you. [Draws her aside.] You are not in earnest, I hope, a woman?

Char. Really a woman.

Widow L. 'Gads my life! I could not be cheated in every thing. I know a man from a woman at these years, or the devil is in't. Pray did not you marry me?

Char. You would have it so.

Widow L. And did not I give you a thousand pounds this morning?

Char. Yes, indeed, 'twas more than I deserved; but you had your pennyworth for your penny, I suppose: you seemed to be pleased with your bargain.

Widow L. A rare bargain I have made on't, truly! I have laid out my money to a fine purpose upon a woman.

Char. You would have a husband, and I provided for you as well as I could.

Widow L. Yes, yes, you have provided for me.

Char. And you have paid me very well for't; I thank you.

Widow L. 'Tis very well: I may be with child too, for aught I know, and may go look for the father.

Char. Nay, if you think so, 'tis time to look about you, indeed. For my part, Mrs. Lackitt, your thousand pounds will engage me not to laugh at you. Then my sister is married to your son; he is to have half your estate, I know; and indeed they may live upon it very comfortably to themselves, and very creditably to you.

Widow L. Nay, I can blame nobody but myself.

Char. You have enough for a husband still, and that you may bestow upon honest Jack Stanmore.

Widow L. Is he the man then?

Char. He is the man you are obliged to.

Jack S. Yes, faith, widow, I am the man.

Widow L. Well, well, I see you will have me; even marry me, and make an end of the business.

Stan. Why, that's well said; now we are all agreed, and all well provided for.

Enter a SERVANT to STANMORE.

Serv. Sir, Mr. Blandford desires you to come to him, and bring as many of your friends as you can with you.

Stan. I come to him. You shall all go along with me. Come, young gentleman, marriage is the fashion you see; you must like it now.

Dan. If I don't, how shall I help myself?

Lucy. Nay, you may hang yourself in the noose, if you please, but you'll never get out on't with struggling.

Dan. Come, then, let's e'en jog on in the old road.

Cuckold, or worse, I must now be contented: I'm not the first has married and repented.

[Exeunt.]

Enter LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR, BLANDFORD, and Planters.

Bland. Have you no reverence for future fame?

No awe upon your actions, from the tongues, The censuring tongues, of men, that will be free?

Re-enter STANMORE, JACK STANMORE, CHARLOTTE WELDON, LUCY, WIDOW LACKITT, and DANIEL.

So, Stanmore, you, I know, the women too, Will join with me: 'tis Oroonoko's cause, A lover's cause, a wretched woman's cause, That will become your intercession.

[To the Women.]

Stan. So far from further wrong, that 'tis a shame

He should be where he is. Good governor, Order his liberty: he yielded up Himself, his all, at your discretion.

Bland. Discretion! no; he yielded on your word;

And I am made the cautionary pledge, The gage and hostage of your keeping it. Remember, Sir, he yielded on your word; Your word; which honest men will think should be

The last resort of truth and trust on earth: There's no appeal beyond it but to Heaven.

Stan. He's out of all power of doing any harm now, if he were disposed to it.

Char. But he is not disposed to it.

Bland. To keep him where is, will make him soon

Find out some desperate way to liberty: He'll hang himself, or dash out his mad brains.

Char. Pray try him by gentle means: we'll all be sureties for him.

Omnes. All, all.

Lucy. We will all answer for him now.

Lieut. Well, you will have it so; do what you please, just what you will, with him; I give you leave. [Exit.]

Bland. We thank you, Sir; this way; pray come with me. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.

The curtain rising, discovers OROONOKO upon his back, his legs and arms stretched out, and chained to the ground. Enter BLANDFORD, STANMORE, &c.

Bland. O miserable sight! help, ev'ry one, Assist me all to free him from his chains.

[They help him up and bring him forward, looking down.]

Most injur'd prince! how shall we clear ourselves?

Oro. If you would have me think you are not Confederates, all accessory to The base injustice of your governor; If you would have me live, as you appear Concern'd for me: if you would have me live To thank and bless you; there is yet a way To tie me ever to your honest love; Bring my Imoinda to me; give me her, To cheer my sorrows, and, if possible, I'll sit down with my wrongs, never to rise Against my fate, or think of vengeance more.

Bland. Be satisfy'd, you may depend upon us, We'll bring her safe to you, and suddenly.

Char. We will not leave you in so good a Widow L. No, no, we'll go with you. [work.]

Bland. In the meantime, Endeavour to forget, Sir, and forgive; And hope a better fortune.

[Exit all but OROONOKO.]

Oro. Forget! forgive! I must indeed forget When I forgive: but while I am a man, In flesh, that bears the living marks of shame, The print of his dishonourable chains, My memory still rousing up my wrongs, I never can forgive this governor, This villain; the disgrace of trust and place, And just contempt of delegated power. What shall I do? If I declare myself, I know him, he will sneak behind his guard Of followers, and brave me in his fears. Else, lion-like, with my devouring rage, I would rush on him, fasten on his throat, Tear a wide passage to his treacherous heart, And that way lay him open to the world.

[Pauses.]

If I should turn his Christian arts on him, Promise him, speak him fair, flatter, and creep With fawning steps, to get within his faith, I could betray him then, as he has me. But am I sure by that to right myself? Lying's a certain mark of cowardice: And, when the tongue forgets its honesty, The heart and hand may drop their functions too, And nothing worthy be resolv'd or done. Let me but find out An honest remedy, I have the hand, A minist'ring hand, that will apply it home.

[Exit.]

SCENE III.—The LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR'S House.

Enter LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR.

Lieut. I would not have her tell me she consents;

In favour of the sex's modesty.

Enter BLANDFORD, STANMORE, JACK STANMORE, DANIEL, CHARLOTTE WELDON, and LUCY.

What's the matter?

Char. Nay, nothing extraordinary. But one good action draws on another. You have given the prince his freedom: now we come a begging for his wife: you won't refuse us.

Lieut. Refuse you? No, no, what have I to do to refuse you? I send her to him! You do very well; tis kindly done of you; even carry her to him, with all my heart.

Lucy. You must tell us where she is.

Lieut. I tell you! why, don't you know?

Bland. Your servant says she's in the house.

Lieut. No, no, I brought her home at first indeed; but I thought it would not look well to keep her here: I removed her in the hurry only to take care of her. What! she belongs to you: I have nothing to do with her.

Char. But where is she now, Sir?

Lieut. Why, faith, I can't say certainly: you'll hear of her at Parham-house, I suppose: there or thereabouts: I think I sent her there.

Bland. I'll have an eye on him. [Aside.]

[Exit all but LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR.]

Lieut. I have lied myself into a little time, And must employ it: they'll be here again; But I must go before 'em.

[Going out, he meets IMOINDA, and seizes her.]

Are you come?

I'll court no longer for a happiness That is in my own keeping: you may still Refuse to grant, so I have power to take. The man that asks deserves to be denied.

[She disengages one hand, and draws his sword from his side upon him; GOVERNOR starts and retires. BLANDFORD enters behind him.]

Imo. He does indeed, that asks unworthily.

Bland. You hear her, Sir, that asks unworthily.

Lieut. You are no judge.

Bland. I am, of my own slave.

Lieut. Be gone, and leave us.

Bland. When you let her go.

Lieut. To fasten upon you.

Bland. I must defend myself.

[IMOINDA retreats towards the door, favoured by BLANDFORD; when they are closed, she throws down the sword and runs out. GOVERNOR takes up his sword, they fight, close, and fall, BLANDFORD upon him. Servants enter and part them.]

Lieut. She sha'n't escape me so; I've gone too far,

Not to go further. Curse on my delay.

But yet she is, and shall be in my power.

Bland. Nay, then it is the war of honesty; I know you, and will save you from yourself.

[Exit.]

SCENE IV.

Enter OROONOKO.

Oro. To honour bound! and yet a slave to I am distracted by their rival powers, [love!] And both will be obey'd. O great revenge! Thou raiser and restorer of fall'n fame! Let me not be unworthy of thy aid, For stopping in thy course. I still am thine; But can't forget I am Imoinda's too. She calls me from my wrongs to rescue her. No man condemn me, who has never felt A woman's power, or tried the force of love,

To run his glorious race of light anew,
And carry on the world. Love, love will be
My first ambition, and my fame the next.

Enter ABOAN, bloody.

My eyes are turn'd against me, and combine
With my sworn enemies, to represent
This spectacle of horror. Aboan!

Aboan. I have no name
That can distinguish me from the vile earth,
To which I'm going: a poor abject worm,
That crawl'd awhile upon the bustling world,
And now am trampled to my dust again.

Oro. I see thee gash'd and mangled!
Aboan. Spare my shame,
To tell how they have us'd me; but believe
The hangman's hand would have been merciful.
Do not you scorn me, Sir, to think I can Intend to live under this infamy?
I do not come for pity, to complain.
I've spent an honourable life with you;
The earliest servant of your rising fame,
And would attend it with my latest care:
My life was yours, and so shall be my death.
You must not live;
Bending and sinking, I have dragg'd my steps
Thus far, to tell you that you cannot live:
To warn you of those ignominious wrongs,
Whips, rods, and all the instruments of death,
Which I have felt, and are prepar'd for you.
This was the duty that I had to pay.
'Tis done, and now I beg to be discharg'd.

Oro. What shall I do for thee?
Aboan. My body tires,
And we not bear me off to liberty:
I shall again be taken, made a slave.
A sword, a dagger, yet would rescue me.
I have not strength to go and find out death,
You must direct him to me.

Oro. Here he is, [Gives him a dagger.]
The only present I can make thee now:
And, next the honourable means of life,
I would bestow the honest means of death.

Aboan. I cannot stay to thank you. If there is
A being after this, I shall be yours
In the next world, your faithful slave again.
This is to try. [Stabs himself.] I had a living sense

Of all your royal favours, but this last
Strikes through my heart. I wo'not say farewell,
For you must follow me. [Dies.]

Oro. In life and death,
The guardian of my honour! Follow thee!
I should have gone before thee: then perhaps Thy fate had been prevented. All his care
Was to preserve me from the barbarous rage
That worried him, only for being mine.
Why, why ye gods: why am I so accur'd,
That it must be a reason of your wrath,
A guilt, a crime sufficient to the fate
Of any one, but to belong to me?
My friend has found it out, and my wife will soon:
My wife! the very fear's too much for life.
I can't support it. Where's Imoinda? Oh!

[Going out, he meets IMOINDA, who runs into his arms.]

Thou bosom softness! Down of all my cares!
I could recline my thoughts upon this breast
To a forgetfulness of all my griefs,
And yet be happy: but it wo'not be.
Thou art disorder'd, pale, and out of breath!
If fate pursue thee, find a shelter here.

What is it thou wouldst tell me?

Imo. 'Tis in vain to call him villain.

Oro. Call him governor: is it not so?

Imo. There's not another sure. [Here,]

Oro. Villain's the common name of mankind
But his most properly. What! what of him?
I fear to be resolv'd, and must inquire.
He had thee in his power.

Imo. I blush to think it.

Oro. Blush! to think what?

Imo. That I was in his power.

Oro. He could not use it?

Imo. What can't such men do?

Oro. But did he? durst he?

Imo. What he could he dar'd.

Oro. His own gods damn him then! For ours have none,
No punishment for such unheard of crime.

Imo. This monster, cunning in his flatteries,
When he had weary'd all his useless arts,
Leap'd out, fierce as a beast of prey, to seize me.
I trembled, fear'd.

Oro. I fear and tremble now.

What could preserve thee? What deliver thee?

Imo. That worthy man, you us'd to call your

Oro. Blandford? [friend—]

Imo. Came in, and sav'd me from his rage.

Oro. He was a friend indeed, to rescue thee!

And, for his sake, I'll think it possible
A Christian may be yet an honest man.

Imo. O did you know what I have struggled through,

To save me yours, sure you would promise me
Never to see me forc'd from you again.

Oro. To promise thee! O! do I need to promise?
But there is now no further use of words.
Death is security for all our fears.

[Shows ABOAN'S body on the floor.]

And yet I cannot trust him.

Imo. Aboan!

Oro. Mangled and torn, resolv'd to give me time

To fit myself for what I must expect,
Groan'd out a warning to me, and expir'd.

Imo. For what you must expect?

Oro. Would that were all.

Imo. What, to be butcher'd thus——

Oro. Just as thou seest.

Imo. By barb'rous hands to fall at last their prey?

Oro. I have run the race with honour, shall I now

Lag, and be overtaken at the goal?

Imo. No.

Oro. I must look back to thee. [T'endently.]

Imo. You sha'not need.

I am always present to your purpose; say,
Which way would you dispose me?

This dagger will instruct you. [Gives it to him.]

Oro. Ha! this dagger!

Like fate, it points me to the horrid deed.

Imo. Strike, strike it home, and bravely save us both.

There is no other safety.

Oro. It must be——

But first a dying kiss——

This last embrace—— [Kisses her.]

And now——

Imo. I'm ready.

Oro. O, where shall I strike?

Is there the smallest grain of that lov'd body
That is not dearer to me than my eyes,

My bosom'd heart, and all the life blood there?
 Bid me cut off these limbs, hew off these hands,
 Dig out these eyes, though I would keep them
 To gaze upon thee: but to murder thee! [last
 The joy and charm of ev'ry ravish'd sense,
 My wife! forbid it, nature.

Imo. 'Tis your wife,
 Who on her knees conjures you. O! in time,
 Prevent those mischiefs that are falling on us.
 You may be hurried to a shameful death,
 And I too dragg'd to the vile governor;
 Then I may cry aloud. When you are gone,
 Where shall I find a friend again to save me?

Oro. It will be so. Thou unexampled virtue,
 Thy resolution has recover'd mine:
 And now prepare thee.

Imo. Thus, with open arms,
 I welcome you and death.

[*He drops the dagger as he looks on her,
 and throws himself on the ground.*

Oro. I cannot bear it.
 O let me dash against the rock of fate,
 Dig up this earth, and tear her bowels out,
 To make a grave, deep as the centre down,
 To swallow wide and bury us together!
 It wou't be. Oh! then some pitying god
 (If there be one a friend to innocence)
 Find yet a way to lay her beauties down
 Gently in death, and save me from her blood.

Imo. O rise, 'tis more than death to see you thus.

I'll ease your love, and do the deed myself—

[She takes up the dagger, he rises in haste to take it from her.

Oro. O! hold, I charge thee, hold.

Imo. Though I must own

It would be nobler for us both, from you.

Oro. O! for a whirlwind's wing to hurry us
 To yonder cliff, which frowns upon the flood;
 That in embraces lock'd we might plunge in,
 And perish thus in one another's arms.

Imo. Alas! what shout is that?

Oro. I see 'em coming.

They sha'not overtake us. This last kiss,
 And now farewell.

Imo. Farewell, farewell for ever!

Oro. I'll turn my face away, and do it so.
 Now, are you ready?

Imo. Now. But do not grudge me
 The pleasure, in my death, of a last look;
 Pray look upon me.—Now I'm satisfied.

Oro. So fate must be by this.

[Going to stab her, he stops short; she lays her hand on his, in order to give the blow.

Imo. Nay, then I must assist you.
 And since it is the common cause of both,

'Tis just that both should be employ'd in it
 Thus, thus 'tis finish'd, and I bless my fate.

That, where I liv'd, I die in these lov'd arms. [Stabs herself.

Oro. She's gone. And now all's at an end with me. [Dies.

Soft, lay her down: O we will part no more.

[Throws himself by her.

But let me pay the tribute of my grief,
 A few sad tears to thy lov'd memory,
 And then I follow—[Shouts; weeps over her.
 But I stay too long. [A noise again.

The noise comes nearer. . . Hold, before I go,
 There's something would be done. It shall be so,
 And then, Imoinda, I'll come all to thee. [Rises.

Enter BLANDFORD and his party, before the LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR and his party. Swords drawn on both sides.

Lieut. You strive in vain to save him, he shall die.

Bland. Not while we can defend him with our lives.

Lieut. Where is he?

Oro. Here is the wretch whom you would have.

Put up your swords, and let no civil broils
 Engage you in the cursed cause of one
 Who cannot live, and now entreats to die;
 This object will convince you.

Bland. 'Tis his wife.

[They gather about the body.
 Alas, there was no other remedy.

Lieut. Who did the bloody deed?

Oro. The deed was mine:

Bloody I know it is, and I expect

Your laws should tell me so. Thus self-condemn'd,

I do resign myself into your hands,
 The hands of justice—But I hold the sword
 For you—and for myself.

[Stabs the GOVERNOR and himself, then throws himself by IMOINDA's body.

'Tis as it should be now, I have sent his ghost
 To be a witness of that happiness
 In the next world, which he denied us here. [Dies.

Bland. I hope there is a place of happiness
 In the next world for such exalted virtue.
 Pagan or unbeliever, yet he liv'd

To all he knew: and, if he went astray,
 There's mercy still above to set him right.
 But Christians, guided by the heavenly ray,
 Have no excuse if they mistake their way. [Exeunt.

THE COUNTRY GIRL:

A COMEDY

IN FIVE ACTS.

BY DAVID GARRICK. Esq.

REMARKS.

This comedy, originally called the Country Wife, was written by Wycherly, a witty companion of Charles the Second, and a favourite of that social and dissolute monarch. The most entertaining parts of this play, to the age for which it was written, are precisely those which the purer taste of the present would reject. Mr Garrick revived this piece, in 1766, when Manager of Drury Lane Theatre; and his judicious alterations have rendered it worthy the approbation of the public.

Mrs. Jordan made her first appearance on the London stage in the character of Peggy; in which she displayed that native talent, grace, simplicity, and harmony, which so long rendered her an object of boundless attraction and applause.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—HARCOURT'S Lodgings.

HARCOURT and BELVILLE discovered sitting.

Har. Ha, ha, ha! and so you are in love, nephew; not reasonably and gallantly, as a young gentleman ought, but sighingly, miserably so; not content to be ankle-deep, you have soused over head and ears—ha, Dick?

Bel. I am pretty much in that condition, indeed, uncle. [Sighs.]

Har. Nay, never blush at it: when I was of your age I was ashamed too; but three years at college, and half a one at Paris, methinks should have cured you of that unfashionable weakness—modesty.

Bel. Could I have released myself from that, I had perhaps been at this instant happy in the possession of what I must despair now ever to obtain—Heigho!

Har. Ha, ha, ha! very foolish indeed.

Bel. Don't laugh at me, uncle; I am foolish, I know; but like other fools, I deserve to be pitied.

Har. Pr'ythee don't talk of pity; how can I help you? for this country girl of yours is certainly married.

Bel. No, no—I won't believe it; she is not married, nor she sha'n't be, if I can help it.

Har. Well said, modesty; with such a spirit you can help yourself, Dick, without my assistance.

Bel. But you must encourage and advise me too, or I shall never make any thing of it.

Har. Provided the girl is not married; for I never encourage young men to covet their neighbours' wives.

Bel. My heart assures me, that she is not married.

Har. O, to be sure, your heart is much to be relied upon; but to convince you that I have a fellow-feeling of your distress, and that I am as nearly allied to you in misfortunes as in relationship, you must know—

Bel. What, uncle? you alarm me!

Har. That I am in love too.

Bel. Indeed!

Har. Miserably in love.

Bel. That's charming.

Har. And my mistress is just going to be married to another.

Bel. Better and better.

Har. I knew my fellow-sufferings would please you; but now prepare for the wonderful wonder-of-wonders!

Bel. Well!

Har. My mistress is in the same house with yours.

Bel. What, are you in love with Peggy too?

[Rising from his chair.]

Har. Well said, jealousy. No, no, set your heart at rest; your Peggy is too young, and too simple for me. I must have one a little more knowing, a little better bred, just old enough to see the difference between me and a coxcomb, spirit enough to break from a brother's engagements, and choose for herself.

Bel. You don't mean Alithea, who is to be married to Mr. Sparkish?

Har. Can't I be in love with a lady that is going to be married to another, as well as you, Sir?

Bel. But Sparkish is your friend?

Har. Pr'ythee don't call him my friend; he can be nobody's friend, not even his own.—He would thrust himself into my acquaintance, would introduce me to his mistress, though I have told him again and again that I was in love with her; which, instead of ridding me of him, has made him only ten times more troublesome, and me really in love. He should suffer for his self-sufficiency.

Bel. 'Tis a conceited puppy!—And what success with the lady?

Har. No great hopes; and yet if I could defer the marriage a few days, I should not despair; but honour, I am confident, is her only attachment to my rival: she can't like Sparkish; and if I can work upon his credulity, a credulity which even popery would be ashamed of, I may yet have the chance of throwing sixes upon the dice to save me.

Bel. Nothing can save me.

Har. No, not if you whine and sigh, when you should be exerting every thing that is man about you. I have sent Sparkish, who is admitted at all hours, in the house, to know how the land lies for you, and if she is not married already.

Bel. How cruel you are—you raise me up with one hand, and then you knock me down with the other.

Har. Well, well, she sha'n't be married. [Knocking at the door.] This is Sparkish, I suppose: don't drop the least hint of your passion to him; if you do, you may as well advertise it in the public papers.

Bel. I'll be careful.

Enter a SERVANT.

Serv. An odd sort of a person, from the country, I believe, who calls himself Moody, wants to see you, Sir; but as I did not know him, I said you were not at home, but would return directly; "And so will I too," said he, very short and surly! and away he went mumbling to himself.

Har. Very well, Will; I'll see him when he comes. [Exit SERVANT.] Moody call to see me!—He has something more in his head than making me a visit; 'tis to complain of you, I suppose.

Bel. How can he know me?

Har. We must suppose the worst, and be prepared for him; tell me all you know of this war of his, this Peggy—Peggy what's her name?

Bel. Thrift, Thrift, uncle.

Har. Ay, ay, Sir Thomas Thrift's daughter, of Hampshire; and left very young, under the guardianship of my old companion and acquaintance, Jack Moody.

Bel. Your companion!—he's old enough to be your father.

Har. Thank you, nephew—he has greatly the advantage of me in years, as well as wisdom. When I first launched from the university, into this ocean of London, he was the greatest rake in it; I knew him well for near two years, but all of a sudden he took a freak (a very prudent one) of retiring wholly into the country.

Bel. There he gained such an ascendancy over the odd disposition of his neighbour, Sir Thomas, that he left him sole guardian to his daughter; who forfeits half her fortune, if she does not marry with his consent—there's the devil, uncle.

Har. And are you so young, so foolish, and so much in love, that you would take her with half her value? ha, nephew?

Bel. I'll take her with any thing—with nothing.

Har. What! such an unaccomplished, awkward, silly creature? he has scarce taught her to write; she has seen nobody to converse with, but the country people about 'em; so she can do nothing but dangle her arms, look gawky, turn her toes in, and talk broad Hampshire.

Bel. Don't abuse her sweet simplicity; had you but heard her talk, as I have done, from the garden-wall in the country, by moon-light—

Har. Romeo and Juliet, I protest, ha, ha, ha! "Arise fair sun, and kill the envious—" ha, ha, ha! How often have you seen this fair Capulet?

Bel. I saw her three times in the country, and spoke to her twice; I have leaped an orchard wall, like Romeo, to come at her; played the balcony scene, from an old summer-house in the garden; and if I lose her, I will find out an apothecary, and play the tomb scene too.

Har. Well said, Dick!—this spirit must produce something; but has the old dragon ever caught you sighing at her?

Bel. Never in the country; he saw me yesterday kissing my hand to her, from the new tavern window that looks upon the back of his house, and immediately drove her from it, and fastened up the window-shutters.

Spark. [Without.] Very well, Will, I'll go up to 'em.

Har. I hear Sparkish coming up; take care of what I told you; not a word of Peggy; hear his intelligence, and make use of it, without seeming to mind it.

Bel. Mum, mum, uncle.

Enter SPARKISH.

Spark. O, my dear Harcourt, I shall die with laughing; I have such news for thee—ha, ha, ha!—What, your nephew too, and a little dumpsh, or so; you have been giving him a lecture upon economy. I suppose, you, who never had any, can best describe the evils that arise from the want of it. I never mind my own affairs, not I—“The gods take care of Cato.”—I hear, Mr. Belville, you have got a pretty snug house, with a bow-window that looks into the Park, and a back-floor that goes out into it. Very convenient, and well imagined—no young handsome fellow should be without one—you may be always ready there, like a spider in his web, to seize upon strayed women of quality.

Har. As you used to do—you vain fellow you; pry’thee, don’t teach my nephew your abandoned tricks; he is a modest young man, and you must not spoil him.

Spark. May be so; but his modesty has done some mischief at our house—my surly, jealous brother-in-law saw that modest young gentleman casting a wishful eye at his forbidden fruit, from the new tavern window.

Bel. You mistake the person, Mr. Sparkish; I don’t know what young lady you mean.

Har. Explain yourself, Sparkish, you must mistake; Dick has never seen the girl.

Spark. I don’t say he has; I only tell you what Moody says. Besides, he went to the tavern himself, and inquired of the waiter who dined in the back room, No. 4? and they told him it was Mr. Belville, your nephew; that’s all I know of the matter, or desire to know of it, faith.

Har. He kissed his hand, indeed, to your lady, Alithea, and is more in love with her than you are, and very near as much as I am; so look about you, such a youth may be dangerous.

Spark. The more danger the more honour: I defy you both—win her and wear her if you can—Dobus an virtus in love as well as in war—though you must be expeditious, faith; for, I believe, if I don’t change my mind, I shall marry her to-morrow, or the day after.—Have you no honest clergyman, Harcourt, no fellow-collegian to recommend me, to do the business?

Har. Nothing ever, sure, was so lucky. [Aside.] Why, faith, I have, Sparkish; my brother, a twin-brother, Ned Harcourt, will be in town to-day, and proud to attend your commands.—I am a very generous rival, you see, to lend you my brother to marry the woman I love!

Spark. And so am I too, to let your brother come so near us—but Ned shall be the man; poor Alithea grows impatient; I can’t put off the evil day any longer. I fancy the brute, her brother, has a mind to marry his country idiot at the same time.

Bel. How, country idiot, Sir?

Har. Hold your tongue. [Apart to BELVILLE.] I thought he had been married already.

Spark. No, no, he’s not married, that’s the joke of it.

Bel. No, no, he is not married.

Har. Hold your tongue—

[Elbowing BELVILLE.]
Spark. Not he—I have the finest story to tell you—by the by, he intends calling upon you, for he asked me where you lived, to complain of modesty there. He picked up an old raking acquaintance of his as we came along together, Will Frankly, who saw him with his girl, skulking and muffled up, at the play last night; he plagued him much about matrimony, and his being ashamed to show himself; swore he was in love with his wife, and intended to cuckold him. “Do you?” cried Moody, folding his arms, and scowling with his eyes thus—“You must have more wit than you used to have; besides, if you have as much as you think you have, I shall be out of your reach, and this profligate metropolis, in less than a week.”—Moody would fain have got rid of him, but the other held him by the sleeve, so I left ’em; rejoiced most luxuriously to see the poor devil tormented.

Bel. I thought you said, just now, that he was not married; is not that a contradiction, Sir?

[HARCOURT still makes signs to BELVILLE.]

Spark. Why, it is a kind of one; but considering your modesty, and the ignorance of the young lady, you are pretty tolerably inquisitive, methinks; ha, Harcourt! ha, ha, ha!

Har. Pooh, pooh! don’t talk to that boy, tell me all you know.

Spark. You must know, my booby of a brother-in-law hath brought up this ward of his (a good fortune let me tell you,) as he coops up and fattens his chickens, for his own eating; he is plaguy jealous of her, and was very sorry that he could not marry her in the country, without coming up to town; which he could not do on account of some writings or other; so what does my gentleman? he persuades the poor silly girl, by breaking a sixpence, or some nonsense or another, that they are to all intents married in heaven; but that the laws require the signing of articles and the church service to complete their union: so he has made her call him husband, and bud, which she constantly does; and he calls her wife, and gives out she is married, that she may not look after younger fellows, nor younger fellows after her, egad; ha, ha, ha! and all went do

Bel. Thank you, Sir. What heavenly news, uncle! [Aside.]

Har. What an idiot you are, nephew! [Apart.] And so then you make but one trouble of it, and are both to be tacked together the same day?

Spark. No, no, he can’t be married this week; he damns the lawyers for keeping him in town;—besides, I am out of favour; and he is continually snarling at me, and abusing me for not being jealous. [Knocking at the door.] There he is—I must not be seen with you, for he’ll suspect something; I’ll wait for you, and make a visit to my wife that is to be, and perhaps we shall show young modesty here a sight of Peggy too.

Re-enter a SERVANT.

Serv. Sir, here’s the strange odd sort of a gentleman come again, and I have shown him into the fore-parlour.

Spark. That must be Moody! Well said, Will; an odd sort of a strange gentleman, indeed; we’ll step into the next room till he comes into this, and then you may have him all to yourself—much good may he do you. [Going.] Remember that he is married, or he’ll suspect me of betraying him.

[Exit SPARKISH and BELVILLE.]

Har. Show him up, Will. [Exit SERVANT.] Now must I prepare myself to see a very strange, though a very natural metamorphosis; a once high-spirited, handsome, well-dressed, raking prodigal of the town, sunk into a surly, suspicious, economical, country sloven.

Enter MOODY.

Moo. Mr. Harcourt, your humble servant: have you forgot me?

Har. What, my old friend Jack Moody! by thy long absence from the town, the grumness of thy countenance, and the slovenliness of thy habit, I should give thee joy—you are certainly married.

Moo. My long stay in the country will excuse my dress, and I have a suit at law that brings me up to town, and puts me out of humour; besides, I must give Sparkish ten thousand pounds to-morrow to take my sister off my hands.

Har. Your sister is very much obliged to you: being so much older than you, you have taken upon you the authority of a father, and have engaged her to a coxcomb.

Moo. I have, and to oblige her: nothing but coxcombs or debauchees are the favourites now-a-days; and a coxcomb is rather the more innocent animal of the two.

Har. She has sense and taste, and can't like him; so you must answer for the consequences.

Moo. When she is out of my hands, her husband must look to consequences. He's a fashionable fool, and will cut his horns kindly.

Har. And what is to secure your worship from consequences?—I did not expect marriage from such a rake—one that knew the town so well; fy, fy, Jack.

Moo. I'll tell you my security—I have married no London wife.

Har. That's all one; that grave circumspection in marrying a country wife, is like refusing a deceitful, pampered, Smithfield jade, to go and be cheated by a friend in the country.

Moo. I wish the devil had both him and his smile.

Har. Well, never grumble about it, what's done can't be undone. Is your wife handsome and young?

Moo. She has little beauty but her youth, nothing to brag of but her health, and no attraction but her modesty—wholesome, homely, and house-wifely; that's all.

Har. You talk as like a grazier as you look, Jack. Why did you not bring her to town before, to be taught something?

Moo. Which something I might repent as long as I live.

Har. But pr'ythee, why wouldst thou marry her, if she be ugly, ill-bred, and silly? she must be rich then?

Moo. As rich as if she had the wealth of the mogul. She'll not ruin her husband, like a London baggage, with a million of vices she never heard of: then, because she's ugly, she's the likelier to be my own; and being ill-bred, she'll hate conversation; and since silly and innocent, will not know the difference between me and you; that is, between a man of thirty, and one of forty.

Har. Fifty, to my knowledge. [MOODY turns off and grumbles.]—But see how you and I differ, Jack—wit to me is more necessary than beauty; I think no young woman ugly that has it, and no handsome woman agreeable without it.

Moo. 'Tis my maxim—He's a fool that marries; but he's a greater that does not marry a fool.—I know the town, Mr. Harcourt; and my wife shall be virtuous in spite of you or your nephew.

Har. My nephew!—poor sheepish lad, he runs away from every woman he sees; he saw your sister Althea at the opera, and was much smitten with her; he always toasts her, and hates the very name of Sparkish. I'll bring him to your house, and you shall see what a formidable Tarquin he is.

Moo. I have no curiosity, so give yourself no trouble.—You have heard of a wolf in sheep's clothing; and I have seen your innocent nephew kissing his hands at my windows.

Har. At your sister, I suppose; not at her, unless he was tipsy. How can you, Jack, be so outrageously suspicious? Sparkish has promised to introduce him to his mistress.

Moo. Sparkish is a fool, and may be what I'll take care not to be—I confess my visit to you, Mr. Harcourt, was partly for old acquaintance sake, but chiefly to desire your nephew to confine his gallantries to the tavern, and not send 'em in looks, signs, or tokens, on the other side of the way. I keep no brothel; so pray tell your nephew.

[Going.]
Har. Nay, pr'ythee, Jack, leave me in better humour. Well, I'll tell him; ha, ha, ha! Poor Dick, how he'll stare. This will give him a reputation, and the girls wont laugh at him any longer. Shall we dine together at the tavern, and send for my nephew to chide him for his gallantry? Ha, ha, ha! we shall have fine sport.

Moo. I am not to be laughed out of my senses, Mr. Harcourt.—I was once a modest young gentleman myself; and I never have been half so mischievous before or since, as I was in that state of innocence.—And, so, old friend, make no ceremony with me; I have much business, and you have much pleasure, and therefore as I hate forms, I will excuse your returning my visit, or sending your nephew to satisfy me of his modesty—and so your servant.

[Exit.]
Har. Ha, ha, ha! poor Jack! what a life of suspicion does he lead! I pity the poor fellow, though he ought and will suffer for his folly.—Folly!—'tis treason, murder, sacrilege! When persons of a certain age will indulge their false, ungenerous appetites, at the expense of a young creature's happiness, dame Nature will revenge herself upon them, for thwarting her most heavenly will and pleasure.

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Chamber in MOODY'S House.

Enter PEGGY and ALTHEA.

Peg. Pray, sister, where are the best fields and woods to walk in, in London?

Al. A pretty question! why, sister, Vauxhall, Kensington Gardens, and St. James' Park, are the most frequented.

Peg. Pray, sister, tell me why my bud looks so grum here in town, and keeps me up so close, and wont let me go a walking, nor let me wear my best gown yesterday?

Al. O, he's jealous, sister!

Peg. Jealous! what's that?

Al. He's afraid you should love another man.

Peg. How should he be afraid of my loving another man, when he will not let me see any but himself?

Al. Did he not carry you yesterday to a play?

Peg. Ay; but we sat amongst ugly people: ho would not let me come near the gentry, who sat under us, so that I could see 'em. He told me none but naughty women sat there; but I would have ventured for all that.

Ali. But how did you like the play?

Peg. Indeed I was weary of the play; but I liked hugely the actors; they are the goodliest, properest men, sister.

Ali. O, but you must not like the actors, sister.

Peg. Ay, how should I help it, sister? pray, sister, when my guardian comes in, will you ask leave for me to go a walking?

Ali. A walking! ha, ha, ha! Lord, a country gentlewoman's pleasure is the drudgery of a foot-post; and she requires as much airing as her husband's horses. [Aside.] But here comes my brother; I'll ask him, though I'm sure he'll not grant it.

Enter MOODY.

Peg. O my dear, dear bud, welcome home; why dost thou look so fropish? who has nanger'd thee?

Moo. You're a fool.

[Peggy goes aside and cries.
Ali. Faith, and so she is, for crying for no fault; poor tender creature!

Moo. What, you would have her as impudent as yourself; as arrant a girl-flirt, a gadder, a magpie; and, to say all, a mere notorious town woman!

Ali. Brother, you are my only censurer: and the honour of your family will sooner suffer in your wife that is to be, than in me, though I take the innocent liberty of the town!

Moo. Hark you, mistress! do not talk so before my wife: the innocent liberty of the town!

Ali. Pray, what ill people frequent my lodgings? I keep no company with any woman of scandalous reputation.

Moo. No, you keep the men of scandalous reputation company.

Ali. Would you not have me civil? answer 'em at public places? walk with 'em when they join me in the Park, Kensington Gardens, or Vauxhall?

Moo. Hold, hold; do not teach my wife where the men are to be found; I believe she's the worse for your town documents already. I bid you keep her in ignorance, as I do.

Peg. Indeed, be not angry with her, bud, she will tell me nothing of the town, though I ask her a thousand times a day.

Moo. Then you are very inquisitive to know, I find.

Peg. Not I, indeed, dear; I hate London: our place-house in the country is worth a thousand of't; would I were there again!

Moo. So you shall, I warrant. But were you not talking of plays and players when I came in? you are her encourager in such discourses.

[To ALITHEA.

Peg. No, indeed, dear: she chid me just now for liking the player-men.

Moo. Nay, if she is so innocent as to own to me her liking them, there is no harm in't. [Aside.] Come, my poor rogue, but thou liest none better than me?

Peg. Yes, indeed, but I do; the player-men are finer folks.

Moo. But you love none better than me?

Peg. You are my own dear bud, and I know you; I hate strangers.

Moo. Ay, my dear, you must love me only; and not be like the naughty town women, who only hate their husbands, and love every man else; love plays, visits, fine coaches, fine clothes, fiddles, balls, treats, and so lead a wicked town life.

Peg. Nay, if to enjoy all these things be a town life, London is not so bad a place, dear.

Moo. How! if you love me, you must hate London.

Peg. Bud, bud, do the town women love the player-men too?

Moo. Ay, I warrant you.

Peg. Ay, I warrant you.

Moo. Why, you do not, I hope?

Peg. No, no, bud; but why have we no player-men in the country?

Moo. Ha! Mrs. Minx, ask me no more to go to a play.

Peg. Nay, why, love? I did not care for going; but when you forbid me, you make me as it were desire it. Pray, let me go to a play, dear!

Moo. Hold your peace; I wont.

Peg. Why, love?

Moo. Why, I'll tell you.

Peg. Pray why, dear?

Moo. First, you like the actors; and the gal-lants may like you.

Peg. What, a homely country girl? no, bud, nobody will like me.

Moo. I tell you yes, they may.

Peg. No, no, you jest—I wont believe you; I will go.

Moo. I tell you then, that one of the most raking fellows in town, who saw you there, told me he was in love with you.

Peg. Indeed! who, who, pray who was't?

Moo. I've gone too far, and slipt before I was aware. How overjoyed she is? [Aside.

Peg. Was it any Hampshire gallant? any of our neighbours?—Promise you I am beholden to him.

Moo. I promise you, you lie; for he would but ruin you, as he has done hundreds.

Peg. Ay, but if he loves me, why should he ruin me? answer me to that. Methinks he should not; I would do him no harm.

Ali. Ha, ha, ha!

Moo. 'Tis very well; but I'll keep him from doing you any harm, or me either. But here comes company; get you in, get you in.

Peg. But pray, husband, is he a pretty gentleman that loves me?

Moo. In baggage, in. [Thrusts her in, and shuts the door.] what, all the libertines of the town brought to my lodging by this easy cock-comb! 'steath, I'll not suffer it.

Enter SPARKISH, HARCOURT, and BELVILLE.

Spark. Here, Belville, do you approve my choice? Dear little rogue, I told you I'd bring you acquainted with all my friends, the wits.

[To ALITHEA.

Moo. Ay, they shall know her as well as yourself will, I warrant you.

[Aside.

Spark. This is one of those, my pretty rogue, that are to dance at your wedding to-morrow; and one you must make welcome; for he's modest. [BELVILLE salutes ALITHEA.] Harcourt makes himself welcome, and has not the same foible, though of the same family.

Har. You are too obliging, Sparkish.

Moo. And so he is, indeed. The fop's horns will as naturally sprout upon his brows as mushrooms upon dunghills.

[Aside.]

Har. This, Mr. Moody, is my nephew you mentioned to me. I would bring him with me; for a sight of him will be sufficient, without poppy or mandragora, to restore you to rest.

Bel. I am sorry, Sir, that any mistake or imprudence of mine should have given you any uneasiness; it was not so intended, I assure you, Sir.

Moo. It may be so, Sir, but not the less criminal for that.—My wife, Sir, must not be smirked and nodded at from tavern windows. I am a good shot, young gentleman, and don't suffer magpies to come near my cherries.

Bel. Was it your wife, Sir?

Moo. What 's that to you, Sir? suppose it were my grandmother?

Bel. I would not dare to offend her.—Permit me to say a word in private to you.

[Exit MOODY and BEL.]

Spark. Now old surly is gone, tell me, Harcourt, if thou likest her as well as ever.—My dear, don't look down; I should hate to have a wife of mine out of countenance at any thing.

Ali. For shame, Mr. Sparkish!

Spark. Tell me, I say, Harcourt, how dost like her? thou hast stared upon her enough to resolve me.

Har. So infinitely well that I could wish I had a mistress too, that might differ from her in nothing but her love and engagement to you.

Ali. Sir, Mr. Sparkish has often told me that his acquaintance were all wits and railers; and now I find it.

Spark. No, by the universe, Madam, he does not rally now; you may believe him. I do assure you he is the honestest, worthiest, true-hearted gentleman; a man of such perfect honour, he would say nothing to a lady he does not mean.

Har. Sir, you are so beyond expectation obliging, that—

Spark. Nay, 'egad, I am sure you do admire her extremely; I see it in your eyes.—He does admire you, Madam; he has told me so a thousand and a thousand times; have you not, Harcourt? you do admire her, by the world, you do—don't you?

Har. Yes, above the world, or the most glorious part of it, her whole sex; and till now I never thought I should have envied you or any man about to marry; but you have the best excuse to marry I ever knew.

Ali. Nay, now Sir, I am satisfied you are of the society of the wits and railers, since you cannot spare your friend, even when he is most civil to you; but the surest sign is, you are an enemy to marriage, the common butt of every railer.

Har. Truly, Madam, I was never an enemy to marriage till now, because marriage was never an enemy to me before.

Ali. But why, Sir, is marriage an enemy to you now? because it robs you of your friend here? for you look upon a friend married as one gone into a monastery; that is, dead to the world.

Har. 'Tis indeed because you marry him: I see, Madam, you can guess my meaning.—I do confess heartily and openly, I wish it were in my power to break the match; by heavens, I would.

Spark. Poor Frank!

Ali. Would you be so unkind to me?

Har. No, no, 'tis not because I would be unkind to you.

Spark. Poor Frank! no, 'egad, 'tis only his kindness to me.

Ali. Great kindness to you indeed!—Insensible! let a man make love to his mistress to his face.

[Aside.]

Spark. Come, dear Frank, for all my wife there, that shall be, thou shalt enjoy me sometimes, dear rogue.—By my honour, we men of wit condole for our deceased brother in marriage, as much as for one dead in earnest. I think that was prettily said of me, ha, Harcourt?—Prythee, Frank, dost think my wife, that shall be, there, a fine person?

Har. I could gaze upon her till I became as blind as you are.

Spark. How as I am? how?

Har. Because you are a lover; and true lovers are blind.

Spark. True, true; but by the world she has wit too, as well as beauty. Go, go with her into a corner, and try if she has wit; talk to her any thing, she's bashful before me—take her into a corner.

[HARCOURT courts ALITHEA aside.]

Re-enter MOODY.

Moo. How, Sir! If you are not concerned for the honour of a wife, I am for that of a sister.—Be a pander to your own wife, bring men to her, let 'em make love before your face, thrust 'em into a corner together, then leave 'em in private! is this your town wit and conduct?

Spark. Ha, ha, ha! a silly, wise rogue would make one laugh more than a stark fool, ha, ha, ha! I shall burst. Nay, you shall not disturb 'em; I'll vex thee, by the world. What have you done with Belville?

[Struggles with MOODY to keep him from HARCOURT and ALITHEA.]

Moo. Shown him the way out of my house, as you should do that gentleman.

Spark. Nay, but prythee let me reason with thee.

[Talks apart with MOODY.]

Ali. The writings are drawn, Sir, settlements made; 'tis too late, Sir, and past all revocation.

Har. Then so is my death.

Ali. I would not be unjust to him.

Har. Then why to me so?

Ali. I have no obligations to you.

Har. My love.

Ali. I had his before.

Har. You never had it; he wanes, you see, jealousy, the only infallible sign of it.

Ali. Love proceeds from esteem: he cannot distrust my virtue; besides, he loves me, or he would not marry me.

Har. Marrying you is no more a sign of his love, than bribing your woman, that he may marry you, is a sign of his generosity. But if you take marriage for a sign of love, take it from me immediately.

Ali. No, now you have put a scruple in my head.—But in short, Sir, to end our dispute, I must marry him; my reputation would suffer in the world else.

Har. No; if you do marry him, with your pardon, Madam, your reputation must suffer in the world.

Ali. Nay, now you are rude, Sir.—Mr. Sparkish, pray come hither, your friend here is very troublesome, and very loving.

Har. Hold, hold. [Aside to ALITHEA.]

Moo. D'ye hear that, senseless puppy?

Spark. Why, d'ye think I'll seem jealous, like a country bumpkin?

Moo. No, rather be dishonoured, like a credulous driveller.

Har. Madam, you would not have been so little generous as to have told him?

Ali. Yes, since you could be so little generous as to wrong him.

Har. Wrong him! no man can do it; he's beneath an injury; a bubble, a coward, a senseless idiot; a wretch so contemptible to all the world but you, that—

Ali. Hold, do not rail at him; for since he is like to be my husband, I am resolved to like him: nay, I think I am obliged to tell him you are not his friend—Mr. Sparkish, Mr. Sparkish!

Spark. What, what?—Now, dear rogue, has she not wit?

Har. Not so much as I thought, and hoped she had.

Ali. Mr. Sparkish, do you bring people to rail at you?

Har. Madam!

Spark. How? no; but if he does rail at me, 'tis but in jest, I warrant: what we wits do for one another, and never take any notice of it.

Ali. He spoke so scurrilously of you, I had no patience to hear him.

Moo. And he was in the right on't.

Ali. Besides, he has been making love to me.

Moo. And I told the fool so.

Har. True, damned tell-tale woman. [Aside.]

Spark. Pshaw! to show his parts; we wits rail and make love often, but to show our parts; as we have no affections, so we have no malice; we—

Moo. Did you ever hear such an ass?

Ali. He said you were a wretch, below an injury.

Spark. Pshaw!

Ali. A common bubble.

Spark. Pshaw!

Ali. A coward.

Spark. Pshaw, pshaw!

Ali. A senseless, drivelling idiot.

Moo. True, true, true; all true.

Spark. How! did he disparage my parts? nay then, my honour's concerned. I can't put up that. Brother, help me to kill him. [Offers to draw.]

Ali. Hold! hold!

Moo. If Harcourt would but kill Sparkish, and run away with my sister, I should be rid of three plagues at once. [Aside.]

Ali. Indeed, to tell the truth, the gentleman said, after all, that what he spoke was but out of friendship to you.

Spark. How! say I am a fool; that is no wit, out of friendship to me.

Ali. Yes, to try whether I was concerned enough for you; and made love to me only to be satisfied of my virtue for your sake.

Har. Kind, however! [Aside.]

Spark. Nay, if it were so, my dear rogue, I ask thee pardon; but why would not you tell me so, 'faith?

Har. Because I do not think on't, faith.

Spark. Come, Belville is gone away; Harcourt let's be gone to the new play; come, Madam.

Ali. I will not go, if you intend to leave me alone in the box, and run all about the house, as you used to do.

Spark. Pshaw! I'll leave Harcourt with you in the box, to entertain you, and that's as good. If I sat in the box, I should be thought no critic. I must run about, my dear, and abuse the author.—Come, away. Harcourt, lead her down. B'ye, brother.

[Exeunt HARCOURT, SPARKISH, and ALITHEA.]

Moo. B'ye, driveller. Well, go thy ways, for the flower of the true town fops; such as spend their estates before they come to 'em, and are cuckolds before they're married. But let me go look to my freehold.

Enter a COUNTRYMAN.

Coun. Master, your worship's servant. Here is the lawyer, counsellor gentleman, with a green bag full of papers, come again, and should be glad to speak to you.

Moo. Now here's some other damned impediment, which the law has thrown in our way. I shall never marry the girl, nor get clear of the smoke and wickedness of this cursed town. [Aside.] Where is he?

Coun. He's below in a coach, with three other lawyers, counsellor gentlemen. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—Another Chamber.

Enter PEGGY and LUCY.

Lucy. What ails you, Miss Peggy? you are grown quite melancholy.

Peg. Would it not make any one melancholy to see your mistress Alithea go every day fluttering about abroad to plays and assemblies, and I know not what, whilst I must stay at home, like a poor, lonely, sullen bird in a cage?

Lucy. Dear Miss Peggy, I thought you chose to be confined: I imagined that you had been bred so young to the cage, that you had no pleasure in flying about, and hopping in the open air, as other young ladies, who go a little wild about this town.

Peg. Nay, I confess I was quiet enough, till somebody told me what pure lives the London ladies lead, with their dancing meetings, and junketings, and dressed every day in their best gowns; and I warrant you, play at nine-pins every day in the week, so they do.

Lucy. To be sure, Miss, you will lead a better life when joined in holy wedlock with your sweet-tempered guardian, the cheerful Mr. Moody?

Peg. I can't lead a worse, that's one good thing; but I must make the best of a bad market, for I can't marry nobody else.

Lucy. How so, Miss? that's very strange.

Peg. Why, we have a contraction to one another; so we are as good as married, you know.

Lucy. I know it!—Heaven forbid, Miss.

Peg. Heigho!

Lucy. Don't sigh, Miss Peggy; if that young gentleman, who was here just now, would take pity on me, I'd throw such a contract as yours behind the fire.

Peg. Lord bless us, how you talk!

Lucy. Young Mr. Belville would make you talk otherwise, if you knew him.

Peg. Mr. Belville!—Where is he?—When did you see him?—You have undone me, Lucy; where was he? did he say any thing?

Lucy. Say any thing!—very little indeed; he's quite distracted, poor young creature. He was talking with your guardian just now.

Peg. The deuce he was?—but where was it, and when was it?

Lucy. In this house, five minutes ago, when your guardian turned you into your chamber, for fear of your being seen.

Peg. I knew something was the matter, I was in such a fluster. But what did he say to my bud?

Lucy. What do you call him bud for? Bud means husband, and he is not your husband yet, and I hope never will be; and if he was my husband I'd bud him, a surly, unreasonable beast.

Peg. I'd call him any names, to keep him in good humour, if he'd let me marry any body else, (which I can't do,) I'd call him husband as long as he lived. But what said Mr. Belville to him?

Lucy. I don't know what he said to him, but I'll tell you what he said to me, with a sigh, and his hand upon his breast, as he went out of the door—"If you ever were in love, young gentlewoman, (meaning me,) and can pity a most faithful lover, tell the dear object of my affections—"

Peg. Meaning me, Lucy!

Lucy. Yes, you, to be sure. "Tell the dear object of my affections, I live but upon the hopes that she is not married; and when those hopes leave me, she knows the rest;" then he cast up his eyes thus—gnashed his teeth—struck his forehead—would have spoke again, but could not—fetched a deep sigh, and vanished.

Peg. That is really very fine; I am sure it makes my heart sink within me, and brings tears into my eyes! O, he's a charming sweet—But hush, hush, I hear my husband!

Lucy. Don't call him husband. Go into the Park this evening, if you can.

Peg. Mum, mum.

Enter MOODY.

Moo. Come, what's here to do; you are putting the town pleasures in her head, and setting her a longing.

Lucy. Yes, after nine-pins; you suffer none to give her those longings but yourself.

Moo. Come, Mrs. Flippant, good precepts are lost when bad examples are still before us: the liberty your mistress takes abroad makes her hanker after it, and out of humour at home. Poor wretch! she desired not to come to London; I would bring her.

Lucy. O yes, you surfeit her with pleasures.

Moo. She has been this fortnight in town, and never desired, till this afternoon, to go abroad.

Lucy. Was she not at the play yesterday?

Moo. Yes, but she never asked me: I was myself the cause of her going.

Lucy. Then if she ask you again, you are the cause of her asking, and not my mistress.

Moo. Well, next week I shall be rid of you all, rid of this town, and my dreadful apprehensions. Come, be not melancholy, for thou shalt go into the country very soon, dearest.

Peg. Pish! what d'ye tell me of the country for?

Moo. How's this? what, flout at the country?

Peg. Let me alone, I am not well.

Moo. O, if that be all—what ails my dearest?

Peg. Truly, I don't know; but I have not been well since you told me there was a gallant at the play in love with me.

Moo. Ha!

Lucy. That's my mistress too.

Moo. Nay, if you are not well, but are so concerned because a raking young fellow chanced to lie, and say he liked you, you'll make me sick too.

Peg. Of what sickness?

Moo. O, of that which is worse than the plague, jealousy.

Peg. Pish, you jeer: I'm sure there's no such disease in your receipt-book at home.

Moo. No, you never met with it, poor innocent.

Peg. Well, but pray, bud, let's go to a play to-night.

Moo. No, no; no more plays. But why are you so eager to see a play?

Peg. Faith, dear, not that I care one pin for their talk there; but I like to look upon the player-men, and would see, if I could, the gallant you say loves me; that's all, dear bud.

Moo. Is that all, dear bud?

Lucy. This proceeds from my mistress' example.

Peg. Let's go abroad, however, dear bud, if we don't go to the play.

Moo. Come, have a little patience, and thou shalt go into the country next week.

Peg. Therefore, I would first see some sights to tell my neighbours of: nay, I will go abroad, that's once.

Moo. What, you have put this into her head?

[To LUCY.]

Lucy. Heaven defend me, what suspicions! somebody has put more things into your head than you ought to have.

Moo. Your tongue runs too glibly, Madam; and you have lived too long with a London lady, to be a proper companion for innocence. I am not over fond of your mistress.

Lucy. There's no love lost between us.

Moo. You admitted those gentlemen into the house, when I said I would not be at home; and there was the young fellow too who behaved so indecent to my wife at the tavern window.

Lucy. Because you would not let him see your handsome wife out of your lodgings.

Peg. Why, O Lord, did the gentleman come hither to see me indeed?

Moo. No, no. You are not the cause of that damned question too? [To LUCY.]

Peg. Come, pray, bud, let's go abroad before 'tis late; for I will go, that's flat and plain—only into the Park.

Moo. So! the obstinacy already of the town wife; and I must, while she's here, humour her like one. [Aside.]—How shall we do, that she may not be seen or known?

Lucy. Muffle her up with a bonnet and cloak, and I'll go with her to avoid suspicion.

Moo. No, no, I am obliged to you for your kindness, but she sha'n't stir without me.

Lucy. What will you do then?

Peg. What, shall we go? I am sick with staying at home: if I don't walk in the Park, I'll do nothing that I am bid for a week—I won't be moped.

Lucy. O she has a charming spirit! I could stand your friend now, and would, if you had ever a civil word to give me. [To Moody.]

Moo. I'll give thee a better thing, I'll give thee a guinea for thy good advice, if I like it; and I can have the best of the college for the same money.

Lucy. I despise a bribe: when I am your friend, it shall be without fee or reward.

Peg. Don't be long then, for I will go out.

Lucy. The tailor brought home last night the clothes you intend for a present to your godson in the country.

Peg. You must not tell that, Lucy.

Lucy. But I will, Madam. When you were with your lawyers last night, Miss Peggy, to divert me and herself, put 'em on, and they fitted her to a hair.

Moo. Thank you, thank you, Lucy, 'tis the luckiest thought! Go this moment, Peggy, into your chamber, and put 'em on again—and you shall walk with me into the Park, as my godson. Well thought of, Lucy! I shall love you for ever for this.

Peg. And so shall I too, Lucy: I'll put 'em on directly. [Going.] Suppose, bud, I must keep on my petticoats, for fear of showing my legs?

Moo. No, no, you fool, never mind your legs? [Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The Park.

Enter BELVILLE and HARCOURT.

Bel. And the moment Moody left me, I took an opportunity of conveying some tender sentiments through Lucy to Miss Peggy; and here I am, in expectation of seeing my country goddess.

Har. And so, to blind Moody, and take him off the scent of your passion for this girl, and at the same time to give me an opportunity with Sparkish's mistress (and of which I have made the most), you hinted to him with a grave melancholy face that you were dying for his sister—Gad-a-mercy, nephew! I will back thy modesty against any other in the three kingdoms: it will do, Dick.

Bel. What could I do, uncle?—It was my last stake, and I played for a great deal.

Har. You mistake me, Dick; I don't say you could do better, I only can't account for your modesty's doing so much: you have done such wonders, that I, who am rather bold than sheepish, have not yet ceased wondering at you. But do you think that you imposed upon him?

Bel. Faith, I can't say; he said very little, grumbled much, shook his head, and showed me the door.—But what success have you had with Alithea?

Har. Just enough to have a glimmering of hope, without having light enough to see an inch before my nose.—This day will produce something; Alithea is a woman of great honour, and will sacrifice her happiness to it, unless Sparkish's absurdity stands my friend, and does every thing that the fates ought to do for me.

Bel. Yonder comes the prince of coxcombs, and if your mistress and mine should, by chance, be tripping this way, this fellow will spoil sport; let us avoid him—you can't cheat him before his face.

Har. But I can though, thanks to my wit, and his want of it.

Bel. But you cannot come near his mistress but in his company.

Har. Still the better for me, nephew, for fools are most easily cheated, when they themselves are accessories; and he is to be bubbled of his mistress, or of his money (the common mistress,) by keeping him company.

Enter SPARKISH.

Spark. Who's that, that is to be bubbled? faith, let me snack; I han't met with a bubble since Christmas. 'Gad, I think bubbles are like their brother woodcocks, go out with the cold weather.

Har. He did not hear all, I hope.

[Apart to BEL.]

Spark. Come, you bubbling rogues, you, where do we sup? O Harcourt, my mistress tells me you have made love, fierce love, to her last night, all the play long; ha, ha, ha! but I—

Har. I make love to her?

Spark. Nay, I forgive thee, and know her; but I am sure I know myself.

Bel. Do you, Sir? Then you are the wisest man in the world, and I honour you as such.

[Boas.]

Spark. O, your servant, Sir; you are at your rallery, are you? You can't oblige me more; I'm your man: he'll meet with his match. Ha! Harcourt! did not you hear me laugh prodigiously at the play last night?

Har. Yes, and was very much disturbed at it. You put the actors and audience into confusion, and all your friends out of countenance.

Spark. So much the better; I love confusion, and to see folks out of countenance; I was in tip-top spirits, faith, and said a thousand good things.

Bel. But I thought you had gone to plays to laugh at the poet's good things, and not at your own.

Spark. Your servant, Sir: no I thank you. 'Gad, I go to a play as to a country treat: I carry my own wine to one, and my own wit to t'other, or else I'm sure I should not be merry at either: and the reason why we are so often louder than the players is, because we hate authors damnably.

Bel. But why should you hate the poor rogues: you have too much wit, and despise writing, I'm sure.

Spark. O yes, I despise writing; but women, women, that make men do all foolish things, make 'em write songs too. Every body does it; 'tis e'en as common with lovers as playing with fans; and you can no more help rhyming to your Phillis, than drinking to your Phillis.

Har. But the poets damned your songs, did they?

Spark. Damn the poets: they turned them into burlesque, as they call it: that burlesque is a hocus-pocus trick they have got, which, by the virtue of hiccus-doccus, topsy-turvy, they make a clever witty thing absolute nonsense! Do you know, Harcourt, that they ridiculed my last song, "Twang, twang," the best I ever wrote?

Har. That may be, and be very easily ridiculed for all that.

Bel. Favour me with it, Sir; I never heard it.

Spark. What, and have all the Park about us?

Har. Which you'll not dislike; and so, pry-thee, begin.

Spark. I never am ask'd twice, and so have at you.

*Tell me not of the roses and lilies
Which tinge the fair cheek of your Phillis;
Tell me not of the dimples and eyes,
For which silly Corydon dies,
Let all whining lovers go hang;
My heart would you hit,
Tip your arrow with wit,
And it comes to my heart with a twang,
And it comes to my heart with a twang.*

[At the end of the song HARCOURT and BELVILLE steal away from SPARKISH, and leave him singing; he sinks his voice by degrees at the surprise of their being gone.

Re-enter HARCOURT and BELVILLE.

What the deuce did you go away for?

Har. Your mistress is coming.

Spark. The devil she is! O hide, hide me from her. [Hides behind HARCOURT.

Har. She sees you.

Spark. But I will not see her; for I'm engaged, and at this instant. [Looking at his Watch.

Har. Pray first take me, and reconcile me to her.

Spark. Another time; faith, it is the lady, and one cannot make excuses to a woman.

Bel. You have need of 'em, I believe.

Spark. Pshaw! pry'thee, hide me.

Enter MOODY, PEGGY in Boy's clothes, and ALITHEA.

Har. Your servant, Mr. Moody.

Moo. Come along. [To PEGGY.

Peg. Lau! what a sweet delightful place this is!

Moo. Come along, I say; don't stare about you so; you'll betray yourself.

[Exeunt MOO. and PEGGY, ALI. follows.

Har. He does not know us.

Bel. Or he wont know us.

Spark. So much the better.

[Exit BEL. after them.

Har. Who is that pretty youth with him, Sparkish?

Spark. Some relation of Peggy's, I suppose; for he is something like her in face and gawkiness.

Re-enter BELVILLE.

Bel. By all my hopes, uncle, Peggy in boy's clothes. I am all over agitation.

[Apart to HARCOURT.

Har. Be quiet, or you'll spoil all. They return.—Alithea has seen you, Sparkish, and will be angry if you don't go to her: besides, I would fain be reconciled to her, which none but you can do, my dear friend.

Spark. Well, that's a better reason, dear friend: I would not go near her now for her's or my own sake; but I can deny you nothing; for though I have known thee a great while, never go, if I do not love thee as well as a new acquaintance.

Har. I am obliged to you, indeed, my dear friend: I will be well with her, only to be well with thee still; for these ties to wives usually dissolve all ties to friends.

Spark. But they sha'n't though. Come along. [They retire.

Re-enter MOODY, PEGGY, and ALITHEA.

Moo. Sister, if you will not go, we must leave you. [To ALITHEA.] The fool, her gallant, and she, will muster up all the young saunterers of this place. What a swarm of cuckolds and cuckold-makers are here! I begin to be uneasy. [Aside.] Come, let's be gone, Peggy.

Peg. Don't you believe that! I han't half my bellyfull of sights yet.

Moo. Then walk this way.

Peg. Lord, what a power of fine folks are here. And Mr. Belville, as I hope to be married.

[Aside.

Moo. Come along; what are you muttering at?

Peg. There's the young gentleman there, you were so angry about, that's in love with me.

Moo. No, no; he's a dangler after your sister, or pretends to be; but they are all bad alike. Come along, I say.

[MOODY pulls PEGGY away. Exeunt PEGGY and MOODY, BELVILLE following. SPARKISH, HARCOURT, and ALITHEA come forward.

Spark. Come, dear Madam, for my sake you shall be reconciled to him.

Ali. For your sake, I hate him.

Har. That's something too cruel, Madam, to hate me for his sake.

Spark. Ay, indeed, Madam, too cruel to me, to hate my friend for my sake.

Ali. I hate him because he is your enemy; and you ought to hate him too, for making love to me, if you love me.

Spark. That's a good one! I hate a man for loving you! If he did love you, 'tis but what he can't help; and 'tis your fault, not his, if he admires you.

Ali. Is it for your honour, or mine, to suffer a man to make love to me, who am to marry you to-morrow?

Har. But why, dearest Madam, will you be more concerned for his honour than he is himself? Let his honour alone, for my sake and his. He has no honour—

Spark. How's that?

Har. But what my dear friend can guard himself?

Spark. O ho—that's right again.

Ali. You astonish me, Sir, with want of jealousy.

Spark. And you make me giddy, Madam, with your jealousy and fears, and virtue and honour. Gad, I see virtue makes a woman as troublesome as a little reading or learning.

Har. Come, Madam, you see you strive in vain to make him jealous of me; my dear friend is the kindest creature in the world to me.

Spark. Poor fellow!

Har. But his kindness only is not enough for me, without your favour, your good opinion, dear Madam: 'tis that must perfect my happiness. Good gentleman, he believes all I say: would you would do so!—Jealous of me! I would not wrong him nor you for the world.

Spark. Look you there: hear him, hear him, and not walk away so; come back again.

[ALITHEA walks carelessly to and fro.

Har. I love you, Madam, so—

Spark. How's that? nay, now you begin to go too far indeed

Har. So much I confess I say I love you, that I would not have you miserable and cast yourself away upon so unworthy and inconsiderable a thing as what you see here.

[Claps his hand on his breast, and points to SPARKISH.]

Spark. No, faith, I believe thou wouldst not; now his meaning is plain; but I knew before thou wouldst not wrong me nor her.

Har. No, no, heavens forbid the glory of her sex should fall so low as into the embraces of such a contemptible wretch, the least of mankind—my dear friend here—I injure him.

[Embraces SPARKISH.]

Ali. Very well.

Spark. No, no, dear friend, I knew it: Madam, you see he will rather wrong himself than me in giving himself such names.

Ali. Do you not understand him yet?

Spark. Come, come, you shall stay till he has saluted you.

Re-enter MOODY and PEGGY. BELVILLE at a distance.

Moo. What, invite your wife to kiss men? Monstrous! Are you not ashamed?

Spark. Are you not ashamed that I should have more confidence in the chastity of your family than you have? You must not teach me: I am a man of honour, Sir, though I am frank and free; I am frank, Sir—

Moo. Very frank, Sir, to share your wife with your friends.—You seem to be angry, and yet want go. [To ALITHEA.]

Ali. No impertinence shall drive me away.

Moo. Because you like it—But you ought to blush at exposing your wife as you do.

[To SPARKISH.]

Spark. What then? It may be I have a pleasure in't, as I have to show fine clothes at a playhouse the first day, and count money before poor rogues.

Moo. He that shows his wife or money, will be in danger of having them borrowed sometimes.

Spark. I loved to be envied, and would not marry a wife that I alone could love. Loving alone is as dull as eating alone: and so good night, for I must to Whitehall—Madam, I hope you are now reconciled to my friend; and so I wish you a good night, Madam, and sleep if you can; for to-morrow, you know, I must visit you early with a canonical gentleman. Good night, dear Harcourt—remember to send your brother.

[Exit.]

Har. You may depend upon me.—Madam, I hope you will not refuse my visit to-morrow, if it should be earlier, with a canonical gentleman, than Mr. Sparkish?

Moo. This gentleman is yet under my care, therefore you must yet forbear your freedom with her.

Har. Must, Sir?

Moo. Yes, Sir, she is my sister.

Har. 'Tis well she is, Sir; for I must be her servant, Sir.—Madam—

Moo. Come away, sister; we had been gone if it had not been for you, and so avoided these lewd rake-hells, who seem to haunt us.

Har. I see a little time in the country makes a man turn wild and unsocial, and only fit to converse with his horses, dogs, and his herds.

Moo. I have business, Sir, and must mind it:

your business is pleasure; therefore you and I must go different ways.

Har. Well, you may go on; but this pretty young gentleman [Takes hold of PEGGY.] shall stay with us; for I suppose his business is the same with ours, pleasure.

Moo. 'Sdeath, he knows her, she carries it so sillily; yet if he does not, I should be more silly to discover it first. [Aside.] Come, come.

Har. Had you not rather stay with us? [To PEGGY.] Pr'ythee, who is this pretty young fellow?

[To MOODY.]

Moo. One to whom I am guardian.—I wish I could keep her out of your hands. [Aside.]

Har. Who is he? I never saw any thing so pretty in all my life.

Moo. 'Shaw, do not look upon him so much; he's a poor bashful youth; you'll put him out of countenance. [Offers to take her away.]

Har. Here, nephew, let me introduce this young gentleman to your acquaintance. You are very like, and of the same age, and should know one another. Salute him, Dick, a la Française. [BELVILLE kisses her.]

Moo. I hate French fashions. Men kiss one another! [Endeavours to take hold of her.]

Peg. I am out of my wits. [Aside.] What do you kiss me for? I am no woman.

Har. But you are ten times handsomer.

Peg. Nay, now you jeer one; and pray don't jeer me.

Har. Kiss him again, Dick.

Moo. No, no, no;—come away, come away. [To PEGGY.]

Har. Why, what haste you are in! Why would you let me talk with him?

Moo. Because you'll debauch him; he's yet young and innocent. How she gazes upon him! The devil! [Aside.] Come, pray let him go; I cannot stay fooling any longer; I tell you my wife stays supper for us.

Har. Does she? Come then, we'll all go sup with her.

Moo. No, no; now I think on't, having staid so long for us, I warrant she's gone to bed. I wish she and I were well out of your hands.

[Aside.]

Har. Well then, if she be gone to bed, I wish her and you a good night. But pray, young gentleman, present my humble service to her.

Peg. Thank you heartily, Sir. [Bows.]

Moo. 'Sdeath, she will discover herself yet in spite of me. [Aside.]

Bel. And mine too, Sir.

Peg. That I will indeed. [Bows.]

Har. Pray give her this kiss for me. [Kisses her.]

Moo. O heavens! what do I suffer! [Aside.]

Bel. And this for me. [Kisses her.]

Peg. Thank you, Sir.

[Courtesies; BELVILLE and HARCOURT laugh, and exeunt.]

Moo. O the idiot!—Now 'tis out. Ten thousand cankers gnaw away their lips! [Aside.] Come, come, driveller. [MOODY, PEGGY, and ALITHEA, go out and return.] So they are gone at last. Sister, stay with Peggy, till I find my servant. Don't let her stir an inch; I'll be back directly. [Exit.]

Re-enter HARCOURT and BELVILLE.

Har. What, not gone yet?—Nephew, show the young gentleman Rosamond's pond, while I speak another word to this lady.

[Exeunt BELVILLE and PEGGY; ALITHEA and HARCOURT struggle.]

Alithea. My brother will go distracted.

Re-enter MOODY.

Moo. Where? how?—What's become of—gone!—whither?

Alithea. In the next walk only, brother.

Moo. Only—only—where—where? [Exit.]

Har. What's the matter with him? Why so much concerned?—But, dearest Madam—

Re-enter MOODY.

Moo. Gone, gone—not to be found—quite gone—ten thousand plagues go with 'em! Which way went they?

Alithea. But in t'other walk, brother.

Moo. T'other walk! t'other devil. Where are they, I say?

Alithea. You are too abusive, brother.

Moo. You know where they are, you infamous wretch, eternal shame of your family; which you do not dishonour enough yourself, you think, but you must help her to do it too, thou legion of—

Alithea. Good brother—

Moo. Damned, damned sister! [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—Another part of the Park.

Enter BELVILLE and PEGGY.

Bel. No disguise could conceal you from my heart: I pretended not to know you, that I might deceive the dragon that continually watches over you: but now he's asleep, let us fly from misery to happiness.

Peggy. Indeed, Mr. Belville, as well as I like you, I can't think of going away with you so; and as much as I hate my guardian, I must take leave of him a little handsomely, or he will kill me, so he will.

Bel. But, dear Miss Peggy, think of your situation; if we don't make the best use of this opportunity, we never may have another.

Peggy. Ay but, Mr. Belville, I am as good as married already; my guardian has contracted me, and there wants nothing but church ceremony to make us one: I call him husband, and he calls me wife already: he made me do so: and we had been married in church long ago, if the writings could have been finished.

Bel. That's his deceit, my sweet creature.—He pretends to have married you, for fear of your liking any body else. You have a right to choose for yourself; and there is no law in heaven or earth that binds you before marriage to a man you cannot like.

Peggy. Fack, no more I believe it does; sister Alithea's maid has told me as much. She's a very sensible girl.

Bel. You are in the very jaws of perdition, and nothing but running away can avoid it: the law will finish your chains to-morrow, and the church will rivet them the day after. Let us secure our happiness by escape, and love and fortune will do the rest for us.

Peggy. These are fine sayings, to be sure, Mr. Belville: but how shall we get my fortune out of his clutches? We must be a little cunning; 'tis worth trying for. We can at any time run away without it.

Bel. I see by your fears, my dear Peggy, that you live in awe of this brutal guardian; and if he has you once more in his possession, both you and your fortune are secured to him for ever.

Peggy. Ay, but it sha'n't though; I thank him for that.

Bel. If you marry without his consent, he can but seize upon half your fortune. The other half, and a younger brother's fortune, with a treasure of love, are your own. Take it, my sweetest Peggy, and this moment, or we shall be divided for ever.

[Kneels and presses her hand.]

Peggy. Fackins, but we wont. Your fine talk has bewitched me.

Bel. 'Tis you have bewitched me, thou dear, enchanting, sweet simplicity!—Let us fly with the wings of love to my house there, and we shall be safe for ever.

Peggy. And so we will then.—There, squeeze my hand again.—Now run away with me; and if my gurdy follows us, the devil take the hindmost, I say.

[Going.]

Enter MOODY hastily, and meets them.

Moo. Oh! there's my strayed sheep, and the wolf again in sheep's clothing.—Now I have recovered her, I shall come to my senses again. [Aside.] Where have you been, you puppy?

Peggy. Been, bud?—We have been hunting all over the Park to find you.

Bel. From one end to t'other, Sir.

[Confusedly.]

Moo. But not where I was to be found, you young devil you!—Why did you start when you saw me?

Peggy. I'm always frightened when I see you; and if I did not love you so well, I should run away from you; so I should.

[Pouts.]

Moo. But I'll take care you don't.

Peggy. This gentleman has a favour to beg of you, bud!

[BELVILLE makes signs of dislike.]

Moo. I am not in the humour to grant favours to young gentlemen, though you may. What have you been doing with this young lady—gentleman, I would say?

Peggy. Fy, bud, you have told all.

Bel. I have been as civil as I could to the young stranger; and if you'll permit me, I will take the trouble off your hands, and show the young spark Rosamond's pond; for he has not seen it yet.—Come, pretty young, will you go with me?

[Goes to her.]

Peggy. As my guardian pleases.

Moo. No, no, it does not please me. Whatever I think he ought to see, I shall show him myself. You may visit Rosamond's pond, if you will; and the bottom of it, if you will.—And so, Sir, your servant.

[Exit MOODY, with PEGGY under his arm; BELVILLE, a contrary way.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—MOODY'S House

Enter LUCY and ALITHEA.

Alithea. Hold your peace.

Lucy. Nay, Madam, I will ask you the reason why you would banish poor Mr. Harcourt for ever from your sight? how could you be so hard-hearted?

Alc. 'Twas because I was not hard-hearted.

Lucy. No, no; 'twas stark love and kindness, I warrant.

Alc. It was so; I would see him no more, because I love him.

Lucy. Hey-day! a very pretty reason.

Alc. You do not understand me.

Lucy. I wish you may yourself.

Alc. I was engaged to marry, you see, another man, whom my justice will not suffer me to deceive or injure.

Lucy. Can there be a greater cheat or wrong done to a man, than to give him your person without your heart? I should make a conscience of it.

Alc. Hold your tongue.

Lucy. That you know I can't do, Madam; and upon this occasion, I will talk for ever. What, give yourself away to one, that poor I, your maid, would not accept of?

Alc. How, Lucy?

Lucy. I would not, upon my honour, Madam. 'Tis never too late to repent. Take a man, and give up your coxcomb, I say.

Enter a SERVANT.

Serv. Mr. Sparkish, with company, Madam, attends you below.

Alc. I will wait upon 'em. [Exit SERVANT.] My heart begins to fail me, but I must go through with it. Go with me, Lucy. [Exit.]

Lucy. Not I indeed, Madam. If you will leap the precipice you shall fall by yourself. What excellent advice have I thrown away! So I'll e'en take it where it will be more welcome.—Miss Peggy is bent upon mischief against her guardian, and she can't have a better privy counsellor than myself.—I must be busy one way or another. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—Another Chamber in MOODY'S House.

Enter MOODY and PEGGY.

Moo. I saw him kiss your hand before you saw me.—This pretence of liking my sister was all a blind—the young abandoned hypocrite! [Aside.] Tell me I say—for I know he likes you, and was hurrying you to his house—tell me, I say—

Peg. Lord, han't I told it a hundred times over?

Moo. I would try if, in the repetition of an ungrateful tale, I could find her altering it in the least circumstance; for, if her story is false, she is so too.—[Aside.] Come, how was't, baggage?

Peg. Lord, what pleasure you take to hear it sure?

Moo. No, you take more in telling it, I find; but speak, how was't? No lies; I saw him kiss you; he kissed you before my face.

Peg. Nay, you need not be so angry with him neither; for, to say truth, he has the sweetest breath I ever knew.

Moo. The devil!—You were satisfied with it then, and would do it again?

Peg. Not unless he should force me.

Moo. Force you, changeling?

Peg. If I had struggled too much, you know, he would have known had I been a woman; so I was quiet, for fear of being found out.

Moo. If you had been in petticoats, you would have knocked him down?

Peg. With what, bud?—I could not help myself; besides, he did it so modestly, and blushed so, that I almost thought him a girl in men's clothes, and upon his innumery too as well as me; and if so, there was no harm done you know.

Moo. This is worse and worse. So 'tis plain she loves him, yet she has not love enough to make her conceal it from me; but the sight of him will increase her aversion for me, and love for him; and that love instruct her how to deceive me, and satisfy him, all idiot as she is. Love; 'twas he gave women first their craft, their art of deluding. I must strangle that little monster whilst I can deal with him. [Aside.] Go, fetch pen, ink, and paper, out of the next room.

Peg. Yes, I will, bud.

Moo. Go then.

Peg. I'm going.

Moo. Why don't you go then?

Peg. Lord, I'm going. [Exit.]

Moo. This young fellow loves her, and she loves him; the rest is all hypocrisy.—How the young modest villain endeavoured to deceive me! But I'll crush this mischief in the shell. Why should women have more invention in love than men? It can only be because they have more desire, more soliciting passions, more of the devil

Re-enter PEGGY, with pen, ink, and paper.

Come, minx, sit down and write.

Peg. Ay, dear, dear bud! but I can't do't very well.

Moo. I wish you could not at all.

Peg. But what should I write for?

Moo. I'll have you write a letter to this young man.

Peg. O Lord, to the young gentleman a letter?

Moo. Yes, to the young gentleman.

Peg. Lord, you do but jeer; sure, you jest.

Moo. I am not so merry. Come, sit down, and write as I bid you.

Peg. What, do you think I am a fool?

Moo. She's afraid I would not dictate my love to him, therefore she's unwilling. [Aside.] But you had best begin.

Peg. Indeed and indeed but I wont, so I wont.

Moo. Why?

Peg. Because he's in town. You may send for him here, if you will.

Moo. Very well, you would have him brought to you? Is it come to this? I say take the pen and ink, and write, or you'll provoke me.

Peg. Lord, what do you make a fool of me for?—Don't I know that letters are never writ but from the country to London, and from London into the country? Now he's in town, and I'm in town too; therefore I can't write to him, you know.

Moo. So, I'm glad it's no worse; she is innocent enough yet. [Aside.] Yes, you may, when your husband bids, write letters to people that are in town.

Peg. O, may I so? then I am satisfied.

Moo. Come, begin—Sir—

Peg. Sha'n't I say, dear Sir? you know one says always something more than bare, Sir, up in a corner.

Moo. Write as I bid you, or I will write something with this penknife in your face.

Peg. Sir— [Writes.]
 Moo. Though I suffered last night your nauseous, loathed kisses and embraces—Write!

Peg. Nay, why should I say so? you know, I told you he had a sweet breath.

Moo. Write!

Peg. Let me put out loathed.

Moo. Write, I say.

Peg. Well then.

Moo. Let me see what you have writ. [Reads.] Though I suffered last night your kisses and embraces—Thou impudent creature, where is nauseous and loathed?

Peg. I can't abide to write such filthy words.

Moo. Once more write as I'd have you, or I will spoil your writing with this; I will stab out those eyes that cause my mischief.

[Holds up the penknife.]

Peg. O Lord, I will.

Moo. So—so—let's see now:—though I suffered last night your nauseous, loathed kisses and embraces—go on—yet I would not have you presume that you shall ever repeat them—so—

[PEGGY writes.]

Peg. I have writ it.

Moo. O then—I then concealed myself from your knowledge to avoid your insolencies—

[PEGGY writes.]

Peg. To avoid—

Moo. Your insolencies—

Peg. Your insolencies.

[Writes.]

Moo. The same reason, now I am out of your hands—

Peg. So—

Moo. Makes me own to you my unfortunate—though innocent frolic, in being in boy's clothes.

[PEGGY writes.]

Peg. So—

Moo. That you may for evermore—

Peg. Evermore?

Moo. Evermore cease to pursue her who hates and detests you—

[PEGGY writes.]

Peg. So—

Moo. What do you sigh for?—detests you—as much as she loves her husband and her honour—

Peg. I vow, husband, he'll never believe I should write such a letter.

[Writes.]

Moo. What, he'd expect a kinder one from you? Come, now your name only.

Peg. What sha'n't I say—your most faithful humble servant till death?

Moo. No, tormenting fiend! [PEGGY writes.]—Her style, I find, would be very soft. [Aside.]

Come, wrap it up now, whilst I go fetch wax and a candle, and write on the outside—For Mr. Belville.

[Exit.]

Peg. [Writes.] For Mr. Belville.—So.—I am glad he is gone—Hark, I hear a noise.

Moo. [Within.] Well, well, but can't you call again—Well, walk in then.

Peg. [Goes to the door.] I'fack, there's folks with him—

Moo. [Within.] Very well—if he must see me, I'll come to him.

Peg. That's pure; now I may think a little—Why should I send dear Mr. Belville such a letter?—Can one have no shift? ah, a London woman would have had a hundred presently—Stay—what if I should write a letter, and wrap it up like this, and write upon it too?—Ay, but then my guardian would see't—I don't know what to do—But yet y'vads I'll try, so I will—for I will not send this letter to poor Mr. Belville, come what will on't. [Writes, and repeats what she writes.]—Dear, dear, dear, sweet Mr. Belville—so—My guardian would have me send you a base, rude letter, but I won't—so—and would have me say I hate you, but I won't—there—for I'm sure if you and I were in the country at cards together—so—I could not help treading on your toe under the table—so pray keep at home, for I shall be with you as soon as I can—so no more at present from one who am, dear, dear, poor dear Mr. Belville, your loving friend till death do us part, MARGARET THRIPT.—So—now wrap it up just like t'other—so—now write For Mr. Belville.—But, oh! what shall I do with it? for here comes my guardian.

[Puts it in her bosom.]

Re-enter MOODY, with a candle and sealing-wax.

Moo. I have been detained by a sparkish coxcomb, who pretended to visit me; but I fear 'twas to my wife. [Aside.] What, have you done?

Peg. Ay, ay, bud, just now.

Moo. Let's see't; what d'ye tremble for?—

[He opens and reads the first letter.]

Peg. So, I had been finely served if I had given him this.

[Aside.]

Moo. Come, where's the wax and seal?

Peg. Lord, what shall I do? [Aside.] Pray let me see't. Lord, you think I cannot seal a letter; I will do't, so I will.

[Snatches the Letter from him, changes it for the other, seals it, and delivers it to him.]

Moo. Nay, I believe you will learn that and other things too, which I would not have you.

Peg. So, ha'nt I done it curiously? I think I have—there's my letter going to Mr. Belville, since he'll needs have me send letters to folks.

[Aside.]

Moo. 'Tis very well; but I warrant you would not have it go now?

Peg. Yes, indeed, but I would, bud, now.

Moo. Well, you are a good girl then. Come, let me lock you up in your chamber till I come back; and be sure you come not within three strides of the window when I am gone, for I have a spy in the street. [Puts her into the Chamber.] At least 'tis fit she thinks so; if we do not cheat women, they'll cheat us.—Now I have secured all within, I'll deal with the foe without, with false intelligence.

[Exit.]

SCENE III.—BELVILLE'S Lodgings.

Enter LUCY and BELVILLE.

Lucy. I run great risks, to be sure, to serve the young lady and you, Sir; but I know you are a gentleman of honour, and would scorn to betray a friend who means you well, and is above being mercenary.

Bel. As you are not mercenary, Mrs. Lucy, I ought to be the more generous; give me leave to present you with this trifle; [Gives her a ring.] not as a reward for your services, but as a small token of friendship.

Lucy. Though I scorn to be bribed in any cause, yet I am proud to accept it as a mark of your regard, and as such shall keep it for your sake—and now to business.

Bel. But has the dear creature resolved?

Lucy. Has she? why she will run away and marry you, in spite of your teeth, the first moment she can break prison; so you, in your turn, must take care not to have your quails: I have known several bold gentlemen not able to draw their swords, when a challenge has come too quick upon 'em.

Bel. I assure you, Mrs. Lucy, that I am no bully in love; and Miss Peggy will meet with her match, come when she will.

Lucy. Ay, so you all say; but talking does no business. Stay at home till you hear from us.

Bel. Blessings on thee, Lucy, for the thought.

Moo. [Without.] But I must and will see him, let him have what company he will.

Lucy. As I hope to be married, Mr. Belville, I hear Mr. Moody's voice. Where shall I hide myself?—if he sees me, we are all undone.

Bel. This is our cursed luck again. What the devil can he want here? Get into this closet till he is gone. [Puts Lucy into the closet.] Don't you stir, Lucy. I must put the best face upon the matter. Now for it.

[Takes a Book, and reads.]

Enter MOODY.

Moo. You will excuse me, Sir, for breaking through forms, and your servant's entreaties, to have the honour—but you are alone, Sir—your fellow told me below, that you were with company.

Bel. Yes, Sir, the best company. [Shows his Book.] When I converse with my betters, I choose to have 'em alone.

Moo. And I choose to interrupt your conversation! the business of my errand must plead my excuse.

Bel. You shall be always welcome to me; but you seem ruffled, Sir. What brings you hither, and so seemingly out of humour?

Moo. Your impertinency—I beg pardon—your modesty, I mean.

Bel. My impertinency!

Moo. Your impertinency!

Bel. Sir, from the peculiarity of your character, and your intimacy with my uncle, I shall allow you great privileges; but you must consider youth has its privileges too; and as I have not the honour of your acquaintance I am not obliged to bear with your ill humours, or your ill manners.

Moo. They who wrong me, young man, must bear with both: and if you had not made too free with me, I should have taken no liberties with you.

Bel. I could have wished, Sir, to have found you a little more civil, the first time I had the honour of a visit from you.

Moo. If that is all you want, young gentleman, you will find me very civil indeed! There, Sir, read that, and let your modesty declare whether I want either kindness or civility. Look you there, Sir.

Bel. What is it? [Gives him a letter.]

Moo. Only a love-letter, Sir; and from my wife.

Bel. How, is it from your wife?—hum and hum. [Reads.]

Moo. Even from my wife, Sir; am not I wondrous kind and civil to you now too? But you'll not think her so. [Aside.]

Bel. Ha! is this a trick of his or hers? [Aside.]

Moo. The gentleman's surprised. I find! What, you expected a kinder letter!

Bel. No, faith, not I; how could I?

Moo. Yes, yes, I'm sure you did; a man so young and well made as you are, must needs be disappointed, if the women declare not their passion at the first sight or opportunity.

Bel. But what should this mean? It seems he knows not what the letter contains. [Aside.]

Moo. Come, ne'er wonder at it so much.

Bel. Faith, I can't help it.

Moo. Now, I think, I have deserved your infinite friendship and kindness, and have shown myself sufficiently an obliging, kind friend and husband; am I not so, to bring a letter from my wife to her gallant!

Bel. Ay, indeed, you are the most obliging, kind friend and husband in the world; ha, ha, ha! Pray, however, present my humble service to her, and tell her I will obey her letter to a tittle, and fulfil her desires, be what they will, or with what difficulty soever I do't: and you shall be no more jealous of me, I warrant her and you.

Moo. Well then, fare you well, and play with any man's honour but mine; kiss any man's wife but mine, and welcome—so, Mr. Modesty, your servant. [Going.]

Enter SPARKISH, meeting him.

Spark. So brother-in-law that was to have been, I have followed you from home to Belville's; I have strange news for you.

Moo. What, are you wiser than you were this morning?

Spark. Faith, I don't know but I am, for I have lost your sister, and I sha'n't eat half an ounce the less at dinner for it; there's philosophy for you.

Moo. Insensibility, you mean. I hope you don't mean to use my sister ill, Sir?

Spark. No, Sir, she has used me ill; she's in her tantrums: I have had a narrow escape, Sir.

Moo. If thou art endowed with the smallest portion of understanding, explain this riddle.

Bel. Ay, ay, pr'ythee, Sparkish, condescend to be intelligible.

Spark. Why, you must know—we had settled to be married—it is the same thing to me whether I am married or not—I have no particular fancy one way or another, and so I told your sister; off or on, 'tis the same thing to me; but the thing was fixed, you know—You and my aunt brought it about; I had no hand in it. And, to show you that I was as willing to marry your sister as any other woman, I suffered the law to tie me up to hard terms; and the church would have finished me still to harder—but she was taken with her tantrums!

Moo. Damn your tantrums, come to the point.

Spark. Your sister took an aversion to the parson, Frank Harcourt's brother—abused him like a pickpocket, and swore 'twas Harcourt himself.

Moo. And so it was, for I saw him.

Spark. Why, you are as mad as your sister; I tell you it was Ned, Frank's twin brother.

Moo. What, Frank told you so?

Spark. Ay, and Ned too; they were both in a story.

Moo. What an incorrigible fellow!—Come, come, I must be gone.

Spark. Nay, nay, you shall hear my story out—She walked up within pistol-shot of the church, then twirled round upon her heel, called me every name she could think of; and when she had exhausted her imagination, and tired her tongue (no easy matter let me tell you,) she called her chair, sent her footman to buy a monkey before my face, then bid me good morrow with a sneer, and left us with our mouths open in the middle of a hundred people, who were all laughing at us! If these are not tantrums, I don't know what are.

Moo. Ha, ha, ha! I thank thee, Sparkish, from my soul; 'tis a most exquisite story; I have not had such a laugh for this half year. Thou art a most ridiculous puppy, and I am infinitely obliged to thee; ha, ha, ha! [Exit.]

Spark. Did you ever hear the like, Belville? Bel. O yes; how is it possible to hear such a foolish story, and see thy foolish face, and not laugh at 'em? ha, ha, ha!

[Lucy in the closet laughs.]

Spark. Hey-day? what's that? What, have you raised a devil in the closet to make up a laughing chorus at me? I must take a peep—

[Going to the closet.]

Bel. Indeed, but you must not.

Spark. It was a woman's voice.

Bel. So much the better for me.

Spark. Pr'ythee, introduce me.

Bel. Though you take a pleasure in exposing your ladies, I choose to conceal mine; so, my dear Sparkish, lest the lady should be sick by too long a confinement, and laughing heartily at you, I must entreat you to withdraw. Pr'ythee, excuse me, I must laugh—ha, ha, ha, ha!

Spark. Do you know that I begin to be angry, Belville?

Bel. I can't help that—ha, ha, ha, ha!

Spark. My character's at stake; I shall be thought a damned silly fellow; I will call Alithea to an account directly. [Exit.]

Bel. Ha, ha, ha!

Lucy. [Peeping out.] Ha, ha, ha, ha! O dear, Sir, let me have my laugh out, or I shall burst. What an adventure! [Comes out, and laughs.]

Bel. My sweet Peggy has sent me the kindest letter—and by the dragon himself: there's a spirit for you!

Lucy. There's simplicity for you! show me a town-bred girl with half the genius—Send you a love-letter, and by a jealous guardian too! ha, ha, ha! 'Tis too much—too much—Ha, ha, ha! —Well, Mr. Belville! the world goes as it should do—my mistress will exchange her fool for a wit; Miss Peggy her brute for a pretty young fellow; I shall dance at two weddings; be well rewarded by both parties; get a husband myself; and be as happy as the best of you; and so your humble servant. [Exit.]

Bel. Success attend you, Lucy. [Exit.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—MOODY'S HOUSE.

PEGGY discovered alone, leaning on her elbow on a table, with pen, ink, and paper.

Peg. Well, 'tis e'en so; I have got the London disease they call love; I am sick of my guardian, and dying for Mr. Belville! I have heard this distemper called a fever, but methinks it is like an ague; for when I think of my guardian, I tremble, and am so cold; but when I think of my gallant, dear Mr. Belville, my hot fit comes, and I am all in a fever indeed. Ah! poor Mr. Bel-ville! well, I will not stay here; therefore I'll make an end of my letter to him, which shall be a finer letter than my last, because I have studied it like any thing. Oh! sick, sick!

Enter Moody, who, seeing her writing, steals softly behind her, and looking over her shoulder, snatches the paper from her.

Moo. What, writing more letters?

Peg. O Lord, bud! why d'ye fright me so?

[She offers to run out; he stops her, and reads.]

Moo. How's this! nay, you shall not stir, Madam. [Reads.] Dear, dear Mr. Belville—Very well, I have taught you to write letters to good purpose—but let's see't—First I am to beg your pardon for my boldness in writing to you, which I'd have you to know I would not have done, had you not said first you loved me so extremely; which if you do, you will never suffer me to be another man's, who I loath, nauseate, and detest:—Now you can write these filthy words. But what follows?—therefore I hope you will speedily find some way to free me from this unfortunate match, which was never, I assure you, of my choice; but I'm afraid 'tis already too far gone; however, if you love me as I do you, you will try what you can do; you must help me away before to-morrow, or else, alas! I shall be for ever out of your reach, for I can defer no longer our—our—what is to follow our?—speak, what? our journey into the country, I suppose—Oh, woman! damned! woman and love, damned love! their old temper; for this is one of his miracles; in a moment he can make those blind that could see, and those see that were blind; those dumb that could speak, and those prattle who were dumb before.—But make an end of your letter, and then I'll make an end of you thus, and all my plagues together. [Draws his sword.]

Peg. O Lord! O Lord! you are such a passionate man, bud!

Moo. Come, take the pen, and make an end of the letter, just as you intended; if you are false in a tittle I shall soon perceive it, and punish you with this as you deserve. [Lays his hand on his sword.]—Write what was to follow—let's see—You must make haste and help me away before to-morrow, or else I shall be for ever out of your reach, for I can defer no longer our—what follows our?— [PEG takes the pen, and writes.]

Peg. Must all out then, bud!—Look you there then.

Moo. Let's see—for I can defer no longer our wedding—Your slighted Alithea.—What's the meaning of this? my sister's name to't! speak; unriddle.

Peg. Yes, indeed, bud.

Moo. But why her name to't? speak—speak, I say.

Peg. Ay, but you'll tell her again; if you would not tell her again—

Moo. I will not; I am stunned; my head turns round. Speak.

Peg. Wont you tell her indeed, and indeed?

Moo. No; speak, I say.

Peg. She'll be angry with me; but I would rather she should be angry with me than you, bud. And to tell the truth, 'twas she made me write the letter, and taught me what I should write.

Moo. Ha!—I thought the style was somewhat better than her own. [Aside.] Could she come to you to teach you, since I had locked you up alone?

Peg. Oh, through the key-hole, bud.

Moo. But why should she make you write a letter for her to him, since she can write herself?

Peg. Why she said because—

Moo. Because what—because—

Peg. Why because, bud—

Moo. Because what, I say?

Peg. Because, lest Mr. Belville, as he was so young, should be inconstant, and refuse her; or be vain afterwards, and show the letter, she might disown it, the hand not being hers.

Moo. Belville again!—Am I to be deceived again with that young hypocrite?

Peg. You have deceived yourself, bud; you have indeed. I have kept the secret for my sister's sake, as long as I could—but you must know it—and shall know it too. [Cries.]

Moo. Dry your eyes.

Peg. You always thought he was hankering after me—Good law! he's dying for Alithea, and Alithea for him; they have had private meetings; and he was making love to her before yesterday, from the tavern window, when you thought it was me. I would have discovered all, but she made me swear to deceive you; and so I have finely; have not I, bud?

Moo. Why did you write that foolish letter to him then, and make me more foolish to carry it?

Peg. To carry on the joke, bud—to oblige them?

Moo. And will nothing serve her but that great baby?—he's too young for her to marry.

Peg. Why do you marry me then?—'Tis the same thing, bud.

Moo. No, no; 'tis quite different. How innocent she is! [Aside.—] But hark you, Madam, your sister went out this morning, and I have not seen her within since.

Peg. Alack-a-day, she has been crying all day above, it seems, in a corner.

Moo. Where is she? let me speak with her.

Peg. O Lord! then she'll discover all. [Aside.—] Pray hold, bud; what, d'ye mean to discover me? she'll know I have told you then. Pray, bud, let me talk with her first.

Moo. I must speak with her to know whether Belville ever made her any promise, and whether she will be married to Sparkish or no.

Peg. Pray, dear bud, don't till I have spoken with her, and told her that I have told you all; for she'll kill me else.

Moo. Go then, and bid her come to me.

Peg. Yes, yes, bud.

Moo. Let me see—

Peg. I have just got time to know of Lucy, who first set me to work, what lie I shall tell next; for I am e'en at my wits end.

[Aside, and exit.]

Moo. Well, I resolve it; Belville shall have her: I'd rather give him my sister, than lend him my wife; and such an alliance will prevent his pretensions to my wife, sure: I'll make him of kin to her, and then he wont care for her.

Re-enter PEGGY.

Peg. O Lord, bud, I told you what anger you would make with my sister.

Moo. Wont she come?

Peg. No, she wont, she's ashamed to look you in the face; she'll go directly to Mr. Belville, she says. Pray let her have her way, bud—she wont be pacified if you don't—and will never forgive me. For my part, bud, I believe, but don't tell any body, they have broken a piece of silver between 'em—or have contracted one another, as we have done, you know, which is the next thing to being married.

Moo. Pooh! you fool—she is ashamed of talking with me about Belville, because I made the match for her with Sparkish; but Sparkish is a fool, and I have no objection to Belville's family or fortune—tell her so.

Peg. I will bud.

[Going.]

Moo. Stay, stay, Peggy, let her have her own way; she shall go to Belville herself, and I'll follow her—that, will be best—let her have her whim.

Peg. You're in the right, bud; for they have certainly had a quarrel, by her crying and hanging her head so: I'll be hanged if her eyes an't swelled out of her head, she's in such a piteous taking.

Moo. Belville sha'n't use her ill, I'll take care of that; if he has made her a promise, he shall keep to it: but she had better go first—I will follow her at a distance, that she may have no interruption; and I will wait in the Park before I see them, that they may come to a reconciliation before I come upon 'em.

Peg. Law, bud, how wise you are!—I wish I had half your wisdom; you see every thing at once. Stand a one side then—there, a little further that way.

Moo. And so I will; she sha'n't see me till I break in upon her at Belville's.

Peg. Now for it.

[Exit.]

Moo. My case is something better; for suppose the worst—should Belville use her ill—I had rather fight him for not marrying my sister, than for debauching my wife, for I will make her mine absolutely to-morrow; and of the two, I had rather find my sister too forward than my wife: I expected no other from her free education, as she calls it, and her passion for the town. Well, wife and sister are names which make us expect love and duty, pleasure and comfort; but we find 'em plagues and torments, and are equally, though differently, troublesome to their keeper. But here she comes. [Steps on one side.]

Re-enter PEGGY, dressed like ALITHEA; as she passes over the stage, she seems to sigh, sob, and wipe her eyes.

Peg. Heigho!

[Exit.]

Moo. [Comes forward.] There the poor devil goes, sighing and sobbing, a woful example of the fatal consequences of a town education; but I am bound in duty, as well as inclination, to do my utmost to save her—but first I'll secure my own property.—[Opens the door and calls.—] Peggy! Peggy! my dear!—I will return as soon as possible—do you hear me? why don't you answer? you may read in the book I bought you till I come back.—As the Jew says in the play, "fast bind, fast find." [Locks the door.] This is the best and only security for female affections. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—The Park, before BELVILLE'S House.

Enter SPARKISH, fuddled.

Spark. If I can but meet with her, or any body that belongs to her, they will find me a match for 'em. When a man has wit, and a great deal of it, champagne gives it a double edge, and nothing can withstand it—'tis a lighted match to gunpowder.—I was right to consult my friends, and they all agree with Moody, that I make a damned ridiculous figure, as matters stand at present. I'll consult Belville—this is his house—he's my friend too—and no fool—it shall be so—Damn it, I must not be ridiculous. [Going to the door, sees PEGGY coming.] Hold! hold! if the champagne does not hurt my eye-sight, while it sharpens my wit, the enemy is marching up this way.—Come on, Madam Alithea; now for a smart fire; and then let's see who will be ridiculous.

Enter PEGGY.

Peg. Dear me, I begin to tremble; there is Mr. Sparkish, and I can't get to Mr. Belville's house without passing by him. He sees me, and will discover me; he seems in liquor too.—Bless me!

Spark. O ho! she stands at bay a little; she don't much relish the engagement. The first blow is half the battle. I'll be a little figurative with her. [Aside; approaches her.] I find, Madam, you like a solo better than a duet. You need not have been walking alone this evening, if you had been wiser yesterday.—What, nothing to say for yourself?—Repentance, I suppose, makes you as awkward and as foolish as the poor country girl your brother has locked up in Pall-mall.

Peg. I'm frightened out of my wits.

Spark. Not a step further shall you go till you give me an account of your behaviour, and make me reparation for being ridiculous.—What, dumb still! then if you wont, by fair means, I must squeeze you to a confession. [As he goes to seize her, she slips by him; but he catches hold of her before she reaches BELVILLE'S door.] Not quite so fast, if you please.—Come, come, let me see your modest face, and hear your soft tongue, or I shall be tempted to use you ill.

Enter MOODY.

Moo. Hands off, you ruffian! How dare you use a lady, and my sister, in this manner?

[Takes her from SPARKISH.

Spark. She's my property, Sir; transferred to me by you: and though I would give her up to any body for a dirty sword-knot, yet I wont be bullied out of my right, though it is not worth that.—

[Snaps his fingers.

Moo. There's a fellow to be a husband!—You are justified in despising him and flying from him. I'll defend you with my purse and my sword.—Knock at that door, and let me speak to Belville. [PEGGY knocks at the door; when the FOOTMAN opens it, she runs in.]—Is your master at home, friend?

Foot. Yes, Sir.

Moo. Tell him then that I have rescued that lady from this gentleman, and that by her desire, and my consent, she flies to him for protection; if he can get a parson, let him marry her this minute; tell him so, and shut the door. [Exit FOOTMAN.] And now, Sir, if your wine has given you courage, you had better show it upon this occasion; for you are still damned ridiculous.

Spark. Did you ever hear the like?—Look-ye, Mr. Moody, we are in the Park, and to draw a sword is an offence to the court; so you may vapour as long as you please. A woman of so little taste is not worth fighting for; she's not worth my sword! but if you'll fight me to-morrow morning for diversion, I am your man.

Moo. Relinquish your title in the lady to Belville peacefully, and you may sleep in a whole skin.

Spark. Belville! he would not have your sister with the fortune of a nabob; no, no, his mouth waters at your country tit-bit at home; much good may it do him.

Moo. And you think so, puppy—ha, ha, ha!

Spark. Yes, I do, mastiff—ha, ha, ha!

Moo. Then thy folly is complete—ha, ha, ha!

Spark. Thine will be so, when thou hast married thy country innocent—ha, ha, ha!

[They laugh at each other.

Enter HARCOURT.

Spark. What, my boy Harcourt!

Moo. What brings you here, Sir?

Har. I followed you to Belville's to present a near relation of yours, and a nearer one of mine, to you. [Exit.

Spark. What's the matter now!

Re-enter HARCOURT, with ALITHEA.

Har. Give me leave, gentlemen, without offence to either, to present Mrs. Harcourt to you!

Spark. Alithea! your wife!—Mr. Moody, are you in the clouds too?

Moo. If I am not in a dream, I am the most miserable walking dog that ever ran mad with his misfortunes and astonishment!

Har. Why so, Jack? can you object to my happiness, when this gentleman was unworthy of it? [MOODY walks about in a rage.

Spark. This is very fine, very fine indeed!—Where's your story about Belville now, 'squire Moody? prythee don't chafe, and stare, and stride, and beat thy head, like a mad tragedy poet—but out with thy tropes and figures.

Moo. Zounds! I can't bear it.

[Goes hastily to BELVILLE'S door, and knocks hard.

Al. Dear brother, what's the matter?

Moo. The devil's the matter! the devil and women together. [Knocks again.] I'll break the door down, if they wont answer. [Knocks again.

FOOTMAN appears at the balcony.

Foot. What would your honour please to have?

Moo. Your master, rascal.

Foot. He is obeying your commands, Sir; and the moment he has finished, he will do himself the pleasure to wait on you.

Moo. You sneering villain you, if your master does not produce that she devil, who is now with him, and who, with a face of innocence, has cheated and undone me, I'll set fire to his house.

[Exit FOOTMAN.

Spark. 'Gad so! now I begin to smoke the business. Well said, simplicity, rural simplicity! 'Egad! if thou hast tricked Cerberus here, I shall be so ravished that I will give this couple a wedding dinner. Pray, Mr. Moody, who's damned ridiculous now?

Moo. [Going to SPARKISH.] Look ye, Sir—don't grin, for if you dare to show your teeth at my misfortunes, I'll dash 'em down your impudent throat, you jackanapes.

Spark. [Quite calm.] Very fine, faith—but I nave no weapons to butt with a mad bull, so you may toss and roar by yourself, if you please.

Enter BELVILLE, in the balcony.

Bel. What does my good friend want with me?

Moo. Are you a villain, or are you not?

Bel. I have obeyed your commands, Sir.

Moo. What have you done with the girl, Sir?

Bel. Made her my wife, as you desired.

Spark. Very true, I am your witness—

Moo. She 's my wife, and I demand her.

Enter PEGGY, in the balcony.

Peg. No, but I an't though, bud.—What 's the matter, dear, are you angry with me?

Moo. How dare you look me in the face, cockatrice?

Peg. How dare you look me in the face, bud? Have you not given me to another, when you ought to have married me yourself? have not you pretended to be married to me, when you knew in your conscience you was not? and have you not been shilly-shally for a long time; so that if I had not married dear Mr. Belville, I should not have married at all—so I should not.

[BELVILLE and PEGGY retire from the balcony.]

Spark. Extremely pleasant, faith; ha, ha, ha!

Moo. I am stupified with shame, rage, and astonishment—my fate has overcome me—I can struggle no more with it. [Sighs.] What is left me?—I cannot bear to look, or be looked upon—I will hurry down to my old house, take a twelve-month's provision into it—cut down my draw-bridge, run wild about my garden, which shall grow as wild as myself—then will I curse the world, and every individual in it—and when my rage and spirits fail me, I will be found dead among the nettles and thistles, a woful example of the baseness and treachery of one sex, and the falsehood, lying, perjury, deceit, impudence, and damnation, of the other. [Exit.]

Spark. Very droll, and extravagantly comic, I must confess; ha, ha, ha!

Re-enter BELVILLE and PEGGY.

Lookye, Belville, I wish you joy with all my heart—you have got the prize, and perhaps have caught a tartar—that 's no business of mine—if you want evidence for Mr. Moody's giving his consent to your marriage, I shall be ready. I bear no ill will to that pair: I wish you happy; [To ALITHEA and HARCOURT.]—though I'm sure they'll be miserable—and so your humble servant. [Exit.]

Peg. I hope you forgive me, Alithea, for playing your brother this trick; indeed I should have only made him and myself miserable, had we married together.

Al. Then 'tis much better as it is. But I am yet in the dark how this matter has been brought about; how your innocence, my dear, has outwitted his worldly wisdom?

Peg. I am sure I'll do any thing to please my bud, but marry him.

[She comes forward, and addresses the Audience:

But you, good gentry, what say you to this?

You are to judge me—have I done amiss?

I've reasons will convince you all, and strong ones;

Except old folks, who hanker after young ones;

Bud was so passionate, and grown so thrifty,

'Twas a sad life—and then, he was near fifty!

I'm but nineteen—my husband too is young,

So soft, so gentle, such a winning tongue!

Have I, pray ladies, speak, done very wrong?

As for poor bud, 'twas honest to deceive him!

More virtuous sure to cheat him than to grieve him.

Great folks, I know, will call me simple slut;

"Marry for love," they cry, "the country put!"

Marriage with them 's a fashion—soon grows cool:

But I'm for loving always, like a fool.

With half my fortune I would rather part,

Than be all finery, with an aching heart.

For these strange awkward notions don't abuse me;

And, as I know no better, pray excuse me.

[Exit.]

THE IRISH WIDOW:

A FARCE,

IN TWO ACTS.

BY DAVID GARRICK, Esq.

REMARKS.

This after piece, by Garrick, was originally intended to introduce the celebrated Mrs. Barry, in a novel species of character; and the piece was indebted, for much of its early success, to the peculiar ability of that lady as the widow Brady. It is now occasionally produced, for the same purpose; and has never had a more lovely character to protect it from the critics, than in the assumption of the breeches by Mrs. Mardyn.

Black Boy, Servants, &c.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—WHITTLE'S House.

Enter BATES and SERVANT.

Bates. Is he gone out? his card tells me to come directly—I did but lock up some papers, take my hat and cane, and away I hurried.

Serv. My master desires you will sit down, he will return immediately—he had some business with his lawyer, and went out in great haste, leaving the message I have delivered. Here is my young master. [Exit.]

Enter NEPHEW.

Bates. What, lively Billy!—Hold, I beg your pardon—melancholy William, I think—Here's a fine revolution—I hear your uncle, who was last month all gravity, and you all mirth, have changed characters; he is now all spirit, and you are in the dumps, young man.

Nep. And for the same reason—this journey to Scarborough will unfold the riddle.

Bates. Come, come, in plain English, and before your uncle comes, explain the matter.

Nep. In the first place, I am undone.

Bates. In love, I know—I hope your uncle is not undone too; that would be the devil!

Nep. He has taken possession of him in every sense. In short, he came to Scarborough to see the lady I had fallen in love with—

Bates. And fell in love himself?

Nep. Yes, and with the same lady.

Bates. That is the devil indeed!

Nep. O, Mr. Bates, when I thought my happiness complete, and wanted only my uncle's consent, to give me the independence he so often has promised me, he came to Scarborough for that purpose, and wished me joy of my choice; but, in less than a week, his approbation turned into a passion for her: he now hates the sight of me, and is resolved, with the consent of the father, to make her his wife directly.

Bates. So he keeps you out of your fortune, wont give his consent, which his brother's foolish will requires, and he would marry himself the same woman, because right, title, conscience, nature, justice, and every law divine and human, are against it.

Nep. Thus he tricks me at once both of wife and fortune, without the least want of either.

Bates. Well said, friend Whittle! but it can't be, it sha'n't be, and it must not be—this is murder and robbery in the strongest sense, and he sha'n't be hanged in chains to be laughed at by the whole town, if I can help it.

Nep. I am distracted, the widow is distressed, and we both shall run mad.

Bates. A widow too! 'gad a mercy, threescore and five!

Nep. But such a widow! She is now in town with her father, who wants to get her off his hands; 'tis equal to him who has her, so she is provided for—I hear somebody coming—I must away to her lodgings, where she waits for me to execute a scheme directly for our delivery.

Bates. What is her name, Billy?

Nep. Brady.

Bates. Brady! Is not she daughter to Sir Patrick O'Neale?

Nep. The same. She was sacrificed to the most senseless, drunken, profligate in the whole country. He lived to run out his fortune; and the only advantage she got from the union was, he broke that and his neck before he had broke her heart.

Bates. The affair of marriage is, in this country, put upon the easiest footing; there is neither love nor hate in the matter; necessity brings them together; they are united at first for their mutual convenience, and separated ever after for their particular pleasures—O rare matrimony!—Where does she lodge?

Nep. In Pall-Mall, near the hotel.

Bates. I'll call in my way, and assist at the consultation; I am for a bold stroke, if gentle methods should fail.

Nep. We have a plan, and a spirited one, if my sweet widow is able to go through it—pray let us have your friendly assistance—ours is the cause of love and reason.

Bates. Get you gone, with your love and reason, they seldom pull together now-a-days.—I'll give your uncle a dose first, and then I'll meet you at the widow's—What says your uncle's privy counsellor, Mr. Thomas, to this?

Nep. He is greatly our friend, and will enter sincerely into our service—he is honest, sensible, ignorant, and particular; a kind of half coxcomb, with a thorough good heart—but he's here.

Bates. Do you go about your business, and leave the rest to me. [Exit NEPHEW.]

Enter THOMAS with a pamphlet.

Mr. Thomas, I am glad to see you: upon my word, you look charmingly—you wear well, Mr. Thomas.

Tho. Which is a wonder, considering how times go, Mr. Bates—they'll wear and tear me too, if I don't take care of myself; my old master has taken the nearest way to wear himself out, and all that oelong to him.

Bates. Why surely this strange story about town is not true, that the old gentleman is fallen in love?

Tho. Ten times worse than that!

Bates. The devil!

Tho. And his horns,—going to be married!

Bates. Not if I can help it.

Tho. You never saw such an altered man in your born days! he's grown young again; he frisks, and prances, and runs about, as if he had a new pair of legs—he has left off his brown camlet surtout, which he wore all the summer: and now, with his hat under his arm, he goes open-breasted, and he dresses, and powders, and smirks, so that you wou'd take him for the mad Frenchman in Bedlam—something wrong in his upper story—Would you think it?—he wants me to wear a pig-tail?

Bates. Then he is far gone indeed!

Tho. As sure as you are there, Mr. Bates, a pig-tail!—we have had sad work about it—I made a compromise with him to wear these ruffled shirts which he gave me; but they stand in my way—I am not so listness with them—though I have tied up my hands for him, I wont tie up my head, that I am resolute.

Bates. This it is to be in love, Thomas!

Tho. He may make free with himself, he sha'n't make a fool of me—he has got his head into a bag, but I wont have a pig-tail tacked to mine—and so I told him—

Bates. What did you tell him?

Tho. That as I and my father, and his father before me, had wore their own hair as heaven had sent it, I thought myself rather too odd to set up for a monkey at my time of life, and wear a pig-tail—he, he, he!—he took it.

Bates. With a wry face, for it was wormwood.

Tho. Yes, he was frumped, and called me old blockhead, and would not speak to me the rest of the day—but the next day he was at it again—he then put me into a passion—and I could not help telling him, that I was an Englishman born, and had my prerogative as well as he; and that as long as I had breath in my body I was for liberty, and a straight head of hair.

Bates. Well said, Thomas—he could not answer that.

Tho. The poorest man in England is a match for the greatest, if he will but stick to the laws of the land, and the statute books, as they are delivered down to us from our forefathers.

Bates. You are right—we must lay our wits together, and drive the widow out of your old master's head, and put her into your young master's hands.

Tho. With all my heart—nothing can be more meritorious—marry at his years! what a terrible account would he make of it, Mr. Bates! Let me see—on the debtor side sixty-five—and per contra creditor, a buxom widow of twenty-three—He'll be a bankrupt in a fortnight—he, he, he!

Bates. And so he would, Mr. Thomas—what have you got in your hand?

Tho. A pamphlet, my old gentleman takes in—he has left off buying histories and religious pieces by numbers, as he used to do: and since he has got this widow in his head, he reads nothing but the Amorous Repository, Cupid's Revels, Call to Marriage, Hymen's Delights, Love lies a Bleeding, Love in the Suds, and such like tender compositions.

Bates. Here he comes, with all his folly about him.

Tho. Yes, and the first fool from Vanity-fair—Heaven help us—love turns man and woman topsy-turvy.

Whit. [Without.] Where is he? where is my good friend?

Enter WHITTLE.

Ha! here he is—give me your hand.

Bates. I am glad to see you in such spirits, my old gentleman.

Whit. Not so old neither; no man ought to be called old, friend Bates, if he is in health, spirits, and—

Bates. In his senses—which I should rather doubt, as I never saw you half so frolicsome in my life.

Whit. Never too old to learn, friend; and if I don't make use of my own philosophy now, I may wear it out in twenty years—I have been always bantered as of too grave a cast—you know, when I studied at Lincoln's Inn, they used to call me Young Wisdom.

Bates. And if they should call you Old Folly, it will be a much worse name.

Whit. No young jackanapes dares to call me so, while I have this friend at my side.

[Touches his sword.]

Bates. A hero too! What in the name of common sense, is come to you, my friend!—high spirits, quick honour, a long sword, and a bag!—you want nothing but to be terribly in love, and then you may sally forth Knight of the Woful Countenance. Ha, ha, ha!

Whit. Mr. Bates—the ladies who are the best judges of countenances, are not of your opinion; and unless you'll be a little serious, I must beg pardon for giving you this trouble, and I'll open my mind to some more attentive friend.

Bates. Well, come, unlock then, you wild, handsome, vigorous, young dog you—I will please you if I can.

Whit. I believe you never saw me look better, Frank, did you?

Bates. O yes, rather better forty years ago.

Whit. What, when I was at Merchant Tailors' School?

Bates. At Lincoln's Inn, Tom.

Whit. It can't be—I never disguise my age, and next February I shall be fifty-four.

Bates. Fifty-four! why I am sixty, and you always licked me at school—though I believe I could do as much for you now, and 'ecod I believe you deserve it too.

Whit. I tell you I am in my fifty-fifth year.

Bates. O, you are—let me see—were together at Cambridge, Anno Domini twenty-five, which is near fifty years ago—you came to the college, indeed, surprisingly young; and, what is more surprising, by this calculation you went to school before you was born—you was always a forward child.

Whit. I see there is no talking or consulting with you in this humour; and so, Mr. Bates, when you are in temper to show less of your wit, and more of your friendship, I shall consult with you.

Bates. Fare you well, my old boy—young fellow, I mean—when you have done sowing your wild oats, and have been blistered into your right senses; when you have half killed yourself with being a beau, and return to your woollen caps, flannel waistcoats, worsted stockings, cork soles, and galoches, I am at your service again. So, bon jour to you, Monsieur Fifty-four—ha, ha! [Exit.]

Whit. He has certainly heard of my affair—but he is old and peevish—he wants spirits and strength of constitution to conceive my happiness—I am in love with the widow, and must have her: every man knows his own wants—let the world laugh, and my friends stare! let 'em call me imprudent, and mad, if they please—I live in good times, and among people of fashion; so none of my neighbours, thank Heaven, can have the assurance to laugh at me.

Enter KECKSEY.

Keck. What, my friend Whittle! joy, joy! to you, old boy—you are going, a going, a going! a fine widow has bid for you, and will have you—hah, friend? all for the best—there is nothing like it—hugh, hugh, hugh!—a good wife is a good thing, and a young one is a better—hah—who's afraid? If I had not lately married one, I should have been at death's door by this time—hugh, hugh, hugh!

Whit. Thank, thank you, friend! I was coming to advise with you—I am got into the pond again—in love up to the ears—a fine woman, faith; and there's no love lost between us. Am I right, friend?

Keck. Right! ay, right as my leg, Tom! Life's nothing without love—hugh, hugh! I am happy as the day's long! my wife loves gadding, and I can't stay at home; so we are both of a mind—she's every night at one or other of the gay places; but among friends, I am a little afraid of the damp; hugh, hugh! she has got an Irish gentleman, a kind of cousin of hers, to take care of her; a fine fellow; and so good-natured—it is a vast comfort to have such a friend in a family! Hugh, hugh, hugh!

Whit. You are a bold man, cousin Kecksey.

Keck. Bold! ay, to be sure; none but the brave deserves the fair—Hugh, hugh! who's afraid?

Whit. Why your wife is five feet ten.

Keck. Without her shoes. I hate your little shrimps; none of your lean, meagre figures for me; I was always fond of the majestic: give me a slice of a good English surlain; cut and come again; hugh, hugh! that's my taste.

Whit. I'm glad you have so good a stomach. And so you would advise me to marry the widow directly?

Keck. To be sure—you have not a moment to lose; I always mind what the poet says,

'Tis folly to lose time,

When a man is in his prime.

Hugh, hugh, hugh!

Whit. You have an ugly cough, cousin.

Keck. Marriage is the best lozenge for it.

Whit. You have raised me from the dead—I am glad you came—Frank Bates had almost killed me with his jokes—but you have comforted me, and we will walk through the park; and I will carry you to the widow in Pall-mall.

Keck. With all my heart—I'll raise her spirits, and yours too—courage, Tom—come along—who's afraid? [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—The Widow's Lodging.

Enter WIDOW, NEPHEW, and BATES.

Bates. Indeed, Madam, there is no other way but to cast off your real character, and assume a feigned one; it is an extraordinary occasion, and requires extraordinary measures; pluck up a spirit, and do it for the honour of your sex.

Nep. Only consider, my sweet widow, that our all is at stake.

Wid. Could I bring my heart to act contrary to its feelings, would not you hate me for being a hypocrite, though it is done for your sake?

Nep. Could I think myself capable of such ingratitude—

Wid. Could we live upon affection, I would give your fortune to your uncle, and thank him for taking it; and then—

Nep. What then, my sweet widow?

Wid. I would desire you to run away with me as fast as you can.—What a pity it is that this money, which my heart despises, should hinder its happiness, or that, for the want of a few dirty acres, a poor woman must be made miserable, and sacrificed twice to those who have them.

Nep. Heaven forbid! these exquisite sentiments endear you more to me, and distract me with the dread of losing you.

Bates. Young folks, let an old man, who is not quite in love, and yet will admire a fine woman to the day of his death, throw in a little advice among your flames and darts.

Wid. Though a woman, a widow, and in love too, I can hear reason, Mr. Bates.

Bates. And that's a wonder—you have no time to lose; for want of a jointure you are still your father's slave; he is obstinate, and has promised you to the old man: now, Madam, if you will not rise superior to your sex's weakness, to secure a young fellow instead of an old one, your eyes are a couple of hypocrites.

Wid. They are a couple of traitors, I'm sure, and have led their mistress into a toil, from which all her wit cannot release her.

Nep. But it can, if you will but exert it; my uncle adored and fell in love with you for your beauty, softness, and almost speechless reserve. Now, if amidst all his rapturous ideas of your delicacy, you would bounce upon him a wild, ranting, buxom widow, he will grow sick of his bargain, and give me a fortune to take you off his hands.

Wid. I shall make a very bad actress.

Nep. You are an excellent mimic; assume but the character of your Irish female neighbour in the country, with which you astonished us so agreeably at Scarborough; you will frighten my uncle into terms, and do that for us which neither my love nor your virtue can accomplish without it.

Wid. Now for a trial [Mimicking a strong brogue.] Fait and trot, if you will be after bringing me before the old jontleman, if he loves music, I will trate his ears with a little of the brogue, and some dancing too into the bargain if he loves capering.—O bless me! my heart fails me, and I am frightened out of my wits; I can never go through it. [NEP. and BATES both laugh.]

Nep. [Kneeling and kissing her hand.] O, 'tis admirable! Love himself inspires you, and we shall conquer; what say you, Mr. Bates?

Bates. I'll insure you success; I can scarce believe my own ears; such a tongue and a brogue would make Hercules tremble at five-and-twenty; but, away, away, and give him a broadside in the Park; there you'll find him hobbling with that old cuckold, Kecksey.

Wid. But will my dress suit the character I play.

Nep. The very thing; is your retinue ready, and your part got by heart?

Wid. All is ready: 'tis an act of despair to punish folly, and reward merit: 'tis the last effort of pure, honourable love: and if every woman would exert the same spirit for the same out-of-fashion rarity, there would be less business for Doctors' commons. Now let the critics laugh at me if they dare. [Exit, with spirit.]

Nep. Brava! bravissima! sweet widow! [Exit.]

Bates. Huzza! huzza!

[Exit.]

SCENE III.—The Park.

Enter WHITTLE and KECKSEY.

Whit. Yes, yes, she is Irish, but so modest, so mild, and so tender, and just enough of the accent to give a peculiar sweetness to her words, which drop from her in monosyllables, with such a delicate reserve, that I shall have all the comfort, without the impertinence, of a wife.

Keck. There our taste differs, friend; I am for a lively, smart girl in my house, hugh, hugh! to keep up my spirits, and make me merry; I don't admire dumb waiters, not I, no still life for me; I love the prittle prattle, it sets me to sleep, and I can take a sound nap, while my Sally and her cousin are running and playing about the house like young cats.

Whit. I am for no cats in my house; I cannot sleep with a noise; the widow was made on purpose for me; she is so bashful, has no acquaintance, and she never would stir out of doors if her friends were not afraid of a consumption, and so force her into the air. Such a delicate creature! you shall see her; you were always for a tall, chattering, frisky wench; now, for my part, I am with the old saying,

*Wife a mouse,
Quiet house;
Wife a cat,
Dreadful that.*

Keck. I don't care for your sayings—who's afraid?

Whit. There goes Bates, let us avoid him, he will only be joking with us; when I have taken a serious thing into my head, I can't bear to have it laughed out again. This way, friend Kecksey.—What have we got here?

Keck. [Looking out.] Some fine prancing wench, with her lovers and footmen about her; she's a gay one by her motions.

Whit. Were she not so flaunting, I should take it for—No, it is impossible; and yet is not that my nephew with her? I forbade him speaking to her; it can't be the widow; I hope it is not.

Enter WIDOW, followed by NEPHEW, three Footmen, and a black Boy.

Wid. Don't bother me, young man, with your darts, your Cupids, and your pangs; if you had half of 'em about you that you swear you have, they would have cured you, by killing you long ago. Would you have me faithless to your uncle, hah! young man? Was not I faithful to you, till I was ordered to be faithful to him? But I must know more of your English ways, and live more among the English ladies, to learn how to be faithful to two at a time—and so there's my answer for you.

Nep. Then I know my relief, for I cannot live without you. [Exit.]

Wid. Take what relief you please, young jontleman; what have I to do with dat? He is certainly mad, or out of his senses, for he swears he can't live without me, and yet he talks of killing himself! How does he make out dat? If a countryman of mine had made such a blunder, they would have put it into all the newspapers, and Faulkner's Journal beside; but an Englishman may look over the hedge, while an Irishman must not stale a horse.

Keck. Is this the widow, friend Whittle?

Whit. I don't know, [Sighing.] it is, and it is not.

Wid. Your servant, Mr. Whittol; I wish you would spake to your nephew not to be whining and dangling after me all day in his green coat. It is not for my reputation that he should follow me about like a beggar-man, and ask me for what I had given him along ago, but have since bestowed upon you, Mr. Whittol.

Whit. He is an impudent beggar, and shall be really so, for his disobedience.

Wid. As he can't live without me, you know, it will be charity to starve him: I wish the poor young man dead with all my heart, as he thinks it will do him a great deal of good.

Keck. [To WHITTLE.] She is tender, indeed! and I think she has the brogue a little—hugh, hugh!

Whit. 'Tis stronger to-day than ever I heard it.

[Staring.]

Wid. And are you now talking of my brogue? It is always the most fullest when the wind is aesterly; it has the same effect upon me, as upon stammering people—they can't spake for their impediment, and my tongue is fixed so loose in my mouth I can't stop it for the life of me.

Whit. What a terrible misfortune, friend Kecksey!

Keck. Not at all; the more tongue the better, say I.

Wid. When the wind changes, I have no brogue at all, at all. But come, Mr. Whittol, don't let us be vulgar, and talk of our poor relations. It is impossible to be in this metropolis of London, and have any thought but of operas, plays, masquerades, and pantaons, to keep up one's spirits in the winter; and Vauxhall fire-works to cool and refresh one in the summer.—La, la, la! [Sings.]

Whit. I protest, she puts me into a sweat; we shall have a mob about us.

Keck. The more the merrier, I say—who's afraid?

Wid. How the people stare! as if they never saw a woman's voice before; but my vivacity has got the better of my good manners. This, I suppose, this strange gentleman is a near friend and relation, and as such, notwithstanding his appearance, I shall always trate him, though I might dislike him upon a nearer acquaintance.

Keck. Madam, you do me honour; I like your frankness, and I like your person, and I envy my friend Whittle; and if you were not engaged, and I were not married, I would endeavour to make myself agreeable to you, that I would—hugh, hugh!

Wid. And, indeed, Sir, it would be very agreeable to me; for if I did hate you as much as I did my first dare husband, I should always have the comfort, that in all human probability my torments would not last long.

Keck. She utters something more than monosyllables, friend; this is better than bargain: she has a fine bold way of talking.

Whit. More bold than welcome! I am struck all of a heap.

Wid. What, are you low-spirited, my dare Mr. Whittol? When you were at Scarborough, and winning my affections, you were all mirth and gayety: and now you have won me, you are as thoughtful about it as if we had been married some time.

Whit. Indeed, Madam, I can't but say I am a little thoughtful—we take it by turns; you were very sorrowful a month ago for the loss of your husband, and that you could dry up your tears so soon, naturally makes me a little thoughtful.

VOL. I. . . . 4 H

Wid. Indeed I could dry up my tears for a dozen husbands, when I was sure of having a tirtenth like Mr. Whittol; that's very natural sure both in England and Dublin too.

Keck. She wont die of a consumption; she has a fine full-toned voice, and you'll be very happy, Tom—Hugh, hugh!

Whit. O, yes, very happy.

Wid. But come, don't let us be melancholy before the time; I am sure I have been moped up for a year and a half—I was obliged to mourn for my first husband, that I might be sure of a second; and my father kept my spirits in subjection, as the best recipe (he said) for changing a widow into a wife; but now I have my arms and legs at liberty, I must and will have my swing: now I am out of my cage, I could dance two nights together, and a day too, like any singing bird; and I'm in such spirits that I have got rid of my father, I could fly over the moon without wings, and back again, before dinner. Bless my eyes, and don't I see there Miss Nancy O'Flarty, and her brother, Captain O'Flarty? He was one of my dying Strephons at Scarborough—I have a very grate regard for him, and must make him a little miserable with my happiness. [Courtesies.] Come along, skips, [To the servants.] don't you be gosting there; show your liveries, and bow to your master that is to be, and to his friend, and hold up your heads, and trip after me as lightly as if you had no legs to your feet. I shall be with you again, jontlemen, in the crack of a fan—O, I'll have a husband, ay, marry.

[Exit singing, followed by Footmen.]

Keck. A fine buxon widow, faith! no acquaintance—delicate reserve—mopes at home—forced into the air—inclined to a consumption.—What a description you gave of your wife! Why, she beats my Sally, Tom.

Whit. Yes, and she'll beat me if I don't take care! What a change is here! I must turn about, or this will turn my head. Dance for two nights together, and leap over the moon! you shall dance and leap by yourself, that I am resolved.

Keck. Here she comes again; it does my heart good to see her—you are in luck, Tom.

Whit. I'd give a finger to be out of such luck.

Re-enter WIDOW, &c.

Wid. Ha, ha, ha! the poor captain is marched off in a fury. He can't bear to hear that the town has capitulated to you, Mr. Whittol. I have promised to introduce him to you. He will make one of my danglers to take a little exercise with me, when you take your nap in the afternoon.

Whit. You sha'n't catch me napping, I assure you. What a discovery and escape I have made! I tremble with the thought of my danger! [Aside.]

Keck. I protest, cousin, there goes my wife, and her friend, Mr. Mac Brawn. What a fine stately couple they are! I must after 'em, and have a laugh with them—now they giggle and walk quick, that I mayn't overtake 'em. Madam, your servant. You're a happy man, Tom. Keep up your spirits, old boy. Hugh, hugh!—Who's afraid?

[Exit.]

Wid. I know Mr. Mac Brawn extremely well—he was very intimate at our house, in my first husband's time; a great comfort he was to me to be sure! He would very often leave his claret and companions for a little conversation with me. He was bred at the Dublin university, and being a very deep scholar, has fine talents for a tate-a-tate.

Wid. She knows him too! I shall have my house overrun with the Mac Brawns, O'Shoulders, and the blood of the Backwells. Lord have mercy upon me! [Aside.]

Wid. Pray, Mr. Whittol, is that poor spindle-legged crater of a cousin of yours lately married? ha, ha, ha! I don't pity the poor crater his wife, for that agreeable cough of his will soon reward her for all her sufferings.

Whit. What a delivery! a reprieve before the knot was tied. [Aside.]

Wid. Are you unwell, Mr. Whittol? I should be sorry you would fall sick before the happy day. Your being in danger afterwards would be a great consolation to me, because I should have the pleasure of nursing you myself.

Whit. I hope never to give you that trouble, Madam.

Wid. No trouble at all, at all; I assure you, Sir, from my soul, that I shall take great delight in the occasion.

Whit. Indeed, Madam, I believe it.

Wid. I don't care how soon, the sooner the better; and the more danger the more honour; I spake from my heart.

Whit. And so do I from mine, Madam.

[Sighs.]

Wid. But don't let us think of future pleasure, and neglect the present satisfaction. My mantua-maker is waiting for me to choose my clothes, in which I shall forget the sorrows of Mrs. Brady, in the joys of Mrs. Whittol. Though I have no fortune myself, I shall bring a tolerable one to you, in debts, Mr. Whittol, and which I will pay you tinfold in tenderness; your deep purse, and my open heart, will make us the envy of the little grate ones, and the grate little ones; the people of quality with no souls, and grate souls with no cash at all. I hope you'll meet me at the Pantaon this evening. Lady Rantion and her daughter, Miss Nettledown, and Nancy Tittup, with half a dozen macaroonies, and two savoury vivers, are to take me there, and we propose a grate deal of chat and merriment, and dancing all night, and all other kind of recreations. I am quite another kind of a crater, now I am a bird in the fields; I can junket about a week together; I have a fine constitution, and am never molested with your nasty vapours; are you ever troubled with vapours, Mr. Whittol?

Whit. A little, now and then, Madam.

Wid. I'll rattle 'em away like smoke! there are no vapours where I come; I hate your dumps, and your nerves, and your megrims; and I had much rather break your rest with a little racketting, than let any thing get into your head that should not be there, Mr. Whittol.

Whit. I will take care that nothing shall be in my head, but what ought to be there. What a deliverance!

[Aside.]

Wid. [Looking at her watch.] Bless me! how the hours of the clock creep away when we are plessed with our company; but I must love you, for there are half a hundred people waiting for me to pick your pocket, Mr. Whittol; and there is my own brother, lieutenant O'Neale, is to arrive this morning, and he is so like me you would not know us asunder when we are together; you will be very fond of him, poor lad! he lives by his wits, as you do by your fortune, and so you may assist one another. Mr. Whittol, your obedient, till we meet at the Pantaon. Follow me, Pompey; and, skips, do you follow him.

Pomp. The Baccararo whiteman not let blacky boy go first after you, Missis, they pull and pinch me.

Foot. It is a shame, your ladyship, that a black negro should take place of English Christians—we can't follow him, indeed.

Wid. Then you may follow one another out of my sarvice; if you follow me, you shall follow him, for he shall go before me; therefore, resigns as fast as you please; you sha'n't oppose government and keep your places too, that is not good politics in England or Ireland either; so come along, Pompey, be after going before me.—Mr. Whittol, most tenderly yours.

[Exeunt WIDOW and attendants.]

Whit. Most tenderly yours! [Mimicks her.] 'Ecod, I believe you are, and any body's else, O, what an escape have I had! But how shall I clear myself of this business? I'll serve her as I would bad money, put her off into other hands: my nephew is fool enough to be in love with her, and if I give him a fortune he'll take the good and the bad together—he shall do so or starve. I'll send for Bates directly, confess my folly, ask his pardon, send him to my nephew, write and declare off with the widow, and so get rid of her tenderness as fast as I can.

[Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Room in WHITTLE'S House.

Enter BATES and WHITTLE.

Whit. Well, Mr. Bates, have you talked with my nephew; is not he overjoyed at the proposal?

Bates. The demon of discord has been among you, and has untuned the whole family; you have screwed him too high; the young man is out of his senses, I think; he stares, mopes about, and sighs; looks at me indeed, but gives very absurd answers; I don't like him.

Whit. What is the matter, think you?

Bates. What I have always expected; there is a crack in your family, and you take it by turns! you have had it, and now transfer it to your nephew; which, to your shame be it spoken, is the only transfer you have ever made him.

Whit. But, am I not going to do him more than justice?

Bates. As you have done him much less than justice hitherto, you can't begin too soon.

Whit. Am not I going to give him the lady he likes, and which I was going to marry myself?

Bates. Yes; that is, you are taking a perpetual blister off your own back, to clap it upon his. What a tender uncle you are!

Whit. But you don't consider the estate which I shall give him.

Bates. Restore to him, you mean—'tis his own, and you should have given it up long ago; you must do more, or old Nick will have you; your nephew wont take the widow off your hands without a fortune: throw him ten thousand into the bargain.

Whit. Indeed but I sha'n't; he shall run mad, and I'll marry her myself rather than do that.

Mr. Bates, be a true friend, and sooth my nephew to consent to my proposal.

Bates. You have raised the fiend, and ought to lay him; however, I'll do my best for you; when the head is turned, nothing can bring it right again so soon as ten thousand pounds; shall I promise for you?

Whit. I'll sooner go to Bedlam myself. [Exit BATES.] Why, I'm in a worse condition than I was before. If this widow's father will not let me off without providing for his daughter, I may lose a great sum of money, and none of us be the better for it; my nephew half mad; myself half married; and no remedy for either of us.

Enter SERVANT.

Serv. Sir Patrick O'Neale is come to wait upon you, would you please to see him?

Whit. By all means, the very person I wanted; don't let him wait. [Exit SERVANT.] I wonder if he has seen my letter to the widow; I will sound him by degrees, that I may be sure of my mark before I strike the blow.

Enter SIR PATRICK O'NEALE.

Sir P. Mr. Whizzle, your humble servant; it gives me great pleasure, that an old jontleman of your property, will have the honour of being united with the family of the O'Neales; we have been too much jontlemen not to spend our estate, as you have made yourself a kind of jontleman by getting one; ye runs out one way, and t'other runs in another, which makes them both meet at last, and keeps up the balance of Europe.

Whit. I am much obliged to you, Sir Patrick: I am an old gentleman, you say true; and I was thinking—

Sir P. And I was thinking if you was ever so old, my daughter can't make you young again; she has as fine, rich, tick blood in her veins, as any in all Ireland. I wish you had a swate crater of a daughter like mine, that we might make a double cross of it.

Whit. That would be a double cross indeed!

[Aside.]

Sir P. Though I was miserable enough with my first wife, who had the devil of a spirit, and the very model of her daughter, yet a brave man never shrinks from danger, and I may have better luck another time.

Whit. Yes, but I am no brave man, Sir Patrick, and I begin to shrink already.

Sir P. I have bred her up in great subjection; she is as tame as a young colt, and as tender as a sucking chicken; you will find her a true jontlewoman, and so knowing that a man can teach her nothing; she brings every thing but money, and you have enough of that, if you have nothing else, and that is what I call the balance of things.

Whit. But I have been considering your daughter's great deserts, and my great age—

Sir P. She is a charming crater; I would venture to say that, if I was not her father.

Whit. I say, Sir, as I have been considering your daughter's great deserts, and as I own I have great demerits—

Sir P. To be sure you have, but you can't help that; and if my daughter was to mention any thing of fleeing at your age, or your stinginess, by the balance of power, but I would make her repate it a hundred times to your face, to make her ashamed of it; but mum, old gentleman, the devil a word of your infirmities will she touch upon; I have brought her up to softness and to gentleness, as a kitten to new milk; she will spake nothing but no and yes, as if she were dumb; and no tame rabbit or pigeon will keep house, or be more injanious with her needle and tambourine.

Whit. She is vastly altered then since I saw her last, or I have lost my senses, and in either case we had much better, since I must speak plain, not come together—

Sir P. Till you are married, you mean—with all my heart, it is the more gentale for that, and like our family: I never saw Lady O'Neale, your mother-in-law, who, poor crater, is dead, and can never be a mother-in-law again, till the week before I married her; and I did not care if I had never seen her then, which is a comfort too in case of death, or accidents in life.

Whit. But you don't understand me, Sir Patrick, I say—

Sir P. I say, how can that be, when we both spake English?

Whit. But you mistake my meaning, and don't comprehend me.

Sir P. Then you don't comprehend yourself, Mr. Whizzle, and I have not the gift of prophecy to find out, after you have spoke, what never was in you.

Whit. Let me entreat you to attend to me a little.

Sir P. I do attend, man; I don't interrupt you—out with it.

Whit. Your daughter—

Sir P. Your wife that is to be. Go on.

Whit. My wife that is not to be—Zounds! will you hear me?

Sir P. To be or not to be, is that the question? I can swear too, if it wants a little of that.

Whit. Dear Sir Patrick, hear me. I confess myself unworthy of her; I have the greatest regard for you, Sir Patrick; I should think myself honoured by being in your family, but there are many reasons—

Sir P. To be sure there are many reasons why an old man should not marry a young woman; but that was your business, and not mine.

Whit. I have wrote a letter to your daughter, which I was in hopes you had seen, and brought me an answer to it.

Sir P. What the devil, Mr. Whizzle, do you make a letter-porter of me? Do you imagine, you dirty fellow, with your cash, that Sir Patrick O'Neale would carry your letters? I would have you know that I despise letters, and all that belong to 'em; nor would I carry a letter to the king's, Heaven bless him, unless it came from myself.

Whit. But, dear Sir Patrick, don't be in a passion for nothing.

Sir P. What, is it nothing to make a penny-postman of me? But I'll go to my daughter directly, for I have not seen her to-day; and if I find that you have written any thing that I wont understand, I shall take it as an affront to my family; and you shall either let out the noble blood of the O'Neales, or I will spill the last drop of the red puddle of the Whizzles. [Going, returns.]—Harkye, you Mr. Whizzle, Wheezele, Whistle what's your name? You must not stir till I come back; if you offer to ate, drink, or sleep till my honour is satisfied, 'twill be the worst male you ever took in your life; you had better fast a year, and die at the end of six months, than dare to lave your house. So now, Mr. Wheezele, you are to do as you please.

[Exit.]
Whit. Now the devil is at work indeed! If some miracle don't save me, I shall run mad like my nephew, and have a long Irish sword through me into the bargain.

Enter THOMAS.

Sad work, Thomas!

Tho. Sad work, indeed! why would you think of marrying? I knew what it would come to.

Whit. Why, what is it come to?

Tho. It is in all the papers.

Whit. So much the better; then nobody will believe it.

Tho. But they come to me, to inquire.

Whit. And you contradict it?

Tho. What signifies that? I was telling lady Gabble's footman, at the door just now, that it was all a lie, and your nephew looks out of the two-pair-of-stairs window, with eyes all on fire, and tells the whole story; upon that there gathered such a mob!

Whit. I shall be murdered, and have my house pulled down into the bargain!

Tho. It is all quiet again. I told them the young man was out of his senses, and that you were out of town; so they went away quietly, and said they would come and mob you another time.

Whit. Thomas, what shall I do?

Tho. Nothing you have done, if you will have matters amend.

Whit. I am out of my depth, and you wont lend me your hand to draw me out.

Tho. You were out of your depth to fall in love; swim away as fast as you can, you'll be drowned if you marry.

Whit. I'm frightened out of my wits; yes, yes, 'tis all over with me; I must not stir out of my house; but am ordered to stay to be murdered in it for aught I know;—what are you muttering, Thomas? Pr'ythee speak out and comfort me.

Tho. It is all a judgment upon you; because your brother's foolish will says the young man must have your consent, you wont let him have her, but will marry the widow yourself; that's the dog in the manger; you can't eat the oats, and wont let those who can.

Whit. But I consent that he shall have both the widow and the fortune, if we can get him into his right senses.

Tho. For fear I should lose mine, I'll get out of Bedlam as soon as possible; you must provide yourself with another servant.

Whit. The whole earth conspires against me! you shall stay with me till I die, and then you shall have a good legacy, and I wont live long I promise you.

[Knocking at the door.]
Tho. Here are the undertakers already. [Exit.]

Whit. What shall I do? my head can't bear it; I will hang myself for fear of being run through the body.

Re-enter THOMAS, with bills.

Tho. Half a score people I never saw before, with these bills and drafts upon you for payment, signed Martha Brady.

Whit. I wish Martha Brady was at the bottom of the Thames! what an impudent extravagant baggage, to begin her tricks already! Send them to the devil, and say I wont pay a farthing.

Tho. You'll have another mob about the door.

[Going.]

Whit. Stay, stay, Thomas; tell them I am very busy, and they must come to-morrow morning;—stay, stay, that is promising payment; no, no, no—tell 'em they must stay till I am married, and so they will be satisfied, and tricked into the bargain.

Tho. When you are tricked we shall all be satisfied.

[Aside and exit.]

Whit. That of all dreadful things, I should think of a woman, and that woman should be a widow, and that woman should be an Irish one.—Who have we here? Another of the family, I suppose.

[Retires.]

Enter WIDOW as Lieutenant O'Neale, seemingly flustered, and putting up his sword, THOMAS following.

Tho. I hope you are not hurt, captain.

Wid. O, not at all, at all; 'tis well they run away, or I should have made them run faster; I shall teach them how to snigger and look through glasses at their betters; these are your maccaroons, as they call themselves; by my soul but I would have taught them better manners, if they would have stood still till I had overtaken them; these whipper-snappers look so much more like girls in breeches, than those I see in petticoats, that fait and trot, it is a pity to hurt 'em; but to business; friend, where is your master?

Tho. There, captain; I hope he has not offended you.

Wid. If you are impertinent, Sir, you will offend me; lave the room.

Tho. I value my life too much not to do that—what a raw-boned Tartar! I wish he had not been caught and sent here.

[Aside to WHITTLE; exit.]

Whit. Her brother, by all that's terrible! and as like her as two tigers! I sweat at the sight of him; I'm sorry Thomas is gone; he has been quarrelling already.

[Aside.]

Wid. Is your name Whittol?

Whit. My name is Whittle, not Whittol.

Wid. We sha'n't stand for trifles—and you were born and christened by the name of Thomas?

Whit. So they told me, Sir.

Wid. Then they told no lies, fait; so far, so good. [Takes out a letter.] Do you know that handwriting?

Whit. As well as I know this good friend of mine, who helps me upon such occasions.

[Showing his right hand, and smiling.]

Wid. You had better not show your teeth, Sir, till we come to the jokes—the hand-writing is yours.

Whit. Yes, Sir, it is mine.

[Sighs.]

Wid. Death and powder! what do you sigh for? Are you ashamed, or sorry, for your handy-works?

Whit. Partly one, partly t'other.

Wid. Will you be pleased, Sir, to rade it aloud, that you may know it again when you hare it.

Whit. [Takes the letter and reads.] "Madam"—

Wid. Would you be pleased to let us know what Madam you mean? for woman of quality, and woman of no quality, and woman of all qualities, are so mixed together, that you don't know one from t'other, and all are called madams; you should always read the superscription before you open the letter.

Whit. I beg your pardon, Sir.—I don't like this ceremony. [Aside.] "To Mrs. Brady, in Pall-mall."

Wid. Now prosade—fire and powder, but I would—

Whit. Sir, what's the matter?

Wid. Nothing at all, Sir; pray go on.

Whit. "Madam,—As I prefer your happiness to the indulgence of my own passions"—

Wid. I will not prefer your happiness to the indulgence of my passions—Mr. Whittol, rade on.

Whit. "I must confess that I am unworthy of your charms and virtues."

Wid. Very unworthy indeed; rade on, Sir.

Whit. "I have, for some days, had a severe struggle between my justice and my passion"—

Wid. I have had no struggle at all: my justice and passion are agreed.

Whit. "The former has prevailed, and I beg leave to resign you, with all your accomplishments, to some more deserving, though not more admiring servant, than your miserable and devoted,

THOMAS WHITTOL."

Wid. And miserable and devoted you shall be—to the postscript: rade on.

Whit. "Postscript:—let me have your pity, but not your anger."

Wid. In answer to this love epistle, [Snatches the letter.] you pitiful fellow, my sister presents you with her tenderest wishes, and assures you that you have, as you desire, her pity, and she generously throws her contempt too into the bargain. [Tears the letter, and throws it at him.]

Whit. I'm infinitely obliged to her.

Wid. I must beg leave in the name of all our family to present the same to you.

Whit. I am ditto to all the family.

Wid. But as a brache of promise to any of our family was never suffered without a brache into somebody's body, I have fixed upon myself to be your operator; and I believe that you will find that I have as fine a hand at this work, and will give you as little pain, as any in the three kingdoms. [Sits down and looses her knee-bands.]

Whit. For Heaven's sake, captain, what are you about?

Wid. I always loosen my garters for the advantage of lunging; it is for your sake as well as my own, for I will be twice through your body, before you shall feel me once.

Whit. What a terrible fellow it is! I wish Thomas would come in. [Aside.]

Wid. Come, Sir, prepare yourself; you are not the first, by half a score, that I have run through and through the heart, before they knew what was the matter with them.

Whit. But, captain, suppose I will marry your sister?

Wid. I have not the laste objection, if you recover of your wounds. Callaghan O'Connor lives very happy with my great aunt, Mrs. Deborah O'Neale, in the county of Gallway; except a small asthma he got by my running him through the lungs, at the Currough: he would have forsaken her, if I had not stopped his perfidy by a famous family styptic I have here: O, ho! my little old boy, but you shall get it. [Draws.]

Whit. What shall I do?—well, Sir, if I must, I must; I'll meet you to-morrow morning in Hyde-Park, let the consequence be what it will.

Wid. For fear you might forget that favour, I must beg to be indulged with a little pushing now; I have set my heart upon it; and two birds in hand is worth one in the bushes, Mr. Whittol—come, Sir.

Whit. But I have not settled my matters.

Wid. O, we'll settle them in a trice, I warrant you. [Puts herself in a position.]

Whit. But I don't understand the sword; I had rather fight with pistols.

Wid. I am very happy it is in my power to oblige you; there, Sir, take your choice; I will please you if I can. [Offers pistols.]

Whit. Out of the pan into the fire! there's no putting him off; if I had chosen poison, I dare swear he had arsenic in his pocket. [Aside.] Look ye, young gentleman, I am an old man, and you'll get no credit by killing me; but I have a nephew as young as yourself, and you'll get more honour in facing him.

Wid. Ay, and more pleasure too—I expect ample satisfaction from him, after I have done your business; prepare, Sir.

Whit. What the devil; wont one serve your turn? I can't fight, and I wont fight; I'll do any thing rather than fight; I'll marry your sister; my nephew shall marry her; I'll give him all my fortune; what would the fellow have? Here, nephew! Thomas! murder! murder!

[He flies, and she pursues.]

Enter BATES and NEPHEW.

Nep. What's the matter, uncle?

Whit. Murder, that's all; that ruffian there would kill me, and eat me afterwards.

Nep. I'll find a way to cool him! come out, Sir, I am as mad as yourself; I'll match you, I warrant you.

Wid. I'll follow you ail the world over.

Whit. Stay, stay, nephew, you sha'n't fight; we shall be exposed all over the town, and you may lose your life, and I shall be cursed from morning till night; do, nephew, make yourself and me happy; be the olive-branch, and bring peace into my family; return to the widow; I will give you my consent, and your fortune, and a fortune for the widow, five thousand pounds! Do persuade him, Mr. Bates.

Bates. Do, Sir; this is a very critical point of your life; I know you love her; 'tis the only method to restore us all to our senses.

Nep. I must talk in private first with this hot young gentleman.

Wid. As private as you please, Sir.

Whit. Take their weapons away, Mr. Bates; and do you follow me to my study, to witness my proposal; it is all ready, and only wants signing; come along, come along. [Exit.]

Bates. Victoria! victoria! give me your swords and pistols; and now do your worst, you spirited, loving, young couple; I could leap out of my skin! [Exit.]

Nep. O my charming widow; what a day have we gone through!

Wid. I would go through ten times as much to deceive an old, amorous spark, like your uncle, to purchase a young one, like his nephew.

Nep. I listened at the door all this last scene; my heart was agitated with ten thousand fears; suppose my uncle had been stout, and drawn his sword

Wid. I should have run away as he did; when two cowards meet, the struggle is who shall run first; and sure I can beat an old man at any thing.

Nep. Permit me thus to seal my happiness.

[Kisses her.]

Enter WHITTLE and BATES; WHITTLE stares.

Bates. Confusion! [Aside.

Whit. [Turning to BATES.] Hey-day! I am afraid his head is not right yet! he was kneeling and kissing the captain's hand.

Bates. Take no notice, all will come about.

Wid. I find, Mr. Whittle, your family loves kissing better than fighting; he sweats, I am as like my sister as two pigeons.

Enter SIR PATRICK O'NEALE.

Sir P. I hope, Mr. Whizzle, you'll excuse my coming back to give you an answer, without having any to give; I hear a grate dale of news about myself, and came to know if it be true; they say my son is in London, when he tells me himself, by letter here, that he's at Limerick; and I have been with my daughter to tell her the news, but she would not stay at home to receive it, so I am come—O gramachree! my little din ousil craw, what have we got here? a piece of mummery! here is my son and daughter too, fait; what are you waring the breeches, Pat, to see how they become you when you are Mrs. Weezel?

Wid. I beg your pardon for that, Sir! I wear them before marriage, because I think they become a woman better than after.

Whit. What, is not this your son? [Astonished.

Sir P. No, but it is my daughter, and that is the same thing.

Wid. And your niece, Sir, which is better than either.

Whit. Mighty well! and I suppose you have not lost your wits, young man?

Nep. I sympathize with you, Sir; we lost 'em together, and found 'em at the same time.

Whit. Here's villany! Mr. Bates, give me the paper; not a farthing shall they have till the law gives it 'em.

Bates. We'll cheat the law, and give it them now. [Gives NEPHEW the paper.]

Whit. He may take his own, but he sha'n't have a sixpence of the five thousand pounds I promised him.

Bates. Witness, good folks, he owns to the promise.

Sir P. Fait, I'll witness dat, or any thing else in a good cause.

Whit. What, am I choused again?

Bates. Why, should not my friend be choused out of a little justice for the first time? Your hard usage has sharpened your nephew's wits; therefore, beware, don't play with edge-tools, you'll only cut your fingers.

Sir P. And your trote too, which is all one; therefore, to make all asy, marry my daughter first, and then quarrel with her afterwards; that will be in the natural course of things.

Whit. Here, Thomas! where are you?

Enter THOMAS.

Here are fine doings! I am deceived, tricked, and cheated!

Tho. I wish you joy, Sir; the best thing that could have happened to you; and as a faithful servant I have done my best to check you.

Whit. To check me!

Tho. You were galloping full speed, and down hill too; and if we had not laid hold of the bridle, being a bad jockey, you would have hung by your horns in the stirrup, to the great joy of the whole town.

Whit. What, have you helped to trick me?

Tho. Into happiness. You have been foolish a long while, turn about and be wise; he has got the woman and his estate, give them your blessing, which is not worth much, and live like a Christian for the future.

Whit. I will, if I can: but I can't look at 'em; I can't bear the sound of my voice, nor the sight of my own face; look ye, I am distressed and distracted! and can't come to yet; I will be reconciled if possible; but don't let me see or hear from you, if you would have me forget and forgive you—I shall never lift up my head again!

Wid. I hope, Sir Patrick, that my preferring the nephew to the uncle will meet with your approbation?

Sir P. You are out of my hands, Pat, so if you wont trouble me with your afflictions, I shall sincerely rejoice at your felicity.

Nep. It would be a great abatement of my present joy, could I believe that this lady should be assisted in her happiness, or be supported in her afflictions, by any one but her lover and husband.

Sir P. Fine notions are fine tings, but a fine estate gives every ting but ideas, and them too, if you'll appale to those who help you to spend it—what say you, widow?

Wid. By your and their persuasion I will tell my mind to this good company; and for fear my words should want ideas too, I will add an Irish tune, that may carry off a bad voice, and bad matter.

A widow bewitch'd with her passion,
Though Irish, is now quite asham'd,
To think that she's so out of fashion,
To marry, and then to be tamed.

'Tis love, the dear joy,
That old fashion'd boy,
Has got in my breast with his quiver;
The blind urchin he,
Struck the cush la maw cree,
And a husband secures me for ever!
Ye, fair ones, I hope, will excuse me,
Though vulgar, pray do not abuse me.
I cannot become a find lady,
O love has bewitch'd widow Brady.

Ye critics, to murder so willing,
Pray see all our errors with blindness,
For once change your method of killing,
And kill a fond widow with kindness;

If you look so severe,
In a fit of despair,
Again will I draw forth my steel, Sirs;
You know I've the art,
To be twice through your heart,
Before I can once make you feel, Sirs.
Brother soldiers, I hope you'll protect me:
Nor let cruel critics dissect me;
To favour my cause be but ready,
And grateful you'll find widow Brady

To all that I see here before me,
The bottom, the top, and the middle,
For music we now must implore ye,
No wedding without pipe and fiddle;
If all are in tune,
Pray let it be soon,

My heart in my bosom is prancing!
If your hands should unite,
To give us delight,

O, that 's the best piping and dancing!
Your plaudits to me are a treasure,
Your smiles are a dow'r for a lady,
O, joy to you all in full measure,
So wishes, and prays, widow Brady.

ARDEN OF FEVERSHAM:

A TRAGEDY,

IN FIVE ACTS.

BY GEORGE LILLO.

REMARKS.

We have before alluded to this Play, (in our remarks on the Author's Tragedy of Fatal Curiosity,) as founded on a well-known domestic trouble, recorded by Hollinshed, in his chronicle; and by Jacob, in his History of Feversham.—In 1592, a tragedy under the same title was published, by an anonymous writer; and in 1770 was reprinted by Edward Jacob, with an absurd preface, imputing it to Shakspeare. From this, Mr. Lillo formed the present tragedy, which he is said to have left unfinished to the care of Dr. John Hoadley, by whom it was completed.

With some alteration, this piece might be well adapted for modern representation; it is pathetic and interesting, with many well-written passages. The last act in particular, with the death of Arden by the villany of Mosby, and the despair of Alicia, is not only deeply affecting, but is a sad proof of the folly and danger of the slightest acquaintance or association with the depraved. In 1790, Mr. Holman produced this tragedy, with alterations, for his benefit.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—The Street before ARDEN's door.
MOSBY alone.

Mos. The morning's dark, and horrid as my purpose.
Thrice have my snare's been laid for Arden's life,
And thrice has he escap'd.—I am not safe:
The living may revenge.—Oh! could I win
Alicia to conspire her husband's fall,
Then might I say, security, thou'rt mine,

And laugh at all to come.—For other instruments,
There's Green: he bears him hard about this
For th' abbey-lands, to which the hot youth pleads
Some fancied right.—Michael, the trencher—
A bastard, bred of Arden's charity:
He has been privy to our secret joys,
And, on that trust presuming, loves my sister
Winks at adultery, and may at murder
Maria is his price. I've plac'd her here,
Companion of my sweet Alicia's hours,

To spread her charms for ever in his eye:
To her are all my visits. But—Alicia—
She must, she shall comply: when to my arms
Her honour she resign'd, her fond reluctance whisper'd,
She could deny me nothing. [Exit into ARDEN'S.]

SCENE II.—A Chamber.

Enter ARDEN, in his night gown.

Arđ. Unhappy Arden, whither canst thou wander

To lay thy heavy load of sorrows down!
Will change of place relieve th' afflicted mind;
Or does all nature yield a balm to cure
The pangs of slighted love and broken faith?
Ungrateful, false Alicia! false with Mosby,
The vile dependent of my foe profess'd,
Lord Clifford's full-fed flatterer!—
Come, Franklin, come: Arden, thy friend, invites thee;

And let me pour my griefs into thy bosom,
And find in friendship what I've lost in love.

Enter ALICIA.

Alic. Why, Arden, do you leave your bed thus early?

Have cold and darkness greater charms than I?
There was a time when winter nights were short,
And Arden chid the morn that call'd him from
me.

Arđ. This deep dissembling, this hypocrisy,
(The last worst state of a degenerate mind)
Speaks her in vice determin'd and mature.

[Aside.]

Alic. What maid, that knows man's variable nature,

Would sell her free estate for marriage bonds?
From vows and oaths, and every servile tie,
The tyrant man at pleasure is set free;
The holy nuptial bond leaves him at large;
Yet vests him with a power that makes us slaves.—

Arđ. To stop my just reproach,
Art thou the first to tax the marriage state?

Alic. Are you not jealous? do you not give ear
To vain surmises and malicious tongues,
That hourly wound my yet untainted fame?

Arđ. And wouldst thou make me author of the shame

Thy guilt has brought on us!—I'll bear no longer.
The traitor, Mosby: curs'd, detested, Mosby,
Shall render an account for both your crimes.

Alic. What do I hear? [Aside.]

Arđ. That base, mechanic slave
Shall answer with his blood.

Alic. O hear me speak.

Arđ. No, I am deaf: as thou hast ever been
To fame, to virtue, and my just complaints.

Alic. Thus on my knees—

Arđ. Adulteress! dost thou kneel, [heart
And weep, and pray, and bend thy stubborn
(Stubborn to me) to sue for him?—Away,
Away this instant, lest I kill thee too.

[Recovers himself.]

No—Not the hell thou'st kindled in this bosom
Shall make me shed thy blood.

Alic. I do not hope it.

Arđ. For me, be as immortal as thy shame.

Alic. I see your cruel purpose: I must live,
To see your hand and honour stain'd with blood.
Your ample fortune seiz'd on by the state,
Your life a forfeit to the cruel laws.

O Arden, blend compassion with your rage,

And kindly kill me first.

Arđ. Not for my sake

Are all thy tears (then had you felt them sooner

Plead not the ruin you have made; but say

Why have you driven me to these extremes?

Why sacrific'd my peace, and your own fame,

By corresponding with a menial slave?

Alic. Thou can'st not think, that I have wrong'd thy bed?

Arđ. Would, I could not!

Alic. By Heavens!

Arđ. No perjuries.

But now, as you lay slumbering by my side,
I still awake, anxious, and full of thought,
(For thou hast banish'd sleep from these sad eyes.)

With gentle accents, thrilling with desire,
You call'd on Mosby: love made me doubt my ears,

And question if the dark and silent night
Conspir'd not with my fancy to deceive me:

But soon I lost the painful, pleasing hope;

Again you call'd upon your minion Mosby.

Confirm'd, I strove to fly your tainted bed,

But, wanting strength, sunk lifeless on my pillow.

You threw your eager arms about my neck,

You press'd my bloodless cheeks with your warm lips,

Which glow'd, adulterous! with infernal heat;

And call'd a third time on the villain Mosby,

Alic. A dream, indeed, if I e'er call'd on him.

Arđ. Thy guilty dreams betray thy waking thoughts.

Alic. I know I'm simple, thoughtless, and unguarded;

And what is carelessness, you construe guilt.

Yet were I weak as those fantastic visions,

Sure I could never have condemn'd you, Arden,

On circumstances and an idle dream.

Arđ. But such a dream.—

Alic. Yet was it but a dream,

Which, though I do not remember, I abhor;

And mourn with tears, because it gives you pain.

Arden, you do not wish me innocent,

Or on suspicions could you doom me guilty?

Arđ. Not wish thee innocent! do sinking mariners,

When struggling with the raging seas for life,

Wish the assistance of some friendly plank?

'Tis that, and that alone, can bring me comfort.

Alic. O jealousy! thou fierce, remorseless fiend,

Degenerate, most unnatural, child of love;

How shall I chase thee from my Arden's bosom?

Arđ. There is a way, an easy way, Alicia.—

Alic. O name it—speak.

Arđ. What's past may be forgotten.

Your future conduct.—

Alic. You distract me, Arden.

Say, how shall I convince you of the truth?

Arđ. I ask but this: never see Mosby more.

By Heaven, she's dumb!

Alic. O how shall I conceal

My own confusion, and elude his rage? [Aside.]

Arđ. Thou'rt lost, Alicia!—lost to me—and Heaven.

Alic. Indeed I'm lost, if you unkindly doubt
me.

Arđ. Wilt thou then ne'er converse with Mosby more?

Alic. If e'er I do, may Heaven, and you forsake me!

Ard. You'll keep your word, Alicia!—Pr'ythee, say.

Alic. You'll break my heart.

Ard. I'd rather break my own.

Then thou art innocent, and lov'st me still.

Alic. And ever will.

Ard. Give me thy hand—thy heart,
O give me that!

Alic. That always was your own.

Ard. Thou flatterer—then whence this cruel strife?

Still art thou cold: nor warm are thy embraces,

Nor sparkle in thine eyes the fires of love:

Cold, cold, and comfortless.

Alic. Indeed, you fright me.

Ard. 'Tis possible.

Alic. What?

Ard. That thou may'st yet deceive me.

Alic. O! I am wretched!

Ard. Both perhaps are so.

But if thou ever lov'dst, thou'lt not despise me,
And wilt forgive me, if indeed I've wrong'd thee,
As I've forgiven thee—Pity, I'm sure, I need.

[Exit.]

Alic. Thou hast it, Arden, even from her that wrongs thee.

All, all shall pity thee, and curse Alicia.

Can I feel this, and farther tempt the stream

Of guilty love! O, whither am I fallen!

[Enter MARIA.]

Mar. A happy day, Alicia—and may each morn

Of coming life be usher'd with like joy.

Franklin, from court return'd, has brought the grant

Of the abbey-lands confirm'd by the young king,
To Arden, for his life; nor will deliver
But to himself the deed.

Alic. A worthy friend?

The grant is not more welcome to my husband,
Than Franklin's company.

Mar. He's flown to meet him. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—A Parlour in ARDEN'S House.

[Enter ALICIA, meeting MOSBY.]

Alic. Mosby, that brow befits our wayward fate.
The evil hour, long fear'd, is fallen upon us,
And we shall sink beneath it. Do not frown—
If you're unkind, to whom shall I complain?

Mos. Madam, it was my sister I expected—

Alic. Am I forgotten then? Ungrateful man!
This only could have added to my woes.

Did you but know what I have borne for you,
You would not thus, unmov'd, behold my tears.

Mos. Madam, you make me vain.

Alic. Insult not, Mosby.

You were the first dear object of my love,
And, could my heart have made a second choice,
I had not been the object of your scorn:
But duty, gratitude, the love of fame,
And pride of virtue, were too weak t'erase
The deep impression of your early vows.

Mos. Therefore you kindly chose to wed another.

Alic. Reproach me not with what I deem'd my duty.

Oh! had I thought I could assume the name,
And never know the affection, of a wife,
I would have died ere giv'n my hand to Arden.

Mos. You gave him all.

Alic. No, no, I gave him nothing:

Words without truth—a hand without a heart.

Vol. I. . . . 41 52*

But he has found the fraud—the slumbering lion
At length has rous'd himself—

Mos. And I must fall

The victim.

Alic. No, he knows not yet his wrongs.

Mos. But quickly will.

Alic. That, that's my greatest fear.

Mos. Then, branded with a strumpet's hated name.

The cause abhorr'd of shame, of blood, and ruin,
Thou'lt be exposed and hooted through the world!

Alic. O hide the dreadful image from my view!

Chaste matrons, modest maids, and virtuous wives,
Scorning a weakness which they never knew,
Shall blush with indignation at my name.

Mos. My death—but that—though certain—

Alic. Labour not

To drive me to despair. Fain would I hope—

Mos. You may—and be deceiv'd. For me, I know

My fate resolv'd—and thee the instrument;

The willing instrument of Mosby's ruin.

Inconstant, false Alicia!

Alic. False, indeed;

But not to thee, cruel, injurious Mosby!

Mos. Injurious!—False one! might not all these dangers,

That threaten to involve us both in ruin,

Ere this have been prevented?

Alic. Ha!—say on.

Mos. And, not preventing, art thou not the cause?

Alic. Ah! whither, Mosby—whither wouldst thou drive me?

Mos. Nay, didst thou love, or wouldst secure
thy fame,

Preserve my life, and bind me yours for ever,

'Tis yet within your power—

Alic. By Arden's death!

Mean'st thou not so? speak out, and be a devil.

Mos. Yes, 'tis for thee I am so—But your looks Declare, my death would please you better, Madam.

Alic. Exaggerating fiend! be dumb for ever.

His death! I must not cast a glance that way.

Mos. Is there another way?—O think, Alicia.

Alic. I will, for that will make me mad: and madness

Were some excuse. Come, kind distraction! come,
And Arden dies—my husband dies, for Mosby.

[Shrieks, and runs to MOSBY.]

[Enter ARDEN and FRANKLIN.]

He's here! O save me! tell me, did he hear?

Ard. [Starting.] Franklin, support your friend.
I shake with horror.

Frank. What moves you thus?

Ard. See—Mosby—with my wife?

Mos. But, Madam, I shall spare you farther trouble;

In happy time, behold my neighbour here.

[As taking leave of ALICIA.]

Alic. Mischief and wild confusion have begun,
And desolation waits to close the scene. [Exit.]

Mos. Sir, I would gladly know, whether your grant

Of the rich abbey-lands of Feversham

Be yet confirm'd or not?

Ard. What if I tear

Her faithless heart, ev'n in the traitor's sight,

Who taught it falsehood. [Aside]

Frank. He is lost in thought.

But I can answer that : it is confirm'd—
I brought the deed, with the great seal annex'd,
Sign'd by our pious Edward, and his council.

Mos. I'm satisfied.—

Arđ. So am not I.—By hell,
There's justice in the thought.—I'm strangely tempted. [Aside.]

Mos. My friend seems wrapt in thought—I came to advise him,

That Green, by virtue of a former grant
His father long enjoy'd—

Arđ. For my estate,
The law, and this good seal, is my security ;
To them I leave Green and his groundless claim.
But my just right to false Alicia's heart,
(So dearly purchas'd with a husband's name,
And sacred honour of a gentleman,)
I shall assert myself, and thus secure
From farther violation. [Draws.]

Mos. Her known virtue
Renders the injury, your fancy forms,
A thing of air.

Frank. Impossible to thought.

Whence, Arden, comes this sudden madness on
thee,

That your Alicia, ever dear esteem'd,
And deeply lov'd—

Arđ. Out on the vile adult'ress !

But thou, demure, insinuating slave,
Shalt taste my vengeance first. Defend thyself.

Mos. I scorn to take advantage of your rage.

Arđ. A coward too ! O my consummate shame !

Mos. This I can bear from you.

Arđ. Or any man.

Why hangs that useless weapon by thy side,
Thou shame to manhood ?—Draw.—Will nothing move thee ? [Strikes him.]

Frank. Hold. Whither would your mad revenge transport you ?

Arđ. Shall shameful cowardice protect a villain ?

Mos. You choose a proper place to show your courage !

Arđ. Go on. I'll follow to the ocean's brink,
Or to the edge of some dread precipice,
Where terror and despair shall stop thy flight,
And force thy trembling hand to guard thy life.

Mos. What I endure, to save a lady's honour !

[To FRANKLIN.]
Frank. Your longer stay will but incense him more ;

Pray, quit the house.

Mos. Sir, I shall take your counsel. [Exit.]

Arđ. He hath escap'd me then.—But, for my wife—

Frank. What has she done ?

Arđ. Done ! must I tell my shame ?

Away, begone—lest from my prey withheld
I turn, and tear th' officious hand that lets me.
Soft ! art thou Franklin ? Pardon me, sweet friend ;—

My spirits fail—I shake—I must retire.

Frank. To your Alicia.

Arđ. To my lonely couch ;

For I must learn to live without her, Franklin,

Frank. Pray, Heaven, forbid !

Arđ. To hate her, to forget her—if I can ;

No easy task for one who dotes like me.

From what a height I'm fallen ! Once, smiling
love

Of all its horrors robb'd the blackest night,
And gilt with gladness every ray of light ;
Now, tyrant-like, his conquest he maintains,

And o'er his groaning slave with rods of iron reigns. [Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The Street.

Enter GREEN and MOSBY.

Green. You pity me, and know not my estate.
I'm ruin'd, Mosby : thoughtless and ill advis'd,
My riotous youth will leave my age a beggar.
These abbey-lands were all the hopes I'd left ;
My whole support.

Mos. Base and ungen'rous Arden,
To force a man born equal to himself,
To beg, or starve.

Green. By Heaven, I will do neither
I'll let the proud oppressor know—

Mos. How blind his rage !
Who threatens his enemy, lends him a sword
To guard himself.—

Green. Robb'd of the means of life,
What's life itself ? a useless load, a curse :
Which yet I'll dearly sell to my revenge.

Mos. You mean to kill him, then ? [Eagerly.]

Green. I do, by Heaven.

Mos. Suppose you fail—

Green. I can but lose my life. [secure,

Mos. Then where is your revenge, when he,
Riots unbounded in his ill-got wealth !

Green. What can I do ?

Mos. 'Tis plain, you wish him dead.

Green. Each moment of his life is to my soul

A tedious age of pain ; for, while he lives,
Contempt, and all the ills a lazar knows,
Must be my wretched lot, and lengthen out
The miserable hours. What groveling wretch
Would wish to hold his life on such conditions ?

Mos. But change the scene : suppose but Arden dead,

Your land restor'd, and fortune in your power ;
Honour, respect, and all the dear delights
That wait on wealth, shall wing the joyful hours,
And life contracted seem one happy day.

I hate this Arden, and have stronger motives
Than any you can urge to wish his death :

He has accus'd, insulted, struck me ;

Nay, his fair, virtuous wife, on my account—

Green. If fame speaks true, you're to be envied there.

Mos. The world will talk—But be that as it may ; [friends—

I want not cause, nor will, nor means, nor

Green. Nor opportunity shall long be wanting.

Mos. Enough : his fate is fix'd. See ! Brad-shaw's here.

Enter BRADSHAW.

Brad. Save, save you, gentlemen.

Mos. We thank you, neighbour.
But whither in such haste ?

Brad. To the isle of Sheppy,

To wait on good Lord Cheyney. As he holds
In high esteem our worthy townsman Arden,
I shall first call on him.—'Tis well I met you,
For yonder two were but bad road-companions.

Green. They seem of desperate fortunes.

Mos. Have they names ?

Brad. One I know not : but judge him from his comrade.

The foremost of the two I knew at Boulogne,
Where in the late king's reign I serv'd myself.
He was a corporal then, but such a villain—
Beneath a soldier's name.—A common cut-throat,

That preys on all mankind, and knows no party.

Mos. A horrid character you give him, Bradshaw?

Brad. No worse than he deserves.

Mos. [Aside.] A useful hint:

He shall not want employment.—What's his name?

Brad. Black Will. His family-name I never heard.

Mos. [To GREEN.] A word—write you a letter to Alicia: [it.

Disguise your hand.—This honest fool may bear Hint at these men.—In case her courage fail, She will be glad to shift the deed on them.

Enter BLACK WILL and SHAKEBAG.

B. Will. What, comrade Bradshaw! How fare you, man? S'blood! dost not remember honest Black Will? Why, thou'rt grown purse proud, sure.

Brad. Why, you're not easily forgotten, Will. But, pr'ythee, what brings thee to Feversham?

B. Will. A soldier, you know, is at home wherever he comes. Omne solvum forti patria. There's Latin—Give's a taster.

Brad. In time of peace we should apply to some honest creditable business, and not turn the name of soldier into vagabond.

B. Will. Yes, as you have done. I'm told, you keep a goldsmith's shop here in Feversham; and, like a mechanical rogue, live by cheating. I have more honour.

Brad. Would thou hadst honesty.

B. Will. Where do our honesties differ? I take a purse behind a hedge, and you behind a counter.

Brad. Insolent slave!

B. Will. You cent. per cent. rascal! I may find a time to teach you better manners.

Brad. Go, mend thy own.

B. Will. Thou wert always a sneaking fellow, Bradshaw, and couldst never swear, nor get drunk. Come, shall I and my comrade Shakebag taste your ale?

Brad. My house entertains no such guests. Farewell, gentlemen.

Mos. Along with Bradshaw, And leave the management of these to me, [Aside to GREEN.

Green. It shall be done.—Bradshaw, a word with thee.

Brad. Your pardon, gentlemen.

[Exit GREEN and BRAD.

B. Will. He was a cadet in the last French war, like other soldiers then; but now he has got a nest, and feathered it a little, he pretends to reputation. S'blood! had this been a fit place, he had not 'scaped me so. You have surveyed us well. [To MOSBY.] How do you like us?

Mos. Methinks, I read truth, prudence, secrecy, And courage, writ upon your manly brows.

B. Will. What villany has this fellow in hand, that makes him fawn upon us? [Aside.

Mos. I fear the world's a stranger to your merit. If this may recommend me to your friendship—

[Gives a purse.

B. Will. Of what dark deed is this to be the wages? [cut?

Shake. Hast ever an elder brother's throat to

B. Will. Or an old peevish father to be buried?

Mos. Neither of these.

Shake. A rival, then, mayhap—

Mos. There you come nearer to me.

Shake. Then, speak out.

We're honest, Sir.

B. Will. Trusty, and very poor.

Mos. Metal too fit for me. [Aside.] Then hear me, Sirs.—

In Feversham there lives a man, call'd Arden; In general esteem, and ample means; And has a wife, the very pride of nature.

I have been happy long in her affections, [tunes. And, he, once dead, might with her share his for— He's jealous too of late, and threatens me.

Love, int'rest, self-defence, all, ask his death.—

B. Will. This man you'd have dispatched?

Mos. I would.

B. Will. Rich, you say?

Mos. Immensely so.

B. Will. And much beloved?

Mos. By all degrees of men. [of work.

B. Will. 'George! this will be a dangerous piece Shake. Very dangerous. A man so known; and of his reputation too.

B. Will. And then the power and number of his friends must be considered. [Sirs?

Mos. What! does your courage shrink already, Shake. No.

B. Will. This is ever the curse of your men of true valour; to be the tools of crafty cowardly knaves, who have not the heart to execute what their heads have projected. It is a sad ungrateful world.—What money have you more about you?

Mos. Ten pieces.

B. Will. I've had as much for stealing a dog.

Mos. I give you that as a retaining fee;

When the deed's done, each shall have twice that sum,

And a good horse to further his escape.

B. Will. Sir, will you have him murdered in a church?

Shake. Or on the altar; say the word, and it shall be done.

Mos. Some safer place, the street, highway, or fields,

Will serve my turn as well.

Shake. Just as you please.

Mos. Where may I find you, gentlemen?

B. Will. At Adam Fowl's, the Flower-de-luce.

Mos. I have confederates in this design; When we have contriv'd the manner of his death, I'll send you word.

B. Will. You'll find us always ready.

Mos. And determined?

B. Will. Ay, fear it not. Farewell. [Exit

SCENE II.—A Room in ARDEN'S House.

Enter ALICIA, with a letter.

Alic. He doubts me; yet he dares not tell me so, But thus, by Green, whets my unsettled mind.

[Reads.

“Strike home, or not at all. In case you fail, We have found instruments, by means of Brad— He shall not find me undetermin'd now. [shaw.” Hark! Michael's on the watch.—If Arden sleeps, (For so he seem'd dispos'd,) he'll bring me word. That, that's the safest time. This promis'd marriage

With Mosby's sister has remov'd his qualms.

Enter MICHAEL.

Why dost thou break upon me unawares?

What of your master?

Mich. He's scarce sunk to rest, But full of meditated rage 'gainst Mosby.

Alic. He'll sleep in peace, ere long.—

Mich. Think not on that.

O, did Maria bless me with her smiles,
As you do Mosby, had I twenty lives,
I'd risk 'em all to win her to my arms.

Alic. I pr'ythee leave me, Michael.

[Exit MICHAEL.]

What is nature ?

There is a power in love, subdues to itself
All other passions in the human mind. [derer,
This wretch, more fearful than the lonely mur-
Whom with inquiring eyes some stranger views,
Would meet the king of terrors undismay'd,
For her he loves, and dare him to the combat.
And shall not I preserve my Mosby's life,
And shall not I?—A husband!—What's a husband ?

I have a soul above th' unnatural tie,
That tells me, I'm his right, and only his,
Who won my virgin heart.—Ye tender parents, Whose cruel kindness made your child thus wretched, [scene;

Turn not your eyes toward earth to view this
T will make you sad in heaven. [Exit.

SCENE III.—Another Room.

ARDEN sleeping on a couch.—Enter ALICIA, with a dagger in her hand.

Alic. See!—Jealousy, o'erwatch'd, is sunk to rest,
While fearful guilt knows no security,
But in repeated crimes. My weary eyes,
Each moment apprehensive of his vengeance,
Must seek for rest in vain 'till his are clos'd.
Then for our mutual peace, and Mosby's love—
[Approaching to stab him, starts.
He wakes—defend me from his just revenge!
And yet he sees me not, nor moves a finger
To save his threaten'd life. Then whence that voice,

That pierc'd my ears, and cried, Alicia hold!
Can mimic fancy cheat the outward sense,
And form such sounds? If these heart-racking
thoughts

Precede the horrid act, what must ensue?
Worse plague I cannot fear from Arden's death,
But from his life—the death of him I love.
Perish the hated husband—Wherefore hated?
Is he not all that my vain sex could wish?
My eyes, while they survey his graceful form,
Condemn my heart, and wonder how it stray'd.
He sighs—he starts—he groans. His body sleeps,
But restless grief denies his mind repose.
Perhaps he dreams of me; perhaps he sees me,
Thus, like a fury broke from deepest hell,
Lust in my heart, and murder in my hand,—

[She drops the dagger, ARDEN starts up.

Arđ. Her dagger, Michael—seize it, and I'm safe.

How strong she is!—Oh!—what a fearful dream,
Before me still! speak, vision—art thou Alicia,
Or but the coinage of my troubled brain?

Alic. O Arden—husband—lord—

Arđ. Art thou my wife?

Thou'rt substance—I'm wrapp'd in wonder—
hence—

Hast lost all sense of fear, as well as shame,
That thou durst haunt me thus, asleep and waking,
Thou idol, and thou torment of my soul.

Alic. My bleeding heart—

Arđ. Away, begone, and leave me:

Lest, in the transports of unbounded rage,

I rush upon thee, and deface those charms,
That first enslav'd my soul; mangle that face,
Where, spite of falsehood, beauty triumphs still;
Mar that fair frame, and crush thee into atoms.
Avoid me, and be safe—Nay, now you drive me
hence. [ALICIA kneels, he turns away.

Cruel and false as thou hast been to me,
I cannot see thee wring thy suppliant hands,
And weep, and kneel in vain.— [Exit.

Alic. This, this is he
I came prepar'd to murder. Curs'd Alicia!
In thy own bosom plunge the fatal steel,
Or his, who robb'd thee of thy fame and virtue.—
It will not be—fear holds my dastard hand:
Those chaster powers that guard the nuptial bed
From foul pollution, and the hand from blood,
Have left their charge, and I am lost for ever.

[Exit.

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Road near Feversham.

Enter BLACK WILL, SHAKEBAG, and GREEN.

Green. Well, is Arden, at last, despatched?

Shake. Yes, safe to Feversham.

Green. Safe, say you! his good fortune mocks us all.

His strange escape has almost stagger'd me;
But, thinking of my wrongs, I'm more confirm'd.

B. Will. Well said, my man of resolution! A gentleman commits a murder with double the satisfaction, for such a heart. We must lay our snares more cunning for the future.

Green. We should consult with Michael, Ar-den's man—

The pigmy-hearted wretch, though long ago
He swore his master dead, acts with reluctance.

Shake. The coward must be spurred.—He does it, or he dies.

Green. I wonder at his absence.—As he knew
Of our attempt, and promis'd to be here.

Enter MICHAEL.

Mich. I saw my master and Lord Cheyney pass,
And my heart leap'd for joy. [Apart.

B. Will. What says the villain?

Mich. Would I were gone. [Aside.] Sir, if I give offence— [Going.

Green. Michael, come back; you must not leave us so?

Mich. What is your pleasure?

Green. Why, we understand

You are in love with Mosby's beauteous sister.
Mich. Suppose I am.

B. Will. You deal too mildly with the peasant.
You swore to kill your master, villain. Be an honest man of your word, and do it then, white liver!

Mich. Sir, I repented.

B. Will. Repented! What's that? Dog, know your rank, and act as we command, or your heart's blood—

Mich. What must I do? [Frighted.

B. Will. Do! you must show us the house, appoint the time and place, and lure your master thither—We'll take care of him without your trouble.

Green. So shall you purchase noble Mosby's friendship,
And, by his friendship, gain his sister's love.

Mich. They'll murder me too, should I not comply— [Aside.

Green. Think on your love, your interest.

B. Will. Or your death.

Mich. To-night, soon as the abbey-clock strikes ten,
Come to his house: I'll leave the doors unbarr'd:
The left-hand stairs lead to my master's chamber;
There take him, and dispose him as you please.
Green. This cannot fail.
Shake. Unless this love-sick coward thinks to deceive us.
Mich. I will not, by Heaven!
B. Will. I believe thee; for, by hell, thou darest not.
Mich. Master, thy constant love and daily bounty Deserve more grateful offices from Michael.

[Exit, in tears.]

SCENE II.—A Room in ARDEN'S House.

ALICIA alone.

Alic. When vice has spread her poison through the soul,
How lifeless, slow, confus'd, and insincere,
Are our resolves in the pursuits of virtue!
What wonder, then, Heaven should refuse its aid
To thoughts, that only blossom for a time;
Look blooming to the eye, but yield no fruit.

[Enter MOSBY.]

Mos. I come, Alicia, to partake thy griefs:
For fire, divided, burns with lesser force. [flame]

Alic. I know thee: thou art come to fan the Thy breath hath kindled here, till it consume us.
But tears and sighs shall stifle in my heart
The guilty passion.

Mos. Is heroic love,
That form'd the bright examples of thy sex,
Made their lives glorious, and their fame immortal,
A crime in thee? Art thou not mine by oaths,
By mutual sufferings, by contract, mine?

Alic. Why do you urge a rash, a fatal, promise,
I had no right to make, or you to ask?
Why did you practise on my easy heart?
Why did I ever listen to your vows?
In me, 'twas foolish guilt and disobedience;
In you 'twas avarice, insolence, and pride.

Mos. 'Twas love in me, and gratitude in you.

Alic. 'Twas insolence in you, meanness in me,
And madness in us both. My careful parents,
In scorn of your presumption and my weakness,
Gave me in marriage to a worthy gentleman,
Of birth and fortune equal to my own.

Three years I liv'd with him without reproach,
And made him in that time the happy father
Of two most lovely children. I too was happy;
At least, I liv'd in hopes I might be so:
For time, and gratitude, and Arden's love,
I hop'd, might quench my guilty flame for you,
And make my heart a present worthy him.

Mos. And dost thou glory in thy perjuries?
In love, inconstancy alone's a crime.
Think on the ardour of our youthful passion,
Think how we play'd with love; nor thought it guilt,
Till thy first falsehood (call it not obedience,)
Thy marriage with this Arden, made me despo-
rate;

Think on the transports of our love renew'd,
And—— [hear,]

Alic. Hide the rest, lest list'ning winds should
And publish to the world our shameful tale.
Here let remembrance of our follies die.

Mos. Shall our loves wither in their early bloom?

Alic. Their harvest else will be to both our shames.

Hast thou not made a monster of me, Mosby?
You should abhor me, I abhor myself.
When unperceiv'd I stole on Arden's sleep,
(Hell steel'd my heart, and death was in my hand,)
Pale anguish brooded on his ashy cheek,
And chill sweats stood shivering on his brow.
Relentless murder, at a sight so sad,
Gave place to pity; and, as he wak'd, I stood
Irresolute, and drown'd in tears.

Mos. She's lost.
And I, in vain, have stain'd my soul with blood.

[Aside.]
Alic. Give o'er, in time: in vain are your attempts
Upon my Arden's life; for Heaven, that wrested
The fatal weapon from my trembling hand,
Still has him in its charge.

Mos. Little she thinks,
That Arden's dead ere now.—It must be so;
I've but that game to play, ere it be known.

[Aside.]
Alic. I know our dang'rous state; I hesitate;
I tremble for your life; I dread reproach.
But we've offended, and must learn to suffer.

Mos. Then Arden lives in his Alicia bless'd,
And Mosby, wretched. Yet should chance or Lay Arden gently in a peaceful grave, [nature Might I presume to hope? Alicia, speak.]

Alic. How shall I look into my secret thoughts,
And answer what I fear to ask myself?

[A long pause.]
Mos. Silence speaks best for me. His death once known,

I must forswear the fact, and give these tools
To public justice—and not live in fear. [Aside.]
Thy heart is mine. I ask but for my own. [To her.]
Truth, gratitude, and honour, bind you to me,
Or else you never lov'd.

Alic. Then why this struggle?
Not lov'd! O had my love been justly plac'd,
As sure it was exalted and sincere,
I should have gloried in it, and been happy.
But I'll no longer live the abject slave
Of loose desire—I disclaim the thought

Mos. I'll ask no more what honour should deny;
By Heaven, I never will.

Alic. Well, then, remember,
On that condition only, I renew
My vows. If time and the event of things
Should ever make it lawful, I'll be yours.

[Gives her hand.]

Mos. O, my full joys!
Alic. Suppress thy frantic transports,
My heart recoils; I am betray'd.—O give me back
My promis'd faith.

Mos. First, let the world dissolve.
Alic. There is no joy, nor peace, for you or me.
All our engagements cannot but be fatal.

Mos. The time may come when you'll have other thoughts;
'Till then, farewell.—[Aside.] Now, fortune, do thy worst. [Exit.]

Alic. Mosby, return: he's gone, and I am wretched.

I should have banish'd him my sight for ever.
You happy fair ones, whose untainted fame
Has never yet been blasted with reproach,
Fly from th' appearance of dishonour, far.
Virtue is arbitrary, nor admits debate:
To doubt, is treason in her rigid court;
But, if ye parley with the foe, you're lost. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—A Room in ARDEN's House.

ARDEN and FRANKLIN sitting together on a couch; ARDEN, thoughtful.

Frank. Nay, wonder not.—Though every circumstance

Thus strangely met to prove the lady false,
And justify the husband's horrid vengeance;
Yet it appears to every honest eye,
(Too late for the poor lady,) she was wrong'd.

Ard. Is 't possible?

Frank. Ay, very possible:

He lives that proves it so. Conceal'd from justice,
He pines with ceaseless sorrow for his guilt,
And each hour bends him lower towards his grave.

Ard. I know thy friendship, and perceive its drift.
I'll bear my wrongs—for sure I have been wrong'd.
Do I but think so, then! What fools are men,
Whom love and hatred, anger, hope, and fear,
And all the various passions, rule by turns,
And in their several turns alike deceive?

Frank. To cast away, and on suspicion only,
A jewel, like Alicia, were to her
Unjust, and cruel to yourself. [Clock strikes ten.
Good night,

The clock has stricken ten.

Ard. I thought it more.

Frank. I thought it not so much.

Ard. Why, thus it is:

Our happy hours are few, and fly so swift,
That they are past ere we begin to count 'em:
But, when with pain and misery oppress'd,
Anticipating Time's unvarying pace,
We think each heavy moment is an age. [grave,

Frank. Come, let's to rest. Impartial as the Sleep robs the cruel tyrant of his power,
Gives rest and freedom to the o'erwrought slave,
And steals the wretched beggar from his want.
Droop not, my friend; sleep will suspend thy
And time will end them. [cares,

Ard. True, for time brings death,
The only certain end of human woes.
Sleep interrupts, but waking, we're restor'd
To all our griefs again. Watching and rest,
Alternately succeeding one another,
Are all the idle business of dull life.
What shall we call this undetermined state,
This narrow isthmus 'twixt two boundless oceans,
That whence we came, and that to which we tend?
Is it life, chequer'd with the sleep of death?
Or death, enliven'd by our waking dreams?
But we'll be bed. Here, Michael, bring the lights.

Enter MICHAEL, with lights.

Heaven send you good repose.

[Gives FRANKLIN a candle.

Frank. The like to you.

Mich. Shall I attend you, Sir?

Frank. No, no, I choose to be alone. Good night.

[Exit FRANKLIN. MICHAEL attends his master with the other light, and returns.

Mich. I, who should take my weapon in my hand,

And guard his life with hazard of my own,
With fraudulent smiles have led him, unsuspecting,
Quite to the jaws of death.—But I've an oath.
Mosby has bound me with a horrid vow, [death.
Which if I break, these dogs have sworn my
I've left the doors unbarr'd.—Hark! 'twas the latch.
They come—I hear their oaths, and see their dag-
Insulting o'er my master's mangled body, [gers
While he for mercy pleads. Good master, live:
I'll bar the doors again. But, should I meet 'em—

What's that?—I heard 'em cry, where is this coward?

Arden once dead, they'll murder me for sport
Help—call the neighbours—Master—Franklin—help.

Enter ARDEN and FRANKLIN, undressed.

Ard. What dismal outcry 's this?

Frank. What frights thee, Michael?

Mich. My master!—Franklin!

Ard. Why dost tremble so?

Mich. I dream'd the house was full of thieves and murderers. [Trembling.

Ard. Dream'd! what, awake! Are all the doors made fast?

Mich. I think they are.

Ard. I'll go and see myself. [Exit ARDEN.

Frank. You made a fearful noise.

Mich. Did I?—

Ard. [Within.] Why, Michael!

Frank. You tremble still.—Has any one been here?

Mich. No, I hope not. My master will be angry.

Enter ARDEN.

Ard. This negligence not half contents me, Sir.
The doors were all left open.

Mich. Sir—

Ard. To bed,

And, as you prize my favour, be more careful.

Frank. 'Tis very cold. Once more, my friend—

Ard.—Good night. [Exeunt.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—An Inn, the Flower-de-luce.

Enter MOSBY and MICHAEL.

Mich. Though I with oaths appeal'd to conscious Heaven,
That Arden rose and shut the doors himself.
Yet, but for Green, these bloody rogues had kill'd
me.

We must desist—Franklin and sweet Maria
Have promis'd, at Alicia's own request,
To interfere—

Mos. —Such ever be the employ
Of him I hate.

Mich. —The mourning fair, all chang'd,
By me conjures you, (and with tears she spake it,)
Not to involve yourself and her in ruin,
By seeking to renew a correspondence,
She has renounc'd for ever.

Mos. How! confusion! [her prayers,

Mich. And hopes, (as Heaven, in answer to Hath reconcil'd her duty and affection,)
You will approve her resolution—

Mos. Doubtless!

Mich. And learn, by her example, to subdue
Your guilty passion—

Mos. Ha, ha, ha! exquisite woman! [band!
So! rather than not change, she'll love her husband she will not persevere.

Mich. Yes, sure, she will. [sex,

Mos. Have I then slighted her whole sighing
Bid opportunity and fortune wait;
And all, to be forsaken for a husband!
By Heaven, I am glad he has so oft escap'd,
That I may have him murder'd in her sight.

Enter GREEN.

Green. How strange a providence attends this man!
'Tis vain to strive with Heaven—Let's give it o'er

Mos. No: when I do, may I be curs'd for ever,
Hopeless to love, and hate without revenge:
May I ne'er know an end of disappointment,
But, press'd with hard necessity, like thee,
Live, the contempt of my insulting foe. [life

Green. I scorn the abject thought—Had he a
Hung on each hair, he dies—If we succeed,
This very night Maria shall be thine. [To MICH.

Mich. I am a man again.

Mos. I've thought a way—
That may be easy under friendship's mask,
Which, to a foe suspected, may be hard.

Green. Friendship! Impossible—

Mos. —You know him not. [him.
You, with your ruffians, in the street shall seek
I follow at some distance. They begin
(No matter how,) a quarrel, and at once
Assault him with their swords. Straight I appear,
Forget all wrongs, and draw in his defence; [fly,
Mark me, be sure, with some slight wound; then
And leave the rest to me.

Mich. I know his temper.

This seeming benefit will cancel all
His former doubts, and gain his easy heart.

Green. Perhaps so—yet—

Mos. Farther debates are needless. [Exeunt.

SCENE II.—A Room in ARDEN'S House.

Enter FRANKLIN and MARIA.

Frank. Well, in what temper did you find Alicia?

Mar. Never was anguish, never grief, like hers:
She eats, nor sleeps. Her lovely, downcast eyes,
That us'd to gladden each beholder's heart,
Now wash the flinty bosom of the earth.
Her troubled breast heaves with incessant sighs,
Which drink the purple streams of life, and blast
Her bloom, as storms the blossoms of the spring.
But sure her prayers must quickly reach high
Heaven,

Relenting Arden kindly sooth her sorrows,
And her lost peace restore.

Frank. Their mutual peace, Maria!

For his can ne'er be found but in Alicia.
Asham'd to view the face of man or day,
As Mosby's name was written on his brow,
He cheerless wanders; seeks the darkest gloom
To hide his drooping head, and grieve alone.
With a full heart, swol'n eyes, and falt'ring
tongue,
He sometimes, seeking to beguile his grief,
Begins a mournful tale: but straight, a thought
Of his imagin'd wrongs crossing his memory,
Ends his sad story ere the half be told.
O may our pains with wish'd success be crown'd.

Enter ARDEN.

Arden. No, Franklin, no; your friendly cares are vain:

Were I but certain she had wrong'd my bed,
I then might hate her, and shake off my woes;
But, thus perplex'd, can never taste of comfort.

Frank. O jealousy! thou bane of social joy!
Oh! she's a monster, made of contradictions!
Let truth in all her native charms appear,
And with the voice of harmony itself
Plead the just cause of innocence traduc'd;
Deaf as the adder, blind as upstart greatness,
She sees nor hears. And yet, let slander whisper,
Rumour has fewer tongues than she has ears;
And Argus' hundred eyes are dim and slow,
To piercing jealousy's.—

Arden. —No more, no more—
I know its plagues, but where 's the remedy?

Mar. In your Alicia.

Frank. She shall heal these wounds.

Arden. She's my disease, and can she be my cure?
My friends should rather teach me to abhor her,
To tear her image from my bleeding heart.

Mar. We leave that hateful office to the fiends.

Frank. If you e'er lov'd, you'll not refuse to see her:

You promis'd that.

Arden. Did I?

Frank. Indeed, you did.

Arden. Well, then, some other time.

Frank. No, see her now. [see her:

Arden. Franklin, I know my heart, and dare not
I have a husband's honour to maintain,
I fear the lover's weakness may betray.

Let me not do what honour must condemn,
And friendship blush to hear.

Frank. That Arden never will.

Mar. Did you but know her grief—

Arden. Am I the cause?

Have I, just Heaven, have I e'er injur'd her?

Yet I'm the coward. O prepost'rous fear!

See, where she comes—Arm'd with my num'rous
wrongs,

I'll meet with honourable confidence

Th' offending wife, and look the honest husband.

Frank. Maria, we'll withdraw—even friendship
here

Would seem impertinence. [Exeunt.

Arden. Be still, my heart.

[ALICIA enters, not seeing ARDEN.

Alic. How shall I bear my Arden's just re-proaches!

Or can a reconciliation long continue,
That's founded on deceit! Can I avow
My secret guilt?—No—At so mean a thought
Abandon'd infamy herself would blush.

Nay, could I live with public loss of honour,
Arden would die to see Alicia scorn'd.
He's here; earth, open—hide me from his sight.

Arden. Guilt chains her tongue. Lo! silent, selfcondemn'd,

With tearful eyes and trembling limbs she stands.

Alic. Fain would I kiss his footsteps—but that look,

Where indignation seems to strive with grief,
Forbids me to approach him.

Arden. Who would think,

That anguish were not real?

Alic. I'm rooted here. [were certain,

Arden. Those tears, methinks, even if her guilt
Might wash away her pains.

Alic. Support me, Heaven!

Arden. Curse on the abject thought. I shall re-lapse

To simple dotage. She steals on my heart,
She conquers with her eyes. If I but hear her voice,

Nor earth nor heaven can save me from her snares.
O! let me fly—if I have yet the power.

Alic. O Arden! do not, do not leave me thus.

[Kneels, and holds him.

Arden. I pray thee, loose thy hold.

Alic. O never, never.

Arden. Why should I stay to tell thee of my wrongs,

To aggravate thy guilt, and wound thy soul?

Thyself, if all these agonizing struggles

Of tears, of sighs, of groans, of speechless sorr.w

Be but sincere—thyself, will do it better.
One thing I'll tell thee (for perhaps 'twill please thee,)

Thou'st broke my heart, Alicia.

Alic. Oh! [She falls to the ground.]

Ard. And canst thou,

Can woman pity whom she hath undone?

Why dost thou grasp my knees? what wouldst thou say,

If thou couldst find thy speech?

Alic. O! mercy, mercy!

Ard. Thou hast had none on me, let go my hand:

Why dost thou press it to thy throbbing heart,
That beats—but not for me?

Alic. Then may it ne'er beat more.

Ard. At least, I'm sure it did not always so.

Alic. For that, my soul is pierc'd with deep remorse;

For that, I bow me to the dust before thee,
And die to be forgiven. O, Arden! Arden!

Ard. Presumptuous fool! what business hast thou here?

Did I not know my weakness, and her power!

[Aside.]

Rise—rise—Alicia.

Alic. No: here let me lie

On the bare bosom of this conscious earth,

'Till Arden speak the words of peace and comfort,
Or my heart break before him.

Ard. O, Alicia,

Thou inconsistent spring of grief and joy,
Whence bitter streams and sweet alternate flow,
Come to my arms, and in this too fond bosom
Disburden all the fulness of thy soul.

Alic. Let me approach with awe that sacred temple,

Resume my seat, and dwell for ever there.

Ard. There ever reign, as on thy native throne,
Thou lovely wanderer.

Alic. Am I at last,

In error's fatal mazes long bewilder'd,

Permitted here to find my peace and safety!

Ard. Dry up thy tears; and tell me, truly tell me,

Has my long-suffering love at length prevail'd,
And art thou mine, indeed?

Alic. Heaven is my witness,

I love thee, Arden; and esteem thy love
Above all earthly good. Thy kind forgiveness
Speaks to my soul that peaceful calm confirm'd,
Which reason and reflection had begun.

Ard. Thou'rt cheaply purchas'd with unnumber'd sighs,

With many a bitter tear, and years of patience,
Thou treasure of more worth than mines of gold.

I will not doubt my happiness. Thou art,

Thou wilt be mine, ever and only mine.

Alic. I am, I will. I ne'er knew joy till now.

Ard. This is our truest, happiest nuptial day.

To-night, thou knowest, according to my custom,
Our yearly fair returning with St. Valentine,
I treat my friends. I go to countenance
Their honest mirth, and cheer them with my bounty,

'Till happy night, farewell. My best Alicia,

How will our friends rejoice, our foes repine,

To see us thus?

Alic. Thus ever may they see us!

The wandering fires, that have so long misled me,
Are now extinguish'd, and my heart is Arden's.
The flowery path of innocence and peace

Shines bright before, and I shall stray no longer, Whence then these sighs, and why these floods of tears?

Sighs are the language of a broken heart,

And tears the tribute each enlighten'd eye

Pays, and must pay, for vice and folly past.

And yet the painful'st virtue hath its pleasure:

Though dangers rise, yet, peace restor'd within,

My soul collected shall undaunted meet them.

Though trouble, grief, and death, the lot of all,

On good and bad, without distinction, fall;

The soul which conscious innocence sustains,

Supports with ease these temporary pains;

But, stung with guilt, and loaded by despair,
Becomes itself a burden none can bear. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—The Street.

People at a distance, as at a Fair.

Enter ARDEN on one side, and BLACK WILL, and SHAKBAG on the other, GREEN directing them.

B. Will. Shakebag, you'll second me—S'blood give the way. [Jostles ARDEN.]

Shake. May we not pass the streets?

Ard. I saw you not.

B. Will. Your sight perhaps is bad, your feeling may be better. [Strikes him.]

Ard. Insolent villains!

[Draws.]

B. Will. Come, we'll teach you manners.

Ard. Both at once! barb'rous cowards!

Enter MOSBY.

Mos. O, bloody dogs! attempt a life so precious!—

B. Will. This is a fury, George.

[BLACK WILL and SHAKBAG beaten off.]

Shake. I've pink'd him though—

Ard. Villains, come back; and finish your design.

Mos. Shall I pursue them, Sir?

Ard. Not for the world—

Mosby! amazing generosity!

Mos. I hope you are not hurt.

Ard. Pierc'd to the heart—

Mos. Forbid it, Heaven! quick, let me fly for help.

Ard. With sharp reflection:—Mosby, I can't bear

To be so far oblig'd to one I've wrong'd.

Mos. Who would not venture life, to save a friend?

Ard. From you I've not deserv'd that tender name.

Mos. No more of that—would I were worthy of it!

Ard. I own my heart, by boiling passions torn,
Forgets its gentleness—yet is ever open

To melting gratitude. O say, what price

Can buy your friendship?

Mos. Only think me yours.

Ard. Easy, indeed. I am too much oblig'd.

Why wreak'd not your good sword its justice on me,

When, mad with jealous rage, in my own house,
I urg'd you to my ruin?

Mos. I lov'd you then

With the same warmth as now.

Ard. What's here? you bleed!

Let me bind up your wound.

Mos. A trifle, Sir.

Ard. Your friendship makes it so.—See, Franklin, see,

Enter FRANKLIN.

The man I treated as a coward, bleeding,
(Wretch that I am!) for his defence of me.
Look to your wound. And, Mosby, let us hope You'll sup with me. There will be honest Bradshaw,

And Franklin here, and—

Mos. Sir, I will not fail.

Frank. I shall not come.

Arden. Nay, Franklin; that's unkind.
Pr'ythee—

Frank. Nay, urge me not.—I have my reasons.

Mos. Avoids my company!—So much the better.

His may not be so proper. [Aside.]—An hour
hence,

If you are not engag'd, we'll meet at Fowl's.

Arden. I will be there.

Mos. 'Till then I take my leave. [Exit Mosby.]

Arden. How have I been mistaken in this man?

Frank. How are you sure, you're not mistaken now? [think]

Arden. No doubt he loves me; and I blush to How I've suspected him, and wrong'd Alicia.

Frank. May you be ever happy in your wife:
But— [here.]

Arden. Speak—But what? Let's have no riddles.
Can she be innocent, and Mosby guilty?

Frank. To speak my thoughts, this new officious fondness

Makes me suspect—! I like him worse than ever.
Arden. Because I like him better. What a churl!

Frank. You're credulous, and treat my serious doubts

With too much levity. You vex me, Arden.

Arden. Believe me, friend, you'll laugh at this hereafter. [Exit the other way.]

MOSBY, having watched FRANKLIN out, re-enters with GREEN.

Mos. The surly friend has left him—As I wish'd—

You see how eagerly the foolish fowl
Flies headlong to our snare: now to inclose him.
At eight the guests are bidden to his banquet,
And only Michael, of his numerous train,
Keeps home with his Alicia. He'll secure
The keys of all the doors, and let you in
With my two trusty blood-hounds. Alicia seems Averse at present—

Green. She'll not dare betray us.

Mos. Not when the deed is done. We know
too much;

She'll be our prisoner, and shall be observ'd.
Towards evening, then upon a slight pretence
To pass an hour at draughts, (a game he loves,)
I'll draw this husband home. You'll be prepar'd
In th' inner room, (Michael will show it you,)
'Till, at a signal given, you all rush forth,
And strangle him.

Green. Good—'tis a death that leaves
No bloody character to mark the place.

Mos. How'er, come all provided with your daggers.

Do you seek Michael, I'll instruct the rest

Green. What shall the signal be?

Mos. These words in the game,
"I take you now."

Green. Arden! thou'rt taken now indeed.

Mos. His body, thrown behind the abbey-wall,
Shall be described by the early passenger

Returning from the Fair.—My friend, thy hand—
Shakes it?—Be firm, and our united strength
With ease shall cast dead Arden to the earth.

Green. Thanks to his foolish tenderness of soul.

Mos. True; he, who trusts an old invet'rate foe,
Bares his own breast, and courts the fatal blow.

[Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—ARDEN'S HOUSE.

ALICIA, alone.

What have I heard! Is this the house of Arden?
Oh! that the power which has so often sav'd him,
Would send his guardian angel to him now,
To whisper in his ear his present danger!

Fly, Arden, fly; avoid this fatal roof, [thee:
Where murder lurks, and certain death awaits
Wander—no matter where—Turn but from hence, Thou canst not miss thy way.—The house is theirs.—

I am suspected—Michael guards the door—
And even Maria's absent. Bloody Mosby,
These are the fruits of thy detested lust. [manity,
But, hark, the fiends approach.—Green and hu-

Enter GREEN, BLACK WILL, SHAKEBAG, and MICHAEL.

Could I prevail on him!—O, Sir—
[Talks apart with GREEN.]

B. Will. What a fair house! rich furniture, what piles of massy plate. And, then, yon iron chest. Good plunder, comrade.

Shake. And Madam Arden there—A prize worth them all, to me.

B. Will. And shall that fawning, white-livered, coward, Mosby, enjoy all these?

Shake. No doubt, he would, were we the fools he thinks us.

Green. Had he as many lives as drops of blood
I'd have them all. [To ALICIA]

Alic. But for one single night—
Green. I'd not defer his fate a single hour,
Though I were sure myself to die the next.
So, peace, irresolute woman—and be thankful
For thy own life.

Alic. O mercy, mercy—
Green. Yes,
Such mercy as the nursing lioness,
When drain'd of moisture by her eager young,
Shows to the prey that first encounters her.

B. Will. Who talks of mercy, when I am here Green. She would prevent us; but our steady courage

Laughs at her coward arts.
[Knocking gently at the gate]

Why, Michael?
Mich. Sir!

Green. Thou bloodless coward, what dost tremble at?

Dost thou not hear a knocking at the gate?
[Exit MICHAEL]

Mosby, no doubt. How like a sly adulterer,
Who steals at midnight, and with caution gives
Th' appointed signal to his neighbour's wife!

B. Will. Which is the place where we're to be conceal'd?

Green. This inner room.

B. Will. 'Tis well.—The word is, now I take you. [Knocking louder than before]

Green. Ay, there's authority. That speaks the master

He seems in haste : 'twere pity he should wait,
Now we're so well prepar'd for his reception.

[GREEN, BLACK WILL, and SHAKEBAG, go into the inner room.

ALICIA remains alone.

Alic. Now, whether are they gone ?—The door's unbarr'd.

I hear the sound of feet. Should it be Arden,
And Mosby with him—I can't bear the doubt,
Nor would I be resolv'd. Be hush'd, my fears,
'Tis Mosby, and alone. [Enter MOSBY.] Sir ; hear me, Mosby.

Mos. Madam, is this a time ?

Alic. I will be hard ;

And mark me, when I swear, never hereafter,
By look, word, act—

Mos. Your husband comes—

Alic. Ha !— [She screams.

Enter ARDEN and MICHAEL.

Arden. Am I a monster, that I fright thee thus ?
[To MICHAEL.

Say, what has happen'd since I left the house ?
Thou look'st, Alicia, as if wild amazement
Had chang'd thee to the image of herself.

Alic. Is Franklin with you ?

Arden. No.

Alic. Nor Fowl, nor Bradshaw ?

Arden. Neither, but both expected.—

Alic. Merciful Heaven ! [Aside.

Arden. I meant to dedicate this happy night
To mirth and joy, and thy returning love.

[She sighs.

Make me not sad, Alicia : for my sake,
Let discontent be banished from your brow,
And welcome Arden's friend with laughing eyes.
Among the first let Mosby be enroll'd—

Alic. The villain ! [Aside.

Arden. Nay, I am too well convinc'd
Of Mosby's friendship, and Alicia's love,
Ever to wrong them more by weak suspicions.
I've been indeed to blame, but I will make thee
A large amends, Alicia.—Look upon him,
As on the man that saved your husband's life.

Alic. Would take my husband's life !—I'll tell him all, [Aside.

And cast this load of horror from my soul :
Yet 'tis a dreadful hazard. Both must die.
A fearful thought ! Franklin may come, or Bradshaw—

O let me not precipitate his fate ! [Aside.

Mos. I see my presence is offensive there.

[Going.

Arden. Alicia ! No—she has no will but mine.

Mos. It is not fit she should :—and yet—perhaps—

'Twere better, Sir—permit me to retire.
Arden. No more—our friendship publicly avow'd,
Will clear her injur'd virtue to the world.

Mos. Something there is in that—

Arden. It is a debt

I owe to both your fames, and pay it freely.

Mos. For her sake, then, not for my own.

Alic. O vile dissembler. [Aside.

Arden. Come, take your seat ; this shall not save your money.

Bring us the tables, Michael—[They sit and play.

Alic. [Aside.] O just Heaven !

Wilt thou not interpose ?—How dread this pause !
'Ten thousand terrors crowd the narrow space.

Arden. Your thoughts are absent, Mosby.

B. Will. Blood ! why don't Mosby give the word ?

Mich. Give back ; the game's against him.

Alic. Fly, Franklin ! fly, to save thy Arden's life :

Murder herself, that chases him in view,
Beholding me, starts back, and for a moment
Suspends her thirst of blood. [Aside.

Arden. Come, give it up ; I told you I should win.

[Rises.

Mos. No, I see an advantage ; move again.

Arden. There.

Mos. Now I take you.

[*BLACK WILL throws a scarf over ARDEN'S head, in order to strangle him ; but ARDEN disen-gages himself, wrests a dagger from SHAKE-
BAG, and stands on his defence, till MOSBY getting behind, and seizing his arm, the rest assassinate him.*

Alic. O power Omnipotent ! make strong his arm,
Give him to conquer. Ha ! my prayers are curses,
And draw down vengeance where they meant a blessing.

Arden. Inhospitable villain !

Alic. O ! he dies.

Arden. O hold your bloody—Mosby, too ! Nay then [Falling.

I yield me to my fate.—Is this, Alicia,
This, the return for my unequal love ?

Alic. Or death, or madness, would be mercies
now ;

Therefore, beyond my hopes.

Arden. O Mosby, Michael, Green,

Why have you drawn my blood upon your souls ?

Mos. Behold her there, to whom I was betroth'd,
And ask no farther—

Green. Think on thy abbey-lands

From injur'd Green.

Arden. You now are your own judges,
But we shall meet again where right and truth—
Who—who are these ? But I forgive you all.

Thy hand, Alicia—

Alic. I'll not give it thee. [too ?

Arden. O wretched woman ! have they kill'd thee
A deadly paleness, agony, and horror,

On thy sad visage sit. My soul hangs on thee,
And, though departing—just departing—loves

Is loath to leave, unreconcil'd to thee, [thee :
This useless, mangled tement of clay.

Dismiss her pleas'd, and say thou'rt innocent.

Alic. All hell contains not such a guilty wretch.

Arden. Then, welcome death ! though in the shape of murder.

How have I doted to idolatry !

Vain, foolish wretch, and thoughtless of hereafter,
Nor hop'd, nor wish'd, a heaven beyond her love.

Now, unprepar'd, I perish by her hate.

Alic. Though blacker, and more guilty, than the
My soul is white from this accursed deed. [fiends,
O Arden ! hear me—

Arden. Full of doubts I come,

O thou Supreme, to seek thy awful presence.

My soul is on the wing. I own thy justice.

Prevent me, with thy mercy. [Dies.

Alic. Turn not from me :

Behold me, pity me, survey my sorrows,

I, who despis'd the duty of a wife,

Will be thy slave.—Spit on me, spurn me, Sir,

I'll love the still.—O couldst thou court my scorn,

And now abhor me, when I love thee more,

If possible, than e'er thou lov'dst Alicia !

Mos. Mad fool ! he's dead and hears thee not.

Alic. 'Tis false—
He smiles upon me, and applauds my vengeance.
[Snatches a dagger, and strikes at MOSBY.
—A knocking at the gate.

Mos. Damnation!

B. Will. 'Sdeath! we shall leave our work unfinished, and be betrayed at last.—Let's hide the body.

Mos. Force her away.

Alic. Inhuman, bloody villains!

[She swoons, as she is forced from the body.

Enter MARIA.

Mar. Mosby here!

My sliding feet, as I move trembling forwards,
Are drench'd in blood. O may I only fancy,
That Arden there lies murder'd—

Mos. How fares Alicia?— [helli—

Alic. As the howling damn'd; and thou my

Mar. Unhappy brother!

If thou hast done this deed, hope not to 'scape:
Mercy herself, who only seeks for crimes,
That she may pardon and reform the guilty,
Would change her nature at a sight like this.

Enter MICHAEL.

Mich. The guests are come—the servants all return'd.

Mos. Alicia, be thyself; and mask thy heart, [Lifts up ALICIA.

From every prying eye, with courteous smiles.
Alic. Thou canst not think me mean enough to live.

Mos. You would not choose an ignominious death?

Alic. That's all I dread—might but the silent grave,

When it receives me to its dark abode,
Hide, with my dust, my shame! O might that be,
And Arden's death reveng'd—'Tis my sole prayer.
If not, may awful justice have her course. [Exit.

Mos. Sister! our lives are thine—

Mar. Though Mosby has shook off humanity,
I can't be his accuser. [Exit.

Mos. Follow them, Green, and watch Alicia's conduct.

Green. I will, but cannot answer for my own.
O Arden! Arden! could we change conditions!
[Exit.

B. Will. Why, what a crew of cowards!
In the same moment, murdering and repenting.

Mos. Give me the ring that is on Arden's finger.

Shake. There. Will you have his purse too?

Mos. No, keep that.

B. Will. Thanks for our own: we should have kept the ring,

Were it not too remarkable.
But how must we dispose of the body?

Mos. Convey it through the garden, to the field
Behind the abbey-wall: Michael will show the way.

The night is dark and cloudy—yet, take heed—
The house is full of company.

B. Will. Sir, if you doubt our conduct, do't yourself.

Mos. Nay, gentlemen—

Shake. Pretend to direct us!

Mos. For your own sakes—Arden will soon be miss'd.

Shake. We know our business, Sir.

Mos. I doubt it not.

There's your reward. The horses both are saddled,
And ready for your fight.

B. Will. Use them yourself:
I hope we're as safe as you.

Mos. Why, gentlemen—Arden, I us'd thee worse!
[Aside.

B. Will. We shall take care, however, for our own sakes.

Mos. 'Tis very well—I hope we all are friends.
So—softly—softly—Michael, not that door—

[MICHAEL, going out at the wrong door.
So—make what speed you can: I'll wait you there.
[Exit.

SCENE II.—A Hall in ARDEN'S House.

MOSBY alone.

They must pass undescri'd: gardens and fields
Are dreary deserts now. Night-fowls and beasts of prey

Avoid the pinching rigour of the season,
Nor leave their shelter at a time like this.

And yet this night, this lingering winter night,
Hung with a weight of clouds that stops her course,
Contracts new horrors, and a deeper black
From this damn'd deed.—Mosby, thou hast thy wish.

Arden is dead; now count thy gains at leisure.
Dangers without, on every side suspicion;
Within, my starting conscience makes such wounds,

As hell can equal, only murderers feel. [A pause.
This, this the end of all my flattering hopes!

O! happiest was I in my humble state:
Though I lay down in want, I slept in peace:

My daily toil begat my night's repose,
My night's repose made day-light pleasing to me.
But now I've climb'd the top-bough of the tree,
And sought to build my nest among the clouds,

The gentlest gales of summer shake my bed,
And dreams of murder harrow up my soul.

But hark!—Not yet!—'tis dreadful being alone.
This awful silence, that unbroken reigns

Through earth and air, awakes attention more
Than thunder bursting from ten thousand clouds:
'Sdeath!—'tis but Michael—say—

Enter MICHAEL.

Mich. Dead Arden lies
Behind the abbey—'tis a dismal sight!
It snow'd apace while we dispos'd the body.

Mos. And not as you return'd?

Mich. No, Sir—

Mos. That's much—
Should you be question'd as to Arden's death,
You'll not confess?

Mich. No, so Maria's mine.

Mos. She's thine, if all a brother can—

Mich. What's if?

I bought her dear, at hazard of my soul,
And force shall make her mine.—

Mos. Why, how now, coward!

Enter MARIA.

Mar. The guests refuse to take their seats without you.

Alicia's grief, too, borders on distraction.
Thy presence may appease—

Mos. Increase it, rather.

Mar. Michael, your absence too has been observ'd.

Mos. Say, we are coming. [Exit MARIA.

Mich. One thing I'd forgot. [Returning

Soon as the company have left the house,

The ruffians will return.

Mos. What would the villains?

Mich. They mutter'd threats and curses,
And seem'd not satisfied with their reward.

[Exit.]

Mos. Let them take all.—Ambition, a'rice, lust,
That drove me on to murder, now forsake me.
O Arden! if thy discontented ghost
Still hovers here to see thy blood reveng'd,
View, view the anguish of this guilty breast,
And be appeas'd. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—A Room in ARDEN'S House.

A table, &c. spread for supper.

GREEN, BRADSHAW, ADAM FOWL, ALICIA,
MARIA, &c.

Brad. Madam, be comforted.

A. Fowl. Some accident, or business unforeseen, detains him thus.

Brad. I doubt not of his safety.

Alic. I thank you, gentlemen; I know you lov'd
My Arden well, and kindly speak your wishes.

Enter MOSBY.

Mos. I am asham'd I've made you wait: be seated.

Green. Madam, first take your place.

Alic. Make me not mad—

To me all places are alike. [Sits.]

Mos. Come, since we want the master of the house,

I'll take his seat for once.

Alic. Dares he do this? [Aside.]

Mos. I'm much afflicted that he stays so late;
The times are perilous.

Green. And he has enemies,

Tho' no man, sure, did e'er deserve them less.

Mos. This day he was assaulted in the street.

Green. You sav'd him then.

Mos. Would I were with him now!

Mar. She starts, her looks are wild. [Aside.]

How fare you, Madam?

Alic. I'm lost in admiration of your brother.

Mar. I fear her more than ever. [Aside.]
Madam, be merry.

Mos. Michael, some wine. Health and long life to Arden. [Drinks.]

Alic. The good you wish, and have procur'd for Arden,
Light on thyself! [Rising, in desperation.]

Mar. For Heaven's sake!—

Alic. Give me way. [Comes forward.]
Let them despatch, and send me to my husband:

I've liv'd too long with falsehood and deceit.
[All rise.]

[Knocking at the gate.]

A. Fowl. What noise is that? [Exit MICHAEL.]

Brad. Pray Heaven, that all be right.

Mos. Bar all the doors.

Enter MICHAEL.

Mich. We are discover'd, Sir. [To MOSBY.]
The mayor, with officers and men in arms.

Enter MAYOR, &c.

Mayor. Go you with these, and do as I directed.

[Exit Officers and others.]
I'm sorry that the duty of my office
Demands a visit so unseasonable.

Mos. Your worship doubtless were a welcome guest

At any hour; but wherefore thus attended?

Mayor. I have received a warrant from the council

To apprehend two most notorious ruffians;
And, information being made on oath,
That they were seen to enter here to-night,
I'm come to search.

Green. I'm glad it is no worse. [Aside.]

Mos. And can you think that Arden entertains
Villains like those you speak of? were he here,
You'd not be thank'd for this officiousness.

Mayor. I know my duty, Sir, and that respect,
So justly due to our good neighbour's worth.—
But where is Arden?

Alic. Heavens! where, indeed!

Mar. Alicia, for my sake—

[Aside.]

Alic. If I were silent,
Each precious drop of murder'd Arden's blood
Would find a tongue, and cry to Heaven for vengeance.

Mayor. What says the lady?

Mos. Oh! Sir, heed her not:

Her husband has not been at home to-night,
And her misboding sorrow for his absence
Has almost made her frantic.

Mayor. Scarce an hour,

Since I beheld him enter here with you.

Mos. The darkness of the night deceiv'd you,
Sir:

It was a stranger, since departed hence.

Mayor. That's most surprising. No man knows him better.

Frank. [Without.] Within there—ho!—bar up your gates with care,

And set a watch—Let not a man go by—

[FRANKLIN and others enter, with lights.
And every tongue, that gave not its consent

To Arden's death, join mine and cry aloud

To Heaven and earth for justice. Honest Arden,
My friend—is murder'd.

Mayor. Murder'd!

Green. How?

Mos. By whom?

Frank. How shall I utter what my eyes have seen!

Horrid with many a gaping wound he lies

Behind the abbey, a sad spectacle!

O vengeance! vengeance!

Mayor. Justly art thou mov'd.

Passion is reason in a cause like this.

Frank. Eternal Providence, to whose bright eye
Darkness itself is as the noon-day blaze,

Who brings the midnight murd'rer and his deeds
To light and shame, has in their own security

Found these.

Mayor. Here, seize them all—this instant:

Look to the lady. This may be but feign'd.
[ALICIA faints.]

Your charge but goes along with my suspicions.

Brad. And mine.

A. Fowl. And mine.

Frank. First hear me; and then judge,
Whether on slight presumptions I accuse them.

These honest men, (neighbours and townsmen all)

Conducted me, dropping with grief and fear,
To where the body lay;—with them, I took these notes,

Not to be trusted to the faithless memory.
"Huge clots of blood and some of Arden's hair

May still be seen upon the garden wall;
Many such rushes, as these floors are strew'd with,

Stick to his shoes and garments; and the prints
Of several feet may in the snow be trac'd,

From the stark body to the very door."—

These are presumptions he was murder'd here,
And that the assassins, having borne his corse
Into the fields, hither return'd again.

Mos. Are these your proofs?

Green. These are but circumstances,

And only prove thy malice.

Frank. And this scarf,
Known to be Arden's, in the court was found,
All blood.

Mayor. Search 'em.—

Mich. I thought I'd thrown it down the well.

[Aside.]

Mayor. [To an OFFICER.] Enter that room, search the lady there;

We may perhaps discover more.

[OFFICER goes out, and re-enters; in the mean time another OFFICER searches
MOSBY and GREEN.]

1st Officer. On Arden's wife I found this letter.

2d Officer. And I, this ring on Mosby.

Mayor. Righteous Heaven!

Well may'st thou hang thy head, detested villain:
This very day did Arden wear this ring,
I saw it on his hand.—

Mos. I freely yield me to my fate.

Enter another OFFICER.

Officer. We've seiz'd two men behind some stacks of wood.

Mayor. Well, bring 'em in.

[BLACK WILL and SHAKEBAG brought in.]

They answer the description:

But let them wait 'till I have done with these.

Heavens! what a scene of villany is here!

[Having read the letter.]

B. Will. Since we're sure to die, though I could wish 'twere in better company, (for I hate that fawning rascal, Mosby,) I'll tell the truth for once.
He has been long engaged in an affair with Arden's wife there; but fearing a discovery, and hoping to get into his estate, hired us to hide him.—That's all.

Mayor. And you the horrid deed perform'd?

Shake. We did, with his assistance, and Green's, and Michael's.

Mayor. This letter proves, Alicia, from the first,
Was made acquainted with your black design.

B. Will. I know nothing of that: but, if she was, she repented of it afterwards. So I think, you call that a change of mind.

Mayor. That may avail her at the bar of Heaven,

But is no plea at ours. [ALICIA brought in.]
Bear them to prison;

Load them with irons, make them feel their guilt,

And groan away their miserable hours,

Till sentence of the law shall call them forth

To public execution.

Alic. I adore

Th' unerring hand of justice; and with silence

Had yielded to my fate, but for this maid,

Who, as my soul dreads justice on her crimes,

Knew not, or e'er consented to this deed.

Mayor. But did she not consent to keep it secret?

Mos. To save a brother and most wretched friend.

Mayor. She has undone herself—Behold how innocence

May suffer in bad fellowship.—And Bradshaw,

My honest neighbour Bradshaw too—I read it

With grief and wonder.—

Brad. Madam, I appeal

To you; as you are shortly to appear

Before a Judge that sees our secret thoughts,

Say, had I knowledge, or—

Alic. You brought the letter;

But I hope, you knew not the contents.

Mayor. Hence with them all, 'till time and farther light

Shall clear these mysteries.

A. Fowl. If I'm condemn'd,

My blood be on his head that gives the sentence.

I'm not accus'd, and only ask for justice.

Frank. You shall have justice all, and rig'rous justice.

So shall the growth of such enormous crimes,

By their dread fate be check'd in future times.

Of avarice, Mosby a dread instance prove;

And poor Alicia, of unlawful love. [Exeunt.]

THE JEALOUS WIFE:

A COMEDY,

IN FIVE ACTS.

BY GEORGE COLEMAN, Esq.

REMARKS.

This piece was originally performed at Drury-lane, and met with astonishing success. The plot is taken from Fielding's "Tom Jones," at the period when Sophia takes refuge at the house of Lady Bellaston. The portion of plot borrowed from that work, however, only serves to introduce Mr. and Mrs. Oakly, the jealous wife and her husband. The passions of the lady are certainly worked up to a sufficient height, and Mr. Oakly's vexation and domestic misery, in consequence of her behaviour, very strongly supported; yet, perhaps, the author would have better answered his purpose with respect to exposing the absurdity of the passion, had he made her appear somewhat less of the virago, and Mr. Oakly not so much of the hen-pecked husband. Mrs. Oakly now rather appears a lady, who, from a consciousness of her own power, is desirous of supporting the appearance of jealousy, to procure an undue influence over her husband and family, than one who, feeling the reality of that turbulent yet fluctuating passion, becomes equally absurd in the suddenness of forming unjust suspicions, and in that hastiness of being satisfied, which love, the only true basis of jealousy, will constantly occasion.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Room in OAKLY's House.

Noise heard within.

Mrs. O. [Within.] Don't tell me—I know it is so—It's monstrous, and I will not bear it.

Oak. [Within.] But my dear!

Mrs. O. Nay, nay, &c. [Squabbling within.]

Enter MRS. OAKLY with a letter, followed by OAKLY.

Mrs. O. Say what you will, Mr. Oakly, you shall never persuade me but this is some filthy intrigue of yours.

Oak. I can assure you, my love—

Mrs. O. Your love!—Don't I know your—

Tell me, I say, this instant, every circumstance relating to this letter.

Oak. How can I tell you, when you will not so much as let me see it?

Mrs. O. Look you, Mr. Oakly, this usage is not to be borne. You take a pleasure in abusing my tenderness and soft disposition.—To be perpetually running over the whole town, nay, the whole kingdom too, in pursuit of your amours!—Did not I discover that you was great with Mademoiselle, my own woman?—Did not you contract a shameful familiarity with Mrs. Freeman? Did not I detect your intrigue with Lady Wealthy? Was not you—

Oak. Oons! Madam, the grand Turk himself has not half so many mistresses. You throw me out of all patience. Do I know any body but our common friends? Am I visited by any body that does not visit you? Do I ever go out, unless you go with me? And am I not as constantly by your side, as if I were tied to your apron-strings?

Mrs. O. Go, go, you are a false man; have not I found you out a thousand times? and have not I this moment a letter in my hand, which convinces me of your baseness? Let me know the whole affair, or I will—

Oak. Let you know! let me know what you would have of me; you stop my letter before it comes to my hands, and then expect that I should know the contents of it!

Mrs. O. Heaven be praised, I stopped it! I suspected some of these doings for some time past—but the letter informs me who she is, and I'll be revenged on her sufficiently. Oh, you base man, you!

Oak. I beg, my dear, that you would moderate your passion! show me the letter, and I'll convince you of my innocence.

Mrs. O. Innocence! abominable! innocence! but I am not to be made such a fool; I am convinced of your perfidy, and very sure that—

Oak. 'Sdeath and fire! your passion hurries you out of your senses. Will you hear me?

Mrs. O. No, you are a base man: and I will not hear you.

Oak. Why then, my dear, since you will neither talk reasonably yourself, nor listen to reason from me, I shall take my leave till you are in a better humour. So your servant! [Going.]

Mrs. O. Ay, go, you cruel man! go to your mistresses, and leave your poor wife to her miseries. How unfortunate a woman am I! I could die with vexation.

[Throwing herself into a chair.]

Oak. There it is. Now dare not I stir a step further. If I offer to go, she is in one of her fits in an instant. Never sure was woman at once of so violent and so delicate a constitution! what shall I say to sooth her? [Aside.] Nay, never make thyself so uneasy, my dear; come, come, you know I love you.

Mrs. O. I know you hate me; and that your unkindness and barbarity will be the death of me.

[Whining.]

Oak. Do not vex yourself at this rate. I love you most passionately, indeed I do. This must be some mistake.

Mrs. O. Oh, I am an unhappy woman!

[Weeping.]

Oak. Dry up thy tears, my love, and be comforted! You will find that I am not to blame in this matter. Come, let me see this letter; nay, you shall not deny me. [Takes the letter.]

Mrs. O. There! take it; you know the hand, I am sure.

Oak. [Reads.] To Charles Oakly, Esq.—Hand! 'Tis a clerk-like hand, a good round text; and was certainly never penned by a fair lady.

Mrs. O. Ay, laugh at me, do.

Oak. Forgive me, my love, I did not mean to laugh at thee. But what says the letter? [Reads.] Daughter eloped—you must be privy to it—scandalous—dishonourable—satisfaction—revenge—um, um, um—injured father.

HENRY RUSSET.

Mrs. O. [Rising.] Well, Sir, you see I have detected you. Tell me this instant where she is concealed.

Oak. So, so, so; this hurts me. I'm shocked.

[To himself.]

Mrs. O. What, are you confounded with your guilt? Have I caught you at last?

Oak. O that wicked Charles! to decoy a young lady from her parents in the country! The profligacy of the young fellows of this age is abominable.

[To himself.]

Mrs. O. [Half aside, and musing.] Charles! let me see! Charles! no! impossible! This is all a trick.

Oak. He has certainly ruined this poor lady.

[To himself.]

Mrs. O. Art! art! all art! There's a sudden turn now! You have ready wit for an intrigue, I find.

Oak. Such an abandoned action! I wish I had never had the care of him.

Mrs. O. Mighty fine, Mr. Oakly! Go on, Sir, go on! I see what you mean. Your assurance provokes me beyond your very falsehood itself. So you imagine, Sir, that this affected concern, this flimsy pretence about Charles, is to bring you off. Matchless confidence! But I am armed against every thing; I am prepared for all your dark schemes: I am aware of all your low stratagems.

Oak. See there now! Was ever any thing so provoking? to persevere in your ridiculous—For Heaven's sake, my dear, don't distract me. When you see my mind thus agitated and uneasy, that a young fellow, whom his dying father, my own brother, committed to my care, should be guilty of such enormous wickedness; I say, when you are witness of my distress on this occasion, how can you be weak enough and cruel enough to—

Mrs. O. Prodigiously well, Sir! You do it very well. Nay, keep it up, carry it on; there's nothing like going through with it. O, you artful creature! But, Sir, I am not to be so easily satisfied. I do not believe a syllable of all this. Give me the letter. [Snatches the letter.] You shall sorely repent this vile business, for I am resolved that I will know the bottom of it. [Exit.]

Oak. This is beyond all patience. Provoking woman! Her absurd suspicions interpret every thing the wrong way. But this ungracious boy! In how many troubles will he involve his own and this lady's family! I never imagined that he was of such abandoned principles.

Enter MAJOR OAKLY and CHARLES.

Char. Good morrow, Sir.

Maj. O. Good morrow, brother, good morrow.—What! you have been at the old work, I find. I heard you, ding! dong! i'faith! She has rung a noble peal in your ears. But how now? Why sure you've had a remarkable warm bout on't, you seem more ruffled than usual.

Oak. I am, indeed, brother! Thanks to that young gentleman there. Have a care, Charles! you may be called to a severe account for this. The honour of a family, Sir, is no such light matter.

Char. Sir!

Maj. O. Hey-day! What, has a certain lecture produced a lecture of morality? What is all this?

Oak. To a profligate mind, perhaps, these things may appear agreeable in the beginning. But don't you tremble at the consequences?

Char. I see, Sir, that you are displeas'd with me; but I am quite at a loss to guess at the occasion.

Oak. Tell me, Sir! where is Miss Harriet Russet?

Char. Miss Harriet Russet! Sir, explain.

Oak. Have not you decoyed her from her father?

Char. I! Decoyed her—Decoyed my Harriet! I would sooner die than do her the least injury. What can this mean?

Maj. O. I believe the young dog has been at her, after all.

Oak. I was in hopes, Charles, you had better principles. But there's a letter just come from her father—

Char. A letter! What letter? Dear Sir, give it me. Some intelligence of my Harriet, major! The letter, Sir, the letter this moment, for Heaven's sake!

Oak. If this warmth, Charles, tends to prove your innocence—

Char. Dear Sir, excuse me; I'll prove any thing. Let me but see this letter, and I'll—

Oak. Let you see it! I could hardly get a sight of it myself. Mrs. Oakly has it.

Char. Has she got it? Major, I'll be with you again directly. [Exit hastily.]

Maj. O. Hey-dey! The devil's in the boy! What a fiery set of people! By my troth, I think the whole family is made of nothing but combustibles.

Oak. I like this emotion; it looks well: it may serve too to convince my wife of the folly of her suspicions. Would to Heaven I could quiet them for ever.

Maj. O. Why pray now, my dear, naughty brother, what heinous offence have you committed this morning? What new cause of suspicion? You have been asking one of the maids to mend your ruffle, I suppose, or have been hanging your head out at the window, when a pretty young woman has passed by, or—

Oak. How can you trifle with my distresses, major? Did not I tell you it was about a letter?

Maj. O. A letter! hum. A suspicious circumstance, to be sure! What, and the seal a true lover's knot now, hey? or a heart transfixed with darts; or possibly the wax bore the industrious impression of a thimble; or perhaps the folds were lovingly connected by a wafer, pricked with a pin, and the direction written in a vile scrawl, and not a word spelt as it should be! ha, ha, ha!

Oak. Pooh! brother; whatever it was, the letter, you find, was for Charles, not for me. This outrageous jealousy is the devil.

Maj. O. Mere matrimonial blessings and domestic comfort, brother! jealousy is a certain sign of love.

Oak. Love! it is this very love that hath made us both so miserable. Her love for me has confined me to my house, like a state prisoner, without the liberty of seeing my friends, or the use of pen, ink, and paper; while my love for her has made such a fool of me, that I have never had the spirit to contradict her.

Maj. O. Ay, ay, there you've hit it; Mrs. Oakly would make an excellent wife, if you did but know how to manage her.

Oak. You are a rare fellow indeed to talk of managing a wife! A debauched bachelor; a rattle-brained, rioting fellow, who has picked up your common-place notions of women in bagnios, taverns, and the camp; whose most refined commerce with the sex has been in order to delude country girls at your quarters, or to besiege the virtue of abigails, milliners, or mantua-makers' apprentices.

Maj. O. So much the better! so much the better! women are all alike in the main, brother, high or low, married or single, quality or no quality. I have found them so, from a duchess down to a milk-maid; every woman is a tyrant at the bottom. But they could never make a fool of me. No, no! no woman should ever domineer over me, let her be mistress or wife.

Oak. Single men can be no judges in these cases. They must happen in all families. But when things are driven to extremities—to see a woman in uneasiness—a woman one loves too—one's wife—who can withstand it? You neither speak nor think like a man that has loved and been married, major!

Maj. O. I wish I could hear a married man speak my language. I'm a bachelor, it's true; but I am no bad judge of your case for all that. I know yours and Mrs. Oakly's disposition to a hair. She is all impetuosity and fire; a very magazine of touchwood and gunpowder. You are hot enough too, upon occasion, but then it's over in an instant. In comes love and conjugal affection, as you call it; that is, mere folly and weakness; and you draw off your forces, just when you should pursue the attack, and follow your advantage. Have at her with spirit, and the day's your own, brother.

Oak. Why, what would you have me do?

Maj. O. Do as you please for one month, whether she likes it or not: and I'll answer for it she will consent you shall do as you please all her life after. In short, do but show yourself a man of spirit, leave off whining about love and tenderness, and nonsense, and the business is done, brother.

Oak. I believe you are in the right, major! I see you are in the right. I'll do it, I'll certainly do it. But then it hurts me to the soul, to think what uneasiness I shall give her. The first opening of my design will throw her into fits, and the pursuit of it, perhaps, may be fatal.

Maj. O. Fits! ha, ha, ha! I'll engage to cure her of her fits. Nobody understands hysterical cases better than I do; besides, my sister's symptoms are not very dangerous. Did you ever hear of her falling into a fit when you was not by? Was she ever found in convulsions in her closet? No, no, these fits, the more care you take of them, the more you will increase the distemper: let them alone, and they will wear themselves out, I warrant you.

Oak. True, very true; you are certainly in the right—I'll follow your advice. Where do you dine to-day? I'll order the coach, and go with you.

Maj. O. O brave! keep up this spirit, and you are made for ever.

Oak. You shall see now, major. Who's there?

Enter SERVANT.

Order the coach directly. I shall dine out to-day.

Serv. The coach, Sir?—Now, Sir?

Oak. Ay, now, immediately.

Serv. Now, Sir?—the—the—coach, Sir?—that is—my mistress—

Maj. O. Sirrah! do as you are bid. Bid them put to this instant.

Serv. Ye—yes, Sir—yes, Sir.

Oak. Well, where shall we dine? [Exit.]

Maj. O. At the St. Albans, or where you will. This is excellent, if you do but hold it.

Oak. I will have my own way, I am determined.

Maj. O. That's right.

Oak. I am steel.

Maj. O. Bravo!

Oak. Adamant.

Maj. O. Bravissimo!

Oak. Just what you'd have me.

Maj. O. Why, that's well said. But will you do it?

Oak. I will.

Maj. O. You want.

Oak. I will, I'll be a fool to her no longer. But hark ye, major, my hat and cane lie in my study. I'll go and steal them out, while she is busy talking with Charles.

Maj. O. Steal them! for shame! Pr'ythee take them boldly; call for them; make them bring them to you here; and go out with spirit, in the face of your whole family.

Oak. No, no; you are wrong; let her rave after I am gone, and when I return, you know, I shall exert myself with more propriety, after this open affront to her authority.

Maj. O. Well, take your own way.

Oak. Ay, ay; let me manage it, let me manage it. [Exit.]

Maj. O. Manage it! ay, to be sure, you are a rare manager! It is dangerous, they say, to meddle between man and wife. I am no great favourite of Mrs. Oakly's already; and in a week's time I expect to have the door shut in my teeth.

Enter CHARLES.

How now, Charles, what news?

Char. Ruined and undone! She's gone, uncle! my Harriet's lost for ever.

Maj. O. Gone off with a man? I thought so; they are all alike.

Char. Oh, no! Fled, to avoid that hateful match with Sir Harry Beagle.

Maj. O. Faith, a girl of spirit; but whence comes all this intelligence?

Char. In an angry letter from her father. How miserable I am! If I had not offended my Harriet, much offended her, by that foolish riot and drinking at your house in the country, she would certainly, at such a time, have taken refuge in my arms.

Maj. O. A very agreeable refuge for a young lady to be sure, and extremely decent!

Char. What a heap of extravagancies is I guilty of!

Maj. O. Extravagancies with a witness! Ah! you silly young dog, you would ruin yourself with her father, in spite of all I could do. There you sat, as drunk as a lord, telling the old gentleman the whole affair, and swearing you would drive Sir Harry Beagle out of the country, though I kept winking and nodding, pulling you by the sleeve, and kicking your shins under the table, in hopes of stopping you; but all to no purpose.

Char. What distress may she be in at this instant! Alone and defenceless! Where, where can she be?

Maj. O. What relations or friends has she in town?

Char. Relations! let me see. Faith, I have it! If she is in town, ten to one but she is at her aunt's, Lady Freelove's. I'll go thither immediately.

VOL. I. . . . 4 L

Maj. O. Lady Freelove's! Hold, hold, Charles! do you know her ladyship?

Char. Not much! but I'll break through all, to get to my Harriet.

Maj. O. I do know her ladyship.

Char. Well, and what do you know of her?

Maj. O. O, nothing! Her ladyship is a woman of the world, that's all.

Char. What do you mean?

Maj. O. That lady Freelove is an arrant—— By the by, did not she, last summer, make formal proposals to Harriet's father from Lord Trinket?

Char. Yes; but they were received with the utmost contempt. The old gentleman, it seems, hates a lord, and he told her so in plain terms.

Maj. O. Such an aversion to the nobility may not run in the blood. The girl, I warrant you, has no objection. However, if she's there, watch her narrowly, Charles. Lady Freelove is as mischievous as a monkey, and as cunning too. Have a care of her, I say, have a care of her.

Char. If she's there, I'll have her out of the house within this half hour, or set fire to it.

Maj. O. Nay, now you are too violent——stay a moment, and we'll consider what's best to be done.

Enter OAKLY.

Oak. Come, is the coach ready? Let us be gone. Does Charles go with us?

Char. I go with you! What can I do? I am so vexed and distracted, and so many thoughts crowd in upon me, I don't know which way to turn myself.

Mrs. O. [Within.] The coach!—dines out!—where is your master?

Oak. Zounds, brother, here she is!

Re-enter MRS. OAKLY.

Mrs. O. Pray, Mr. Oakly, what is the matter you cannot dine at home to-day?

Oak. Don't be uneasy, my dear! I have a little business to settle with my brother; so I am only just going to dinner, with him and Charles, to the tavern.

Mrs. O. Why cannot you settle your business here, as well as at a tavern? but it is some of your ladies' business, I suppose, and so you must get rid of my company. This is chiefly your fault, Major Oakly.

Maj. O. Lord, sister, what signifies it, whether a man dines at home, or abroad? [Coolly.]

Mrs. O. It signifies a great deal, Sir; and I don't choose——

Maj. O. Phoo! let him go, my dear sister, let him go; he will be ten times better company when he comes back. I tell you what, sister, you sit at home till you are quite tired of one another, and then you grow cross, and fall out. If you would but part a little now and then, you might meet again in humour.

Mrs. O. I beg, Major Oakly, that you would trouble yourself about your own affairs; and let me tell you, Sir, that I——

Oak. Nay, do not put thyself into a passion with the major, my dear.—It is not his fault; and I shall come back to thee very soon.

Mrs. O. Come back! why need you go out? I know well enough when you mean to deceive me; for then there is always a pretence of dining with Sir John, or my lord, or somebody; but when you tell me that you are going to a tavern, it's such a bare-faced affront.

Oak. This is so strange now! Why, my dear, I shall only just—

Mrs. O. Only just go after the lady in the letter, I suppose.

Oak. Well, well, I wont go then. Will that convince you? I'll stay with you, my dear. Will that satisfy you?

Maj. O. For shame; hold out, if you are a man. [Apart.]

Oak. She has been so much vexed this morning already, I must humour her a little now. [Apart.]

Maj. O. Fy, fy! go out, or you are undone. [Apart.]

Oak. You see it's impossible. I'll dine at home with thee, my love. [Apart to Mrs. OAKLY.]

Mrs. O. Ay, ay, pray do, Sir. Dine at a tavern, indeed! [Going.]

Oak. [Returning.] You may depend on me another time, major.

Maj. O. Steel and adamant!—Ah!

Mrs. O. [Returning.] Mr. Oakly.

Oak. O, my dear. [Exit, with Mrs. OAKLY.]

Maj. O. Ha, ha, ha! there's a picture of resolution! there goes a philosopher for you! ha! Charles!

Char. O, uncle, I have no spirits to laugh now.

Maj. O. So! I have a fine time on't between you and my brother. Will you meet me to dinner at the St. Albans by four? We'll drink her health, and think of this affair.

Char. Don't depend on me. I shall be running all over the town, in pursuit of my Harriet; at all events I'll go directly to Lady Freelove's. If I find her not there, which way I shall direct myself, Heaven knows.

Maj. O. Harkye, Charles; if you meet with her, you may be at a loss. Bring her to my house; I have a snug room, and—Char. Phoo! pry'thee, uncle, don't trifle with me now.

Maj. O. Well, seriously, then, my house is at your service.

Char. I thank you; but I must be gone.

Maj. O. Ay, ay, bring her to my house, and we'll settle the whole affair for you. You shall clap her into a post-chaise, take the chaplain of our regiment along with you, wheel her down to Scotland, and when you come back, send to settle her fortune with her father; that's the modern art of making love, Charles. [Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Room in the Bull and Gate Inn.

Enter SIR HARRY BEAGLE and TOM.

Sir H. Ten guineas a mare, and a crown the man? hey, Tom!

Tom. Yes, your honour.

Sir H. And are you sure, Tom, that there is no flaw in his blood?

Tom. He's a good thing, Sir, and as little beholden to the ground, as any horse that ever went over the turf upon four legs. Why here's his whole pedigree, your honour.

Sir H. Is it attested?

Tom. Very well attested; it is signed by Jack Spur and my Lord Startal.

[Giving the pedigree.]
Sir H. Let me see. [Reads.] Tom—come—tickle me was out of the famous Tantwivy mare, by Sir Aaron Driver's chesnut horse, White Stockings. White Stockings, his dam, was got by Lord Hedge's South Barb full sister to the Proserpine Filly, and his sire

Tom Jones; his grandam was the Irish Duchess, and his grandsire squire Sportley's Trajan; his great and great great grandam were Newmarket Peggy and Black Moll; and his great grandsire, and great great grandsire, were Sir Ralph Whip's Regulus and the famous Prince Anamaboo.

STARTAL.

Tom. All fine horses, and won every thing! a foal out of your honour's bald-faced Venus, by this horse, would beat the world.

Sir H. Well then, we'll think on't. But, plague on't, Tom, I have certainly knocked up my little roan gelding in this damned wildgoose chase of threescore miles an end.

Tom. He's afraid blown, to be sure, your honour; and I am afraid we are upon a wrong scent after all. Madam Harriet certainly took across the country, instead of coming on to London.

Sir H. No, no, we traced her all the way up. But d'ye hear, Tom, look out among the stables and repositories here in town, for a smart road nag, and a strong horse to carry a portmanteau.

Tom. Sir Roger Turf's horses are to be sold; I'll see if there's ever a tight thing there. But I suppose, Sir, you would have one somewhat stronger than Snip; I don't think he's quite enough of a horse for your honour.

Sir H. Not enough of a horse! Snip's a powerful gelding; master of two stone more than my weight. If Snip stands sound, I would not take a hundred guineas for him. Poor Snip! go into the stable, Tom, see they give him a warm mash, and look at his heels and his eyes. But where's Mr. Russet all this while?

Tom. I left the squire at breakfast on a cold pigeon pie, and inquiring after Madam Harriet, in the kitchen. I'll let him know your honour would be glad to see him here.

Sir H. Ay, do; but harkye, Tom, be sure you take care of Snip.

Tom. I'll warrant your honour.

Sir H. I'll be down in the stables myself by and by. [Exit TOM.] Let me see—out of the famous Tantwivy by White Stockings; White Stockings, his dam, full sister to the Proserpine Filly; and his sire—pox on't, how unlucky it is that this damned accident should happen in the Newmarket week—ten to one I lose my match with Lord Chokejade, by not riding myself, and I shall have no opportunity to hedge my bets neither—what a damned piece of work have I made on't. I have knocked up poor Snip, shall loose my match, and as to Harriet, why the odds are that I lose my match there too—a skittish young tit! If I once get her tight in hand, I'll make her wince for it. Her estate, joined to my own, I would have the finest stud and the noblest kennel in the whole country. But here comes her father, puffing and blowing, like a broken-winded horse up hill.

Enter RUSSET.

Rus. Well, Sir Harry, have you heard any thing of her?

Sir H. Yes, I have been asking Tom about her, and he says you may have her for five hundred guineas.

Rus. Five hundred guineas! how d'ye mean? where is she? which way did she take?

Sir H. Why, first she went to Epsom, then to Lincoln, then to Nottingham, and now she is at York.

Rus. Impossible! she could not go over half the ground in the time. What the devil are you talking of?

Sir H. Of the mare you was just now saying you wanted to buy.

Rus. The devil take the mare!—who would think of her, when I am mad about an affair of so much more consequence?

Sir H. You seemed mad about her a little while ago. She's a fine mare, and a thing of shape and blood.

Rus. Damn her blood!—Harriet, my dear, provoking Harriet! Where can she be? Have you got any intelligence of her.

Sir H. No, faith, not I: we seem to be quite thrown out here; but, however, I have ordered Tom to try if he can hear any thing of her among the hostlers.

Rus. Why don't you inquire after her yourself? why don't you run up and down the whole town after her?—t'other young rascal knows where she is, I warrant you. What a plague it is to have a daughter! When one loves her to distraction, and has toiled and laboured to make her happy, the ungrateful slut will sooner go to hell her own way—but she shall have him. I will make her happy, if I break her heart for it. A provoking gipsy—to run away, and torment her poor father, that dotes on her! I'll never see her face again.

Sir H. Harry, how can we get any intelligence of her? Why don't you speak? why don't you tell me?—Zounds! you seem as indifferent as if you did not care a farthing about her.

Sir H. Indifferent! you may well call me indifferent!—this damned chase after her will cost me a thousand—if it had not been for her, I would not have been off the course this week to have saved the lives of my whole family. I'll hold you six to two that—

Rus. Zounds! hold your tongue, or talk more to the purpose!—I swear she is too good for you; you don't deserve such a wife; a fine, dear, sweet, lovely, charming girl! She'll break my heart. How shall I find her out? Do, pry'thee, Sir Harry, my dear, honest friend, consider how we may discover where she is fled to.

Sir H. Suppose you put an advertisement into the newspapers, describing her marks, her age, her height, and where she strayed from. I recovered a bay mare once by that method.

Rus. Advertise her! What, describe my daughter, and expose her, in the public papers, with a reward for bringing her home, like horses stolen or strayed!—recovered a bay mare!—the devil 's in the fellow!—he thinks of nothing but racers, and bay mares, and stallions.—Sdeath, I wish you—

Sir H. I wish Harriet was fairly pounded; it would save us both a deal of trouble.

Rus. Which way shall I turn myself? I am half distracted. If I go to that young dog's house, he has certainly conveyed her somewhere out of my reach. If she does not send to me to-day, I'll give her up for ever. Perhaps, though, she may have met with some accident, and has nobody to assist her. No, she is certainly with that young rascal. I wish she was dead, and I was dead. I'll blow young Oakly's brains out.

Re-enter TOM.

Sir H. Well, Tom, how is poor Snip?

Tom. A little better, Sir, after his warm mash: but Lady, the pointing bitch that followed you all the way, is deadly foot-sore.

Rus. Damn Snip and Lady! have you heard any thing of Harriet?

Tom. Why, I came on purpose to let my master and your honour know, that John Hostler says as how, just such a lady as I told him Madam Harriet was, came here in a four-wheel chaise, and was fetched away soon after by a fine lady in a chariot.

Rus. Did she come alone?

Tom. Quite alone, only a servant maid, please your honour.

Rus. And what part of the town did they go to?

Tom. John Hostler says as how they bid the coachman drive to Grosvenor-square.

Sir H. Soho! puss—Yoicks!

Rus. She is certainly gone to that young rogue; he has got his aunt to fetch her from hence, or else she is with her own aunt, Lady Freelove: they both live in that part of the town. I'll go to his house, and in the meanwhile, Sir Harry, you shall step to Lady Freelove's. We'll find her, I warrant you. I'll teach my young mistress to be gadding. She shall marry you to-night. Come along, Sir Harry, come along; we wont lose a minute. Come along.

Sir H. Soho! hark forward! wind 'em and cross 'em! hark forward! Yoicks! Yoicks! [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—OAKLY'S HOUSE.

Enter MRS. OAKLY.

Mrs. O. After all, that letter was certainly intended for my husband. I see plain enough they are all in a plot against me. My husband intriguing, the major working him up to affront me, Charles owning his letters, and so playing into each other's hands. They think me a fool, I find, but I'll be too much for them yet. I have desired to speak with Mr. Oakly, and expect him here immediately. His temper is naturally open; and if he thinks my anger abated, and my suspicions laid asleep, he will certainly betray himself by his behaviour. I'll assume an air of good humour, pretend to believe the fine story they have trumped up, throw him off his guard, and so draw the secret out of him. Here he comes. How hard it is to dissemble one's anger! Oh, I could rate him soundly! but I'll keep down my indignation at present, though it chokes me.

Enter OAKLY.

O, my dear, I am very glad to see you. Pray sit down. [They sit.] I longed to see you. It seemed an age till I had an opportunity of talking over the silly affair that happened this morning. [Mildly.]

Oak. Why, really, my dear—

Mrs. O. Nay, don't look so grave now. Come, it's all over. Charles and you have cleared up matters. I am satisfied.

Oak. Indeed! I rejoice to hear it! You make me happy beyond my expectation. This disposition will insure our felicity. Do but lay aside your cruel, unjust suspicion, and we should never have the least difference.

Mrs. O. Indeed I begin to think so. I'll endeavour to get the better of it. And really sometimes it is very ridiculous. My uneasiness this morning for instance, ha, ha, ha! To be so much alarmed about that idle letter, which turned out quite another thing at last; was not I very angry with you? ha, ha, ha! [Affecting a laugh.]

Oak. Don't mention it. Let us both forget it. Your present cheerfulness makes amends for every thing.

Mrs. O. I am apt to be too violent; I love you too well to be quite easy about you. [Fondly.]

Well, no matter: what is become of Charles?

Oak. Poor fellow! he is on the wing, rambling all over the town, in pursuit of this young lady.

Mrs. O. Where is he gone, pray?

Oak. First of all, I believe, to some of her relations.

Mrs. O. Relations! Who are they? Where do they live?

Oak. There is an aunt of hers lives just in the neighbourhood; Lady Freelove.

Mrs. O. Lady Freelove! Oh! gone to Lady Freelove's, is he? and do you think he will hear any thing of her?

Oak. I don't know; but I hope so, with all my soul.

Mrs. O. Hope! with all your soul; do you hope so? [Alarmed.]

Oak. Hope so! ye—yes, why, don't you hope so? [Surprised.]

Mrs. O. Why, yes. [Recovering.] O, ay, to be sure. I hope it of all things. You know, my dear, it must give me great satisfaction, as well as yourself to see Charles well settled.

Oak. I should think so; and really I don't know where he can be settled so well. She is a most deserving young woman, I assure you.

Mrs. O. You are well acquainted with her then?

Oak. To be sure, my dear; after seeing her so often last summer, at the major's house in the country, and at her father's.

Mrs. O. So often!

Oak. O, ay, very often; Charles took care of that, almost every day.

Mrs. O. Indeed! But pray—a—a—a—I say—a—a— [Confused.]

Oak. What do you say, my dear?

Mrs. O. I say—a—a [Stammering.] Is she handsome?

Oak. Prodigiously handsome, indeed.

Mrs. O. Prodigiously handsome! and is she reckoned a sensible girl?

Oak. A very sensible, modest, agreeable young lady, as ever I knew. You would be extremely fond of her, I am sure. You can't imagine how happy I was in her company. Poor Charles! she soon made a conquest of him, and no wonder, she has so many elegant accomplishments! such an infinite fund of cheerfulness and good humour. Why, she's the darling of the whole country.

Mrs. O. Lord! you seem quite in raptures about her!

Oak. Raptures! not at all. I was only telling you the young lady's character. I thought you would be glad to find that Charles had made so sensible a choice, and was so likely to be happy.

Mrs. O. Oh, Charles! True, as you say, Charles will be mighty happy.

Oak. Don't you think so?

Mrs. O. I am convinced of it. Poor Charles, I am much concerned for him. He must be very uneasy about her. I was thinking whether we could be of any service to him in this affair.

Oak. Was you, my love? that is very good of you. Why, to be sure, we must endeavour to assist him. Let me see; how can we manage it? 'Gad! I have hit it. The luckiest thought! and it will be of great service to Charles.

Mrs. O. Well, what is it? [Eagerly.] You know I would do any thing to serve Charles, and oblige you. [Mildly.]

Oak. That is so kind. Lord, my dear, if you would but always consider things in this proper light, and continue this amiable temper, we should be the happiest people—

Mrs. O. I believe so; but what's your proposal?

Oak. I am sure you'll like it. Charles, you know, may perhaps be so lucky as to meet with this lady.

Mrs. O. True.

Oak. Now I was thinking, that he might with your leave, my dear,—

Mrs. O. Well.

Oak. Bring her home here—

Mrs. O. How!

Oak. Yes, bring her home here, my dear; it will make poor Charles's mind quite easy: and you may take her under your protection, till her father comes to town.

Mrs. O. Amazing! this is even beyond my expectation.

Oak. Why!—what!—

Mrs. O. Was there ever such assurance! [Rises.] Take her under my protection! What! would you keep her under my nose?

Oak. Nay, I never conceived; I thought you would have approved—

Mrs. O. What! make me your convenient woman! No place but my own house to serve your purposes?

Oak. Lord, this is the strangest misapprehension! I am quite astonished.

Mrs. O. Astonished! yes—confused, detected, betrayed, by your vain confidence of imposing on me.—Why, sure, you imagine me an idiot, a driver.—Charles, indeed! yes, Charles is a fine excuse for you. The letter this morning, the letter, Mr. Oakley!

Oak. The letter! why, sure, that—

Mrs. O. Is sufficiently explained. You have made it very clear to me. Now I am convinced. I have no doubt of your perfidy. But I thank you for some hints you have given me, and you may be sure I shall make use of them: nor will I rest till I have full conviction, and overwhelm you with the strongest proof of your baseness towards me.

Oak. Nay, but—

Mrs. O. Go, go! I have no doubt of your falsehood: away! [Exit.]

Oak. Was there ever any thing like this? Such unaccountable behaviour! angry I don't know why! jealous of I know not what! Hints!—hints I have given her! What can she mean?

Enter TOILET, crossing the Stage.

Toilet, where are you going?

Toi. To order the porter to let in no company to my lady to-day. She wont see a single soul, Sir. [Exit.]

Oak. What an unhappy woman! Now will she sit all day feeding on her suspicions, till she has convinced herself of the truth of them.

Enter JOHN, crossing the Stage.

Well, Sir, what's your business?

John. Going to order the chariot, Sir; my lady's going out immediately. [Exit.]

Oak. Going out! what is all this? But every way she makes me miserable. Wild and unmanageable as the sea or the wind! made up of storms and tempests! I can't bear it: and one way or other I will put an end to it. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—LADY FREELOVE'S HOUSE.

Enter LADY FREELOVE, with a Card; a SERVANT following.

Lady F. [Reading as she enters.] And will take the liberty of waiting on her ladyship en cavalier, as he comes from the menage. Does any body wait that brought this card?

Serv. Lord Trinket's servant is in the hall, Madam.

Lady F. My compliments, and I shall be glad to see his lordship. Where is Miss Russet?

Serv. In her own chamber, Madam.

Lady F. What is she doing?

Serv. Writing, I believe, Madam.

Lady F. Oh, ridiculous! scribbling to that Oakly, I suppose. [Apart.] Let her know, I should be glad of her company here. [Exit SERVANT.] It is a mighty troublesome thing to manage a simple girl, that knows nothing of the world. Harriet, like all other girls, is foolishly fond of this young fellow of her own choosing, her first love; that is to say, the first man that is particularly civil; and the first air of consequence which a young lady gives herself. Poor silly soul!—But Oakly must not have her, positively. A match with Lord Trinket will add to the dignity of the family. I must bring her into it. But here she comes.

Enter HARRIET.

Well, Harriet, still in the pouts! nay, pr'ythee, my dear little runaway girl, be more cheerful! your everlasting melancholy puts me into the vapours.

Har. Dear Madam, excuse me. How can I be cheerful in my present situation? I know my father's temper so well, that I am sure this step of mine must almost distract him. I sometimes wish that I had remained in the country, let what would have been the consequence.

Lady F. Why, it is a naughty child, that's certain; but it need not be so uneasy about papa, as you know that I wrote by last night's post to acquaint him that his little lost sheep was safe, and that you were ready to obey his commands in every particular, except marrying that oaf, Sir Harry Beagle.—Lord! Lord! what a difference there is between a country and a town education! Why, a London lass would have jumped out of a window into a gallant's arms, and without thinking of her father, unless it were to have drawn a happy bill on him, been a hundred miles off in nine or ten hours, or perhaps out of the kingdom in twenty-four.

Har. I fear I have already been too precipitate. I tremble for the consequences.

Lady F. I swear, child, you are a downright prude. Your way of talking gives me the spleen; so full of affection, and duty, and virtue, 'tis just like a funeral sermon. And yet, pretty soul! it can love.—Well, I wonder at your taste; a sneaking, simple gentleman, without a title! and when to my knowledge you might have a man of quality to-morrow.

Har. Perhaps so. Your ladyship must excuse me, but many a man of quality would make me miserable.

Lady F. Indeed, my dear, these antediluvian notions will never do now-a-days; and at the same time too, those little wicked eyes of yours speak a very different language. Indeed you have fine eyes, child! and they have made fine work with Lord Trinket.

Har. Lord Trinket! [Contemptuously.]

Lady F. Yes, Lord Trinket: you know it as well as I do; and yet, you ill-natured thing, you will not vouchsafe him a single smile. But you must give the poor soul a little encouragement, pr'ythee do.

Har. Indeed I can't, Madam, for of all mankind Lord Trinket is my aversion.

Lady F. Why so, child? He is counted a well-bred, sensible, young fellow, and the women all think him handsome.

Har. Yes, he is just polite enough to be able to be very unmannerly, with a great deal of good breeding; is just handsome enough to make him most excessively vain of his person; and has just reflection enough to finish him for a coxcomb; qualifications which are all very common among those whom your ladyship calls men of quality.

Lady F. A satirist too! Indeed my dear, this affectation sits very awkwardly upon you. There will be a superiority in the behaviour of persons of fashion.

Har. A superiority indeed! for his lordship always behaves with so much insolent familiarity, that I should almost imagine he was soliciting me for other favours, rather than to pass my whole life with him.

Lady F. Innocent freedoms, child, which every fine woman expects to be taken with her as an acknowledgment of her beauty.

Har. They are freedoms which I think no innocent woman can allow.

Lady F. Romantic to the last degree!—Why, you are in the country still, Harriet!

Enter a SERVANT.

Serv. My Lord Trinket, Madam. [Exit.]

Lady F. I swear now I have a good mind to tell him all you have said.

Enter LORD TRINKET, in boots, &c. as from the riding house.

Your lordship's most obedient humble servant.

Lord T. Your ladyship does me too much honour. Here I am, en bottine, as you see—just come from the menage.

Lady F. Your lordship is always agreeable in every dress.

Lord T. Vastly obliging, Lady Freelove. Miss Russet, I am your slave. I declare it makes me quite happy to find you together. 'Pon honour, Ma'am, [To HARRIET.] I begin to conceive great hopes of you; and as for you, Lady Freelove, I cannot sufficiently commend your assiduity with your fair pupil. She was before possessed of every grace that nature could bestow on her, and nobody is so well qualified as your ladyship to give her the bon ton.

Har. Compliment and contempt all in a breath!—My lord, I am obliged to you. But, waving my acknowledgments, give me leave to ask your lordship whether nature and the bon ton (as you call it) are so different, that we must give up one in order to obtain the other?

Lord T. Totally opposite, Madam. The chief aim of the bon ton is to render persons of family different from the vulgar, for whom indeed nature serves very well. For this reason it has, at various times, been ungentle to see, to hear, to walk, to be in good health, and to have twenty other horrible perfections of nature. Nature indeed may do very well sometimes. It made you, for instance, and it then made something very lovely; and if you would suffer us of quality to give you the ton, you would be absolutely divine: but now—me—Madam—me—nature never made such a thing as me.

Har. Why, indeed, I think your lordship has very few obligations to her.

Lord T. Then you really think it's all my own? I declare now that is a mighty genteel compliment: nay, if you begin to flatter already, you improve apace. 'Pon honour, Lady Freelove, I believe we shall make something of her at last.

Lady F. No doubt on't. It is in your lordship's power to make her a complete woman of fashion at once.

Lord T. Hum! Why, ay—

Har. Your lordship must excuse me. I am of a very tasteless disposition. I shall never bear to be carried out of nature.

Lady F. You are out of nature now, Harriet! I am sure no woman but yourself ever objected to being carried among persons of quality. Would you believe it, my lord! here has she been a whole week in town, and would never suffer me to introduce her to a rout, an assembly, a concert, or even to court, or the opera; nay, would hardly so much as mix with a living soul that has visited me.

Lord T. No wonder, Madam, you do not adopt the manners of persons of fashion, when you will not even honour them with your company. Were you to make one in our little coteries, we should soon make you sick of the boors and bumpkins of the horrid country. By the by, I met a monster at the riding-house this morning who gave me some intelligence, that will surprise you, concerning your family.

Har. What intelligence?

Lady F. Who was this monster, as your lordship calls him? a curiosity, I dare say.

Lord T. This monster, Madam, was formerly my head groom, and had the care of all my running horses; but growing most abominably surly and extravagant, as you know all these fellows do, I turned him off; and ever since my brother, Slouch Trinket, has had the care of my stud, rides all my principal matches himself, and—

Har. Dear, my lord, don't talk of your groom and your brother, but tell me the news. Do you know any thing of my father?

Lord T. Your father, Madam, is now in town. This fellow, you must know, is now groom to Sir Harry Beagle, your sweet rural swain, and informed me that his master and your father were running all over the town in quest of you; and that he himself has orders to inquire after you: for which reason, I suppose, he came to the riding-house stables to look after a horse, thinking it, to be sure, a very likely place to meet you. Your father, perhaps, is gone to seek you at the Tower, or Westminster Abbey, which is all the idea he has of London; and your faithful lover is probably cheapening a hunter, and drinking strong beer, at he Horse and Jockey in Smithfield.

Lady F. The whole set admirably disposed of.

Har. Did not your lordship inform him where I was?

Lord T. Not I, 'pon honour, Madam; that I left to their own ingenuity to discover.

Lady F. And pray, my lord, where in this town have this polite company bestowed themselves?

Lord T. They lodge, Madam, of all places in the world, at the Bull and Gate Inn, in Holborn.

Lady F. Ha, ha, ha! The Bull and Gate! Incomparable! What, have they brought any hay or cattle to town?

Lord T. Very well, Lady Freelove, very well indeed! There they are like so many graziers; and there, it seems, they have learned that this lady is certainly in London.

Har. Do, dear Madam, send a card directly to my father, informing him where I am, and that your ladyship would be glad to see him here. For my part I dare not venture into his presence, till you have in some measure pacified him; but for Heaven's sake, desire him not to bring that wretched fellow along with him.

Lord T. Wretched fellow! Oho! Courage, Milor Trinket!

Lady F. I'll send immediately. Who's there?

Re-enter SERVANT.

Serv. [Apart to LADY FREELOVE.] Sir Harry Beagle is below, Madam.

Lady F. [Apart to SERVANT.] I am not at home.—Have they let him in?

Serv. Yes, Madam.

Lady F. How abominably unlucky this is! Well, then, show him into my dressing-room, I will come to him there.

Lord T. Lady Freelove! no engagement I hope? We went part with you, 'pon honour.

Lady F. The worst engagement in the world. A pair of musty old prudes! Lady Formal and Miss Prate.

Lord T. O the beldams! as nauseous as ipecacuanha, 'pon honour.

Lady F. Lud, lud! what shall I do with them? Why do these foolish women come troubling me now? I must wait on them in the dressing-room, and you must excuse the card, Harriet, till they are gone. I'll dispatch them as soon as I can, but Heaven knows when I shall get rid of them, for they are both everlasting gossips! though the words come from her ladyship one by one, like drops from a still, while the other tiresome woman overwhelms us with a flood of impertinence. Harriet, you'll entertain his lordship till I return.

Lord T. Gone!—'Pon honour, I am not sorry for the coming in of these old tabbies, and am much obliged to her ladyship for leaving us such an agreeable tete-a-tete.

Har. Your lordship will find me extremely bad company.

Lord T. Not in the least, my dear! We'll entertain ourselves one way or other, I'll warrant you.—Egad, I think it a mighty good opportunity to establish a better acquaintance with you.

Har. I don't understand you.

Lord T. No?—Why then I'll speak plain-er.—[Pausing, and looking her full in the face.] You are an amazing fine creature, 'pon honour.

Har. If this be your lordship's polite conversation, I shall leave you to amuse yourself in soliloquy.

Lord T. No, no, no, Madam, that must not be, [Stopping her.] This place, my passion, the opportunity, all conspire—

Har. How, Sir! you don't intend to do me any violence?

Lord T. 'Pon honour, Ma'am, it will be doing great violence to myself, if I do not. You must excuse me. [Struggling with her.]

Har. Help! help! murder! help!

Lord T. Your yelping will signify nothing—nobody will come. [Struggling.]

Har. For Heaven's sake!—Sir!—My lord!—

[Noise within.]

Lord T. Plague on't, what noise!—Then I must be quick. [Still struggling.]

Har. Help! murder! help! help!

Enter CHARLES, hastily.

Char. What do I hear? my Harriet's voice calling for help!—Ha!—[Seeing them.] Is it possible!—Turn, ruffian! I'll find you employment.

Lord T. You are a most impertinent scoundrel, and I'll whip you through the lungs, 'pon honour. [Drawing.]

[They fight; HARRIET runs out, screaming help, &c.]

Re-enter LADY FREELOVE, with SIR HARRY BEAGLE, and Servants.

Lady F. How's this?—Swords drawn in my house!—Part them!—[They are parted.] This is the most impudent thing—

Lord T. Well, rascal, I shall find a time; I know you, Sir!

Char. The sooner the better; I know your lordship too.

Sir H. P'faith, Madam, [To LADY FREELOVE.] we had like to have been in at the death.

Lady F. What is all this? pray, Sir, what is the meaning of your coming hither, to raise this disturbance? do you take my house for a brothel?

[To CHARLES.]

Char. Not I, indeed, Madam; but I believe his lordship does.

Lord T. Impudent scoundrel!

Lady F. Your conversation, Sir, is as insolent as your behaviour. Who are you? What brought you here?

Char. I am one, Madam, always ready to draw my sword in defence of innocence in distress, and more especially in the cause of that lady I delivered from his lordship's fury; in search of whom I troubled your ladyship's house.

Lady F. Her lover, I suppose; or what?

Char. At your ladyship's service; though not quite so violent in my passion as his lordship there.

Lord T. Impertinent rascal!

Lady F. You shall be made to repent of this insolence.

Lord T. Your ladyship may leave that to me.

Char. Ha, ha!

Sir H. But pray what is become of the lady all this while? why, Lady Free love, you told me she was not here; and p'faith, I was just drawing off another way, if I had not heard the view halloo.

Lady F. You shall see her immediately, Sir; who's there?

Enter SERVANT.

Where is Miss Russet?

Serv. Gone out, Madam.

Lady F. Gone out?—Where?

Serv. I don't know, Madam; but she run down the back stairs, crying for help, crossed the servants' hall in tears, and took a chair at the door.

Lady F. Blockheads! to let her go out in a chair alone!—Go and inquire after her immediately. [Exit SERVANT.]

Sir H. Gone!—When I had just run her down; and is the little puss stole away at last?

Lady F. Sir, if you will walk in, [To SIR H.] with his lordship and me, perhaps you may hear some tidings of her; though it is most probable she may be gone to her father. I don't know any other friend she has in town.

Char. I am heartily glad she is gone. She is safer any where than in this house.

Lady F. Mighty well, Sir!—My lord, Sir Harry,—I attend you.

Lord T. You shall hear from me, Sir!

[To CHARLES.]

Char. Very well, my lord.

Sir H. Stole away!—plague on't—stole away! [Exeunt SIR HARRY and LORD TRINKET.]

Lady F. Before I follow the company, give me leave to tell you, Sir, that your behaviour here has been so extraordinary—

Char. My treatment here, Madam, has indeed been very extraordinary.

Lady F. Indeed!—Well, no matter—permit me to acquaint you, Sir, that there lies your way out, and that the greatest favour you can do me, is to leave the house immediately.

Char. That your ladyship may depend on. Since you have put Miss Russet to flight, you may be sure of not being troubled with my company. I'll after her immediately.

Lady F. If she has any regard for her reputation, she'll never put herself into such hands as yours.

Char. O Madam, there can be no doubt of her regard for that, by her leaving your ladyship.

Lady F. Leave my house.

Char. Directly—A charming house! and a charming lady of the house too!—ha, ha, ha!

Lady F. Vulgar fellow!

Char. Fine lady! [Exeunt severally.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—LADY FREELOVE'S House.

Enter LADY FREELOVE and LORD TRINKET.

Lord T. Doucement, doucement, my dear Lady Free love!—Excuse me, I mean no harm, 'pon honour.

Lady F. Indeed, indeed, my Lord Trinket, this is absolutely intolerable! What, to offer rudeness to a young lady in my house! What will the world say of it?

Lord T. Just what the world pleases.—It does not signify a doit what they say.—However, I ask pardon; but 'egad, I thought it was the best way.

Lady F. For shame, for shame, my lord! I am quite hurt at your want of discretion; and as this is rather an ugly affair in regard to me, as well as your lordship, and may make some noise, I think it absolutely necessary, merely to save appearances, that you should wait on her father, palliate matters as well as you can, and make a formal repetition of your proposal of marriage.

Lord T. Your ladyship is perfectly in the right.—You are quite au fait of the affair. It shall be done immediately, and then your reputation will be safe, and my conduct justified to all the world. But should the old rustic continue as stubborn as his daughter, your ladyship, I hope, has no objections to my being a little rusee, for I must have her, 'pon honour.

Enter SERVANT.

Serv. Captain O'Cutter, to wait on your ladyship.

Lady F. O the hideous fellow! The Irish sailor-man, for whom I prevailed on your lordship to get the post of regulating captain. I suppose he is come to load me with his odious thanks. I won't be troubled with him now.

Lord T. Let him in, by all means. He is the best creature to laugh at in nature. He is a perfect sea-monster, and always looks and talks as if he was upon deck. Besides a thought strikes me—He may be of use.

Lady F. Well—send the creature up then. [Exit SERVANT.] But what fine thought is this?

Lord T. A coup de maitre, 'pon honour! I intend—but, hush! here the porpus comes.

Enter CAPTAIN O'CUTTER.

Lady F. Captain, your humble servant! I am very glad to see you.

O'Cut. I am much obliged to you, my lady! Upon my conscience, the wind favours me at all points. I had no sooner got under weigh, to tank your ladyship, but I have borne down upon my noble friend his lordship too. I hope your lordship's well?

Lord T. Very well, I thank you, captain:—but you seem to be hurt in the service: what is the meaning of that patch over your right eye?

O'Cut. Some advanced wages from my new post, my lord! This pressing is hot work, though it entitles us to smart money.

Lady F. And pray, in what perilous adventure did you get that scar, captain?

O'Cut. Quite out of my element, indeed, my lady, I got it in an engagement by land. A day or two ago, I spied three stout fellows, belonging to a merchantman. They made down Wapping. I immediately gave my lads the signal to chase, and we bore down right upon them. They tackled, and lay to.—We gave them a thundering broadside, which they resaved like men; and one of them made use of small arms, which carried off the weathermost corner of Ned Gage's hat; so I immediately stood in with him, and raked him, but resaved a wound on my starboard eye, from the stock of the pistol. However we took them all, and they now lie under the hatches, with fifty more, aboard a tender off the Tower.

Lord T. Well done, noble captain!—But however you will soon have better employment, for I think the next step to your present post, is commonly a ship.

O'Cut. The sooner the better, my lord! Honest Terence O'Cutter shall never flinch, I warrant you; and has had as much sea-sarvice as any man in the navy.

Lord T. You may depend on my good offices, captain! But, in the meantime, it is in your power to do me a favour.

O'Cut. A favour, my lord?—your lordship does me honour. I would go round the world, from one end to the other, by day or by night, to sarve your lordship, or my good lady here.

Lord T. Dear Madam, the luckiest thought in nature! [Apart to LADY F.] The favour I have to ask of you, captain, need not carry you so far out of your way. The whole affair is, that there is a couple of impudent fellows at an inn in Holborn, who have affronted me, and you would oblige me finally, by pressing them into his majesty's service.

Lady F. Now I understand—Admirable!

[Apart.]
O'Cut. With all my heart, my lord, and tank you too, 'fait. But, by the by, I hope they are not house-keepers, or freemen of the city. There's the devil to pay in meddling with them. They boder one so about liberty, and property, and stuff.—It was but t'other day that Jack Trowser was carried before my lord mayor, and lost above a twelvemonth's pay for nothing at all, at all.

Lord T. I'll take care you shall be brought into no trouble. These fellows were formerly my grooms. If you'll call on me in the morning, I'll go with you to the place.

O'Cut. I'll be with your lordship, and bring with me four or five as pretty boys as you'll wish to clap your two looking eyes upon of a summer's day.

Lord T. I am much obliged to you—But, captain, I have another little favour to beg of you.

O'Cut. Upon my shoul, I'll do it.

Lord T. What, before you know it?

O'Cut. Fore and aft, my lord!

Lord T. A gentleman has offended me in a point of honour—

O'Cut. Cut his throat!

Lord T. Will you carry him a letter from me?

O'Cut. Indeed and I will:—and I'll take you in tow too; and you shall engage him yard-arm and yard-arm.

Lord T. Why then, captain, you'll come a little earlier to-morrow morning than you proposed, that you may attend him with my billet, before you proceed on the other affair.

O'Cut. Never fear it, my lord—Your sarvant!—My ladyship, your humble sarvant!

Lady F. Captain, yours—Pray give my service to my friend Mrs. O'Cutter. How does she do?

O'Cut. I tank your ladyship's axing—The dear creature is purely tight and well.

Lord T. How many children have you, captain?

O'Cut. Four, a please your lordship, and another upon the stocks.

Lord T. When it is launched, I hope to be at the christening.—I'll stand godfather, captain.

O'Cut. Your lordship's very good.

Lord T. Well, you'll come to-morrow.

O'Cut. Ay, my lord, and every day next week.—Little Terence O'Cutter never fails, 'fait, when a trout is to be cut. [Exit.]

Lady F. Ha, ha, ha! but, sure, you don't intend to ship off both her father and her country lover for the Indies?

Lord T. O no! Only let them contemplate the inside of a ship, for a day or two.

Lady F. Well, my lord, what use do you propose to make of this stratagem?

Lord T. Every use in nature. This artifice must, at least, take them out of the way for some time; and in the mean while measures may be concerted to carry off the girl.

Re-enter SERVANT.

Serv. Mrs. Oakly, Madam, is at the door, in her chariot, and desires to have the honour of speaking to your ladyship on particular business.

Lord T. Mrs. Oakly! what can that jealous-pated woman want with you?

Lady F. No matter what,—I hate her mortally.—Let her in. [Exit SERVANT.]

Lord T. What wind blows her hither?

Lady F. A wind that must blow us some good.

Lord T. How?—I was amazed you chose to see her.

Lady F. How can you be so slow of apprehension?—She comes, you may be sure, on some occasion relating to this girl: in order to assist young Oakly, perhaps, to sooth me, and gain intelligence, and so forward the match; but I'll forbid the bans, I warrant you.—Whatsoever she wants, I'll draw some sweet mischief out of it.—But, away, away!—I think I hear her—slip down the back stairs—or—stay, now I think on't, go out this way—meet her—and be sure to make her a very respectful bow, as you go out.

Lord T. Hush! here she is!

Enter MRS. OAKLY.

[LORD TRINKET bows, and exit.]

Mrs. O. I beg pardon, for giving your ladyship this trouble.

Lady F. I am always glad of the honour of seeing Mrs. Oakly.

Mrs. O. There is a letter, Madam, just come from the country, which has occasioned some alarm in our family. It comes from Mr. Russet—

Lady F. Mr. Russet!

Mrs. O. Yes, from Mr. Russet, Madam; and is chiefly concerning his daughter. As she has the honour of being related to your ladyship, I took the liberty of waiting on you.

Lady F. She is, indeed, as you say, Madam, a relation of mine; but, after what has happened, I scarce know how to acknowledge her.

Mrs. O. Has she been so much to blame then?

Lady F. So much—Madam!—Only judge for yourself—Though she had been so indiscreet, not to say indecent in her conduct, as to elope from her father, I was in hopes to have hushed up the matter, for the honour of our family.—But she has run away from me too, Madam:—went off, in the most abrupt manner, not an hour ago.

Mrs. O. You surprise me. Indeed, her father, by his letter, seems apprehensive of the worst consequences.—But does your ladyship imagine any harm has happened?

Lady F. I can't tell—I hope not.—But indeed she's a strange girl. You know, Madam, young women can't be too cautious in their conduct. She is, I am sorry to declare it, a very dangerous person to take into a family.

Mrs. O. Indeed! [Alarmed.]

Lady F. If I was to say all I know—

Mrs. O. Why sure your ladyship knows of nothing that has been carried on clandestinely between her and Mr. Oakly! [In disorder.]

Lady F. Mr. Oakly!

Mrs. O. Mr. Oakly—no, not Mr. Oakly—that is, not my husband—I don't mean him—not him—but his nephew—young Mr. Oakly.

Lady F. Jealous of her husband! So, so; now I know my game. [Aside.]

Mrs. O. But pray, Madam, give me leave to ask, was there any thing very particular in her conduct while she was in your ladyship's house?

Lady F. Why really, considering she was here scarce a week, her behaviour was rather mysterious;—letters and messages, to and fro, between her and I don't know who.—I suppose you know that Mr. Oakly's nephew has been here, Madam:

Mrs. O. I was not sure of it. Has he been to wait on your ladyship already on this occasion?

Lady F. To wait on me!—The expression is much too polite for the nature of his visit.—My Lord Trinket, the nobleman whom you met as you came in, had, you must know, Madam, some thoughts of my niece, and, as it would have been an advantageous match, I was glad of it: but I believe, after what he has been witness to this morning, he will drop all thoughts of it.

Mrs. O. I am sorry that any relation of mine should so far forget himself—

Lady F. It's no matter—his behaviour, indeed, as well as the young lady's, was pretty extraordinary—and yet, after all, I don't believe he is the object of her affections.

Mrs. O. Ha! [Much alarmed.]

Lady F. She has certainly an attachment some where, a strong one; but his lordship, who was present all the time, was convinced, as well as myself, that Mr. Oakly's nephew was rather a convenient friend, a kind of go-between, than the lover.—Bless me, Madam, you change colour! you seem uneasy! What's the matter?

Mrs. O. Nothing—Madam—nothing—a little shocked, that my husband should behave so.

Lady F. Your husband, Madam!

Mrs. O. His nephew, I mean.—His unparadonable rudeness—But I am not well—I am sorry I have given your ladyship so much trouble—I'll take my leave.

Lady F. I declare, Madam, you frighten me. Your being so visibly affected makes me quite uneasy. I hope I have not said any thing—I really don't believe your husband is in fault. Men, to be sure, allow themselves strange liberties.—But I think, nay, I am sure, it cannot be so—it is impossible! don't let what I have said have any effect on you.

Mrs. O. No, it has not—I have no idea of such a thing.—Your ladyship's most obedient—[Going, returns]—but sure, Madam, you have not heard—or don't know any thing—

Lady F. Come, come, Mrs. Oakly, I see how it is, and it would not be kind to say all I know. I dare not tell you what I have heard. Only be on your guard—there can be no harm in that. Do you be against giving the girl any countenance, and see what effect it has.

Mrs. O. I will—I am much obliged—But does it appear to your ladyship then that Mr. Oakly—

Lady F. No, not at all—nothing in't, I dare say—I would not create uneasiness in a family—but I am a woman myself, have been married, and can't help feeling for you.—But don't be uneasy; there's nothing in't, I dare say.

Mrs. O. I think so.—Your ladyship's humble servant.

Lady F. Your servant, Madam.—Pray don't be alarmed; I must insist on your not making yourself uneasy.

Mrs. O. Not at all alarmed—not in the least uneasy—Your most obedient. [Exit.]

Lady F. Ha, ha, ha! there she goes, brimful of anger and jealousy, to vent it all on her husband.—Mercy on the poor man!

Re-enter LORD TRINKET.

Bless me, my lord, I thought you was gone!

Lord T. Only into the next room. My curiosity would not let me stir a step further. I heard it all, and was never more diverted in my life, 'pon honour. Ha, ha, ha!

Lady F. How the silly creature took it.—Ha, ha, ha!

Lord T. Ha, ha, ha!—My dear Lady Freelo, you have a deal of ingenuity, a deal of esprit, 'pon honour.

Lady F. A little shell thrown into the enemy's works, that's all.

Both. Ha, ha, ha, ha!

Lady F. But I must leave you—I have twenty visits to pay. You'll let me know how you succeed in your secret expedition.

Lord T. That you may depend on.

Lady F. Remember then, that to-morrow morning I expect to see you. At present, your lordship will excuse me. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—MR. OAKLY'S HOUSE.

Enter HARRIET, following WILLIAM.

Har. Not at home! are you sure that Mrs. Oakly is not at home, Sir?

Wil. She is just gone out, Madam.

Har. I have something of consequence—If you will give me leave, Sir, I will wait till she returns.

Wil. You would not see her, if you did, Madam. She has given positive orders not to be interrupted with any company to-day.

Har. Sure, Sir, if you was to let her know that I had particular business—

Wil. I should not dare to trouble her, indeed, Madam.

Har. How unfortunate this is! what can I do?—Pray, Sir, can I see Mr. Oakly then?

Wil. Yes, Madam: I'll acquaint my master, if you please.

Har. Pray do, Sir.

Wil. Will you favour me with your name, Madam?

Har. Be pleased, Sir, to let him know that a lady desires to speak with him.

Wil. I shall, Madam. [Exit.]

Har. I wish I could have seen Mrs. Oakly. What an unhappy situation I am reduced to by my father's obstinate perseverance to force me into a marriage which my soul abhors.

Enter OAKLY.

Oak. [At entering.] Where is this lady? [Seeing her.]—Bless me, Miss Russet, is it you?—Was ever any thing so unlucky? [Aside.] Is this possible, Madam, that I see you here?

Har. It is too true, Sir; and the occasion on which I am now to trouble you, is so much in need of an apology, that—

Oak. Pray make none, Madam.—If my wife should return before I get her out of the house again! [Aside.]

Har. I dare say, Sir, you are not quite a stranger to the attachment your nephew has professed to me.

Oak. I am not, Madam—I hope Charles has not been guilty of any baseness towards you. If he has, I'll never see his face again.

Har. I have no cause to accuse him.—But—

Oak. But what, Madam? pray be quick!—The very person in the world I would not have seen! [Aside.]

Har. You seem uneasy, Sir!

Oak. No, nothing at all.—Pray go on, Madam.

Har. I am at present, Sir, through a concurrence of strange accidents, in a very unfortunate situation, and do not know what will become of me without your assistance.

Oak. I'll do every thing in my power to serve you. I know of your leaving your father, by a letter we have had from him. Pray let me know the rest of your story.

Har. My story, Sir, is very short. When I left my father's I came immediately to London, and took refuge with a relation; where, instead of meeting with the protection I expected, I was alarmed with the most infamous designs upon my honour. It is not an hour ago since your nephew rescued me from the attempts of a villain. I tremble to think that I left him actually engaged in a duel.

Oak. He is very safe. He has just sent home the chariot from the St. Alban's tavern, where he dines to-day.—But what are your commands for me, Madam?

Har. The favour, Sir, I would now request of you is, that you would suffer me to remain, for a few days, in your house.

Oak. Madam!

Har. And that, in the mean time, you will use your utmost endeavours to reconcile me to my father, without his forcing me into a marriage with Sir Harry Beagle.

Oak. This is the most perplexing situation!—Why did not Charles take care to bestow you properly?

Har. It is most probable, Sir, that I should not have consented to such a measure myself. The world is but too apt to censure, even without a cause: and if you are so kind as to admit me into your house, I must desire not to consider Mr. Oakly in any other light than as your nephew.

Oak. What an unlucky circumstance!—Upon my soul, Madam, I would do any thing to serve you—but being in my house creates a difficulty that—

Har. I hope, Sir, you do not doubt the truth of what I have told you?

Oak. I religiously believe every tittle of it, Madam; but I have particular family considerations, that—

Har. Sure, Sir, you cannot suspect me to be base enough to form any connexions in your family, contrary to your inclinations, while I am living in your house!

Oak. Such connexions, Madam, would do me and all my family great honour. I never dreamt of any scruples on that account.—What can I do?—Let me see—let me see—suppose— [Pausing.]

Enter MRS. OAKLY behind, in a cupuchin, tippet, &c.

Mrs. O. I am sure I heard the voice of a woman, conversing with my husband—Ha! [Seeing HARRIET.] It is so indeed! Let me contain myself—I'll listen. [Aside.]

Har. I see, Sir, you are not inclined to serve me—good Heaven! what am I reserved to?—Why, why did I leave my father's house, to expose myself to greater distresses? [Ready to weep.]

Oak. I would do any thing for your sake, in deed I would. So pray be comforted, and I'll think of some proper place to bestow you in.

Mrs. O. So! so! [Aside.]

Har. What place can be so proper as your own house?

Oak. My dear Madam, I—

Mrs. O. My dear Madam! Mighty well!

[Aside.]

Oak. Hush!—hark!—what noise?—no,—nothing. But I'll be plain with you, Madam; we may be interrupted. The family consideration I hinted at is nothing else than my wife. She is a little unhappy in her temper, Madam; and if you were to be admitted into the house, I don't know what would be the consequence.

Mrs. O. Very fine! [Aside.]

Har. My behaviour, Sir!—

Oak. My dear life, it would be impossible for you to behave in such a manner as not to give her suspicion.

Har. But if your nephew, Sir, took every thing upon himself—

Oak. Still that would not do, Madam. Why, this very morning, when the letter came from your father, though I positively denied any knowledge of it, and Charles owned it, yet it was almost impossible to pacify her.

Har. What shall I do? What will become of me?

Oak. Why lookye, my dear Madam, since my wife is so strong an objection, it is absolutely impossible for me to take you into the house. Nay, if I had not known she was gone out, just before you came, I should be uneasy at your being here, even now. So we must manage as well as we can. I'll take a private lodging for you a little way off, unknown to Charles, or my wife, or any body; and if Mrs. Oakly should discover it at last, why the whole matter will light upon Charles, you know.

Mrs. O. Upon Charles! [Aside.]

Har. How unhappy is my situation! [Weeping.] I am ruined for ever.

Oak. Ruined! not at all. Such a thing as this has happened to many a young lady before you, and all has been well again. Keep up your spirits! I'll contrive, if I possibly can, to visit you every day.

Mrs. O. [Advances.] Will you so? O, Mr. Oakly! have I discovered you at last? I'll visit you, indeed! And you, my dear Madam, I'll—

Har. Madam, I don't understand—

Mrs. O. I understand the whole affair, and have understood it for some time past. You shall have a private lodging, Miss! It is the fittest place for you, I believe. How dare you look me in the face?

Oak. For Heaven's sake, my love, don't be so violent. You are quite wrong in this affair—you don't know who you are talking to. This lady is a person of fashion.

Mrs. O. Fine fashion, indeed! to seduce other women's husbands!

Har. Dear Madam, how can you imagine—

Oak. I tell you, my dear, this is the young lady that Charles—

Mrs. O. Mighty well! but this wont do, Sir! Did not I hear you lay the whole intrigue together? Did not I hear you fine plot of throwing all the blame upon Charles?—

Oak. Nay, be cool a moment. You must know, my dear, that the letter which came this morning related to this lady—

Mrs. O. I know it.

Oak. And since that, it seems, Charles has been so fortunate as to—

Mrs. O. O, you deceitful man! That trick is too stale to pass again with me. It is plain now what you meant by your proposing to take her into the house this morning. But the gentleman could introduce herself, I see.

Oak. Fy! fy, my dear, she came on purpose to inquire for you.

Mrs. O. For me! better and better! Did not she watch her opportunity, and come to you just as I went out? But I am obliged to you for your visit, Madam. It is sufficiently paid. Pray, don't let me detain you.

Oak. For shame! for shame! Mrs. Oakly! How can you be so absurd? Is this proper behaviour to a lady of her character?

Mrs. O. I have heard her character. Go, my fine, runaway Madam! Now you have eloped from your family, and run away from your aunt. Go! You sha'n't stay here, I promise you.

Oak. Pr'ythee, be quiet. You don't know what you are doing. She shall stay.

Mrs. O. She sha'n't stay a minute.

Oak. She shall stay a minute, an hour, a day, a week, a month, a year! I sdeath, Madam, she shall stay for ever, if I choose.

Mrs. O. How!

Har. For Heaven's sake, Sir, let me go, I am frightened to death.

Oak. Don't be afraid, Madam! She shall stay, I insist upon it.

Rus. [Within.] I tell you, Sir, I will go up. I am sure the lady is here, and nothing shall hinder me.

Har. O, my father! my father! [Faints.]

Oak. See! she faints! [Catches her.] Ring the bell! Who's there?

Mrs. O. What! take her into your arms too! I have no patience.

Enter RUSSET.

Rus. Where is this—ha! fainting! [Runs to her.] O, my dear Harriet! my child! my child!

Oak. Your coming so abruptly shocked her spirits. But she revives. How do you do, Madam?

Har. [To RUSSET.] O, Sir!

Rus. O, my dear girl! how could you run away from your father, that loves you with such fondness? But I was sure I should find you here—

Mrs. O. There! there! sure he should find her here! Did I not tell you so? Are not you a wicked man, to carry on such base underhand doings, with a gentleman's daughter?

Rus. Let me tell you, Sir, whatever you may think of the matter, I shall not easily put up with this behaviour. How durst you encourage my daughter to an elopement, and receive her in your house?

Mrs. O. There, mind that! The thing is as plain as the light.

Oak. I tell you, you misunderstand—

Rus. Look you, Mr. Oakly, I shall expect satisfaction from your family for so gross an affront. Zounds, Sir, I am not to be used ill by any man in England.

Har. My dear Sir, I can assure you—

Rus. Hold your tongue, girl! You'll put me in a passion.

Oak. Sir, this is all a mistake.

Rus. A mistake! Did not I find her in your house?

Oak. Upon my soul, she has not been in my house above—

Mrs. O. Did not I hear you say, you would take her a lodging, a private lodging?

Oak. Yes, but that—

Rus. Has not this affair been carried on a long time in spite of my teeth?

Oak. Sir, I never troubled myself—

Mrs. O. Never troubled yourself! Did not you insist on her staying in the house, whether I would or no?

Oak. No.

Rus. Did not you send to meet her, when she came to town?

Oak. No.

Mrs. O. Did not you deceive me about the letter this morning?

Oak. No, no, no—I tell you, no.

Mrs. O. Yes, yes, yes—I tell you, yes.

Rus. Sha'n't I believe my own eyes?

Mrs. O. Sha'n't I believe my own ears?

Oak. I tell you, you are both deceived.

Rus. Zounds, Sir, I'll have satisfaction.

Mrs. O. I'll stop these fine doings, I warrant you.

Oak. 'Sdeath, you will not let me speak—and you are both alike, I think. I wish you were married to one another with all my heart.

Mrs. O. Mighty well! mighty well!

Rus. I shall soon find a time to talk with you.

Oak. Find a time to talk! you have talked enough now for all your lives.

Mrs. O. Very fine! Come along, Sir! Leave that lady with her father. Now she is in the properest hands. [Exit.

Oak. I wish I could leave you in his hands. [Going, returns.] One word with you, Sir! The height of your passion, and Mrs. Oakly's strange misapprehension of this whole affair, makes it impossible to explain matters to you at present. I will do it when you please, and how you please.

Rus. Yes, yes; I'll have satisfaction. So, Madam! I have found you at last. You have made a fine confusion here.

Har. I have indeed been the innocent cause of a great deal of confusion.

Rus. Innocent! What business had you to be running hither after—

Har. My dear Sir, you misunderstand the whole affair. I have not been in this house half an hour.

Rus. Zounds, girl, don't put me in a passion! You know I love you; but a lie puts me in a passion. But come along, we'll leave this house directly. [CHARLES sings without.] Hey-day! what now?

After a noise without, enter CHARLES, drunk.

Char. [Sings.] But my wine neither nurses nor babies can bring,

And a big-bellied bottle's a mighty good thing. What's here? a woman? Harriet! impossible! My dearest, sweetest Harriet! I have been looking all over the town for you, and at last, when I was tired, and weary, and disappointed, why then the honest major and I sat down together to drink your health in pint bumpers. [Running to her.

Rus. Stand off! how dare you take any liberty with my daughter before me? Zounds, Sir, I'll be the death of you.

Char. Ha! 'Squire Russet too! You jolly old cock, how do you do? But, Harriet! my dear girl! [Taking hold of her.] My life, my soul my—

Rus. Let her go, Sir; come away, Harriet! Leave him this instant, or I'll tear you asunder.

[Pulling her.

Har. There needs no violence to tear me from a man who could disguise himself in such a gross manner, at a time when he knew I was in the utmost distress.

[Disengages herself, and exit with RUSSET
Char. Only hear me, Sir!—Madam! my dear Harriet—Mr. Russet—gone! she's gone! and 'egad, in very ill humour, and in very bad company! I'll go after her—but hold! I shall only make it worse, as I did, now I recollect, once before. How the devil came they here? Who could have thought of finding her in my own house? My head turns round with conjectures. I believe I am drunk; very drunk: so 'egad, I'll e'en go and sleep myself sober, and then inquire the meaning of all this. For,

I love Sue, and Sue loves me, &c.

[Exit, singing.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—OAKLY'S HOUSE.

Enter CHARLES and MAJOR OAKLY.

Maj. O. Poor Charles! what a scene of confusion! I would give the world to have been there.

Char. And I would give the world to have been any where else. May wine be my poison, if ever I am drunk again!

Maj. O. Ay, ay, so every man says the next morning.

Char. Where, where can she be? Her father would hardly carry her back to Lady Free-love's, and he has no house in town himself, or Sir Harry—I don't know what to think. I'll go in search of her, though I don't know where to direct myself.

Enter WILLIAM.

Wil. A gentleman, Sir, that calls himself Captain O'Cutter, desires to speak with you.

Char. Don't trouble me—I'll see nobody—I'm not at home—

Wil. The gentleman says he has very particular business, and he must see you.

Char. What's his name? who did you say?

Wil. Captain O'Cutter, Sir.

Char. Captain O'Cutter! I never heard of him before. Do you know any thing of him, Major?

Maj. O. Not I—but you hear he has particular business. I'll leave the room.

Char. He can have no business that need be a secret to you. Desire the captain to walk up.

[Exit WILLIAM.

Enter CAPTAIN O'CUTTER.

O'Cut. Jontlemen, your sarvant. Is either of your names Charles Oakly, Esq.?

Char. Charles Oakly, Sir, is my name, if you have any business with it.

O'Cut. Avast, avast, my dear! I have a little business with your name; but as I was to let nobody know it, I can't mention it till you clear the decks, 'fait. [Pointing to the MAJOR.

Char. This gentleman, Sir, is my most intimate friend, and any thing that concerns me may be mentioned before him.

O'Cut. O, if he's your friend, my dear, we may do all above board. It's only about your deciding a difference with my Lord Trinket. He wants to show you a little warm work; and, as I was steering this way, he desired me to fetch you this letter.

Maj. O. How, Sir, a challenge!

O'Cut. Yes, fait, a challenge. I am to be his lordship's second; and if you are fond of a hot birth, and will come along with that jontleman, we'll all go to it together, and make a little line of battle a-head of our own, my dear.

Char. [Reads.] Ha! what's this? This may be useful.

Maj. O. Sir, I am infinitely obliged to you. A rare fellow this! [Aside.] Yes, yes, I'll meet all the good company. I'll be there in my waistcoat and pumps, and take a morning's breathing with you. Are you very fond of fighting, Sir?

O'Cut. Indeed, and I am; I love it better than frog.

Maj. O. But pray, Sir, how are you interested in this difference? Do you know what it is about?

O'Cut. O, the devil burn me, not I. What signifies what it's about, you know? so we do but tilt a little.

Maj. O. What, fight, and not know for what?

O'Cut. When the signal's out for engaging, what signifies talking?

Maj. O. I fancy, Sir, a duel's a common breakfast with you. I'll warrant now, you have been engaged in many such affairs.

O'Cut. Upon my shoul, and I have; sea or land, it's all one to little Terence O'Cutler. When I was last in Dublin, I fought one jontleman for cheating me out of a thousand pounds; I fought two of the Mermaid's crew about Sally Maeguire; tree about politics; and one about the playhouse in Smock Alley. But upon my fait, since I am in England, I have done nothing at all, at all.

Char. This is lucky—but my transport will discover me. [Aside.] Will you be so kind, Sir, [To O'Cutler.] as to make my compliments to his lordship, and assure him, that I shall do myself the honour of waiting on him.

O'Cut. Indeed, and I will. Arrah, my dear, won't you come too? [To MAJOR OAKLY.]

Maj. O. Depend upon it, captain. A very extraordinary fellow!

Char. Now to get my intelligence. [Aside.] I think, the time, Sir, his lordship appoints in his letter, is a—O'Cut. You say right. Six o'clock.

Char. And the place—a—a—is—I think, behind Montague-House?

O'Cut. No, my dear! Avast, by the ring in Hyde-park, fait. I settled it there myself, for fare of interruption.

Char. True, as you say, the ring in Hyde-park; I had forgot. Very well, I'll not fail you, Sir.

O'Cut. Devil burn me, nor I. Upon my shoul, little Terence O'Cutler will see fair play, or he'll know the reason; and so, my dear, your servant. You'll not forget to come, my dear. [Exit.]

Maj. O. Ha, ha, ha! What a fellow!—He loves fighting like a game cock.

Char. O uncle! the luckiest thing in the world!

Maj. O. What, to have the chance of being run through the body? I desire no such good fortune.

Char. Wish me joy, wish me joy! I have found her, my dear girl, my Harriet! She is at an inn in Holborn, major!

Maj. O. Ay, how do you know?

Char. Why, this dear, delightful, charming, blundering captain has delivered me a wrong letter.

Maj. O. A wrong letter!

Char. Yes, a letter from Lord Trinket to Lady Freelove.

Maj. O. The devil! What are the contents?

Char. The news I told you just now, that she's at an inn in Holborn: and, besides, an excuse from my lord, for not waiting on her ladyship this morning according to his promise, as he shall be entirely taken up with his design upon Harriet.

Maj. O. So, so!—A plot between the lord and the lady.

Char. There! read, read man!

[Giving the letter.]

Maj. O. [Reading.] Um—un—un—Very fine! And what do you propose doing?

Char. To go thither immediately!

Maj. O. Then you shall take me with you. Who knows what his lordship's designs may be? I begin to suspect foul play.

Char. No, no; pray mind your own business. If I find there is any need of your assistance, I'll send for you.

Maj. O. You'll manage this affair like a boy, now; go on rashly with noise and bustle, and fury, and get yourself into another scrape.

Char. No, no, let me alone; I'll go incog. Leave my chariot at some distance—Proceed prudently, and take care of myself, I warrant you. I did not imagine that I should ever rejoice at receiving a challenge, but this is the most fortunate accident that could possibly have happened. Bye, bye, uncle!

[Exit, hastily.]

Maj. O. I don't half approve of this; and yet I can hardly suspect his lordship of any very deep designs neither. Charles may easily outwit him. Harkye, William!

[Seeing WILLIAM at some distance.]

Re-enter WILLIAM.

Wil. Sir!

Maj. O. Where's my brother?

Wil. In his study, Sir.

Maj. O. Is he alone?

Wil. Yes, Sir.

Maj. O. And how is he, William?

Wil. Pretty well, I believe, Sir.

Maj. O. Ay, ay, but is he in a good humour, or—
Wil. I never meddle in family affairs, not I, Sir.

Maj. O. Well said, William!—No bad hint for me, perhaps!—What a strange world we live in! no two people in it love one another better than my brother and sister, and yet the bitterest enemies could not torment each other more heartily. —However, yesterday, to give him his due, he behaved like a man. Keep it up, brother! keep it up! or it's all over with you. Some mischief is on foot, I'll even set forwards on all sides. I'll in to him directly, read him one of my morning lectures, and persuade him, if I possibly can, to go out with me immediately; or work him to some open act of rebellion against the sovereign authority of his lady wife. Zounds, brother! rant and roar, and rave, and turn the house out of the window. If I was a husband!—'Sdeath, what a pity it is that nobody knows how to manage a wife but a bachelor.

[Exit.]

SCENE II.—The Bull and Gate Inn.Enter HARRIET.

Har. What will become of me? Among all my distresses, I must confess that Charles's behaviour yesterday is not the least. So wild! so given up to excesses! And yet, I am ashamed to own it even to myself,—I love him; and death itself shall not prevail on me to give my hand to Sir Harry. But here he comes! What shall I do with him?

Enter SIR HARRY BEAGLE.

Sir H. Your servant, Miss! What; not speak! Bashful, mayhap. Why then I will. Lookye, Miss, I am a man of few words. What signifies haggling! it looks just like a dealer. What d'ye think of me for a husband? I am a tight young fellow; sound wind and limb; free from all natural blemishes; rum all over, damme.

Har. Sir, I don't understand you. Speak English, and I'll give you an answer.

Sir H. English! Why so I do; and good plain English too. What d'ye think of me for a husband? That's English—e'nt it?—I know none of your French lingo, none of your parlyvoos, not I. What d'ye think of me for a husband? The 'squire says you shall marry me.

Har. What shall I say to him? I had best be civil. [Aside.] I think, Sir, you deserve a much better wife, and beg—

Sir H. Better! No, no, though you're so knowing, I'm not to be taken in so. You're a fine thing. Your points are all good.

Har. Sir Harry! Sincerity is above all ceremony. Excuse me, if I declare I never will be your wife.

Sir H. Hey! how! what, be off! Why, it's a match, Miss!—It's done, and done on both sides.

Har. For Heaven's sake, Sir, withdraw your claim to me. I never can be prevailed on; indeed I can't.

Sir H. What, make a match and then draw stakes! That's doing of nothing. Play or pay all the world over.

Har. I am determined not to marry you, at all events.

Sir H. But your father's determined you shall, Miss. So the odds are on my side. I am not quite sure of my horse, but I have the rider hollow.

Har. Your horse! Sir, d'ye take me for; but I forgive you. I beseech you, come into my proposal. It will be better for us both in the end.

Sir H. I can't be off.

Har. Let me entreat you.

Sir H. I tell you, it's impossible.

Har. Pray, pray, do, Sir.

Sir H. I can't, damme.

Har. I beseech you. [SIR HARRY whistles.] How! laughed at?

Sir H. Will you marry me, dear Ally, Ally Croker? [Singing.]

Har. Marry you! I had rather be married to a slave, a wretch—You! [Walks about.]

Sir H. A fine going thing. She has a deal of foot—treads well upon her pasterns—goes above her ground.

Har. Peace, wretch! Do you talk to me as if I were your horse?

Sir H. Horse! Why not speak of my horse! If your fine ladies had half as many good qualities, they would be much better bargains.

Har. And if their wretches of husbands liked them half so well as they do their horses, they would lead better lives.

Sir H. Mayhap so. But what signifies talking to you? The 'squire shall know your tricks. He'll doctor you. I'll go and talk to him.

Har. Go any where, so that you go from me.

Sir H. He'll break you in. If you wont go in a snaffle, you must be put in a curb. He'll break you, damme. [Exit.]

Har. A wretch! But I was to blame to suffer his brutal behaviour to ruffle my temper. I could expect nothing else from him, and he is below my anger.

Enter RUSSET.

Rus. Are not you a sad girl! a perverse, stubborn, obstinate—

Har. My dear Sir—

Rus. Lookye, Harriet, don't speak, you'll put me in a passion. Will you have him? Answer me that. Why don't the girl speak? Will you have him?

Har. Dearest Sir, there is nothing in the world else—

Rus. Why there, there! Lookye there! Zounds, you shall have him. Hussy you shall have him. You shall marry him to-night. Did not you promise to receive him civilly? How came you to affront him?

Har. Sir, I did receive him very civilly; but his behaviour was so insolent and insupportable.

Rus. Insolent! Zounds, I'll blow his brains out. Insolent to my dear Harriet! A rogue, a villain, a scoundrel! I'll—but it's a lie—I know, it's a lie.—He durst not behave insolent. Will you have him? Answer me that. Will you have him? Zounds, you shall have him.

Har. If you have any love for me, Sir—

Rus. Love for you! You know I love you. You know your poor fond father dotes on you to madness. I would not force you, if I did not love you. Don't I want you to be happy? But I know what you would have. You want young Oakly, a rakehelly, drunken—

Har. Release me from Sir Harry, and if I ever marry against your consent, renounce me for ever.

Rus. I will renounce you, unless you'll have Sir Harry.

Har. Consider, my dear Sir, you'll make me miserable. Absolve me from this hard command, and in every thing else it will be happiness to obey you.

Rus. You'll break my heart, Harriet, you'll break my heart. Make you miserable! Don't I want to make you happy? Is not he the richest man in the county? That will make you happy. Don't all the pale-faced girls in the country long to get him? And yet you are so perverse, and wayward, and stubborn. Zounds, you shall have him.

Har. For Heaven's sake, Sir—

Rus. Hold your tongue, Harriet! I'll hear none of your nonsense. You shall have him, I tell you, you shall have him. He shall marry you this very night. I'll go for a license and a parson immediately. Zounds, why do I stand arguing with you? An't I your father? Have not I a right to dispose of you? You shall have him.

Har. Sir!

Rus. I wont hear a word. You shall have him. [Exit.]

Har. Sir! Hear me! but one word! He will not hear me, and is gone to prepare for this odious marriage. I will die before I consent to it.

Enter CHARLES, in a frock, &c.

Ha! What do I see? [Screaming.]

Char. Peace, my love! My dear life, make no noise! I have been hovering about the house this hour. I just now saw your father and Sir Harry go out, and have seized this precious opportunity to throw myself at your feet.

Har. You have given yourself, Sir, a great deal of needless trouble. I did not expect or hope for the favour of such a visit.

Char. O, my Harriet, upbraid me, reproach me, do any thing but look and talk with that air of coldness and indifference. Let me, while their absence allows it, convey you from the brutal violence of a constrained marriage.

Har. No, I will wait the event, be it what it may; Oh, Charles, I am too much inclined—they sha'n't force me to marry Sir Harry—but your behaviour—Not half an hour ago, my father reproached me with the looseness of your character.

[Weeping.]
Char. I see my folly, and am ashamed of it;—you have reclaimed me, Harriet, on my soul you have. If all women were as attentive as yourself to the morals of their lovers, a libertine would be an uncommon character. But let me persuade you to leave this place while you may. Major Oakly will receive us at his house with pleasure. I am shocked at the thoughts of what your stay here may reserve you to.

Har. No, I am determined to remain. To leave my father again, to go off openly with a man, of whose libertine character he has himself so lately been a witness, would justify his anger, and impeach my reputation.

Enter CHAMBERMAID.

Chamb. O law, Ma'am! Such a terrible accident! As sure as I am here, there's a pressgang has seized the two gemmin, and is carrying them away, thof so be one an 'em says as how he's a knight and baronight, and that t'other's a 'squire and a housekeeper.

Har. Seized by a pressgang! impossible!

Char. Oh, now the design comes out. But I'll balk his lordship.

Chamb. Lack-a-daisy, Ma'am, what can we do? There is master, and John Hostler, and Boot-catcher, all gone a'ter 'em. There is such an uproar as never was! [Exit.]

Har. If I thought this was your contrivance, Sir, I would never speak to you again.

Char. I would sooner die than be guilty of it. This is Lord Trinket's doing, I am sure. I knew he had some scheme in agitation, by a letter I intercepted this morning. [HARRIET screams.] Ha! here he comes. Nay, then, it's plain enough. Don't be frightened, my love! I'll protect you. But now I must desire you to follow my directions.

Enter LORD TRINKET.

Lord T. Now, Madam.—Pox on't, he here again! Nay then, [Draws.] come, Sir! You're unarmed, I see. Give up the lady; give her up, I say, or I am through you in a twinkling.

[Going to make a pass at CHARLES.]

Char. Keep your distance, my lord! I have arms. [Produces a pistol.] If you come a foot nearer, you have a brace of balls through you. lordship's head.

Lord T. How! what 's this? pistols!

Char. At your lordship's service. Sword and pistol, my lord.—Those, you know, are our weapons. If this misses, I have the fellow to it in my pocket. Don't be frightened, Madam. His lordship has removed your friends and relations, but he will take great care of you. Shall I leave you with him?

Har. Cruel Charles! you know I must go with you now.

Char. A little way from the door, if your lordship pleases. [Waves his hand.]

Lord T. Sir!—'Sdeath!—Madam!

Char. A little more round, my lord. [Waves.]

Lord T. But, Sir! Mr. Oakly!

Char. I have no leisure to talk with your lordship now. A little more that way, if you please. [Waves.] You know where I live. If you have any commands for Miss Russet, you will hear of her too at my house. Nay, keep back, my lord. [Presents.] Your lordship's most obedient, humble servant. [Exit with HARRIET.]

Lord T. [Looks at them, and pauses for a short time.] I cut a mighty ridiculous figure here, 'pon honour. [Exit.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—LADY FREELOVE'S House.

Enter LORD TRINKET, LADY FREELOVE, with a letter, and CAPTAIN O'CUTTER.

Lord T. Was ever any thing so unfortunate! Plague on't, captain, how could you make such a strange blunder?

O'Cut. I never thought of a blunder. I was to deliver two letters; and if I gave them one a piece, I thought it would do.

Lady F. And so, my lord, the ingenious captain gave the letter intended for me to young Oakly, and here has brought me a challenge.

Lord T. Ridiculous! Never was any thing so malapropos. Did you read the direction, captain?

O'Cut. Who, me? Devil burn me, not I. I never rade at all.

Lord T. 'Sdeath! how provoking! When I had secured the servants, and got all the people out of the way—when every thing was en train.

Lady F. Nay, never despair, my lord! I've hit upon a method to set every thing to rights again.

Lord T. How? how? my dear Lady Freelove, how?

Lady F. Suppose then your lordship was to go and deliver these country gentlemen from their confinement: make them believe it was a plot of young Oakly's to carry off my niece; and so make a merit of your own services with the father.

Lord T. Admirable! I'll about it immediately.

O'Cut. Has your lordship any occasion for my service in this expedition?

Lord T. O, no. Only release me these people, and then keep out of the way, dear captain.

O'Cut. With all my heart, fait. But you are all wrong: this will not signify a brass farding. If you would let me alone, I would give him a salt eel, I warrant you. But upon my credit, there's noting to be done without a little tilting. [Exit.]

Lord T. But where shall I carry them, when I have delivered them?

Lady F. To Mr. Oakly's, by all means; you may be sure my niece is there.

Lord T. To Mr. Oakly's! Why, does your ladyship consider? 'Tis going directly in the fire of the enemy—throwing the dementi full in their teeth.

Lady F. So much the better. Face your enemies; nay, you shall outface them too. I'll certainly meet you there. It's hard indeed if two persons of condition can't bear themselves out against such trumpery folks as the family of the Oaklys.

Lord T. Odious low people! But I lose time; I must after the captain; and so, till we meet at Mr. Oakly's, I kiss your ladyship's hands—you won't fail me?

Lady F. You may depend on me. [Exit LORD TRINKET.] So, here is fine work! this artful little hussy has been too much for us all. Well, what's to be done? Why, when a woman of fashion gets into a scrape, nothing but a fashionable assurance can get her out of it again. I'll e'en go boldly to Mr. Oakly's, as I have promised, and if it appears practicable, I will forward Lord Trinket's match; but if I find that matters have taken another turn, his lordship must excuse me. In that case I'll fairly drop him, seem a perfect stranger to all his intentions, and give my visit an air of congratulation to my niece and any other husband, which fortune, her wise father, or her ridiculous self, has provided for her. [Exit

SCENE II.—MRS. OAKLY'S Dressing-room.

Enter MRS. OAKLY.

Mrs. O. This is worse and worse! He never held me so much in contempt before. To go out without speaking to me, or taking the least notice. I am obliged to the major for this. How could he take him out? and how could Mr. Oakly go with him?—

Enter TOILET.

Well, Toilet.

Toilet. My master is not come back yet, Ma'am.

Mrs. O. Where is he gone?

Toilet. I don't know, I can assure your ladyship.

Mrs. O. Why don't you know. You know nothing. But I warrant you know well enough, if you would tell. You shall never persuade me but you knew of Mr. Oakly's going out to-day.

Toilet. I wish I may die, Ma'am, upon my honour, and I protest to your ladyship I knew nothing in the world of the matter, no more than the child unborn. There is Mr. Paris, my master's gentleman, knows—

Mrs. O. What does he know?

Toilet. That I knew nothing at all of the matter.

Mrs. O. Where is Paris? What is he doing?

Toilet. He is in my master's room, Ma'am.

Mrs. O. Bid him come here.

Toilet. Yes, Ma'am. [Exit.]

Mrs. O. He is certainly gone after this young flirt. His confidence and the major's insolence provoke me beyond expression.

Re-enter TOILET with PARIS.

Where's your master?

Par. Il est sorti. He is gone out.

Mrs. O. Where is he gone?

Par. Ah, Madame, je n'en sçai rien. I know nothing of it.

Mrs. O. Nobody knows anything. Why did not you tell me he was going out?

Par. I dress him—Je ne m'en soucie pas du plus—He go where he will; I have no business with it.

Mrs. O. Yes, you should have told me—that was your business; and if you don't mind your business better, you sha'n't stay here, I promise you, Sir.

Par. Voilà quelque chose d'extraordinaire!

Mrs. O. Don't stand jabbering and shrugging your shoulders, but go and inquire; go, and bring me word where he is gone.

Par. I don't know what I am do.

Mrs. O. Bid John come to me.

Par. De tout mon cœur. Jean! ici! Jean! speak, my ladi. [Exit.]

Mrs. O. Impudent fellow! His insolent gravity and indifference is insupportable. Toilet!

Toilet. Ma'am.

Mrs. O. Where's John? Why don't he come? Why do you stand with your hands before you? Why don't you fetch him?

Toilet. Yes, Ma'am, I'll go this minute.—O, here, John; my lady wants you.

Enter JOHN.

Mrs. O. Where's your master?

John. Gone out, Madam.

Mrs. O. Why did not you go with him?

John. Because he went out in the major's chariot, Madam.

Mrs. O. Where did they go to?

John. To the major's, I suppose, Madam.

Mrs. O. Suppose! Don't you know?

John. I believe so, but can't tell for certain, indeed, Madam.

Mrs. O. Believe and suppose! and don't know, and can't tell! You are all fools. Go about your business. [JOHN going.] Come here. [Returns.] Go the major's—no—no—it does not signify, go along. [JOHN going.] Yes, harkye, [Returns.] go to the major's, and see if your master is there.

John. Give your compliments, Madam?

Mrs. O. My compliments, blockhead! Get along. [JOHN going.] Come hither. [Returns.] Can't you go to the major's, and bring me word if Mr. Oakly is there, without taking any further notice?

John. Yes, Ma'am.

Mrs. O. Well, why don't you go then? And make haste back. And, d'ye hear, John?

[JOHN going, returns.]

John. Madam!

Mrs. O. Nothing at all, go along. [JOHN goes] How uneasy Mr. Oakly makes me! Harkye, John!

[JOHN returns.]

John. Madam!

Mrs. O. Send the porter here.

John. Yes, Madam.

Toilet. So she's in a rare humour! I shall have a fine time on't. [Aside.] Will your ladyship choose to dress?

Mrs. O. Frythee, creature, don't tease me with your fiddle-faddle stuff. I have a thousand things to think of. Where is the porter? Why has not that booby sent him? What is the meaning—

Re-enter JOHN.

John. Madam, my master is this moment returned with Major Oakly, and my young master, and the lady that was here yesterday.

Mrs. O. Very well. [Exit JOHN.] Returned—yes, truly he is returned—and in a very extraordinary manner. This is setting me at open defiance. But I'll go down, and show them I have too much spirit to endure such usage. [Going.] Or, stay—I'll not go amongst his company—I'll go out—Toilet!

Toil. Ma'am!

Mrs. O. Order the coach; I'll go out. [TOILET going.] Toilet, stay—I'll e'en go down to them—No—Toilet!

Toil. Ma'am!

Mrs. O. Order me a boiled chicken—I'll not go down to dinner. I'll dine in my own room, and sup there. I'll not see his face these three days.

[Exeunt.]

Enter OAKLY, MAJOR OAKLY, CHARLES, and HARRIET.

Char. My dear Harriet, do not make yourself so uneasy.

Har. Alas! I have too much cause for my uneasiness. Who knows what that vile lord has done with my father?

Oak. Be comforted, Madam; we shall soon hear of Mr. Russet, and all will be well, I dare say.

Har. You are too good to me, Sir; I shall never forgive myself for having disturbed the peace of such a worthy family.

Maj. O. Don't mind that, Madam; they'll be very good friends again. This is nothing among married people. 'Sdeath! here she is! No, it's only Mrs. Toilet.

Re-enter TOILET.

Oak. Well, Toilet, what now: [TOILET whispers.] not well? Can't come down to dinner? Wants to see me above? Harkye, brother, what shall I do?

Maj. O. If you go, you are undone.

Har. Go, Sir, go to Mrs. Oakly. Indeed you had better—

Maj. O. 'Sdeath, brother, don't budge a foot. This is all fractiousness and ill humour.

Oak. No, I'll not go. Tell her I have company, and we shall be glad to see her here.

[Exit TOILET.]

Maj. O. That's right.

Oak. Suppose I go and watch how she proceeds?

Maj. O. What d'ye mean? You would not go to her? Are you mad?

Oak. By no means go to her; I only want to know how she takes it. I'll lie perdue in my study, and observe her motions.

Maj. O. I don't like this pitiful ambuscade work—this bush fighting. Why can't you stay here? Ay, ay! I know how it will be. She'll come bounce in upon you with a torrent of anger and passion, or, if necessary, a whole flood of tears, and carry all before her at once.

Oak. You shall find that you are mistaken, major. Now I am convinced I'm in the right, I'll support that right with ten times your steadiness.

Maj. O. You talk this well, brother.

Oak. I'll do it well, brother.

Maj. O. If you don't, you are undone.

Oak. Never fear, never fear.

Maj. O. Well, Charles.

Char. I can't bear to see my Harriet so uneasy. I'll go immediately in quest of Mr. Russet. Perhaps I may learn at the inn where his lordship's ruffians have carried him.

Rus. [Without.] Here! Yes, yes, I know she's here well enough. Come along, Sir Harry, come along.

Har. He's here! My father! I know his voice. Where is Mr. Oakly? O, now, good Sir, [To the MAJOR.] do but pacify him, and you'll be a friend indeed.

Enter RUSSET, LORD TRINKET, and SIR HARRY BEAGLE.

Lord T. There, Sir—I told you it was so!

Rus. Ay, ay, it is too plain. O you provoking slut! Elopement after elopement! And at last to have your father carried off by violence! to endanger my life! Zounds! I am so angry I dare not trust myself within reach of you.

Char. I can assure you, Sir, that your daughter is entirely—

Rus. You assure me! You are the fellow that has perverted her mind—That has set up my own child against me—

Char. If you will but hear me, Sir.

Rus. I won't hear a word you say. I'll have my daughter; I won't hear a word.

Maj. O. Nay, Mr. Russet, hear reason. If you will but have patience.

Rus. I'll have no patience, I'll have my daughter, and she shall marry Sir Harry to-night.

Lord T. That is dealing rather too much en cavalier with me, Mr. Russet, 'pon honour. You take no notice of my pretensions, though my rank and family—

Rus. What care I for rank and family? I don't want to make my daughter a rantipole woman of quality. I'll give her to whom I please. Take her away, Sir Harry; she shall marry you to-night.

Maj. O. Only three words, Mr. Russet.

Rus. Why don't the booby take her?

Sir H. Hold hard! hold hard! You are all on a wrong scent; hold hard, I say, hold hard! Harkye, 'Squire Russet.

Rus. Well, what now?

Sir H. It was proposed, you know; to match me with Miss Harriet: but she can't take kindly to me. When one has made a bad bet, it is best to hedge off, you know; and so I have e'en swopped her with Lord Trinket here for his brown horse, Nabob.

Rus. Swopped her? swopped my daughter for a horse! Zounds, Sir, what d'ye mean?

Sir H. Mean? Why I mean to be off, to be sure. It wont do; I tell you it wont do. First of all, I knocked up myself and my horses, when they took for London; and now I have been stewed aboard a tender. I have wasted three stone at least. If I could have rid my match, it would not have grieved me. And so, as I said before, I have swopped her for Nabob.

Rus. The devil take Nabob and yourself, and Lord Trinket, and—

Lord T. Pardon! je vous demande pardon, Monsieur Russet, 'pon honour.

Rus. Death and the devil; I shall go distracted! My daughter plotting against me—the—

Maj. O. Come, come, Mr. Russet, I am your man after all. Give me but a moment's hearing, and I'll engage to make peace between you and your daughter, and throw the blame where it ought to fall most deservedly.

Sir H. Ay, ay, that's right. Put the saddle on the right horse, my buck!

Rus. Well, Sir; what d'ye say? Speak. I don't know what to do.

Maj. O. I'll speak the truth, let who will be offended by it. I have proof presumptive and positive for you, Mr. Russet. From his lordship's behaviour at Lady FreeLove's, when my nephew rescued her, we may fairly conclude that he would stick at no measures to carry his point; there's proof presumptive. But, Sir, we can give you proof positive too; proof under his lordship's own hand, that he likewise was the contriver of the gross affront that has just been offered you.

Rus. Hey! how?

Lord T. Every syllable romance, 'pon honour.

Maj. O. Gospel, every word on't.

Char. This letter will convince you, Sir! In consequence of what happened at Lady FreeLove's, his lordship thought fit to send me a challenge; but the messenger blundered, and gave me this letter instead of it. [Giving the letter.] I have the case which enclosed it in my pocket.

Lord T. Forgery from beginning to end, 'pon honour.

Maj. O. Truth, upon my honour. But read, read, Mr. Russet, read and be convinced.

Rus. Let me see, let me see. [Reads.] Um, um, um; so, so; um, um, um, damnation! Wish me success,—obedient slave—TRINKET. Fire and fury! How dare you do this?

Lord T. When you are cool, Mr. Russet, I will explain this matter to you.

Rus. Cool! 'Sdeath and hell! I'll never be cool again! I'll be revenged. So, my Harriet, my dear girl, is innocent at last. Say so, my Harriet; tell me you are innocent. [Embraces her.]

Har. I am indeed, Sir, and happy beyond expression at your being convinced of it.

Rus. I am glad on't—I am glad on't—I believe you Harriet!—You was always a good girl.

Maj. O. So she is, an excellent girl!—Worth a regiment of such lords and baronets—Come, Sir, finish every thing handsomely at once.—Come, Charles will have a handsome fortune.

Rus. Marry!—she durst not do it.

Maj. O. Consider, Sir, they have long been fond of each other—old acquaintance—faithful lovers—turtles—and may be very happy.

Rus. Well, well—since things are so—I love my girl.—Harkye, young Oakly, if you don't make her a good husband, you'll break my heart, you rogue.

Maj. O. I'll cut his throat, if he don't.

Char. Do not doubt it, Sir; my Harriet has reformed me altogether.

Rus. Has she?—Why then—there—Heaven bless you both—there—now there's an end on't.

Sir H. So, my lord, you and I are both distanced—A hollow thing, damme.

Lord T. N'importe.

Sir H. Now this stake is drawn, my lord may be for hedging off, mayhap. Ecod! I'll go to Jack Speed's, secure Nabob, and be out of town in an hour. [Aside, and exit.]

Enter LADY FREELOVE.

Lady F. My dear Miss Russet, you'll excuse—

Char. Mrs. Oakly, at your ladyship's service.

Lady F. Married!

Har. Not yet, Madam; but my father has been so good as to give his consent.

Lady F. I protest I am prodigiously glad of it.

My dear, I give you joy—and you, Mr. Oakly.—I wish you joy, Mr. Russet, and all the good company—for I think the most of them are parties concerned.

Maj. O. How easy, impudent, and familiar.

Lady F. Lord Trinket here too! I vow I did not see your lordship before. [Aside.]

Lord T. Your ladyship's most obedient slave. [Bowing.]

Lady F. You seem grave, my lord! Come, come, I know there has been some difference between you and Mr. Oakly—You must give me leave to be a mediator in this affair.

Lord T. Here has been a small fracas, to be sure, Madam!—We are all blown, 'pon honour.

Lady F. Blown! what do you mean, my lord?

Lord T. Nay, your ladyship knows that I never mind these things, and I know that they never discompose your ladyship—But things have happened a little en travers—The little billet I sent your ladyship has fallen into the hands of that gentleman—[Pointing to CHARLES.]—and so there has been a little brouillerie about it—that's all.

Lady F. You talk to me, my lord, in a very extraordinary style—If you have been guilty of any misbehaviour, I am sorry for it; but your ill conduct can fasten no imputation on me—Miss Russet will justify me sufficiently.

Maj. O. Had not your ladyship better appeal to my friend Charles here?—The letter, Charles!—Out with it this instant.

Char. Yes, I have the credentials of her ladyship's integrity in my pocket.—Mr. Russet, the letter you read a little while ago, was enclosed in this cover, which also I now think it my duty to put into your hands.

Rus. [Reading.] To the Right Honourable Lady FreeLove.—'Sdeath and hell!—and now I recollect, the letter itself was pieced with scraps of French, and Madam, and your ladyship—Fire and fury, Madam! how came you to use me so? I am obliged to you, then, for the insult that has been offered me!

Lady F. What is all this? Your obligations to me, Mr. Russet, are of a nature, that—

Rus. Fine obligations! I dare say, I am partly obliged to you for the attempt on my daughter by that thing of a lord yonder at your house. Zounds, Madam, these are injuries never to be forgiven—they are the grossest affronts to me and my family—all the world shall know them—Zounds!—I'll—

Lady F. Mercy on me! how boisterous are these country gentlemen: Why, really, Mr. Russet, you rave like a man in Bedlam—I am afraid you'll beat me—and then you swear most abominably.—How can you be so vulgar?—I see the meaning of this low malace—But the reputations of women of quality are not so easily impeached—My rank places me above the scandal of little people, and I shall meet such petty insolence with the greatest ease and tranquillity. But you and your simple girl will be sufferers.—I had some thoughts of introducing her into the first company.—But now, Madam, I shall neither receive nor return your visits, and will entirely withdraw my protection from the ordinary part of the family. [Exit.]

Rus. Zounds, what impudence! that's worse than all the rest.

Lord T. Fine presence of mind, faith!—The true French nouchalance—But, good folks, why such a deal of rout and tapage about nothing at all?—If Mademoiselle Harriet had rather be Mrs. Oakly than Lady Trinket—Why, I wish her joy—that's all—Mr. Russet, I wish you joy of your son-in-law—Mr. Oakly, I wish you joy of the lady—and you, Madam, [To HARRIET.] of the gentleman—And, in short, I wish you all joy of one another, 'pon honour. [Exit.]

Rus. There's a fine fellow of a lord now! The devil's in your London folks of the first fashion, as you call them. They will rob you of your estate, debauch your daughter, or lie with your wife—and all as if they were doing you a favour—'pon honour!—

Maj. O. Hey! what now?

[Bell rings violently.]

Re-enter OAKLY.

Oak. D'ye hear, major, d'ye hear?

Maj. O. Zounds! what a clatter!—She'll put down all the bells in the house.

Oak. My observations since I left you, have confirmed my resolution. I see plainly that her good humour, and her ill humour, her smiles, her tears, and her fits, are all calculated to play upon me.

Maj. O. Did not I always tell you so? It's the way with them all—they will be rough and smooth, and hot and cold, and all in a breath. Any thing to get the better of us.

Oak. She is in all moods at present, I promise you—There has she been in her chamber, fuming and fretting, and dispatching a messenger to me every two minutes—servant after servant—now she insists on my coming to her—now again she writes a note to entreat—then Toilet is sent to let me know that she is ill, absolutely dying—then the very next minute, she'll never see my face again—she'll go out of the house directly. [Bell rings.] Again! now the storm rises!—

Maj. O. It will soon drive this way then—now, brother, prove yourself a man—You have gone too far to retreat.

Oak. Retreat!—Retreat!—no, no!—I'll preserve the advantage I have gained, I am determined.

Maj. O. Ay, ay!—keep your ground!—fear nothing—up with your noble heart!—Good discipline makes good soldiers; stick close to my advice, and you may stand buff to a tigris—

Oak. Here she is, by Heavens! now, brother!

Maj. O. And now, brother!—Now or never!

Re-enter MRS. OAKLY.

Mrs. O. I think, Mr. Oakly, you might have had humanity enough to have come to see how I did. You have taken your leave, I suppose, of all tenderness and affection—but I'll be calm—I'll not throw myself into a passion—You want to drive me out of your house—I see what you aim at, and will be beforehand with you—let me keep my temper! I'll send for a chair, and leave the house this instant.

Oak. True, my love: I knew you would not think of dining in your chamber alone, when I had company below. You shall sit at the head of the table, as you ought, to be sure, as you say, and make my friends welcome.

Mrs. O. Excellent rallery! Lookye, Mr. Oakly, I see the meaning of all this affected coolness and indifference.

Oak. My dear, consider where you are—

Mrs. O. You would be glad, I find, to get me out of your house, and have all your flirts about you.

Oak. Before all this company! fy!

Mrs. O. But I'll disappoint you, for I shall remain in it, to support my due authority—as for you, Major Oakly—

Maj. O. Hey-day! what have I done?

Mrs. O. I think you might find better employment, than to create divisions between married people—and you, Sir!—

Oak. Nay but, my dear!—

Mrs. O. Might have more sense as well as tenderness, than to give ear to such idle stuff.

Oak. Lord, Lord!

Mrs. O. You and your wise counsellor there, I suppose, think to carry all your points with me—

Oak. Was ever any thing—

Mrs. O. But it wont do, Sir. You shall find that I will have my own way, and that I will govern my own family.

Oak. You had better learn to govern yourself, by half. Your passion makes you ridiculous. Did ever any body see so much fury and violence; affronting your best friends, breaking my peace, and disconcerting your own temper. And all for what? for nothing. 'Sdeath, Madam! at these years you ought to know better.

Mrs. O. At these years!—Very fine!—Am I to be talked to in this manner?

Oak. Talked to!—Why not?—You have talked to me long enough—almost talked me to death—and I have taken it all, in hopes of making you quiet—but all in vain. Patience, I find, is all thrown away upon you; and henceforward, come what may, I am resolved to be master of my own house.

Mrs. O. So, so!—Master, indeed!—Yes, Sir; and you'll take care to have mistresses enough too, I warrant you.

Oak. Perhaps I may; but they shall be quiet ones, I can assure you.

Mrs. O. Indeed!—And do you think I am such a tame fool, as to sit quietly and bear all this behaviour—You shall find that I have a spirit—

Oak. Of the devil.

Mrs. O. Intolerable!—You shall find then that I will exert that spirit. I am sure I have need of it. As soon as the house is once cleared again, I'll shut my doors against all company—You sha'n't see a single soul for this month.

Oak. 'Sdeath, Madam, but I will!—I'll keep open house for a year.—I'll send cards to the whole town—Mr. Oakly's rout!—All the world will come—and I'll go among the world too—I'll be mewed up no longer.

Mrs. O. Provoking insolence! this is not to be endured—Lookye, Mr. Oakly—

Oak. And lookye, Mrs. Oakly, I will have my own way.

Mrs. O. Nay, then, let me tell you, Sir—

Oak. And let me tell you, Madam, I will not be crossed—I wont be made a fool.

Mrs. O. Why, you wont let me speak.

Oak. Because you don't speak as you ought. Madam, Madam! you sha'n't look, nor walk, nor talk, nor think, but as I please.

Mrs. O. Was there ever such a monster! I can bear this no longer. [Bursts into tears.] O you vile man! I can see through your design—you cruel, barbarous, inhuman—such usage to your poor wife!—you'll be the death of her.

Oak. She sha'n't be the death of me, I am determined.

Mrs. O. That it should ever come to this!—To be contradicted—[Sobbing.]—insulted—abused—hated—'tis too much—my heart will burst with—oh—oh!—

[Falls into a fit. HARRIET, CHARLES, &c. run to her assistance.

Oak. [Interposing.] Let her alone.

Har. Sir, Mrs. Oakly—

Char. For Heaven's sake, Sir, she will be—

Oak. Let her alone, let her alone.

Har. Pray, my dear Sir, let us assist her. She may—

Oak. I don't care. Let her alone, I say.

Mrs. O. [Rising.] O, you monster!—you villain!—you base man! Would you let me die for want of help?—would you?

Oak. Bless me, Madam, your fit is very violent; take care of yourself.

Mrs. O. Despised, ridiculed; but I'll be revenged, you shall see, Sir.

Oak. Tol-de-rol lol-de-rol lol-de-rol lol.

Mrs. O. What, am I made a jest of? Exposed to all the world? If there's law or justice—

Oak. Tol-de-rol lol-de-rol lol-de-rol lol.

Mrs. O. I shall burst with anger. Have a care, Sir; you may repent this. Scorned and made ridiculous! No power on earth shall hinder my revenge!

Har. [Interposing.] Stay, Madam.

Mrs. O. Let me go: I cannot bear this place.

Har. Let me beseech you, Madam.

Maj. O. Courage, brother! you have done wonders.

Oak. I think she'll have no more fits.

Har. Stay, Madam; pray stay one moment. I have been a painful witness of your uneasiness, and in great part the innocent occasion of it. Give me leave then—

Mrs. O. I did not expect, indeed, to have found you here again. But, however—

Har. I see the agitation of your mind, and it makes me miserable. Suffer me to tell the real truth. I can explain every thing to your satisfaction.

Mrs. O. May be so: I cannot argue with you.

Char. Pray, Madam, hear her; for my sake, for your own—dear Madam!

Mrs. O. Well, well, proceed.

Har. I understand, Madam, that your first alarm was occasioned by a letter from my father to your nephew.

Rus. I was in a bloody passion, to be sure, Madam! The letter was not over civil, I believe. I did not know but the young rogue had ruined my girl. But it's all over now, and so—

Mrs. O. You was here yesterday, Sir?

Rus. Yes; I came after Harriet. I thought I should find my young Madam with my young Sir here.

Mrs. O. With Charles, did you say, Sir?

Rus. Ay, with Charles, Madam. The young rogue has been fond of her a long time, and she of him, it seems.

Mrs. O. I fear I have been to blame. [Aside.

Rus. I ask pardon, Madam, for the disturbance I made in your house.

Har. And the abrupt manner in which I came into it demands a thousand apologies. But the occasion must be my excuse.

Mrs. O. How have I been mistaken! [Aside.] But did not I overhear you and Mr. Oakly—

Har. Dear Madam, you had but a partial hearing of our conversation. It related entirely to this gentleman.

Char. To put it beyond doubt, Madam, Mr. Russet and my guardian have consented to our marriage; and we are in hopes that you will not withhold your approbation.

Mrs. O. I have no further doubt. I see you are innocent, and it was cruel to suspect you. You have taken a load of anguish off my mind; and yet your kind interposition comes too late; Mr. Oakly's love for me is entirely destroyed.

Oak. I must go to her.

Maj. O. Not yet, not yet.

Har. Do not disturb yourself with such apprehensions; I am sure Mr. Oakly loves you most affectionately.

Oak. I can hold no longer. [Going to her.] My affection for you, Madam, is as warm as ever. My constrained behaviour has cut me to the soul, for it was all constrained, and it was with the utmost difficulty that I was able to support it.

Mrs. O. O, Mr. Oakly, how have I exposed myself! What low arts has my jealousy induced me to practise! I see my folly, and fear that you can never forgive me.

Oak. Forgive you! This change transports me!—Brother! Mr. Russet! Charles! Harriet! give me joy! I am the happiest man in the world!

Maj. O. Joy, much joy to you both! though, by the by, you are not a little obliged to me for it. Did not I tell you I would cure all the disorders in your family? I beg pardon, sister, for taking the liberty to prescribe for you. My medicines have been somewhat rough, I believe, but they have had an admirable effect, and so don't be angry with your physician.

Mrs. O. I am indeed obliged to you, and I feel—

Oak. Nay, my dear, no more of this. All that's past must be utterly forgotten.

Mrs. O. I have not merited this kindness; but it shall hereafter be my study to deserve it. Away with all idle jealousies! And since my suspicions have hitherto been groundless, I am resolved for the future never to suspect a' all.

[Exeunt.

THE BEGGAR'S OPERA:

AN OPERA,

IN THREE ACTS.

BY JOHN GAY, Esq.

REMARKS.

This piece is said to have arisen from a remark of Dean Swift to Mr. Gay, "that a Newgate Pastoral might make a pretty sort of thing." It had a run of 63 nights, in its first season, (1727) and spread rapidly, with equal success, throughout Wales, Scotland, and Ireland. The card-table and the drawing-room echoed with its praise; the ladies had the songs engraven on their fans; even screens and other pieces of furniture were decorated with them. The profits were so considerable, both to the Author, (who was called the Orpheus of Highwaymen), and to Mr. Rich, the Manager, as to produce the saying, that it had "made Rich gay, and Gay rich." Miss Fenton, who acted Polly, became the idol of the town and of the Duke of Bolton, by marriage with whom she attained the highest rank a female subject can acquire.

This fortunate opera has been generally thought to give vice additional attraction, by exhibiting it in a pleasing form; in this respect, the example of the hero and its general influence have probably been much over-rated; but the scruples of the present refined age may well hesitate to admit the moral pretensions of this work. Instead of approbation merely as a powerful attack on the absurdities of the Italian opera,* it now charms by the native beauty of the old airs, and the professional abilities of the performers.

* This effeminacy had been recently imported from Italy, and infected the fashionable world; to oppose this Mr. Gay, in his "Beggars Opera," drew up the nervous old ballad of Britain, against the soft, unnatural, Italian stanza, and took his airs from our most popular songs. "An Italian, (says Mr. Ireland, in his, 'Hogarth Illustrated') concluded an harangue calculated to throw Gay's talents and taste into contempt, with—'Saire, this simple signor did tri to pelt mi countrymen out of England with lumps of pudding; ' one of Gay's tunes."

ACT I.

SCENE I.—PEACHUM'S House.

PEACHUM sitting at a table, with a large book of accounts before him.

Peach. Through all the employments of life,
Each neighbour abuses his brother:
Whore and rogue, they call husband and wife:
All professions be-rogue one another.
The priest calls the lawyer a cheat;
The lawyer be-knaves the divine;
And the statesman, because he's so great,
Thinks his trade is as honest as mine.

A lawyer is an honest employment, so is mine. Like me too, he acts in a double capacity, both against rogues, and for them; for it is but fitting, that we should protect and encourage cheats, since we live by them.

Enter FILCH.

Filch. Sir, Black Moll has sent word, her trial comes on in the afternoon, and she hopes you will order matters so as to bring her off.

Peach. Why, as the wench is very active and industrious, you may satisfy her that I'll soften the evidence.

Filch. Tom Gagg, Sir, is found guilty.

Peach. A lazy dog! When I took him, the time before, I told him what he would come to, if he did not mend his hand. This is death, without reprieve. I may venture to book him; [Writes.] for Tom Gagg, forty pounds. Let Betty Sly know, that I'll save her from transportation, for I can get more by her staying in England.

Filch. Betty hath brought more goods to our lock this year, than any five of the gang; and, in truth, 'tis pity to lose so good a customer.

Peach. If none of the gang takes her off, she may, in the common course of business, live a twelvemonth longer. I love to let women 'scape. A good sportsman always lets the hen-partridges fly, because the breed of the game depends upon them. Besides, here the law allows us no reward: there is nothing to be got by the death of women—except our wives.

Filch. Without dispute, she is a fine woman! 'Twas to her I was obliged for my education. To say a bold word, she has trained up more young fellows to the business than the gaming-table.

Peach. Truly, Filch, thy observation is right. We and the surgeons are more beholden to women, than all the professions besides.

Filch. 'Tis woman that seduces all mankind;
By her we first were taught the wheedling arts;

Her very eyes can cheat; when most she's
She tricks us of our money, with our hearts.
For her, like wolves, by night, we roam for prey,
And practice every fraud to bribe her
For, suits of love, like law, are won by pay,
And beauty must be fed'd into our arms.

Peach. But make haste to Newgate, boy, and let my friends know what I intend; for I love to make them easy, one way or another.

Filch. When a gentleman is long kept in suspense, penitence may break his spirit ever after. Besides, certainty gives a man a good air upon his trial, and makes him risk another, without fear or scruple. But I'll away, for 'tis a pleasure to be a messenger of comfort to friends in affliction. [Exit.]

Peach. But it is now high time to look about me, for a decent execution against next sessions I hate a lazy rogue, by whom one can get nothing till he is hanged. A register of the gang: [Reading.] Crook-fingered Jack—a year and a half in the service—let me see, how much the stock owes to his industry;—One, two, three, four, five gold watches, and seven silver ones. A mighty clean-handed fellow! sixteen snuff-boxes, five of them of true gold, six dozen of handkerchiefs, four silver-hilted swords, half a dozen of shirts, three tie-perriwigs, and a piece of broadcloth. Considering these are only the fruits of his leisure hours, I don't know a prettier fellow; for no man alive hath a more engaging presence of mind upon the road.—Wat Dreary, alias Brown Will—an irregular dog; who hath an underhand way of disposing of his goods; I'll try him only for a session or two longer, upon his good behaviour.—Harry Paddington—a poor petty-larceny rascal, without the least genius! that fellow, though he were to live these six months, will never come to the gallows with any credit.—Slippery Sam—he goes off the next sessions; for the villain hath the impudence to have views of following his trade as a tailor, which he calls an honest employment.—Mat-o-the-Mint—listed not above a month ago; a promising, sturdy fellow, and diligent in his way; somewhat too bold and hasty, and may raise good contributions on the public, if he does not cut himself short by murder.—Tom Tiddle—a guzzling, soaking sot, who is always too drunk to stand himself, or to make others stand; a cart is absolutely necessary for him. Robin of Bagsshot, alias Gorgon, alias Bluff Bob, alias Caruncle, alias Bob Booty—

Enter MRS. PEACHUM.

Mrs. P. What of Bob Booty, husband? I hope nothing bad hath betided him.—You know, my dear, he's a favourite customer of mine—'twas he made me a present of this ring.

Peach. I have set his name down in the black list, that's all, my dear; he spends his life among women, and, as soon as his money is gone, one or other of the ladies will hang him for the reward, and there's forty pounds lost to us for ever!

Mrs. P. You know, my dear, I never meddle in matters of death; I always leave those affairs to you. Women, indeed, are bitter bad judges in these cases; for they are so partial to the brave, that they think every man handsome, who is going to the camp or the gallows. But really, husband, you should not be too hard-hearted, for you never had a finer, braver set of men than at present. We have not had a murder among them all these seven months; and truly, my dear, this is a great blessing.

Peach. What a dickens is the woman always whimpering about murder for? No gentleman is ever looked upon the worse for killing a man in his own defence; and if business cannot be carried on without it, what would you have a gentleman do? so, my dear, have done upon this subject. Was Captain Macheath here, this morning, for the bank-notes he left with you last week?

Mrs. P. Yes, my dear; and though the bank has stopped payment, he was so cheerful and so agreeable! Sure, there is not a finer gentleman upon the road than the captain? if he comes from Bagshot, at any reasonable hour, he hath promised to make one this evening, with Polly, me, and Bob Booty, at a party at quadrille. Pray, my dear, is the captain rich?

Peach. The captain keeps too good company ever to grow rich. Marybone and the chocolate-houses are his undoing. The man that proposes to get money by play, should have the education of a fine gentleman, and be trained up to it from his youth.

Mrs. P. Really, I am sorry, upon Polly's account, the captain hath not more discretion. What business hath he to keep company with lords and gentlemen? he should leave them to prey upon one another.

Peach. Upon Polly's account! what a plague doth the woman mean?—Upon Polly's account!

Mrs. P. Captain Macheath is very fond of the girl.

Peach. And what then?

Mrs. P. If I have any skill in the ways of women, I am sure Polly thinks him a very pretty man.

Peach. And what then? you would not be so mad as to have the wench marry him! Gamesters and highwaymen are, generally, very good to their mistresses, but they are very devils to their wives.

Mrs. P. But if Polly should be in love, how should we help her, or how can she help herself? Poor girl, I'm in the utmost concern about her!

Peach. Look ye, wife, a handsome wench, in our way of business, is as profitable as at the bar of a Temple coffee-house, who looks upon it as her livelihood, to grant every liberty but one. My daughter to me should be like a court lady to a minister of state, a key to the whole gang. Married! if the affair is not already done, I'll terrify her from it, by the example of our neighbours.

Mrs. P. Mayhap, my dear, you may injure the poor girl: she loves to imitate the fine ladies, and she may only allow the captain liberties, in the view of interest.

Peach. But 'tis your duty, my dear, to warn the girl against her ruin, and to instruct her how to make the most of her beauty. I'll go to her this moment, and sift her. In the meantime, wife, rip out the coronets and marks of these dozen of cambric handkerchiefs, for I can dispose of them this afternoon to a chap in the city. [Exit.]

Mrs. P. Never was a man more out of the way in an argument than my husband. Why must our Polly, forsooth, differ from her sex, and love only her husband? and why must Polly's marriage, contrary to all observation, make her the less followed by other men? All men are thieves in love, and like a woman the better for being another's property.

Enter FILCH.

Come hither, Filch.—I am as fond of this child, as though my mind misgave me he were my own. He hath as fine a hand at picking a pocket as a woman, and is as nimble-fingered as a juggler. If an unlucky session does not cut the rope of thy life, I pronounce, boy, thou wilt be a great man in history. Where was your post last night, my boy?

Filch. I plied at the opera, Madam; and, considering 'twas neither dark nor rainy, so that there was no great hurry in getting chairs and coaches, made a tolerable hand on't—These seven handkerchiefs, Madam.

Mrs. P. Coloured ones, I see. They are of sure sale from our warehouse at Redriff, among the seamen.

Filch. And this snuff-box.

Mrs. P. Set in gold! a pretty encouragement this to a young beginner!

Filch. I had a fair tug at a charming gold watch. Plague take the tailors, for making the fobs so deep and narrow!—it stuck by the way, and I was forced to make my escape under a coach. Really, Madam, I fear I shall be cut off in the flower of my youth, so that every now and then, since I was pumped, I have thoughts of taking up, and going to sea.

Mrs. P. You should go to Hockley-in-the-hole, and to Marybone, child, to learn valour; these are the schools that have bred so many brave men. I thought, boy, by this time, thou hadst lost fear as well as shame. Poor lad! how little does he know yet of the Old Bailey! For the first fact, I'll insure thee from being hanged; and going to sea, Filch, will come time enough, upon a sentence of transportation. But, hark you, my lad, don't tell me a lie; for you know I hate a liar—Do you know of any thing that hath passed between Captain Macheath and our Polly?

Filch. I beg you, Madam, don't ask me; for I must either tell a lie to you, or to Miss Polly; for I promised her I would not tell.

Mrs. P. But when the honour of our family is concerned.

Filch. I shall lead a sad life with Miss Polly, if ever she comes to know I told you. Besides, I would not willingly forfeit my own honour, by betraying any body.

Mrs. P. Yonder comes my husband and Polly. Come, Filch, you shall go with me into my own room, and tell me the whole story. I'll give thee a glass of a most delicious cordial that I keep for my own drinking. [Exeunt.]

Enter PEACHUM and POLLY.

Polly. I know as well as any of the fine ladies how to make the most of myself, and of my man too. A woman knows how to be mercenary, though she hath never been in a court or at an assembly. We have it in our nature, papa. If I allow Captain Macheath some trifling liberties, I have this watch and other visible marks of his favour to show for it. A girl who cannot grant some things, and refuse what is most material will make but a poor hand of her beauty, and soon be thrown upon the common.

Virgins are like the fair flower in its lustre,

Which in the garden enamels the ground.

Near it the bees in play flutter and cluster,

And gaudy butterflies frolic around.

But when once pluck'd 'tis no longer alluring,

To Covent Garden 'tis sent (as yet sweet,)

There fades, and shrinks, and grows past all ex-during,

Rots, stinks, and dies, and is trod under feet.

Peach. You know, Polly, I am not against your toying and trifling with a customer, in the way of business, or to get out a secret or so; but if I find out that you have played the fool, and are married, you jade you, I'll cut your throat, hussy. Now, you know my mind,

Enter Mrs. PEACHUM, in a very great passion.
Our Polly is a sad slut! nor heeds what we have taught her,

I wonder any man alive will ever rear a daughter!
For she must have both hoods and gowns, and hoops to swell her pride,

With scarfs, and stays, and gloves, and lace, and she will have men beside;

And when she's dress'd with care and cost, all tempting, fine, and gay,

As men should serve a cucumber, she flings herself away.

You baggage! you hussy! you inconsiderate jade! had you been hanged, it would not have vexed me; for that might have been your misfortune; but to do such a mad thing by choice!—The wench is married, husband.

Peach. Married! the captain is a bold man, and will risk any thing for money: to be sure he believes her a fortune. Do you think your mother and I should have lived comfortably so long together, if ever we had been married, baggage?

Mrs. P. I knew she was always a proud slut, and now the wench hath played the fool and married, because, forsooth, she would do like the gentry! Can you support the expense of a husband, hussy, in gaming and drinking? have you money enough to carry on the daily quarrels of man and wife, about who shall squander most? If you must be married, could you introduce nobody into our family but a highwayman? Why, thou foolish jade, thou wilt be as ill used and as much neglected as if thou hadst married a lord!

Peach. Let not your anger, my dear, break through the rules of decency; for the captain looks upon himself in the military capacity, as a gentleman by his profession. Besides what he hath already, I know he is in a fair way of getting or dying; and both these ways, let me tell you, are most excellent chances for a wife. Tell me, hussy, are you ruined or no?

Mrs. P. With Polly's fortune she might very well have gone off to a person of distinction: yes, that you might, you pouting slut.

Peach. What! is the wench dumb? speak, or I'll make you plead by squeezing out an answer from you. Are you really bound wife to him, or are you only upon liking. [Pinches her.

Polly. Oh!

Mrs. P. How the mother is to be pitied who hath handsome daughters! Locks, bolts, bars, and lectures of morality, are nothing to them; they break through them all; they have as much pleasure in cheating a father and mother, as in cheating at cards.

Peach. Why, Polly, I shall soon know if you are married, by Macheath's keeping from our house.

Polly. Can love be controll'd by advice!

Will Cupid our mothers obey?

Though my heart were as frozen as ice,

At his flame 'twould have melted away.

When he kiss'd me, so sweetly he press'd,

'Twas so sweet that I must have complied,

So I thought it both safest and best

To marry, for fear you should chide.

Mrs. P. Then all the hopes of our family are gone for ever and ever.

Peach. And Macheath may hang his father and mother-in-law, in hopes to get into their laughter's fortune.

Polly. I did not marry him (as tis the fashion, coolly and deliberately, for honour or money—but I love him.

Mrs. P. Love him! worse and worse! I thought the girl had been better bred. Oh husband! husband! her folly makes me mad! my head swims! I'm distracted! I can't support myself—Oh! [Faints

Peach. See, wench, to what a condition you have reduced your poor mother! A glass of cordial this instant! How the poor woman takes it to heart! [POLLY goes out, and returns with it.] Ah, hussy! now this is the only comfort your mother has left.

Polly. Give her another glass, Sir; my mamma drinks double the quantity whenever she is in this way. This, you see, fetches her.

Mrs. P. The girl shows such readiness, and so much concern, that I almost could find in my heart to forgive her.

O Polly, you might have toy'd and kiss'd:

By keeping men off, you keep them on,

Polly. But he so teased me,

And he so pleased me,

What I did you must have done.

Mrs. P. Not with a highwayman—you sorry slut.

Peach. A word with you, wife. 'Tis no new thing for a wench to take a man without consent of parents. You know 'tis the frailty of woman, my dear!

Mrs. P. Yes, indeed, the sex is frail; but the first time a woman is frail, she should be somewhat nice methinks, for then or never is her time to make her fortune: after that she hath nothing to do but to guard herself from being found out, and she may do what she pleases.

Peach. Make yourself a little easy; I have a thought shall soon set all matters again to rights. Why so melancholy, Polly? since what is done cannot be undone, we must endeavour to make the best of it.

Mrs. P. Well, Polly, as far as one woman can forgive another, I forgive thee.—Your father is too fond of you, hussy.

Polly. Then all my sorrows are at an end.

Mrs. P. A mighty likely speech in troth for a wench who is just married!

Polly. I like a ship in storms was toss'd,

Yet afraid to put into land,

For, seized in the port the vessel's lost

Whose treasure is contraband.

The waves are laid,

My duty's paid;

O joy beyond expression!

Thus safe ashore

I ask no more;

My all's in my possession.

Peach. I hear customers in t'other room; go talk with them, Polly; but come again as soon as they are gone.—But, harkye, child, if 'tis the gentleman who was here yesterday about the repeating watch, say you can't get intelligence of it till to-morrow, for I lent it to Sukey Straddle, to make a figure with to-night at a tavern in Drury-lane. If t'other gentleman calls for the silver-hilted sword, you know Beetle-browed Jenny hath it on, and he doth not come from Tunbridge till Tuesday night, so that it cannot be had till then. [Exit POLLY.] Dear wife, be a little pacified; don't let your passion run away with your senses: Polly, I grant you, hath done a rash thing.

Mrs. P. If she had had only an intrigue with the fellow, why the very best families have excused and huddled up a frailty of that sort. 'Tis marriage, husband, that makes it a blemish.

Peach. But money, wife, is the true fullers'-wrath for reputations; there is not a spot or stain but what it can take out. I tell you, wife, I can make this match turn to our advantage.

Mrs. P. I am very sensible, husband, that Captain Macheath is worth money, but I am in doubt whether he hath not two or three wives already, and then, if he should die in a session or two, Polly's dower would come into dispute.

Peach. That indeed is a point which ought to be considered. The lawyers are bitter enemies to those in our way; they don't care that any body should get a clandestine livelihood but themselves.

Enter POLLY.

Polly. 'Twas only Nimming Ned: he brought in a damask window-curtain, a hoop-petticoat, a pair of silver candlesticks, a perriwig, and one silk stocking, from the fire that happened last night.

Peach. There is not a fellow that is cleverer in his way, and saves more goods out of the fire, than Ned. But now, Polly, to your affair; for matters must not be as they are. You are married, then, it seems?

Polly. Yes, Sir.

Peach. And how do you propose to live, child?

Polly. Like other women, Sir; upon the industry of my husband.

Mrs. P. What! is the wench turned fool? a highwayman's wife, like a soldier's, hath as little of his pay as of his company.

Peach. And had not you the common views of a gentleman in your marriage, Polly?

Polly. I don't know what you mean, Sir.

Peach. Of a jointure, and of being a widow.

Polly. But I love him, Sir: how then could I have thoughts of parting with him?

Peach. Parting with him! why that is the whole scheme and intention of all marriage articles. The comfortable estate of widowhood is the only hope that keeps up a wife's spirits. Where is the woman who would scruple to be a wife, if she had it in her power to be a widow whenever she pleased? If you have any views of this sort, Polly, I shall think the match not so very unreasonable.

Polly. How I dread to hear your advice! yet I must beg you to explain yourself.

Peach. Secure what he hath got, have him peached the next sessions, and then at once you are made a rich widow.

Polly. What! murder the man I love! the blood runs cold at my heart with the very thought of it!

Peach. Fy, Polly! what hath murder to do in the affair? Since the thing sooner or later must happen, I dare say that the captain himself would like that we should get the reward for his death sooner than a stranger. Why, Polly, the captain knows that 'tis his employment to rob, so 'tis ours to take robbers; every man in his business: so that there is no malice in the case.

Mrs. P. To have him peached is the only thing could ever make me forgive her.

Polly. O ponder well! be not severe;
Save a wretched wife:

For on the rope that hangs my dear,
Depends poor Polly's life.

Mrs. P. But your duty to your parents, hussy, obliges you to hang him. What would many a wife give for such an opportunity!

Polly. What is a jointure, what is widowhood, to me? I know my heart; I cannot sur vive him. Thus, Sir, it will happen to your poor Polly.

Mrs. P. What! is the fool in love in earnest then? I hate thee for being particular. Why, wench, thou art a shame to thy very sex!

Polly. But hear me, mother—if you ever loved—

Mrs. P. Those cursed play books she reads have been her ruin! One word more, hussy, and I shall knock your brains out, if you have any.

Peach. Keep out of the way, Polly, for fear of mischief, and consider of what is proposed to you.

Mrs. P. Away, hussy. Hang your husband, and be dutiful. [POLLY listens.] The thing, husband, must and shall be done. If she will not know her duty, we know ours.

Peach. But really, my dear, it grieves one's heart to take off a great man. When I consider his personal bravery, his fine stratagems, how much we have already got by him, and how much more we may get, methinks I can't find in my heart to have a hand in his death: I wish you could have made Polly undertake it.

Mrs. P. But in case of necessity—our own lives are in danger.

Peach. Then indeed we must comply with the customs of the world, and make gratitude give way to interest—he shall be taken off.

Mrs. P. I'll undertake to manage Polly.

Peach. And I'll prepare matters for the Old Bailey.

[Exit PEACHUM and MRS. PEACHUM.]

Polly. Now I'm a wretch indeed!—Methinks I see him already in the cart, sweeter and more lovely than the nosegay in his hand!—I hear the crowd extolling his resolution and intrepidity!—I see him at the tree! the whole circle are in tears!—What then will become of Polly?—As yet I may inform him of their design, and aid him in his escape.—It shall be so.—But then he flies, absents himself, and I bar myself from his dear, dear conversation! that too will distract me.—If he keeps out of the way, my papa and mamma may in time relent, and we may be happy.—If he stays he is hanged, and then he is lost for ever!—He intended to lie concealed in my room till the dusk of the evening. If they are abroad, I'll this instant let him out, lest some accident should prevent him.

Enter MACHEATH.

Mac. Pretty Polly, say,
When I was away,
Did your fancy never stray
To some newer lover?

Polly. Without disguise,
Heaving sighs,
Doting eyes,
My constant heart discover.
Fondly let me lol!

Mac. O pretty, pretty Poll!

Polly. And are you as fond of me as ever, my dear?

Mac. Suspect my honour, my courage, suspect any thing but my love.—May my pistols miss fire, and my mare slip her shoulder while I am pursued, if ever I forsake thee!

Polly. Nay, my dear! I have no reason to doubt you, for I find in the romance you lent me, none of the great heroes were false in love.

Mac. My heart was so free,
It roved like the bee,
Till Polly my passion requited;
I sipt each flower,
I chang'd every hour,
But here every flower is united.

Polly. Were you sentenced to transportation, sure, my dear, you could not leave me behind you—could you?

Mac. Is there any power, any force, that could tear me from thee? You might sooner tear a pension out of the hands of a courtier, a fee from a lawyer, a pretty woman from a looking-glass, or any woman from quadrille.—But to tear me from thee is impossible!

Mac. Were I laid on Greenland's coast,
And in my arms embraced my lass,
Warm amidst eternal frost,
Too soon the half year's night would pass.

Polly. Were I sold on Indian soil,
Soon as the burning day was closed,
I could mock the sultry toil

When on my charmer's breast repos'd.

Mac. And I would love you all the day,

Polly. Every night would kiss and play,

Mac. If with me you'd fondly stray,

Polly. Over the hills and far away.

Polly. Yes, I would go with thee. But oh!—how shall I speak it? I must be torn from thee! We must part!

Mac. How! part!

Polly. We must, we must!—My papa and mamma are set against thy life: thy now, even now, are in search after thee: they are preparing evidence against thee; thy life depends upon a moment!

O, what pain it is to part!

Can I leave thee, can I leave thee?

O, what a pain it is to part!

Can thy Polly ever leave thee?

But lest death my love should thwart,

And bring thee to the fatal cart,

Thus I tear thee from my bleeding heart!

Fly hence, and let me leave thee.

One kiss, and then!—one kiss!—Be gone!—Farewell!

Mac. My hand, my heart, my dear, is so rivetted to thine, that I cannot unloose my hold!

Polly. But my papa may intercept thee, and then I should lose the very glimmering of hope. A few weeks, perhaps, may reconcile us all. Shall thy Polly hear from thee?

Mac. Must I then go?

Polly. And will not absence change your love?

Mac. If you doubt it, let me stay—and be hanged.

Polly. Oh, how I fear! how I tremble!—Go—but, when safety will give you leave, you will be sure to see me again; for, till then, Polly is wretched.

Mac. The miser thus a shilling sees,

Which he's obliged to pay;

With sighs resigns it by degrees,

And tears 'tis gone for aye.

Polly. The boy thus when his sparrow's flown,
The bird in silence eyes;

But soon as out of sight 'tis gone,

Whines, whimpers, sobs, and cries.

[Exeunt]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Tavern near Newgate.

JEMMY TWITCHER, CROOK-FINGERED JACK, WAT DREARY, ROBIN OF BAGSHOT, NIMMING NED, HARRY PADDINGTON, MAT-O'-THE-MINT, BEN BUDGE, and the rest of the gang, at the table, with wine, brandy, and tobacco.

Ben. But prythee, Mat, what is become of thy brother Tom? I have not seen him since my return from transportation.

Mat. Poor brother Tom had an accident, this time twelvemonth, and so clever made a fellow as he was, I could not save him from these stealing rascals, the surgeons; and now, poor man, he is among the otamies, at Surgeons'-hall.

Ben. So, it seems, his time was come.

Jemmy. But the present time is ours, and nobody alive hath more. Why are the laws levelled at us? are we more dishonest than the rest of mankind? What we win, gentlemen, is our own, by the law of arms, and the right of conquest.

Jack. Where shall we find such another set of practical philosophers, who, to a man, are above the fear of death?

Wat. Sound men and true!

Robin. Of tried courage, and indefatigable industry!

Ned. Who is there here that would not die for his friend?

Harry. Who is there here that would betray him for his interest?

Mat. Show me a gang of courtiers that can say as much.

Ben. We are for a just partition of the world; for every man has a right to enjoy life.

Mat. We retrench the superfluities of mankind. The world is avaricious, and I hate avarice. A covetous fellow, like a jackdaw, steals what he was never made to enjoy, for the sake of hiding it. These are the robbers of mankind; for money was made for the free-hearted and generous: and where is the injury of taking from another what he hath not the heart to make use of?

Jemmy. Our several stations for the day are fixed. Good luck attend us all! Fill the glasses!

Mat. Fill every glass, for wine inspires us,

And fires us,

With courage, love, and joy.

Women and wine should life employ;

Is there aught else on earth desirous?

Chorus. Fill every glass, &c.

Enter MACHEATH.

Mac. Gentlemen, well met; my heart hath been with you this hour, but an unexpected affair hath detained me. No ceremony, I beg you!

Mat. We were just breaking up to go upon duty. Am I to have the honour of taking the air with you, Sir, this evening, upon the Heath? I drink a dram now and then with the stage-coachmen, in the way of friendship, and intelligence; and I know that, about this time, there will be passengers upon the western road who are worth speaking with.

Mac. I was to have been of that party—but—

Mat. But what, Sir?

Mac. Is there any one that suspects my courage?

Mat. We have all been witnesses of it.

Mac. My honour and truth to the gang?

Mat. I'll be answerable for it.

Mac. In the division of our booty, have I ever shown the least marks of avarice and injustice?

Mat. By these questionings, something seems to have ruffled you. Are any of us suspected?

Mac. I have a fixed confidence, gentlemen, in you all, as men of honour, and as such I value and respect you. Peachum is a man that is useful to us.

Mat. Is he about to play us any foul play? I'll shoot him through the head.

Mac. I beg you, gentlemen, act with conduct and discretion. A pistol is your last resort.

Mat. He knows nothing of this meeting.

Mac. Business cannot go on without him: he is a man who knows the world, and is a necessary agent to us. We have had a slight difference, and, till it is accommodated, I shall be obliged to keep out of his way. Any private dispute of mine shall be of no ill consequence to my friends. You must continue to act under his discretion; for, the moment we break loose from him, our gang is ruined.

Mat. He is, to us, of great convenience.

Mac. Make him believe I have quitted the gang, which I can never do but with life. At our private quarters I will continue to meet you. A week or so will probably reconcile us.

Mat. Your instructions shall be observed. 'Tis now high time for us to repair to our several duties; so, till the evening, at our quarters in Moorfields, we bid you farewell.

Mac. I shall wish myself with you. Success attend you. [Sits down melancholy at the table.]

Mat-o'-the-Mint and Gang.

Let us take the road;

Hark! I hear the sound of coaches,

The hour of attack approaches,

To your arms, brave boys, and load,

See the ball I hold!

Let the chemists toil like asses,

Our fire their fire surpasses,

And turns all our lead to gold.

[The gang, ranged in the front of the Stage, load their pistols, and stick them under their girdles; then go off, singing the first part in chorus.]

Mac. What a fool is a fond wench! Polly is most confoundedly bit. I love the sex; and a man who loves money might as well be contented with one guinea, as I with one woman. The town, perhaps, hath been as much obliged to me for recruiting it with free-hearted ladies, as to any recruiting officer in the army. If it were not for us and the other gentlemen of the sword, Drury-lane would be uninhabited.

If the heart of a man is depress'd with cares,
The mist is dispell'd when a woman appears;
Like the notes of a fiddle, she sweetly, sweetly,
Raises the spirits, and charms our ears.
Roses and lilies her cheeks disclose,
But her ripe lips are more sweet than those;

Press her,

Caress her,

With blisses,

Her kisses

Dissolve us in pleasure and soft repose.

I must have women—there is nothing unbends the mind like them: money is not so strong a cordial for the time—Drawer!

Enter DRAWER.

is the porter gone for all the ladies, according to my directions?

Drawer. I expect him back every minute: but you know, Sir, you sent him as far as Hockley-in-the-hole for three of the ladies; for one in Vi-regar-yard, and for the rest of them, somewhere about Lewkner's-lane. Sure some of them are below, for I hear the bar-bell. As they come, I will show them up. Coming! coming. [Exit.]

Enter Mrs. COAXER, DOLLY TRULL, Mrs. VIXEN, BETTY DOXY, JENNY DIVER, Mrs. SLAMMEKIN, SUKEY TAWDRY, MOLLY BRAZEN.

Mac. Dear Mrs. Coaxer, you are welcome! you look charmingly to-day: I hope you don't want the repairs of quality, and lay on paint.—Dolly Trull! kiss me, you slut! are you as amorous as ever, hussy? you are always so taken up with stealing hearts, that you don't allow yourself time to steal any thing else.—Ah, Dolly, thou wilt ever be a coquette.—Mrs. Vixen, I'm yours! I always loved a woman of wit and spirit: they make charming mistresses, but plaguy wives.—Betty Doxy! come hither, hussy: do you drink as hard as ever? you had better stick to good wholesome beer; for, in troth, Betty, strong waters will, in time, ruin your constitution; you should leave those to your betters.—What, and my pretty Jenny Diver too! as prim and demure as ever! there is not any prude, though ever so high bred, hath a more sanctified look, with a more mischievous heart: ah, thou art a dear, artful hypocrite!—Mrs. Slammekin! as careless and genteel as ever! all you fine ladies, who know your own beauty, affect an undress.—But see! here's Sukey Tawdry come to contradict what I was saying.—Molly Brazen! [She kisses him.] That's well done! I love a free-hearted wench: thou hast a most agreeable assurance, girl, and art as willing as a turtle.

Macheath and Ladies.

Youth's the season made for joys,

Love is then our duty;

She alone who that employs,

Well deserves her beauty.

Let's be gay,

While we may,

Beauty's a flower despised in decay.

Chorus. Youth's the season, &c.

Let us drink and sport to-day,

Ours is not to-morrow;

Love with youth flies swift away,

Age is nought but sorrow.

Dance and sing,

Time's on the wing,

Life never knows the return of spring.

Chorus. Let us drink, &c.

Mac. Now, pray, ladies, take your places. Here, Drawer, bring us more wine. If any of the ladies choose gin, I hope they will be so free as to call for it.

Jenny. You look as if you meant me. Wine is strong enough for me. Indeed, Sir, I never drink strong waters but when I have the colic.

Mac. Just the excuse of the fine ladies! why, a lady of quality is never without the colic. I hope, Mrs. Coaxer, you have had good success of late in your visits among the mercers.

Mrs. C. We have so many interlopers; yet, with industry, one may still have a little picking.—If any woman hath more art than another, to be sure 'tis Jenny Diver.

Mac. Have done with your compliments, ladies, and drink about. You are not so fond of me, Jenny, as you used to be.

Jenny. 'Tis not convenient, Sir, to show my fondness among so many rivals. 'Tis your own choice, and not the warmth of my inclinations, that will determine you.—But, to be sure, Sir, with so much good fortune as you have had upon the road, you must be grown immensely rich.

Mac. The road, indeed, hath done me justice, but the gaming-table hath been my ruin.

Jenny. A man of courage should never put any thing to the risk but his life. These are the tools of a man of honour; cards and dice are only fit for cowardly cheats, who prey upon their friends. [She takes up one pistol; SUREY TAWDRY the other.]

Sukey. This, Sir, is fitter for your hand. Besides your loss of money, 'tis a loss to the ladies. How fond could I be of you! but, before company, 'tis ill bred.

Mac. Wanton hussies!

Jenny. I must, and will, have a kiss, to give my wine a zest.

PEACHUM and Constables rush in upon him.

Peach. I seize you, Sir, as my prisoner.

Mac. Was this well done, Jenny?—Women are decoy ducks; who can trust them? beasts, tades, jilts, harpies, furies, whores!

Peach. Your case, Mr. Macheath, is not particular. The greatest heroes have been ruined by women.—But, to do them justice, I must own they are a pretty sort of creatures, if we could trust them. You must now, Sir, take your leave of the ladies; and, if they have a mind to make you a visit, they will be sure to find you at home. This gentleman, ladies, lodges in Newgate. Constables, wait upon the captain to his lodgings.

Mac. At the tree I shall suffer with pleasure;

At the tree I shall suffer with pleasure;

Let me go where I will,

In all kinds of ill,

I shall find no such furies as these are.

[Exit MACHEATH, guarded with PEACHUM and Constables.]

Mrs. V. Look ye, Mrs. Jenny, though Mr. Peachum may have made a private bargain with you and Sukey Tawdry, for betraying the captain, as we were all assisting we ought all to share alike.

Jenny. As far as a bowl of punch, or a treat, I believe, Mrs. Sukey will join me—as for any thing else, ladies, you cannot, in conscience, expect it.

Mrs. S. Dear Madam!

[Offering the pass to Mrs. VIXEN.]

Mrs. V. I wouldn't for the world.

Mrs. S. Nay—thus I must stay all night.

Mrs. V. Since you command me—

Mrs. S. [After giving way to Mrs. VIXEN, pushes her from the door.] Let your betters go before you. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—Newgate.

Enter LOCKIT, Turnkeys, MACHEATH, and Constables.

Lockit. Noble captain, you are welcome! you have not been a lodger of mine this year and a half. You know the custom, Sir; garnish, captain, garnish.—Hand me down those fetters there.

Mac. Those, Mr. Lockit, seem to be the heaviest of the whole set. With your leave, I should like the further pair better.

Lockit. Look ye, captain, we know what is fittest for our prisoners. When a gentleman uses me with civility, I always do the best I can to please him.—Hand them down, I say. We have them of all prices, from one guinea to ten; and 'tis fitting every gentleman should please himself.

Mac. I understand you, Sir. [Gives money.] The fees here are so many, and so exorbitant, that few fortunes can bear the expense of getting off handsomely, or of dying like a gentleman.

Lockit. Those, I see, will fit the captain better.—Take down the further pair.—Do but examine them, Sir—Never was better work—How genteelly they are made!—They will sit as easy as a glove, and the nicest man in England might not be ashamed to wear them. [He puts on the chains.] If I had the best gentleman in the land in my custody, I could not equip him more handsomely. And so, Sir—I now leave you to your private meditations.

[Exit LOCKIT, Turnkeys, and Con.]

Mac. Man may escape from rope and gun,

Nay, some have outlived the doctor's pill;

Who takes a woman must be undone,

That basilisk is sure to kill.

The fly, that sips treacle, is lost in the sweets,

So he that tastes woman, woman, woman,

He that tastes woman, ruin meets.

To what a woful plight have I brought myself! Here must I (all day long till I am hanged) be confident to hear the reproaches of a wench, who lays her ruin at my door—I am in the custody of her father; and, to be sure, if he knows of the matter, I shall have a fine time on't betwixt this and my execution.—But I promised the wench marriage.—What signifies a promise to a woman? does not man, in marriage itself, promise a hundred things that he never means to perform? Do all we can, women will believe us; for they look upon a promise as an excuse for following their own inclinations.—But here comes Lucy, and I cannot get from her—'would I were deaf!

Enter LUCY.

Lucy. You base man, you!—how can you look me in the face, after what hath passed between us?—Oh, Macheath! thou hast robbed me of my quiet—to see thee tortured would give me pleasure.

Thus, when a good housewife sees a rat,

In her trap in the morning taken,

With pleasure her heart goes pit-a-pat,

In revenge for her loss of bacon.

Then she throws him

To the dog or cat

To be worried, crush'd, and shaken.

Mac. Have you no tenderness, my dear Lucy to see a husband in these circumstances?

Lucy. A husband!

Mac. In every respect but the form, and that, my dear, may be said over us at any time. Friends should not insist upon ceremonies. From a man of honour his word is as good as his bond.

Lucy. It is the pleasure of all you fine men to insult the women you have ruined.

Mac. The very first opportunity, my dear (but have patience,) you shall be my wife in whatever manner you please.

Lucy. Insinuating monster! And so you think I know nothing of the affair of Miss Polly Peachum?—I could tear thy eyes out.

Mac. Sure, Lucy, you can't be such a fool as to be jealous of Polly.

Lucy. Are you not married to her, you brute, you?

Mac. Married! very good. The wench gives it out only to vex thee, and to ruin me in thy good opinion. 'Tis true I go to the house, I chat with the girl, I kiss her, I say a thousand things to her (as all gentlemen do) that mean nothing, to divert myself; and now the silly jade hath set it about that I am married to her, to let me know what she would be at. Indeed, my dear Lucy! those violent passions may be of ill consequence to a woman in your condition.

Lucy. Come, come, captain, for all your assurance, you know that Miss Polly hath put it out of your power to do me the justice you promised me.

Mac. A jealous woman believes every thing her passion suggests. To convince you of my sincerity, if we can find the ordinary, I shall have no scruples of making you my wife; and I know the consequence of having two at a time.

Lucy. That you are only to be hanged, and so get rid of them both.

Mac. I am ready, my dear Lucy! to give you satisfaction—if you think there is any in marriage.—What can a man of honour say more?

Lucy. So then it seems you are not married to Miss Polly?

Mac. You know, Lucy, the girl is prodigiously conceited: no man can say a civil thing to her, but (like other fine ladies) her vanity makes her think he's her own for ever and ever.

The first time at the looking glass

The mother sets her daughter,

The image strikes the smiling lass

With self-love ever after.

Each time she looks, she, fonder grown,

Thinks every charm grows stronger;

But, alas, vain maid! all eyes but your own

Can see you are not younger.

When women consider their own beauties, they are all alike unreasonable in their demands; for they expect their lovers should like them as long as they like themselves.

Lucy. Yonder is my father—Perhaps this way we may light upon the ordinary, who shall try if you will be as good as your word—for I long to be made an honest woman. [Exeunt.]

Enter PEACHUM, and LOCKIT, with an account-book.

Lockit. In this last affair, brother Peachum, we are agreed. You have consented to go halves in Macheath.

Peach. We shall never fall out about an execution. But as to that article, pray how stands your last year's account?

Lockit. If you will run your eye over it, you'll find 'tis fair and clearly stated.

Peach. This long arrear of the government is very hard upon us. Can it be expected that we should hang our acquaintance for nothing, when our betters will hardly save theirs without being paid for it? Unless the people in employment pay better, I promise them for the future I shall let other rogues live besides their own.

Lockit. Perhaps, brother, they are afraid those matters may be carried too far. We are treated too by them with contempt, as if our profession were not reputable.

Peach. In one respect indeed our employments may be reckoned dishonest, because, like great statesmen, we encourage those who betray their friends.

Lockit. Such language, brother, any where else might turn to your prejudice. Learn to be more guarded, I beg you.

When you censure the age,
Be cautious and sage,
Lest the courtiers offended should be;
If you mention vice or bribe,
'Tis so pat to all the tribe,
Each cries—That was level'd at me.

Peach. Here's poor Ned Clincher's name, I see: sure, brother Lockit, there was a little unfair proceeding in Ned's case; for he told me in the condemned hold, that, for value received, you had promised him a session or two longer without molestation.

Lockit. Mr. Peachum—this is the first time my honour was ever called in question.

Peach. Business is at an end—if once we act dishonestly, Lockit. Who accuses me?

Peach. You are warm, brother.

Lockit. He that attacks my honour, attacks my livelihood—and this usage—Sir—is not to be borne.

Peach. Since you provoke me to speak—I must tell you too, that Mrs. Coaxer charges you with defrauding her of her information money for the apprehending of Curl-pated Hugh. Indeed, in deed, brother, we must punctually pay our spies, or we shall have no information.

Lockit. Is this language to me, sirrah—who have saved you from the gallows, sirrah!

[They collar each other.]
Peach. If I am hanged it shall be for ridding the world of an arrant rascal.

Lockit. This hand shall do the office of the halter you deserve, and throttle you—you dog!

Peach. Brother, brother—we are both in the wrong—we shall be both losers in the dispute—for you know we have it in our power to hang each other. You should not be so passionate.

Lockit. Nor you so provoking.

Peach. 'Tis our mutual interest, 'tis for the interest of the world, we should agree. If I said any thing, brother, to the prejudice of your character, I ask pardon.

Lockit. Brother Peachum—I can forgive as well as resent—Give me your hand; suspicion does not become a friend.

Peach. I only meant to give you occasion to justify yourself. But I must now step home, for I expect the gentleman about his snuff-box that Filch nimmed two nights ago in the Park. I appointed him at this hour. [Exit.]

Enter LUCY.

Lockit. Whence come you, hussy?

Lucy. My tears might answer that question.

Lockit. You have been whimpering and fondling like a spaniel, over the fellow that hath abused you.

Lucy. One can't help love; one can't cure it. 'Tis not in my power to obey you and hate him.

Lockit. Learn to bear your husband's death like a reasonable woman; 'tis not the fashion now-a-days so much as to affect sorrow upon these occasions. No woman would ever marry if she had not the chance of mortality for a release. Act like a woman of spirit, hussy, and thank your father for what he is doing.

Lucy. Is then his fate decreed, Sir,

Such a man can I think of quitting?

When first we met, so moves me yet,

O see how my heart is splitting!

Lockit. Look ye, Lucy, there is no saving him—so I think you must even do like other widows—buy yourself weeds, and be cheerful.

You'll think, ere many days ensue,

This sentence not severe;

I hang your husband, child, 'tis true,

But with him hang your care.

Twang dang dillo dee.

Like a good wife, go moan over your dying husband: that, child, is your duty—Consider, girl, you can't have the man and the money too—so make yourself as easy as you can, by getting all you can from him. [Exit.

Enter MACHEATH.

Lucy. Though the ordinary was out of the way to-day, I hope, my dear, you will, upon the first opportunity, quiet my scruples.—Oh, Sir! my father's hard heart is not to be softened, and I am in the utmost despair.

Mac. But if I could raise a small sum—would not twenty guineas, think you, move him?—Of all the arguments in the way of business, the perquisite is the most prevailing.—Money, well-timed, and properly applied, will do anything.

If you at an office expect your due,

And would'nt have matters neglected,

You must quicken the clerk with perquisite too,

To do what his duty directed:

Or would you the frowns of a lady prevent,

She too has that palpable failing;

The perquisite softens her into consent,

That reason with all is prevailing.

Lucy. What love or money can do shall be done; for all my comfort depends upon your safety.

Enter POLLY.

Polly. Where is my dear husband?—Was a rope ever intended for this neck?—Oh let me throw me throw my arms about it, and throttle thee with love!—Why dost thou turn away from me!—'tis thy Polly—'tis thy wife.

Mac. Was ever such an unfortunate rascal as I am?

Lucy. Was there ever such another villain?

Polly. Oh, Macheath! was it for this we parted?—Taken! imprisoned! tried! hanged!—Cruel reflection! I'll stay with thee till death—no force shall tear thy dear wife from thee now.—

What means my love?—not one kind word! not one kind look!—Think what thy Polly suffers to see thee in this condition!

Mac. I must disown her. [Aside.] The wench is distracted!

Lucy. Am I then bilked of my virtue? Can I have no reparation? Sure men were born to lie, and woman to believe them! Oh, villain! villain!

Polly. Am I not thy wife?—Thy neglect o me, thy aversion to me, too severely proves it.—Look on me—tell me, am I not thy wife?

Lucy. Perfidious wretch!

Polly. Barbarous husband!

Lucy. Hadst thou been hanged five months ago, I had been happy.

Polly. If you had been kind to me till death, it would not have vexed me—and that's no very unreasonable request (though from a wife) to a man who hath not above seven or eight days to live.

Lucy. Art thou, then, married to another? Hast thou two wives, monster?

Mac. If woman's tongue can cease for an answer—hear me.

Lucy. I wont.—Flesh and blood can't bear my usage!

Polly. Shall not I claim my own? Justice bids me speak.

Mac. How happy could I be with either

Were t'other dear charmer away!

But while ye thus tease me together,

To neither a word will I say;

But toll de roll, &c.

Polly. Sure, my dear, there ought to be some preference shown to a wife—at least she may claim the appearance of it. He must be distracted with misfortunes, or he could not use me thus.

Lucy. Oh villain! villain! thou hast deceived me!—I could even inform against thee with pleasure.—Not a prude wishes more heartily to have facts against her intimate acquaintance, than I now wish to have facts against thee. I would have her satisfaction, and they should all out.

Polly. I'm bubbled.

Lucy. I'm bubbled.

Polly. Oh, how I'm troubled!

Lucy. Bamboozled and bit!

Polly. My distresses are doubled.

Lucy. When you come to the tree, should the hangman refuse, These fingers, with pleasure, could fasten the noose.

Polly. I'm bubbled, &c.

Mac. Be pacified, my dear Lucy—this is all a fetch of Polly's, to make me desperate with you, in case I get off. If I am hanged, she would fain have the credit of being thought my widow.—Really, Polly, this is no time for a dispute of this sort; for whenever you are talking of marriage, I am thinking of hanging.

Polly. And hast thou the heart to persist in disowning me?

Mac. And hast thou the heart to persist in persuading me that I am married? Why, Polly, dost thou seek to aggravate my misfortunes?

Lucy. Really, Miss Peachum, you do but expose yourself; besides, 'tis barbarous in you to worry a gentleman in his circumstances.

Polly. Cease your funning,

Force or cunning

Never shall my heart trepan;
 All these sallies
 Are but malice,
 To seduce my constant man.
 'Tis most certain,
 By their flirting,
 Women oft have envy shown;
 Pleas'd to ruin
 Others' wooing,
 Never happy in their own!

Decency, Madam, methinks, might teach you to behave yourself with some reserve to the husband, while his wife is present.

Mac. But, seriously, Polly, this is carrying the joke a little too far.

Lucy. If you are determined, Madam, to raise a disturbance in the prison, I shall be obliged to send for the turnkey, to show you the door. I am sorry, Madam, you force me to be so ill-bred.

Polly. Give me leave to tell you, Madam, these forward airs don't become you in the least, Madam; and my duty, Madam, obliges me to stay with my husband, Madam.

Lucy. Why, how now, Madam Flirt?
 If you thus must chatter,
 And are for flinging dirt,
 Let's try who best can spatter,
 Madam Flirt!

Polly. Why, how now, saucy jade?
 Sure the wench is tipsy?
 How can you see me made { To him.
 The scoff of such a gipsy?
 Saucy jade! { To her.

Enter PEACHUM.

Peach. Where's my wench? Ah, hussy, hussy!—Come home, you slut! and when your fellow is hanged, hang yourself, to make your family some amends.

Polly. Dear, dear father! do not tear me from him.—I must speak—I have more to say to him.—Oh, twist thy fetters about me, that he may not haul me from thee! { To MACHEATH.

Peach. Sure, all women are alike! if ever they commit one folly, they are sure to commit another, by exposing themselves.—Away—not a word more.—You are my prisoner, now, hussy.

Polly. No power on earth can e'er divide
 The knot that sacred love hath tied;
 When parents draw against our mind,
 The true love's knot they faster bind.
 Oh, oh, ray, oh Amborah—Oh, oh,
 &c.

{ Holding MACHEATH, PEACHUM pulling her;
exeunt PEACHUM and POLLY.

Mac. I am naturally compassionate, wife, so that I could not use the wench as she deserved, which made you, at first, suspect there was something in what she said.

Lucy. Indeed, my dear, I was strangely puzzled!

Mac. If that had been the case, her father would never have brought me into this circumstance.—No, Lucy, I had rather die than be false to thee!

Lucy. How happy am I, if you say this from your heart! for I love thee so, that I could sooner bear to see thee hanged, than in the arms of another.

Mac. But couldst thou bear to see me hanged?

Lucy. Oh, Macheath! I could never live to see that day!

Mac. You see, Lucy, in the account of love, you are in my debt.—Make me, if possible, love thee more, and let me owe my life to thee.—If you refuse to assist me, Peachum and your father will immediately put me beyond all means of escape.

Lucy. My father, I know, hath been drinking hard with the prisoners, and I fancy he is now taking his nap in his own room.—If I can procure the keys, shall I go off with thee, my dear?

Mac. If we are together, 'twill be impossible to lie concealed. As soon as the search begins to be a little cool, I will send to thee; till then, my heart is thy prisoner.

Lucy. Come then, my dear husband, owe thy life to me; and, though you love me not, be grateful.—But that Polly runs in my head strangely.

Mac. A moment of time may make us unhappy for ever.

Lucy. I like the fox shall grieve,
 Whose mate hath left her side;
 Whom hounds, from morn to eve,
 Chase o'er the country wide.
 Where can my lover hide?
 Where cheat the weary pack?
 If love be not his guide,
 He never will come back. [Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—Newgate.

LOCKIT and LUCY.

Lockit. To be sure, wench, you must have been aiding and abetting to help him in this escape?

Lucy. Sir, here hath been Peachum, and his daughter Polly, and, to be sure, they know the ways of Newgate as well as if they had been born and bred in the place all their lives. Why must all your suspicion light upon me?

Lockit. Lucy, Lucy, I will have none of these shuffling answers!

Lucy. Well then, if I know any thing of him, I wish I may be burned!

Lockit. Keep your temper, Lucy, or I shall pronounce you guilty.

Lucy. Keep yours, Sir—I do wish I may be burned, I do; and what can I say more to convince you?

Lockit. Did he tip handsomely?—How much did he come down with? Come, hussy, don't cheat your father, and I shall not be angry with you—Perhaps, you have made a better bargain with him than I could have done—How much, my good girl?

Lucy. You know, Sir, I am fond of him, and would have given money to have kept him with me.

Lockit. Ah, Lucy! thy education might have put thee more upon thy guard: for a girl, in the bar of an alehouse, is always besieged.

Lucy. If you can forgive me, Sir, I will make a fair confession; for, to be sure, he hath been a most barbarous villain to me!

Lockit. And so you have let him escape, hussy—have you?

Lucy. When a woman loves, a kind look, a tender word, can persuade her to any thing, and I could ask no other bribe. Notwithstanding all he swore, I am now fully convinced, that Polly Peachum is actually his wife—Did I let him escape, fool that I was! to go to her? Polly will wheedle herself into his money; and then Peachum will hang him, and cheat us both.

Lockit. So I am to be ruined because, forsooth, you must be in love!—A very pretty excuse!

Lucy. I could murder that impudent, happy strumpet!—I gave him his life, and that creature enjoys the sweets of it—Ungrateful Macheath!

My love is all madness and folly;

Alone I lie,

Toss, tumble, and cry,

What a happy creature is Polly!

Was e'er such a wretch as I?

With rage I redden like scarlet,

That my dear, inconstant varlet,

Stark blind to my charms,

Is lost in the arms

Of that jilt, that inveigling harlot!

Stark blind to my charms,

Is lost in the arms

Of that jilt, that inveigling harlot!

This, this my resentment alarms.

Lockit. And so, after all this mischief, I must stay here to be entertained with your caterwauling, Mistress Puss!—Out of my sight, wanton strumpet!—You shall fast, and mortify yourself into reason, with now and then a little handsome discipline, to bring you to your senses.—Go!—[Exit Lucy.] Peachum, then, intends to outwit me in this affair, but I'll be even with him!—The dog is leaky in his liquor, so I'll ply him that way, get the secret from him, and turn this affair to my own advantage. Lucy!

Enter Lucy.

Are there any of Peachum's people now in the house?

Lucy. Filch, Sir, is drinking a quartern of strong waters in the next room, with Black Moll.

Lockit. Bid him come to me. [Exit.]

Enter Filch.

What, boy, thou lookest as if thou wert half starved,—like a shotten herring.—But, boy, canst thou tell me where thy master is to be found?

Filch. At his lock, Sir, at the Crooked Billet.

Lockit. Very well—I have nothing more with you. [Exit Filch.] I'll go to him there, for I have many important affairs to settle with him, and in the way of those transactions, I'll artfully get into his secret—so that Macheath shall not remain a day longer out of my clutches. [Exit.]

Enter Lucy.

Lucy. Jealousy, rage, love, and fear, are at once tearing me to pieces. How am I weatherbeaten and shattered with distresses.

I'm like a skiff on the ocean toss'd,
Now high, now low, with each billow borne,
With rudder broke and anchor lost,
Deserted and all forlorn.
While thus I lie rolling and tossing all night,
That Polly lies sporting on seas of delight.
Revenge, revenge, revenge,
Shall appease my restless sprite.

I have the ratsbane ready—But say I were to be hanged—I never could be hanged for any thing that would give me greater comfort than the poisoning that sluit.

Enter Filch.

Filch. Madam, here's Miss Polly come to wait upon you

Lucy. Show her in.

Enter Polly.

Dear Madam! your servant.—I hope you will pardon my passion when I was so happy to see you last—I was so overrun with the spleen, that I was perfectly out of myself; and really when one hath the spleen, every thing is to be excused by a friend.

When a wife's in the pout

(As she's sometimes, no doubt,)

The good husband, as meek as a lamb,

Her vapours to still,

First grants her her will,

And the quieting draught is a dram;

Poor man! and the quieting draught is a dram.

I wish all our quarrels might have so comfortable a reconciliation.

Polly. I have no excuse for my own behaviour, Madam, but my misfortunes—and really, Madam, I suffer too upon your account.

Lucy. But, Miss Polly—in the way of friendship, will you give me leave to propose a glass of cordial to you?

Polly. Strong waters are apt to give me the head-ache.—I hope, Madam, you will excuse me?

Lucy. Not the greatest lady in the land could have better in her closet for her own private drinking.—You seem mighty low in spirits, my dear.

Polly. I am sorry, Madam, my health will not allow me to accept of your offer—I should not have left you in the rude manner I did when we met last, Madam, had not my papa hauled me away so unexpectedly.—I was indeed somewhat provoked, and perhaps might use some expressions that were disrespectful—but really, Madam, the captain treated me with so much contempt and cruelty, that I deserved your pity rather than your resentment.

Lucy. But since his escape, no doubt, all matters are made up again.—Ah, Polly, Polly! 'tis I am the unhappy wife, and he loves you as if you were only his mistress.

Polly. Sure, Madam, you cannot think me so happy as to be the object of your jealousy.—A man is always afraid of a woman who loves him too well.—So that I must expect to be neglected and avoided.

Lucy. Then our cases, my dear Polly, are exactly alike: both of us indeed have been too fond. Indeed, my dear Polly, we are both of us a cup too low; let me prevail upon you to accept of my offer.

Come, sweet lass,
Let's banish sorrow
Till to-morrow;
Come, sweet lass,
Let's take a chirping glass.
Wine can clear
The vapours of despair,
And make us light as air;
Then drink and banish care.

I can't bear, child, to see you in such low spirits—and I must persuade you to what I know will do you good [Exit.]

Polly. All this wheedling of Lucy can't be for nothing—at this time too, when I know she hates me!—The dissembling of a woman is always the forerunner of mischief.—By pouring strong waters down my throat she thinks to pump some secrets out of me—I'll be upon my guard, and wont taste a drop of her liquor, I'm resolved.

Re-enter LUCY, with strong waters.

Lucy. Come, Miss Polly.

Polly. Indeed, child, you have given yourself trouble to no purpose.—You must, my dear, excuse me.

Lucy. Really, Miss Polly, you are as squeamishly affected about taking a cup of strong waters as a lady before company.

Polly. What do I see? Macheath again in custody!—now every glimmering of happiness is lost. [Drops the glass of liquor on the ground.]

Enter LOCKIT, MACHEATH, and PEACHUM.

Lockit. Set your heart at rest, captain.—You have neither the chance of love or money for another escape, for you are ordered to be called down upon your trial immediately.

Peach. Away, hussies!—This is not a time for a man to be hampered with his wives—you see the gentleman is in chains already.

Lucy. O husband, husband! my heart longed to see thee, but to see thee thus distracts me!

Polly. Will not my dear husband look upon his Polly? Why hadst thou not flown to me for protection? with me thou hadst been safe.

Polly. Hither, dear husband, turn your eyes!

Lucy. Bestow one glance to cheer me.

Polly. Think, with that look, thy Polly dies.

Lucy. O shun me not, but hear me!

Polly. 'Tis Polly sues.

Lucy. 'Tis Lucy speaks.

Polly. Is this true love requited?

Lucy. My heart is bursting.

Polly. Mine, too, breaks.

Lucy. Must I—

Polly. Must I be slighted?

Mac. What would you have me say, ladies? You see the affair will soon be at an end, without my disobliging either of you.

Peach. But the settling of this point, captain, might prevent a lawsuit between your two ladies.

Mac. Which way shall I turn me? how can I decide?

Wives, the day of our death, are as fond as a bride.

One wife is too much for most husbands to hear, [bear,

But two at a time, there's no mortal can
This way and that way, and which way
I will,

What would comfort the one, t'other wife would take ill.

Polly. But, if his own misfortunes have made him insensible to mine, a father, sure, will be more compassionate!—Dear, dear Sir! sink the material evidence, and bring him off at his trial—Polly, upon her knees, begs it of you.

When my hero in court appears,
And stands arraign'd for his life,
Then think of poor Polly's tears,
For ah! poor Polly's his wife.

Like the sailor, he holds up his hand,
Distress'd on the dashing wave;
To die a dry death at land
Is as bad as a wat'ry grave.
And alas, poor Polly!
Alack, and well-a-day!
Before I was in love,
Oh! every month was May.

Peach. Set your heart at rest, Polly—your husband is to die to-day; therefore, if you are not already provided, 'tis high time to look about for another.—There's comfort for you, you slut!

Lockit. We are ready, Sir, to conduct you to the Old Bailey.

Mac. The charge is prepar'd, the lawyers are met,

The judges all ranged: (a terrible show!)

I go undismay'd, for death is a debt—

A debt on demand, so take what I owe.

Then farewell, my love—dear charmers, adieu!

Contented I die—'tis the better for you.

Here ends all dispute, for the rest of our lives,

For this way at once, I please all my wives.

Now, gentlemen, I am ready to attend you.

SCENE II.—Another part of the Prison.

Dance of Prisoners in fetters.

SCENE III.—The condemned Cell.

MACHEATH in a melancholy posture.

MEDLEY.

Oh, cruel, cruel, cruel case!

Must I suffer this disgrace?

Of all the friends in time of grief,

When threaten'g death looks grimmer,

Not one so sure can bring relief,

As this best friend, a brimmer. [Drinks.]

Since I must swing—I scorn, I scorn to wince or whine. [Rises.]

But now again, my spirits sink,
I'll raise them high with wine.

[Drinks]

But valour the stronger grows,

The stronger liquor we're drinking;

And how can we feel our woes,

When we've lost the trouble of thinking? [Drinks.]

If thus a man can die,

Much bolder with brandy.

[Pours out a bumper of Brandy.]

So I drink off this bumper—and now I can stand the test,

And my comrades shall see that I die as brave as the best. [Drinks.]

But can I leave my pretty hussies

Without one tear, or tender sigh?

Their eyes, their lips, their bussies,

Recall my love—Ah! must I die?

Since laws were made of every degree,

To curb vice in others, as well as in me,

I wonder we ha'n't better company

Upon Tyburn tree.

But gold from law can take out the sting;

And if rich men, like us, were to swing,

'T would thin the land, such numbers to string

Upon Tyburn tree.

Enter GAOLER.

Gaoler. Some friends of yours, captain, desire to be admitted—I leave you together. [Exit.]

Enter BEN BUDGE and MAT-O'-THE-MINT.

Mac. For my having broke prison, you see, gentlemen, I am ordered immediate execution—The sheriff's officers, I believe, are now at the door. That Jemmy Twitcher should peach me, I own surprised me—'Tis a plain proof that the world is all alike, and that even our gang can no more trust one another than other people; therefore, I beg you, gentlemen, to look well to yourselves, for, in all probability, you may live some months longer.

Mat. We are all heartily sorry, captain, for your misfortune; but 'tis what we must all come to.

Mac. Peachum and Lockit, you know, are infamous scoundrels—their lives are as much in your power, as yours are in theirs—Remember your dying friend—'Tis my last request—Bring those villains to the gallows before you, and I am satisfied.

Mat. We'll do it.

Re-enter GAOLER.

Gaoler. Miss Polly and Miss Lucy entreat a word with you. [Exit.]

Mac. Gentlemen, adieu!

[Exeunt BEN BUDGE and MAT.]

Enter LUCY and POLLY.

My dear Lucy! my dear Polly! whatsoever hath passed between us is now at an end.

TRIO.

Lucy. 'Would I might be hanged!

Polly. And I would so too!

Lucy. To be hang'd with you.

Polly. My dear with you.

Mac. Oh, leave me to thought! I fear, I doubt! I tremble—I droop!—See, my courage is out! [Turns up the empty pot]

Polly. No token of love?

Mac. See, my courage is out! [Turns up the empty bottle.]

Lucy. No token of love?

Polly. Adieu!

Lucy. Farewell!

Mac. But hark! I hear the toll of the bell.

Re-enter GAOLER.

Gaoler. Four women more, captain, with a child a-piece.

Mac. Tell the sheriff's officers I am ready.

Mob. [Within.] A reprieve! a reprieve! [Exeunt.]

Re-enter MACHEATH, POLLY, LUCY, &c.

Mac. So, it seems, I am not left to my choice, but must have a wife at last—Look ye, my dears, we will have no controversy now—Let us give this day to mirth; and, ladies, I hope you will give me leave to present a partner to each of you; and for this time I take Polly for mine—and for life, you slut, for we are really married.

FINALE.

Thus, I stand like a Turk, and his doxies around, [found;]

From all sides, their glances his passion con-
For black, brown, and fair, his inconstancy burns,
And the different beauties subdue him by turns:
Each calls forth her charms, to provoke his desires,

Though willing to all, but with one he retires;
Then think of this maxim, and put off all sorrow,
The wretch of to-day may be happy to-morrow.

CHORUS.

Then think of this maxim, and cast away sorrow,
The wretch of to-day may be happy to-morrow.

GEORGE BARNWELL:

OR,

THE LONDON MERCHANT;

A TRAGEDY,

IN FIVE ACTS.

BY GEORGE LILLO.

REMARKS.

This play was first acted at Drury Lane Theatre, with great success. In the newspapers of the time, we find, that "the queen sent to the play-house in Drury Lane, for the manuscript of George Barnwell, to peruse, which Mr. Wilkes carried to Hampton-court."—It is written in prose well adapted to the subject, and exalted enough to express the sentiments of the characters, which are all thrown into domestic life. The plot is ingenious, and the conduct of it affecting. No lesson can be more necessary to inculcate among the valuable body of youths who are trained to mercantile business, so essential in a commercial country, and who must necessarily have very large trusts confided to them, than this warning, how impossible it will be to avoid the snares of ruin, if they suffer themselves to be drawn into the paths of the harlot, where they will be sure to meet with the most insatiable avarice on one hand, and an unguarded sensibility on the other, which will excite the practice of the most abandoned artifices, and plunge them headlong into vice, infamy, and ruin.

There are authentic instances on record, one of which we subjoin,* wherein this play has raised such horror and contrition, as to produce in servants an immediate return to honourable conduct, and to the confidence and esteem of their employers and friends.

* Extract of a Letter from Mr. Ross, the actor, to a friend.

In the year 1732, during the Christmas holidays, I played George Barnwell, and the late Mrs. Pritchard played Millwood. Doctor Barrowby, physician to St. Bartholomew's Hospital, told me he was sent for by a young gentleman, in Great St. Helex's, apprentice to a very capital merchant. He found him very ill with a slow fever, a heavy hammer pulse, that no medicine could touch. The doctor sent every body out of the room, and told his patient he was sure there was something that oppressed his mind. After much solicitation on the part of the Doctor, the youth confessed there was something lay heavy at his heart; but that he would sooner die than

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Room in THOROWGOOD'S House.

Enter THOROWGOOD and TRUEMAN.True. Sir, the packet from Genoa is arrived.[Gives letters.]Thorow. Heaven be praised! the storm that threatened our royal mistress, pure religion, liberty, and laws, is for a time diverted. By this means, time is gained to make such preparation on our part, as may, Heaven concurring, prevent his malice, or turn the meditated mischief on himself.True. He must be insensible indeed, who is not affected when the safety of his country is concerned. Sir, may I know by what means? If I am not too bold—Thorow. Your curiosity is laudable; and I gratify it with the greater pleasure, because from thence you may learn how honest merchants, as such, may sometimes contribute to the safety of their country, as they do at all times to its happiness; that if hereafter you should be tempted to any action that has the appearance of vice or meanness in it, upon reflecting on the dignity of our profession, you may with honest scorn reject whatever is unworthy of it.True. Should Barnwell, or I, who have the benefit of your example, by our ill conduct bring any imputation on that honourable name, we must be left without excuse.Thorow. You compliment, young man, [TRUEMAN bows respectfully.] Nay, I'm not offended. As the name of merchant never degrades the gentleman, so by no means does it exclude him: only take heed not to purchase the character of complaisant at the expense of your sincerity.True. Sir, have you any commands for me at this time?Thorow. Only look carefully over the files, to see whether there are any tradesmen's bills unpaid; if there are, send and discharge 'em. We must not let artificers lose their time, so useful to the public and their families, in unnecessary attendance.[Exit TRUEMAN.]Enter MARIA.

Well, Maria, have you given orders for the entertainment? I would have it in some measure worthy the guests. Let their be plenty and of the best, that the courtiers may at least commend our hospitality.

Maria. Sir, I have endeavoured not to wrong your well-known generosity by an ill-timed parsimony.Thorow. Nay, 'twas a needless caution; I have no cause to doubt your prudence.Maria. Sir, I find myself unfit for conversation. I should but increase the number of the company, without adding to their satisfaction.Thorow. Nay, my child, this melancholy must not be indulged.Maria. Company will but increase it. I wish you would dispense with my presence. Solitude best suits my present temper.Thorow. You are not insensible, that it is chiefly on your account these noble lords do me the honour so frequently to grace my board. Should you be absent, the disappointment may make them repent of their condescension, and think their labour lost.Maria. He that shall think his time or honour lost in visiting you, can set no real value on your daughter's company, whose only merit is that she is yours. The man of quality who chooses to converse with a gentleman and merchant of your worth and character, may confer honour by so doing, but he loses none.Thorow. Come, come, Maria, I need not tell you, that a young gentleman may prefer your conversation to mine, and yet intend me no disrespect at all; for, though he may lose no honour in my company, 'tis very natural for him to expect more pleasure in yours. I remember the time when the company of the greatest and wisest man in the kingdom, would have been insipid and tiresome to me, if it had deprived me of an opportunity of enjoying your mother's.Maria. Yours, no doubt, was as agreeable to her: for generous minds know no pleasure in society but where 'tis mutual.Thorow. Thou knowest I have no heir, no child but thee; the fruits of many years' successful industry must all be thine. Now it would give me pleasure, great as my love, to see on whom you will bestow it. I am daily solicited by men of the greatest rank and merit for leave to address you; but I have hitherto declined it, in divulge it, as it must be his ruin if it was known. The doctor assured him, if he would make him his confidant, he would by every means in his power serve him. After much conversation, he told the doctor, he was the second son to a gentleman of good fortune in Hertfordshire; that he had made an improper acquaintance with a kept mistress of a captain of an Indiaman, then abroad; that he was within a year of being out of his time, and had been entrusted with cash, drafts, and notes, which he had made free with, to the amount of two hundred pounds. That going two or three nights before to Drury Lane, to see Ross and Mrs. Pritchard, in their characters of George Barnwell and Millwood, he was so forcibly struck, he had not enjoyed a moment's peace since, and wished to die, to avoid the shame he saw hanging over him. The doctor asked where his father was? He replied, he expected him there every minute, as he was sent for by his master upon his being taken so very ill. The doctor desired the young gentleman to make himself perfectly easy, as he would undertake his father should make all right. The father soon arrived. The doctor took him into another room, and, after explaining the whole cause of his son's illness, begged him to save the honour of his family, and the life of his son. The father, with tears in his eyes, gave him a thousand thanks, said he would step to his banker, and bring the money. While the father was gone, Doctor Barrowby went to his patient, and told him every thing would be settled in a few minutes, to his ease and satisfaction. What is very extraordinary, the doctor told me, that in a few minutes after he communicated this news to his patient, upon feeling of his pulse, without the help of any medicine, he was quite another creature. The father returned with notes to the amount of £200 which he put into his son's hands—they wept, kissed, embraced. The son soon recovered, and lived to be a very eminent merchant. Doctor Barrowby never told me the name; but the story he mentioned often in the green-room of Drury Lane Theatre; and after telling it one night when I was standing by, he said to me, "You have done some good in your profession, more, perhaps, than many a clergyman who preached last Sunday"—for the patient told the doctor, that the play raised such horror and contrition in his soul, that he would, if it would please God to raise a friend to extricate him out of that distress, dedicate the rest of his life to religion and virtue. Though I never knew his name, or saw him of my knowledge, I had for nine or ten years, at my benefit, a note sealed up with ten guineas, and these words, "A tribute of gratitude from one who was highly obliged, and saved from ruin, by seeing Mr. Ross's performance of Barnwell."

hopes that, by observation, I should learn which way your inclination tends; for, as I know love to be essential to happiness in the marriage state, I had rather my approbation should confirm your choice than direct it.

Maria. What can I say? How shall I answer as I ought this tenderness, so uncommon even in the best of parents? But you are without example; yet, had you been less indulgent, I had been most wretched. That I look on the crowd of courtiers that visit here, with equal esteem, but equal indifference, you have observed, and I must needs confess; yet, had you asserted your authority, and insisted on a parent's right to be obeyed, I had submitted, and to my duty sacrificed my peace.

Thorow. From your perfect obedience in every other instance, I feared as much; and therefore would leave you without a bias in an affair wherein your happiness is so immediately concerned.

Maria. Whether from a want of that just ambition that would become your daughter, or from some other cause, I know not; but I find high birth and titles don't recommend the man who owns them to my affections.

Thorow. I would not that they should, unless his merit recommends him more. A noble birth and fortune, though they make not a bad man good yet they are a real advantage to a worthy one, and place his virtues in the fairest light.

Maria. I cannot answer for my inclinations; but they shall ever be submitted to your wisdom and authority. And as you will not compel me to marry where I cannot love, love shall never make me act contrary to my duty. Sir, have I your permission to retire?

Thorow. I'll see you to your chamber.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Room in MILLWOOD'S House.

Enter MILLWOOD and LUCY.

Mill. How do I look to-day, Lucy?

Lucy. O, killingly, Madam! A little more red, and you'll be irresistible!—But why this more than ordinary care of your dress and complexion! What new conquest are you aiming at?

Mill. A conquest would be new indeed!

Lucy. Not to you, who make 'em every day—but to me—Well, 'tis what I'm never to expect—unfortunate as I am—But your wit and beauty—

Mill. First made me a wretch, and still continue me so. Men, however generous and sincere to one another, are all selfish hypocrites in their affairs with us; we are no otherwise esteemed or regarded by them, but as we contribute to their satisfaction.

Lucy. You are certainly, Madam, on the wrong side of this argument. Is not the expense all theirs? And I am sure it is our own fault if we ha'n't our share of the pleasure.

Mill. We are but slaves to men.

Lucy. Nay, 'tis they that are slaves most certainly, for we lay them under contribution.

Mill. Slaves have no property; no, not even in themselves; all is the victor's.

Lucy. You are strangely arbitrary in your principles, Madam.

Mill. I would have my conquest complete, like those of the Spaniards in the new world; who first plundered the natives of all the wealth they had, and then condemned the wretches to the mines for life, to work for more.

Lucy. Well, I shall never approve of your scheme of government; I should think it much more politic, as well as just, to find my subjects an easier employment.

Mill. It is a general maxim among the knowing part of mankind, that a woman without virtue, like a man without honour or honesty, is capable of any action, though never so vile; and yet what pains will they not take, what arts not use, to seduce us from our innocence, and make us contemptible and wicked, even in their own opinion? Then is it not just, the villains to their cost, should find us so? But guilt makes them suspicious, and keeps them on their guard; therefore we can take advantage only of the young and innocent part of the sex, who, never having injured women, apprehend no danger from them.

Lucy. Ay, they must be young indeed!

Mill. Such a one I think I have found. As I have passed through the city, I have often observed him receiving and paying considerable sums of money; from thence I conclude he is employed in affairs of consequence.

Lucy. Is he handsome?

Mill. Ay, ay, the stripping is well made, and has a good face.

Lucy. About—

Mill. Eighteen.

Lucy. Innocent, handsome, and about eighteen! You'll be vastly happy. Why, if you manage well, you may keep him to yourself these two or three years.

Mill. If I manage well, I shall have done with him much sooner. Having long had a design on him, and meeting him yesterday, I made a full stop, and gazing wishfully on his face, asked his name. He blushed, and, bowing very low, answered, George Barnwell. I begged his pardon for the freedom I had taken, and told him that he was the person I had long wished to see, and to whom I had an affair of importance to communicate at a proper time and place. He named a tavern; I talked of honour and reputation, and invited him to my house. He swallowed the bait, promised to come, and this is the time I expect him. [Knocking at the door.] Somebody knocks. D'ye hear, I'm at home to nobody to-day but him. [Exit LUCY.] Less affairs must give way to those of more consequence; and I am strangely mistaken if this does not prove of great importance to me, and him too, before I have done with him. Now, after what manner shall I receive him? Let me consider—What manner of person am I to receive? He is young, innocent, and bashful; therefore I must take care not to put him out of countenance at first.

Enter BARNWELL, bowing very low. LUCY at a distance.

Mill. Sir, the surprise and joy!

Barn. Madam!

Mill. This is such a favour— [Advancing.]

Barn. Pardon me, Madam!

Mill. So unhop'd for! [Still advances. BARNWELL salutes her, and retires in confusion.] To see you here—excuse the confusion—

Barn. I fear I am too bold.

Mill. Alas, Sir, I may justly apprehend you think me so. Please, Sir, to sit. I am as much at a loss how to receive this honour as I ought, as I am surprised at your goodness in conferring it.

Barn. I thought you had expected me: I promised to come.

Mill. That is the more surprising: few men are such religious observers of their word.

Barn. All who are honest are.

Mill. To one another; but we simple women are seldom thought of consequence enough to gain a place in their remembrance.

[Laying her hand on his, as by accident.]

Barn. Her disorder is so great, she don't perceive she has laid her hand on mine. Heavens! how she trembles! What can this mean? [Aside.]

Mill. The interest I have in all that relates to you (the reason of which you shall know hereafter) excites my curiosity; and were I sure you would pardon my presumption, I should desire to know your real sentiments on a very particular subject.

Barn. Madam, you may command my poor thoughts on any subject. I have none that I would conceal.

Mill. You'll think me bold.

Barn. No, indeed.

Mill. What then are your thoughts of love?

Barn. If you mean the love of women, I have not thought of it at all. My youth and circumstances make such thoughts improper in me yet. But if you mean the general love we owe to mankind, I think no one has more of it in his temper than myself. I don't know that person in the world, whose happiness I don't wish, and wouldn't promote, were it in my power. In an especial manner, I love my uncle and my master; but above all, my friend.

Mill. You have a friend, then, whom you love?

Barn. As he does me, sincerely.

Mill. He is, no doubt, often blessed with your company and conversation.

Barn. We live in one house, and both serve the same worthy merchant.

Mill. Happy, happy youth! Whoe'er thou art, I envy thee; and so must all who see and know this youth. What have I lost by being formed a woman! I hate my sex, myself. Had I been a man, I might perhaps have been as happy in your friendship, as he who now enjoys it is; but as it is—Oh!

Barn. I never observed woman before; or this is, sure, the most beautiful of her sex. [Aside.] You seem disordered, Madam;—may I know the cause?

Mill. Do not ask me.—I can never speak it, whatever is the cause. I wish for things impossible. I would be a servant, bound to the same master, to live in the same house with you.

Barn. How strange, and yet how kind, her words and actions are! and the effect they have on me is as strange. I feel desires I never knew before; I must begone, while I have power to go. [Aside.] Madam, I humbly take my leave.

Mill. You will not, sure, leave me so soon!

Barn. Indeed, I must.

Mill. You cannot be so cruel! I have prepared a poor supper, at which I promised myself your company.

Barn. I am sorry I must refuse the honour you designed me; but my duty to my master calls me hence. I never yet neglected his service. He is so gentle, and so good a master, that, should I wrong him, though he might forgive me, I should never forgive myself.

Mill. Am I refused by the first man, the second favour I ever stooped to ask? Go then, thou proud, hard-hearted youth; but know, you are the only man that could be found, who would let me sue twice for greater favours.

Barn. What shall I do? How shall I go or stay?

Mill. Yet do not, do not leave me. I with my sex's pride would meet your scorn; but when I look upon you, when I behold those eyes—Oh! spare my tongue, and let my blushes—this flood of tears too, that will force its way, declare—what woman's modesty should hide.

Barn. Oh, heavens! she loves me, worthless as I am. Her looks, her words, her flowing tears, confess it. And can I leave her then? Oh, never, never! Madam, dry up your tears; you shall command me always. I will stay here for ever, if you would have me.

Lucy. So, she has wheeled him out of his virtue of obedience already, and will strip him of all the rest, one after another, till she has left him as few as her ladyship or myself. [Aside.]

Mill. Now you are kind indeed; but I mean not to detain you always; I would have you shake off all slavish obedience to your master; but you may serve him still.

Lucy. Serve him still! Ay, or he'll have no opportunity of fingering his cash; and then he'll not serve your end, I'll be sworn. [Aside.]

Enter BLUNT.

Blunt. Madam, supper's on the table.

Mill. Come, Sir, you'll excuse all defects. My thoughts were too much employed on my guest to observe the entertainment.

[Exit BARN, and MILL.]

Blunt. What, is all this preparation, this elegant supper, variety of wines, and music, for the entertainment of that young fellow?

Lucy. So it seems.

Blunt. How! is our mistress turned fool at last? She's in love with him, I suppose.

Lucy. I suppose not. But she designs to make him in love with her, if she can.

Blunt. What will she get by that? He seems under age, and can't be supposed to have much money.

Lucy. But his master has, and that's the same thing, as she'll manage it.

Blunt. I don't like this fooling with a handsome young fellow; while she's endeavouring to ensnare him, she may be caught herself.

Lucy. Nay, were she like me, that would certainly be the consequence; for, I confess, there is something in youth and innocence that moves me mightily.

Blunt. Yes, so does the smoothness and plumpness of a partridge move a mighty desire in the hawk to be the destruction of it.

Lucy. Why, birds are their prey, and men ours: though, as you observed, we are sometimes caught ourselves. But that, I dare say, will never be the case with our mistress.

Blunt. I wish it may prove so; for you know we all depend upon her. Should she trifle away her time with a young fellow that there's nothing to be got by, we must all starve.

Lucy. There's no danger of that: for I am sure she has no view in this affair but interest.

Blunt. Well, and what hopes are there of success in that?

Lucy. The most promising that can be. 'Tis true, the youth has his scruples; but she'll soon teach him to answer them, by stifling his conscience. Oh, the lad is in a hopeful way, depend upon it. [Exit.

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Room in THOROWGOOD'S House.

Enter BARNWELL.

Barn. How strange are all things round me! Like some thief who treads forbidden ground, and fain would lurk unseen, fearful I enter each apartment of this well-known house. To guilty love, as if that were too little, already have I added breach of trust. A thief! Can I know myself that wretched thing, and look my honest friend and injured master in the face? Though hypocrisy may awhile conceal my guilt, at length it will be known, and public shame and ruin must ensue. In the mean time, what must be my life? Ever to speak a language foreign to my heart; hourly to add to the number of my crimes, in order to conceal 'em. Sure such was the condition of the grand apostate, when first he lost his purity. Like me, disconsolate he wandered; and while yet in heaven, bore all his future hell about him.

Enter TRUEMAN.

True. Barnwell, oh! how I rejoice to see you safe! So will our master, and his gentle daughter; who, during your absence, often inquired after you.

Barn. Would he were gone! His officious love will pry into the secrets of my soul. [Aside.

True. Unless you knew the pain the whole family has felt on your account, you can't conceive how much you are beloved. But why thus cold and silent!—When my heart is full of joy for your return, why do you turn away—why thus avoid me? What have I done? How am I altered since you saw me last? Or rather, what have you done—and why are you thus changed? for I am still the same.

Barn. What have I done, indeed! [Aside.

True. Not speak!—nor look upon me!—

Barn. By my face he will discover all I would conceal. Methinks already I begin to hate him.

[Aside.

True. I cannot bear this usage from a friend; one whom till now I ever found so loving; whom yet I love; though his unkindness strikes at the root of friendship, and might destroy it in any breast but mine.

Barn. I am not well. [Turning to him.] Sleep has been a stranger to these eyes since you beheld 'em last.

True. Heavy they look, indeed, and swol'n with tears;—now they overflow. Rightly did my sympathizing heart forebode last night, when thou wast absent, something fatal to our peace.

Barn. Your friendship engages you too far. My troubles, whatever they are, are mine alone, you have no interest in them, nor ought your concern for me to give you a moment's pain.

True. You speak as if you knew of friendship nothing but the name. Before I saw your grief I felt it. E'en now, though ignorant of the cause, your sorrow wounds me to the heart.

Barn. 'Twill not be always thus. Friendship and all engagements cease as circumstances and occasions vary; and since you once may hate me, perhaps it might be better for us both that now you loved me less.

True. Sure I but dream! Without a cause would Barnwell use me thus? Ungenerous and ungrateful youth, farewell; I shall endeavour to follow your advice. [Going.] Yet, stay; perhaps I am too rash and angry, when the cause demands compassion. Some unforeseen calamity may have befallen him too great to bear.

Barn. What part am I reduced to act? 'Tis vile and base to move his temper thus, the best of friends and men. [Aside.

True. I am to blame; pry'thee forgive me, Barnwell. Try to compose your ruffled mind; and let me know the cause that thus transports you from yourself; my friendly counsel may restore your peace.

Barn. All that is possible for man to do for man your generous friendship may effect; but here, even that's in vain.

True. Something dreadful is labouring in your breast; oh, give it vent, and let me share your grief; 'twill ease your pain, should it admit no cure, and make it lighter by the part I bear.

Barn. Vain supposition! My woes increase by being observed; should the cause be known, they would exceed all bounds.

True. So well I know thy honest heart, guilt cannot harbour there.

Barn. Oh, torture insupportable! [Aside.

True. Then why am I excluded? Have I a thought I would conceal from you?

Barn. If still you urge me on this hated subject, I'll never enter more beneath this roof, nor see your face again.

True. 'Tis strange—but I have done—say but you hate me not.

Barn. Hate you! I am not that monster yet.

True. Shall our friendship still continue?

Barn. It's a blessing I never was worthy of, yet now must stand on terms; and but upon conditions can confirm it.

True. What are they?

Barn. Never hereafter, though you should wonder at my conduct, desire to know more than I am willing to reveal.

True. 'Tis hard; but upon any conditions I must be your friend.

Barn. Then, as much as one lost to himself can be another's, I am yours. [Embracing.]

True. Be ever so; and may Heaven restore your peace! But business requires our attendance: business, the youth's best preservative from ill, as idleness his worst of snares. Will you go with me?

Barn. I'll take a little time to reflect on what has passed, and follow you. [Exit TRUEMAN.] I might have trusted Trueman, and engaged him to apply to my uncle to repair the wrong I have done my master:—but what of Millwood? Yet shall I leave her, for ever leave her, and not let her know the cause? she who loves me with such a boundless passion! Can cruelty be duty? I judge of what she then must feel, by what I now endure. The love of life, and fear of shame, opposed by inclination strong as death or shame, like wind and tide in raging conflict met, when neither can prevail, keep me in doubt. How then can I determine?

Enter THOROWGOOD.

Thorow. Without a cause assigned or notice given, to absent yourself last night was a fault, young man, and I came to chide you for it, but hope I am prevented. That modest blush, the confusion so visible in your face, speak grief and shame. When we have offended Heaven, it requires no more: and shall man, who needs himself to be forgiven, be harder to appease? If my pardon, or love, be of moment to your peace, look up secure of both.

Barn. This goodness has o'ercome me. [Aside.] Oh, Sir, you know not the nature and extent of my offence; and I should abuse your mistaken bounty to receive it. Though I had rather die than speak my shame, though racks could not have forced the guilty secret from my breast, your kindness has.

Thorow. Enough, enough; whate'er it be, this concern shows you're convinced, and I am satisfied. How painful is the sense of guilt to an ingenuous mind; some youthful folly, which it were prudent not to inquire into.

Barn. It will be known, and you'll recall your pardon, and abhor me.

Thorow. I never will. Yet be upon your guard in this gay, thoughtless season of your life: when vice becomes habitual, the very power of leaving it is lost.

Barn. Hear me, on my knees, confess—

Thorow. Not a syllable more upon this subject; it were not mercy, but cruelty, to hear what must give you such torment to reveal.

Barn. This generosity amazes and distracts me!

Thorow. This remorse makes thee dearer to me, than if thou hadst never offended. Whatever is your fault, of this I am certain, 'twas harder for you to offend, than me to pardon. [Exit.]

Barn. Villain! villain! villain! basely to wrong so excellent a man. Should I again return to folly?—Detested thought! But what of Millwood then?—Why, I renounce her—I give her up—The struggle's over, and virtue has prevailed. Reason may convince, but gratitude compels. This unlooked-for generosity has saved me from destruction. [Going.]

Enter a FOOTMAN.

Foot. Sir, two ladies from your uncle in the country desire to see you.

Barn. Who should they be? [Aside.] Tell them I'll wait upon 'em. [Exit FOOT.] Methinks I dread to see 'em—Now, every thing alarms me! Guilt, what a coward hast thou made me! [Exit.]

SCENE I.—Another Room in THOROWGOOD'S House.

Enter MILLWOOD, LUCY, and a FOOTMAN.

Foot. Ladies, he'll wait upon you immediately.

Mill. 'Tis very well—I thank you.

[Exit FOOTMAN.]

Enter BARNWELL.

Barn. Confusion! Millwood!

Mill. That angry look tells me, that here I am an unwelcome guest: I feared as much: the unhappy are so every where.

Barn. Will nothing but my utter ruin content you?

Mill. Unkind and cruel. Lost myself, your happiness is now my only care.

Barn. How did you gain admission?

Mill. Saying we were desired by your uncle to visit and deliver a message to you, we were received by the family without suspicion, and with much respect conducted here.

Barn. Why did you come at all?

Mill. I never shall trouble you more. I'm come to take my leave for ever. Such is the malice of my fate! I go hopeless, despairing ever to return. This hour is all I have left; one short hour is all I have to bestow on love and you, for whom I thought the longest life too short.

Barn. Then we are met to part for ever.

Mill. It must be so. Yet think not that time or absence shall ever put a period to my grief, or make me love you less. Though I must leave you, yet condemn me not.

Barn. Condemn you! No, I approve your resolution, and rejoice to hear it; 'tis just, 'tis necessary;—I have well weighed, and found it so.

Lucy. I am afraid the young man has more sense than she thought he had. [Aside.]

Barn. Before you came, I had determined never to see you more.

Mill. Confusion!

[Aside.]

Lucy. Ay, we are all out; this is a turn so unexpected, that I shall make nothing of my part; they must e'en play the scene betwixt themselves.

[Aside.]

Mill. It was some relief to think, though absent, you would love me still; but to find this, as I never could expect, I have not learned to bear.

Barn. I am sorry to hear you blame me in a resolution that so well becomes us both.

Mill. I have reason for what I do, but you have none.

Barn. Can we want a reason for parting, who have so many to wish we had never met?

Mill. Look on me, Barnwell. Am I deformed or old, that satiety so soon succeeds enjoyment? Nay, look again; am I not she whom yesterday you thought the fairest and the kindest of her sex; whose hand, trembling with ecstasy, you pressed and moulded thus, while on my eyes you gazed with such delight, as if desire increased by being fed?

Barn. No more: let me repent my former follies, if possible, without remembering what they were.

Mill. Why?

Barn. Such is my frailty, that 'tis dangerous.

Mill. Where is the danger, since we are to part.

Barn. The thought of that already is too painful.

Mill. If it be painful to part, then I may hope, at least, you do not hate me.

Barn. No—No—I never said I did—Oh, my heart!

Mill. Perhaps you pity me?

Barn. I do—I do—Indeed I do.

Mill. You'll think upon me!

Barn. Doubt it not, while I can think at all.

Mill. You may judge an embrace at parting too great a favour, though it would be the last. [BARNWELL draws back.] A look shall then suffice—farewell—for ever.

[Exit MILLWOOD and LUCY.]

Barn. If to resolve to suffer be to conquer—I have conquered—Painful victory!

Re-enter MILLWOOD and LUCY.

Mill. One thing I had forgot—I never must return to my own house again. This I thought proper to let you know, lest your mind should change, and you should seek in vain to find me there. Forgive me this second intrusion; I only came to give you this caution, and that perhaps was needless.

Barn. I hope it was; yet it is kind, and I must thank you for it.

Mill. My friend, your arm. [To Lucy.] Now, I am gone for ever. [Going.]

Barn. One thing more—sure there's no danger in knowing where you go? If you think otherwise—

Mill. Alas!

[Weeping.]

Lucy. We are right, I find; that's my cue. [Aside.] Ah, dear Sir, she's going she knows not whither; but go she must.

Barn. Humanity obliges me to wish you well; why will you thus expose yourself to needless troubles?

Lucy. Nay, there's no help for it; she must quit the town immediately, and the kingdom as soon as possible. It was no small matter, you may be sure, that could make her resolve to leave you.

Mill. No more, my friend; since he for whose dear sake alone I suffer, and am content to suffer, is kind and pities me; where'er I wander, through wilds and deserts, benighted and forlorn, that thought shall give me comfort.

Barn. For my sake!—Oh, tell me how, which way am I so cursed to bring such ruin on thee!

Mill. To know it will but increase your troubles.

Barn. My troubles can't be greater than they are.

Lucy. Well, well, Sir, if she wont satisfy you, I will.

Barn. I am bound to you beyond expression.

Mill. Remember, Sir, that I desired you not to hear it.

Barn. Begin and ease my expectation.

Lucy. Why you must know my lady here was an only child, and her parents dying while she was young, left her and her fortune (no inconsiderable one, I assure you) to the care of a gentleman who has a good estate of his own.

Mill. Ay, ay, the barbarous man is rich enough; but what are riches when compared to love!

Lucy. For awhile he performed the office of a faithful guardian, settled her in a house, hired her servants—But you have seen in what manner she has lived, so I need say no more of that.

Mill. How I shall live hereafter, Heaven knows!

Lucy. All things went on as one could wish, till some time ago, his wife dying, he fell violently in love with his charge, and would fain have married her. Now the man is neither old nor ugly, but a good, personable sort of a man; but I don't know it was, she could never endure him. In short, her ill usage so provoked him, that he brought in an account of his executorship, wherein he makes her debtor to him—

Mill. A trifle in itself, but more than enough to ruin me, whom, by this unjust account he had stripped of all before.

Lucy. Now, she having neither money nor friend, except me, who am as unfortunate as herself, he compelled her to pass his account, and give bond for the sum he demanded; and still provided handsomely for her, and continued his courtship, till being informed by his spies (truly, I suspect some in her own family) that you were entertained in her house, and staid with her all night, he came this morning, raving and storming like a madman; talks no more of marriage (so there's no hope of making up matters that way,) but vows her ruin, unless she'll allow him the same favour that he supposes she granted you.

Barn. Must she be ruined, or find a refuge in another's arms?

Mill. He gave me but an hour to resolve in: that's happily spent with you—And now I go—

Barn. To be exposed to all the rigours of the various seasons; the summer's parching heat, and winter's cold; unhoused to wander friendless through the inhospitable world, in misery and want; attended with fear and danger, and pursued by malice and revenge. Wouldst thou endure all this for me, and can I do nothing, nothing, to prevent it?

Lucy. 'Tis really a pity there can be no way found out.

Barn. Oh, where are all my resolutions now?

Lucy. Now, I advised her, Sir, to comply with the gentleman.

Barn. Tormenting fiend, away! I had rather perish, nay, see her perish, than have her saved by him. I will myself prevent her ruin, though with my own. A moment's patience; I'll return immediately. [Exit.]

Lucy. 'Twas well you came, or, by what I can perceive, you had lost him.

Mill. Hush! he's here.

Re-enter BARNWELL, with a bag of money.

Barn. What am I about to do?—Now you, who boast your reason all-sufficient, suppose yourselves in my condition, and determine for me; whether 'tis right to let her suffer for my faults, or, by this small addition to my guilt, prevent the ill effects of what is past.—Here, take this, and with it purchase your deliverance; return to your house, and live in peace and safety.

Mill. So, I may hope to see you there again?

Barn. Answer me not, but fly—lest in the agonies of my remorse, I again take what is not mine to give, and abandon thee to want and misery.

Mill. Say but you'll come.

Barn. You are my fate—my heaven, or my hell; only leave me now—dispose of me hereafter as you please. [Exeunt MILLWOOD and LUCY.] What have I done? Were my resolutions founded on reason, and sincerely made? Why then has heaven suffered me to fall? I sought not the occasion; and if my heart deceives me not, compassion and generosity were my motives.—But why should I attempt to reason? All is confusion, horror, and remorse. I find I am lost, cast down from all my late-erected hope, and plunged again in guilt, yet scarce know how or why—

*Such undistinguish'd horrors make my brain,
Like hell, the seat of darkness and of pain.* [Exit]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Room in THOROWGOOD'S House.

THOROWGOOD and TRUEMAN discovered, with account-books, sitting at a table.

Thorow. Well, I have examined your accounts; they are not only just, as I have always found them, but regularly kept and fairly entered. I commend your diligence: method in business is the surest guide. Are Barnwell's accounts ready for my inspection? He does not use to be the last on those occasions.

True. Upon receiving your orders he retired, I thought, in some confusion. If you please, I'll go and hasten him.

Thorow. I'm now going to the Exchange: let him know, at my return I expect to find him ready. [Exit.

Enter MARIA, with a book. Sits and reads.

Maria. How forcible is truth! The weakest mind, inspired with love of that, fixed and collected in itself, with indifference beholds the united force of earth and hell opposing. Such souls are raised above the sense of pain, or so supported that they regard it not. The martyr cheaply purchases his heaven; small are his sufferings, great is his reward. Not so the wretch who combats love with duty; whose mind, weakened and dissolved by the soft passion, feeble and hopeless, opposes his own desires.—What is an hour, a day, a year of pain, to a whole life of tortures such as these?

Enter TRUEMAN.

True. Oh, Barnwell! Oh, my friend! how art thou fallen!

Maria. Ha! Barnwell! What of him? Speak, say, what of Barnwell?

True. 'Tis not to be concealed: I've news to tell of him that will afflict your generous father, yourself, and all who know him.

Maria. Defend us, Heaven!

True. I cannot speak it. See there.

[Gives a letter.

Maria. [Reads.] I know my absence will surprise my honoured master and yourself, and the more, when you shall understand, that the reason of my withdrawing is, my having embezzled part of the cash with which I was entrusted. After this, 'tis needless to inform you, that I intend never to return again. Though this might have been known by examining my accounts, yet to prevent that unnecessary trouble, and to cut off all fruitless expectations of my return, I have left this from the lost

GEORGE BARNWELL.

True. Lost, indeed! Yet how he should be guilty with what he here charges himself withal, raises my wonder equal to my grief. Never had youth a higher sense of virtue. Justly he thought, and as he thought he practised; never was life more regular than his. An understanding uncommon at his years; an open, generous manliness of temper; his manners easy, unaffected, and engaging.

Maria. This and much more you might have said with truth. He was the delight of every eye, and joy of every heart that knew him.

True. Since such he was, and was my friend, can I support his loss? See, the fairest, happiest maid, this wealthy city boasts, kindly condescends to weep for thy unhappy fate, poor, ruined Barnwell!

Maria. Trueman, do you think a soul so delicate as his, so sensible of shame, can e'er submit to live a slave to vice?

True. Never, never: so well I know him, I'm sure this act of his, so contrary to his nature, must have been caused by some unavoidable necessity.

Maria. Are there no means yet to preserve him?

True. Oh, that there were! But few men recover their reputation lost, a merchant never. Nor would he, I fear, though I should find him, ever be brought to look his injured master in the face.

Maria. I fear as much, and therefore would never have my father know it.

True. That's impossible.

Maria. What's the sum?

True. 'Tis considerable. I've marked it here, to show it, with the letter, to your father, at his return.

Maria. If I should supply the money, could you so dispose of that and the account, as to conceal this unhappy mismanagement from my father?

True. Nothing more easy. But can you intend it? Will you save a helpless wretch from ruin? Oh, 'twere an act worthy such exalted virtue as Maria's! Sure Heaven, in mercy to my friend, inspired the generous thought.

Maria. Doubt not but I would purchase so great a happiness at a much dearer price. But how shall he be found?

True. Trust to my diligence for that. In the mean time I'll conceal his absence from your father, or find such excuses for it, that the real cause shall never be suspected.

Maria. In attempting to save from shame one whom we hope may yet return to virtue, to Heaven, and you, the only witnesses of this action, I appeal whether I do any thing unbecoming my sex and character.

True. Earth must approve the deed, and Heaven, I doubt not, will reward it.

Maria. If Heaven succeeds it, I am well rewarded. A virgin's fame is sullied by suspicion's lightest breath; and, therefore, as this must be a secret from my father and the world, for Barnwell's sake, for mine, let it be so to him. [Exit.

SCENE II.—A Room in MILLWOOD'S House.

Enter LUCY and BLUNT.

Lucy. Well, what do you think of Millwood's conduct now? Her artifice in making him rob his master at first, and the various stratagems by which she has obliged him to continue that course, astonish even me, who know her so well. Being called by his master to make up his accounts, he was forced to quit his house and service, and wisely flies to Millwood for relief and entertainment.

Blunt. How did she receive him?

Lucy. As you would expect. She wondered what he meant, was astonished at his impudence, and, with an air of modesty peculiar to herself, swore so heartily that she never saw him before, that she put me out of countenance.

Blunt. That's much, indeed! But how did Barnwell behave?

Lucy. He grieved; and, at length, enraged at this barbarous treatment, was preparing to be gone; and making towards the door, showed a sum of money, which he had brought from his master's, the last he is ever likely to have from thence.

Blunt. But then, Millwood—

Lucy. Ay, she with her usual address, returned to her old arts of lying, swearing, and dissembling; hung on his neck, wept, and swore twas meant in jest. The amorous youth melted into tears, threw the money into her lap, and swore he had rather die than think her false.

Blunt. Strange infatuation!

Lucy. But what ensued was stranger still. Just then, when every passion with lawless anarchy prevailed, and reason was in the raging tempest lost, the cruel, artful Millwood prevailed upon the wretched youth to promise—what I tremble to think on.

Blunt. I am amazed! What can it be?

Lucy. You will be more so to hear—it is to attempt the life of his nearest relation, and best benefactor.

Blunt. His uncle! whom we have often heard him speak of, as a gentleman of a large estate, and fair character in the country where he lives.

Lucy. The same. She was no sooner possessed of the last dear purchase of his ruin, but her avarice, insatiate as the grave, demanded this horrid sacrifice; Barnwell's near relation, whose blood must seal the dreadful secret, and prevent the terrors of her guilty fears.

Blunt. 'Tis time the world were rid of such a monster. But there is something so horrid in murder, that all other crimes seem nothing, when compared to that; I would not be involved in the guilt of it for all the world!

Lucy. Nor I, Heaven knows. Therefore let us clear ourselves, by doing all that 's in our power to prevent it. I have just thought of a way that to me seems probable. Will you join with me to detect this cursed design?

Blunt. With all my heart. He who knows of a murder intended to be committed, and does not discover it, in the eye of the law and reason, is a murderer.

Lucy. Let us lose no time. I'll acquaint you with the particulars as we go. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—A walk some distance from a country-seat.

Enter BARNWELL.

Barn. A dismal gloom obscures the face of the day. Either the sun has slipped behind a cloud, or journeys down the west of heaven with more than common speed, to avoid the sight of what I am doomed to act. Since I set forth on this accursed design, where'er I tread, methinks the solid earth trembles beneath my feet. Murder my uncle! my father's only brother, and since his death, has been to me a father; that took me up an infant and an orphan, reared me with tenderest care, and still indulged me with most paternal fondness! Yet here I stand, his destined murderer.—I stiffen with horror at my own impiety.—'Tis yet unperformed.—What if I quit my bloody purpose, and fly the place? [Going, then stops.]—But whither, oh, whither shall I fly? My master's once friendly doors are ever shut against me; and without money, Millwood will never see me more; and she has got such firm possession of my heart, and governs there with such despotic sway, that life is not to be endured without her. Ay, there's the cause of all my sin and sorrow: 'tis more than love; it is the fever of the soul, and madness of desire. In vain does nature, reason, conscience, all oppose it; the impetuous passion bears down all before it, and drives me on to lust, to theft, and murder. Oh, conscience, feeble guide to virtue, thou only showest us when we go astray; but wastest power to stop us in our course!—Ha! in yonder shady walk I see my uncle.—He's alone.—Now for my disguise.

[Plucks out a vizard.]—This is his hour of private meditation. Thus daily he prepares his soul for heaven, while I—But what have I to do with heaven?—Ha! no struggles, conscience—

Hence hence, remorse, and ev'ry thought that's good;

The storm that lust began, must end in blood.

[Puts on a vizard, draws a pistol, and exit.]

SCENE IV.—A close walk in a wood.

Enter UNCLE.

Uncle. If I were superstitious, I should fear some danger lurked unseen, or death were nigh. A heavy melancholy clouds my spirits. My imagination is filled with ghastly forms of dreary graves, and bodies changed by death; when the pale, lengthened visage attracts each weeping eye, and fills the musing soul at once with grief and horror, pity and aversion. I will indulge the thought. The wise man prepares himself for death by making it familiar to his mind. When strong reflections hold the mirror near, and the living in the dead behold their future self, how does each inordinate passion and desire cease, or sicken at the view! The mind scarce moves! the blood, curdling and chilled, creeps slowly through the veins; fixed, still, and motionless we stand, so like the solemn objects of our thoughts, we are almost at present what we must be hereafter; till curiosity awakes the soul, and sets it on inquiry.

Enter GEORGE BARNWELL, at a distance.

Oh, death! thou strange, mysterious power, seen every day, yet never understood but by the incommunicative dead, what art thou? The extensive mind of man, that with a thought circles the earth's vast globe, sinks to the centre, or ascends above the stars; that worlds exotic finds, or thinks it finds; thy thick clouds, attempts to pass in vain; lost and bewildered in the horrid gloom, defeated, she returns more doubtful than before, of nothing certain but of labour lost.

[During this speech, BARNWELL sometimes presents the pistol, and draws it back again.]

Barn. Oh, 'tis impossible!

[Throws down the pistol. UNCLE starts, and attempts to draw his sword.]

Uncle. A man so near me! armed and masked—

Barn. Nay, then there's no retreat.

[Plucks a poniard from his breast, and stabs him.]

Uncle. Oh, I am slain! All gracious Heaven, regard the prayer of thy dying servant; bless, with the choicest blessings, my dearest nephew; forgive my murderer; and take my fleeting soul to endless mercy!

[BARNWELL throws off his mask, runs to him, and kneeling by him, raises him.]

Barn. Expiring saint! Oh, murdered, martyred uncle! lift up your dying eyes, and view your nephew in your murderer.—Oh, do not look so tenderly upon me—Let indignation lighten from your eyes, and blast me ere you die—By Heaven, he weeps, in pity of my woes.—Tears, tears, for blood.—The murdered, in the agonies of death, weeps for his murderer.—Oh, speak your pious purpose; pronounce your pardon then, and take me with you—He would, but cannot.—Oh, why with such fond affection do you press my murdering hand?—[UNCLE sighs, and dies.] Life, that hovered on his lips but till he had sealed my pardon, in that sigh expired! He's gone for ever—and oh! I follow—[Swoons away upon the dead body.] Do I still breathe, and taint with my infectious breath the wholesome air? Let Heaven from its high throne, in justice or in mercy, now look down on that dear, murdered saint, and me the murderer, and if his vengeance spares, let pity strike, and end my wretched being.—Murder, the worst of crimes, and parricide, the worst of murders, and this the worst of parricides!

Oh may it ever stand alone accurst,
The last of murders, as it is the worst. [Exit.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Room in THOROWGOOD'S House.

Enter MARIA, meeting TRUEMAN.

Maria. What news of Barnwell?

True. None; I have sought him with the greatest diligence, but all in vain.

Maria. Does my father yet suspect the cause of his absence?

True. All appeared so just and fair to him, it is not possible he ever should. But his absence will no longer be concealed. Your father is wise; and though he seems to hearken to the friendly excuses I would make for Barnwell, yet I am afraid he regards 'em only as such, without suffering them to influence his judgment.

Enter THOROWGOOD and LUCY.

Thorow. This woman here has given me a sad, and, bating some circumstances, too probable an account of Barnwell's defection.

Lucy. I am sorry, Sir, that my frank confession of my former unhappy course of life should cause you to suspect my truth on this occasion.

Thorow. It is not that; your confession has in it all the appearance of truth. Among many other particulars, she informs me that Barnwell has been influenced to break his trust, and wrong me, at several times, of considerable sums of money. Now, as I know this to be false, I would fain doubt the whole of her relation, too dreadful to be willingly believed.

Maria. Sir, your pardon; I find myself on a sudden so indisposed that I must retire. Poor, ruined Barnwell! Wretched, lost Maria!

[Aside; exit.]

Thorow. How am I distressed on every side! Pity for that unhappy youth, fear for the life of a much valued friend—and then my child—the only joy and hope of my declining life!—Her melancholy increases hourly, and gives me painful apprehensions of her loss—Oh, Trueman, this person informs me that your friend, at the instigation of an impious woman, is gone to rob and murder his venerable uncle.

True. Oh, execrable deed! I'm blasted with horror at the thought!

Lucy. This delay may ruin all.

Thorow. What to do or think I know not. That he ever wronged me I know is false; the rest may be so too; there's all my hope.

True. Trust not to that; rather suppose all true, than lose a moment's time. Even now the horrid deed may be doing—dreadful imagination!—or it may be done, and we be vainly debating on the means to prevent what is already past.

Thorow. This earnestness convinces me that he knows more than he has yet discovered. What, ho! without there, who waits?

Enter a Servant.

Order the groom to saddle the swiftest horse, and prepare to set out with speed; an affair of life and death demands his diligence. [Exit Servant.] For you, whose behaviour on this occasion I have no time to commend as it deserves, I must engage your further assistance. Return, and observe this Millwood till I come. I have your directions, and will follow you as soon as possible. [Exit Lucy.] Trueman, you I am sure will not be idle on this occasion.

True. He only who is a friend, can judge of my distress. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—MILLWOOD'S House.

Enter MILLWOOD.

Mill. I wish I knew the event of his design. The attempt without success would ruin him.—Well, what have I to apprehend from that? I fear too much. The mischief being only intended, his friends, through pity of his youth, turn all their rage on me. I should have thought of that before. Suppose the deed done; then and then only I shall be secure—Or what if he returns without attempting it at all—

Enter BARNWELL, bloody.

But he is here, and I have done him wrong. His bloody hands show he has done the deed, but show he wants the prudence to conceal it.

Barn. Where shall I hide me? Whither shall I fly to avoid the swift unerring hand of justice?

Mill. Dismiss your fears; though thousands had pursued you to the door, yet, being entered here, you are as safe as innocence. I have a cavern by heart so cunningly contrived, that the piercing eyes of jealousy and revenge may search in vain, nor find the entrance to the safe retreat. There will I hide you, if any danger's near.

Barn. Oh, hide me—from myself, if it be possible: for while I bear my conscience in my bosom, though I were hid where man's eye never saw, nor light ere dawned, 'twere all in vain. For, oh, that innate, that impartial judge, will try, convict, and sentence me for murder, and execute me with never-ending torments. Behold these hands all crimsoned o'er with my dear uncle's blood. Here's a sight to make a statue start with horror, or turn a living man into a statue!

Mill. Ridiculous! Then it seems you are afraid of your own shadow, or, what is less than a shadow, your conscience.

Barn. Though to man unknown I did the accursed act, what can hide me from Heaven's all-seeing eye?

Mill. No more of this stuff! What advantage have you made by his death: or what advantage may yet be made of it? Did you secure the keys of his treasure, which no doubt were about him? What gold, what jewels, or what else of value have you brought me?

Barn. Think you I added sacrilege to murder! Oh, had you seen him as his life flowed from him in a crimson flood, and heard him praying for me by the double name of nephew and of murderer; (alas, alas, he knew not then that his nephew was his murderer!) how would you have wished, as I did, though you had a thousand years of life to come, to have given them all to have lengthened his one hour. But being dead, I fled the sight of what my hands had done; nor could I, to have gained the empire of the world, have violated by theft his sacred corpse.

Mill. Whining, preposterous, canting villain! to murder your uncle, rob him of life; nature's first, last, dear prerogative, after which there's no injury, then fear to take what he no longer wanted, and bring to me your penury and guilt. Do you think I'll hazard my reputation, nay my life, to entertain you?

Barn. Oh, Millwood!—this from thee?—But I have done—If you hate me, if you wish me dead, then are you happy; for, oh, 'tis sure my grief will quickly end me.

Mill. In this madness he will discover all, and involve me in his ruin. We are on a precipice, from whence there's no retreat for both. Then to preserve myself—[Pauses.]—There is no other way. 'Tis dreadful; but reflection comes too late when danger's pressing, and there's no room for choice. It must be done.

[Aside; rings a bell.]

Enter a Servant.

Fetch me an officer, and seize this villain. He has confessed himself a murderer. Should I let him escape, I might justly be thought as bad as he.

[Exit Servant.]

Barn. Oh, Millwood! sure you do not, you cannot mean it. Stop the messenger; upon my knees, I beg you'd call him back. 'Tis fit I die, indeed, but not by you. I will this instant throw myself into the hands of justice, indeed I will; for death is all I wish. But thy ingratitude so tears my wounded soul, 'tis worse ten thousand times than death with torture.

Mill. Call it what you will; I am willing to live, and live secure, which nothing but your death can warrant.

Barn. If there be a pitch of wickedness that sets the author beyond the reach of vengeance, you must be secure. But what remains for me, but a dismal dungeon, hard galling fetters, an awful trial, and an ignominious death, justly to fall, unpitied and abhorred? This I could bear, nay wish not to avoid, had it but come from any hand but thine.

Enter BLUNT, Officer, and Attendants.

Mill. Heaven defend me! conceal a murderer! here, Sir, take this youth into your custody, I accuse him of murder, and will appear to make good my charge.

[They seize him.]

Barn. To whom, or what, or how, shall I complain? I'll not accuse her. The hand of Heaven is in it, and this the punishment of lust and parricide.

Be warn'd, ye youths, who see my sad despair;

Avoid lewd women, false as they are fair.

By my example, learn to shun my fate,

(How wretched is the man who's wise too late!)

Ere innocence, and fame, and life be lost,

Here purrse wisdom cheaply at my cost.

[Exit BARNWELL, Officer, and Attendants.]

Mill. Where's Lucy? why is she absent at such a time?

Blunt. Would I had been so too! Lucy will soon be here; and I hope to thy confusion, thou devil!

Mill. Insolent! this to me!

57*

Blunt. The worst that we know of the devil is; that he first seduces to sin, and betrays to punishment.

[Exit BLUNT.]

Mill. They disapprove of my conduct then. My ruin is resolved. I see my danger, but scorn both it and them. I was not born to fall by such weak instruments.

[Going.]

Enter THOROWGOOD.

Thorow. Where is the scandal of her own sex, and curse of ours?

Mill. What means this insolence? whom do you seek for?

Thorow. Millwood!—

Mill. Well, you have found her then, I am Millwood!

Thorow. Then you are the most impious wretch that e'er the sun beheld!

Mill. From your appearance I should have expected wisdom and moderation; but your manners belie your aspect. What is your business here? I know you not.

Thorow. Hereafter you may know me better. I am Barnwell's master.

Mill. Then you are master to a villain; which, I think, is not much to your credit.

Thorow. Had he been as much above thy arts, as my credit is superior to thy malice, I need not have blushed to own him.

Mill. My arts! I don't understand you, Sir. If he has done amiss, what's that to me? was he my servant, or yours? you should have taught him better.

Thorow. Why should I wonder to find such uncommon impudence in one arrived to such a height of wickedness? know, sorceress, I'm not ignorant of any of the arts, by which you first deceived the unwary youth. I know how, step by step, you've led him on, reluctant and unwilling, from crime to crime, to this last horrid act; which you contrived, and by your cursed wiles even forced him to commit.

Mill. Ha! Lucy has got the advantage, and accused me first. Unless I can turn the accusation, and fix it upon her and Blunt, I am lost.

[Aside.]

Thorow. Had I known your cruel design sooner, it had been prevented. To see you punished, as the law directs, is all that now remains. Poor satisfaction! For he, innocent as he is, compared to you, must suffer too.

Mill. I find, Sir, we are both unhappy in our servants. I was surprised at such ill treatment without cause, from a gentleman of your appearance, and therefore too hastily returned it, for which I ask your pardon. I now perceive you have been so far imposed on, as to think me engaged in a former correspondence with your servant, and some way or other accessory to his undoing.

Thorow. I charge you as the cause, the sole cause, of all his guilt, and all his suffering, of all he now endures, and must endure, till a violent and shameful death shall put a dreadful period to his life and miseries together.

Mill. 'Tis very strange! But who's secure from scandal and detraction? So far from contributing to his ruin, I never spoke to him till since this fatal accident, which I lament as much as you. 'Tis true I have a servant, on whose account he hath of late frequented my house. If she has abused my good opinion of her, am I to blame? Has not Barnwell done the same by you?

Thorow. I hear you. Pray go on.

Mill. I have been informed he had a violent passion for her, and she for him; but till now I always thought it innocent. I know her poor, and given to expensive pleasures. Now, who can tell but she may have influenced the amorous youth to commit this murder, to supply her extravagancies—it must be so. I now recollect a thousand circumstances that confirm it. I'll have her, and a man-servant whom I suspect as an accomplice, secured immediately. [Offers to go.]

Thorow. Madam, you pass not this way. I see your design, but shall protect them from your malice.

Mill. I hope you will not use your influence, and the credit of your name, to screen such guilty wretches. Consider, Sir, the wickedness of persuading a thoughtless youth to such a crime!

Thorow. I do—and of betraying him when it was done.

Mill. That which you call betraying him, may convince you of my innocence. She who loves him, though she contrived the murder, would never have delivered him into the hands of justice, as I, struck with horror at his crimes, have done.

Thorow. How should an unexperienced youth escape her snares? Even I, that with just prejudice came prepared, had by her artful story been deceived, but that my strong conviction of her guilt makes even a doubt impossible. [Aside.] Those whom subtly you would accuse, you know are your accusers; and, which proves unanswerably their innocence and your guilt, they accused you before the deed was done, and did all that was in their power to prevent it.

Mill. Sir, you are very hard to be convinced; but I have a proof, which, when produced, will silence all objection. [Exit MILLWOOD.]

Enter LUCY, TRUEMAN, BLUNT, Officers, &c.

Lucy. Gentlemen, pray place yourselves, some on one side of that door, and some on the other; watch her entrance, and act as your prudence shall direct you. This way; [To THOROWGOOD.] and note her behaviour; I have observed her; she's driven to the last extremity, and is forming some desperate resolution. I guess at her design.

Re-enter MILLWOOD with a pistol, TRUEMAN secures her.

True. Here thy power of doing mischief ends, deceitful, cruel, bloody woman!

Mill. Fool, hypocrite, villain, man! Thou canst not call me that.

True. To call these woman were to wrong thy sex, thou devil.

Mill. That imaginary being is an emblem of thy cursed sex collected. A mirror, wherein each particular man may see his own likeness, and that of all mankind.

Thorow. Think not, by aggravating the faults of others, to extenuate thy own, of which the abuse of such uncommon perfections of mind and body is not the least.

Mill. If such I had, well may I curse your barbarous sex, who robbed me of 'em ere I knew their worth; then left me, too late, to count their value by their loss.—Another, and another spoiler came, and all my gain was poverty and reproach. My soul disdained, and yet disdains, dependence and contempt. Riches, no matter by what means obtained, I saw secured the worst of men from both; I found it therefore necessary to be rich, and to that end summoned all my arts. You call 'em wicked; be it so; they were such as my conversation with your sex had furnished me withal.

Thorow. Sure none but the worst of men conversed with thee!

Mill. Men of all degrees, and all professions, I have known, yet found no difference, but in their several capacities; all were alike, wicked to the utmost of their power. What are your laws of which you make your boast, but the fool's wisdom, and the coward's valour, the instrument and screen of all your villainies? By them you punish in others what you act yourselves, or would have acted, had you been in their circumstances. The judge, who condemns the poor man for being a thief, had been a thief himself had he been poor.—Thus you go on deceiving and deceived, harassing, plaguing, and destroying one another. But women are your universal prey:

Women, by whom you are, the source of joy,

With cruel arts you labour to destroy:

A thousand ways our ruin you pursue,

Yet blame in us those arts first taught by you.

Oh, may from hence each violated maid,

By flattering, faithless, barbarous man betray'd,

When robb'd of innocence and virgin fame,

From your destruction raise a nobler name;

T'avenge their sex's wrongs devote their mind

And future Millwood's prove to plague mankind.

[Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Dungeon. A table, and a lamp.
BARNWELL reading.

Enter THOROWGOOD, at a distance.

Thorow. There see the bitter fruits of passion's detested reign, and sensual appetite indulged: severe reflections, penitence, and tears.

Barn. My honoured, injured master, whose goodness has covered me a thousand times with shame, forgive this last unwilling disrespect. Indeed I saw you not.

Thorow. 'Tis well; I hope you are better employed in viewing of yourself; your journey's long, your time for preparation almost spent. I sent a reverend divine to teach you to improve it, and should be glad to hear of his success.

Barn. The word of truth which he recommended for my constant companion in this my sad retirement, has at length removed the doubts I laboured under. From thence I have learned the infinite extent of heavenly mercy. How shall I describe my present state of mind? I hope in doubt, and trembling I rejoice; I feel my grief increase, even as my fears give way. Joy and gratitude now supply more tears than the horror and anguish of despair before.

Thorow. These are the genuine signs of true repentance; the only preparatory, the certain way to everlasting peace.

Barn. What do I owe for all your generous kindness? But though I cannot, Heaven can and will reward you.

Thorow. To see thee thus, is joy too great for words. Farewell.—Heaven strengthen thee!—Farewell.

Barn. Oh, Sir, there's something I would say, if my sad swelling heart would give me leave.

Thorow. Give it vent awhile and try.

Barn. I had a friend—'tis true I am unworthy—yet methinks your generous example might persuade. Could I not see him once, before I go from whence there's no return?

Thorow. He's coming, and as much thy friend as ever. I will not anticipate his sorrow; too soon he'll see the sad effects of this contagious ruin.—This torrent of domestic misery bears too hard upon me. I must retire, to indulge a weakness I find impossible to overcome. [Aside.] Much loved—and much lamented youth!—Farewell.—Heaven strengthen thee!—Eternally farewell.

Barn. The best of masters, and of men—Farewell. While I live let me not want your prayers.

Thorow. Thou shalt not. Thy peace being made with Heaven, death is already vanquished. Bear a little longer the pains that attend this transitory life, and cease from pain for ever. [Exit.]

Barn. Perhaps I shall. I find a power within, that bears my soul above the fears of death, and, spite of conscious shame and guilt, gives me a taste of pleasure more than mortal.

Enter TRUEMAN.

Barn. Trueman!—My friend, whom I so wished to see; yet, now he's here, I dare not look upon him. [Weeps.]

True. Oh, Barnwell, Barnwell!

Barn. Mercy! mercy! gracious Heaven! For death, but not for this, was I prepared.

True. What have I suffered since I saw thee last! What pain has absence given me!—But oh, to see thee thus!—

Barn. I know it is dreadful! I feel the anguish of thy generous soul—But I was born to murder all who love me. [Both weep.]

True. I come not to reproach you; I thought to bring you comfort. Oh, had you trusted me when first the fair seducer tempted you, all might have been prevented.

Barn. Alas, thou knowest not what a wretch I've been. Breach of friendship was my first and least offence. So far was I lost to goodness, so devoted to the author of my ruin, that had she insisted on my murdering thee—I think—I should have done it.

True. Pr'ythee, aggravate thy faults no more.

Barn. I think I should! Thus good and generous as you are, I should have murdered you!

True. We have not yet embraced, and may be interrupted. Come to my arms.

Barn. Never, never, will I taste such joys on earth; never will I sooth my just remorse. Are those honest arms and faithful bosom fit to embrace and support a murderer? These iron fetters only shall clasp, and flinty pavement bear me; [Throwing himself on the ground.] even these are too good for such a bloody monster.

True. Shall fortune sever those whom friendship joined? Thy miseries cannot lay thee so low, but love will find thee. Here will we offer to stern calamity; this place the altar, and ourselves the sacrifice. Our mutual groans shall echo to each other through the dreary vault; our sighs shall number the moments as they pass; and mingling tears communicate such anguish, as words were never made to express.

Barn. Then be it so. [Rising.] Since you propose an intercourse of wo, pour all your griefs into my breast, and in exchange take mine. [Em- bracing.] Where's now the anguish that you promised? Oh, take, take some of the joy that overflows my breast!

True. I do, I do. Almighty Power! how hast thou made us capable to bear at once the extremes of pleasure and of pain!

Enter KEEPER.

Keep. Sir.

True. I come.

[Exit KEEPER.]

Barn. Must you leave me? Death would soon have parted us for ever.

True. Oh, my Barnwell, there's yet another task behind. Again your heart must bleed for others' woes.

Barn. To meet and part with you, I thought was all I had to do on earth. What is there more for me to do or suffer?

True. I dread to tell thee, yet it must be known! Maria—

Barn. Our master's fair and virtuous daughter?

True. The same.

Barn. No misfortune, I hope, has reached that maid! Preserve her, Heaven, from every ill, to show mankind that goodness is your care!

True. Thy, thy misfortunes, my unhappy friend have reached her ear. Whatever you and I have felt, and more, if more be possible, she feels for you.

Barn. This is indeed the bitterness of death.

[Aside.]

True. You must remember (for we all observed it) for some time past, a heavy melancholy seized her down. Disconsolate she seemed, and pined and languished from a cause unknown; till, hearing of your dreadful fate, the long stifled flame blazed out, and in the transport of her grief discovered her own lost state, while she lamented yours.

Barn. [Weeping.] Why did you not let me die, and never know it?

True. It was impossible. She makes no secret of her passion for you; she is determined to see you ere you die, and waits for me to introduce her.

[Exit.]

Barn. Vain, busy thoughts, be still! What avails it to think on what I might have been? I am now what I've made myself.

Re-enter TRUEMAN, with MARIA.

True. Madam, reluctant I lead you to this dismal scene. This is the seat of misery and guilt. Here awful justice reserves her public victims. This is the entrance to a shameful death.

Maria. To this sad place then, no improper guest, the abandoned and lost Maria brings despair, and sees the subject and the cause of all this world of wo. Silent and motionless he stands, as if his soul had quitted her abode, and the lifeless form alone was left behind.

Barn. I groan, but murmur not. Just Heaven! I am your own; do with me what you please.

Maria. Why are your streaming eyes still fixed below, as though thou'dst give the greedy earth thy sorrows, and rob me of my due? Were happiness within your power, you should bestow it where you pleased; but in your misery I must and will partake.

Barn. Oh, say not so; but fly, abhor, and leave me to my fate. Consider what you are. So shall I quickly be to you—as though I had never been.

Maria. When I forget you, I must be so indeed: Reason, choice, virtue, all forbid it. Let women, like Millwood, if there are more such women, smile in prosperity, and in adversity forsake. Be it the pride of virtue to repair, or to partake, the ruin such have made.

True. Lovely, ill-fated maid!

Maria. Yes, fruitless is my love, and unavailing all my sighs and tears. Can they save thee from approaching death?—from such a death?—Oh, sorrow insupportable!

Barn. Preserve her, Heaven, and restore her peace, nor let her death be added to my crimes!—
[Bell tolls.] I'm summoned to my fate.

Re-enter KEEPER.

Keep. Sir, the officers attend you. Millwood is already summoned.

Barn. Tell 'em I'm ready. [Exit KEEPER.] And now, my friend, farewell. [Embracing.] Support and comfort, the best you can, this mourning fair. No more—Forget not to pray for me.—
[Turning to MARIA.]—Would you, bright excellence, permit me the honour of a chaste embrace, the last happiness this world could give were mine.—[She inclines towards him; they embrace.]—Exalted goodness! Oh, turn your eyes from earth and me to Heaven, where virtue like yours is ever heard. Pray for the peace of my departing soul! Early my race of wickedness began, and soon I reached the summit. Thus justice, in compassion to mankind, cuts off a wretch like me; by one such example to secure thousands from future ruin.

*If any youth, like you, in future times
Shall mourn my fate, though he abhors my crimes,
Or tender maid, like you, my tale shall hear,
And to my sorrows give a pitying tear;
To each such melting eye and throbbing heart
Would gracious Heaven this benefit impart:
Never to know my guilt, nor feel my pain,
Then must you own you ought not to complain,
Since you nor weep, nor I shall die, in vain.*

[Exit BARNWELL.]

True. In vain
With bleeding hearts, and weeping eyes, we show
A humane, gen'rous sense of others' wo,
Unless we mark what drew their ruin on,
And, by avoiding that, prevent our own.

[The curtain descends to slow music]

THE HYPOCRITE:

A COMEDY

IN FIVE ACTS.

BY ISAAC BICKERSTAFF.

REMARKS.

THIS alteration of Cibber's Nonjuror, by Bickerstaff, was acted at Drury Lane, 1768. The ingenious alterer says, in his preface, that he should be under no obligation to answer objections to his play, being accountable for none of its faults, as he claims none of its beauties.

The Nonjuror, written to expose a party, would not interest the present age, because the folly and roguery it was designed to ridicule no longer exist; but the substitution, for Doctor Wolf, of the Tartuffe of Moliere: (Doctor Cantwell of the Hypocrite) has rendered it agreeable to modern times. Little more than the character of Mawworm was written by Bickerstaff, and that principally for the sake of the comic talent of Weston.

It is a valuable trait of this comedy, that it carefully distinguishes between rational piety, and the hypocrisy-fanaticism, and outrageous pretensions to sanctity, which it so severely satirises.

SCENE.—London.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Hall in SIR JOHN LAMBERT'S House.

Enter SIR JOHN LAMBERT and COLONEL LAMBERT.

Col. L. Pray consider, Sir.

Sir J. So I do, Sir, that I am her father, and will dispose of her as I please.

Col. L. I do not dispute your authority, Sir; but as I am your son too, I think it my duty to be concerned for your honour. Have not you countenanced his addresses to my sister? has not she received them?—Mr. Darnley's birth and fortune are well known to you; and I dare swear, he may defy the world to lay a blemish on his character.

Sir J. Why then, Sir, since I am to be catechised, I must tell you I do not like his character; he is a world-server, a libertine, and has no more religion than you have.

Col. L. Sir, we neither of us think it proper to make a boast of our religion; but, if you please to inquire, you will find that we go to church as orderly as the rest of our neighbours.

Sir J. Oh, you go to church! you go to church! —Wonderful! wonderful! to bow, and grin, and cough, and sleep: a fine act of devotion indeed.

Col. L. Well but, dear Sir—

Sir J. Colonel, you are an Atheist.

Col. L. Pardon me, Sir, I am none: it is a character I abhor; and next to that, I abhor the character of an enthusiast.

Sir J. Oh, you do so; an enthusiast!—this is the fashionable phrase, the bye-word, the nickname, that our pleasure-loving generation give to those few who have a sense of true sanctity.

Col. L. Say, canting, Sir.

Sir J. I tell you what, son, as I have told you more than once, you will draw some heavy judgment on your head one day or other.

Col. L. So says the charitable Doctor Cantwell; you have taken him into your house, and in return he gives over half your family to the devil.

Sir J. Do not abuse the doctor, colonel; it is not the way to my favour. I know you cannot bear him, because he is not one of your mincing preachers.—He holds up the glass to your enormities shows you to yourselves in your genuine colours

Col. L. I always respect piety and virtue, Sir; but there are pretenders to religion, as well as to courage; and as we never find the truly brave to be such as make much noise about their valour; so, I apprehend, the truly good seldom or never deal much in grimace.

Sir J. Very well, Sir; this is very well.

Col. L. Besides, Sir, I would be glad to know, by what authority the doctor pretends to exercise the clerical function. It does not appear clearly to me that he ever was in orders.

Sir J. That is no business of yours, Sir.—But, I am better informed.—However, he has the call of zeal.

Col. L. Zeal!

Sir J. Why, colonel, you are in a passion.

Col. L. I own I cannot see with temper, Sir, so many religious mountebanks impose on the unwary multitude; wretches, who make a trade of religion, and show an uncommon concern for the next world, only to raise their fortunes with greater security in this.

Sir J. Colonel, let me hear no more; I see you are too hardened to be converted now: but since you think it your duty, as a son, to be concerned for my errors, I think it as much mine, as a father, to be concerned for yours. If you think fit to amend them, so; if not, take the consequence.

Col. L. Well, Sir, may I ask you, without offence, if the reasons you have given me are your only reasons for discountenancing Mr. Darnley's addresses to my sister?

Sir J. Are they not flagrant? would you have me marry my daughter to a Pagan?

Col. L. He intends this morning paying his respects to you, in hopes to obtain your final consent; and desired me to be present as a mediator of articles between you.

Sir J. I am glad to hear it.

Col. L. That's kind indeed, Sir.

Sir J. May be not, Sir; for I will not be at home when he comes: and because I will not tell a lie for the matter, I'll go out this moment.

Col. L. Nay, dear Sir—

Sir J. And, do you hear—because I will not deceive him either, tell him I would not have him lose his time in fooling after your sister.—In short, I have another man in my head for her. [Exit.]

Col. L. Another man! It would be worth one's while to know him: pray Heaven this canting hypocrite has not got some beggarly rascal in his eye for her. I must rid the house of him at any rate, or all the settlement I can hope for from my father is a castle in the air.—My sister may be ruined too—here she comes. If there be another man in the case, she, no doubt, can let me into the secret.

Enter CHARLOTTE.

Sister, good morrow; I want to speak with you.

Char. Pr'ythee then, dear brother, don't put on that wise, politic face, as if your regiment was going to be disbanded, or sent to the West Indies, and you obliged to follow it.

Col. L. Come, come, a truce with your railery: what I have to ask of you is serious, and I beg you would be so in your answer.

Char. Well, then, provided it is not upon the subject of love, I will be so—but make haste too—for I have not had my tea yet.

Col. L. Why it is, and it is not, upon that subject.

Char. Oh, I love a riddle dearly—Come—let's hear it.

Col. L. Nay, pshaw! if you will be serious, say so.

Char. O lard, Sir! I beg your pardon—there—there's my whole form and features, totally disengaged and lifeless, at your service; now, put them in what posture of attention you think fit.

[Leans on him awkwardly.]

Col. L. Was there ever such a giddy devil!—Pr'ythee, stand up. I have been talking with my father, and he declares positively you shall not receive any further addresses from Mr. Darnley.

Char. Are you serious?

Col. L. He said so this minute, and with some warmth.

Char. I am glad on't, with all my heart.

Col. L. How! glad!

Char. To a degree. Do you think a man has any more charms for me for my father's liking him? no, Sir, if Mr. Darnley can make his way to me now, he is obliged to me, and to me only. Besides, now it may have the face of an amour indeed, now one has something to struggle for; there's difficulty, there's danger, there's the dear spirit of contradiction in it too—Oh! I like it mightily.

Col. L. I am glad this does not make you think the worse of Darnley—but my father's consent might have clapped a pair of horses more to your coach perhaps, and the want of it may pinch your fortune.

Char. Burn fortune; am not I a fine woman? and have not I twenty thousand pounds in my own hands?

Col. L. Yes, sister; but with all your charms, you have had them in your hands almost these four years.

Char. Pshaw! and have not I had the full swing of my own airs and humours these four years? but if I humour my father, I warrant he'll make it three or four thousand more, with some unlicked lout—a comfortable equivalent, truly!—No, no; let him light his pipe with his consent, if he please. Wilful against wise for a wager.

Col. L. But pray, sister, has my father ever proposed any other man to you?

Char. Another man! let me know why you ask, and I'll tell you.

Col. L. Why, the last words he said to me were, that he had another man in his head for you.

Char. And who is it? who is it? tell me, dear brother.

Col. L. Why, you don't so much as seem surprised.

Char. No; but I'm impatient, and that's as well.

Col. L. Why how now, sister?

Char. Why sure, brother, you know very little of female happiness, if you suppose the surprise of a new lover ought to shock a woman of my temper—don't you know that I am a coquette?

Col. L. If you are, you are the first that ever was sincere enough to own her being so.

Char. To a lover, I grant you; but not to you; I make no more of you than a sister: I can say any thing to you.

Col. L. I should have been better pleased, if you had not owned it to me—it's a hateful character.

Char. Ay, it's no matter for that, it's violently pleasant, and there's no law against it, that I know of.

Col. L. Darnley's like to have a hopeful time with you.

Char. Well, but don't you really know who it is my father intends me?

Col. L. Not I, really; but I imagined you might, and therefore thought to advise with you about it.

Char. Nay, he has not opened his lips to me yet—are you sure he is gone out?

Col. L. You are very impatient to know, methinks; what have you to do to concern yourself about any man but Darnley?

Char. O lud! O lud! prythee brother don't be so wise; if you had an empty house to let, would you be displeas'd to hear there were two people about it? besides, to be a little serious, Darnley has a tincture of jealousy in his temper, which nothing but a substantial rival can cure.

Col. L. Oh, your servant, Madam! now you talk reason. I am glad you are concern'd enough for Darnley's faults, to think them worth your mending; ha, ha!

Char. Concern'd! why, did I say that?—look you, I'll deny it all to him—well, if ever I'm serious with him again—

Col. L. Here he comes; be as merry with him as you please.

Enter DARNLEY.

Darn. My dear colonel, your servant.

Col. L. I am glad you did not come sooner; for in the humour my father left me, 'twould not have been a proper time for you to have press'd your affair—I touch'd upon't—but—I'll tell you more presently; in the meantime lose no ground with my sister.

Darn. I shall always think myself oblig'd to your friendship, let my success be what it will—Madam—your most obedient—what have you got there, pray!

Char. [Reading.] "Her lively looks a sprightly mind disclose;

Quick as her eyes, and as unfix'd as those—"

Darn. Pray, Madam, what is't?

Char. "Favours to none, to all she smiles extends—"

Darn. Nay, I will see.

Char. "Oft she rejects, but never once offends."

Col. L. Have a care; she has dipped into her own character, and she'll never forgive you, if you don't let her go through with it.

Darn. I beg your pardon, Madam.

Char. "Bright as the sun her eyes the gazers strike,

And like the sun they shine on all alike." Um—um—

Darn. That is something like indeed.

Col. L. You would say so, if you knew all.

Darn. All what? pray what do you mean?

Col. L. Have a little patience; I'll tell you immediately.

Char. "If to her share some female errors fall, Look on her face—and you'll forget them all." Is not that natural, Mr. Darnley?

Darn. For a woman to expect, it is indeed.

Char. And can you blame her, when 'tis at the same time a proof of the poor man's passion and her power?

Darn. So that you think the greatest compliment a lover can make his mistress, is to give up his reason to her.

Char. Certainly; for what have your lordly sex to boast of but your understanding, and till that's entirely surrendered to her discretion, while the least sentiment holds out against her, a woman must be downright vain to think her conquest completed!

Darn. There we differ, Madam; for, in my opinion, nothing but the most excessive vanity could value or desire such a conquest.

Char. Oh, d'ye hear him, brother? the creature reasons with me; nay, has the effrontery to think me in the wrong too! O lud! he'd make a horrid tyrant—positively I won't have him.

Darn. Well, my comfort is, no other man will easily know whether you'll have him or not.

Char. Am I not a vain, silly creature, Mr. Darnley?

Darn. A little bordering upon the baby, I must own.

Char. Laud! how can you love a body so then? but I don't think you love me though—do you?

Darn. Yes, faith, I do; and so shamefully, that I'm in hopes you doubt it.

Char. Poor man! he'd fain bring me to reason.

Darn. I would indeed.—Nay, were it but possible to make you serious only when you should be so, I should think you the most amiable—

Char. O lud! he's civil—

Darn. Come, come, you have good sense; use me but with that, and make me what you please.

Char. Laud! I don't desire to make any thing of you, not I.

Darn. Come then, be generous, and swear at least you'll never marry another.

Char. Ah, laud! now you have spoiled all again:—besides, how can I be sure of that, before I have seen this other man my brother spoke to me of?

Darn. What riddle's this?

Col. L. I told you, you did not know all. To be serious, my father went out but now, on purpose to avoid you.—In short, he absolutely retracts his promises; says, he would not have you fool away your time after my sister; and in plain terms told me, he had another man in his head for her.

Darn. Another man! who? what is he? did not he name him?

Col. L. No; nor has he yet spoke of him to my sister.

Darn. This is unaccountable!—what can have given him this sudden turn?

Col. L. Some whim our conscientious doctor has put in his head, I'll lay my life.

Darn. He! he can't be such a villain; he professes a friendship for me.

Col. L. So much the worse.

Darn. But on what pretence, what grounds, what reason, what interest, can he have to oppose me?

Col. L. Are you really now as unconcern'd as you seem to be?

Char. You are a strange dunce, brother—you know no more of love than I do of a regiment—You shall see now how I'll comfort him—Poor Darnley, ha, ha, ha!

Darn. I don't wonder at your good humour, Madam, when you have so substantial an opportunity to make me uneasy for life.

Char. O lud! how sentimental he is! well, his reproaches have that greatness of soul—the confusion they give is insupportable.—

Enter BETTY.

Betty, is the tea ready?

Bet. Yes, Madam.

Char. Mr. Darnley, your servant.

Col. L. So; you have made a fine piece of work on't, indeed!

Darn. Dear Tom, pardon me if I speak a little freely; I own the levity of her behaviour, at this time, gives me harder thoughts than I once believed it possible to have of her.

Col. L. Indeed, my friend, you mistake her.

Darn. Nay, nay; had she any real concern for me, the apprehensions of a man's addresses, whom yet she never saw, must have alarmed her to some degree of seriousness.

Col. L. Not at all; for let this man be whom he will, I take her levity as a proof of her resolution to have nothing to say to him.

Darn. And pray, Sir, may I not as well suspect, that this artful delay of her good nature to me now, is meant as a provisional defence against my reproaches, in case, when she has seen this man, she should think it convenient to prefer him.

Col. L. No, no; she's giddy, but not capable of so studied a falsehood.

Darn. But still, what could she mean by going away so abruptly?

Col. L. You grew too grave for her.

Darn. Why, who could bear such trifling?

Col. L. You should have laughed at her.

Darn. I can't love at that easy rate.

Col. L. No—if you could, the uneasiness would lie on her side.

Darn. Do you then really think she has any thing in her heart for me?

Col. L. Ay, marry, Sir—ah! if you could but get her to own that seriously now; Lord! how you could love her!

Darn. And so I could, by Heaven!

Col. L. Well, well, I'll undertake for her; if my father don't stand in the way, we are well enough.

Darn. What says my lady? you don't think she's against us?

Col. L. I dare say she is not. She's of so soft, so sweet a disposition—

Darn. Pr'ythee, how came so fine a woman to marry your father, with such a vast inequality of years?

Col. L. Want of fortune, Frank; she was poor and beautiful—he, rich and amorous—she made him happy, and he her—

Darn. A lady—

Col. L. And a jointure—now she's the only one in the family that has power with our precise doctor; and, I dare engage, she'll use it with him to persuade my father from any thing that is against your interest. By the way, you must know I have some shrewd suspicion that this sanctified rogue is in love with her.

Darn. In love!

Col. L. You shall judge by the symptoms—but hush!—here he comes with my grandmother—step this way, and I'll tell you. [Exit.]

Enter DOCTOR CANTWELL, old LADY LAMBERT, and SEWARD.

Dr. C. Charles, step up into my study; bring down a dozen more of those manuals of devotion, with the last hymns I composed; and, when he calls, give them to Mr. Mawworm; and, do you hear, if any one inquires for me, say I am gone to Newgate, and the Marshalsea, to distribute alms.

[Exit SEWARD.]

Old Lady L. Well but, worthy doctor, why will you go to the prisons yourself—cannot you send the money?—ugly distempers are often caught there—have a care of your health; let us keep one good man, at least, amongst us.

Dr. C. Alas, Madam, I am not a good man; I am a guilty, wicked sinner, full of iniquity; the greatest villain that ever breathed; every instant of my life is clouded with stains; it is one continued series of crimes and defilements; you do not know what I am capable of; you indeed take me for a good man; but the truth is, I am a worthless creature.

Old Lady L. Have you then stumbled? alas! if it be so, who shall walk upright? what horrid crime have you been hurried into, that calls for this severe self-accrimination?

Dr. C. None, Madam, that perhaps humanity may call very enormous; yet am I sure, that my thoughts never stray a moment from celestial contemplations? do they not sometimes, before I am aware, turn to things of this earth? am I not often hasty, and surprised into wrath? nay, the instance is recent; for last night, being snarled at and bit by Minxy, your daughter-in-law's lap-dog, I am conscious I struck the little beast with a degree of passion, for which I have never been able to forgive myself since.

Old Lady L. Oh! worthy, humble soul! this is a slight offence, which your suffering and mortifications may well atone for.

Dr. C. No, Madam, no; I want to suffer; I ought to be mortified; and I am obliged now to tell you, that, for my soul's sake, I must quit your good son's family; I am pampered too much here, live too much at my ease.

Old Lady L. Good doctor!

Dr. C. Alas, Madam! it is not you that should shed tears; it is I ought to weep; you are a pure woman.

Old Lady L. I pure! who, I? no, no; sinful, sinful—but do not talk of quitting our family; what will become of us—for friendship—for charity—

Dr. C. Enough; say no more, Madam; I submit; while I can do good, it is my duty.

Enter COLONEL LAMBERT and DARNLEY.

Col. L. Your ladyship's most humble servant.

Old Lady L. Grandson, how do you?

Darn. Good day to you, doctor!

Dr. C. Mr. Darnley, I am your most humble servant; I hope you and the good colonel will stay and join in the private duties of the family.

Old Lady L. No, doctor, no; it is too early; the sun has not risen upon them; but, I doubt not, the day will come.

Dr. C. I warrant, they would go to a play now!

Old Lady L. Would they—I am afraid they would.

Darn. Why, I hope it is no sin, Madam; if I am not mistaken, I have seen your ladyship at a play.

Old Lady L. Me, Sir! see me at a play! you may have seen the prince of darkness, or some of his imps, in my likeness, perhaps—

Darn. Well but, Madam—

Old Lady L. Mr. Darnley, do you think I would commit murder?

Dr. C. No, Sir, no; these are not the plants usually to be met with in that rank soil; the seeds of wickedness indeed sprout up every where too fast; but a playhouse is the devil's hot-bed—

Col. L. And yet, doctor, I have known some of the leaders of your tribe, as scrupulous as they are, who have been willing to gather fruit there for the use of the brethren—as in case of a benefit—

Dr. C. The charity covereth the sin: and it may be lawful to turn the wages of abomination to the comfort of the righteous.

Col. L. Ha, ha, ha!

Dr. C. Reprobate! reprobate!

Col. L. What is that you mutter, sirrah?

Old Lady L. Oh Heavens!

Darn. Let him go, colonel.

Col. L. A canting hypocrite!

Dr. C. Very well, Sir; your father shall know my treatment. [Exit.]

Old Lady L. Let me run out of the house; I shall have it fall upon my head, if I stay among such wicked wretches. O grandson! grandson!

[Exit.]

Darn. Was there ever such an insolent rascal!

Col. L. The dog will one day provoke me to beat his brains out.

Darn. But what the devil is he? whence comes he?—what is his original!—how has he so ingratiated himself with your father, as to get footing in the house?

Col. L. Oh, Sir, he is here in quality of chaplain; he was first introduced by the good old lady that's just gone out. You know, she has been a long time a frequenter of our modern conventicles, where it seems she got acquainted with this sanctified pastor. His disciples believe him a saint; and my poor father, who has been for some time tainted with their pernicious principles, has been led into the same snare.

Darn. Hah! here's your sister again.

Re-enter CHARLOTTE and DOCTOR CANTWELL.

Char. You'll find, Sir, I will not be used thus; nor shall your credit with my father protect your insolence to me.

Col. L. What's the matter?

Char. Nothing; pray be quiet.—I don't want you—stand out of the way—how durst you bolt with such authority into my chamber, without giving me notice?

Darn. Confusion!

Col. L. Hold—if my father wont resent this, 'tis then time enough for me to do it.

Dr. C. Compose yourself, Madam; I came by your father's desire, who, being informed that you were entertaining Mr. Darnley, grew impatient, and gave his positive commands that you attend him instantly, or he himself, he says, will fetch you.

Darn. Ay, now the storm is rising.

Dr. C. So, for what I have done, Madam, I had his authority, and shall leave him to answer you.

Char. 'Tis false. He gave you no authority to insult me; or, if he had, did you suppose I would bear it from you? What is it you presume upon? your function? does that exempt you from the manners of a gentleman?

Dr. C. Shall I have an answer to your father, lady?

Char. I'll send him none by you.

Dr. C. I shall inform him so. [Exit.]

Char. A saucy puppy!

Col. L. Pray, sister, what has the fellow done to you?

Char. Nothing.

Darn. I beg you would tell us, Madam.

Char. Nay, no great matter—but I was sitting carelessly in my dressing-room—a—a fastening my garter, and this impudent cur comes bounce in upon me—

Darn. The rogue must be corrected.

Col. L. Yet, 'egad, I cannot help laughing at the accident; what a ridiculous figure she must make—ha, ha!

Char. Hah! you're as impudent as he, I think.

Darn. Now, dear Tom, speak to her before she goes.

Char. What does he say, brother?

Col. L. Why, he wants to have me speak to you; and I would have him do it himself.

Char. Ay, come, do, Darnley; I am in a good humour now.

Darn. Oh, Charlotte! my heart is bursting—

Char. Well, well; out with it then.

Darn. Your father now, I see, is bent on parting us—nay, what's worse perhaps, will give you to another—I cannot speak—imagine what I want from you.—

Char. Well—O lud! one looks so silly though when one is so serious—O dear,—in short, I cannot get it out.

Col. L. I warrant you; try again.

Char. O lud—well—if one must be teased, then—why, he must hope, I think.

Darn. Is't possible!—thus—

Col. L. Buz—not a syllable; she has done very well.—I bar all heroics; if you press it too far, I'll hold six to four she's off again in a moment.

Darn. I'm silenced.

Char. Now am I on tiptoe to know what odd fellow my father has found out for me.

Darn. I'd give something to know him.

Char. He's in a terrible fuss at your being here, I find.

Col. L. 'Sdeath! here he comes.

Char. Now we are all in a fine pickle.

Enter SIR JOHN LAMBERT hastily; and, looking sternly at DARNLEY, takes CHARLOTTE under his arm, and carries her off. [Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—An Antechamber at SIR JOHN LAMBERT'S.

Enter SEYWARD, with a writing in his hand.

Sey. 'Tis so—I have long suspected where his zeal would end, in the making of his private fortune. But then, to found it on the ruin of his patron's children!—I shudder at the villany! What desperation may a son be driven to, so barbarously disinherited!—Besides, his daughter, fair Charlotte, too, is wronged; wronged in the tenderest point: for so extravagant is this settlement, that it leaves her not a shilling, unless she marries with the doctor's consent; which is intended, by what I have heard, as an expedient to oblige her to marry the doctor himself. Now, 'twere but an honest part to let Charlotte know the snare that's laid for her. This deed's not signed, and may yet be prevented. It shall be so.

Enter SIR JOHN LAMBERT, LADY LAMBERT, and CHARLOTTE.

Sir J. Oh! Seyward, your uncle wants you to transcribe some hymns.

Sey. Sir, I'll wait on him. [Exit.

Char. A pretty, well-bred fellow, that.

Sir J. Ay, ay; but he has better qualities than his good breeding.

Char. He's always clean too.

Sir J. I wonder, daughter, when you will take notice of a man's real merit. Humph—well bred and clean, forsooth. Would not one think now she was describing a coxcomb? When do you hear my wife talk at this rate? and yet she is as young as your fantastical ladyship.

Lady L. Charlotte is of a cheerful temper, my dear; but I know you don't think she wants discretion.

Sir J. I shall try that presently; and you, my dear, shall judge between us. In short, daughter, your course of life is but one continued round of playing the fool to no purpose; and therefore I am resolved to make you think seriously, and marry.

Char. That I shall do before I marry, Sir, you may depend upon it.

Sir J. Um—That I am not so sure of; but you may depend upon my having thought seriously, and that's as well; for the person I intend you is, of all the world, the only man who can make you truly happy.

Char. And, of all the world, Sir, that's the only man I'll positively marry.

Lady L. You have rare courage, Charlotte; if I had such a game to play, I should be frightened out of my wits.

Char. Lord! Madam, he'll make nothing of it, depend upon it. [Aside.

Sir J. Mind what I say to you. This wonderful man, I say—first, in his public character, is religious, zealous, and charitable.

Char. Very well, Sir.

Sir J. In his private character, sober.

Char. I should hate a sot.

Sir J. Chaste.

Char. A hem! [Stifling a laugh.

Sir J. What is it you sneer at, Madam? You want one of your fine gentlemen rakes, I suppose, that are snapping at every woman they meet with.

Char. No, no, Sir; I am very well satisfied.—I—I should not care for such a sort of a man, no more than I should for one that every woman was ready to snap at.

Sir J. No, you'll be secure from jealousy; he has experience, ripeness of years—he is almost forty-nine. Your sex's vanity will have no charms for him.

Char. But all this while, Sir, I don't find that he has charms for our sex's vanity. How does he look? Is he tall, well made? Does he dress, sing, talk, laugh, and dance well? Has he good hair, good teeth, fine eyes? Does he keep a chaise, coach, and vis-a-vis? Has he six prancing ponies? Does he wear the prince's uniform, and subscribe to Brookes's?

Sir J. Was there ever so profligate a creature? What will this age come to?

Lady L. Nay, Charlotte, here I must be against you. Now you are blind indeed. A woman's happiness has little to do with the pleasure her husband takes in his own person.

Sir J. Right

Lady L. It is not how he looks, but how he loves, is the point.

Sir J. Good again.

Lady L. And a wife is much more secure that has charms for her husband, than when the husband has only charms for her.

Sir J. Admirable! go on, my dear.

Lady L. Do you think a woman of five and twenty may not be much happier with an honest man of fifty, than the finest woman of fifty with a young fellow of five and twenty?

Sir J. Mark that!

Char. Ay, but when two five and twenties come together—dear papa, you must allow they have a chance to be fifty times as pleasant and frolicsome.

Sir J. Frolicsome! Why, you sensual idiot, what have frolics to do with solid happiness? I am ashamed of you.—Go, you talk worse than a girl at a boarding-school.—Frolicsome! as if marriage was only a license for two people to play the fool according to law. Methinks, Madam, you have a better example of happiness before your face.—Here's one has ten times your understanding, and she, you find, has made a different choice.

Char. Lord, Sir, how you talk! you don't consider people's tempers. I don't say my lady is not in the right; but then you know, papa, she's a prude, and I am a coquette; she becomes her character very well, I don't deny it; and I hope you see every thing I do, is as consistent with mine.—Your wise people may talk what they will, but 'tis constitution governs us all; and be assured, you will no more be able to bring me to endure a man of forty-nine, than you can persuade my lady to dance in church to the organ.

Sir J. O horrible! My poor sister has ruined her: leaving her fortune in her own hands, has turned her brain. In short, Charlotte, your sentiments of life are shameful, and I am resolved upon your instant reformation: therefore, as an earnest of your obedience, I shall first insist that you never see young Darnley more; for, in one word, the good and pious doctor Cantwell's the man I have decreed for your husband.

Char. Ho, ho, ho!

Sir J. 'Tis very well; this laugh you think becomes you, but I shall spoil your mirth—no more—give me a serious answer.

Char. I ask your pardon, Sir; I should not have smiled indeed, could I suppose it possible that you were serious.

Sir J. You'll find me so.

Char. I'm sorry for it; but I have an objection to the doctor, Sir, that most fathers think a substantial one.

Sir J. Name it.

Char. Why, Sir, we know nothing of his future; he's not worth a groat.

Sir J. That's more than you know, Madam; I am able to give him a better estate than I am afraid you'll deserve.

Char. How, Sir?

Sir J. I have told you what's my will, and shall leave you to think on't.

Enter SEYWARD.

Sey. Sir, if you are at leisure, the doctor desires to speak with you, upon business of importance.

Sir J. Where is he?

Sey. In his own chamber, Sir.

Sir J. I will come to him immediately.—[Exit SEYWARD.—Daughter, I am called away, and therefore have only time to tell you as my last resolution, doctor Cantwell is your husband, or I am no more your father. [Exit.]

Char. O Madam! I am at my wit's end; not for the little fortune I may lose in disobeying my father, but it startles me to find what a dangerous influence this fellow has over all his actions.

Lady L. Here's your brother.

Enter COLONEL LAMBERT.

Col. L. Madam, your most obedient—Well, sister, is the secret out? Who is this pretty fellow my father has picked up for you?

Char. Even our agreeable doctor.

Col. L. You are not serious?

Lady L. He is the very man, I can assure you, Sir.

Col. L. Confusion! what, would the cormorant devour the whole family? Your ladyship knows he is secretly in love with you too.

Lady L. Fy, fy, colonel.

Col. L. I ask your pardon, Madam, if I speak too freely; but I am sure, by what I have seen, your ladyship must suspect something of it.

Lady L. I am sorry any body else has seen it; but I must own, his behaviour to me of late, both in private and before company, has been something warmer than I thought became him.

Col. L. How are these opposites to be reconciled? Can the rascal have the assurance to think both points are to be carried?

Char. Truly, one would not suspect the gentleman to be so termagant.

Col. L. Especially while he pretends to be so shocked at all indecent amours. In the country he used to make the maids lock up the turkey-cocks every Saturday night, for fear they should gallant the hens on a Sunday.

Lady L. Oh! ridiculous!

Col. L. Upon my life, Madam, my sister told me so.

Char. I tell you so, impudent—

Lady L. Fy, Charlotte; he only jests with you.

Char. How can you be such a monster, to stay playing the fool here, when you have more reason to be frightened out of your wits? You don't know perhaps, that my father declares he'll settle a fortune upon this fellow too.

Col. L. What do you mean?

Lady L. 'Tis too true; 'tis not three minutes since he said so.

Col. L. Nay then, 'tis time indeed his eyes were opened; and give me leave to say, Madam, 'tis only in your power.

Lady L. What is 't you propose?

Col. L. Why, if this fellow, which I'm sure of, is really in love with you, give him a fair opportunity to declare it, and leave me to make my advantage.

Lady L. I should be loath to do a wrong thing—

Char. Dear Madam, it is the only way in the world to expose him to my father.

Lady L. I'll think of it.

Col. L. Pray do, Madam; but in the mean time I must leave you—poor Darnley stays for me at the Smyrna, and will sit upon thorns till I bring him an account of his new rival.

Char. Well, well, get you gone then; here is my grandmother. [Exit COLONEL LAMBERT.]

Enter Old LADY LAMBERT.

Lady L. This is kind, Madam; I hope your ladyship's come to dine with us.

Old Lady L. No; don't be afraid; only in my way from Tottenham-court, I just called to see whether any dreadful accident happened to the family since I was here last.

Lady L. Accident! did your ladyship say?

Old Lady L. I shall be sorry, daughter, but not surprised, when I hear it; for there are goings on under this roof, that will bring temporal punishments along with them.

Lady L. Indeed, Madam, you astonish me!

Old Lady L. We'll drop the subject; and I beg leave to address myself to you, Miss Charlotte; I see you have a bit of lace upon your neck; I desire to know what you wear it for.

Char. Wear it for, Madam! it's the fashion.

Old Lady L. In short, I have been at my linen draper's to-day, and have bought you some thick muslin, which I desire you will make handkerchiefs of—for I must tell you that slight covering is indecent, and gives much offence.

Lady L. Indecent, did your ladyship say?

Old Lady L. Yes, daughter-in-law, doctor Cantwell complains to me that he can't sit at table, the sight of her bare neck disturbs him so; and he's a good man, and knows what indecency is.

Char. Yes, indeed, I believe he does, better than any one in this house. But you may tell the doctor from me, Madam, that he is an impudent coxcomb, a puppy, and deserves to have his bones broke.

Old Lady L. Fy, Charlotte, fy! He speaks but for your good, and this is the grateful return you make.

Char. Grateful return, Madam!—how can you be so partial to that hypocrite?—The doctor is one of those who start at a feather.—Poor good man! yet he has his vices of the graver sort—

Old Lady L. Come, come; I wish you would follow his precept, whose practice is conformable to what he teaches.—Virtuous man!—Above all sensual regards, he considers the world merely as a collection of dirt and pebble-stones.—How has he weaned me from temporal connections! My heart is now set upon nothing sublunary: and, I thank Heaven, I am so insensible to every thing in this vain world, that I could see you, my son, my daughters, my brothers, my grandchildren, all expire before me; and mind it no more than the going out of so many snuffs of candle.

Char. Upon my word, Madam, it is a very humane disposition you have been able to arrive at, and your family is much obliged to the doctor for his instructions.

Old Lady L. Well, child, I have nothing more to say to you at present; Heaven mend you, that's all.

Lady L. But pray, Madam, stay and dine with us.

Old Lady L. No, daughter, I have said it, and you know I never tell a lie; but here's my son, if you'll give me leave, I'll stay and speak to him.

Lady L. Your ladyship's time is your own.

Char. Ay, here 's that abominable doctor.—This fellow puts me beyond my patience.

[Exit LADY L. and CHAR.]

Enter SIR JOHN LAMBERT and DOCTOR CANTWELL.

Sir J. Oh, Madam, Madam! I'm glad you're here to join me in solicitations to the doctor.—Here is my mother, friend, my mother; a pious woman; you will hear her, more worthy to advise you than I am.

Dr. C. Alas! the dear good lady, I will kiss her hand!—but what advice can she give me? The riches of this world, Sir, have no charms for me; I am not dazzled with their false glare; and was I, I repeat it, to accept of the trust you want to repose in me, Heaven knows, it would only be lest the means should fall into wicked hands, who would not lay it out as I would do, for the glory of Heaven, and the good of my neighbour.

Old Lady L. What's the matter, son?

Dr. C. Nothing, Madam; nothing.—But you were witness how the worthy colonel treated me this morning—Not that I speak it on my own account—for to be reviled is my portion.

Sir J. O the villain! the villain!

Dr. C. Indeed, I did not think he had so hard a nature.

Old Lady L. Ah! your charitable heart knows not the rancour that is in his.—His wicked sister too, has been here this moment, abusing this good man.

Dr. C. O Sir, 'tis plain; 'tis plain; your whole family are in a combination against me—your son and daughter hate me; they think I stand between them and your favour: and indeed it is not fit I should do so; for, fallen as they are, they are still your children, and I an alien, an intruder, who ought in conscience to retire and heal those unhappy breaches.

Old Lady L. See; if the good man does not wipe his eyes!

Dr. C. Oh Heavens! the thought of their ingratitude wounds me to the quick—but I'll remove this eye-sore—here, Charles!

Enter SEYWARD.

Sir J. For goodness' sake—

Dr. C. Bring me that writing, I gave you to lay up this morning.

Sir J. Make haste, good Charles; it shall be signed this moment. [Exit SEYWARD.]

Dr. C. Not for the world, Sir John—every minute tends to corroborate my last intentions—I must not, will not take it, with the curses of your children.

Sir J. But consider, doctor—shall my wicked son then be heir to my lands, before repentance has entitled him to favour—No, let him depend upon you, whom he has wronged; perhaps, in time he may reflect on his father's justice, and be reconciled to your rewarded virtues.—If Heaven should at last reclaim him, in you I know he still would find a fond, forgiving father.

Dr. C. The imagination of so blessed an hour, softens me to a tenderness I cannot support!

Old Lady L. Oh! the dear good man.

Sir J. With regard to my daughter, doctor, you know she is not wronged by it; because, if she proves not obstinate, she may still be happy.

Old Lady L. Yes, but the perverse wretch fights the blessing you propose for her.

Dr. C. We must allow, Madam, female modesty a time, which often takes the likeness of distress: the commands of your good son might too suddenly surprise her—Maids must be gently dealt with—and might I humbly advise—

Sir J. Any thing you will: you shall govern me and her.

Dr. C. Then, Sir, abate of your authority, and let the matter rest awhile.

Sir J. Suppose we were to get my wife to speak to her; women will often hear, from their own sex, what sometimes, even from the man they like, will startle them.

Dr. C. Then, with your permission, Sir, I will take an opportunity of talking to my lady.

Sir J. She's now in her dressing-room; I'll go and prepare her for it. [Exit.]

Dr. C. You are too good to me, Sir—too bountiful.

Enter SEYWARD.

Sey. Sir, Mr. Mawworm is without, and would be glad to be permitted to speak with you.

Old Lady L. Oh pray, doctor, admit him; I have not seen Mr. Mawworm this great while; he's a pious man, though in an humble estate; desire the worthy creature to walk in.

Enter MAWWORM.

—How do you do, Mr. Mawworm?

Maw. Thank your ladyship's axing—I'm but deadly poorish indeed; the world and I can't agree—I got the books, doctor—and Mrs. Grunt bid me give her service to you, and thanks you for the eighteen-pence.

Dr. C. Hush, friend Mawworm! not a word more; you know I hate to have my little charities blazed about: a poor widow, Madam, to whom I sent my mite.

Old Lady L. Give her this.

[Offers a purse to MAW.]

Dr. C. I'll take care it shall be given to her.

[Takes it.]

Old Lady L. But what is the matter with you, Mr. Mawworm?

Maw. I don't know what's the matter with me—I'm a breaking my heart—I think it's a sin to keep a shop.

Old Lady L. Why if you think it a sin, indeed—pray what's your business?

Maw. We deals in grocery, tea, small-beer, charcoal, butter, brickdust, and the like.

Old Lady L. Well, you must consult with your friendly director here.

Maw. I wants to go a preaching.

Old Lady L. Do you?

Maw. I'm almost sure I have had a call.

Old Lady L. Ay!

Maw. I have made several sermons already; I does them extrumperry, because, I can't write; and now the devils in our alley says, as how my head's turned.

Old Lady L. Ay, devils indeed—but don't you mind them.

Maw. No, I don't—I rebukes them, and preaches to them, whether they will or not. We lets our house in lodgings to single men; and sometimes I gets them together, with one or two of the neighbours, and makes them all cry.

Old Lady L. Did you ever preach in public?

Maw. I got upon Kennington-common, the last review day; but the boys threw brickbats at me and pinned crackers to my tail; and I have been afraid to mount ever since.

Old Lady L. Do you hear this, doctor? throw bricks at him, and pin crackers to his tail! can these things be stood by?

Maw. I told them so—says I, I does nothing claudicently; I stands here contagious to his majesty's guards, and I charge you upon your apparels not to mistle me.

Old Lady L. And had it no effect?

Maw. No more than if I spoke to so many postesses: but if he advises me to go a preaching, and quit my shop, I'll make an exressance further into the country.

Old Lady L. An excursion, you would say.

Maw. I am but a sheep, but my bleatings shall be heard afar off; and that sheep shall become a shepherd: nay, if it be only as it were a shepherd's dog, to bark the stray lambs into the fold.

Old Lady L. He wants method, doctor.

Dr. C. Yes, Madam; but there is the matter, and I despise not the ignorant.

Maw. He's a saint—till I went after him, I was little better than the devil; my conscience was tanned with sin, like a piece of neat's leather, and had no more feeling than the sole of my shoe; always a roving after fantastical delights: I used to go, every Sunday evening, to the Three Hats at Islington! it's a public-house! mayhap, your ladyship may know it: I was a great lover of skittles too, but now I can't bear them.

Old Lady L. What a blessed reformation!

Maw. I believe, doctor, you never know'd as how I was instigated one of the stewards of the reforming society. I convicted a man of five oaths, as last Thursday was a se'nnight, at the Pewter-platter, in the Borough; and another of three, while he was playing trap-ball in St. George's-fields: I bought this waistcoat out of my share of the money.

Old Lady L. But how do you mind your business?

Maw. We have lost almost all our customers; because I keeps extorting them whenever they come into the shop.

Old Lady L. And how do you live?

Maw. Better than ever we did: while we were worldly-minded, my wife and I (for I am married to as likely a woman as you shall see in a thousand) could hardly make things do at all; but since this good man has brought us into the road of the righteous, we have always plenty of every thing; and my wife goes as well dressed as a gentlewoman—we have had a child too.

Old Lady L. Merciful!

Maw. And between you and me, doctor, I believe Susy's breeding again.

Dr. C. Thus it is, Madam; I am constantly told, though I can hardly believe it, a blessing follows wherever I come.

Maw. And yet, if you would hear how the neighbours reviles my wife; saying as how she sets no store by me, because we have words now and then; but as I says, if such was the case, would ever she have cut me down that there time as I was melancholy, and she found me hanging behind the door; I don't believe there's a wife in the parish would have done so by her husband.

Dr. C. I believe 'tis near dinner-time; and Sir John will require my attendance.

Maw. Oh! I am troublesome—nay, I only come to you, doctor, with a message from Mrs. Grunt. I wish your ladyship heartily and heartily farewell; doctor, a good day to you.

Old Lady L. Mr. Mawworm, call on me some time this afternoon; I want to have a little private discourse with you; and, pray, my service to your spouse.

Maw. I will, Madam; you are a malefactor to all goodness; I'll wait upon your ladyship; I will indeed: [Going, returns.] Oh, doctor, that's true; Susy desired me to give her kind love and respects to you. [Exit.]

Dr. C. Madam, if you please, I will lead you into the parlour.

Old Lady L. No, doctor, my coach waits at the door.

Enter SEYWARD.

Dr. C. Charles, you may lay those papers by again, but in some place where you'll easily find them; for I believe we shall have occasion for them some time this afternoon.

Sey. I'll take care, Sir. [Exit DR. CANT. and old LADY LAMBERT.]—Occasion for them this afternoon!—Then there's no time to be lost; the coast is clear, and this is her chamber.—What's the matter with me? the thought of speaking to her throws me into a disorder. There's nobody within; I'll knock again.

Enter BETTY.

Is your lady busy?

Bet. I believe she's only reading, Sir.

Sey. Will you do me the favour to let her know, if she's at leisure, I beg to speak with her upon some earnest business.

Enter CHARLOTTE.

Char. Who's that?

Bet. She's here.—Mr. Seyward, Madam, desires to speak with you.

Char. Oh, your servant, Mr. Seyward.—Here, take this odious Homer, and lay him up again; he tires me.—[Exit BETTY.]—How could the blind wretch make such an horrid fuss about a fine woman, for so many volumes together, and give us no account of her amours? you have read him, I suppose, in the Greek, Mr. Seyward?

Sey. Not lately, Madam.

Char. But do you so violently admire him now?

Sey. The critics say he has his beauties, Madam; but Ovid has been always my favourite.

Char. Ovid—Oh, he is ravishing!

Sey. So art thou, to madness! [Aside.]

Char. Lord! how could one do, to learn Greek!—Were you a great while about it?

Sey. It has been half the business of my life, Madam.

Char. That's cruel, now; then you think one could not be mistress of it in a month or two?

Sey. Not easily, Madam.

Char. They tell me, it has the softest tone for love of any language in the world—I fancy I could soon learn it. I know two words of it already.

Sey. Pray, Madam, what are they?

Char. Stay—let me see—Oh—ay—Zoe kai psuche.

Sey. I hope you know the English of them, Madam.

Char. Oh lud! I hope there is no harm in it—I'm sure I heard the doctor say it to my lady—pray, what is it?

Sey. You must first imagine, Madam, a tender lover gazing on his mistress; and then indeed they have a softness in them; as thus—Zoe kai psuche!—my life! my soul!

Char. Oh the impudent young rogue! how his eyes spoke too! what the deuce can he want with me!

Sey. I have startled her!—she muses! [Aside.]

Char. It always run in my head that this fellow had something in him above his condition; I'll know immediately. [Aside.] Well, but your business with me, Mr. Seyward? you have something of love in your head, I'll lay my life on't.

Sey. I never durst own it, Madam.

Char. Why; what's the matter?

Sey. My story is too melancholy to entertain a mind so much at ease as yours.

Char. Oh, I love melancholy stories of all things:—pray how long have you lived with your uncle, Mr. Seyward?

Sey. With doctor Cantwell, I suppose you mean, Madam?

Char. Ay.

Sey. He's no uncle of mine, Madam.

Char. You surprise me! not your uncle?

Sey. No, Madam; but that's not the only character the doctor assumes, to which he has no right.

Char. Lord! I am concerned for you.

Sey. So you would, Madam, if you knew all.

Char. I am already; but if there are any further particulars of your story, pray let me hear them; and should any services be in my power, I am sure you may command them.

Sey. You treat me with so kind, so gentle a hand, that I will unbosom myself to you.—My father, Madam, was the younger branch of a genteel family in the north; his name Trueman—but dying while I was yet in my infancy, I was left wholly dependant on my mother; a woman really pious and well-meaning, but—in short, Madam, doctor Cantwell fatally got acquainted with her, and as he is now your father's bosom counsellor, soon became hers. She died, Madam, when I was but eight years old; and then I was, indeed, left an orphan.

Char. Melancholy!

Sey. She left doctor Cantwell her sole heir and executor; but I must do her the justice to say, I believe it was in the confirmation that he would take care of, and do justice to me: and, indeed, he has so far taken care of me, that he sent me to a seminary abroad; and for these three years last past has kept me with him.

Char. A seminary! Oh, heavens! but why have you not strove to do yourself justice?

Sey. Thrown so young into his power, as I was—unknown and friendless, but through his means, to whom could I apply for succour? nay, Madam, I will confess, that on my return to England, I was first tainted with his enthusiastic notions myself; and, for some time, as much imposed upon by him, as others; till, by degrees, as he found it necessary to make use of, or totally discard me (which last he did not think prudent to do), I was obliged to unveil myself to me in his proper colours.—And I believe I can inform you of some parts of his private character, that may be the means of detecting one of the wickedest impostors that ever practised upon credulity.

Char. But how has the wretch dared to treat you?

Sey. In his ill and insolent humours, Madam, he has sometimes the presumption to tell me, that I am the object of his charity; and I own, Madam, that I am humbled in my opinion, by his having drawn me into a connivance at some actions, which I can't look back on without horror.

Char. Indeed, you can't tell how I pity you; and depend upon it, it is possible to serve you, by getting you out of the hands of this monster, I will.

Sey. Once more, Madam, let me assure you, that your generous inclination would be a consolation to me in the worst misfortunes; and, even in the last moment of painful death, would give my heart a joy.

Char. Lord! the poor unfortunate boy loves me too—what shall I do with him? [Aside.]—Pray, Mr. Seyward, what paper's that you have in your hand?—Is it relative to—

Sey. Another instance of the conscience and gratitude which animate our worthy doctor.

Char. You frighten me! pray, what is the purport of it? Is it neither signed nor sealed?—

Sey. No, Madam; therefore to prevent it, by this timely notice, was my business here with you; your father gave it to the doctor first, to show his counsel; who having approved it, I understand this evening it will be executed.

Char. But what is it?

Sey. It grants to doctor Cantwell, in present, four hundred pounds per annum, of which this very house is part; and, at your father's death, invests him in the whole remainder of his freehold estate.—For you, indeed, there is a charge of four thousand pounds upon it, provided you marry with the doctor's consent; if not, 'tis added to my lady's jointure.—But your brother, Madam, is, without conditions, utterly disinherited.

Char. I am confounded!—What will become of us! my father now I find was serious—Oh, this insinuating hypocrite!—Let me see—ay—I will go this minute. Sir, dare you trust this in my hands for an hour only?

Sey. Any thing to serve you.— [Bell rings.]

Char. Hark! they ring to dinner: pray, Sir, step in: say I am obliged to dine abroad; and whisper one of the footmen to get a chair immediately; then do you take a proper occasion to slip out after me to Mr. Double's chambers in the Temple; there shall I have time to talk further with you. [Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A dressing-room, with table and chairs.

Enter CHARLOTTE, with BETTY, taking off her cloak, &c.

Char. Has any one been to speak with me, Betty?

Bet. Only Mr. Darnley, Madam; he said he would call again, and bid his servant stay below to give him notice when you came home.

Char. You don't know what he wanted?

Bet. No, Madam; he seemed very uneasy at your being abroad.

Char. Well, go and lay up those things— [Exit BETTY.] Ten to one but his wise head has found out something to be jealous of; if he lets me see it, I shall be sure to make him infinitely easy—here he comes.

Enter DARNLEY.

Darn. Your humble servant, Madam.

Char. Your servant, Sir.

Darn. You have been abroad, I hear.

Char. Yes, and now I am come home, you see.

Darn. You seem to turn upon my words, Madam! Is there any thing particular in them?

Char. As much as there is in my being abroad, I believe.

Darn. Might I not say you had been abroad, without giving offence?

Char. And might I not as well say I was come home, without your being so grave upon't?

Darn. Do you know any thing that should make me grave?

Char. I know, if you are so, I am the worst person in the world you can possibly show it to.

Darn. Nay, I don't suppose you do any thing you wont justify.

Char. Oh, then I find I have done something you think I can't justify.

Darn. I don't say that neither; perhaps I am wrong in what I have said; but I have been so often used to ask pardon for your being in the wrong, that I am resolved henceforth never to rely on the insolent evidence of my own senses.

Char. You don't know now perhaps that I think this pretty smart speech of yours is very dull; but, since that's a fault you can't help, I will not take it ill; come now, be as sincere on your side, and tell me seriously—Is not what real business I had abroad the very thing you want to be made easy in?

Darn. If I thought you would make me easy, I would own it.

Char. Now we come to the point.—To-morrow morning then I give you my word, to let you know it all; till then, there is a necessity for its being a secret; and I insist upon your believing it.

Darn. But pray, Madam, what am I to do with private imagination in the mean time? that is not in my power to confine; and sure you wont be offended, if, to avoid the tortures that may give me, I beg you'll trust me with the secret now.

Char. Don't press me; for, positively, I will not.

Darn. Will not—cannot had been a kinder term—Is my disquiet of so little moment to you?

Char. Of none, while your disquiet dares not trust the assurances I have given you. If you expect I should confide in you for life, don't let me see you dare not take my word for a day; and, if you are wise, you'll think so fair a trial a favour.—Come, come, there's nothing shows so low a mind, as those grave and insolent jealousies.

Darn. However, Madam, mine you wont find so low as you imagine; and since I see your tyranny arises from your mean opinion of me, 'tis time to be myself, and disavow your power; you use it now beyond my bearing; not only impose on me to disbelieve my senses, but do it with such an imperious air, as if my manly reason were your slave; and this despicable frame that follows you, durst show no signs of life but what you vouchsafe to give it.

Char. You are in the right: go on—suspect me still—believe the worst you can—'tis all true—I don't justify myself.—Why do you trouble me with your complaints? if you are master of that manly reason you have boasted, give a manly proof of it; at once resume your liberty; despise me; go off in triumph now, like a king in a tragedy.

Darn. Is this the end of all then? and are those tender protestations you have made me (for such I thought them) when, with a kind reluctance, you gave me something more than hope—what all—Oh, Charlotte! all come to this?

Char. Oh, lud! I am growing silly; if I hear on, I shall tell him every thing; 'tis but another struggle and I shall conquer it.—So, you are not gone, I see.

Darn. Do you then wish me gone, Madam?

Char. Your manly reason will direct you.

Darn. This is too much—my heart can bear no more—What, am I rooted here?

Enter SEYWARD.

Char. At last I am relieved—Well, Mr. Seyward, is it done?

Sey. I did not stir from the desk till it was entirely finished.

Char. Where's the original?

Sey. This is it, Madam.

Char. Very well; that, you know, you must keep; but come, we must lose no time; we will examine this in the next room—now I feel for him. [Exit.

Darn. This is not to be borne—Pray, Mr. Charles, what business have you with that lady?

Sey. Sir!

Darn. I must know, young man.

Sey. Not quite so young, but I can keep a secret, and a lady's too—you'll excuse me, Sir!

[Exit.

Darn. 'Sdeath! to be laughed at by every body—I shall run distracted—this young fellow should repent his pertness, did not this house protect him—this is Charlotte's contrivance to distract me—but what?—Oh! I have love enough to bear this, and ten times as much.

Enter COLONEL LAMBERT.

Col. L. What, in raptures!

Darn. Pr'ythee—I am unfit to talk with you.

Col. L. What, is Charlotte in her airs again?

Darn. I know not what she is.

Col. L. Do you know where she is?

Darn. Retired this moment to her chamber with the young fellow there—the doctor's nephew.

Col. L. Why, you are not jealous of the doctor, I hope?

Darn. Perhaps she'll be less reserved to you, and tell you wherein I have mistaken her.

Col. L. Poor Frank! every plot I lay upon my sister's inclination for you, you are sure to ruin by your own conduct.

Darn. I own I have too little temper, and too much real passion, for a modish lover.

Col. L. Come, come! make yourself easy once more; I'll undertake for you: if you'll fetch a cool turn in the Park, upon Constitution hill, in less than half an hour I'll come to you, and make you perfectly easy.

Darn. Dear Tom, you are a friend indeed!—I have a thousand things—but you shall find me there. [Exit.

Enter CHARLOTTE and SEYWARD.

Col. L. How now, sister; what have you done to Darnley? the poor fellow looks as if he had killed your parrot.

Char. Pshaw! you know him well enough! I've only been setting him a love lesson; it a little puzzles him to get through it at first, but he'll know it all by to-morrow—you will be sure to be in the way, Mr. Seyward.

Sey. Madam, you may depend upon me. I have my full instructions. [Exit.

Col. L. O, ho! here's the business then; and it seems Darnley was not to be trusted with it; ha, ha!—and, pr'ythee, what is the mighty secret that is transacting between Seyward and you?

Char. That's what he would have known, indeed; but you must know, I don't think it proper to let you tell him neither, for all your sly manner of asking.

Col. L. Pray take your own time, dear Madam; I am not in haste to know, I assure you.

Char. Well, but hold; on second thoughts, you shall know part of this affair between Seyward and me; nay, I give you leave to tell Darnley too, on some conditions; 'tis true, I did design to have surprised you—but now my mind's altered, that's enough.

Col. L. Ay, for any mortal's satisfaction—but here comes my lady.

Enter LADY LAMBERT.

Lady L. Away, away, colonel and Charlotte; both of you away this instant.

Char. What's the matter, Madam?

Lady L. I am going to put the doctor to his trial, that's all. I have considered the proposal you have made me to-day, colonel, and am convinced it ought not to be delayed an instant; so just now I told the doctor, in a half-whisper, that I should be glad to have a word in private with him here; and he said he would wait upon me presently; but must I play a traitorous part now, and instead of persuading you to the doctor, persuade the doctor against you?

Char. Dear Madam, why not? one moment's truce with the prude, I beg of you; don't startle at his first declaration, but let him go on, till he shows the very bottom of his ugly heart.

Lady L. I warrant you, I'll give a good account of him—but as I live, here he comes!

Char. Come then, brother, you and I will be comode, and steal off.

[Exit CHAR. and COL. L. who listens.]

Enter DOCTOR CANTWELL.

Dr. C. Here I am, Madam, at your ladyship's command; how happy am I that you think me worthy—

Lady L. Please to sit, Sir.

Dr. C. Well but, dear lady, ha! you can't conceive the joyousness I feel at this so much desired interview. Ah, ah! I have a thousand friendly things to say to you: and how stands your precious health? is your naughty cold abated yet? I have scarce closed my eyes these two nights with my concern for you.

Lady L. Your charity is too far concerned for me.

Dr. C. Ah! don't say so; don't say so; you merit more than mortal man can do for you.

Lady L. Indeed, you overrate me.

Dr. C. I speak it from my heart: indeed, indeed, indeed I do.

Lady L. O dear! you hurt my hand, Sir.

Dr. C. Impute it to my zeal, and want of words for expression: precious soul! I would not hurt you for the world: no, it would be the whole business of my life—

Lady L. But to the affair I would speak to you about.

Dr. C. Ah! thou heavenly woman!

Lady L. Your hand need not be there, Sir.

Dr. C. I was admiring the softness of this silk. They are indeed come to prodigious perfection in all manufactures: how wonderful is human art!

Here it disputes the prize with nature; that all this soft and gaudy lustre should be wrought from the labours of a poor worm!

Lady L. But our business, Sir, is upon another subject; Sir John informs me, that he thinks himself under no obligations to Mr. Darnley, and therefore resolves to give his daughter to you.

Dr. C. Such a thing has been mentioned, Madam; but to deal sincerely with you, that is not the happiness I sigh after; there is a soft and serious excellence for me, very different from what your step-daughter possesses.

Lady L. Well, Sir, pray be sincere, and open your heart to me.

Dr. C. Open my heart! can you then, sweet lady, be yet a stranger to it? has no action of my life been able to inform you of my real thoughts?

Lady L. Well, Sir, I take all this, as I suppose you intend it, for my good and spiritual welfare.

Dr. C. Indeed, I mean your cordial service.

Lady L. I dare say you do: you are above the low, momentary views of this world.

Dr. C. Why, I should be so; and yet, alas! I find this mortal clothing of my soul is made like other men's, of sensual flesh and blood, and has its frailties.

Lady L. We all have those, but yours are well corrected by your divine and virtuous contemplations.

Dr. C. Alas! Madam, my heart is not of stone: I may resist, call all my prayers, my fastings, tears, and penance, to my aid; but yet, I am not an angel; I am still but a man; and virtue may strive, but nature will be uppermost. I love you then, Madam.

Lady L. Hold, Sir! suppose I now should let my husband, your benefactor, know the favour you design him?

Dr. C. You cannot be so cruel!

Lady L. Nor will, on this condition; that instantly you renounce all claim and title to Charlotte, and use your utmost interest with Sir John, to give her, with her full fortune, to Mr. Darnley.

Enter COLONEL LAMBERT.

Col. L. Villain! monster! perfidious and ungrateful traitor! your hypocrisy, your false zeal, is discovered; and I am sent here, by the hand of insulted Heaven, to lay you open to my father, and expose you to the world.

Dr. C. Ha!

Lady L. O, unthinking colonel!

Col. L. Well, Sir, what have you to say for yourself?

Dr. C. I have nothing to say to you, colonel, nor for you—but you shall have my prayers.

Col. L. Why, your profligate hypocrite! do you think to carry off your villainy with that sanctified air?

Dr. C. I know not what you mean, Sir; I have been in discourse here with my good lady, by permission of your worthy father.

Col. L. Dog! did my father desire you to talk of love to my lady?

Dr. C. Call me not dog, colonel: I hope we are both brother Christians.—Yes, I will own I did beg leave to talk to her of love; for, alas! I am but a man; yet if my passion for your dear sister, which I cannot control be sinful—

Lady L. Your noise, I perceive, is bringing up Sir John; manage with him as you will at present: I will withdraw, for I have an after-game to play, which may yet put this wretch effectually into our power. [Exit.]

Enter SIR JOHN LAMBERT.

Sir J. What uproar is this ?

Col. L. Nothing, Sir, nothing; only a little broil of the good doctor's here—You are well rewarded for your kindnesses; and he would fain pay it back with triple interest to your wife: in short, I took him here in the very fact of making a criminal declaration of love to my lady.

Dr. C. Why, why Sir John, would you not let me leave your house ? I knew some dreadful method would be taken to drive me hence—O, be not angry, good colonel: but indeed, and indeed, you use me cruelly.

Sir J. Horrible, wicked creature !—Doctor, let me hear it from you.

Dr. C. Alas, Sir, I am in the dark as much as you; but it should seem, for what purpose he best knows, your son hid himself hereabouts; and while I was talking to my lady, rushed in upon us—you know the subject, Sir, on which I was to entertain her; and I might speak of my love for your daughter with more warmth than, perhaps, I ought; which the colonel overhearing, he might possibly imagine I was addressing my lady herself; for I will not suspect, no Heaven forbid, I will not suspect that he would intentionally forge a falsehood to dishonour me.

Sir J. Now, vile detractor of all virtue! is your outrageous malice confounded? what he tells you is true; he has been talking to my lady by my consent, and what he said was by my orders—Good man! be not concerned; for I see through their vile design—Here, thou curse of my life, if thou art not lost to conscience and all sense of honour, repair the injury you have attempted, by confessing your rancour, and throwing yourself at his feet.

Dr. C. Oh, Sir John! for my sake—I will throw myself at the colonel's feet; nay, if that will please him, he shall tread on my neck.

Sir J. What, mute, defenceless, hardened in thy malice.

Col. L. I scorn the imputation, Sir; and with the same repeated honesty avow (however cunningly he may have devised this gloss,) that you are deceived—what I tell you, Sir, is true—these eyes, these ears, were witnesses of his audacious love, without the mention of my sister's name! directly, plainly, grossly tending to abuse the honour of your bed.

Sir J. Villain! this instant leave my sight, my house, my family, for ever.

Dr. C. Hold, good Sir John; I am now recovered from my surprise; let me then be an humble mediator—on my account this must not be—I grant it possible your son loves me not; but you must grant it too as possible, he might mistake me; to accuse me then, was but the error of his virtue; you ought to love him, thank him, for his watchful care.

Sir J. O miracle of charity!

Dr. C. Come, come; such breaches must not be betwixt so good a son and father; forget, forgive, embrace him, cherish him, and let me bless the hour I was the occasion of so sweet a reconciliation.

Sir J. Hear this, perverse and reprobate! Oh! couldst thou wrong such more than moral virtue?

Col. L. Wrong him! the hardened impudence of this painted charity—

Sir J. Peace, graceless infidel!

Col. L. No, Sir; though I would hazard life to gain you from the clutches of that wretch; could I lie to reconcile my duty to your favour; yet, on the terms his villany offers, it is merit to refuse it—but, Sir, I'll trouble you no more; to-day is his, to-morrow may be mine. [Exit.]

Sir J. Come, my friend, we'll go this instant and sign the settlement; for that wretch ought to be punished, who I now see is incorrigible, and given over to perdition.

Dr. C. And do you think I take your estate with such view?—No, Sir—I receive it that I may have an opportunity to rouse his mind to virtue, by showing him an instance of the forgiveness of injuries; the return of good for evil—

Sir J. O, my dear friend! my stay and my guide! I am impatient till the affair is concluded.

Dr. C. The will of Heaven be done in all things.

Sir J. Poor, dear, man! [Exit.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Parlour at SIR JOHN LAMBERT'S.

Enter CHARLOTTE and SEYWARD.

Char. You were a witness, then?

Sey. I saw it signed, sealed, and delivered, Madam.

Char. And all passed without the least suspicion?

Sey. Sir John signed it with such earnestness, and the doctor received it with such seeming reluctance, that neither had the curiosity to examine a line of it.

Char. Well, Mr. Seyward, whether it succeeds to our ends or not, we have still the same obligations to you.—You saw with what friendly warmth my brother heard your story; and I don't in the least doubt his being able to do something for you.

Sey. What I have done, my duty bound me to; but pray, Madam, give me leave, without offence, to ask you one innocent question.

Char. Freely.

Sey. Have you never suspected, that in all this affair, I have had some secret, stronger motive, than barely duty?

Char. Yes.—But have you been in no apprehensions I should discover that motive?

Sey. Pray, pardon me; I see already I have gone too far.

Char. Not at all; it loses you no merit with me; nor is it my nature to use any one ill that loves me, unless I loved that one again: then, indeed, there might be danger. Come, don't look grave; my inclinations to another shall not hinder me paying every one what's due to their merit: I shall therefore always think myself obliged to treat your misfortunes and your modesty with the utmost tenderness.

Sey. Your good opinion is all I aim at.

Char. Ay; but the more I give it you, the better you'll think of me still; and then I must think the better of you again; and then you the better of me, upon that too; and so at last I shall seriously, and you'll begin to think ill of me. But I hope, Mr. Seyward, your good sense will prevent all this.

Sey. I see my folly, Madam, and blush at my presumption. Madam, I humbly take my leave.

[Exit.]

Char. Well, he's a pretty young fellow after all, and the very first, sure, that ever heard reason against himself with so good an understanding.

Enter LADY LAMBERT.

Lady L. Dear Charlotte, what will become of us?—The tyranny of this subtle hypocrite is insupportable. He has so fortified himself in Sir John's opinion, by this last misconduct of your brother, that I begin to lose my power with him.

Char. Pray, explain, Madam.

Lady L. In spite of all I could urge, he has consented that the doctor shall this minute come, and be his own advocate.

Char. I'm glad on't; for the beast must come like a bear to the stake. I'm sure, he knows I shall bait him.

Lady L. No matter for that; he presses it, to keep Sir John still blind to his wicked design upon me.—Therefore I come to give you notice, that you might be prepared to receive him.

Char. I'm obliged to your ladyship. Our meeting will be a tender scene, no doubt on't.

Lady L. But I think I hear the doctor coming up stairs. My dear girl, at any rate, keep your temper. I shall expect you in my dressing-room, to tell me the particulars of your conduct. [Exit.]

Char. He must have a great deal of impudence, to come in this manner to me.

Enter BETTY.

Bet. Doctor Cantwell desires to be admitted, Madam.

Char. Let him come in.

Enter DOCTOR CANTWELL.

Your servant, Sir.—Give us chairs, Betty, and leave the room.—[Exit BETTY.—Sir, there's a seat—What can the ugly cur say to me?—he seems a little puzzled.

Dr. C. Lookye, young lady, I am afraid, notwithstanding your good father's favour, I am not the man you would desire to be alone with upon this occasion.

Char. Your modesty is pleased to be in the right.

Dr. C. I'm afraid too, notwithstanding all my endeavours to the contrary, that you entertain a pretty bad opinion of me.

Char. A worse, Sir, of no mortal breathing.

Dr. C. Which opinion is immoveable.

Char. No rock so firm.

Dr. C. I am afraid then it will be a vain pursuit, when I solicit you, in compliance with my worthy friend's desire, and my own inclinations, to become my partner in that blessed estate in which we may be a comfort and support to each other.

Char. I would die rather than consent to it.

Dr. C. In other words, you hate me.

Char. Most transcendently.

Dr. C. Well, there is sincerity at least in your confession: you are not, I see, totally deprived of all virtue, though I must say I never could perceive in you but very little.

Char. Oh, fy! you flatter me.

Dr. C. No; I speak it with sorrow, because you are the daughter of my best friend. But how are we to proceed now? are we to preserve temper?

Char. Oh! never fear me, Sir, I shall not fly out, being convinced that nothing gives so sharp a point to one's aversion as good breeding; as, on the contrary, ill manners often hide a secret inclination.

Dr. C. Well then, young lady, be assured so far am I from the unchristian disposition of returning injuries, that your antipathy to me causes no hatred in my soul towards you; on the contrary, I would willingly make you happy, if it may be done according to my conscience, with the interest of heaven in view.

Char. Why, I can't see, Sir, how heaven can be any way concerned in a transaction between you and me.

Dr. C. When you marry any other person, my consent is necessary.

Char. So I hear, indeed!—but, pray, doctor, how could your modesty receive so insolent a power, without putting my poor father out of countenance with your blushes?

Dr. C. I sought it not; but he would crowd it among other obligations. He is good natured; and I foresaw it might serve to pious purposes.

Char. I don't understand you.

Dr. C. I take it for granted, that you would marry Mr. Darnley. Am I right?

Char. Once in your life, perhaps, you may.

Dr. C. Nay, let us be plain. Would you marry him?

Char. You're mighty nice, methinks. Well, I would.

Dr. C. Then I will not consent.

Char. You won't?

Dr. C. My conscience will not suffer me. I know you to be both luxurious and worldly-minded; and you would squander upon the vanities of the world, those treasures which ought to be better laid out.

Char. Hum!—I believe I begin to conceive you.—

Dr. C. If you can think of any project to satisfy my conscience, I am tractable. You know there is a considerable moiety of your fortune which goes to my lady in case of our disagreement.

Char. That's enough, Sir.—You think we should have a fellow-feeling in it. At what sum do you rate your concurrence to my inclinations? that settled, I am willing to strike the bargain.

Dr. C. What do you think of half?

Char. How! two thousand pounds?

Dr. C. Why, you know you gain two thousand pounds; and really the severity of the times for the poor, and my own stinted pittance, which cramps my charities, will not suffer me to require less.

Char. But how is my father to be brought into this?

Dr. C. Leave that to my management.

Char. And what security do you expect for the money?

Dr. C. Oh! Mr. Darnley is wealthy: when I deliver my consent in writing, he shall lay it down to me in bank-bills.

Char. Pretty good security! On one proviso, though.

Dr. C. Name it.

Char. That you immediately tell my father, that you are willing to give up your interest to Mr. Darnley.

Dr. C. Hum!—stay—I agree to it; but in the mean time, let me warn you, child, not to expect to turn that, or what has now passed between us, to my confusion, by sinister construction, or evil representation to your father. I am satisfied of the piety of my own intentions, and care not what the wicked think of them; but force me not to take advantage of Sir John's good opinion of me, in order to shield myself from the consequences of your malice.

Char. Oh! I shall not stand in my own light: I know your conscience and your power too well, dear doctor!

Dr. C. Well, let your interest sway you. Thank Heaven, I am actuated by more worthy motives.

Char. No doubt on't.

Dr. C. Farewell, and think me your friend.

[Exit.]

Char. What this fellow's original was, I know not; but by his conscience and cunning, he would make an admirable Jesuit.

Enter SERVANT.

Serv. Madam, Mr. Darnley.

Char. Desire him to walk in. [Exit SERVANT.]

Enter DARNLEY.

Darn. To find you thus alone, Madam, is a happiness I did not expect, from the temper of our last parting.

Char. I should have been as well pleased now, to have been thanked, as reproached, for my good nature; but you will be in the right, I find.

Darn. Indeed, you take me wrong. I literally mean that I was afraid you would not so soon think I had deserved this favour.

Char. Well, but were you not silly now?

Darn. Come, you shall not be serious: you can't be more agreeable.

Char. Oh! but I am serious.

Darn. Then I'll be so.—Do you forgive me all?

Char. What?

Darn. Are we friends, Charlotte?

Char. O Lord; but you have told me nothing of poor Seyward!

Darn. Must you needs know that, before you answer me?

Char. Lord! you are never well till you have talked one out of countenance.

Darn. Come, I won't be too particular; you shall answer nothing—Give me but your hand only.

Char. Pshaw! I won't pull off my glove, not I.

Darn. I'll take it as it is then.

Char. Lord! there, there; eat it, eat it.

Darn. And so I could, by Heaven!

Char. Oh, my glove! my glove! my glove! you are in a perfect storm! Lord! if you make such a rout with one's hand, what would you do if you had one's heart?

Darn. That's impossible to tell.—But you were asking me of Seyward, Madam?

Char. Oh, ay! that's true. Well, now you are very good again.—Come, tell me all the affair, and then you shall see—how I will like you.

Darn. There is not much to tell—only this: we met the attorney-general, to whom he has given a very sensible account of himself, and the doctor's proceedings.—The attorney-general seems very clear in his opinion, that, as the doctor, at the time of the death of Seyward's mother, was intrusted with her whole affairs, the Court of Equity will oblige him to be accountable.

Char. If Seyward does not recover his fortune, you must absolutely get him a commission, and bring him into acquaintance.

Darn. Upon my word I will.

Char. And show him to all the women of taste; and I'll have you call him my pretty fellow, too.

Darn. I will, indeed!—but hear me—

Char. You can't conceive how prettily he makes love.

Darn. Not so well as you make your defence, Charlotte.

Char. Lord! I had forgot, he is to teach me Greek, too.

Darn. Trifling tyrant! how long, Charlotte, do you think you can find new evasions for what I say unto you?

Char. Lord! you are horrid silly; but since 'tis love that makes you such a dunce—poor Darnley, I forgive you.

Enter COLONEL LAMBERT, unobserved.

Darn. That's kind, however.—But, to complete my joy, be kinder yet—and—

Char. Oh! I can't! I can't!—Lord! did you never ride a horse-match?

Darn. Was ever so wild a question!

Char. Because, if you have, it runs in my head you galloped a mile beyond the winning-post, to make sure on't.

Darn. Now, I understand you. But since you will have me touch every thing so very tenderly, Charlotte, how shall I find proper words to ask you the lover's last necessary question?

Char. Oh! there's a thousand points to be adjusted before that's answered.

Col. L. [Advances.] Name them this moment; for, positively, this is the last time of asking.

Char. Pshaw! who sent for you?

Col. L. I only came to teach you to speak plain English, my dear.

Char. Lord! mind your own business; can't you!

Col. L. So I will; for I will make you do more of yours in two minutes, than you would have done without me in a twelvemonth. Why, how now!—do you think the man's to dangle after your ridiculous airs for ever?

Char. This is mighty pretty!

Col. L. You'll say so on Thursday se'nnight, for (let affairs take what turn they will in the family,) that's positively your wedding-day—Nay, you sha'n't stir.

Char. Was ever such assurance!

Darn. Upon my life, Madam, I'm out of countenance! I don't know how to behave myself.

Char. No, no; let him go on only—this is beyond what ever was known, sure!

Col. L. Ha, ha! if I was to leave you to yourselves what a couple of pretty out of countenanced figures you would make! humming and hawing upon the vulgar points of jointure and pin-money. Come, come, I know what's proper on both sides; you shall leave it to me.

Darn. I had rather Charlotte would name her own terms to me.

Col. L. Have you a mind to any thing particular, Madam?

Char. Why, sure! what, do you think I'm only to be filled out as you please, and sweetened and sipped up like a dish of tea?

Col. L. Why, pray, Madam, when your tea's ready, what have you to do but to drink it?—but you, I suppose, expect a lover's heart, like you lamp, should be always flaming at your elbow; and when it's ready to go out, you indolently supply it with the spirit of contradiction.

Char. And so you suppose, that your assurance has made an end of this matter?

Col. L. Not till you have given him your hand upon it.

Char. That then would complete it.

Col. L. Perfectly.

Char. Why, then take it, Darnley. Now I presume you are in high triumph, Sir.

Col. L. No, sister; now you are consistent with that good sense I always thought you mistress of.

Char. And now I beg we may separate; for our being seen together, at this critical juncture, may give that devil, the doctor, suspicion of a confederacy, and make him set some engine at work that we are not aware of.

Col. L. It's a very proper caution. Come along, Darnley; nay, you must leave her now, whatever violence you do yourself.

Char. Ay, ay, take him with you, brother—or stay, Darnley; if you please, you may come along with me. [Exeunt.

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Parlour at SIR JOHN LAMBERT'S.

Enter DARNLEY and CHARLOTTE.

Char. But really, will you stand to the agreement though, that I have made with the doctor?

Darn. Why not? you shall not break your word upon my account, though he might be a villain you gave it to. Suppose I should talk with Sir John myself?—'tis true, he has slighted me of late.

Char. No matter—here he comes—this may open another scene of action to that I believe my brother's preparing for.

Enter SIR JOHN and LADY LAMBERT.

Sir J. Mr. Darnley, I am glad I have met you here.

Darn. I have endeavoured twice to-day, Sir, to pay my respects to you.

Sir J. Sir, I'll be plain with you, I went out to avoid you; but where the welfare of a child is concerned, you must not take it ill if we don't stand upon ceremony—However, since I have reason now to be more in temper than perhaps I was at that time, I shall be glad to talk with you.

Darn. I take it as a favour, Sir.

Sir J. You must allow, Mr. Darnley, that conscience is the rule which every honest man ought to walk by.

Darn. 'Tis granted, Sir.

Sir J. Then give me leave to tell you, Sir, that giving you my daughter would be to act against that conscience I pretend to, while I think you an ill liver; and consequently the same tie obliges me to bestow her on a better man—

Darn. Well but, Sir, come to the point. Suppose the doctor (whom I presume you design her for) actually consents to give me up his interest?

Sir J. But why do you suppose, Sir, he will give up his interest?

Darn. I only judge from what your daughter tells me, Sir.

Sir J. My daughter!

Darn. I appeal to her.

Char. And I appeal even to yourself, Sir—

Has not the doctor, just now in the garden spoke in favour of Mr. Darnley to you? Nay pray, Sir be plain; because more depends on that than you can easily imagine or believe.

Sir J. What senseless insinuation have you got into your head now?

Char. Be so kind, Sir, first to answer me, that I may be better able to inform you.

Sir J. Well, I own he has declined his interest in favour of Mr. Darnley; but I must tell you, Madam, he did it in so modest, so friendly, so good natured, so conscientious a manner, that I now think myself more than ever bound in honour to espouse him.

Char. But now, Sir, only for argument's sake, suppose I could prove that all this seeming virtue was artificial; that this regard for Mr. Darnley was neither founded upon modesty, friendship, good nature, nor conscience; or in short that he has, like a villain, bartered, bargained to give me to Mr. Darnley, for half the four thousand pounds you valued his consent at; I say, Sir, suppose this could be proved, where would be his virtue then?

Sir J. It is impious to suppose it.

Char. Then, Sir, from what principle must you suppose that I accuse him?

Sir J. From an obstinate prejudice to all that's good and virtuous.

Char. That's too hard, Sir. But the worst your opinion can provoke me to, is to marry Mr. Darnley, without either his consent or yours.

Sir J. What, do you brave me, Madam?

Char. No, Sir; but I scorn a lie; and will so far vindicate my integrity, as to insist on your believing me; if not, as a child you abandon, I have a right to throw myself into other arms for protection.

Sir J. I am confounded. These tears cannot be counterfeit; nor can this be true.

Lady L. Indeed, my dear, I fear it is. Give me leave to ask one question. In all our mutual course of happiness, have I ever yet deceived you with a falsehood?

Sir J. Never.

Lady L. Would you then believe me, should I accuse him even of crimes which virtue blushes but to mention?

Sir J. To what extravagance would you drive me!

Lady L. I would before have undeceived you, when his late artifice turned the honest duty of your son into his own reproach and ruin; but, knowing then your temper was inaccessible, I durst not offer it. But suppose I should be able to let you see his villainy, make him repeat his odious love to me in your own hearing, at once throw off the mask, and show the barefaced traitor?

Sir J. Is it possible?

Lady L. But then, Sir, I must prevail on you to descend to the poor shifts we are reduced to.

Sir J. All; to any thing, to ease me of my doubts; make me but a witness of this fact, and I shall soon accuse myself, and own my folly equal to his baseness.

Lady L. Behind that screen you may easily conceal yourself.

Sir J. Be it so.

Lady L. Mr. Darnley, shall we beg your leave and you, Charlotte, take the least suspected way to send the doctor to me directly.

Char. I have a thought will do it, Madam.

Sir J. Oh, Charlotte! Oh, Mr. Darnley.

Darn. Have but resolution, Sir, and fear nothing. [Exeunt DARNLEY and CHARLOTTE.]

Lady L. Now, Sir, you are to consider what a desperate disease I have undertaken to cure: therefore, be sure keep close and still; and when the proof is full, appear at your discretion.

Sir J. Fear not; I will conform myself—Yet, be not angry, my love, if, in a case like this, I have also charity enough to hope you may yet be deceived in what you charge him with, till the evidence of my own senses assure me of the contrary.

Lady L. 'Tis just.

Sir J. Hark! I think I hear him coming.

Lady L. Now, my dear, remember your promise to have patience.

Sir J. Rely upon't.

Lady L. To your post then.

[SIR JOHN goes behind the screen.]

Enter DOCTOR CANTWELL, with a book.

Dr. C. Madam, your woman tells me, that, being here and alone, you desired to speak with me.

Lady L. I did, Sir—but that we may be sure that we are alone, pray shut the outward door—another surprise might ruin us—is all safe?

Dr. C. I have taken care, Madam.

Lady L. But I am afraid I interrupt your meditation.

Dr. C. No, Madam, no; I was only looking over some pious exhortations here, for the use of a society of chosen brethren.

Lady L. Ah, doctor, what have you done to me? the trouble of my mind since our last unfortunate conference is not to be expressed. You indeed discovered to me what, perhaps, for my own peace, 'twere better I had never been acquainted with; but I had not sufficient time to lay my heart open to you.

Dr. C. Whither, Madam, would you lead me?

Lady L. I have been uneasy too, not knowing how far you might mistake my behaviour on the last accident that happened, but I was really so shocked, so terrified, I knew not what I was doing; only, had I joined in your defence against the colonel, it would have been evident that I was his enemy, and I have uses for his friendship. Silence, therefore, was my own prudent part: and I knew your credit with Sir John needed no support.

Dr. C. Let me presume then to hope, that what I did, you judge was self-defence and pure necessity.

Lady L. And perhaps, after all, the accident was lucky; for Sir John, in order to obviate any ill constructions that may be put upon it, insists now that we should be more together, to let the world see his confidence in us both. This relieves you from restraint; and I now dare tell you—but no—I wont—

Dr. C. But why, Madam? let me beseech you—

Lady L. No—besides—what need you ask me—

Dr. C. Ah! do not endeavour to decoy my foolish heart, too apt to flatter itself. You cannot sure think kindly of me!

Lady L. Well, well. I would have you imagine so.

Dr. C. Besides, may I not with reason suspect, that this apparent goodness is but artifice; a shadow of compliance, meant only to persuade me from your daughter.

Vol. I... 4 T 59

Lady L. Methinks, this doubt of me seems rather founded on your settled resolution not to resign her.—I am convinced of it. I can assure you, Sir, I should have saved you this trouble, had I known how deeply you were engaged to her.

Dr. C. Tears—then I must believe you—but indeed you wrong me. To prove my innocence, it is not an hour since I pressed Sir John to give Charlotte to young Darnley.

Lady L. Mere artifice. You knew that modest resignation would make Sir John warmer in your interest.

Dr. C. No, indeed, indeed. I had other motives, which you may hereafter be made acquainted with, and will convince you—

Lady L. Well, Sir, now I'll give you reason to guess the reason why, at our last meeting, I pressed you so warmly to resign Charlotte.

Dr. C. Ah dear! ah dear!

Lady L. You cannot blame me for having opposed your happiness, when my own, perhaps, depended upon it.

Dr. C. Spare me, spare me; you kill me with this kindness.

Lady L. But now that I have discovered my weakness, be secret; for the least imprudence—

Dr. C. It is a vain fear.

Lady L. Call it not vain; my reputation is dearer to me than life.

Dr. C. Where can it find so sure a guard? The grave austerities of my life will dumb-found suspicion, and yours may defy detraction.

Lady L. Well, doctor, 'tis you must answer for my folly.

Dr. C. I take it all upon myself.

Lady L. But there's one thing still to be afraid of.

Dr. C. Nothing, nothing.

Lady L. My husband, Sir John.

Dr. C. Alas, poor man! I will answer for him. Between ourselves, Madam, your husband is weak; I can lead him by the nose any where.

Sir J. [Comes forward.] No, caitiff, I'm to be led no farther.

Dr. C. Ah! woman.

Sir J. Is this your sanctity? this your doctrine? these your meditations?

Dr. C. Is then my brother in a conspiracy against me?

Sir J. Your brother! I have been your friend, indeed, to my shame; your dupe; but your spell has lost its hold: no more canting; it will not serve your turn any longer.

Lady L. Now, Heaven be praised.

Dr. C. It seems you wanted an excuse to part with me.

Sir J. Ungrateful wretch! but why do I approach you! Had I not been the weakest of mankind, you never could have proved so great a villain. Get out of my sight; leave my house; of all my follies, which is it tells you, that if you stay much longer, I shall not be tempted to wrest you out of the hands of the law, and punish you as you deserve!

Dr. C. Well; but first let me ask you, Sir, who is it you menace? consider your own condition, and where you are?

Sir J. What would the villain drive at? leave me. I forgive you: but once more I tell you, seek some other place; out of my house. This instant be gone, and see my shameful face no more.

Dr. C. Nay, then, 'tis my duty to exert myself, and let you know that I am master here. Turn you out, Sir; this house is mine; and now, Sir, at your peril, dare to insult me.

Sir J. O Heavens! 'tis true: whither shall I fly to hide me from the world?

Lady L. Whither are you going, Sir?

Sir J. I know not—but here it seems I am a trespasser—the master of the house has warned me hence—and, since the right is now in him, 'tis just I should resign it.

Lady L. You shall not stir. He dares not act with such abandoned insolence. No, Sir, possession still is yours. If he pretends a right, let him by open course of law maintain it.

Dr. C. Ha! Here! Seyward! [Exit.]

Enter Old LADY LAMBERT and MAWORM.

Sir J. Who is this fellow? what do you want, man?

Maw. My lady, come up.

Old Lady L. How now!

Maw. He wants to know who I be.

Old Lady L. The gentleman is a friend of mine, son. I was carrying him in a coach to attend a controversy that's to be held this evening, at the Rev. Mr. Scruple's, about an affair of simony; and called to take up the doctor. But what strange tales are these I hear below?

Sir J. The doctor's a villain, Madam; I have detected him; detected him in the horrible design of seducing my wife.

Maw. It's impossible.

Sir J. What do you say, man?

Maw. I say, it's impossible. He has been locked up with my wife for hours together, morning, noon, and night, and I never found her the worse for him.

Old Lady L. Ah, son! son!

Sir J. What is your ladyship going to say now?

Old Lady L. The doctor is not in fault.

Sir J. 'Sife, Madam!

Old Lady L. Oh, he swears! he swears! years in growing good, we become profligate in a moment. If you swear again, I wont stay in the house.

Maw. Nor I neither; aren't you ashamed of yourself? have you no commensuration on your poor soul?—Ah! poor, wicked sinter! I pity you.

Sir J. 'Sdeath! and the devil!

Maw. If you swear any more, I'll inform against you.

Sir J. Why would you bring this idiot, Madam?

Maw. Ay, do despise me, I'm the prouder for it; I likes to be despised.

Enter CHARLOTTE.

Char. Oh dear papa, I shall faint away; there's murder doing.

Sir J. Who! when! what is it?

Char. The doctor, Sir, and Seyward, were at high words just now in the garden; and, upon a sudden, there was a pistol fired between them. Oh! I'm afraid poor Seyward is killed.

Sir J. How?

Char. Oh, there he comes himself; he'll tell you more.

Enter CANTWELL, DARNLEY, SEYWARD, and Servants.

Darn. Here, bring in this ruffian; this is vil lany beyond example.

Sir J. What means this outrage?

Lady L. I tremble.

Sey. Don't be alarmed, Madam—there is no mischief done: what was intended, the doctor here can best inform you.

Sir J. Mr. Darnley, I am ashamed to see you. Maw. So you ought: but this good man is ashamed of nothing.

Dr. C. Alas! my enemies prevail.

Sey. In short, gentlemen, the affair is circumstantially this—The doctor called me out into the pavilion in the garden; appeared in great disorder; told me here was a sudden storm raised, which he was not sufficiently prepared to weather. He said, his dependance was upon me; and at all events, I must be ready to swear, when he called upon me, I had seen him pay Sir John several large sums of money. He talked confusedly about giving value for an estate; but I boldly refused to perjure myself; and told him, on the contrary, I was satisfied he had fleeced Sir John of several large sums, under pretence of charitable uses, which he secretly converted to his own.—This stung him, and he fastened at my throat. Then, indeed, all temper left me; and, disengaging myself from his hold, with a home-blow, I struck him down. At this, grown desperate, he ran with fury to some pistols that hung about the chimney: but in the instant he reached one, I seized upon his wrist; and as we grappled, the pistol, firing to the ceiling, alarmed the family.

Old Lady L. This is a lie, young man; I see the devil standing at your elbow.

Maw. So do I, with a great big pitchfork, pushing him on.

Dr. C. Well, what have you more against me?

Darn. More, Sir, I hope is needless—but if Sir John is yet unsatisfied.

Sir J. Oh! I have seen too much.

Dr. C. I demand my liberty.

Sir J. Let him go.

Enter COLONEL LAMBERT and Attendants.

Col. L. Hold, Sir! not so fast; you can't pass.

Dr. C. Who, Sir, shall dare to stop me?

Col. L. Within there!

Enter TIPSTAFF.

Tip. Is your name Cantwell, Sir?

Dr. C. What if it be, Sir?

Tip. Then, Sir, I have my lord chief justice's warrant against you.

Dr. C. Against me

Tip. Yes, Sir, for a cheat and impostor.

Old Lady L. What does he say?

Sir J. Dear son, what is this?

Col. L. Only some action of the doctor's, Sir, which I have affidavits in my hand here to prove, from more than one creditable witness; and I think it my duty to make the public acquainted with: if he can acquit himself of them, so; if not, he must take the consequence.

Dr. C. Well, but stay; let the accusations against me be what they will, by virtue of this conveyance I am still master here; and if I am forced to leave the house myself, I will shut up the doors—nobody shall remain behind.

Sir J. There! there! indeed, he stings me to the heart! for that rash act, reproach and endless shame will haunt me!

Char. No, Sir!—be comforted.—Even there too his wicked hopes must leave him; for know, the fatal deed which you intended to sign is here, even yet unsealed and innocent?

Sir J. What mean you?

Char. I mean, Sir, that this deed by accident falling into this gentleman's hands, his generous concern for our family discovered it to me; and that in concert we procured that other to be drawn exactly like it; which, in your impatience to execute, passed unsuspected for the original. Their only difference is, that wherever here you read the doctor's name, there you'll find my brother's.

Dr. C. Come, Sir; lead me where you please.

[Exit.]

Col. L. Secure your prisoner.

Old Lady L. I don't know what to make of all this.

Maw. They'll all go to the devil for what they are doing—Come away, my lady, and let us see after the good dear doctor. Ay, do laugh, you'll go to the devil for all that.—Come, my lady, you go first.

[Exeunt MAWORM and Old LADY LAMBERT.]

Char. Now, Darnley, I hope I have made atonement for your jealousy.

Darn. You've banished it for ever! this was beyond yourself surprising.

Col. L. Sister—

Char. Come, no set speeches; if I deserve your thanks, return them in friendship to your first preserver.

Col. L. The business of my life shall be to merit it.

Sey. And mine, to speak my sense of obligations.

Sir J. Oh, my child! for my deliverance I can only reward you here.—For you, my son, whose filial virtue I have injured, this honest deed shall in every article be ratified.—And for the sake of that hypocritical villain, I declare, that from henceforward I renounce all pious folks; I will have an utter abhorrence for every thing that bears the appearance—

Char. Nay now, my dear Sir, I must take the liberty to tell you, you go from one extreme to another.—What, because a worthless wretch has imposed upon you, under the fallacious show of austere grimace, will you needs have it every body is like him; confound the good with the bad, and conclude there are no truly religious in the world?—Leave, my dear Sir, such rash consequences to fools and libertines.—Let us be careful to distinguish between virtue and the appearance of it. Guard if possible against doing honour to hypocrisy—But, at the same time, let us allow there is no character in life, greater or more valuable than that of the truly devout—nor any thing more noble or more beautiful, than the fervour of a sincere piety.

[Exeunt.]

THE MOCK DOCTOR:

A FARCE,

IN TWO ACTS.

BY HENRY FIELDING, Esq.

REMARK

MOLIERE's comedy of Le Medecin malgre lui is the parent-stock whence our ingenious countryman, Henry Fielding, has deduced the present whimsical farce; which is, however, but slightly altered from the original in plot, situation, and conduct. The knavery of Gregory will not find a parallel in English habits, though our continental neighbours enlarge on the credulity of honest John Bull; but similar portraits are frequent in La Sage and their other writers, probably derived from an experience we need not envy.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Wood.

Enter DORCAS and GREGORY.

Greg. I tell you no, I wont comply, and it is my business to talk and to command.

Dor. And I tell you, you shall conform to my will; and that I was not married to you to suffer your ill-humours.

Greg. O the intolerable fatigue of matrimony! Aristotle never said a better thing in his life, than when he told us, "that a wife is worse than a devil."

Dor. Hear the learned gentleman, with his Aristotles!

Greg. And a learned man I am too; find me out a maker of faggots, that's able, like myself, to reason upon things, or that can boast such an education as mine.

Dor. An education!

Greg. Ay, hussy, a regular education; first at the charity-school, where I learnt to read; then I waited on a gentleman at Oxford, where I learnt very near as much as my master; from whence

I attended a travelling physician six years, under the facetious denomination of a Merry Andrew, where I learnt physic.

Dor. O that thou hadst followed him still! cursed be the hour wherein I answered the parson—I will.

Greg. And cursed be the parson that asked me the question!

Dor. You have reason to complain of him, indeed, who ought be on your knees every moment, returning thanks to Heaven for that great blessing it sent you, when it sent you myself.—I hope you have not the assurance to think you deserve such a wife as me.

Greg. No, really, I don't think I do.—Come, come, Madam, it was a lucky day for you, when you found me out.

Dor. Lucky, indeed! a fellow who eats every thing I have.

Greg. That happens to be a mistake, for I drink some part on't.

Dor. That has not even left me a bed to lie on.

Greg. You'll rise the earlier.

Dor. And who from morning till night is eternally in an alehouse.

Greg. It s genteel, the squire does the same.

Dor. Pray, Sir, what are you willing I shall do with my family?

Greg. Whatever you please.

Dor. My four little children, that are continually crying for bread.

Greg. Give 'em a rod! best cure in the world for crying children.

Dor. And do you imagine, sot—

Greg. Hark ye, my dear; you know my temper is not over and above passive, and that my arm is extremely active.

Dor. I laugh at your threats, poor, beggarly, insolent fellow.

Greg. Soft object of my wishing eyes, I shall play with your pretty ears.

Dor. Touch me, if you dare, you insolent, impudent, dirty, lazy, rascally—

Greg. Oh, ho, ho! you will have it then, I find. [Beats her.

Dor. O murder! murder!

Enter SQUIRE ROBERT.

Rob. What's the matter here? fie upon you, neighbour, to beat your wife in this scandalous manner.

Dor. Well, Sir, and I have a mind to be beat, and what then?

Rob. O dear, Madam! I give my consent with all my heart and soul.

Dor. What's that you, saucebox? Is it any business of yours?

Rob. No, certainly, Madam.

Dor. Here's an impertinent fellow for you, wont suffer a husband to beat his own wife!

Rob. Neighbour, I ask your pardon heartily; here, take and thrash your wife, beat her as you ought to do.

Greg. No, Sir, I wont beat her.

Rob. O! Sir, that's another thing.

Greg. I'll beat her when I please, and will not beat her when I do not please. She is my wife, and not yours.

Rob. Certainly.

Dor. Give me the stick, dear husband.

Rob. Well, if ever I attempt to part husband and wife again, may I be beaten myself. [Exit.

Greg. Come, my dear, let us be friends.

Dor. What, after beating me so?

Greg. 'Twas but in jest.

Dor. I desire you will crack your jests on your own bones, not on mine.

Greg. Psha! you know, you and I are one, and I beat one half of myself when I beat you.

Dor. Yes, but for the future I desire you will beat the other half of yourself.

Greg. Come, my pretty dear, I ask pardon, I'm sorry for't.

Dor. For once I pardon you,—but you shall pay for it.

Greg. Psha! Psha! child, these are only little affairs, necessary in friendship; four or five good blows with a cudgel between your very fond couples, only tend to heighten the affections. I'll now to the wood, and I promise thee to make a hundred faggots before I come home again. [Exit.

Dor. If I am not revenged on those blows of yours!—Oh, that I could but think of some method to be revenged on him! Hang the rogue, he's quite insensible of cuckoldom.—Oh, that I could find out some invention to get him well drubbed!

Enter HARRY and JAMES.

Har. Were ever two fools sent on such a message as we are, in quest of a dumb doctor?

Jam. Blame your own cursed memory, that made you forget his name. For my part, I'll travel through the world rather than return without him; that were as much as a limb or two were worth.

Har. Was ever such a cursed misfortune! to lose the letter! I should not even know his name if I were to hear it.

Dor. Can I find no invention to be revenged?—Heyday! who are these?

Jam. Harkye, mistress, do you know where—where—where doctor what-d'ye-call him lives?

Dor. Doctor who?

Jam. Doctor—doctor—what's his name?

Dor. Hey! what has the fellow a mind to barter me?

Har. Is there no physician hereabouts, famous for curing dumbness?

Dor. I fancy you have no need of such a physician, Mr. Impertinence.

Har. Don't mistake us, good woman; we don't mean to banter you; we are sent by our master, whose daughter has lost her speech, for a certain physician, who lives hereabouts; we have lost our direction, and 'tis as much as our lives are worth to return without him.

Dor. There is one Doctor Lazy lives just by, but he has left off practising. You would not get him a mile, to save the lives of a thousand patients.

Jam. Direct us but to him; we'll bring him with us one way or other, I warrant you.

Har. Ay, ay, we'll have him with us, though we carry him on our backs.

Dor. Ha! Heaven has inspired me with one of the most admirable inventions to be revenged on my hang-dog! [Aside.] I assure you, if you can get him with you, he'll do your young lady's business for her; he's reckoned one of the best physicians in the world, especially for dumbness.

Har. Pray, tell us where he lives?

Dor. You'll never be able to get him out of his own house; but, if you watch hereabouts, you'll certainly meet with him, for he very often amuses himself here with cutting of wood.

Har. A physician cut wood?

Jam. I suppose he amuses himself in searching after herbs, you mean.

Dor. No, he's one of the most extraordinary men in the world: he goes dressed like a common clown; for there is nothing he so much dreads, as to be known for a physician.

Jam. All your great men have strange oddities about 'em.

Dor. Why, he will suffer himself to be beat, before he will own himself to be a physician: and I'll give you my word, you'll never make him own himself one, unless you both of you take a good cudgel, and thrash him into it; 'tis what we are all forced to do when we have any need of him.

Jam. What a ridiculous whim is here!

Dor. Very true; and in so great a man.

Jam. And is he so very skilful a man?

Dor. Skilful? why he does miracles. About half a year ago, a woman was given over by all her physicians, nay, she had been dead some time; when this great man came to her, as soon as he saw her, he poured a little drop of something down her throat—he had no sooner done it, than she got out of her bed, and walked about the room, as if there had been nothing the matter with her.

Both. Oh, prodigious!

Dor. 'Tis not above three weeks ago, that a child of twelve years old fell from the top of a house to the bottom, and broke its skull, its arms, and legs.—Our physician was no sooner drubbed into making him a visit, than, having rubbed the child all over with a certain ointment, it got upon its legs, and ran away to play.

Both. Oh, most wonderful!

Har. Hey, gad, James we'll drub him out of a pot of this ointment.

Jam. But can he cure dumbness?

Dor. Dumbness! why the curate of our parish's wife was born dumb, and the doctor, with a sort of wash, washed her tongue 'till he set it a-going, so that in less than a month's time she out-talked her husband.

Har. This must be the very man we were sent after.

Dor. Yonder is the very man I speak of.

Jam. What, that he yonder?

Dor. The very same.—He has spied us, and taken up his bill.

Jam. Come, Harry, don't let us lose one moment.—Mistress, your servant; we give you ten thousand thanks for this favour.

Dor. Be sure and make good use of your sticks.

Jam. He sha'n't want that. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—Another part of the Wood.

Enter JAMES, HARRY, and GREGORY.

Greg. Pox on't! 'tis most confounded hot weather. Hey! who have we here?

Jam. Sir, your most obedient, humble servant.

Greg. Sir, your servant.

Jam. We are mighty happy in finding you here.

Greg. Ay, like enough.

Jam. 'Tis in your power, Sir, to do us a very great favour.—We come, Sir, to implore your assistance in a certain affair.

Greg. If it be in my power to give you any assistance, masters, I am very ready to do it.

Jam. Sir, you are extremely obliging—but, dear Sir, let me beg you'd be covered, the sun will hurt your complexion.

Har. For Heaven's sake, Sir, be covered.

Greg. These should be footmen, by their dress: but should be courtiers, by their ceremony.

[Aside.]

Jam. You must not think it strange, Sir, that we come thus to seek after you; men of your capacity will be sought after by the whole world.

Greg. Truly, gentlemen, though I say it, that should not say it, I have a pretty good hand at a faggot.

Jam. O dear Sir!

Greg. You may, perhaps, buy faggots cheaper elsewhere; but, if you find such in all this country, you shall have mine for nothing. To make but one word then with you, you shall have mine for ten shillings a hundred.

Jam. Don't talk in that manner I desire you.

Greg. I could not sell 'em a penny cheaper, if 'twas to my father.

Jam. Dear Sir, we know you very well—don't jest with us in this manner.

Greg. Faith, master, I am so much in earnest, that I can't bate one farthing.

Jam. O pray, Sir, leave this idle discourse. Can a person, like you, amuse himself in this manner? Can a learned and famous physician, like you, try to disguise himself to the world, and bury such fine talents in the woods?

Greg. The fellow's a fool.

Jam. Let me intreat you, Sir, not to dissemble with us.

Har. It is in vain, Sir; we know what you are.

Greg. Know what you are! what do you know of me?

Jam. Why, we know you, Sir, to be a very great physician.

Greg. Physician in your teeth! I a physician!

Jam. The fit is on him.—Sir, let me beseech you to conceal yourself no longer, and oblige us to—you know what.

Greg. Devil take me, if I know what, Sir.—But I know this, that I'm no physician.

Jam. We must proceed to the usual remedy, I find. And so you are no physician?

Greg. No.

Jam. You are no physician?

Greg. No, I tell you.

Jam. Well, if we must, we must. [Beats him.]

Greg. Oh! oh! Gentlemen! Gentlemen! what are you doing? I am—I am—whatever you please to have me!

Jam. Why will you oblige us, Sir, to this violence?

Har. Why will you force us to this troublesome remedy?

Jam. I assure you, Sir, it gives me a great deal of pain.

Greg. I assure you, Sir, and so it does me. But pray, gentlemen, what is the reason that you have a mind to make a physician of me?

Jam. What! do you deny your being a physician again?

Greg. And the devil take me if I am.

Har. You are no physician!

Greg. May I be hanged, if I am. [They beat him.] Oh!—oh!—Dear gentlemen! Oh! for Heaven's sake; I am a physician, and an apothecary too, if you'll have me: I had rather be any thing, than be knocked off the head.

Jam. Dear Sir, I am rejoiced to see you come to your senses; I ask pardon ten thousand times for what you have forced us to.

Greg. Perhaps I am deceived myself, and am a physician without knowing it. But, dear gentlemen, are you certain I'm a physician?

Jam. Yes, the greatest physician in the world.

Greg. Indeed!

Har. A physician that has cured all sorts of distempers.

Greg. The devil I have!

Jam. That has made a woman walk about the room after she was dead six hours.

Har. That set a child upon its legs immediately after it had broke 'em.

Jam. That made the curate's wife, who was dumb, talk faster than her husband.

Har. Look ye, Sir, you shall have content; my master will give you whatever you will demand.

Greg. Shall I have whatever I will demand?

Jam. You may depend upon it.

Greg. I am a physician without doubt—I had forgot it, but I begin to recollect myself.—Well—and what is the distemper I am to cure?

Jam. My young mistress, Sir, has lost her tongue.

Greg. The devil take me if I have found it.— But come, gentlemen, if I must go with you, I must have a physician's habit; for a physician can no more prescribe without a full wig, than without a fee. [Exit.

Enter DORCAS.

Dor. I don't remember my heart has gone so pit-a-pat with joy a long while. Revenge is surely the most delicious morsel the devil ever dropped into the mouth of a woman. And this is a revenge which costs nothing; for, lack-a-day! to plant horns upon a husband's head is more dangerous than is imagined.—Odd! I had a narrow escape when I met with this fool; the best of my market was over, and I began to grow almost as cheap as a cracked China cup. [Exit.

ACT II.

SCENE I.—SIR JASPER'S House.

Enter SIR JASPER and JAMES.

Sir J. Where is he? where is he?

Jam. Only recruiting himself after his journey. You need not be impatient, Sir; for, were my young lady dead, he'd bring her to life again.—He makes no more of bringing a patient to life, than other physicians do of killing him.

Sir J. 'Tis strange so great a man should have those unaccountable odd humours you mentioned.

Jam. 'Tis but a good blow or two, and he comes immediately to himself. Here he is.

Enter GREGORY and HARRY.

Har. Sir, this is the doctor.

Sir J. Dear Sir, you're the welcomest man in the world.

Greg. Hippocrates says, we should both be covered.

Sir J. Ha! does Hippocrates say so? In what chapter, pray?

Greg. In his chapter of hats.

Sir J. Since Hippocrates says so, I shall obey him.

Greg. Doctor, after having exceedingly travelled in the highway of letters—

Sir J. Doctor! pray whom do you speak to?

Greg. To you, doctor.

Sir J. Ha, ha!—I am a knight, thank the king's grace for it; but no doctor.

Greg. What, you're no doctor?

Sir J. No, upon my word.

Greg. You're no doctor?

Sir J. Doctor! no.

Greg. There—'tis done. [Beats him.

Sir J. Done, in the devil's name! what 's done?

Greg. Why now you are made a doctor of physic—I am sure it's all the degrees I ever took.

Sir J. What devil of a fellow have you brought here?

Jam. I told you, Sir, the doctor had strange whims with him.

Sir J. Whims, quotha!—egad, I shall bind his physicianship over to his good behaviour, if he has any more of these whims.

Greg. Sir, I ask pardon for the liberty I have taken.

Sir J. Oh! it's very well, it's very well for once.

Greg. I am sorry for those blows.

Sir J. Nothing at all, nothing at all, Sir.

Greg. Which I was obliged to have the honour of laying so thick on you.

Sir J. Let's talk no more of 'em, Sir—my daughter, doctor, is fallen into a very strange distemper.

Greg. Sir, I am overjoyed to hear it: and I wish with all my heart, you and your whole family had the same occasion for me as your daughter, to show the great desire I have to serve you.

Sir J. Sir, I am obliged to you.

Greg. I assure you, Sir, I speak from the very bottom of my soul.

Sir J. I do believe you, Sir, from the very bottom of mine.

Greg. What is your daughter's name?

Sir J. My daughter's name is Charlotte.

Greg. Are you sure she was christened Charlotte?

Sir J. No, Sir, she was christened Charlotta.

Greg. Hum! I had rather she should have been christened Charlotte. Charlotte is a very good name for a patient; and let me tell you, the name is often of as much service to the patient as the physician is.

Enter CHARLOTTE and MAID.

Sir J. Sir, my daughter's here.

Greg. Is that my patient? Upon my word, she carries no distemper in her countenance, and I fancy a healthy young fellow would sit very well upon her.

Sir J. You make her smile, doctor.

Greg. So much the better; 'tis a very good sign when we can get a patient to smile; it is a sign that the distemper begins to clarify, as we say. Well, child, what's the matter with you? what's your distemper?

Char. Han, hi, hon, han—

Greg. What do you say—

Char. Han, hi, han, hon.

Greg. What, what, what?—

Char. Han, hi, hon—

Greg. Han! hon! honin! ha!—I don't understand a word she says. Han! hi! hon! what the devil of a language is this?

Sir J. Why, that's her distemper, Sir; she's become dumb, and no one can assign the cause—and this distemper, Sir, has kept back her marriage.

Greg. Kept back her marriage! why so?

Sir J. Because her lover refuses to have her till she's cured.

Greg. O lud! was ever such a fool, that would not have his wife dumb!—would to Heaven my wife was dumb, I'd be far from desiring to cure her. Does this distemper, this han, hi, hon, oppress her very much?

Sir J. Yes, Sir.

Greg. So much the better. Has she any great pains?

Sir J. Very great.

Greg. That's just as I would have it. Give me your hand, child. Hum—ha—a very dumb pulse indeed.

Sir J. You have guessed her distemper.

Greg. Ay, Sir, we great physicians know a distemper immediately: I know some of the college would call this the Boree, or the Coupee, or the Sinkee, or twenty other distempers; but I give you my word, Sir, your daughter is nothing more than dumb—so I'd have you be very easy for there is nothing else the matter with her— if she were not dumb, she would be as well as I am.

Sir J. But I should be glad to know, doctor, from whence her dumbness proceeds?

Greg. Nothing so easily accounted for. Her dumbness proceeds from her having lost her speech.

Sir J. But whence, if you please, proceeds her having lost her speech?

Greg. All our best authors will tell you, it is the impediment of the action of the tongue.

Sir J. But if you please, dear Sir, your sentiment upon that impediment.

Greg. Aristotle has upon that subject said very fine things; very fine things.

Sir J. I believe it, doctor.

Greg. Ah! he was a great man; he was indeed a very great man, who upon that subject was a man that—but to return to our reasoning: I hold that this impediment of the action of the tongue is caused by certain humours which our great physicians call—humours—humours—ah! you understand Latin—

Sir J. Not in the least.

Greg. What, not understand Latin?

Sir J. No indeed, doctor.

Greg. Cabricius arci Thurum Cathalimus, Singulariter non. Hæc musa, hic, hæc, hoc, Genitivo hujus, hunc, hanc, Musæ, Bonus, bona, bonum. Estne oratio Latinus? Etiam. Quia Substantivo et Adjectivum concordat in Generi, Numerum, et Casus, sic aiunt, prædicant, clamant, et similibus.

Sir J. Ah! Why did I neglect my studies?

Har. What a prodigious man is this!

Greg. Besides, Sir, certain spirits passing from the left side, which is the seat of the liver, to the right, which is the seat of the heart, we find the lungs, which we call in Latin, Whiskerus, having communication with the brain, which we name in Greek, Jackbootos, by means of a hollow vein, which we call in Hebrew, Periwiggius, meet in the road with the said spirits, which fill the ventricles of the Omotaplasmus, and because the said humours have—you comprehend me well, Sir? and because the said humours have a certain malignity—listen seriously, I beg you.

Sir J. I do.

Greg. Have a certain malignity that is caused—be attentive, if you please.

Sir J. I am.

Greg. That is caused, I say, by the acrimony of the humours engendered in the concavity of the diaphragm; thence it arrives, that these vapours, Propria quæ maribus tribuuntur, mascula dicas, Ut sunt divorum.—This, Sir, is the cause of your daughter's being dumb.

Har. O that I had but his tongue.

Sir J. It is impossible to reason better, no doubt. But, dear Sir, there is one thing.—I always thought 'till now, that the heart was on the left side, and the liver on the right.

Greg. Ay, Sir, so they were formerly, but we have changed all that.—The college, at present, Sir, proceeds upon an entire new method.

Sir J. I ask your pardon, Sir.

Greg. Oh, Sir! there's no harm—you're not obliged to know so much as we do.

Sir J. Very true; but, doctor, what would you have done with my daughter?

Greg. What would I have done with her?

Why, my advice is, that you immediately put her into a bed warmed with a brass warming-pan cause her to drink one quart of spring water, mixed with one pint of brandy, six Seville oranges, and three ounces of the best double refined sugar.

Sir J. Why, this is punch, doctor.

Greg. Punch, Sir! Ay, Sir;—and what's better than punch, to make people talk?—Never tell me of your juleps, your gruels, your—your—this, and that, and t'other, which are only arts to keep a patient in hand a long time. I love to do a business all at once.

Sir J. Doctor, I ask pardon, you shall be obeyed.

Greg. I'll return in the evening, and see what effect it has on her. But hold, there's another young lady here, that I must apply some little remedies to.

Maid. Who, me? I was never better in my life, I thank you, Sir.

Greg. So much the worse, Madam, so much the worse—'tis very dangerous to be very well—for when one is very well, one has nothing else to do, but to take physic, and bleed away.

Sir J. Oh strange! What, bleed when one has no distemper?

Greg. It may be strange, perhaps, but 'tis very wholesome. Besides, Madam, it is not your case, at present, to be very well; at least, you cannot possibly be well above three days longer: and it is always best to cure a distemper before you have it—or as we say in Greek, distemprium bestium est curare ante habestum.—What I shall prescribe you, at present, is to take every six hours one of these boluses.

Maid. Ha, ha, ha! Why, doctor, these look exactly like lumps of loaf sugar.

Greg. Take one of these boluses, I say, every six hours, washing it down with six spoonfuls of the best Holland's Geneva.

Sir J. Sure you are in jest, doctor!—This wench does not show any symptom of a distemper.

Greg. Sir Jasper, let me tell you, it were not amiss if you yourself took a little lenitive physic: I shall prepare something for you.

Sir J. Ha, ha, ha! No, no, doctor, I have escaped both doctors and distempers hitherto, and I am resolved the distemper shall pay me the first visit.

Greg. Say you so, Sir? Why then, if I can get no more patients here, I must even seek 'em elsewhere, and so humbly beggo te Domine Domitii veniam goundi foras.

Sir J. Well, this is a physician of vast capacity, but of exceeding odd humours. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—The Street.

Enter LEANDER.

Lean. Ah, Charlotte! thou hast no reason to apprehend my ignorance of what thou endurest, since I can so easily guess thy torment by my own.—Oh how much more justifiable are my fears, when you have not only the command of a parent, but the temptation of fortune to allure you!

Enter GREGORY.

Greg. Upon my word, this is a good beginning, and since—

Lean. I have waited for you, doctor, a long time; I'm come to beg your assistance.

Greg. Ay, you have need of my assistance indeed! What a pulse is here! What do you do out of your bed? [Feels his pulse.]

Lean. Ha, ha, ha! doctor you're mistaken; I am not sick, I assure you.

Greg. How, Sir! not sick! do you think I don't know when a man is sick, better than he does himself?

Lean. Well, if I have any distemper, it is the love of that young lady your patient, from whom you just now came, and to whom, if you convey me, I swear, dear doctor, I shall be effectually cured.

Greg. Do you take me for a pimp, Sir, a physician for a pimp?

Lean. Dear Sir! make no noise.

Greg. Sir, I will make a noise; you're an impertinent fellow.

Lean. Softly, good Sir!

Greg. I shall show you, Sir, that I'm not such a sort of a person, and that you are an insolent, saucy—[LEANER gives a purse.]—I'm not speaking to you, Sir; but there are certain impertinent fellows in the world, that take people for what they are not—which always puts me, Sir, into such a passion, that—

Lean. I ask pardon, Sir, for the liberty I have taken.

Greg. O dear Sir! no offence in the least. Pray, Sir, how am I to serve you?

Lean. This distemper, Sir, which you are sent for to cure, is feigned. The physicians have reasoned upon it, according to custom, and have derived it from the brain, from the bowels, from the liver, lungs, lights, and every part of the body; but the true cause of it is love; and is an invention of Charlotte's to deliver her from a match she dislikes.

Greg. Hum!—suppose you were to disguise yourself as an apothecary?

Lean. I'm not very well known to her father, therefore believe I may pass upon him securely.

Greg. Go then, disguise yourself immediately; I'll wait for you here—Ha! methinks I see a patient: I'll e'en continue a physician as long as I live. [Exit LEANER.]

Enter JAMES and DAVY.

Jam. [Speaking to DAVY.] Fear not, if he relapse into his humours, I'll quickly thrash him into the physician again. Doctor, I have brought you a patient.

Davy. My poor wife, doctor, has kept her bed these six months. [GREG. holds out his hand.] If your worship would find some means to cure her—

Greg. What's the matter with her?

Davy. Why, she has had several physicians; one says 'tis the dropsy; another, 'tis what-d'ye-call-it, the tumpany; a third says 'tis a slow fever; a fourth says the rumatiz; a fifth—

Greg. What are the symptoms?

Davy. Symptoms, Sir?

Greg. Ay, ay, what does she complain of?

Davy. Why, she is always craving and craving for drink, eats nothing at all. Then her legs are swelled up as big as a good handsome post, and as cold they be as a stone.

Greg. Come, to the purpose; speak to the purpose, my friend. [Holding out his hand.]

Davy. The purpose is, Sir, that I am come to ask what your worship pleases to have done with her.

Vol. I. . . . 4 U

Greg. Pshaw, pshaw, pshaw! I don't understand one word that you mean.

Jam. His wife is sick, doctor, and he has brought you a guinea for your advice. Give it the doctor, friend. [DAVY gives the guinea.]

Greg. Ay, now I understand you; here's a gentleman explains the case. You say your wife is sick of the dropsy?

Davy. Yes, an't please your worship.

Greg. Well, I have made a shift to comprehend your meaning at last; you have the strangest way of describing a distemper. You say your wife is always calling for drink; let her have as much as she desires, she can't drink too much; and d'ye hear, give her this piece of cheese!

Davy. Cheese, Sir!

Greg. Ay, cheese, Sir. The cheese of which this is a part, has cured more people of a dropsy, than ever had it.

Davy. I give your worship a thousand thanks; I'll go make her take it immediately. [Exit.]

Greg. Go; and, if she dies, be sure to bury her after the best manner you can.

Enter DORCAS.

Dor. I'm like to pay severely for my frolic, if I have lost my husband by it.

Greg. Oh, physic and matrimony! my wife!

Dor. For, though the rogue used me a little roughly, he was as good a workman as any in five miles of his head.

Greg. What evil stars, in the devil's name, have sent her hither? If I could but persuade her to take a pill or two that I'd give her, I should be a physician to some purpose—come hider, child, let me feela your pulsa.

Dor. What have you to do with my pulse?

Greg. I am de French physician, my dear, and I am to feel a de pulse of the patien.

Dor. Yes, but I am no patien, Sir, nor want no physician, good Dr. Ragou.

Greg. Begar, you must be put a to bed, and take a de peel; me sal give you de little peel dat sal cure you, as you have more distempren den evere were hered off.

Dor. What's the matter with the fool? If you feel my pulse any more, I shall feel your ears for you.

Greg. Begar, you must takea de peel.

Dor. Begar, I shall not takea de peel.

Greg. I'll take this opportunity to try her. [Aside.]—Maye dear, if you will not letta me cura you, you sal cura me, you sal be my physician, and I will give you de fee.

[Holds out a purse.]

Dor. Ay, my stomach does not go against those pills; and what must I do for your fee?

Greg. Oh begar! me vill show you, me vill teacha you what you sal doe; you must come kissa me now, you must come kissa me.

Dor. [Kisses him.] As I live, my very hang-dog! I've discovered him in good time, or he had discovered me. [Aside.]—Well, doctor, and are you cured now?

Greg. I shall make myself a cuckold presently. [Aside.]—Dis is not a propre place, dis too publique, for sud any one pass by while I taka dis physique, it vill preventa de operation.

Dor. What physic, doctor?

Greg. In your ear, dat.

[Whispers.]

Dor. And in in your ear, dat, sirrah, [Hitting] him a box.] Do you dare affront my virtue, you villain! D'ye think the world should bribe me to part with my virtue, my dear virtue? There, take your purse again.

Greg. But where's the gold?

Dor. The gold I'll keep, as an eternal monument of my virtue.

Greg. O what a happy dog am I, to find my wife so virtuous a woman, when I least expected it! Oh my injured dear! behold your Gregory, your own husband.

Dor. Ha!

Greg. Oh me, I'm so full of joy, I cannot tell thee more, than that I am as much the happiest of men, as thou art the most virtuous of women.

Dor. And art thou really my Gregory? And hast thou any more of these purses?

Greg. No, my dear, I have no more about me; but 'tis probable in a few days I may have a hundred; for the strangest accident has happened to me!

Dor. Yes, my dear, but I can tell you whom you are obliged to for that accident; had you not beaten me this morning, I had never had you beaten into a physician.

Greg. Oh, oh! then 'tis to you I owe all that drubbing.

Dor. Yes, my dear, though I little dreamt of the consequence.

Greg. How infinitely I'm obliged to thee!—But hush!

Enter HELLEBORE.

Hel. Are not you the great doctor just come to this town, famous for curing dumbness!

Greg. Sir, I am he.

Hel. Then, Sir, I should be glad of your advice.

Greg. Let me feel your pulse.

Hel. Not for myself, good doctor; I am myself, Sir, a brother of the faculty, what the world calls a mad doctor. I have at present under my care, a patient whom I can by no means prevail with to speak.

Greg. I shall make him speak, Sir.

Hel. It will add, Sir, to the great reputation you have already acquired: I am happy in finding you.

Greg. Sir, I am as happy in finding you. You see that woman there; she is possessed of a more strange sort of madness, and imagines every one she sees to be her husband. Now, Sir, if you will but admit her into your house—

Hel. Most willingly, Sir.

Greg. The first thing, Sir, you are to do, is to let out thirty ounces of her blood: then, Sir, you are to shave off all her hair, all her hair, Sir; after which you are to make a very severe use of your rod twice a day; and take a particular care that she have not the least allowance beyond bread and water.

Hel. Sir, I shall readily agree to the dictates of so great a man; nor can I help approving of your method, which is exceeding mild and wholesome.

Greg. [To his wife.] My dear, that gentleman will conduct you to my lodging.—Sir, I beg you will take a particular care of the lady.

Hel. You may depend on't, Sir, nothing in my power shall be wanting; you have only to inquire for Dr. Hellebore.

Dor. 'Twon't be long before I see you, husband.

Hel. Husband! this is as unaccountable a madness as any I have yet met with.

[Exit with DORCAS.]

Enter LEANDER.

Greg. I think I shall be revenged of you now, my dear.—So, Sir.

Lean. I think I make a pretty good apothecary now.

Greg. Yes, faith, you're almost as good an apothecary as I'm a physician, and if you please I'll convey you to the patient.

Lean. If I did but know a few physical hard words—

Greg. A few physical hard words! why, in a few hard words consists the science. Would you know as much as the whole faculty in an instant, Sir? come along, come along.—Hold, let me go first; the doctor must always go before the apothecary. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—SIR JASPER'S HOUSE.

SIR JASPER, CHARLOTTE, GREGORY, LEANDER.

Sir J. Has she made no attempt to speak yet?

Jam. Not in the least, Sir; so far from it, that, as she used to make a sort of a noise before, she is now quite silent.

Sir J. [Looking on his watch.] 'Tis almost the time the doctor promised to return. Oh! he is here. Doctor, your servant.

Greg. Well, Sir, how does my patient?

Sir J. Rather worse, Sir, since your prescription.

Greg. So much the better, 'tis a sign that it operates.

Sir J. Who is that gentleman, pray, with you?

Greg. An apothecary, Sir. Mr. Apothecary, I desire you would immediately apply the remedy I prescribed.

Sir J. A song, doctor? prescribe a song!

Greg. Prescribe a song, Sir! yes, Sir, prescribe a song, Sir. Is there any thing so strange in that? did you never hear of pills to purge melancholy? If you understand these things better than I, why did you send for me? shud! Sir, this song would make a stone speak. But, if you please, Sir, you and I will confer at some distance during the application; for this song will do you as much harm as it will do your daughter good. Be sure, Mr. Apothecary, to pour it down her ears very closely.

Air.—LEANDER.

*Thus, lovely patient, Charlotte sees
Her dying patient kneel;
Soon cured will be your feign'd disease
But what physician e'er can ease
The torments which I feel.*

*Think, skilful nymph, while I complain,
Ah! I think what I endure!
All other remedies are vain;
The lovely cause of all my pain
Can only cause my cure.*

Greg. It is, Sir, a great and subtle question among the doctors, whether the women are more easy to be cured than men. I beg that you would attend to this, Sir, if you please.—Some say, no; others say, yes; and for my part, I say both yes, and no; forasmuch as the incongruity of the opaque humours that meet in the natural temper of women, are the cause that the brutal part will always prevail over the sensible—one sees that the inequality of their opinions depends on the black movement of the circle of the moon, and as the sun that darts its rays upon the concavity of the earth, finds—

Char. No, I am not at all capable of changing my opinion.

Sir J. My daughter speaks! my daughter speaks! Oh, the great power of physic! oh the admirable physician! How can I reward thee for such a service?

Greg. This distemper has given me a most insufferable deal of trouble.

[Traversing the stage in a great heat, the apothecary following.]

Char. Yes, Sir, I have recovered my speech; but I have recovered it to tell you, that I never will have any husband but Leander.

[Speaks with great eagerness, and drives Sir JASPER round the stage.]

Sir J. But——

Char. Nothing is capable to shake the resolution I have taken.

Sir J. What!

Char. Your rhetoric is in vain; all your discourses signify nothing.

Sir J. I——

Char. I am determined, and all the fathers in the world shall never oblige me to marry contrary to my inclination.

Sir J. I have——

Char. I never will submit to this tyranny; and if I must not have the man I like, I'll die a maid.

Sir J. You shall have Mr. Dapper——

Char. No, not in any manner, not in the least, not at all; you throw away your breath, you lose your time; you may confine me, beat me, bruise me, destroy me, kill me, do what you will, but I never will consent; nor all your threats, nor all your blows, nor all your ill-usage, never shall force me to consent; so far from giving him my heart, I never will give him my hand; for he is my aversion, I hate the very sight of him, I had rather see the devil, I had rather touch a toad; you may make me miserable any other way, but with him you sha'n't, that I'm resolved.

Greg. There, Sir, there, I think we have brought her tongue to a pretty tolerable consistency.

Sir J. Consistency, quotha! why, there is no stopping her tongue.—Dear doctor, I desire you will make her dumb again.

Greg. That's impossible, Sir; all that I can do to serve you is, I can make you deaf if you please.

Sir J. And do you think——

Char. All your reasoning shall never conquer my resolution.

Sir J. You shall marry Mr. Dapper, this evening.

Char. I'll be buried first.

Greg. Stay, Sir, stay, let me regulate this affair; it is a distemper that possesses her, and I know what remedy to apply to it.

Sir J. Is it possible, Sir, that you can cure the distempers of the mind?

Greg. Sir, I can cure any thing. Harkye, Mr. Apothecary, you see that the love she has for Leander is entirely contrary to the will of her father, and that there is no time to lose, and that an immediate remedy is necessary: for my part, I know of but one, which is a dose of purgative running-away, mixt with two drachms of pills matrimoniac, and three large handfuls of the arbor vite; perhaps she will make some difficulty to take them; but, as you are an able apothecary, I shall trust to you for the success; go, make her walk in the garden, be sure lose no time; to the remedy, quick, to the remedy specific.

[Exit LEANDER and CHARLOTTE.]

Sir J. What drugs, Sir, were those I heard you mention, for I don't remember I ever heard them spoken of before?

Greg. They, are some, Sir, lately discovered by the Royal Society.

Sir J. Did you ever see any thing equal to her insolence?

Greg. Daughters are indeed sometimes a little too head-strong.

Sir J. You cannot imagine, Sir, how foolishly fond she is of that Leander.

Greg. The heat of blood, Sir, causes that in young minds.

Sir J. For my part, the moment I discovered the violence of her passion, I have always kept her locked up.

Greg. You have done very wisely.

Sir J. And I have prevented them from having the least communication together; for who knows what might have been the consequence? who knows but she might have taken it into her head, to have run away with him.

Greg. Very true.

Sir J. Ay, Sir, let me alone for governing girls; I think I have some reason to be vain on that head; I think I have shown the world, that I understand a little of women, I think I have; and let me tell you, Sir, there is not a little art required; if this girl had had some fathers, they had not kept her out of the hands of so vigilant a lover as I have done.

Greg. No certainly, Sir.

Enter DORCAS.

Dor. Where is this villain, this rogue, this pretended physician?

Sir J. Heyday! What, what, what's the matter now?

Dor. Oh sirrah! sirrah! would you have destroyed your wife, you villain? would you have been guilty of murder, dog!

Greg. Hoity, toity! What mad woman is this?

Sir J. Poor wretch! for pity's sake cure her, doctor.

Greg. Sir, I shall not cure her, unless somebody gives me a fee. If you will give me a fee, Sir Jasper, you shall see me cure her this instant.

Dor. I'll fee you, you villain. Cure me!

Enter JAMES.

Jam. Oh, Sir! undone, undone! your daughter is run away with her lover, Leander, who was here disguised like an apothecary—and this is the rogue of a physician, who has contrived all the affair.

Sir J. How! am I abused in this manner? Here, who is there? Bid my clerk bring pen, ink, and paper; I'll send this fellow to jail immediately.

Jam. Indeed, my good doctor, you stand a very fair chance to be hanged for stealing an heiress.

Greg. Yes, indeed, I believe I shall take my degrees now.

Dor. And are they going to hang you, my dear husband?

Greg. You see, my dear wife.

Dor. Had you finished the faggots, it had been some consolation.

Greg. Leave me, or you'll break my heart.

Dor. No, I'll stay to encourage you at your death; nor will I budge an inch, till I've seen you hanged.

Enter LEANDER and CHARLOTTE.

Lean. Behold, Sir, that Leander, whom you had forbid your house, restores your daughter to your power, even when he had her in his. I have received letters, by which I have learnt the death of an uncle, whose estate far exceeds that of your intended son-in-law.

Sir J. Sir, your virtue is beyond all estates, and I give you my daughter with all the pleasure in the world.

Lean. Now my fortune makes me happy indeed, my dearest Charlotte. And, doctor, I'll make thy fortune too.

Greg. If you would be so kind to make me a physician in earnest, I should desire no other fortune.

Lean. Faith, doctor, I wish I could do that in return for your having made me an apothecary; but I'll do as well for thee, I warrant.

Dor. So, so, our physician, I find, has brought about fine matters. And is it not owing to me, sirrah, that you have been a physician at all?

Sir J. May I beg to know whether you are a physician or not, or what the devil you are?

Greg. I think, Sir, after the miraculous cure you have seen me perform, you have no reason to ask, whether I am a physician or no. And for you, wife, I'll henceforth have you behave with all deference to my greatness; for a faggot-maker can only thrash your jacket, but a physician, he—

Dor. Can pick your pocket. Why, thou puffed up fool! I could have made as good a physician myself; the cure was owing to the apothecary, not the doctor. [Exeunt.]

THE MOURNING BRIDE:

A TRAGEDY,

IN FIVE ACTS.

BY WILLIAM CONGREVE, Esq.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

MANUEL, the King of Granada,
GONSALEZ, his Favourite,
GARCIA, Son to Gonsalez.
PEREZ, Captain of the Guards.
ALONZO, an Officer, Creature to Gonsalez.
OSMYN, a noble Prisoner.
HELLI, a Prisoner, his Friend.
SELIM, a Eunich.

ALMERIA, the Princess of Granada.
ZARA, a Captive Queen.
LEONORA, chief Attendant on the Princess.

Women, Eunuchs, and Mutes, attending Zara, Guards, &c.

SCENE.—Granada.

PROLOGUE.

THE time has been when plays were not so plenty,
And a less number, new, would well content ye.
New plays did then like almanacks appear,
And one was thought sufficient for a year:
Though they are more like almanacks of late;
For in one year, I think, they're out of date.
Nor were they, without reason, joined together;
For just as one prognosticates the weather,
How plentiful the crop, or scarce the grain,
What peals of thunder, or what showers of rain;
So t'other can foretell, by certain rules,
What crops of coxcombs, or what floods of fools.
In such like prophecies were poets skill'd,
Which now they find in their own tribe fulfill'd.
The dearth of wit they did so long presage,
Is fallen on us, and almost starves the stage.
Were you not griev'd, as often as you saw
Poor actors thrash such empty sheafs of straw?
Toiling and labouring at their lungs' expense,
To start a jest, or force a little sense?
Hard fate for us, still harder in the event:
Our authors sin, but we alone repent.
Still they proceed, and, at our charge, write worse;
'Twere some amends, if they could reimburse;
But there 's the devil, though their cause is lost,
There 's no recovering damages or cost.
Good wits, forgive this liberty we take,
Since custom gives the losers leave to speak.
But, if provok'd, your dreadful wrath remains,
Take your revenge upon the coming scenes:

For that damn'd poet's spar'd, who damns a brother,
As one thief 'scapes that executes another.
Thus far alone does to the wits relate;
But from the rest we hope a better fate.
To please, and move, has been our poet's theme,
Art may direct, but nature is his aim;
And nature miss'd, in vain he boasts his art,
For only nature can affect the heart.
Then freely judge the scenes that shall ensue;
But as with freedom, judge with candour too.
He would not lose, through prejudice, his cause;
Nor would obtain, precariously, applause.
Impartial censure he requests from all,
Prepar'd by just decrees to stand or fall.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Room of State.

The Curtain rising slowly to soft Music, discovers ALMERIA in Mourning, LEONORA waiting in Mourning.

After the Music, ALMERIA rises from her Chair, and comes forward.

Almeria. Music has charms to sooth a savage breast,
To soften rocks, or bend a knotted oak.
I've read, that things inanimate have mov'd,
And, as with living souls, have been inform'd
By magic numbers and persuasive sound.

What then am I? Am I more senseless grown
Than trees or flint? O, force of constant wo,
'Tis not in harmony to calm my griefs.

Anselmo sleeps, and is at peace; last night
The silent tomb receiv'd the good old king;
He and his sorrows now are safely lodg'd
Within its cold, but hospitable bosom.

Why am not I at peace?

Leon. Dear Madam, cease,

Or moderate your grief; there is no cause—

Atm. No cause! Peace, peace! there is eternal cause,

And misery eternal will succeed.

Thou canst not tell—thou hast indeed no cause.

Leon. Believe me, Madam, I lament Anselmo,
And always did compassionate his fortune;
Have often wept, to see how cruelly
Your father kept in chains his fellow-king:

And oft, at night, when all have been retir'd,
Have stolen from bed, and to his prison crept;
Where, while his gaoler slept, I through the grate

Have softly whisper'd, and inquir'd his health;
Sent in my sighs and pray'rs for his deliverance;
For sighs and pray'rs were all that I could offer.

Atm. Indeed thou hast a soft and gentle nature,

That thus could melt to see a stranger's wrongs.

Oh, Leonora, hadst thou known Anselmo,
How would thy heart have bled to see his sufferings!

Thou hadst no cause but general compassion.

Leon. Love of my royal mistress gave me
cause,

My love of you begot my grief for him;
For I heard that when the chance of war
Had bless'd Anselmo's arms with victory,
And the rich spoil of all the field, and you,
The glory of the whole, were made the prey
Of his success; that then, in spite of hate,
Revenge, and that hereditary feud
Between Valentia's and Granada's kings,
He did endear himself to your affection,
By all the worthy and indulgent ways
His most industrious goodness could invent;
Proposing, by a match between Alphonso
His son, the brave Valentian prince, and you,
To end the long dissension, and unite
The jarring crowns.

Atm. Alphonso! O, Alphonso!

Thou too art quiet—long hast been at peace—
Both, both—father and son are now no more.
Then why am I? Oh, when shall I have rest?
Why do I live to say you are no more?
Why are all these things thus?—Is it of force?
Is there necessity I must be miserable?
Is it of moment to the peace of Heaven,
That I should be afflicted thus?—If not,
Why is it thus contriv'd? Why are things laid
By some unseen hand, so, as of sure consequence,

They must to me bring curses, grief of heart,
The last distress of life, and sure despair?

Leon. Alas! you search too far, and think too deeply.

Atm. Why was I carried to Anselmo's court?
Or there, why was I used so tenderly?

Why not ill treated like an enemy?
For so my father would have used his child.
Oh, Alphonso, Alphonso!

Devouring seas have wash'd thee from my sight,
No time shall raze thee from my memory;

No, I will live to be thy monument:

The cruel ocean is no more thy tomb:
But in my heart thou art interr'd; there, there,
Thy dear resemblance is for ever fix'd;
My love, my lord, my husband still, though lost.

Leon. Husband! Oh, Heavens!

Atm. Alas! what have I said?

My grief has hurried me beyond all thought.

I would have kept that secret; though I know
Thy love and faith to me deserve all confidence.
But 'tis the wretch's comfort still to have
Some small reserve of near and inward wo,
Some unsuspected hoard of darling grief,
Which they unseen may wail, and weep, and mourn,

And, glutton-like, alone devour.

Leon. Indeed,

I knew not this:

Atm. Oh, no; thou know'st not half,

Know'st nothing of my sorrows—if thou didst—
If I should tell thee, wouldst thou pity me?

Tell me—I know thou wouldst; thou art compassionate.

Leon. Witness these tears—

Atm. I think thee, Leonora—

Indeed I do, for pitying thy sad mistress:

For 'tis, alas! the poor prerogative

Of greatness, to be wretched, and unpitied—

But I did promise I would tell thee—What?

My miseries! Thou dost already know 'em:

And when I told thee thou didst nothing know,

It was because thou didst not know Alphonso:

For to have known my loss, thou must have known

His worth, his truth, and tenderness of love.

Leon. The memory of that brave prince stands fair

In all report—

And I have heard imperfectly his loss;

But, fearful to renew your troubles past,

I never did presume to ask the story.

Atm. If for my swelling heart I can, I'll tell thee.

I was a welcome captive in Valentia,

E'en on the day when Manuel, my father,

Led on his conquering troops high as the gates

Of king Anselmo's palace; which, in rage,

And heat of war, and dire revenge, he fir'd.

The good king, flying to avoid the flames,

Started amidst his foes, and made captivity

His fatal refuge—Would that I had fallen

Amidst those flames—but 'twas not so decreed.

Alphonso, who foresaw my father's cruelty,

Had borne the queen and me on board a ship

Ready to sail; and when this news was brought

We put to sea; but being betray'd by some

Who knew our flight, we closely were pursu'd,

And almost taken, when a sudden storm

Drove us, and those that follow'd on the coast

Of Afric: there our vessel struck the shore

And bulging 'gainst a rock, was dash'd in pieces;

But Heaven spar'd me for yet much more afflic-
tion:

Conducting them who follow'd us, to shun

The shore, and save me floating on the waves,

While the good queen and my Alphonso perish'd.

Leon. Alas! were you then wedded to Alphonso?

Atm. That day, that fatal day, our hands were join'd.

For when my lord beheld the ship pursuing,

And saw her rate so far exceeding ours,

He came to me, and begg'd me by my love,
I would consent the priest should make us one;
That whether death or victory ensued
I might be his, beyond the power of fate;
The queen too did assist his suit—I granted;
And in one day was wedded and a widow.

Leon. Indeed 'twas mournful—

Alm. 'Twas as I have told thee—
For which I mourn, and will for ever mourn;
Nor will I change these black and dismal robes,
Or ever dry these swoln and watery eyes;
Or ever taste content or peace of heart,
While I have life, and thought of my Alphonso.

Leon. Look down, good Heaven, with pity on her sorrows,

And grant that time may bring her some relief.

Alm. Oh, no! time gives increase to my afflictions.

The circling hours, that gather all the woes
Which are diffus'd through the revolving year,
Come heavy laden with th' oppressive weight
'To me; with me, successively, they leave
The sighs, the tears, the groans, the restless cares,

And all the damps of grief, that did retard their flight:

They shake their downy wings, and scatter all
The dire collected dews on my poor head:
Then fly with joy and swiftness from me.

Leon. Hark! [Shouts at a distance.]

The distant shouts proclaim your father's triumph.
O cease, for Heaven's sake, assuage a little
This torrent of your grief, for this, I fear,
'Twill urge his wrath, to see you drown'd in tears,

When joy appears in every other face.

Alm. And joy he brings to every other heart,
But double, double weight of wo to mine:
For with him Garcia comes—Garcia, to whom
I must be sacrific'd, and all the vows
I gave my dear Alphonso basely broken.
No, it shall never be; for I will die
First, die ten thousand deaths—Look down, look down,

Alphonso, hear the sacred vow I make; [Kneels.]
One moment, cease to gaze on perfect bliss,
And bend thy glorious eyes to earth and me.
And thou, Anselmo, if yet thou art arriv'd,
Through all impediments of purging fire,
'To that bright Heaven, where my Alphonso reigns,

Behold thou also, and attend my vow.
If ever I do yield, or give consent,
By any action, word, or thought, to wed
Another lord; may then just Heaven shower
down

Unheard of curses on me, greater far
(If such there be in angry Heaven's vengeance)
That any I have yet endur'd—And now

[Rising.]
My heart has some relief; having so well
Discharg'd this debt, incumbent on my love.
Yet, one thing more I would engage from thee.

Leon. My heart, my life, and will, are only yours.

Alm. I thank thee. 'Tis but this, anon:
when all

Are wrapp'd and busied in the general joy,
Thou wilt withdraw, and privately with me
Steal forth, to visit good Anselmo's tomb.

Leon. Alas! I fear some fatal resolution.

Alm. No, on my life, my faith, I mean no ill,

Nor violence—I feel myself more light,
And more at large, since I have made this vow.
Perhaps I would repeat it there more solemnly.
'Tis that, or some such melancholy thought,
Upon my word, no more.

Leon. I will attend you.

Enter ALONZO.

Alon. The lord Gonsalez comes to tell your highness

The king is just arriv'd.

Alm. Conduct him in. [Exit ALON.]

That's his pretence; his errand is, I know,
To fill my ears with Garcia's valiant deeds;
And gild and magnify his son's exploits.

But I am arm'd with ice around my heart,
Not to be warm'd with words, or idle eloquence.

Enter GONSALEZ.

Gon. Be every day of your long life like this.
The sun, bright conquest, and your brighter eyes,
Have all conspir'd to blaze promiscuous light,
And bless this day with most unequal'd lustre.
Your royal father, my victorious lord,
Loaden with spoils, and ever-living laurel,

Is entering now, in martial pomp, the palace.
Five hundred mules precede his solemn march,
Which groan beneath the weight of Moorish wealth.

Chariots of war, adorn'd with glittering gems,
Succeed; and next, a hundred neighing steeds,
White as the fleecy rain on Alpine hills,
That bound and foam, and champ the golden bit,
As they disdain'd the victory they grace.

Prisoners of war, in shining fetters follow:
And captains of the noblest blood of Afric
Sweat by his chariot wheel, and lick and grind,
With gnashing teeth, the dust his triumphs raise.
The swarming populace spread every wall,
And cling, as if with claws they did enforce Their hold; through lifted stones stretching and staring,

As if they were all eyes, and every limb
Would feed its faculty with admiration:
While you alone retire, and shun this sight;
This sight, which is indeed not seen, (though twice

The multitude should gaze) in absence of your eyes.

Alm. My lord, my eyes ungratefully behold
The gilded trophies of exterior honours.
Nor will my ears be charmed with sounding words,
Or pompous phrase, the pageantry of souls.
But that my father is return'd in safety,
I bend to Heaven with thanks.

Gon. Excellent princess!—
But 'tis a task unfit for my weak age
With dying words to offer at your praise.

Garcia, my son, your beauty's lowest slave,
Has better done, in proving with his sword
The force and influence of your matchless charms.

Alm. I doubt not of the worth of Garcia's deeds,
Which had been brave though I had ne'er been born.

Leon. Madam, the king. [Flourish]

Alm. My women. I would meet him.

[Attendants to ALMERIA enter in mourning.]

Symphony of warlike Music. Enter the KING, attended by GARCIA and several Officers. Files of Prisoners in chains, and Guards, who are ranged in order round the Stage. ALMERIA meets the KING, and kneels: afterwards GONSALEZ kneels, and kisses the KING's hand, while GARCIA does the same to the PRINCESS.

King. Almeria, rise—My best Gonzalez, rise. What, tears! my good old friend—

Gon. But tears of joy.

Believe me, Sir, to see you thus, has fill'd Mine eyes with more delight than they can hold.

King. By Heaven, thou lov'st me, and I'm pleas'd thou dost;

Take it for thanks, old man, that I rejoice To see thee weep on this occasion—Some Here are, who seem to mourn at our success! Why is't, Almeria, that you meet our eyes, Upon this solemn day, in these sad weeds? In opposition to my brightness, you And yours are all like daughters of affliction.

Alm. Forgive me, Sir, if I in this offend.

The year which I have vow'd to pay to Heaven, In mourning and strict life for my deliverance From wreck and death, wants yet to be expir'd.

King. Your zeal to Heaven is great, so is your debt:

Yet something too is due to me, who gave That life, which Heaven preserv'd. A day bestow'd

In filial duty, had aton'd and given A dispensation to your vow—No more! 'Twas weak and wilful—and a woman's error. Yet, upon thought, it doubly wounds my sight, To see that sable worn upon the day, Succeeding that, in which our deadliest foe, Hated Anselmo, was interr'd—By Heaven, It looks as thou didst mourn for him: just so Thy senseless vow appear'd to bear its date, Not from that hour wherein thou wert preserv'd, But that wherein the curs'd Alphonso perish'd. Ha! What? thou dost not weep to think of that!

Gon. Have patience, royal Sir; the princess weeps

To have offended you. If fate decreed, One pointed hour should be Alphonso's loss, And her deliverance, is she to blame?

King. I tell thee she's to blame, not to have feasted

When my first foe was laid in earth, such enmity, Such detestation bears my blood to his; My daughter should have revel'd at his death, She should have made these palace walls to shake,

And all this high and ample roof to ring With her rejoicings. What, to mourn and weep!

'Tis then, then to weep, and pray, and grieve! by Heaven!

There's not a slave, a shackl'd slave of mine, But should have smil'd that hour, through all his care, And shook his chains in transport and rude harmony.

Gon. What she has done, was in excess of goodness; Betray'd by too much piety, to seem As if she had offended.—Sure, no more.

King. To seem is to commit, at this conjuncture.

I wo't not have a seeming sorrow seen

To-day. Retire; divest yourself with speed Of that offensive black; on me be all The violation of your vow; for you, It shall be your excuse, that I command it.

Gar. [Kneeling.] Your pardon, Sir, if I presume so far,

As to remind you of your gracious promise.

King. Rise, Garcia.—I forgot. Yet stay, Almeria.

Alm. My boding heart!—What is your pleasure, Sir?

King. Draw near, and give your hand, and Garcia, yours:

Receive this lord, as one whom I have found Worthy to be your husband, and my son.

Gar. Thus let me kneel to take—O, not to take—

But to devote, and yield myself for ever

The slave and creature of my royal mistress.

Gon. O, let me prostrate pay my worthless thanks—

King. No more; my promise long since pass'd, thy services,

And Garcia's well-tried valour, all oblige me:

This day we triumph; but to-morrow's sun, Garcia, shall shine to grace thy nuptials—

Alm. Oh!

Gar. She faints! help to support her. [Faints.]

Gon. She recovers.

King. A fit of bridal fear. How is't, Almeria?

Alm. A sudden chillness seizes on my spirits.

Your leave, Sir, to retire.

King. Garcia, conduct her.

[GARCIA leads ALMERIA to the door, and returns.]

This idle vow hangs on her woman's fears.

I'll have a priest shall preach her from her faith,

And make it sin not to renounce that vow

Which I'd have broken. Now, what would Alonzo?

Enter ALONZO.

Alon. Your beauteous captive, Zara, is arriv'd, And with a train as if she still were wife To Albucacim, and the Moor had conquer'd.

King. It is our will she should be so attended. Bear hence these prisoners. Garcia, which is he, Of whose mute valour you relate such wonders?

[Prisoners led off.]
Gar. Osmyn, who led the Moorish horse; but he,

Great Sir, at her request, attends on Zara.

King. He is your prisoner; as you please dispose him.

Gar. I would oblige him, but he shuns my kindness;

And with a haughty mien and stern civility,

Dumbly declines all offers. If he speak,

'Tis scarce above a word; as he were born

Alone to do, and did disdain to talk;

At least to talk where he must not command.

King. Such sullenness, and in a man so brave,

Must have some other cause than his captivity.

Did Zara, then, request he might attend her?

Gar. My lord, she did.

King. That, join'd with his behaviour, Begets a doubt. I'd have 'em watch'd; perhaps Her chains hang heavier on him than his own.

Enter ALONZO, ZARA, and OSMYN bound, conducted by PEREZ and a guard, attended by SELIM and several mutes and eunuchs in a train.

King. What welcome, and what honours, beautiful Zara,

A king and conqueror can give, are yours :
A conqueror indeed where you are won ;
Who with such lustre strike admiring eyes,
That had our pomp been with your presence
grac'd,
Th' expecting crowd had been deceiv'd ; and seen

The monarch enter not triumphant, but
In pleasing triumph led ; your beauty's slave.

Zar. If I on any terms could condescend
To like captivity, or think those honours,
Which conquerors in courtesy bestow,
Of equal value with unborrow'd rule
And native right to arbitrary sway,
I might be pleased, when I behold this train
With usual homage wait : but when I feel
These bonds, I look with loathing on myself,
And scorn vile slavery, though doubly hid
Beneath mock praises, and dissembled state.

King. Those bonds ! 'Twas my command you should be free.

How durst you, Perez, disobey ?

Perez. Great Sir,

Your order was, she should not wait your triumph,
But at some distance follow, thus attended.

King. 'Tis false ; 'twas more ; I bid she should be free ;

If not in words, I bid it by my eyes.

Her eyes did more than bid—Free her and hers

With speed—yet stay—my hands alone can make

Fit restitution here—Thus I release you.

And by releasing you, enslave myself.

Zar. Such favours, so conferr'd, though when unsought,

Deserve acknowledgment from noble minds.

Such thanks, as one hating to be oblig'd—

Yet hating more ingratitude, can pay,
I offer.

King. Born to excel, and to command !

As by transcendent beauty to attract

All eyes, so, by pre-eminence of soul,

To rule all hearts.

Garcia, what's he, who with contracted brow,

[Beholding OSMYN as they unbind him.

And sullen port, glooms downwards with his eyes ;

At once regardless of his chains, or liberty ?

Gar. That, Sir, is he of whom I spoke ; that's Osmyn.

King. He answers well the character you gave him.

Whence comes it, valiant Osmyn, that a man

So great in arms as thou art said to be,

So hardly can endure captivity,

The common chance of war ?

Osmyn. Because captivity

Has robb'd me of a dear and just revenge.

King. I understand not that.

Osmyn. I would not have you.

Zar. That gallant Moor in battle lost a friend,

Whom more than life he lov'd ; and the regret

Of not revenging on his foes that loss,

Has caus'd this melancholy and despair.

King. She does excuse him ; 'tis as I suspected.

[To GONS.

Gon. That friend might be herself ; seem not to heed

His arrogant reply : she looks concern'd.

King. I'll have inquiry made ; perhaps his friend

Yet lives, and is a prisoner. His name ?

Zar. Heli.

King. Garcia, that search shall be your care :

It shall be mine to pay devotion here ;

At this fair shrine to lay my laurels down

And raise love's altar on the spoils of war.

Conquest and triumphs, now, are mine no more ;

Nor will I victory in camps adore :

For, lingering there, in long suspense she stands,

Shifting the prize in unresolving hands ;

Unus'd to wait, I broke through her delay,

Fix'd her by force, and snatch'd the doubtful day,

Now late I find that war is but her sport ;

In love the goddess keeps her awful court,

Fickle in fields, unsteadily she flies,

But rules with settl'd sway in Zara's eyes. [Exit.

ACT II.

SCENE I.—Representing the aisle of a Temple.

GARCIA, HELI, PEREZ.

Gar. This way we're told, Osmyn was seen to walk ;

Choosing this lonely mansion of the dead,

To mourn, brave Heli, thy mistaken fate.

Heli. Let Heaven with thunder to the centre strike me,

If to arise in very deed from death,

And to revisit, with my long-clos'd eyes,

This living light, could to my soul or sense

Afford a thought, or show a glimpse of joy,

In least proportion to the vast delight

I feel, to hear of Osmyn's name ; to hear

That Osmyn lives, and I again shall see him.

Gar. I've heard, with admiration of your friendship.

Per. Yonder, my lord, behold the noble Moor.

Heli. Where ? Where ?

Gar. I saw him not, nor any like him—

Per. I saw him when I spoke, thwarting my view,

And striding with distemper'd haste ; his eyes

Seem'd flame, and flash'd upon me with a glance

Then forward shot their fires, which he pursu'd

As to some object frightful, yet not fear'd.

Gar. Let's haste to follow him, and know the cause.

Heli. My lord, let me intreat you to forbear :

Leave me alone, to find and cure the cause.

I know his melancholy, and such starts

Are usual to his temper. It might raise him

To act some violence upon himself,

So to be caught in an unguarded hour,

And when his soul gives all her passion way,

Secure and loose in friendly solitude.

I know his noble heart would burst with shame,

To be surpriz'd by strangers in its frailty.

Gar. Go, generous Heli, and relieve your friend.

Far be it from me officiously to pry

Or press upon the privacies of others. [Exit HELI.

Perez, the king expects from our return

To have his jealousy confirm'd or clear'd,

Of that appearing love which Zara bears

To Osmyn ; but some other opportunity

Must make that plain.

Per. To me 'twas long since plain,

And every look from him and her confirms it.

Gar. If so, unhappiness attends their love,
And I could pity 'em. I hear some coming.
The friends, perhaps are met; let us avoid 'em.

[Exeunt.]

Enter ALMERIA and LEONORA.

Alm. It was a fancied noise, for all is hush'd.

Leon. It bore the accent of a human voice.

Alm. It was thy fear, or else some transient wind

Whistling through hollows of this vaulted aisle.

We'll listen—

Leon. Hark!

Alm. No, all is hush'd, and still as death—'tis dreadful!

How reverend is the face of this tall pile,
Whose ancient pillars rear their marble heads,
To bear aloft its arch'd and ponderous roof,
By its own weight made steadfast and immoveable,
Looking tranquillity. It strikes an awe
And terror on my aching sight; the tombs
And monumental caves of death look cold,
And shoot a chillness to my trembling heart.
Give me thy hand, and let me hear thy voice;
Nay, quickly speak to me, and let me hear
Thy voice—my own affrights me with its echoes.

Leon. Let us return; the horror of this place
And silence will increase your melancholy.

Alm. It may my fears, but cannot add to that.
No, I will on; show me Anselmo's tomb,
Lead me o'er bones and skulls and mouldering earth,

Of human bodies; for I'll mix with them,
Or wind me in the shroud of some pale corpse
Yet green in earth, rather than be the bride
Of Garcia's more detested bed: that thought
Exerts my spirits; and my present fears
Are lost in dread of greater ill. Then show me, Lead me, for I am bolder grown: lead on Where I may kneel, and pay my vows again
To him, to Heaven, and my Alphonso's soul.

Leon. I go, but Heaven can tell with what regret. [Exit.]

Enter HELL.

I wander through this maze of monuments,
Yet cannot find him—Hark! sure 'tis the voice
Of one complaining.—There it sounds—I'll follow
it. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—Opening, discovers a place of Tombs: one Monument fronting the view greater than the rest.

Enter ALMERIA and LEONORA.

Leon. Behold the sacred vault, within whose womb

The poor remains of good Anselmo rest,
Yet fresh and unconsum'd by time or worms:
What do I see? Oh, Heaven! either my eyes
Are false, or still the marble door remains
Unclos'd; the iron gates, that lead to death
Beneath, are still wide stretch'd upon their hinge,
And staring on us with unfolded leaves.

Alm. Sure 'tis the friendly yawn of death for
me;

And that dumb mouth, significant in show,
Invites me to the bed, where I alone [weary
Shall rest; shows me the grave, where nature,

And long oppress'd with woes and bending cares,
May lay the burden down, and sink in slumbers
Of peace eternal. Death, grim death, will fold
Me in his leaden arms, and press me close
To his cold, clayey breast: my father then
Will cease his tyranny; and Garcia too
Will fly my pale deformity with loathing:
My soul, enlarg'd from its vile honds, will mount
And range the starry orbs, and milky ways,
Of that refulgent world, where I shall swim
In liquid light, and float on seas of bliss
To my Alphonso's soul. Oh, joy too great!
Oh, ecstasy of thought! Help me, Anselmo:
Help me, Alphonso; take me, reach thy hand;
To thee, to thee I call, to thee, Alphonso:
Oh, Alphonso!

OSMYN ascending from the tomb.

Osm. Who calls that wretched thing that was Alphonso?

Alm. Angels, and all the host of Heaven support me!

Osm. Whence is that voice, whose shrillness, from the grave,

And growing to his father's shroud, roots up
Alphonso!

Alm. Mercy! Providence! Oh, speak,
Speak to it quickly, quickly; speak to me,
Comfort me, help me, hold me, hide me, hide me,
Leonora, in thy bosom, from the light,
And from my eyes.

Osm. Amazement and illusion!
Rivet and nail me where I stand, ye powers,

[Coming forward.]

That, motionless, I may be still deceiv'd.
Let me not stir, nor breathe, lest I dissolve
That tender, lovely form of painted air,
So like Almeria. Ha! it sinks, it falls;
I'll catch it ere it goes, and grasp her shade.
'Tis life! 'tis warm! 'tis she, 'tis she herself!
Nor dead, nor shade, but breathing and alive!
It is Almeria, 'tis my wife!

Enter HELL.

Leon. Alas! she stirs not yet, nor lifts her eyes;
He too is fainting—Help me, help me, stranger.
Whoe'er thou art, and lend thy hand to raise
These bodies.

Heli. Ha! 'tis he! and with Almeria!
Oh, miracle of happiness! Oh, joy
Unhop'd for! does Almeria live!

Osm. Where is she?
Let me behold, and touch her, and be sure
'Tis she; show me her face, and let me feel
Her lips with mine—'Tis she, I'm not deceiv'd;
I taste her breath, I warm'd her, and am warm'd.
Look up, Almeria, bless me with thy eyes;
Look on thy love, thy lover, and thy husband.

Alm. I've sworn I'll not wed Garcia: why d'ye force me.

Is this a father?

Osm. Look on thy Alphonso.
Thy father is not here, my love, nor Garcia:
Nor am I what I seem, but thy Alphonso:
Wilt thou not know me? Hast thou then forgot
me?

Hast thou thy eyes, yet canst not see Alphonso?
Am I so alter'd, or art thou so chang'd,
That seeing my disguise thou seest not me?

Alm. It is, it is Alphonso; 'tis his face,
His voice, I know him now, I know him all.

Oh, take me to thy arms, and bear me hence,
Back to the bottom of the boundless deep,
To seas beneath, where thou so long hast dwelt.
Oh, how hast thou return'd? How hast thou charm'd

The wildness of the waves and rocks to this?
That thus relenting they have given thee back
To earth, to light and life, to love and me.

Osm. Oh, I'll not ask, nor answer, how or why
We both have backward trod the paths of fate,
To meet again in life: to know I have thee,
Is knowing more than any circumstance,
Or means, by which I have thee—

To fold thee thus, to press thy balmy lips,
And gaze upon thy eyes, is so much joy;
I have not leisure to reflect, or know,
Or trifle time in thinking.

Alm. Stay a while—

Let me look on thee yet a little more.

Osm. What wouldst thou? thou dost put me from thee.

Alm. Yes.

Osm. And why? What dost thou mean? Why dost thou gaze so?

Alm. I know not; 'tis to see thy face, I think—
It is too much; too much to bear and live!
To see thee thus again is such profusion
Of joy, of bliss—I cannot bear—I must Be mad—I cannot be transported thus.

Osm. Thou excellence, thou joy, thou heaven of love!

Alm. Where hast thou been? and how art thou alive?

How is all this? All-powerful Heaven, what are we?

Oh, my strain'd heart—let me again behold thee,
For I weep to see thee—Art thou not paler?
Much, much; how thou art chang'd!

Osm. Not in my love.

Alm. No, no, thy griefs, I know, have done this to thee.

Thou hast wept much, Alphonso; and, I fear,
Too much, too tenderly lamented me.

Osm. Wrong not my love, to say too tenderly.
No more, my life; talk not of tears or grief;
Affliction is no more, now thou art found.

Why dost thou weep, and hold thee from my arms,
My arms which ache to hold thee fast, and grow
To thee with twining? Come, come to my heart.

Alm. I will, for I should never look enough.
They would have married me; but I had sworn To Heaven and thee, and sooner would have died—

Osm. Perfection of all faithfulness and love!

Alm. Indeed I would! Nay, I would tell thee
all,

If I could speak; how I have mourn'd and pray'd!
For I have pray'd to thee, as to a saint;
And thou hast heard my pray'r; for thou art come
To my distress, to my despair, which Heaven
Could only, by restoring thee, have cured.

Osm. Grant me but life, good Heaven; but length of days,

To pay some part, some little of this debt,
This countless sum of tenderness and love,
For which I stand engag'd to this all excellence:
Then bear me in a whirlwind to my fate,
Snatch me from life, and cut me short unwarn'd:
Then, then, 'twill be enough—I shall be old,
I shall have pass'd all eras then
Of yet unmeasur'd time; when I have made
This exquisite, this most amazing goodness,

Some recompence of love and matchless truth.
Alm. 'Tis more than recompence to see thy face.

If Heaven is greater joy, it is no happiness,
For 'tis not to be borne—What shall I say?
I have a thousand things to know and ask,
And speak—That thou art here beyond all hope,
All thought; and all at once thou art before me,
And with such suddenness hast hit my sight,
Is such surprise, such mystery, such ecstasy,
It hurries all my soul, and stuns my sense.
Sure from thy father's tomb thou didst arise?

Osm. I did; and thou, my love, didst call me;
thou.

Alm. True; but how cam'st thou there? Wert thou alone?

Osm. I was, and lying on my father's lead,
When broken echoes of a distant voice
Disturb'd the sacred silence of the vault,
In murmurs round my head. I rose and listen'd,
And thought I heard thy spirit call Alphonso;
I thought I saw thee too; but, oh, I thought not
That I indeed should be so bless'd to see thee—

Alm. But still, how cam'st thou thither? How thus?—Ha?

What's he, who like thyself, is started here
Ere seen?

Osm. Where? Ha! What do I see, Antonio!
I'm fortunate indeed—my friend too safe!

Heli. Most happily, in finding you thus bless'd.

Alm. More miracles! Antonio too, escap'd!

Osm. And twice escap'd; both from the rage of seas

And war: for in the fight I saw him fall.

Heli. But fell unhurt, a pris'ner as yourself,
And as yourself made free; hither I came,
Impatiently to seek you, where I knew
Your grief would lead you to lament Anselmo.

Osm. There are no wonders, or else all is wonder.

Heli. I saw you on the ground, and rais'd you up,
When with astonishment I saw Almeria.

Osm. I saw her too, and therefore saw not thee.

Alm. Nor I; nor could I, for my eyes were yours.

Osm. What means the bounty of all-gracious
Heaven,

That persevering still, with open hand,
It scatters good, as in a waste of mercy?

Where will this end? But Heaven is infinite

In all, and can continue to bestow,

When scanty number shall be spent in telling.

Leon. Or I'm deceiv'd, or I beheld the gimpse
Of two in shining habits cross the aisle;

Who by their pointing seem to mark this place.

Alm. Sure I have dreamt, if we must part so soon.

Osm. I wish at least our parting were a dream;
Or we could sleep 'till we again were met.

Heli. Zara with Selim, Sir, I saw and know
'em:

You must be quick, for love will lend her wings.

Alm. What love? Who is she? Why are you alarm'd?

Osm. She's the reverse of thee; she's my unhappiness.

Harbour no thought that may disturb thy peace
But gently take thyself away, lest she Should come, and see the straining of my eyes

To follow thee.

Retire, my love, I'll think how we may meet
To part no more; my friend will tell thee all;
How I escap'd, how I am here; and thus;

How I'm not call'd Alphonso now, but Osmyn ;
And he Heli. All, all, he will unfold,
Ere next we meet—

Alm. Sure we shall meet again—

Osm. We shall ; we part not but to meet again.

Gladness and warmth of ever kindling love
Dwell with thee, and revive thy heart in absence.
[Exeunt ALMERIA, LEONORA, and HELI.]

Yet I behold her—yet—and now no more.
Turn your lights inward, eyes, and view my thoughts,

So shall you still behold her—'twill not be.

Oh, impotence of sight ! Mechanic sense !
Which to exterior objects ow'st thy faculty,
Not seeing of election, but necessity.

Thus do our eyes, as do all common mirrors,
Successively reflect succeeding images :
Not what they would, but must ; a star, or toad ;
Just as the hand of chance administers.

Not so the mind, whose undetermin'd view
Revolves, and to the present adds the past ;
Essaying farther to futurity ;

But that in vain. I have Almeria here
At once, as I before have seen her often—

Enter ZARA and SELIM.

Zar. See where he stands, folded and fix'd to earth,

Stiffening in thought, a statue among statues.

Why, cruel Osmyn, dost thou fly me thus ?

Is it well done ? Is this then the return

For fame, for honour, and for empire lost ?

But what is loss of honour, fame, and empire ?

Is this the recompence reserv'd for love ?

Why dost thou leave my eyes, and fly my arms,

To find this place of horror and obscurity ?

Am I more loathsome to thee than the grave,

That thou dost seek to shield thee there, and shun

My love ? But to the grave I'll follow thee—

He looks not, minds not, hears not ! barbarous man !

Am I neglected thus ? Am I despis'd ?

Not heard ! Ungrateful Osmyn !

Osm. Ha ! 'tis Zara !

Zar. Yes, traitor ; Zara, lost, abandon'd Zara,
Is a regardless suppliant now, to Osmyn.

The slave, the wretch that she redeem'd from death,

Disdains to listen now, or look on Zara.

Osm. Far be the guilt of such reproaches from me ;

Lost in myself, and blinded by my thoughts,

I saw you not till now.

Zar. Now then you see me—

But with such dumb and thankless eyes you look,
Better I was unseen, than seen thus coldly.

Osm. What would you from a wretch who came to mourn,

And only for his sorrows choose this solitude ?

Look round ; joy is not here, nor cheerfulness,
You have pursu'd misfortune to its dwelling,
Yet look for gaiety and gladness there.

Zar. Inhuman ! Why, why dost thou rack me thus ?

And with perverseness, from the purpose, answer ?

What is't to me, this house of misery ?

What joy do I require ? if thou dost mourn,

I come to mourn with thee, to share thy griefs,
And give thee, for 'em, in exchange, my love.

Osm. Oh, that's the greatest grief—I am so poor,

I have not wherewithal to give again.

Zar. Thou hast a heart, though 'tis a savage one ;

Give it me as it is ; I ask no more

For all I've done, and all I have endur'd :

For saving thee, when I beheld thee first,

Driven by the tide upon my country's coast,

Pale and expiring, drench'd in briny waves,

Thou and thy friend, till my compassion found thee ;

Compassion ! scarce will't own that name, so soon,

So quickly was it love ; for thou wert godlike
Even then. Kneeling on earth, I loos'd my hair,

And with it dried thy watery cheeks, then chaf'd
Thy temples, till reviving blood arose,
And, like the morn, vermilion'd o'er thy face.

Oh, Heaven ! how did my heart rejoice and ache,

When I beheld the day-break of thy eyes,

And felt the balm of thy respiring lips !

Osm. Oh, call not to my mind what you have done,

It sets a debt of that account before me,

Which shows me poor and bankrupt even in hopes.

Zar. The faithful Selim, and my women, know

The danger which I tempted to conceal you.

You know how I abus'd the credulous king ;

What arts I used to make you pass on him,

When he received you as the prince of Fez ;

And as my kinsman, honour'd and advanc'd you.

Oh, why do I relate what I have done ?

What did I not ? Was't not for you this war

Commenc'd ? not knowing who you were, nor why

You hated Manuel, I urg'd my husband

To this invasion : where he late was lost,

Where all is lost, and I am made a slave.

Osm.* You pierce my soul—I own it all—But while

The power is wanting to repay such benefits,

'Tis treble anguish to a generous heart.

Zar. Repay me with thy heart—What ! dost thou start ?

Make no reply ! Is this thy gratitude ?

Look on me now, from empire fallen to slavery ;

Think on my sufferings first, then look on me ;

Think on the cause of all, then view thyself :

Reflect on Osmyn, and then look on Zara,

The fallen, the lost, and now the captive Zara,
And now abandon'd—Say, what then is Osmyn ?

Osm. A fatal wretch—A huge, stupendous ruin,

That tumbling on its prop, crush'd all beneath,

And bore contiguous palaces to earth.

Zar. Yet thus, thus fallen, thus level'd with the vilest,

If I have gain'd thy love, 'tis glorious ruin ;

Ruin ! 'tis still to reign and to be more

 The lines printed in Italics are not in the original, but are now given to the reader as delivered in the representation at Drury-lane theatre.*

A queen; for what are riches, empire, power,
But larger means to gratify the will?
The steps on which we tread, to rise and reach Our wish; and that obtain'd, down with the scaffolding

Of sceptres, crowns, and thrones: they've serv'd their end,

And are, like lumber, to be left and scorn'd.

Osm. Why was I made the instrument to throw

In bonds the frame of this exalted mind?

Zar. We may be free; the conqueror is mine;

In chains unseen I hold him by the heart,
And can unwind and strain him as I please.
Give me thy love, I'll give thee liberty.

Osm. In vain you offer, and in vain require
What neither can bestow. Set free yourself,
And leave a slave the wretch that would be so.

Zar. Thou canst not mean so poorly as thou talk'st.

Osm. Alas! you know me not.

Zar. Not who thou art:

But what this last ingratitude declares,
This grovelling baseness—Thou say'st true, I
know

Thee not; for what thou art yet wants a name;
But something so unworthy and so vile,
That to have lov'd thee makes me yet more lost,
Than all the malice of my other fate.

Traitor, monster, cold, and perfidious slave;
A slave not daring to be free! nor dares
To love above him; for 'tis dangerous.

'Tis that I know; for thou dost look, with eyes
Sparkling desire, and trembling to possess.
I know my charms have reach'd thy very soul,
And thrill'd thee through with darted fires; but thou

Dost fear so much, thou dar'st not wish. The king!

There, there's the dreadful sound, the king's thy rival!

Sel. Madam, the king is here, and entering now.

Zar. As I could wish: by Heaven, I'll be re-veng'd.

Enter the KING, PEREZ, and Attendants.

King. Why does the fairest of her kind withdraw

Her shining from the day, to gild this scene
Of death and night? Ha! what disorder's this?
Somewhat I heard of king and rival mention'd.
What's he that dares be rival to the king,
Or lift his eyes to like where I adore?

Zar. There, he, your prisoner, and that was my slave.

King. How! better than my hopes! Does she accuse him? [Aside.]

Zar. Am I become so low by my captivity,
And do your arms so lessen what they conquer,
That Zara must be made the sport of slaves?
And shall the wretch, whom yester sun beheld
Waiting my nod, the creature of my power,
Presume to-day to plead audacious love,
And build bold hopes on my dejected fate?

King. Better for him to tempt the rage of Heaven,

And wrench the bolt red hissing from the hand
Of him that thunders, than but to think that insolence.

'Tis daring for a god. Hence to the wheel
With that Ixion, who aspires to hold
Divinity embraced; to whips and prisons
Drag him with speed, and rid me of his face.

[Guards seize OSMYN, and exeunt.]

Zar. Compassion led me to bemoan his state,
Whose former faith had merited much more:
And through my hopes in you I undertook
He should be set at large; thence sprung his insolence,

And what was charity he construed love.

King. Enough; his punishment be what you please.

But let me lead you from this place of sorrow,
To one where young delights attend, and joys
Yet new, unborn, and blooming in the bud,
Which wait to be full-blown at your approach,
And spread, like roses, in the morning sun;
Where every hour shall roll in circling joys,
And love shall wing the tedious-wasting day.
Life, without love, is load; and time stands still:
What we refuse to him, to death we give;
And then, then only, when we love, we live.

[Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Prison.

OSMYN with a Paper.

Osm. But now, and I was closed within the tomb
That holds my father's ashes; and but now,
Where he was prisoner, I am too imprison'd.
Sure 'tis the hand of Heaven that leads me thus
And for some purpose points out these remembrances.

In a dark corner of my cell I found
This paper; what it is this light will show.

If my Alphonso— Ha! [Reading.]

*If my Alphonso live, restore him, Heaven;
Give me more weight, crush my declining years,
With bolts, with chains, imprisonment and want;
But bless my son, visit not him for me.*

It is his hand; this was his prayer—yet more:
Let every hair, which sorrow by the roots

[Reading.]

*Tears from my hoary and devoted head,
Be doubled in thy mercies to my son:*

Not for myself, but him, hear me all-gracious—
'Tis wanting what should follow—Heaven should follow,

But 'tis torn off—Why should that word alone
Be torn from this petition? 'Twas to Heaven,
But Heaven was deaf, Heaven heard him not;
but thus,

Thus as the name of Heaven from this is torn,
So did it tear the ears of mercy from
His voice, shutting the gates of prayer against him.
If piety be thus debarr'd access

On high, and of good men the very best
Is singled out to bleed, and bear the scourge,
What is reward? Or what is punishment?

But who shall dare to tax eternal justice!
Yet I may think—I may, I must; for thought
Precedes the will to think, and error lives
Ere reason can be born. Reason, the power
To guess at right and wrong, the twinkling lamp
Of wandering life, that winks and wakes by turns,
Fooling the followers, betwixt shade and shining
What noise! Who's there? My friend? How cam'st thou hither?

Enter HELI.

Hel. The time 's too precious to be spent in telling.

The captain, influenc'd by Almeria's power,
Gave order to the guards for my admittance.

Osm. How does Almeria? But I know she is
As I am. Tell me, may I hope to see her?

Hel. You may. Anon, at midnight, when the king

Is gone to rest, and Garcia is retired,
(Who takes the privilege to visit late,
Presuming on a bridegroom's right) she'll come.

Osm. She'll come; 'tis what I wish, yet what I fear.

She'll come; but whither, and to whom? Oh,
Heaven,

To a vile prison, and a captiv'd wretch;
To one, whom had she never known, she had Been happy. Why, why was that heavenly creature

Abandon'd o'er to love what Heaven forsakes?
Why does she follow, with unwearied steps,
One, who has tired misfortune with pursuing?
One driv'n about the world, like blasted leaves,
And chaff, the sport of adverse winds; till late,
At length imprison'd in some cleft of rock,
On earth it rests, and rots to silent dust.

Hel. Have hopes, and hear the voice of better fate.

I've learn'd there are disorders ripe for mutiny
Among the troops, who thought to share the plunder,

Which Manuel to his own use and avarice
Converts. This news has reach'd Valentia's frontiers,

Where many of your subjects, long oppress'd
With tyranny, and grievous impositions,
Are risen in arms, and call for chiefs to head
And lead them to regain their rights and liberty.

Osm. By Heavens thou'ast roused me from my lethargy.

The spirit which was deaf to my own wrongs,
And the loud cries of my dead father's blood,
Deaf to revenge—nay, which refus'd to hear
The piercing sighs and murmurs of my love
Yet unenjoy'd; what not Almeria could Revive or raise, my people's voice has waken'd.

Hel. Our posture of affairs, and scanty time,
My lord, require you should compose yourself.

Osm. Oh, my Antonio, I am all on fire;
My soul is up in arms, ready to charge
And bear amidst the foe with conquering troops.
I hear 'em call to lead 'em on to liberty,
To victory, their shouts and clamours rend
My ears, and reach the heavens. Where is the king?

Where is Alphonso? Ha! where? where indeed!
Oh, I could tear and burst the strings of life,
To break these chains. Off, off, ye stains of royalty;

Off, slavery. Oh, curse! that I alone
Can beat and flutter in my cage, when I
Would soar and stoop at victory beneath.

Hel. Abate this ardour, Sir, or we are lost.

Our posture of affairs and scanty time,
My lord, require you should compose yourself,
And think on what we may reduce to practice.

Zara, the cause of your restraint, may be
The means of liberty restor'd. That gain'd,
Occasion will not fail to point out ways
For your escape. Mean time, I've thought already

With speed and safety to convey myself,
Where not far off some malcontents hold council
Nightly, who hate this tyrant; some, who love
Anselmo's memory, and will, for certain,
When they shall know you live, assist your cause.
Osm. My friend and counsellor, as thou think'st fit,

So do. I will, with patience, wait my fortune.

Hel. When Zara comes, abate of your aversion.

Osm. I hate her not, nor can dissemble love:
But as I may I'll do. I have a paper
Which I would show thee, friend, but that the sight

Would hold thee here, and clog thy expedition.
Within I found it; by my father's hand
'T was writ; a prayer for me, wherein appears
Paternal love prevailing o'er his sorrows;
Such sanctity, such tenderness, so mix'd
With grief, as would draw tears from inhumanity.

Hel. The care of providence sure left it there,
To arm your mind with hope. Such piety
Was never heard in vain. Heaven has in store
For you those blessings it withheld from him.
In that assurance live; which time, I hope,
And our next meeting will confirm.

Osm. Farewell,
My friend; the good thou dost deserve, attend thee. [Exit HELI.]

I've been to blame, and question'd with impiety
The care of Heaven. Not so my father bore
More anxious grief. This should have better taught me;

This lesson, in some hour of inspiration
By him set down, when his pure thoughts were borne,

Like fumes of sacred incense o'er the clouds,
And wafted thence on angels' wings, through ways

Of light, to the bright Source of all. For there
He in the book of prescience saw this day;
And waking to the world and mortal sense,
Left this example of his resignation,
This his last legacy to me; which, here,
I'll treasure as more worth than diadems,
Or all extended rule of regal power.

Enter ZARA, veiled.

Osm. What brightness breaks upon me thus through shades,
And promises a day to this dark dwelling?
Is it my love?—

Zar. Oh, that thy heart had taught
Thy tongue that saying! [Lifting her veil]

Osm. Zara! I am betray'd
By my surprise.

Zar. What! does my face displease thee?
That, having seen it, thou dost turn thy eyes
Away, as from deformity and horror?
If so, this sable curtain shall again

Be drawn, and I will stand before thee, seeing,
And unscen. Is it my love? Ask again
That question; speak again in that soft voice;
And look again with wishes in thy eyes.

Oh, no! thou canst not, for thou seest me now
As she whose savage breast has been the cause
Of these thy wrongs; as she whose barbarous rage

Has loaded thee with chains and galling irons.
Well dost thou scorn me, and upbraid my falseness,

Could one who lov'd thus torture whom she lov'd?

No, no, it must be hatred, dire revenge,
And detestation, that could use thee thus.
So dost thou think; then do but tell me so;
Tell me, and thou shalt see how I'll revenge
Thee on this false one, how I'll stab and tear
This heart of flint, 'till it shall bleed; and thou Shalt weep for mine, forgetting thy own miseries.

Osm. You wrong me, beautiful Zara, to believe

I bear my fortunes with so low a mind,
As still to meditate revenge on all
Whom chance, or fate, working by secret causes,
Has made, perforce, subservient to that end
The heavenly powers allot me; no, not you,
But destiny and inauspicious stars
Have cast me down to this low being. Or Granting you had, from you I have deserved it.

Zar. Canst thou forgive me, then? wilt thou believe

So kindly of my fault, to call it madness?
Oh, give that madness yet a milder name,
And call it passion! then be still more kind,
And call that passion love.

Osm. Give it a name,

Or being, as you please, such I will think it.

Zar. Oh, thou dost wound me more with this thy goodness,

Than e'er thou couldst with bitterest reproaches?
Thy anger could not pierce thus to my heart.

Osm. Yet I could wish—

Zar. Haste me to know it; what?

Osm. That at this time I had not been this thing.

Zar. What thing?

Osm. This slave.

Zar. Oh Heaven! my fears interpret

This thy silence; somewhat of high concern,
Long fashioning within thy labouring mind,
And now just ripe for birth, my rage has ruin'd.
Have I done this? Tell me, am I so curs'd?

Osm. Time may have still one fated hour to come,

Which, wing'd with liberty, might overtake Occasion past.

Zar. Swift as occasion, I

Myself will fly; and earlier than the morn,
Wake thee to freedom. Now 'tis late; and yet
Some news, few minutes past, arriv'd, which seem'd

To shake the temper of the king—Who knows
What racking cares disease a monarch's bed?
Or love, that late at night still lights his lamp,
And strikes his rays through dusk and folded lids,
Forbidding rest, may stretch his eyes awake,
And force their balls abroad at this dead hour.
I'll try.

Osm. I have not merited this grace;
Nor, should my secret purpose take effect,
Can I repay, as you require, such benefits.

Zar. Thou canst not owe me more, nor have I more

To give, than I have already lost. But now,
So does the form of our engagements rest,
Thou hast the wrong till I redeem thee hence;
That done, I leave thy justice to return
My love. Adieu. [Exit.]

Osm. This woman has a soul
Of godlike mould, intrepid and commanding,
And challenges, in spite of me, my best
Esteem; to this, she's fair, few more can boast
Of personal charms, or with less vanity
Might hope to captivate the hearts of kings;

But she has passions which outstrip the wind,
And tear her virtues up, as tempests root
The sea. I fear, when she shall know the truth,
Some swift and dire event of her blind rage
Will make all fatal. But behold, she comes
For whom I fear, to shield me from my fears,
The cause and comfort of my boding heart.

Enter ALMERIA.

My life, my health, my liberty, my all!
How shall I welcome thee to this sad place?
How speak to thee the words of joy and transport?
How run into thy arms, withheld by fetters;
Or take thee into mine, while I'm thus manacled
And pinion'd like a thief or murderer?
Shall I not hurt and bruise thy tender body,
And stain thy bosom with the rust of these Rude irons? Must I meet thee thus, Almeria?

Alm. Thus, thus; we parted, thus to meet again.

Thou told'st me thou wouldst think how we might meet

To part no more—Now we will part no more;
For these thy chains, or death, shall join us ever

Osm. Hard means to ratify that word!—Oh cruelty!

That ever I should think beholding thee
A torture!—Yet such is the bleeding anguish
Of my heart, to see thy sufferings—Oh, Heaven!
That I could almost turn my eyes away,
Or wish thee from my sight.

Alm. Oh, say not so!

Though 'tis because thou lov'st me. Do not say,
On any terms, that thou dost wish me from thee.
No, no, 'tis better thus, that we together
Feed on each other's heart, devour our woes
With mutual appetite; and mingling in
One cup the common stream of both our eyes,
Bring bitter draughts, with never slaking thirst;
Thus better, than for any cause to part.

What dost thou think? Look not so tenderly
Upon me—speak, and take me in thy arms—
Thou canst not; thy poor arms are bound, and strive

In vain with the remorseless chains, which gnaw
And eat into thy flesh, festering thy limbs
With rankling rust.

Osm. Oh! Oh—

Alm. Give me that sigh.

Why dost thou heave, and stifle in thy griefs?
Thy heart will burst, thy eyes look red and start;
Give thy soul way, and tell me thy dark thought.

Osm. For this world's rule, I would not wound thy breast

With such a dagger as then struck my heart.

Alm. Why? why? To know it, cannot wound me more

Than knowing thou hast felt it. Tell me,
—Thou giv'st me pain with too much tenderness.

Osm. And thy excessive love distracts my sense.

Oh, wouldst thou be less killing, soft, or kind
Grief could not double thus his arts against me.

Alm. Thou dost me wrong, and grief too robs
my heart,

If there he shoot not every other shaft;
Thy second self should feel each other wound,
And wo should be in equal portions dealt.

I am thy wife—

Osm. Oh, thou hast search'd too deep:
There, there I bleed; there pull the cruel cords,

That strain my cracking nerves; engines and wheels,
That piece-meal grind, are beds of down and balm
To that soul-racking thought.

Alm. Then I am curs'd

Indeed, if that he so! if I'm thy torment,
Kill me, then, kill me, dash me with thy chains,
Tread on me: What, am I the bosom-snake
That sucks thy warm life-blood, and gnaws thy heart?

Oh, that thy words had force to break those bonds,
As they have strength to tear this heart in sunder;
So should'st thou be at large from all oppression.
Am I, am I of all thy woes the worst?

Osm. My all of bliss, my everlasting life,
Soul of my soul, and end of all my wishes,
Why dost thou thus unman me with thy words,
And melt me down to mingle with thy weepings?
Why dost thou ask? Why dost thou talk thus piercingly?

Thy sorrows have disturb'd thy peace of mind,
And thou dost speak of miseries impossible.

Alm. Didst not thou say that racks and wheels were balm

And beds of ease, to thinking me thy wife?

Osm. No, no; nor should the subtlest pains that hell

Or hell-born malice can invent, extort
A wish or thought from me to have thee other.
But thou wilt know what harrows up my heart:
Thou art my wife—nay, thou art yet my bride?—

The sacred union of connubial love
Yet unaccomplish'd: his mysterious rites
Delay'd; nor has our hymeneal torch
Yet lighted up his last most grateful sacrifice;
But dash'd with rain from eyes, and swa'd with sighs,

Burns dim, and glimmers with expiring light.
Is this dark cell a temple for that god?
Or this vile earth an altar for such offerings?
This den for slaves, this dungeon damp'd with woes;

Is this our marriage bed? are these our joys?
Is this to call thee mine? Oh, hold, my heart!
To call thee mine? Yes; thus, even thus to call
Thee mine, were comfort, joy, extremest ecstasy.
But, oh, thou art not mine, not e'en in misery;
And 'tis denied to me to be so bless'd,
As to be wretched with thee.

Alm. No; not that

Th' extremest malice of our fate can hinder:
That still is left us, and on that we'll feed,
As on the leavings of calamity.
There we will feast and smile on past distress,
And hug, in scorn of it, our mutual ruin.

Osm. Oh, thou dost talk, my love, as one resolv'd,

Because not knowing danger. But look forward;
Think of to-morrow, when thou shalt be torn
From these weak, struggling, unextended arms:
Think how my heart will heave, and eyes will strain

To grasp and reach what is deny'd my hands:
Think how the blood will start, and tears will gush,

To follow thee, my separating soul.
Think who I am, when thou shalt wed with Garcia!

Then will I smear these walls with blood, disfigure
And dash my face, and rive my clotted hair,
Break on the flinty floor my throbbing breast,

And grovel with gash'd hands to scratch a grave,
Stripping my nails to tear this pavement up,
And bury me alive.

Alm. Heart-breaking horror!

Osm. Then Garcia shall lie panting on thy bosom,
Luxurious, revelling amidst thy charms;
And thou perforce must yield, and aid his transport.

Hell! Hell! have I not cause to rage and rave?
What are all racks, and wheels, and whips to this?
Are they not soothing softness, sinking ease,
And wafting air to this? Oh, my Almeria!
What do the damn'd endure, but to despair,
But knowing Heaven, to know it lost for ever?

Alm. Oh, I am struck; thy words are bolts of ice,

Which, shot into my breast, now melt and chill me.
I chatter, shake, and faint with thrilling fears.
No, hold me not—Oh, let us not support,
But sink each other, deeper yet, down, down,
Where level'd low, no more we'll lift our eyes,
But prone, and dumb, rot the firm face of earth
With rivers of incessant scalding rain.

Enter ZARA, PEREZ, and SELIM.

Zar. Somewhat of weight to me requires his freedom.

Dare you dispute the king's command? Behold
The royal signet.

Per. I obey; yet beg
Your majesty one moment to defer
Your entering, till the princess is return'd
From visiting the noble prisoner.

Zar. Ha!
What say'st thou?

Osm. We are lost! undone! discover'd!
Retire, my life, with speed—Alas, we're seen!
Speak of compassion, let her hear you speak
Of interceding for me with the king;
Say somewhat quickly to conceal our loves,
If possible—

Alm. —I cannot speak.

Osm. Let me
Conduct you forth, as not perceiving her,
But till she's gone; then bless me thus again.

Zar. Trembling and weeping as he leads her forth!

Confusion in his face, and grief in hers!
'Tis plain I've been abus'd—Death and destruction!

How shall I search into this mystery?
The bluest blast of pestilential air
Strike, damp, deaden her charms, and kill his eyes;

Perdition catch 'em both, and ruin part 'em!
Osm. This charity to one unknown, and thus [Aloud to ALMERIA as she goes out.

Distress'd Heaven will repay; all thanks are poor.
[Exit ALMERIA.

Zar. Damn'd, damn'd dissembler! Yet I will be calm,

Choke in my rage, and know the utmost depth
Of this deceiver—You seem much surpris'd.

Osm. At your return so soon and unexpected!
Zar. And so unwish'd, unwanted too, it seems Confusion! Yet I will contain myself.

You're grown a favourite since last we parted;
Perhaps I'm saucy and intruding—

Osm. —Madam!

Zar. I did not know the princess' favourite.

Your pardon, Sir—Mistake me not; you think I'm angry; you're deceiv'd. I came to set You free; but shall return much better pleas'd, To find you have an interest superior.

Osm. You do not come to mock my miseries?

Zar. I do.

Osm. I could at this time spare your mirth.

Zar. I know thou couldst; but I'm not often pleas'd,

And will indulge it now. What miseries?

Who would not be thus happily confin'd,
To be the care of weeping majesty;
To have contending queens, at dead of night,
Forsake their down, to wake with watery eyes,
And watch like tapers o'er your hours of rest?
Oh, curse! I cannot hold—

Osm. Come, 'tis too much.

Zar. Villain!

Osm. How, Madam!

Zar. Thou shalt die.

Osm. I thank you.

Zar. Thou liest, for now I know for whom thou'dst live.

Osm. Then you may know for whom I'd die.

Zar. Hell! Hell!

Yet I'll be calm—Dark and unknown betrayer!
But now the dawn begins, and the slow hand
Of fate is stretch'd to draw the veil, and leave
These bare, the naked mark of public view.

Osm. You may be still deceiv'd, 'tis in my power—

*Chain'd as I am, to fly from all my wrongs,
And free myself, at once, from misery,
And you of me.*

Zar. Ha! say'st thou—but I'll prevent it—
Who waits there? As you will answer it, look this slave [To the guard.

Attempt no means to make himself away.
I've been deceiv'd. The public safety now
Requires he should be more confin'd, and none,
No, not the princess, suffer'd or to see
Or speak with him. I'll quit you to the king.
Vile and ingrate! too late thou shalt repent
The base injustice thou hast done my love:
Yes, thou shalt know, spite of thy past distress,
And all those ills which thou so long hast
mourn'd;
Heaven has no rage like love to hatred turn'd,
Nor hell a fury like a woman scorn'd. [Exeunt.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Room of State.

ZARA and SELIM.

Zar. Thou hast already rack'd me with thy stay;

Therefore require me not to ask thee twice:
Reply at once to all. What is concluded?

Sel. Your accusation highly has incens'd
The king, and were alone enough to urge
The fate of Osmyn; but to that, fresh news
Is since arriv'd, of more revolted troops.
'Tis certain Heli, too, is fled, and with him
(Which breeds amazement and distraction) some
Who bore high offices of weight and trust,
Both in the state and army. This confirms
The king in full belief of all you told him
Concerning Osmyn, and his correspondence
With them who first began the mutiny.
Wherefore a warrant for his death is sign'd;

Vol. I. . . 4 Y 61

And order given for public execution.

Zar. Ha! haste thee! fly, prevent his fate and mine,

Find out the king, tell him I have of weight
More than his crown 't impart ere Osmyn die.

Sel. It needs not, for the king will straight be here,

And, as to your revenge, not his own interest,
Pretend to sacrifice the life of Osmyn.

Zar. What shall I say, invent, contrive, advise?
Somewhat to blind the king, and save his life,
In whom I live. Spite of my rage and pride,
I am a woman, and a lover still.

Oh! 'tis more grief but to suppose his death,
Than still to meet the rigour of his scorn.

From my despair my anger had its source;

When he is dead I must despair for ever.
For ever! That's despair—It was distrust

Before; distrust will ever be in love,
And anger in distrust; both short-lived pains.

But in despair, and ever-during death,
No term, no bound, but infinite of woe.

Oh, torment, but to think! what then to bear?

Not to be borne—Devise the means to shun it,
Quick: or by Heaven this dagger drinks thy blood.

Sel. My life is yours, nor wish I to preserve it,
But to serve you. I have already thought.

Zar. Forgive my rage; I know thy love and truth.

But say what's to be done, or when, or how Shall I prevent or stop th' approaching danger?

Sel. You must still seem more resolute and fix'd

On Osmyn's death: too quick a change of mercy
Might breed suspicion of the cause. Advise
That execution may be done in private.

Zar. On what pretence?

Sel. Your own request's enough.
However, for a colour, tell him, you
Have cause to fear his guards may be corrupted,
And some of them bought off to Osmyn's interest,

Who at the place of execution will Attempt to force his way for an escape;
The state of things will countenance all suspicious.

Then offer to the king to have him strangled
In secret by your mutes; and get an order,
That none but mutes may have admittance to
him.

I can no more, the king is here. Obtain
This grant, and I'll acquaint you with the rest.

Enter KING, GONSALEZ, and PEREZ.

King. Bear to the dungeon those rebellious slaves,

Th' ignoble curs that yelp to fill the cry,
And spend their mouths in barking tyranny.

But for their leaders, Sancho and Kanurez,

Let them be led away to present death.

Perez, see it perform'd.

Gon. Might I presume,
Their execution better were deferr'd
Till Osmyn die. Meantime we may learn more
Of this conspiracy.

King. Then be it so.
Stay, soldier; they shall suffer with the Moor.
Are none return'd of those who follow'd Heli?

Gon. None, Sir. Some papers have been since discover'd
In Roderigo's house, who fled with him,

Which seem'd to intimate, as if Alphonso
Were still alive, and arming in Valentia,
Which wears indeed the colour of a truth:
They who are fled have that way bent their course.
Of the same nature divers notes have been Dispers'd t' amuse the people; whereupon
Some, ready of belief, have rais'd this rumour:
That, being sav'd upon the coast of Afric,
He there disclos'd himself to Albucacim,
And, by a secret compact made with him,
Open'd and urg'd the way to this invasion;
While he himself, returning to Valentia
In private, undertook to raise this tumult.

Zar. Ha! hear'st thou that? Is Osmyn then Alphonso?

Oh, Heaven! a thousand things occur at once
To my remembrance now, that make it plain.
Oh, certain death for him as sure despair
For me, if it be known—If not, what hope
Have I? Yet 'twere the lowest baseness now,
To yield him up—No, I will conceal him,
And try the force of yet more obligations.

Gon. 'Tis not impossible. Yet it may be,
That some impostor has usurp'd his name.
Your beauteous captive, Zara, can inform,
If such a one, so 'scaping, was receiv'd
At any time in Albucacim's court.

King. Pardon, fair excellence, this long neglect:
An unforeseen, unwelcome hour of business,
Has thrust between us and our while of love;
But wearing now apace with ebbing sand,
Will quickly waste and give again the day.

Zar. You're too secure; the danger is more imminent

Than your high courage suffers you to see;
While Osmyn lives you are not safe.

King. His doom
Is pass'd; if you revoke it not, he dies.

Zar. 'Tis well. By what I heard upon your entrance

I find I can unfold what yet concerns
You more. One, who did call himself Alphonso,
Was cast upon my coast, as 'tis reported,
And oft had private conference with the king;
To what effect I knew not then: but he,
Alphonso, secretly departed, just
About the time our arms embark'd for Spain.
What I know more is, that a triple league
Of strictest friendship was profess'd between Alphonso, Heli, and the traitor Osmyn.

King. Public report is ratified in this.

Zar. And Osmyn's death requir'd of strong necessity.

King. Give orders straight, that all the prisoners die.

Zar. Forbear a moment, somewhat more I have Worthy your private ear, and this your minister.

King. Let all, except Gonsalez, leave the room.
[Exit PEREZ, &c.]

Zar. I am your captive, and you've used me nobly;

And in return of that, though otherwise your enemy, I have discover'd Osmyn,
His private practice and conspiracy
Against your state; and fully to discharge myself of what I've undertaken, now
I think it fit to tell you, that your guards
Are tainted: some among 'em have resolv'd
To rescue Osmyn at the place of death.

King. Is treason then so near us as our guards?

Zar. Most certain; though my knowledge is not yet

So ripe, to point at the particular men.

King. What's to be done?

Zar. That too I will advise.

I have remaining in my train some mutes,
A present once from the sultana queen,
In the grand signior's court. These from their infancy

Are practis'd in the trade of death; and shall (As there the custom is) in private strangle
Osmyn.

Gon. My lord, the queen advises well.

King. What offering, or what recompence remains

In me that can be worthy so great services?

To cast beneath your feet the crown you've sav'd,
Though on the head that wears it, were too little.

Zar. Of that hereafter: but, mean time, 'tis fit
You give strict charge that none may be admitted

To see the prisoner, but such mutes as I Shall send.

King. Who waits there?

Enter PEREZ.

King. On your life, take heed
That only Zara's mutes, or such who bring
Her warrant, have admittance to the Moor.

Zar. They, and no other, not the princess'
self.

Per. Your majesty shall be obey'd.

King. Retire. [Exit PEREZ.]

Gon. That interdiction so particular
Pronounced with vehemence against the princess,
Should have more meaning than appears bare-fac'd.

This king is blinded by his love, and heeds
It not. [Aside.]—Your majesty might sure have spar'd

The last restraint: you hardly can suspect
The princess is confederate with the Moor.

Zar. I've heard her charity did once extend
So far, to visit him at his request.

Gon. Ha!

King. How! She visit Osmyn! What, my daughter?

Sel. Madam, take heed; or you have ruin'd all.

Zar. And after did solicit you on his Behalf. [Aside.]

King. Never. You have been misinform'd.

Zar. Indeed! Then 'twas a whisper spread by some

Who wish'd it so; a common art in courts.
I will retire, and instantly prepare
Instruction for my ministers of death.

[Exit ZARA and SELIM.]
Gon. There's somewhat yet of mystery in this;
Her words and actions are obscure and double,
Sometimes concur, and sometimes disagree:
I like it not. [Aside.]

King. What dost thou think, Gonsalez?
Are we not much indebted to this fair one?

Gon. I am a little slow of credit, Sir,
In the sincerity of women's actions.
Methinks this lady's hatred to the Moor
Disquiets her too much; which makes it seem
As if she'd rather that she did not hate him.
I wish her mutes are meant to be employ'd
As she pretends—I doubt it now—Your guards
Corrupted! How? By whom? Who told her so?
I th' evening Osmyn was to die; at midnight

She begg'd the royal signet to release him;
 P' th' morning he must die again; ere noon
 Her mutes alone must strangle him, or he'll Escape. This, put together, suits not well.

King. Yet that there's truth in what she has discover'd

Is manifest from every circumstance.
 This tumult, and the lords who fled with Heli,
 Are confirmation;—that Alphonso lives,
 Agrees expressly too, with her report.

Gon. I grant it, Sir; and doubt not, but in rage
 Of jealousy, she has discover'd what
 She now repents. It may be I'm deceiv'd.
 But why that needless caution of the princess?
 What if she had seen Osmyn? Though 'twere strange;

But if she had, what was't to her? Unless
 She fear'd her stronger charms might cause the Moor's

Affection to revolt.

King. I thank thee, friend.
 There's reason in thy doubt, and I am warn'd—
 But think'st thou that my daughter saw this Moor?

Gon. If Osmyn be, as Zara has related,
 Alphonso's friend, 'tis not impossible
 But she might wish, on his account, to see him.

King. Say'st thou? By Heaven, thou hast rous'd a thought,

That like a sudden earthquake shakes my frame.
 Confusion! then my daughter's an accomplice,
 And plots in private with this hellish Moor.

Gon. That were too hard a thought—but see, she comes—

'Twere not amiss to question her a little,
 And try how'er, if I've divin'd aright.
 If what I fear be true, she'll be concern'd
 For Osmyn's death, as he's Alphonso's friend:
 Urge that, to try if she'll solicit for him.

Enter ALMERIA and LEONORA.

King. Your coming has prevented me, Almeria;
 I had determin'd to have sent for you.
 Let your attendant be dismiss'd; I have [LEON. retires.

 To talk with you. Come near; why dost thou shake?

What mean those swoln and red-fleck'd eyes, that look

As they had wept in blood, and worn the night
 In waking anguish? Why this on the day
 Which was design'd to celebrate thy nuptials;
 But that the beams of light are to be stain'd
 With reeking gore, from traitors on the rack?
 Wherefore I have deferr'd the marriage-rites;
 Nor shall the guilty horrors of this day
 Profane that jubilee.

Alm. All days to me
 Henceforth are equal: this, the day of death,
 To-morrow, and the next, and each that follows,
 Will undistinguish'd roll, and but prolong
 One hated line of more extended wo.

King. Whence is thy grief? Give me to know the cause;

And look thou answer me with truth; for know,
 I am not unacquainted with thy falsehood.

Why art thou mute? Base and degenerate maid!
Gon. Dear Madam, speak, or you'll incense
 the king.

Alm. What is't to speak? Or wherefore should I speak?

What means these tears but grief unutterable?

King. They are the dumb confessions of thy mind;

They mean thy guilt, and say thou wert confederate

With damn'd conspirators to take my life.
 Oh, impious paricide! Now canst thou speak!

Alm. O earth, behold, I kneel upon thy bosom,
 And bend my flowing eyes to stream upon

Thy face, imploring thee that thou wilt yield;
 Open thy bowels of compassion, take

Into thy womb the last and most forlorn
 Of all thy race. Hear me, thou common parent

—I have no parent else—be thou a mother,
 And step between me and the curse of him

Who was—who was, but is no more a father
 But brands my innocence with horrid crimes;

And, for the tender names of child and daughter,
 Now calls me murderer and paricide.

King. Rise, I command thee, rise,—and if thou wouldst

Acquit thyself of these detested names,
 Swear thou hast never seen that foreign dog;

Now doom'd to die, that most accursed Osmyn.
Alm. Never, but as with innocence I might,
 And free of all bad purposes. So Heaven's

My witness.
King. Vile, equivocating wretch! [it]

With innocence! Oh, patience! hear—she owns Confesses it! By Heaven, I'll have him rack'd,

Torn, mangled, flay'd, impal'd—all pains and tortures

That wit of man, or dire revenge can think,
 Shall he, accumulated, underbear.

Alm. Oh, I am lost.—There fate begins to wound.

King. Hear me, then: if thou canst reply;
 know, traitress,

I'm not to learn that curs'd Alphonso lives;
 Nor am I ignorant what Osmyn is—

Alm. Then all is ended, and we both must die.
 Since thou'rt reveal'd, alone thou shalt not die.

And yet alone would I have died, Heaven knows,
 Repeated deaths, rather than have reveal'd thee.

Yes, all my father's wounding wrath, though each
 Reproach cuts deeper than the keenest sword,

And cleaves my heart, I would have borne it all,
 Nay all the pains that are prepar'd for thee;

To the remorseless rack I would have given
 This weak and tender flesh, to have been bruis'd

And torn, rather than have reveal'd thy being.
King. Hell, hell! Do I hear this, and yet endure!

What! dar'st thou to my face avow thy guilt?
 Hence, ere I curse—fly my just rage with speed;

Least I forget us both, and spurn thee from me.
Alm. And yet a father! Think, I am your child!

Turn not your eyes away—look on me kneeling
 Now curse me if you can, now spurn me off.

Did ever father curse his kneeling child?
 Never: for always blessings crown that posture,
 Nature inclines, and half way meets that duty,
 Stooping to raise from earth the filial reverence;

For bended knees returning folding arms,
 With prayers and blessings, and paternal love.

Oh, hear me then, thus crawling on the earth—
King. Be thou advis'd, and let me go, while yet

The light impression thou hast made remains.
Alm. No, never will I rise, nor lose this hold,

 'Till you are mov'd and grant that he may live

King. Ha! who may live? Take heed! no more of that;
For on my soul he dies, though thou and I,
And all should follow to partake his doom.
Away, off, let me go—Call her attendants.

[LEONORA and women return.

Alm. Drag me; and harrow the earth with my bare bosom;

I will not go till you have spar'd my husband.

King. Ha! What say'st thou? Husband! Husband! damnation!

What husband! Which? Who?

Alm. He, he is my husband.

King. Poison and daggers! Who?

Alm. Oh—

[Faints.

Gon. Help, support her.

Alm. Let me go, let me fall, sink deep—I'll dig,

I'll dig a grave and tear up death; I will;

I'll scrape, till I collect his rotten bones,
And clothe their nakedness with my own flesh;

Yes, I will strip off life, and we will change:
I will be death! then, though you kill my husband,

He shall be mine still, and for ever mine.

King. What husband? Whom dost thou mean?

Gon. She raves!

Alm. Oh, that I did. Osmyn, he is my husband.

King. Osmyn!

Alm. Not Osmyn, but Alphonso, is my dear
And wedded husband—Heaven, and air, and seas,
Ye winds and waves, I call ye all to witness.

King. Wilder than winds or waves thyself dost rave.

Should I hear more, I too should catch thy madness.

Yet somewhat she must mean of dire import,
Which I'll not hear, till I am more at peace.
Watch her returning sense, and bring me word;
And look that she attempt not on her life. [Exit.

Alm. Oh, stay, yet stay; hear me, I am not mad,

I would to Heaven I were—He's gone.

Gon. Have comfort.

Alm. Curs'd be that tongue that bids me be of comfort;

Curs'd my own tongue, that could not move his pity;

Curs'd these weak hands that could not hold him here;

For he is gone to doom Alphonso's death.

Gon. Your too excessive grief works on your fancy,

And deludes your sense. Alphonso, if living,
Is far from hence, beyond your father's power.

Alm. Hence, thou detested, ill-timed flatterer!
Source of my woes; thou and thy race be curs'd;
But doubly thou, who couldst alone have policy
And fraud to find the fatal secret out,
And know that Osmyn was Alphonso.

Gon. Ha!

Alm. Why dost thou start? What dost thou see or hear?

Was it the doleful bell, tolling for death?

Or dying groans from my Alphonso's breast?

See, see, look yonder! where a grizz'd, pale,
And ghastly head glares by, all smear'd with blood,

Gasping as it would speak; and after, see,
Behold, a damp, dead hand has dropp'd a dagger:

I'll catch it—Hark! a voice cries murder! ah,
My father's voice! hollow it sounds, and calls
Me from the tomb—I'll follow it; for there
I shall again behold my dear Alphonso.

[Exit ALMERIA and LEONORA.

Gon. She's greatly griev'd; nor am I less surpris'd.

Osmyn, Alphonso! No; she over-rates

My policy; I ne'er suspected it;

Nor now had known it, but from her mistake.

Her husband too! Ha! where is Garcia then?

And where the crown that should descend on him,

To grace the line of my posterity?

Hold, let me think—If I should tell the king—

Things come to this extremity: his daughter

Wedded already—What if he should yield

Knowing no remedy for what is past,

And urg'd by nature pleading for his child,

With which he seems to be already shaken.

And though I know he hates beyond the grave

Anselmo's race; yet if—that if concludes me.

To doubt, when I may be assur'd, is folly.

But how prevent the captive queen, who means

To set him free? Ay, now 'tis plain. O well

Invented tale! He was Alphonso's friend.

This subtle woman will amuse the king.

If I delay—'twill do—or better so.

One to my wish. Alonzo, thou art welcome.

Enter ALONZO.

Alon. The king expects your lordship.

Gon. 'Tis no matter.

I'm not i'the way at present, good Alonzo.

Alon. If't please your lordship, I'll return and say

I have not seen you.

Gon. Do, my best Alonzo.

Yet stay, I would—but go; anon will serve—

Yet I have that requires thy speedy help.

I think thou wouldst not stop to do me service.

Alon. I am your creature.

Gon. Say, thou art my friend.

I've seen thy sword do noble execution.

Alon. All that can your lordship shall command.

Gon. Thanks; and I take thee at thy word.

Thou'st seen,

Amongst the followers of the captive queen,
Dumb men, who make their meaning known by signs.

Alon. I have, my lord.

Gon. Couldst thou procure, with speed

And privacy, the wearing garb of one

Of those, though purchas'd by his death, I'd give

Thee such reward, as should exceed thy wish.

Alon. Conclude it done. Where shall I wait your lordship? [Gence;

Gon. At my apartment. Use thy utmost diligence.
And say I've not been seen—Haste, good Alonzo.

[Exit ALONZO.

So, this can hardly fail. Alphonso slain,

The greatest obstacle is then remov'd.

Almeria widow'd, yet again may wed;

And I yet fix the crown on Garcia's head. [Exit.

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Room of State.

Enter KING, PEREZ, and ALONZO.

King. Not to be found! In an ill hour he's absent.

None, say you? none! What, not the favourite eunuch?

Nor she herself, nor any of her mutes, Have yet requir'd admittance?

Per. None, my lord.

King. Is Osmyn so dispos'd as I commanded?

Per. Fast bound in double chains, and at full length

He lies supine on earth: with as much ease She might remove the centre of this earth, As loose the rivets of his bonds.

King. 'Tis well.

[A Mute appears, and seeing the KING, retires.]

Ha! stop, and seize that mute; Alonzo, follow him.

Entering he met my eyes, and starting back, Frighted, and fumbling one hand in his bosom, As to conceal th' importance of his errand.

[ALONZO follows him, and returns with a paper.]

Alon. A bloody proof of obstinate fidelity?

King. What dost thou mean?

Alon. Soon as I seiz'd the man, He snatch'd from out his bosom this—and strove, With rash and greedy haste, at once, to cram The morsel down his throat. I caught his arm, And hardly wrench'd his hand to wring it from him:

Which done, he drew a poignard from his side, And on the instant plung'd it in his breast.

King. Remove the body thence, ere Zara see it.

Alon. I'll be so bold to borrow his attire.

'Twill quit me of my promise to Gonsalez.

[Aside. Exit.]

Per. What'er it is, the king's complexion turns.

King. How's this? My mortal foe beneath my roof! [Having read the letter.]

Oh, give me patience, all ye powers! No, rather

Give me new rage, implacable revenge, And trebled fury—Ha! who's there?

Per. My lord.

King. Hence, slave! how dar'st thou 'bide to watch and pry

Into how poor a thing a king descends, How like thyself, when passion treads him down?

Ha! stir not on thy life; for thou wert fix'd, And planted here, to see me gorge this bait,

And lash against the hook—By Heaven, you're all

Rank traitors! thou art with the rest combin'd; Thou knew'st that Osmyn was Alphonso; knew'st

My daughter privately with him conferr'd; And wert the spy and pander to their meeting.

Per. By all that's holy, I'm amaz'd—

King. Thou liest.

Thou art accomplice too with Zara; here Where she sets down—Still will I set thee free.

[Reads.]

That somewhere is repeated—I have power O'er them that are thy guards—Mark that, thou traitor.

Per. It was your majesty's command I should Obey her order.—

King. [Reading.]—And still will I set Thee free, Alphonso.—Hell! curs'd, curs'd Alphonso!

False and perfidious Zara! Strumpet daughter! Away, begone, thou feeble boy, fond love;

61*

All nature, softness, pity, and compassion.

This hour I throw ye off, and entertain

Fell hate within my breast, revenge, and gall.

By Heaven, I'll meet and counterwork this treachery.

Hark thee, villain, traitor—answer me, slave.

Per. My service has not merited those titles.

King. Dar'st thou reply? Take that—thy service! thine! [Strikes him.]

What's thy whole life, thy soul, thy all, to my One moment's ease? Hear my command: and look

That thou obey, or horror on thy head: Drench me thy dagger in Alphonso's heart.

Why dost thou start? Resolve, or—

Per. Sir, I will.

King. 'Tis well—that when she comes to set him free,

His teeth may grin, and mock at her remorse.

[PER. going.]

—Stay thee—I've farther thought—I'll add to this,

And give her eyes yet greater disappointment:

When thou hast ended him, bring me his robe

And let the cell where she'll expect to see him

Be darken'd, so as to amuse the sight.

I'll be conducted thither—mark me well—

There with his turban, and his robe array'd,

And laid along, as he now lies, supine,

I shall convict her, to her face, of falsehood.

When for Alphonso's she shall take my hand,

And breathe her sighs upon my lips for his;

Sudden I'll start, and dash her with her guilt.

But see, she comes. I'll shun th' encounter;

thou

Follow me, and give heed to my direction.

[Exit.]

Enter ZARA and SELIM.

Zar. The mute not yet return'd! ha! 'twas the king,

The king that parted hence! frowning he went;

His eyes like meteors roll'd, then darting down

Their red and angry beams; as if his sight

Would, like the raging dog-star, scorch the earth,

And kindle ruin in its course. Dost think

He saw me?

Sel. Yes; but then, as if he thought

His eyes had err'd, he hastily recall'd

Th' imperfect look, and sternly turn'd away.

Zar. Shun me, when seen! I fear thou hast undone me.

Thy shallow artifice begets suspicion,

And, like a cobweb veil, but thinly shades

The face of thy design; alone disguising

What should have never been seen. Imperfect mischief!

Thou, like the adder, venomous and deaf,

Hast stung the traveller, and after hear'st

Not his pursuing voice; even when thou think'st

To hide, the rustling leaves and bended grass

Confess and point the path which thou hast crept.

Oh, fate of fools! officious in contriving;

In executing, puzzled, lame, and lost.

Sel. Avert it, Heaven, that you should ever suffer

For my defect; or that the means which I

Devis'd to serve, should ruin your design.

Prescience is Heaven's alone, not given to man,

If I have fail'd, in what, as being man

I needs must fail; impute not as a crime
My nature's want, but punish nature in me;
I plead not for a pardon and to live,
But to be punish'd and forgiven. Here, strike;
I bare my breast to meet your just revenge.

Zar. I have not leisure now to take so poor
A forfeit as thy life; somewhat of high
And more important fate requires my thought.
When I've concluded on myself, if I
Think fit, I'll leave thee my command to die.
Regard me well, and dare not to reply
To what I give in charge; for I'm resolv'd.
Give order that the two remaining mutes
Attend me instantly, with each a bowl
Of such ingredients mix'd, as will with speed
Benumb the living faculties, and give
Most easy and inevitable death.
Yes, Osmyn, yes; be Osmyn or Alphonso,
I'll give thee freedom, if thou dar'st be free:
Such liberty as I embrace myself
Thou shalt partake. Since fates no more afford;
I can but die with thee, to keep my word. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—Opening, shows the Prison.

Enter GONSALEZ, disguised like a Mute, with a Dagger.

Gon. Nor centinel nor guard! the doors un-barr'd!

And all as still as at the noon of night!
Sure death already has been busy here.

There lies my way; that door too is unlock'd.

[Looking in.]
Ha! sure he sleeps—all's dark within, save what
A lamp, that feebly lifts a sickly flame,
By fits reveals—his face seems turn'd, to favour
Th' attempt; I'll steal and do it unperceiv'd.
What noise! Somebody coming? is't Alonzo?
Nobody. Sure he'll wait without—I would 'Twere done—I'll crawl and sting him to the heart,

Then cast my skin, and leave it there to answer it.
[Goes in.]

Enter GARCIA and ALONZO.

Gar. Where, where, Alonzo, where's my father? where

The king? Confusion! all is on the rout!
All's lost, all ruin'd by surprise and treachery.
Where, where is he? Why dost thou mislead
me?

Alon. My lord, he entered but a moment since,
And could not pass me unperceiv'd—What, ho!
My lord! my lord! What, ho! my lord Gonsalez!

Enter GONSALEZ, bloody.

Gon. Perdition choke your clamours—whence this rudeness?

Garcia!

Gar. Perdition, slavery, and death,
Are entering now our doors. Where is the king?
What means this blood, and why this face of horror?

Gon. No matter—give me first to know the cause

Of these your rash and ill-timed exclamations.

Gar. The eastern gate is to the foe betray'd,
Who, but for heaps of slain that choke the passage,

Had enter'd long ere now, and borne down all Before 'em, to the palace-walls. Unless
The king in person animate our men,
Granada's lost; and to confirm this fear,
The traitor Perez, and the captive Moor,
Are through a postern fled, and join'd the foe.

Gon. Would all were false as that; for whom you call

The Moor, is dead. That Osmyn was Alphonso;
In whose heart's blood this poignard yet is warm.

Gar. Impossible! for Osmyn was, while flying,
Pronounc'd aloud by Perez for Alphonso.

Gon. Enter that chamber, and convince your eyes,

How much report has wrong'd your easy faith.

[GARCIA goes in.]
Alon. My lord, for certain truth, Perez is fled;
And has declar'd the cause of his revolt

Was to revenge a blow the king had given him.

Gar. [Returning.] Ruin and horror! Oh, heart-wounding sight!

Gon. What says my son? What ruin? Ha!
what horror?

Gar. Blasted my eyes, and speechless be my tongue,

Rather than or to see, or to relate

This deed—Oh, dire mistake! Oh, fatal blow!

The King!—

Gon. Alon. The king!

Gar. Dead, weltering, drown'd in blood.

See, see, attir'd like Osmyn, where he lies.

[They look in.]
Oh, whence, or how, or wherefore was this done?

But what imports the manner or the cause

Nothing remains to do, or to require,

But that we all should turn our swords against Ourselves, and expiate with our own, his blood.

Gon. Oh, wretch! Oh, cursed, rash, deluded fool!

On me, on me turn your avenging swords.

I, who have spilt my royal master's blood,

Should make atonement by a death as horrid,

And fall beneath the hand of my own son.

Gar. Ha! what! atone this murder with a greater!

The horror of that thought has damp'd my rage.

The earth already groans to bear this deed;

Oppress her not, nor think to stain her face

With more unnatural blood. Murder my father!

Better with this to rip up my own bowels,

And bathe it to the hilt in far less damnable

Self-murder.

Gon. Oh, my son! from the blind dotage

Of a father's fondness these ills arose.

For thee I've been ambitious, base, and bloody:

For thee I've plung'd into this sea of sin;

Stemming the tide with only one weak hand, While t'other bore the crown (to wreathe thy brow)

Whose weight has sunk me, ere I reach'd the shore.

Gar. Fatal ambition! Hark! the foe is enter'd:
[Shout.]

The shrillness of that shout speaks them at hand.

We have no time to search into the cause

Of this surprising and most fatal error.

What's to be done? the king's death known, would strike

The few remaining soldiers with despair,

And make them yield to mercy of the conqueror,

Alon. My lord, I've thought how to conceal the body.
Require me not to tell the means, till done,
Lest you forbid what you may then approve.

Gon. They shout again! [Goes in. Shout.] Whate'er he means to do,

'T were fit the soldiers were amus'd with hopes;
And in the mean time fed with expectation
To see the king in person at their head.

Gar. Were it a truth, I fear 'tis now too late.
But I'll omit no care, nor haste; and try,
Or to repel their force, or bravely die. [Exit.]

Re-enter ALONZO.

Gon. What hast thou done, Alonzo?

Alon. Such a deed
As but an hour ago I'd not have done,
Though for the crown of universal empire.
But what are kings reduc'd to common clay?
Or what can wound the dead?—I've from the body

Sever'd the head, and in an obscure corner
Dispos'd it, muffled in the mute's attire,
Leaving to view of them who enter next,
Alone the undistinguishable trunk:
Which may be still mistaken by the guards
For Osmyn, if in seeking for the king,
They chance to find it.

Gon. 'T was an act of horror:
And of a piece with this day's dire misdeeds.
But 'tis no time to ponder or repent.
Haste thee, Alonzo, haste thee hence with speed,
To aid my son. I'll follow with the last
Reserve to reinforce his arms: at least,
I shall make good and shelter his retreat.

[Exit severally.]

Enter ZARA, followed by SELIM and two Mutes, bearing the Bowls.

Zar. Silence and solitude are every where.
Through all the gloomy ways and iron doors
That hither lead, nor human face nor voice
Is seen or heard. A dreadful din was wont
To grate the sense, when enter'd here, from groans
And howls of slaves, condemn'd; from clink of chains,

And crash of rusty bars and creaking hinges:
And ever and anon the sight was dash'd
With frightful faces, and the meagre looks
Of grim and ghastly executioners.
Yet more this stillness terrifies my soul,
Than did that scene of complicated horrors.
It may be that the cause of this my errand
And purpose, being chang'd from life to death,
Has also wrought this chilling change of temper.
Or does my heart bode more? What can it more Than death?

Let 'em set down the bowls, and warn Alphonso
That I am here—so. You return and find

The king; tell him what he requir'd, I've done,
And wait his coming to approve the deed.

[Exit SELIM.]

Enter Mutes.

Zar. What have you seen? Ha! wherefore stare you thus,
[The Mutes return and look affrighted.]

With haggard eyes? Why are your arms across?
Your heavy and desponding heads hung down?
Why is't you more than speak in these sad signs?

Give me more ample knowledge of this mourning
[They open the scene, she perceives the body.]
Ha! prostrate! bloody! headless! Oh—I'm lost.
Oh, Osmyn! Oh, Alphonso! Cruel fate!
Cruel, cruel, oh, more than killing object!
I came prepar'd to die, and see thee die—
Nay, came prepar'd myself to give thee death—
But cannot bear to find thee thus, my Osmyn—
Oh, this accurs'd, this base, this treacherous king!

Enter SELIM.

Sel. I've sought in vain, for no where can the king
Be found—

Zar. Get thee to hell, and seek him there.

[Stabs him.]

His hellish rage had wanted means to act,
But for thy fatal and pernicious counsel.

Sel. You thought it better then—but I'm rewarded.

The mute you sent, by some mischance was seen,
And forc'd to yield your letter with his life;
I found the dead and bloody body stripp'd—
My tongue falters, and my voice fails—I sink—
Drink not the poison—for Alphonso is— [Dies.]

Zar. As thou art now—and I shall quickly be.
'Tis not that he is dead: for 'twas decreed
We both should die. Nor is't that I survive;
I have a certain remedy for that.
But, oh, he died, unknowing in my heart.
He knew I lov'd, but knew not to what height,
Nor that I meant to fall before his eyes,
A martyr and a victim to my vows.
Insenible of this last proof he's gone;
Yet fate alone can rob his mortal part
Of sense; his soul still sees and knows each purpose

And fix'd event of my persisting faith.
Then wherefore do I pause? give me the bowl.
[A Mute kneels, and gives one of the bowls.]
Hover a moment, yet, thou gentle spirit,
Soul of my love, and I will wait thy flight.
This to our mutual bliss, when join'd above.

[Drinks.]

Oh, friendly draught, already in my heart,
Cold, cold; my veins are icicles and frost.
I'll creep into his bosom, lay me there;
Cover us close—or I shall chill his breast,
And fright him from my arms—See, see, he slides
Still farther from me; look he hides his face,
I cannot feel it—quite beyond my reach,—
Oh, now he's gone, and all is dark— [Dies.]

[The Mutes kneel, and mourn over her.]

Enter ALMERIA and LEONORA.

Alm. Oh, let me seek him in this horrid cell:
For in the tomb, or prison I alone
Must hope to find him.

Leon. Heavens! what dismal scene
Of death is this! The eunuch Selim slain!

Alm. Show me; for I am come in search of death,

But want a guide, for tears have dimm'd my sight.

Leon. Alas! a little farther, and behold
Zara all pale and dead! two frightful men,

Who seem the murderers, kneel weeping by;
Feeling remorse too late for what they've done.
But, oh, forbear—lift up your eyes no more;
But haste away, fly from this fatal place,
Where miseries are multiplied; return,
Return, and look not on; for there's a dagger
Ready to stab the sight, and make your eyes
Rain blood—

Alm. Oh, I foreknow, foresee that object.
Is it at last then so? Is he then dead?
What, dead at last? quite, quite, for ever dead?
There, there, I see him; there he lies, the blood Yet bubbling from his wounds—Oh, more than savage!

Had they or hearts or eyes that did this deed?
Could eyes endure to guide such cruel hands?
Are not my eyes guilty alike with theirs,
That thus can gaze, and yet not turn to stone?
—I do not weep! The springs of tears are dried;

And of a sudden I am calm, as if
All things were well; and yet my husband's murder'd!

Yes, yes, I know to mourn! I'll sluice this heart,
The source of wo, and let the torrent loose.
—Those men have left to weep! they look on
me!

I hope they murder all on whom they look.
Behold me well: your bloody hands have err'd,
And wrongfully have slain those innocents:
I am the sacrifice design'd to bleed,
And come prepar'd to yield my throat—They shake

Their heads in sign of grief and innocence!
[They point at the bowl on the ground.]
And point! What mean they? Ha! a cup!
Oh, well,

I understand what medicine has been here.
Oh, noble thirst! yet greedy, to drink all——Oh, for another draught of death—What mean they?

[They point at the other cup.]
Ha! point again! 'tis there, and full, I hope.
Thanks to the liberal hand that fill'd thee thus;
I'll drink my glad acknowledgment—

Leon. Oh, hold,
For mercy's sake, upon my knee I beg—
Alm. With thee the kneeling world should beg in vain.

Seest thou not there? Behold who prostrate lies,
And pleads against thee; who shall then prevail?
Yet I will take a cold and parting leave
From his pale lips; I'll kiss him ere I drink,
Lest the rank juice should blister on my mouth,
And stain the colour of my last adieu.
Horror! a headless trunk! nor lips, nor face, [Coming near the body, starts, and lets fall the cup.]
But spouting veins, and mangled flesh! Oh, oh!

Enter ALPHONSO, HELI, PEREZ, with GARCIA Prisoner. Guards and Attendants.

Alph. Away, stand off, where is she? let me fly,
Save her from death, and snatch her to my heart.

Alm. Oh!
Alph. Forbear! my arms alone shall hold her up,
Warm her to life, and wake her into gladness.
Oh, let me talk to thy reviving sense

The words of joy and peace; warm thy cold beauties

With the new flushing ardour of my cheek;
Into thy lips pour the soft trickling balm
Of cordial sighs, and re-inspire thy bosom
With the breath of love. Shine, awake, Al- meria,

Give a new birth to thy long-shaded eyes,
Then double on the day reflected light.

Alm. Where am I? Heaven! what does this dream intend?

Alph. Oh, may'st thou never dream of less delight,

Nor ever wake to less substantial joys.
Alm. Given me again from death! Oh, all ye powers,

Confirm this miracle! Can I believe
My sight against my sight? and shall I trust
That sense, which in one instant shows him
dead

And living?—Yes, I will; I've been abus'd
With apparitions and affrighting phantoms:
This is my lord, my life, my only husband,
I have him now, and we no more will part.
My father, too, shall have compassion—

Alph. Oh, my heart's comfort, 'tis not given to this

Frail life to be entirely bless'd. E'en now,
In this extremest joy my soul can taste,
Yet I am dash'd to think that thou must weep;
Thy father fell where he design'd my death.
Gonsalez and Alonzo, both of wounds
Expiring, have, with their last breath, confess'd
The just decrees of Heaven, which on themselves

Has turn'd their own most bloody purposes,
Nay, I must grant, 'tis fit you should be thus—
[She weeps.]

Let 'em remove the body from her sight.
Ill-fated Zara! Ha! a cup! Alas!
My error then is plain! but I were fiant
Not to o'erflow in tribute to thy memory
Oh, Garcia!—

Whose virtue has renounc'd thy father's crimes, Seest thou how just the hand of Heaven has been?

Let us, who through our innocence survive,
Still in the paths of honour persevere,
And not from past or present ills despair;
For blessings ever wait on virtuous deeds;
And though a late, a sure reward succeeds.

[Exeunt omnes.]

EPILOGUE.

SPOKEN BY ALMERIA.

THE tragedy thus done, I am, you know,
No more a princess, but in statu quo;
And now as unconcern'd this mourning wear,
As if indeed a widow or an heir.
I've leisure, now, to mark your several faces,
And know each critic by his sour grimaces,
To poison plays, I see them where they sit,
Scatter'd like ratsbane up and down the pit;
While others watch, like parish searchers hir'd,
To tell of what disease the play expir'd,
Oh, with what joy they run to spread the news
Of a damn'd poet and departed muse!

But if he 'scape, with what regret they're seiz'd ! And how they're disappointed, when they're Critics to plays for the same end resort, [pleas'd ! That surgeons wait on trials in a court : For innocence condemn'd they've no respect, Provided they've a body to dissect. As Sussex men, that dwell upon the shore, Look out when storms arise, and billows roar, Devoutly praying, with uplifted hands, That some well-laden ship may strike the sands,	To whose rich cargo they may make pretence, And fatten on the spoils of Providence : So critics throng to see a new play split, And thrive and prosper on the wrecks of wit. Small hope our poet from these prospects draws ; And therefore to the fair commends his cause. Your tender hearts to mercy are inclin'd, With whom he hopes this play will favour find, Which was an offering to the sex design'd.

THE CLANDESTINE MARRIAGE:

A COMEDY,

IN FIVE ACTS.

BY GARRICK AND COLMAN.

REMARKS.

This comedy was produced at Drury-lane Theatre early in 1766, being the joint production of Garrick and the elder Colman. It is recorded by Davies, that no dramatic piece, since the days of Beaumont and Fletcher, had been written by two authors, in which wit, fancy, and humour, were so happily blended. The part of Lord Ogleby, principally written by Mr. Garrick, was intended for himself; but in consequence of his increasing infirmities, it devolved on Mr. King, who gave it that marked and brilliant originality which distinguished his acting. From the traits of character throughout this play, may be derived much useful reflection.—The mercenary maxims and views of Sterling, the vulgar consequence of Mrs. Heidelberg, and the meanness of Miss Sterling; are well set off by the solitudes of the amiable Fanny and her husband; the eccentricities of Lord Ogleby and his Swiss non-descript; and the agreeable variety of the subordinate characters.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Room in STERLING'S House.

Enter MISS FANNY, and BETTY, meeting.

Bet. [Running in.] Ma'am! Miss Fanny! Ma'am!

Fan. What's the matter, Betty?

Bet. Oh la! Ma'am! as sure as I am alive, here is your husband—I saw him crossing the court-yard in his boots.

Fan. I'm glad to hear it.—But pray now, my dear Betty, be cautious. Don't mention that word again on any account. You know we have agreed never to drop any expressions of that sort, for fear of an accident.

Bet. Dear Ma'am, you may depend upon me. There is not a more trustier creature on the face of the earth than I am. Though I say it, I am as secret as the grave—and if it is never told till I tell it, it may remain untold till doomsday for Betty.

Fan. I know you are faithful—but in our circumstances we cannot be too careful.

Bet. Very true, Ma'am! and yet I vow and protest there's more plague than pleasure with a secret; especially if a body mayn't mention it to four or five of one's particular acquaintance.

Fan. Do but keep this secret a little while longer, and then I hope you may mention it to any body.—Mr. Lovewell will acquaint the family with the nature of our situation as soon as possible.

Bet. The sooner the better, I believe; for if he does not tell it, there's a little tell-tale, I know of, will come and tell it for him.

Fan. Fy, Betty! [Blushes.]

Bet. Ah! you may well blush. But you're not so sick, and so pale, and so wan, and so many qualms—

Fan. Have done! I shall be quite angry with you.

Bet. Angry—Bless the dear puppet! I am sure I shall love it as much as if it was my own.—I meant no harm, Heaven knows.

Fan. Well, say no more of this—it makes me uneasy.—All I have to ask of you is, to be faithful and secret, and not to reveal this matter till we disclose it to the family ourselves.

Bet. Me reveal it!—If I say a word, I wish I may be burned. I would not do you any harm for the world—and as for Mr. Lovewell, I am sure I have loved the dear gentleman ever since he got a tide-waiter's place for my brother.—But let me tell you both, you must leave off your soft looks to each other, and your whispers, and your glances, and your always sitting next to one another at dinner, and your long walks together in the evening.—For my part, if I had not been in the secret, I should have known you were a pair of lovers at least, if not man and wife, as—

Fan. See there now again! Pray be careful.

Bet. Well, well—nobody hears me.—Man and wife—I'll say no more.—What I tell you is very true, for all that—

Love. [Within.] William!

Bet. Hark! I hear your husband—

Fan. What!

Bet. I say here comes Mr. Lovewell.—Mind the caution I give you—I'll be whipped now if you are not the first person he sees or speaks to in the family. However, if you choose it, it's nothing at all to me—as you sow, so you must reap—as you brew, so you must bake.—I'll e'en slip down the back stairs, and leave you together. [Exit.]

Fan. I see, I see, I shall never have a moment's ease till our marriage is made public. New distresses crowd in upon me every day. The solicitude of my mind sinks my spirits, preys upon my health, and destroys every comfort of my life. It shall be revealed, let what will be the consequence.

Enter LOVEWELL.

Love. My love!—How's this?—In tears?—Indeed this is too much. You promised me to support your spirits, and to wait the determination of our fortune with patience. For my sake, for your own, be comforted! Why will you study to add to our uneasiness and perplexity?

Fan. Oh, Mr. Lovewell, the indelicacy of a secret marriage grows every day more and more shocking to me.—I walk about the house like a guilty wretch: I imagine myself the object of the suspicion of the whole family, and am under the perpetual terrors of a shameful detection.

Love. Indeed, indeed, you are to blame. The amiable delicacy of your temper, and your quick sensibility, only serve to make you unhappy.—To clear up this affair properly to Mr. Sterling, is the continual employment of my thoughts. Every thing now is in a fair train. It begins to grow ripe for a discovery; and I have no doubt of its concluding to the satisfaction of ourselves, of your father, and the whole family.

Fan. End how it will, I am resolved it shall end soon—very soon. I would not live another week in this agony of mind, to be mistress of the universe.

Love. Do not be too violent neither. Do not let us disturb the joy of your sister's marriage with the tumult this matter may occasion!—I have brought letters from Lord Ogleby and Sir John Melvil to Mr. Sterling. They will be here this evening—and I dare say within this hour.

Fan. I am sorry for it.

Love. Why so?

Fan. No matter—only let us disclose our marriage immediately!

Love. As soon as possible.

Fan. But directly.

Love. In a few days, you may depend on it.

Fan. To-night—or to-morrow morning.

Love. That, I fear, will be impracticable.

Fan. Nay, but you must.

Love. Must! why?

Fan. Indeed you must—I have the most alarming reasons for it.

Love. Alarming, indeed! for they alarm me, even before I am acquainted with them—What are they?

Fan. I cannot tell you.

Love. Not tell me?

Fan. Not at present. When all is settled, you shall be acquainted with every thing.

Love. Sorrow they are coming!—Must be discovered!—What can this mean? Is it possible you can have any reasons that need be concealed from me?

Fan. Do not disturb yourself with conjectures—but rest assured, that though you are unable to divine the cause, the consequence of a discovery, be it what it will, cannot be attended with half the miseries of the present interval.

Love. You put me upon the rack—I would do any thing to make you easy.—But you know your father's temper—Money (you will excuse my frankness) is the spring of all his actions, which nothing but the idea of acquiring nobility or magnificence, can ever make him forego—and these he thinks his money will purchase.—You know too, your aunt's, Mrs. Heidelberg's, notions of the splendour of high life; her contempt for every thing that does not relish of what she calls quality; and that from the vast fortune in her hands, by her late husband, she absolutely governs Mr. Sterling and the whole family. Now if they should come to the knowledge of this affair too abruptly, they might perhaps be incensed beyond all hopes of reconciliation.

Fan. Manage it your own way. I am persuaded.

Love. But in the mean time make yourself easy.

Fan. As easy as I can, I will.—We had better not remain together any longer at present.—

Enter STERLING, as she is going.

Ster. Hey-day! who have we got here?

Fan. [Confused.] Mr. Lovewell, Sir.

Ster. And where are you going, hussy?

Fan. To my sister's chamber, Sir. [Exit.]

Ster. Ah, Lovewell! What! always getting my foolish girl yonder into a corner?—Well—let us but once see her eldest sister fast married to Sir John Melvil, we'll soon provide a good husband for Fanny, I warrant you.

Love. Would to Heaven, Sir, you would provide her one of my recommendation!

Ster. Yourself! eh, Lovewell?

Love. With your pleasure, Sir.

Ster. Mighty well!

Love. And I flatter myself, that such a proposal would not be very disagreeable to Miss Fanny.

Ster. Better and better!

Love. And if I could but obtain your consent, Sir—

Ster. What! you marry Fanny!—no—no—that will never do, Lovewell!—You're a good boy, to be sure—I have a great value for you—but can't think of you for a son-in-law.—There's no stuff in the case; no money, Lovewell!

Love. My pretensions to fortune, indeed, are but moderate; but though not equal to splendour, sufficient to keep us above distress.—Add to which, that I hope by diligence to increase it—and have love, honour—

Ster. But not the stuff, Lovewell!—Add one little round 0 to the sum total of your fortune, and that will be the finest thing you can say to me.—You know I've a regard for you—would do any thing to serve you—any thing on the footing of friendship—but—

Love. If you think me worthy of your friendship, Sir, be assured that there is no instance in which I should rate your friendship so highly.

Ster. Pshaw! pshaw! that's another thing, you know.—Where money or interest is concerned, friendship is quite out of the question.

Love. But where the happiness of a daughter is at stake, you would not scruple, sure, to sacrifice a little to her inclinations.

Ster. Inclinations! why you would not persuade me that the girl is in love with you—eh, Lovewell?

Lon. I cannot absolutely answer for Miss Fanny, Sir; but am sure that the chief happiness or misery of my life depends entirely upon her.

Ster. Why, indeed, now if your kinsman, Lord Ogleby, would come down handsomely for you—but that 's impossible—No, no,—'twill never do—I must hear no more of this—Come, Lovewell, promise me that I shall hear no more of this.

Love. [Hesitating.] I am afraid, Sir, I should not be able to keep my word with you, if I did promise you.

Ster. Why, you would not offer to marry her without my consent! would you, Lovewell?

Love. Marry her, Sir! [Confused.]

Ster. Ay, marry her, Sir!—I know very well, that a warm speech or two from such a dangerous young spark as you are, would go much further towards persuading a silly girl to do what she has more than a month's mind to do, than twenty grave lectures from fathers, or mothers, or uncles, or aunts, to prevent her. But you would not, sure, be such a base fellow, such a treacherous young rogue, as to seduce my daughter's affections, and destroy the peace of my family in that manner.—I must insist on it, that you give me your word not to marry her without my consent.

Love. Sir—I—I—as to that—I—I—beg, Sir—Pray, Sir, excuse me on this subject at present.

Ster. Promise then, that you will carry this matter no further without my approbation.

Love. You may depend on it, Sir, that it shall go no further.

Ster. Well—well—that's enough—I'll take care of the rest, I warrant you.—Come, come, let's have done with this nonsense!—What's doing in town!—Any news upon 'Change?

Love. Nothing material.

Ster. Have you seen the currants, the soap, and madeira, safe in the warehouse? Have you compared the goods with the invoice and bills of lading, and are they all right?

Love. They are, Sir.

Ster. And how are stocks?

Love. Fell one and a half this morning.

Ster. Well, well—some good news from America, and they'll be up again.—But how are Lord Ogleby, and Sir John Melvil?—when are we to expect them?

Love. Very soon, Sir. I came on purpose to bring you their commands. Here are letters from both of them. [Giving letters.]

Ster. Let me see—let me see—'Slife, how his lordship's letter is perfumed!—It takes my breath away. [Opening it.] And French paper too!—with a slippery gloss on it that dazzles one's eyes.—My dear Mr. Sterling—[Reading.—] Mercy on me! his lordship writes a worse hand than a boy at his exercise.—But how's this?—Eh!—

With you to-night—Lawyers to-morrow morning—To-night!—that's sudden, indeed—Where is my sister Heidelberg? She should know of this immediately.—Here, John! Harry! Thomas! [Calling the Servants.] Harkye, Lovewell!

Love. Sir.

Ster. Mind now, how I'll entertain his lordship and Sir John—We'll show your fellows at the other end of the town how we live in the city—They shall eat gold—and drink gold—and lie in gold.—Here, cook! butler! [Calling.] What signifies your birth, and education, and titles!—Money, money!—that's the stuff that makes the great man in this country.

Love. Very true, Sir.

Ster. True, Sir!—Why then have done with your nonsense of love and matrimony. You're not rich enough to think of a wife yet. A man of business should mind nothing but his business—Where are these fellows? John! Thomas! [Calling.] Get an estate, and a wife will follow of course—Ah! Lovewell! an English merchant is the most respectable character in the universe.—'Slife, man, a rich English merchant may make himself a match for the daughter of a nabob.—Where are all my rascals?—Here, William!—[Exit, calling.]

Love. So—as I suspected.—Quite averse to the match, and likely to receive the news of it with great displeasure.—What's best to be done?—Let me see—Suppose I get Sir John Melvil to interest himself in this affair. He may mention it to Lord Ogleby with a better grace than I can, and more probably prevail on him to interfere in it. I can open my mind also more freely to Sir John. He told me, when I left him in town, that he had something of consequence to communicate, and that I could be of use to him. I am glad of it: for the confidence he reposes in me, and the service I may do him, will ensure me his good offices.—Poor Fanny! it hurts me to see her so uneasy, and her making a mystery of the cause adds to my anxiety.—Something must be done upon her account; for, at all events, her solicitude shall be removed. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—MISS STERLING'S Dressing Room.

MISS STERLING and FANNY, discovered.

Miss S. O, my dear sister, say no more!—This is downright hypocrisy.—You shall never convince me that you don't envy me beyond measure.

—Well, after all, it is extremely natural—It is impossible to be angry with you.

Fan. Indeed, sister, you have no cause.

Miss S. And so you really pretend not to envy me?

Fan. Not in the least.

Miss S. And you don't in the least wish that you was just in my situation?

Fan. No, indeed, I don't. Why should I?

Miss S. Why should you? What! on the brink of marriage, fortune, title—But I had forgot—There's that dear, sweet creature, Mr. Lovewell, in the case.—You would not break your faith with your true-love now for the world, I warrant you.

Fan. Mr. Lovewell!—always Mr. Lovewell!—Lord, what signifies Mr. Lovewell, sister?

Miss S. Pretty peevish soul!—O, my dear, grave, romantic sister!—a perfect philosopher in petticoats! Love and a cottage!—eh, Fanny—Ah, give me indifference and a coach and six!

Fan. And why not a coach and six without the indifference?—But pray when is this happy marriage of yours to be celebrated? I long to give you joy.

Miss S. In a day or two—I cannot tell exactly—Oh, my dear sister!—I must mortify her a little: [Aside.] I know you have a pretty taste. Pray give me your opinion of my jewels. How do you like the style of this esclavage? [Showing jewels.]

Fan. Extremely handsome indeed, and well fancied.

Miss S. What d'ye think of these bracelets? I shall have a miniature of my father set round with diamonds to one, and Sir John's to the other.—And this pair of ear-rings, set transparent!—Here, the tops, you see, will take off, to wear in a morning, or in an undress—how d'ye like them? [Shows jewels.]

Fan. Very much, I assure you—Bless me, sister, you have a prodigious quantity of jewels—you'll be the very queen of diamonds.

Miss S. Ha, ha, ha! very well, my dear!—I shall be as fine as a little queen indeed.—I have a bouquet to come home to-morrow—made up of diamonds, and rubies, and emeralds, and topazes, and amethysts—jewels of all colours, green, red, blue, yellow, intermixed—the prettiest thing you ever saw in your life!—The jeweller says I shall set out with as many diamonds as any body in town, except Lady Brilliant, and Polly What-d'ye-call-it, Lord Squander's kept mistress.

Fan. But what are your wedding-clothes, sister?

Miss S. O, white and silver, to be sure, you know.—I bought them at Sir Joseph Lutestring's, and sat above an hour in the parlour behind the shop, consulting Lady Lutestring about gold and silver stuffs, on purpose to mortify her.

Fan. Fy, sister! how could you be so abominably provoking?

Miss S. Oh, I have no patience with the pride of your city-knight's ladies.—Did you ever observe the airs of Lady Lutestring, dressed in the richest brocade out of her husband's shop, playing crown-whist at Haberdasher's hall—whilst the civil, smirking Sir Joseph, with a snug wig trimmed round his broad face as close as a new cut yew hedge, and his shoes so black that they shine again, stands all day in his shop, fastened to his counter like a bad shilling?

Fan. Indeed, indeed, sister, this is too much—If you talk at this rate, you will be absolutely a bye-word in the city—You must never venture on the inside of Temple-bar again.

Miss S. Never do I desire it—never, my dear Fanny, I promise you. Oh, how I long to be transported to the dear regions of Grosvenor-square—far—far—from the dull districts of Aldersgate, Cheap, Candle-wick, and Farringdon Without and Within!—my heart goes pit-a-pat at the very idea of being introduced at court!—gilt chariot!—piebald horses!—laced liveries!—and then the whispers buzzing round the circle—“Who is that young lady? Who is she?” “Lady Melvil, Ma'am!”—Lady Melvil!—My ears tingle at the sound.—And then at dinner, instead of my father perpetually asking—“Any news upon 'Change?”—to cry, “Well, Sir John! anything new from Arthur's?”—or to say to some other woman of quality, “Was your ladyship at the Duchess of Rubber's last night?—Did you call in at Lady Thunder's?—In the immensity of crowd, I swear I did not see you—Scarce a soul at the opera last Saturday—Shall I see you at Carlisle-house next Thursday?”—Oh, the beau monde! I was born to move in the sphere of the great world.

Fan. And so, in the midst of all this happiness, you have no compassion for me—no pity for us poor mortals in common life.

Miss S. [Affectedly.] You?—You're above pity.—You would not change conditions with me.—You're over head and ears in love, you know;—Nay, for that matter, if Mr. Lovewell and you come together, as I doubt not you will, you will live very comfortably, I dare say.—He will mind his business—you'll employ yourself in the delightful care of your family—and once in a season, perhaps, you'll sit together in a front box at a benefit play, as we used to do at our dancing master's, you know—and perhaps I may meet you in the summer, with some other citizens, at Tunbridge. For my part, I shall always entertain a proper regard for my relations.—You sha'n't want my countenance, I assure you.

Fan. Oh, you're too kind, sister!

Enter MRS. HEIDELBERG.

Mrs. H. [At entering.] Here this evening!—I vow and perstew we shall scarce have time to provide for them—Oh, my dear! [To Miss STERLING.] I am glad to see you are not quite in a dish-able. Lord Ogleby and Sir John Melvil will be hear to-night.

Miss S. To-night, Ma'am?

Mrs. H. Yes, my dear, to-night.—Oh, put on a smarter cap, and change these ordinary ruffles!—Lord, I have such a deal to do, I shall scarce have time to slip on my Italian lutestring.—Where is this dawdle of a housekeeper?

Enter TRUSTY.

Oh, here, Trusty! do you know that people of quality are expected this evening?

Trus. Yes, Ma'am.

Mrs. H. Well—Do you be sure now that every thing is done in the most genteel manner—and to the honour of the family.

Trus. Yes, Ma'am.

Mrs. H. Well—but mind what I say to you.

Trus. Yes, Ma'am.

Mrs. H. His lordship is to lie in the chintz bed-chamber—d'ye hear?—and Sir John in the blue damask room—his lordship's valet-de-chamb in the opposite—

Trus. But Mr. Lovewell is come down—and you know that's his room, Ma'am.

Mrs. H. Well—well—Mr. Lovewell may make shift—or get a bed at the George.—But harkye, Trusty!

Trus. Ma'am!

Mrs. H. Get the great dining-room in order as soon as possible. Unpaper the curtains, take the kivers off the couch and the chairs, and, do you hear—take the china dolls out of my closet, and put them on the mantle-piece immediately—

Trus. Yes, Ma'am.

Mrs. H. And mind, as soon as his lordship comes in, be sure you set all their heads a nodding.

Trus. Yes, Ma'am.

Mrs. H. Begone, then! fly, this instant!—Where's my brother Sterling?

Trus. Talking to the butler, Ma'am.

Mrs. H. Very well. [Exit TRUSTY.] Miss Fanny, I pertest I did not see you before—Lord, child, what's the matter with you?

Fan. With me! nothing, Ma'am.

Mrs. H. Bless me! Why your face is as pale, and black, and yellow—of fifty colours, I vow and pertest.—And then you have drest yourself as loose and as big—I declare there is not such a thing to be seen now, as a young woman with a fine waist—You all make yourselves as round as Mrs. Deputy Barter. Go, child! You know the quality will be here by and by. Go, and make yourself a little more fit to be seen. [Exit FANNY.] She is gone away in tears—absolutely crying, I vow and pertest.—This ridiculous love! we must put a stop to it. It makes a perfect natural of the girl.

Miss S. Poor soul! she can't help it.

Mrs. H. Well, my dear! Now I shall have an opportunity of convincing you of the absurdity of what you was telling me concerning Sir John Melvil's behaviour to you.

Miss S. Oh, it gives me no manner of uneasiness.—But indeed, Ma'am, I cannot be persuaded but that Sir John is an extremely cold lover. Such distant civility, grave looks, and lukewarm professions of esteem for me and the whole family! I have heard of flames and darts, but Sir John's is a passion of mere ice and snow.

Mrs. H. Oh fy, my dear! I am perfectly ashamed of you. That's so like the notions of your poor sister! What you complain of as coldness and indifference, is nothing but the extreme gentility of his address, an exact picture of the manners of quality.

Miss S. O, he is the very mirror of complaisance; full of formal bows and set speeches! I declare, if there was any violent passion on my side, I should be quite jealous of him.

Mrs. H. Jealous! I say, jealous indeed—Jealous of who, pray?

Miss S. My sister Fanny. She seems a much greater favourite than I am; and he pays her infinitely more attention, I assure you.

Mrs. H. Lord! d'ye think a man of fashion, as he is, cannot distinguish between the genteel and the vulgar part of the family? Between you and your sister, for instance—or me and my brother? Be advised by me, child; it is all politeness and good breeding. Nobody knows the quality better than I do.

Miss S. In my mind, the old lord, his uncle, has ten times more gallantry about him than Sir John. He is full of attentions to the ladies, and smiles, and grins, and leers, and ogles, and fills every wrinkle of his old wizen face with comical expressions of tenderness. I think he would make an admirable sweetheart.

Enter STERLING.

Ster. No fish? Why the pond was dragged but yesterday morning—There's carp and tench in the boat.—Plague on't, if that dog Lovewell had any thought, he would have brought down a turbot, or some of the land-carriage mackarel.

Mrs. H. Lord, brother, I am afraid his lordship and Sir John will not arrive while it is light.

Ster. I warrant you.—But pray, sister Heidelberg, let the turtle be dressed to-morrow, and some venison—and let the gardener cut some pine-apples—and get out some ice.—I'll answer for wine, I warrant you—I'll give them such a glass of champagne as they never drank in their lives—no, not at a duke's table.

Mrs. H. Pray, now, brother, mind how you behave. I am always in a fright about you with people of quality. Take care that you don't fall asleep directly after supper, as you commonly do. Take a good deal of snuff: and that will keep you awake—And don't burst out with your horrible loud horse-laugh. It is monstrous vulgar.

Ster. Never fear, sister!—Who have we here?

Mrs. H. It is Mounseer Cantoan, the Swish gentleman that lives with his lordship, I vow and pertest.

Enter CANTON.

Ster. Ah, Mounseer! your servant.—I am very glad to see you, Mounseer.

Can. Mosh oblige to Mons. Sterling.—Ma'am, I am yours.—Matemoiselle, I am your.

[Bowing round.]

Mrs. H. Your humble servant, Mr. Cantoan!

Can. Kiss your hand, Matam!

Ster. Well, Motnseer—and what news of your good family?—when are we to see his lordship and Sir John?

Can. Mons. Sterling! milor Ogleby and Sir Jean Melvil will be here in one quarter hour.

Ster. I am glad to hear it.

Mrs. H. O, I am perdidious glad to hear it. Being so late, I was afraid of some accident.—Will you please to have any thing, Mr. Cantoan, after your journey?

Can. No, thank you, Ma'am.

Mrs. H. Shall I go and show you the apartments, Sir?

Can. You do me great honour, Ma'am.

Mrs. H. Come then! come, my dear.

[To MISS S. Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—Anti-Room to LORD OGLEBY'S Bedchamber.

BRUSH and CHAMBERMAID discovered.

Brush. You shall stay, my dear, I insist upon it.

Cham. Nay pray, Sir, don't be so positive; I cannot stay, indeed.

Brush. You shall drink one cup to our better acquaintance.

Cham. I seldom drinks chocolate; and, if I did, one has no satisfaction with such apprehensions about one—if my lord should wake, or the Swish gentleman should see one, or Madam Heidelberg should know of it, I should be frightened to death—besides, I have had my tea already this morning—I'm sure I hear my lord. [In a fright.]

Brush. No, no, Madam, don't flutter yourself—the moment my lord wakes he rings his bell, which I answer sooner or later, as it suits my convenience.

Cham. But should he come upon us without ringing—

Brush. I'll forgive him if he does—this key—[Takes a vial out of the case.] locks him up till I please to let him out.

Cham. Law! Sir, that's potecary's stuff.

Brush. It is so—but without this he can no more get out of bed—than he can read without spectacles—[Sips.] What with qualms, age, rheumatism, and a few surfeits in his youth, he must have a great deal of brushing, oiling, screwing, and winding-up to set him a-going for the day.

Cham. [Sips.] That's prodigious indeed—[Sips.] My lord seems quite in a decay.

Brush. Yes, he's quite a spectacle. [Sips.] A mere corpse till he is revived and refreshed from our little magazine here—When the restorative pills and cordial waters warm his stomach, and get into his head, vanity frisks in his heart, and then he sets up for the lover, the rake, and the fine gentleman.

Cham. [Sips.] Poor gentleman! but should the Swiss gentleman come upon us! [Frightened.]

Brush. Why then the English gentleman would be very angry.—No foreigner must break in upon my privacy. [Sips.] But I can assure you Monsieur Canton is otherwise employed—He is obliged to skim the cream of half a score newspapers for my lord's breakfast—ha, ha, ha! Pray, Madam, drink your cup peaceably—My lord's chocolate is remarkably good; he wont touch a drop but what comes from Italy.

Cham. [Sipping.] 'Tis very fine indeed! [Sips.] and charmingly perfumed—it smells for all the world like our young ladies' dressing-boxes.

Brush. You have an excellent taste, Madam; and I must beg of you to accept of a few cakes for your own drinking; [Takes them out of a drawer in the table.] and in return I desire nothing but to taste the perfume of your lips. [Kisses her.]—A small return of favours, Madam, will make, I hope, this country and retirement agreeable to us both. [He bows, she courtesses.]—Come, pray sit down—Your young ladies are fine girls, faith; [Sips.] though, upon my soul, I am quite of my old lord's mind about them; and were I inclined to matrimony, I should take the youngest. [Sips.]

Cham. Miss Fanny! The most affablest, and the most best-natured creter!—

Brush. And the eldest a little haughty or so—

Cham. More haughtier and prouder than Saturn himself—but this I say quite confidential to you; for one would not hurt a young lady's marriage, you know. [Sips.]

Brush. By no means; but you cannot hurt it with us—we don't consider tempers—we want money, Mrs. Nancy. Give us plenty of that, we'll abate you a great deal in other particulars, ha, ha, ha!

Cham. Bless me, here's somebody! [Bell rings.]—Oh, 'tis my lord!—Well, your servant, Mr. Brush—I'll clean the cups in the next room.

Brush. Do so—but never mind the bell—I sha'n't go this half hour.—Will you drink tea with me in the afternoon?

Cham. Not for the world, Mr. Brush—I'll be here to set all things to rights—But I must not drink tea indeed—and so your servant.

[Exit with tea-board. Bell rings again.]

Brush. Yes, yes, I hear you.—It is impossible to stupify one's self in the country for a week, without some little flirting with the abigails;—this is much the handsomest wench in the house, except the old citizen's youngest daughter, and I have not time enough to lay a plan for her.—[Bell rings.] O, my lord— [Going.]

Enter CANTON with newspapers in his hand.

Can. Monsieur Brush!—Maitre Brush! my lor stirra yet?

Brush. He has just rung his bell—I am going to him. [Exit.]

Can. Depechez-vous donc. [Puts on his spectacles.]—I wish de deveil had all dese papiers—I forget as fast as I read—de Advertise put out of my head de Gazette, de Chronique, and so dey all go l'un apres l'autre—I must get some nouvelle for my lor, or he'll be enrage contre moi.—Voyons! [Reads the paper.] Here is nothing but Anti-Sejanus and advertise—

Enter MAID with chocolate things.

Vat you want, chil?

Maid. Only the chocolate things, Sir.

Can. O, ver well—dat is good girl—and ver prit too. [Exit MAID.]

Lord O. [Within.] Canton! he, he!—[Coughs.] Canton!—

Can. I come, my!—vat shall I do?—I have no news—he will make great tintamarre!—

Lord O. [Within.] Canton! I say, Canton! Where are you?

Enter LORD OGLEBY, leaning on BRUSH.

Can. Here, my lor!—I ask pardon, my lor, I have not finish de papiers.—

Lord O. Damn your pardon and your papiers—I want you here, Canton.

Can. Den I run, dat is all.

[Shuffles along. LORD OGLEBY leans upon CANTON too, and comes forward.]

Lord O. You Swiss are the most unaccountable mixture—you have the language and the impertinence of the French, with the laziness of Dutchmen.

Can. 'Tis very true, my lor—I can't help—

Lord O. [Cries out.] O Diavolo!

Can. You are not in pain, I hope, my lor?

Lord O. Indeed but I am, my lor.—That vulgar fellow, Sterling, with his city politeness, would force me down his slope last night to see a clay-coloured ditch, which he calls a canal; and what with the dew and the east wind, my hips and shoulders are absolutely screwed to my body.

Can. A littel veritable eau d'arquisade vil set all to right—

[LORD OGLEBY sits down, and BRUSH gives chocolate.]

Lord O. Where are the palsy drops, Brush?

Brush. Here, my lord. [Pours out.]

Lord O. Quelle nouvelle avez-vous, Canton?

Can. A great deal of papier, but no news at all.

Lord O. What! nothing at all, you stupid fellow!

Can. Oui, my lor, I have little advertise, here, vil give you more plaisir den all de lies about nothing at all. La voua! [Puts on his spectacles.]

Lord O. Come, read it, Canton, with good emphasis, and good discretion.

Can. I vil, my lor. [Reads.] Dere is no question but that the cosmetique royale will utterly take away all heats, pimples, frecks, oder eruptions of de skin, and likewise de wrinkle of old age, &c. &c.—A great deal more, my lor.—Be sure to ask for de cosmetique royale, signed by the docteur own hand—Dere is more raison for dis caution dan good men vil tink—Eh, bien, my lor

Lord O. Eh bien, Canton! Will you purchase any?

Can. For you, my lor?

Lord O. For me, you old puppy? for what?

Can. My lor!

Lord O. Do I want cosmetics?

Can. My lor!

Lord O. Look in my face—come, be sincere.—Does it want the assistance of art?

Can. [With his spectacles.] En verite non.—'Tis very smoose and brillian—But tote dat you might take a little by way of prevention.

Lord O. You thought like an old fool, Monsieur, as you generally do. Try it upon your own face, Canton, and if it has any effect, the doctor cannot have a better proof of the efficacy of his nostrum. The surfeit water, Brush! [Brush pours out.]—What do you think, Brush, of this family we are going to be connected with?—Eh!

Brush. Very well to marry in, my lord; but it would never do to live with.

Lord O. You are right, Brush—There is no washing the blackmoor white—Mr. Sterling will never get rid of Blackfriars—always taste of the Borachio—and the poor woman, his sister, is so busy, and so notable, to make one welcome, that I have not yet got over the fatigue of her first reception; it almost amounted to suffocation!—I think the daughters are tolerable—Where's my cephalic snuff? [Brush gives him a box.]

Can. Dey tink so of you, my lor, for dey look at noting else, ma foi.

Lord O. Did they? Why I think they did a little—Where's my glass?—[Brush puts one on the table.] The youngest is delectable.

[Takes snuff.]

Can. O oui, my lor, very delect inteed; she made doux yeux at you, my lor.

Lord O. She was particular. The eldest, my nephew's lady, will be a most valuable wife; she has all the vulgar spirits of her father and aunt, happily blended with the tarmagant qualities of her deceased mother.—Some peppermint water, Brush—How happy is it, Canton, for young ladies in general, that people of quality overlook every thing in a marriage contract but their fortune.

Can. C'est bien heureux, et commode aussi.

Lord O. Brush, give me that pamphlet by my bed-side. [Brush goes for it.] Canton, do you wait in the anti-chamber, and let nobody interrupt me till I call you.

Can. Mush good may do your lordship. [Exit.]

Lord O. [To Brush, who brings the pamphlet.] And now, Brush, leave me a little to my studies. [Exit Brush.]—What can I possibly do among these women here, with this confounded rheumatism? it is a most grievous enemy to gallantry and address. [Gets off his chair.] He! courage! courage, my lor! by heavens, I'm another creature. [Hums and dances a little.] It will do, faith—Bravo, my lor! these girls nave absolutely inspired me—If they are for a game of romps—Me viola pret! [Sings and dances.]—Oh! that's an ugly twinge—but it's gone. I have rather too much of the lily this morning in my complexion; a faint tincture of the rose will give a delicate spirit to my eyes for the day.—[Unlocks a drawer at the bottom of the glass, and takes out rouge; while he is painting himself, a knocking at the door.] Who's there? I wont be disturbed.

Can. [Within.] My lor! my lor! here is Monsieur Sterling, to pay his devoir to you this morn in your chambre.

Lord O. What a fellow! [Softly.]—I am extremely honoured by Mr. Sterling.—Why don't you see him in, Monsieur? [Aloud.]—I wish he was at the bottom of his stinking canal. [Softly—door opens.] Oh, my dear Mr. Sterling, you do me a great deal of honour.

Enter STERLING and LOVEWELL.

Ster. I hope, my lord, that your lordship slept well last night—I believe there are no better beds in Europe than I have—I spare no pains to get them, nor money to buy them.—His Majesty, God bless him, don't sleep upon a better out of his palace; and if I had said in too, I hope no treason, my lord.

Lord O. Your beds are like every thing else about you—incomparable!—They not only make one rest well, but give one spirits, Mr. Sterling.

Ster. What say you then, my lord, to another walk in the garden? You must see my water by day-light, and my walks, and my slopes, and my clumps, and my bridge, and my flowering trees, and my bed of Dutch tulips.—Matters looked but dim, last night, my lord. I feel the dew in my great toe—but I would put on a cut shoe, that I might be able to walk you about—I may be laid up to-morrow.

Lord O. I pray Heaven you may! [Aside.]

Ster. What say you, my lord?

Lord O. I was saying, Sir, that I was in hopes of seeing the young ladies at breakfast: Mr. Sterling, they are, in my mind, the finest tulips in this part of the world, he, he, he!

Can. Bravissimo, my lor! ha, ha, ha, ha!

Ster. They shall meet your lordship in the garden—we wont lose our walk for them; I'll take you a little round before breakfast; and a larger before dinner, and in the evening you shall go the grand tour, as I call it, ha, ha, ha!

Lord O. Not a foot, I hope, Mr. Sterling; consider your gout, my good friend—you'll certainly be laid by the heels for your politeness, he, he, he!

Can. Ha, ha, ha! 'tis admirable, en verite!

[Laughs very heartily.]

Ster. If my young man [To LOVEWELL.] here would but laugh at my jokes, which he ought to do, as Mounseer does at yours, my lord, we should be all life and mirth.

Lord O. What say you, Canton, will you take my kinsman into your tuition? You have certainly the most companionable laugh I ever met with, and never out of tune.

Can. But when your lordship is out of spirits.

Lord O. Well said, Canton! But here comes my nephew, to play his part.

Enter SIR JOHN MELVIL.

Well, Sir John, what news from the island of love? Have you been sighing and serenading this morning?

Sir J. I am glad to see your lordship in such spirits this morning.

Lord O. I'm sorry to see you so dull, Sir—What poor things, Mr. Sterling, these very young fellows are! They make love with faces as if they were burying the dead—though indeed a marriage sometimes may be properly called a burying of the living—eh, Mr. Sterling?

Ster. Not if they have enough to live upon, my lord—Ha, ha, ha!

Can. Dat is all Monsieur Sterling tink of.

Sir J. Pr'ythee, Lovewell, come with me into the garden; I have something of consequence for you, and I must communicate it directly.

[Apart to LOVEWELL.]

Love. We'll go together. [Apart.] If your lordship and Mr. Sterling please, we'll prepare the ladies to attend you in the garden.

[Exeunt SIR JOHN MELVIL and LOVEWELL.]

Ster. My girls are always ready; I make them rise soon, and to bed early; their husbands shall have them with good constitutions and good fortunes, if they have nothing else, my lord.

Lord O. Fine things, Mr. Sterling!

Ster. Fine things, indeed, my lord!—Ah, my lord, had you not run off your speed in your youth, you had not been so crippled in your age, my lord.

Lord O. Very pleasant, he, he, he!

[Half laughing.]

Ster. Here's Mounseer now, I suppose, is pretty near your lordship's standing; but, having little to eat, and little to spend in his own country, he'll wear three of your lordship out—eating and drinking kills us all.

Lord O. Very pleasant, I protest—What a vulgar dog!

[Aside.]

Can. My lor so old as me!—He is chicken to me—and look like a boy to pauvre me.

Ster. Ha, ha, ha! Well said, Mounseer—keep to that, and you'll live in any country of the world—Ha, ha, ha!—But, my lord, I will wait upon you in the garden: we have but a little time to breakfast—I'll go for my hat and cane, fetch a little walk with you, my lord, and then for the rolls and butter!

[Exit.]

Lord O. I shall attend you with pleasure—hot rolls and butter in July! I sweat with the thoughts of it—

Can. C'est un barbare.

Lord O. He is a vulgar dog; and if there was not so much money in the family, which I can't do without, I would leave him and his hot rolls and butter directly—Come along, Monsieur.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—The Garden.

[Enter SIR JOHN MELVIL and LOVEWELL.]

Love. In my room this morning? Impossible.

Sir J. Before five this morning, I promise you.

Love. On what occasion?

Sir J. I was so anxious to disclose my mind to you, that I could not sleep in my bed—but I found that you could not sleep neither—The bird was flown, and the nest long since cold—Where was you, Lovewell?

Love. Pooh! pr'ythee! ridiculous!

Sir J. Come now, which was it; Miss Sterling's maid? a pretty little rogue! or Miss Fanny's Abigail? a sweet soul too—or—

Love. Nay, nay, leave trifling, and tell me your business.

Sir J. Well, but where was you, Lovewell?

Love. Walking—writing—what signifies where I was?

VOL. I. . . . 5 A

62*

Sir J. Walking! yes, I dare say. It rained as hard as it could pour. Sweet refreshing showers to walk in! No, no, Lovewell. Now would I give twenty pounds to know which of the maids—

Love. But your business! your business, Sir John!

Sir J. Let me a little into the secrets of the family.

Love. Pshaw!

Sir J. Poor Lovewell! he can't bear it, I see. [Aside.] She charged you not to kiss and tell, eh, Lovewell! However, though you will not honour me with your confidence, I'll venture to trust you with mine.—What do you think of Miss Sterling?

Love. What do I think of Miss Sterling?

Sir J. Ay, what do you think of her?

Love. An odd question!—but I think her a smart, lively girl, full of mirth and sprightliness.

Sir J. All mischief and malice, I doubt.

Love. How?

Sir J. But her person—what d'ye think of that?

Love. Pretty and agreeable.

Sir J. A little grisette thing.

Love. What is the meaning of all this?

Sir J. I'll tell you. You must know, Lovewell, that notwithstanding all appearances—[A loud laugh without.] We are interrupted—When they are gone, I'll explain.

[Enter LORD OGLEBY, STERLING, CANTON, MRS. HEIDELBERG, MISS STERLING, and FANNY.]

Lord O. Great improvements indeed, Mr. Sterling! wonderful improvements! The four seasons in lead, the flying Mercury, and the bason with Neptune in the middle, are in the very extreme of fine taste. You have as many rich figures as the man at Hyde-park corner.

Ster. The chief pleasure of a country house is to make improvements, you know, my lord. I spare no expense, not I.—This is quite another-guess sort of a place than it was when I first took it, my lord. We were surrounded with trees. I cut down about fifty to make the lawn before the house, and let in the wind and the sun—smack smooth—as you see.—Then I made a green-house out of the old laundry, and turned the brew-house into a pinery. The high octagon summer-house, you see yonder, is raised on the mast of a ship, given me by an East-India captain, who has turned many a thousand of my money. It commands the whole road. All the coaches, and chariots, and chaises, pass and repass under your eye. I'll mount you up there in the afternoon, my lord.

Lord O. No, I thank you, Mr. Sterling.

Ster. 'Tis the pleasantest place in the world to take a pipe and a bottle, and so you shall say, my lord.

Lord O. Ay, or a bowl of punch, or a can of flip, Mr. Sterling; for it looks like a cabin in the air.—If flying chairs were in use, the captain might make a voyage to the Indies in it still, if he had but a fair wind.

Can. Ha, ha, ha, ha!

Mrs. H. My brother's a little comical in his ideas, my lord!—But you'll excuse him.—I have a little Gothic dairy, fitted up entirely in my own taste.—In the evening, I shall hope for the honour of your lordship's company to take a dish of tea there, or a sullabub warm from the cow.

Lord O. I have every moment a fresh opportunity of admiring the elegance of Mrs. Heidelberg—the very flower of delicacy and cream of politeness.

Mrs. H. O, my lord!—[Leers at LORD OGLEBY.
Lord O. O, Madam!—

[Leers at MRS. HEIDELBERG.

Ster. How d'ye like these close walks, my lord?

Lord O. A most excellent serpentine!—It forms a perfect maze, and winds like a true-lover's knot.

Ster. Ay, here's none of your straight lines here—but all taste—zig-zag—crinkum-crankum—in and out—right and left—to and again—twisting and turning like a worm, my lord.

Lord O. Admirably laid out indeed, Mr. Sterling! one can hardly see an inch before one's nose any where in these walks. You are a most excellent economist of your land, and make a little go a great way.—It lies together in as small parcels as if it was placed in pots out of your window in Gracechurch-street.

Can. Ha, ha, ha, ha!

Lord O. What d'ye laugh at, Canton?

Can. Ah! que cette similitude est drole! so clever what you say, my lord!—

Lord O. You seem mightily engaged, Madam. What are those pretty hands so busily employed about?

[To FANNY.

Fan. Only making up a nosegay, my lord!—Will your lordship do me the honour of accepting it?

[Presents it.

Lord O. I'll wear it next my heart, Madam;—I see the young creature dotes on me.

[Aside.

Miss S. Lord, sister! you've loaded his lordship with a bunch of flowers as big as the cook, or the nurse, carries to town, on a Monday morning, for a beau-pot.—Will your lordship give me leave to present you with this rose and a sprig of sweetbriar?

Lord O. The truest emblems of yourself, Madam! all sweetness and poignancy.—A little jealous, poor soul!

[Aside.

Ster. Now, my lord, if you please, I'll carry you to see my ruins.

Mrs. H. You'll absolutely fatigue his lordship with over walking, brother!

Lord O. Not at all, Madam! We're in the garden of Eden, you know; in the region of perpetual spring, youth, and beauty.

[Leers at the women.

Mrs. H. Quite the man of quality, I vow and perjest.

[Aside.

Can. Take a my arm, mi lord!

[LORD OGLEBY leans on him.

Ster. I'll only show his lordship my ruins, and the cascade, and the Chinese bridge, and then we'll go in to breakfast.

Lord O. Ruins, did you say, Mr. Sterling?

Ster. Ay, ruins, my lord! and they are reckoned very fine ones, too. You would think them ready to tumble on your head. It has just cost me a hundred and fifty pounds to put my ruins in thorough repair. This way, if your lordship pleases.

Lord O. [Going, stops.] What steeple's that we see yonder?—the parish church, I suppose.

Ster. Ha, ha, ha! that's admirable. It is no church at all, my lord! it is a spire that I have built against a tree, a field or two off, to terminate the prospect. One must always have a church, or an obelisk, or something, to terminate the prospect, you know. That's a rule in taste, my lord!

Lord O. Very ingenious indeed! For my part, I desire no finer prospect than this I see before me.

[Leers at the women.] Simple, yet varied; bound ed, yet extensive.—Get away, Canton! [Pushes CANTON away.] I want no assistance—I'll walk with the ladies.

Ster. This way, my lord!

Lord O. Lead on, Sir!—We young folks here, will follow you.—Madam!—Miss Sterling!—Miss Fanny! I attend you.

[Exit after STERLING, gallanting the ladies.

Can. [Following.] He is cock o'de game, ma foi! [Exit.

Sir J. Hark ye, Lovewell, you must not go—at length, thank Heaven! I have an opportunity to unbosom.—I know you are faithful, Lovewell, and flatter myself you would rejoice to serve me.

Love. Be assured, you may depend upon me.

Sir J. You must know then, notwithstanding all appearances, that this treaty of marriage between Miss Sterling and me, will come to nothing.

Love. How?

Sir J. It will be no match, Lovewell.

Love. No match?

Sir J. No.

Love. You amaze me. What should prevent it?

Sir J. I.

Love. You! Wherefore?

Sir J. I don't like her.

Love. Very plain, indeed! I never supposed that you were extremely devoted to her from inclination, but thought you always considered it as a matter of convenience rather than affection.

Sir J. Very true. I came into the family without any impressions on my mind—with an unimpassioned indifference, ready to receive one woman as soon as another. I looked upon love, serious, sober love, as a chimera, and marriage as a thing of course, as you know most people do. But I, who was lately so great an infidel in love, am now one of its sincerest votaries.—In short, my defection from Miss Sterling proceeds from the violence of my attachment to another.

Love. Another! So, so! here will be fine work. And pray who is she?

Sir J. Who is she! who can she be but Fanny—the tender, amiable, engaging, Fanny?

Love. Fanny! what Fanny?

Sir J. Fanny Sterling. Her sister—Is not she an angel, Lovewell?

Love. Her sister? Confusion!—You must not think of it, Sir John.

Sir J. Not think of it? I can think of nothing else. Nay, tell me, Lovewell, was it possible for me to be indulged in a perpetual intercourse with two such objects as Fanny and her sister, and not find my heart led by insensible attraction towards her?—You seem confounded—Why don't you answer me?

Love. Indeed, Sir John, this event gives me infinite concern. Why did not you break this affair to the family before?

Sir J. Under such embarrassed circumstances as I have been, can you wonder at my irresolution or perplexity? Nothing but despair, the fear of losing my dear Fanny, could bring me to a declaration even now; and yet I think I know Mr. Sterling so well, that strange as my proposal may appear, if I can make it advantageous to him as a money transaction, as I am sure I can, he will certainly come into it.

Love. But even suppose he should, which I very much doubt, I don't think Fanny herself would listen to your addresses.

Sir J. You are deceived a little in that particular.

Love. You'll find I'm in the right.

Sir J. I have some little reason to think otherwise.

Love. You have not declared your passion to her already?

Sir J. Yes, I have.

Love. Indeed!—And—and—and how did she receive it?

Sir J. I think it is not very easy for me to make my addresses to any woman, without receiving some little encouragement.

Love. Encouragement!—did she give you any encouragement?

Sir J. I don't know what you call encouragement—but she blushed—and cried—and desired me not to think of it any more:—upon which I pressed her hand—kissed it—swore she was an angel—and I could see it tickled her to the very soul.

Love. And did she express no surprise at your declaration?

Sir J. Why, faith, to say the truth, she was a little surprised—and she got away from me too before I could thoroughly explain myself. If I should not meet with an opportunity of speaking to her, I must get you to deliver a letter for me.

Love. I!—a letter!—I had rather have nothing—

Sir J. Nay, you promised me your assistance—and I am sure you cannot scruple to make yourself useful on such an occasion.—You may, without suspicion, acquaint her verbally of my determined affection for her, and that I am resolved to ask her father's consent.

Love. As to that, I—your commands, you know—that is, if she—Indeed, Sir John, I think you are in the wrong.

Sir J. Well—well—that's my concern—Ha! there she goes, by Heaven! along that walk yonder, d'ye see!—I'll go to her immediately!

Love. You are too precipitate. Consider what you are doing.

Sir J. I would not lose this opportunity for the universe.

Love. Nay, pray don't go! Your violence and eagerness may overcome her spirits.—The shock will be too much for her. [Detains him.]

Sir J. Nothing shall prevent me—Ha! now she turns into another walk—Let me go!—[Breaks from him.] I shall lose her. [Going, turns back.] Be sure now, to keep out of the way! If you interrupt us I shall never forgive you. [Exit hastily.]

Love. 'Sdeath, I can't bear this. In love with my wife! acquaint me with his passion for her! make his addresses before my face!—I shall break out before my time.—This was the meaning of Fanny's uneasiness. She could not encourage him—I am sure she could not—Ha! they are turning into the walk, and coming this way. Shall I leave the place!—Leave him to solicit my wife? I can't submit to it.—They come nearer and nearer.—If I stay, it will look suspicious—It may betray us, and incense him.—They are here—I must go—I am the most unfortunate fellow in the world!

[Exit.]

Re-enter SIR JOHN MELVIL and FANNY.

Fan. Leave me, Sir John—I beseech you, leave me! Nay, why will you persist to follow me with idle solicitations, which are an affront to my character, and an injury to your own honour?

Sir J. I know your delicacy, and tremble to offend it: but let the urgency of the occasion be my excuse! Consider, Madam, that the future happiness of my life depends on my present application to you! Consider, that this day must determine my fate; and these are perhaps the only moments left me to incline you to warrant my passion, and to entreat you not to oppose the proposals I mean to open to your father.

Fan. For shame, for shame, Sir John! Think of your previous engagements! Think of your own situation, and think of mine! What have you discovered in my conduct that might encourage you to so bold a declaration? I am shocked that you should venture to say so much, and blush that I should even dare to give it a hearing.—Let me be gone.

Sir J. Nay, stay, Madam, but one moment:—your sensibility is too great.—Engagements! what engagements have been pretended on either side, more than those of family convenience? I went on in the trammels of a matrimonial negotiation, with a blind submission to your father and Lord Ogleby; but my heart soon claimed a right to be consulted. It has devoted itself to you, and obliges me to plead earnestly for the same tender interest in yours.

Fan. Have a care, Sir John! do not mistake a depraved will for a virtuous inclination. By these common pretences of the heart half our sex are made fools, and a greater part of yours despise them for it.

Sir J. Affection, you will allow, is involuntary. We cannot always direct it to the object on which it should fix—but when it is once inviolably attached, inviolably as mine is to you, it often creates reciprocal affection.—When I last urged you on this subject, you heard me with more temper, and I hoped with some compassion.

Fan. You deceived yourself. If I forbore to exert a proper spirit, nay if I did not even express the quickest resentment at your behaviour, it was only in consideration of that respect I wish to pay you in honour to my sister; and be assured, Sir, woman as I am, that my vanity could reap no pleasure from a triumph that must result from the blackest treachery to her. [Going.]

Sir J. One word, and I have done. [Stops her.]—Your sister, I verily believe, neither entertains any real affection for me, or tenderness for you. Your father, I am inclined to think, is not much concerned by means of which of his daughters the families are united. Now as they cannot, shall not, be connected otherwise than by my union with you, why will you, from a false delicacy, oppose a union so conducive to my happiness, and, I hope, your own? I love you, most passionately and sincerely love you,—and hope to propose terms agreeable to Mr. Sterling:—If then you don't absolutely loath, abhor, and scorn me—If there is no other happier man—

Fan. Hear me, Sir; hear my final determination.—Were my father and sister as insensible as you are pleased to represent them; were my heart for ever to remain disengaged to any other, I could not listen to your proposals.—What! on the very eve of a marriage with my sister; I, living under the same roof with her, bound, not only by the laws of friendship and hospitality, but even the ties of blood, to contribute to her happiness; and not to conspire against her peace, the peace of a whole family, and that of my own too!—Away away, Sir John!—At such a time, and in such circumstances, your addresses only inspire me with horror.—Nay, you must detain me no longer—I will go.

Sir J. Do not leave me in absolute despair!—Give me a glimpse of hope! [Falls on his knees.]
Fan. I cannot.—Pray, Sir John!—

[Struggles to go.]
Sir J. Shall this hand be given to another!—[Kisses her hand.] No, I cannot endure it.—My whole soul is yours, and the whole happiness of my life is in your power.

Re-enter MISS STERLING.

Fan. Ha! my sister is here. Rise, for shame, Sir John.

Sir J. Miss Sterling! [Rises.]
Miss S. I beg pardon, Sir! You'll excuse me, Madam!—I have broke in upon you a little un- opportunely, I believe—but I did not mean to interrupt you—I only came, Sir, to let you know that breakfast waits, if you have finished your morning's devotion.

Sir J. I am very sensible, Miss Sterling, that this may appear particular, but—

Miss S. O dear, Sir John, don't put yourself to the trouble of an apology—the thing explains itself.

Sir J. It will soon, Madam. In the mean time, I can only assure you of my profound respect and esteem for you, and make no doubt of convincing Mr. Sterling of the honour and integrity of my intentions—And—and—your humble servant, Madam!

[Exit in confusion.]
Miss S. Respect! Insolence! Esteem!—Very fine, truly. And you, Madam! my sweet, delicate, innocent, sentimental sister! will you convince my papa too of the integrity of your intentions?

Fan. Do not upbraid me, my dear sister! Indeed, I don't deserve it. Believe me, you can't be more offended at his behaviour than I am, and I am sure it cannot make you half so miserable.

Miss S. Make me miserable! You are mightily deceived, Madam; it gives me no sort of uneasiness, I assure you. A base fellow! As for you, Miss, the pretended softness of your disposition, your artful good nature, never imposed upon me. I always knew you to be sly, envious, and deceitful.

Fan. Indeed, you wrong me.

Miss S. Oh, you are all goodness, to be sure! Did not I find him on his knees before you? Did not I see him kiss your sweet hand? Did not I hear his protestations? Was not I a witness of your dissembled modesty? No, no, my dear! don't imagine that you can make a fool of your elder sister so easily.

Fan. Sir John, I own, is to blame; but I am above the thoughts of doing you the least injury.

Miss S. We shall try that, Madam. I hope, Miss, you'll be able to give a better account to my papa and my aunt, for they shall both know of this matter, I promise you. [Exit.]

Fan. How unhappy I am! my distresses multiply upon me. Mr. Lovewell must now become acquainted with Sir John's behaviour to me, and in a manner that may add to his uneasiness. My father, instead of being disposed by fortunate circumstances to forgive any transgressions, will be previously incensed against me. My sister and my aunt will become irreconcilably my enemies, and rejoice in my disgrace. Yet, at all events, I am determined on a discovery. I dread it, and am resolved to hasten it. It is surrounded with more horrors every instant, as it appears every instant more necessary. [Exit.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Hall.

Enter a SERVANT conducting in SERGEANT FLOWER, and COUNSELLORS TRAVERSE and TRUEMAN, all booted.

Ser. This way if you please, gentlemen; my master is at breakfast with the family at present, but I'll let him know, and he will wait on you immediately.

Flow. Mighty well, young man, mighty well.

Ser. Please to favour me with your names, gentlemen.

Flow. Let Mr. Sterling know, that Mr. Sergeant Flower, and two other gentlemen of the bar, are come to wait on him according to his appointment.

Ser. I will, Sir.

[Going]
Flow. And harkye, young man. [SERVANT returns.] Desire my servant, Mr. Sergeant Flower's servant, to bring in my green and gold saddle-cloth and pistols, and lay them down here in the hall, with my portmanteau.

Ser. I will, Sir.

[Exit.]
Flow. Well, gentlemen; the settling these marriage articles falls conveniently enough, almost just on the eve of the circuits. Let me see—the Home, the Midland, and Western; ay, we can all cross the country well enough to our several destinations: Traverse, when do you begin at Hertford?

Tra. The day after to-morrow.

Flow. That is commission-day with us at Warwick too; but my clerk has retainers for every cause in the paper, so it will be time enough if I am there next morning. Besides, I have half a dozen cases that have lain by me ever since the spring assizes, and I must tack opinions to them before I see my country clients again; so I'll take the evening before me, and then currente calamo, as I say, eh, Traverse?

Tra. True; and pray, Mr. Sergeant, are you concerned in Jones and Thomas, at Lincoln?

Flow. I am—for the plaintiff.

Tra. And what do you think on't?

Flow. A nonsuit.

Tra. I thought so.

Flow. Oh, no manner of doubt on't—huc clarius—we have no right in us. We have but one chance.

Tra. What's that?

Flow. Why, my lord chief does not go the circuit this time, and my brother Puzzle being in the commission, the cause will come on before him.

True. Ay, that may do indeed, if you can but throw dust in the eyes of the defendant's counsel.

Flow. True, Mr. Trueman, I think you are concerned for Lord Ogleby in this affair?

True. I am, Sir. I have the honour to be related to his lordship, and hold some courts for him in Somersetshire; go to the Western circuit, and attend the sessions at Exeter, merely because his lordship's interests and property lie in that part of the kingdom.

Flow. Ha!—and pray, Mr. Trueman, how long have you been called to the bar?

True. About nine years and three quarters.

Flow. Ha! I don't know that I ever had the pleasure of seeing you before. I wish you success, young gentleman.

Enter STERLING.

Ster. Oh, Mr. Sergeant Flower, I am glad to see you—your servant, Mr. Sergeant! gentlemen, your servant! Well, are all matters concluded? Has that snail-paced conveyancer, old Ferret of Gray's-inn, settled the articles at last? Do you approve of what he has done? Will his tackle hold, tight, and strong? Eh, master Sergeant?

Flow. My friend Ferret's slow and sure, Sir. But then, serius aut citius, as we say, sooner or later, Mr. Sterling, he is sure to put his business out of hand as he should do. My clerk has brought the writings, and all other instruments, along with him; and the settlement is I believe as good a settlement as any settlement on the face of the earth!

Ster. But that damned mortgage of sixty thousand pounds. There don't appear to be any other incumbrances, I hope?

Tra. I can answer for that, Sir—and that will be cleared off immediately on the payment of the first part of Miss Sterling's portion. You agree, on your part, to come down with eighty thousand pounds.

Ster. Down on the nail. Ay, ay, my money is ready to-morrow if he pleases; he shall have it in India bonds, or notes, or how he chooses. Your lords, and your dukes, and your people at the court end of the town, stick at payments sometimes—debts unpaid, no credit lost with them; but no fear of us substantial fellows—Eh, Mr. Sergeant?

Flow. Sir John having, last term, according to agreement, levied a fine and suffered a recovery, has hitherto cut off the entail of the Ogleby estate, for the better effecting the purposes of the present intended marriage; on which above-mentioned Ogleby estate, a jointure of two thousand pounds per annum is secured to your eldest daughter, now Elizabeth Sterling, spinster, and the whole estate after the death of the aforesaid earl, descends to the heirs male of Sir John Melvil, on the body of the aforesaid Elizabeth Sterling, lawfully to be begotten.

Tra. Very true; and Sir John is to be put in immediate possession of as much of his lordship's Somersetshire estate, as lies in the manors of Hogmore and Cranford, amounting to between two and three thousand pounds per annum; and at the death of Mr. Sterling, a further sum of seventy thousand—

Enter SIR JOHN MELVIL.

Ster. Ah, Sir John! Here we are, hard at it, paving the road to matrimony. First the lawyers, then comes the doctor. Let us but despatch the long-robe, we shall soon get pudding-sleeves to work, I warrant you.

Sir J. I am sorry to interrupt you, Sir—but I hope that both you and these gentlemen will excuse me. Having something very particular for your private ear, I took the liberty of following you, and beg you will oblige me with an audience immediately. [To STERLING.]

Ster. Ay, with all my heart! Gentlemen, Mr. Sergeant, you'll excuse it; business must be done, you know. The writings will keep cold till to-morrow morning.

Flow. I must beat Warwick, Mr. Sterling, the day after.

Ster. Nay, nay, I sha'n't part with you to-night, gentlemen, I promise you. My house is very full, but I have beds for you all, beds for your servants, and stabling for all your horses. Will you take a turn in the garden, and view some of my improvements before dinner? Or will you amuse yourselves on the green, with a game at bowls and a cool tankard? My servants shall attend you. Do you choose any other refreshment? Call for what you please; do as you please; make yourselves quite at home, I beg of you. Here, Thomas! Harry! William! wait on these gentlemen!—[Follows the Lawyers out, bawling and talking, and then returns to Sir John.] And now, Sir, I am entirely at your service. What are your commands with me, Sir John?

Sir J. After having carried the negotiation between our families to so great a length; after having assented so readily to all your proposals, as well as received so many instances of your cheerful compliance with the demands made on our part; I am extremely concerned, Mr. Sterling, to be the involuntary cause of any uneasiness.

Ster. Uneasiness! what uneasiness?—Where business is transacted as it ought to be, and the parties understand one another, there can be no uneasiness. You agree, on such and such conditions, to receive my daughter for a wife; on the same conditions I agree to receive you as a son-in-law; and as to all the rest, it follows of course, you know, as regularly as the payment of a bill after acceptance.

Sir J. Pardon me, Sir, more uneasiness has arisen than you are aware of. I am myself, at this instant, in a state of inexpressible embarrassment; Miss Sterling, I know, is extremely disconcerted too; and unless you will oblige me with the assistance of your friendship, I foresee the speedy progress of discontent and animosity through the whole family.

Ster. What the deuce is all this? I don't understand a single syllable.

Sir J. In one word, then—it will be absolutely impossible for me to fulfil my engagements in regard to Miss Sterling.

Ster. How, Sir John? Do you mean to put an affront upon my family? What! refuse to—

Sir J. Be assured, Sir, that I neither mean to affront nor forsake your family. My only fear is, that you should desert me; for the whole happiness of my life depends on my being connected with your family, by the nearest and tenderest ties in the world.

Ster. Why, did not you tell me, but a moment ago, that it was absolutely impossible for you to marry my daughter?

Sir J. True—but you have another daughter, Sir—

Ster. Well!

Sir J. Who has obtained the most absolute dominion over my heart. I have already declared my passion to her; nay, Miss Sterling herself is also apprised of it; and if you will but give a sanction to my present addresses, the uncommon merit of Miss Sterling will no doubt recommend her to a person of equal, if not superior rank, to myself, and our families may still be allied by my union with Miss Fanny.

Ster. Mighty fine, truly! Why, what the plague do you make of us, Sir John? Do you come to market for my daughters, like servants at a statute-fair? Do you think that I will suffer you, or any man in the world, to come into my house, like the grand seignor, and throw the handkerchief first to one, and then to t'other, just as ~~he~~ pleases? Do you think I drive a kind of African slave-trade with them, and—

Sir J. A moment's patience, Sir! Nothing but the excess of my passion for Miss Fanny should have induced me to take any step that had the least appearance of disrespect to any part of your family; and even now I am desirous to atone for my transgression by making the most adequate compensation that lies in my power.

Ster. Compensation! what compensation can you possibly make in such a case as this, Sir John?

Sir J. Come, come, Mr. Sterling, I know you to be man of sense, a man of business, a man of the world. I'll deal frankly with you; and you shall see that I don't desire a change of measures for my own gratification, without endeavouring to make it advantageous to you.

Ster. What advantage can your inconstancy be to me, Sir John?

Sir J. I'll tell you, Sir. You know that by the articles at present subsisting between us, on the day of my marriage with Miss Sterling, you agree to pay down the gross sum of eighty thousand pounds.

Ster. Well!

Sir J. Now if you will but consent to my waving that marriage—

Ster. I agree to your waving that marriage? Impossible, Sir John!

Sir J. I hope not, Sir; as, on my part, I will agree to wave my right to thirty thousand pounds of the fortune I was to receive with her.

Ster. Thirty thousand, d'ye say?

Sir J. Yes, Sir; and accept of Miss Fanny with fifty thousand, instead of fourscore.

Ster. Fifty thousand—

[Pausing.]

Sir J. Instead of fourscore.

Ster. Why—why—there may be something in that.—Let me see—Fanny with fifty thousand, instead of Betsy with fourscore. But how can this be, Sir John? for you know I am to pay this money into the hands of my Lord Ogleby; who, I believe, between you and me, Sir John, is not overstocked with ready money at present; and threescore thousand of it, you know, is to go to pay off the present encumbrances on the estate, Sir John.

Sir J. That objection is easily obviated.—Ten of the twenty thousand, which would remain as a surplus of the fourscore, after paying off the mortgage, was intended by his lordship for my use, that we might set off with some little eclat on our marriage; and the other ten for his own. Ten thousand pounds therefore I shall be able to pay you immediately; and for the remaining twenty thousand, you shall have a mortgage on that part of the estate which is to be made over to me, with whatever security you shall require for the regular payment of the interest, till the principal is duly discharged.

Ster. Why—to do you justice, Sir John, there is something fair and open in your proposal; and since I find you do not mean to put an affront upon the family—

Sir J. Nothing was ever further from my thoughts, Mr. Sterling. And, after all, the whole affair is nothing extraordinary—such things happen every day; and as the world has only heard generally of a treaty between the families, when this marriage takes place, nobody will be the wiser, if we have but discretion enough to keep our own counsel.

Ster. True, true; and since you only transfer from one girl to the other, it is no more than transferring so much stock, you know.

Sir J. The very thing!

Ster. Odsø! I had quite forgot.—We are reckoning without our host here—there is another difficulty—

Sir J. You alarm me. What can that be?

Ster. I can't stir a step in this business without consulting my sister Heidelberg.—The family has very great expectations from her, and we must not give her any offence.

Sir J. But if you come into this measure, surely she will be so kind as to consent—

Ster. I don't know that, Betsy is her darling, and I can't tell how far she may resent any slight that seems to be offered to her favourite niece. However, I'll do the best I can for you. You shall go and break the matter to her first, and by that time I may suppose that your rhetoric has prevailed on her to listen to reason, I will step in to reinforce your arguments.

Sir J. I'll fly to her immediately—you promise me your assistance?

Ster. I do.

Sir J. Ten thousand thanks for it! And now, success attend me!

[Going.]

Ster. Harkye, Sir John! [SIR JOHN returns.] Not a word of the thirty thousand to my sister, Sir John.

Sir J. O, I am dumb, I am dumb, Sir. [Going.]

Ster. You'll remember it is thirty thousand!

Sir J. To be sure I do.

Ster. But, Sir John! one thing more. [SIR JOHN returns.] My lord must know nothing of this stroke of friendship between us.

Sir J. Not for the world. Let me alone! let me alone!

[Offering to go.]

Ster. [Holding him.] And when every thing is agreed, we must give each other a bond to be held fast to the bargain.

Sir J. To be sure. A bond, by all means! a bond, or whatever you please. [Exit, hastily.]

Ster. I should have thought of more conditions—he's in a humour to give me every thing—Why, what mere children are your fellows of quality, that cry for a plaything one minute and throw it by the next!—as changeable as the weather, and as uncertain as the stocks.—Special fellows to drive a bargain! and yet they are to take care of the interest of the nation, truly! Here does this whirligig man of fashion offer to give up thirty thousand pounds in hard money, with as much indifference as if it was a china orange. By this mortgage I shall have a hold on his terra firma; and if he wants more money, as he certainly will, let him have children by my daughter or no, I shall have his whole estate in a net for the benefit of my family.—Well, thus it is; that the children of citizens who have acquired fortunes, prove persons of fashion; and thus it is, that persons of fashion who have ruined their fortunes, reduce the next generation to cits. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—Another Apartment.

Enter MRS. HEIDELBERG and MISS STERLING

Miss S. This is your gentle-looking, soft-speaking, sweet-smiling, affable, Miss Fanny, for you!

Mrs. H. My Miss Fanny! I disclaim her.—With all her arts, she never could insinuate herself into my good graces; and yet she has a way with her, that deceives man, woman, and child, except you and me, niece.

Miss S. O ay—she wants nothing but a crook in her hand, and a lamb under her arm, to be a perfect picture of innocence and simplicity.

Mrs. H. Just as I was drawn at Amsterdam, when I went over to visit my husband's relations.

Miss S. And then she's so mighty good to servants—"Pray, John, do this—pray, Thomas, do that—thank you, Jenny"—and then so humble to her relations—"To be sure, papa—as my aunt pleases—my sister knows best." But with all her demureness and humility, she has no objection to be Lady Melvil, it seems, nor to any wickedness that can make her so.

Mrs. H. She lady Melvil! compose yourself, niece! I'll ladyship her, indeed;—a little creppin, cantin—She sha'n't be the better for a farden of my money. But tell me, child, how does this intriguing with Sir John correspond with her partiality to Lovewell? I don't see a concatenation here.

Miss S. There I was deceived, Madam. I took all their whisperings and stealings into corners, to be the mere attraction of vulgar minds; but, behold! their private meetings were not to contrive their own insipid happiness, but to conspire against mine. But I know whence proceeds Mr. Lovewell's resentment to me. I could not stoop to be familiar with my father's clerk, and so I have lost his interest.

Mrs. H. My spurit to a T.—My dear child! [Kisses her.]—Mr. Heidelberg lost his election for member of parliament, because I would not demean myself to be slobbered about by drunken shoemakers, beastly cheese-mongers, and tallow-chandlers. However, niece, I can't help diffuring a little in opinion from you in this matter. My experunce and sagacity makes me still suspect that there is something more between her and that Lovewell, notwithstanding this affair of Sir John. I had my eye upon them the whole time of breakfast. Sir John, I observed, looked a little confounded indeed, though I knew nothing of what had passed in the garden. You seemed to sit upon thorns too; but Fanny and Mr. Lovewell made quite another-guess sort of a figur! and were as perfect a picture of two distrest lovers as if it had been drawn by Raphael Angelo. As to Sir John and Fanny, I want a matter of fact.

Miss S. Matter of fact, Madam! Did not I come unexpectedly upon them? Was not Sir John kneeling at her feet, and kissing her hand? Did not he look all love, and she all confusion? Is not that matter of fact? and did not Sir John, the moment that papa was called out of the room to the lawyer-men, get up from breakfast, and follow him immediately? And I warrant you that by this time he has made proposals to him to marry my sister—Oh, that some other person, an earl or a duke, would make his addresses to me, that I might be revenged on this monster!

Mrs. H. Be cool, child! you shall be Lady Melvil, in spite of all their caballins, if it costs me ten thousand pounds to turn the scale. Sir John may apply to my brother, indeed; but I'll make them all know who governs in this fammaly.

Miss S. As I live, Madam, yonder comes Sir John. A base man! I can't endure the sight of him. I'll leave the room this instant. [Disordered]

Mrs. H. Poor thing! Well, retire to your own chamber, child! I'll give it him, I warrant you; and by and by I'll come and let you know all that has past between us.

Miss S. Pray do, Madam.—[Looking back.]—A vile wretch! [Exit, in a rage.]

Enter SIR JOHN MELVIL.

Sir J. Your most obedient, humble servant, Madam. [Bowing very respectfully.]

Mrs. H. Your servant, Sir John.

[Dropping a half courtesy, and pouting.]

Sir J. Miss Sterling's manner of quitting the room on my approach, and the visible coolness of your behaviour to me, Madam, convince me that she has acquainted you with what passed this morning.

Mrs. H. I am very sorry, Sir John, to be made acquainted with any thing that should induce me to change the opinion which I would always wish to entertain of a person of quality. [Pouting.]

Sir J. It has always been my ambition to merit the best opinion from Mrs. Heidelberg; and when she comes to weigh circumstances, I flatter myself—

Mrs. H. You do flatter yourself, if you imagine that I can approve of your behaviour to my niece, Sir John.—And give me leave to tell you, Sir John, that you have been drawn into an action much beneath you, Sir John; and that I look upon every injury offered to Miss Betty Sterling, as an affront to myself, Sir John. [Warmly.]

Sir J. I would not offend you for the world, Madam; but when I am influenced by a partiality for another, however ill-founded, I hope your discernment and good sense will think it rather a point of honour to renounce engagements which I could not fulfil so strictly as I ought; and that you will excuse the change in my inclinations, since the new object, as well as the first, has the honour of being your niece, Madam.

Mrs. H. I disclaim her as a niece, Sir John; Miss Sterling disclaims her as a sister; and the whole fammaly must disclaim her, for her monstrous baseness and treachery.

Sir J. Indeed she has been guilty of none, Madam. Her hand and her heart are, I am sure, entirely at the disposal of yourself and Mr. Sterling. And if you should not oppose my inclinations, I am sure of Mr. Sterling's consent, Madam.

Mrs. H. Indeed?

Sir J. Quite certain, Madam.

Enter STERLING.

Ster. [Behind.] So! they seem to be coming to terms already. I may venture to make my appearance.

Mrs. H. To marry Fanny?

[STERLING advances.]

Sir J. Yes, Madam.

Mrs. H. My brother has given his consent, you say?

Sir J. In the most ample manner, with no other restriction than the failure of your concurrence, Madam. [Sees STERLING.]—Oh, here's Mr. Sterling, who will confirm what I have told you.

Mrs. H. What! have you consented to give up your eldest daughter in this manner, brother?

Ster. Give her up, Heaven forbid! no, not give her up, sister; only in the case that you—Zounds, I am afraid you have said too much, Sir John.

[Apart to SIR JOHN.]

Mrs. H. Yes, yes; I see now that it is true enough what my niece told me. You are all plottin and caballin against her. Pray, does Lord Ogleby know of this affair?

Sir J. I have not yet made him acquainted with it, Madam.

Mrs. H. No, I warrant you. I thought so. And so his lordship and myself, truly, are not to be consulted till the last.

Ster. What! did not you consult my lord? oh, fy for shame, Sir John!

Sir J. Nay, but Mr. Sterling—

Mrs. H. We, who are the persons of most consequence and experunce in the two fammalies, are to know nothing of the matter, till the whole is as good as concluded upon. But his lordship I am sure, will have more generosaty than to countenance such a perceding. And I could not have expected such behaviour from a person of your qualaty, Sir John. And as for you, brother—

Ster. Nay, nay, but hear me, sister.

Mrs. H. I am perfectly ashamed of you—Have you no spurrit? No more concern for the honour of our fammaly than to consent—

Ster. Consent! I consent! As I hope for mercy, I never gave my consent—Did I consent, Sir John?

Sir J. Not absolutely, without Mrs. Heidelberg's concurrence. But in case of her approbation—

Ster. Ay, in case I grant you, that is, if my sister approved—But that's quite another thing, you know— [To Mrs. HEIDELBERG.]

Mrs. H. Your sister approve, indeed!—I thought you knew her better, brother Sterling!—What! approve of having your eldest daughter returned upon your hands, and exchanged for the younger? I am surprisid how you could listen to such a scandalous proposal.

Ster. I tell you, I never did listen to it.—Did not I say, that I would be entirely governed by my sister, Sir John?—And unless she agreed to your marrying Fanny—

Mrs. H. I agree to his marrying Fanny!—abominable!—The man is absolutely out of his senses.—Can't that wise head of yours foresee the consequence of all this, brother Sterling? Will Sir John take Fanny without a fortune?—No!—After you have settled the largest part of your property on your youngest daughter, can there be an equal portion left for the eldest?—No!—Does not this overturn the whole system of the fammaly?—Yes, yes, yes!

Ster. Do you see now what you've done?—Don't betray me, Sir John. [Apart to SIR JOHN.]

Mrs. H. You know, I was always for my niece Betsy's marrying a person of the very first qualaty. That was by maxum:—and, therefore, much the largest settlement was of course to be made upon her. As for Fanny, if she could, with a fortune of twenty or thirty thousand pounds, get a knight, or a member of parliament, or a rich common council-man, for a husband, I thought it might do very well.

Sir J. But if a better match should offer itself, why should it not be accepted, Madam?

Mrs. H. What! at the expense of her elder sister?—O fy, Sir John!—How could you bear to hear such an indignaty, brother Sterling?

Ster. I! Nay, I sha'n't hear of it, I promise you.—I can't hear of it indeed, Sir John.

Mrs. H. But you have heard of it, brother Sterling—You know you have, and sent Sir John to propose it to me. But if you can give up your daughter, I sha'n't forsake my niece, I assure you.—Ah, if my poor dear Mr. Heidelberg and our sweet babes had been alive, he would not have behaved so.

Ster. Did I, Sir John?—Nay, speak!—Bring me off, or we are ruined. [Apart to SIR JOHN.]

Sir J. Why to be sure, to speak the truth—

Mrs. H. To speak the truth!—To speak the truth, I'm ashamed of you both.—But have a care what you are about, brother! have a care, I say. The counsellors are in the house, I hear; and if every thing is not settled to my liking, I'll have nothing more to say to you, if I live these hundred years—I'll go over to Holland, and settle with Mr. Vanderspracken, my poor husband's first cousin, and my own fammaly shall never be the better for a farden of my money, I promise you. [Exit.]

Ster. I thought so. I knew she would never agree to it.

Sir J. 'Sdeath, how unfortunate! What can we do, Mr. Sterling?

Ster. Nothing.

Sir J. What, must our agreement break off the moment it is made, then?

Ster. It can't be helped, Sir John.—The family, as I told you before, have great expectations from my sister; and if this matter proceeds, you hear yourself that she threatens to leave us.—My brother Heidelberg was a warn man—a very warn man, and died worth a plum at least:—a plum! ay, I warrant you, he died worth a plum and a half.

Sir J. Well; but if I—

Ster. And then, my sister has three or four very good mortgages, a deal of money in the three per cents, and old South Sea annuities, besides large concerns in the Dutch and French funds. The greatest part of all this she means to leave to our family.

Sir J. I can only say, Sir—

Ster. Why, your offer of the difference of thirty thousand was very fair and handsome, to be sure, Sir John.

Sir J. Nay, but I am willing to—

Ster. Ay, but if I was to accept it against her will, I might lose above a hundred thousand; so you see the balance is against you, Sir John.

Sir J. Suppose I was to prevail on Lord Ogleby to apply to her, do you think that would have any influence over her?

Ster. I think he would be more likely to persuade her to it than any other person in the family. She has a great respect for Lord Ogleby. She loves a lord.

Sir J. I'll apply to him this very day.—And if he should prevail on Mrs. Heidelberg, I may depend on your friendship, Mr. Sterling?

Ster. Ay, ay, I shall be glad to oblige you, when it is in my power, but as the account stands now, you see it is not upon the figures. And so your servant, Sir John? [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Room.

Enter MR. STERLING, MRS. HEIDELBERG, and MISS STERLING.

Ster. What! will you send Fanny to town sister?

Mrs. H. To-morrow morning. I've given orders about it already.

Ster. Indeed!

Mrs. H. Positively.

Ster. But consider, sister, at such a time as this, what an odd appearance it will have.

Mrs. H. Not half so odd as her behaviour, brother.—This time was intended for happiness, and I'll keep no incendiaries here to destroy it. I insist on her going off to-morrow morning.

Ster. I'm afraid this is all your doing, Betsy?

Miss S. No indeed, papa. My aunt knows that it is not.—For all Fanny's baseness to me, I am sure I would not do or say any thing to hurt her with you or my aunt, for the world.

Mrs. H. Hold your tongue, Betsy; I will have my way. When she is packed off, every thing will go on as it should do. Since they are at their intrigues, I'll let them see that we can act with vigour on our part; and the sending her out of the way, shall be the perliminary step to all the rest of my proceedings.

Ster. Well, but, sister—

Mrs. H. It does not signify talking, brother Sterling, for I'm resolved to be rid of her, and I will.—Come along, child. [To MISS STERLING.] The post-shay shall be at the door by six o'clock in the morning; and if Miss Fanny does not get into it, why I will—and so there's an end of the matter. [Bounces out with MISS STERLING, then returns.] One word more, brother Sterling—I expect that you will take your eldest daughter in your hand, and make a formal complaint to Lord Ogleby of Sir John Melvil's behaviour.—Do this, brother; show a proper regard for the honour of your famlly yourself, and I shall throw in my mite to the raising of it. If not—but now you know my mind. So act as you please, and take the consequences. [Exit.]

Ster. The devil's in the women for tyranny!—Mothers, wives, mistresses, or sisters, they always will govern us. As to my sister Heidelberg, she knows the strength of her purse, and domineers upon the credit of it.—“I will do this,” and “you shall do that,” and “you shall do t'other—or else the famlly sha'n't have a farden of” [Mimicking.] So absolute with her money!—But, to say the truth, nothing but money can make us absolute, and so we must e'en make the best of her. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—The Garden.

Enter LORD OGLEBY and CANTON.

Lord O. What! Mademoiselle Fanny to be sent away?—Why?—Wherefore?—What's the meaning of all this?

Can. Je ne sçais pas—I know nothing of it.

Lord O. It can't be—it sha'n't be: I protest against the measure. She's a fine girl, and I had much rather that the rest of the family were annihilated, than that she should leave us.—Her vulgar father, that's the very abstract of “Change-alley—the aunt, that's always endeavouring to be a fine lady—and the pert sister, for ever showing that she is one, are horrid company indeed, and without her would be intolerable. Ah la petite Fan-chon! she's the thing; isn't she, Canton?

Can. Dere is very good sympatie entre vous and dat young lady, mi lor.

Lord O. I'll not be left among these Goths and Vandals; your Sterlings, your Heidelbergs, and Devilbergs—if she goes, I'll positively go too.

Can. In de same post-chay, mi lor? You have no objection to dat, I believe, nor Mademoiselle neither too—ha, ha, ha!

VOL. I. . . . 5 B

Lord O. Pr'ythee hold thy foolish tongue, Cant. Does thy Swiss stupidity imagine, that I can see and talk with a fine girl without desires?—My eyes are involuntarily attracted by beautiful objects—I fly as naturally to a fine girl.—

Can. As de fine girl to you, mi lor, ha, ha, ha! you always fly togeder like un pair de pigeons—

Lord O. Like un pair de pigeons—[Mocks him.] Vous etes un sot, Monsieur Canton.—Thou art always dreaming of my intrigues, and never see'st me badiner, but you suspect mischief, you old fool you.

Can. I am fool, I confess, but not always fool in dat, mi lor, he, he, he!

Lord O. He, he, he!—Thou art incorrigible, but thy absurdities amuse one. Thou art like my rappee here, [Takes out his box.] a most ridiculous superfluity; but a pinch of thee now and then is a more delicious treat.

Can. You do me great honneur, mi lor.
Lord O. 'Tis fact, upon my soul. Thou art properly my cephalic snuff, and art no bad medicine against megrims, vertigoes, and profound thinking—ha, ha, ha!

Can. Your flatterie, mi lor, vil make me too prode.

Lord O. The girl has some little partiality for me, to be sure: but pr'ythee, Cant. is not that Miss Fanny yonder?

Can. [Looks with a glass.] Ah!—la voilà! En verite, 'tis she, mi lor—'tis one of de pigeons—de pigeons d'amour.

Lord O. Don't be ridiculous, you old monkey. [Smiles.]

Can. I am monkee, I am ole; but I have eye, I have ear, and a little understand, now and den.
Lord O. Taisez-vous, bete!

Can. Elle vous attend, mi lor. She vil make a love to you.

Lord O. Will she? Have at her then! A fine girl can't oblige me more—Egad, I find myself a little enjoue—Come along, Cant. she is but in the next walk—but there is such a deal of this damned crinkum-crankum, as Sterling calls it, that one sees people for half an hour before one can get to them—Allons, Monsieur Canton, allons, donc! [Exeunt, singing.]

SCENE III.—Another part of the Garden.

Enter LOVEWELL and FANNY.

Love. My dear Fanny, I cannot bear your distress; it overcomes all my resolutions, and I am prepared for the discovery.

Fan. But how can it be effected before my departure?

Love. I'll tell you.—Lord Ogleby seems to entertain a visible partiality for you; and notwithstanding the peculiarities of his behaviour, I am sure that he is humane at the bottom. He is vain to an excess; but withal extremely good-natured, and would do any thing to recommend himself to a lady.—Do you open the whole affair of our marriage to him immediately. It will come with more irresistible persuasion from you than from myself; and I doubt not but you'll gain his friendship and protection at once. His influence and authority will put an end to Sir John's solicitations, remove your aunt's and sister's unkindness and suspicions, and, I hope, reconcile your father and the whole family to our marriage.

Fan. Heaven grant it! Where is my lord?

Love. I have heard him and Canton, since dinner, singing French songs under the great walnut-tree by the parlour door. If you meet with him in the garden, you may disclose the whole immediately. To-morrow morning is fixed for your departure, and if we lose this opportunity, we may wish in vain for another.—He approaches—I must retire.—Speak, my dear Fanny, speak, and make us happy! [Exit.]

Fan. What shall I do? What shall I say to him? I am all confusion.

Enter LORD OGLEBY and CANTON.

Lord O. To see so much beauty so solitary, Madam, is a satire upon mankind, and 'tis fortunate that one man has broke in upon your reverie, for the credit of our sex. I say one, Madam; for poor Canton here, from age and infirmities, stands for nothing.

Can. Noting at all, indeed.

Fan. Your lordship does me great honour.—I had a favour to request, my lord!

Lord O. A favour, Madam?—To be honoured with your commands is an inexpressible favour done to me, Madam.

Fan. If your lordship could indulge me with the honour of a moment's—What's the matter with me?

Lord O. The girl's confused—Hey!—here's something in the wind, faith—I'll have a tete-a-tete with her. [Aside.—Allez-vous en!]

[To CANTON.]

Can. I go—Ah, pauvre Mademoiselle! My lor, have pitié upon the poor pigeone!

[Apart to LORD O.]

Lord O. I'll knock you down, Cant. [Smiles.]

Can. Den I go—[Shuffles along.—You are mosh please, for all dat. [Aside. Exit.]

Fan. I shall sink with apprehension. [Aside.]

Lord O. What a sweet girl!—she's a civilized being, and atones for the barbarism of the rest of the family. [Aside.]

Fan. My lord! I—[Courtesies and blushes.]

Lord O. I look upon it, Madam, to be one of the luckiest circumstances of my life, that I have at this moment the honour of receiving your commands, and the satisfaction of confirming with my tongue what my eyes perhaps have but too weakly expressed—that I am literally the humblest of your servants.

Fan. I think myself greatly honoured by your lordship's partiality to me; but it distresses me that I am obliged, in my present situation, to apply to it for protection.

Lord O. I am happy in your distress, Madam, because it gives me an opportunity to show my zeal.—Beauty to me is a religion in which I was born and bred a bigot, and would die a martyr.—I'm in tolerable spirits, faith! [Aside.]

Fan. There is not, perhaps, at this moment, a more distressed creature than myself. Affection, duty, hope, despair, and a thousand different sentiments, are struggling in my bosom; and even the presence of your lordship, to whom I have flown for protection, adds to my perplexity.

Lord O. Does it, Madam?—Venus forbid!—My old fault; the devil's in me, I think, for perplexing young women. [Aside, and smiling.]

Take courage, Madam! dear Miss Fanny, explain.—You have a powerful advocate in my breast, I assure you—my heart, Madam:—I am attached to you by all the laws of sympathy and delicacy.—By my honour, I am.

Fan. Then I will venture to unburden my mind—Sir John Melvil, my lord, by the most misplaced and mistimed declaration of affection for me, has made me the unhappiest of women.

Lord O. How, Madam? Has Sir John made his addresses to you?

Fan. He has, my lord, in the strongest terms. But I hope it is needless to say that my duty to my father, love to my sister, and regard to the whole family, as well as the great respect I entertain for your lordship, [Courtesies.] made me shudder at his addresses.

Lord O. Charming girl!—Proceed, my dear Miss Fanny, proceed!

Fan. In a moment—give me leave, my lord!—But if what I have to disclose should be received with anger or displeasure—

Lord O. Impossible, by all the tender powers!—Speak, I beseech you, or I shall divine the cause before you utter it.

Fan. Then, my lord, Sir John's addresses are not only shocking to me in themselves, but are more particularly disagreeable to me at this time—as—as— [Hesitates.]

Lord O. As what, Madam?

Fan. As—pardon my confusion—I am entirely devoted to another.

Lord O. If this is not plain, the devil's in it. [Aside.] But tell me, my dear Miss Fanny, for I must know; tell me the how, the when, and the where—Tell me—

Re-enter CANTON, hastily.

Can. My lor, my lor, my lor!

Lord O. Damn your Swiss impertinence! how durst you interrupt me in the most critical, melting moment that ever love and beauty honoured me with?

Can. I demande pardonne, my lor! Sir John Melvil, my lor, sent me to beg you do him de honneur to speak a little to you, my lor.

Lord O. I'm not at leisure—I am busy—Get away, you stupid old dog, you Swiss rascal, or I'll—

Can. Fort bien, my lor. [Goes out on tiptoe.]

Lord O. By the laws of gallantry, Madam, this interruption should be death; but as no punishment ought to disturb the triumph of the softer passions, the criminal is pardoned and dismissed. Let us return, Madam, to the highest luxury of exalted minds—a declaration of love from the lips of beauty.

Fan. The entrance of a third person has a little relieved me, but I cannot go through with it; and yet I must open my heart with a discovery, or it will break with its burden. [Aside.]

Lord O. What passion in her eyes! I am alarmed to agitation. [Aside.] I presume, Madam, (and as you have flattered me, by making me a party concerned, I hope you'll excuse the presumption,) that—

Fan. Do you excuse my making you a party concerned, my lord, and let me interest your heart in my behalf, as my future happiness or misery in a great measure depend—

Lord O. Upon me, Madam?

Fan. Upon you, my lord. [Sighs.]

Lord O. There's no standing this: I have caught the infection—her tenderness dissolves me. [Sighs.]

Fan. And should you too severely judge of a rash action, which passion prompted, and modesty has long concealed—

Lord O. [Takes her hand.] Thou amiable creature, command my heart, for it is vanquished. Speak but thy virtuous wishes, and enjoy them.

Fan. I cannot, my lord; indeed, I cannot. Mr. Lovewell must tell you my distresses; and when you know them, pity and protect me. [Exit in tears.]

Lord O. How the devil could I bring her to this? It is too much—too much—I can't bear it—I must give way to this amiable weakness. [Wipes his eyes.] My heart overflows with sympathy, and I feel every tenderness I have inspired. [Stifles a tear.] Can I be a man and withstand it? No—I'll sacrifice the whole sex to her. But here comes the father, quite a-propos. I'll open the matter immediately, settle the business with him, and take the sweet girl down to Ogleby-house to-morrow morning. But what the devil! Miss Sterling too! What mischief's in the wind now! No conquest there—no, no, that would be too much desolation to the family.

Enter STERLING and MISS STERLING.

Ster. My lord, your servant! I am attending my daughter here upon rather a disagreeable affair. Speak to his lordship, Betsy.

Lord O. Your eyes, Miss Sterling, for I always read the eyes of a young lady, betray some little emotion. What are your commands, Madam?

Miss S. I have but too much cause for my emotion, my lord!

Lord O. I cannot commend my kinsman's behaviour, Madam. He has behaved like a false knight, I must confess. I have heard of his apostacy. Miss Fanny has informed me of it.

Miss S. Miss Fanny's baseness has been the cause of Sir John's inconstancy.

Lord O. Nay now, my dear Miss Sterling, your passion transports you too far. Sir John may have entertained a passion for Miss Fanny, but believe me, my dear Miss Sterling, believe me, Miss Fanny has no passion for Sir John. She has a passion, indeed, a most tender passion. She has opened her whole soul to me, and I know where her affections are placed. [Conceitedly.]

Miss S. Not upon Mr. Lovewell, my lord.

Lord O. Lovewell! no, poor lad! she does not think of him. [Smiles.] I know better: however, a little time will solve all mysteries.

Miss S. Have a care, my lord, that both the families are not made the dupes of Sir John's artifice, and my sister's dissimulation! You don't know her; indeed, my lord, you don't know her; a base, insinuating, perfidious!—It is too much—She has been beforehand with me, I perceive, endeavouring to prejudice your lordship in her favour; and I am to be laughed at by every body. Such unnatural behaviour to me! But since I see I can have no redress, I am resolved that some way or other I will have revenge. [Exit.]

Ster. This is foolish work, my lord!

Lord O. I have too much sensibility to bear the tears of beauty.

Ster. It is touching, indeed, my lord; and very moving for a father.

Lord O. To be sure, Sir! You, with your exquisite feelings, must be distressed beyond measure! Wherefore, to divert your too exquisite feeling, suppose we change the subject, and proceed to business.

Ster. With all my heart, my lord.

Lord O. You see, Mr. Sterling, we can make no union in our families by the proposed marriage.

Ster. And I am very sorry to see it, my lord.

Lord O. Have you set your heart upon being allied to our house, Mr. Sterling?

Ster. 'Tis my only wish at present, my omnium, as I may call it.

Lord O. Your wishes shall be fulfilled.

Ster. Shall they, my lord? but how—how?

Lord O. I'll marry in your family.

Ster. What! my sister Heidelberg?

Lord O. You throw me into a cold sweat, Mr. Sterling. No, not your sister, but your daughter.

Ster. My daughter?

Lord O. Fanny!—now the murder's out!

Ster. What you, my lord!

Lord O. Yes, I, I, Mr. Sterling.

Ster. No, no, my Lord; that's too much.

Lord O. Too much! I don't comprehend you. [Smiles.]

Ster. What you, my lord, marry my Fanny? Bless me! what will the folks say?

Lord O. Why, what will they say?

Ster. That you are a bold man, my lord; that's all.

Lord O. Mr. Sterling, this may be city wit, for aught I know. Do you court my alliance?

Ster. To be sure, my lord.

Lord O. Then I'll explain—My nephew wont marry your eldest daughter, nor I neither.—Your youngest daughter wont marry him; I will marry your youngest daughter.

Ster. What! with a youngest daughter's fortune, my lord?

Lord O. With any fortune, or no fortune at all, Sir. Love is the idol of my heart, and the demon interest sinks before him. So, Sir, as I said before, I will marry your youngest daughter; your youngest daughter will marry me.

Ster. Who told you so, my lord?

Lord O. Her own sweet self, Sir

Ster. Indeed!

Lord O. Yes, Sir; our affection is mutual; your advantage double and treble; your daughter will be a countess directly—I shall be the happiest of beings, and you'll be a father to an earl instead of a baronet.

Ster. But what will my sister say? and my daughter?

Lord O. I'll manage that matter; nay, if they wont consent, I'll run away with your daughter in spite of you.

Ster. Well said, my lord! your spirit's good; I wish you had my constitution; but if you'll venture, I have no objection, if my sister has none.

Lord O. I'll answer for your sister, Sir.—A-propos, the lawyers are in the house. I'll have articles drawn, and the whole affair concluded to-morrow morning.

Ster. Very well! and I'll despatch Lovewell to London immediately for some fresh papers I shall want; you must excuse me, my lord, but I can't help laughing at the match.—He, he, he! what will the folks say? [Exit.]

Lord O. What a fellow am I going to make a father of! He has no more feeling than the post in his warehouse.—But Fanny's virtues tune me to rapture again, and I won't think of the rest of the family.

Re-enter LOVEWELL, hastily.

Love. I beg your lordship's pardon; are you alone, my lord?

Lord O. No, my lord, I am not alone; I am in company, the best company.

Love. My lord!

Lord O. I never was in such exquisite, enchanting company since my heart first conceived, or my senses tasted, pleasure.

Love. Where are they, my lord?—

[Looks about.]

Lord O. In my mind's eye, Horatio.

Love. What company have you there, my lord?

[Smiles.]

Lord O. My own ideas, Sir, which so crowd upon my imagination, and kindle in it such a delirium of ecstasy, that wit, wine, music, poetry, all combined, and each in perfection, are but mere mortal shadows of my felicity.

Love. I see that your lordship is happy, and I rejoice at it.

Lord O. You shall rejoice at it, Sir; my felicity shall not selfishly be confined, but shall spread its influence to the whole circle of my friends. I need not say, Lovewell, that you shall have your share of it.

Love. Shall I, my lord?—then I understand you; you have heard. Miss Fanny has informed you—

Lord O. She has; I have heard, and she shall be happy; 'tis determined.

Love. Then I have reached the summit of my wishes. And will your lordship pardon the folly?

Lord O. O yes, poor creature, how could she help it? 'Twas unavoidable—fate and necessity.

Love. It was indeed, my lord. Your kindness distracts me.

Lord O. And so it did the poor girl, faith.

Love. She trembled to disclose the secret, and declare her affections.

Lord O. The world, I believe, will not think her affections ill placed.

Love. [Bows.] You are too good, my lord.—And do you really excuse the rashness of the action?

Lord O. From my very soul, Lovewell.

Love. [Bows.] I was afraid of her meeting with a cold reception.

Lord O. More fool you then—

Who pleads her cause with never failing beauty, Here finds a full redress. [Strikes his breast.]
She's a fine girl, Lovewell.

Love. Her beauty, my lord, is her least merit. She has an understanding—

Lord O. Her choice convinces me of that.

Love. [Bows.] That's your lordship's goodness. Her choice was a disinterested one.

Lord O. No, no, not altogether; it began with interest, and ended in passion.

Love. Indeed, my lord, if you were acquainted with her goodness of heart, and generosity of mind, as well as you are with the inferior beauties of her face and person—

Lord O. I am so perfectly convinced of their existence, and so totally of your mind, touching every amiable particular of that sweet girl, that were it not for the cold, unfeeling impediments of the law, I would marry her to-morrow morning.

Love. My lord!

Lord O. I would, by all that's honourable in man, and amiable in woman.

Love. Marry her!—Who do you mean my lord?

Lord O. Miss Fanny Sterling that is; the countess of Ogleby that shall be.

Love. I am astonished!

Lord O. Why, could you expect less from me?

Love. I did not expect this, my lord.

Lord O. Trade and accounts have destroyed your feeling.

Love. No indeed, my lord. [Sighs.]

Lord O. The moment that love and pity entered my breast, I was resolved to plunge into matrimony, and shorten the girl's tortures—I never do any thing by halves, do I, Lovewell?

Love. No indeed, my lord. [Sighs.] What an accident!

[Aside.]

Lord O. What's the matter, Lovewell? thou seem'st to have lost thy faculties. Why don't you wish me joy, man?

Love. O, I do, my lord. [Sighs.]

Lord O. She said that you would explain what she had not power to utter; but I wanted no interpreter for the language of love.

Love. But has your lordship considered the consequences of your resolution?

Lord O. No, Sir, I am above consideration, when my desires are kindled.

Love. But consider the consequences, my lord, to your nephew, Sir John.

Lord O. Sir John has considered no consequences himself, Mr. Lovewell.

Love. Mr. Sterling, my lord, will certainly refuse his daughter to Sir John.

Lord O. Sir John has already refused Mr. Sterling's daughter.

Love. But what will become of Miss Sterling, my lord?

Lord O. What's that to you? You may have her, if you will. I depend upon Mr. Sterling's city philosophy to be reconciled to Lord Ogleby's being his son-in-law, instead of Sir John Melvil, baronet. Don't you think that your master may be brought to that, without having recourse to his calculations, eh, Lovewell?

Love. But, my lord, that is not the question.

Lord O. Whatever is the question, I'll tell you my answer. I am in love with a fine girl, whom I resolve to marry.

Enter SIR JOHN MELVIL.

What news with you, Sir John? You look all hurry and impatience—like a messenger after a battle.

Sir J. After a battle indeed, my lord. I have this day had a severe engagement; and wanting your lordship as an auxiliary, I have at last mustered up resolution to declare what my duty to you and to myself have demanded from me some time.

Lord O. To the business then, and be as concise as possible, for I am upon the wing—eh, Lovewell! [Smiles, and LOVEWELL bows.]

Sir J. I find 'tis in vain my lord, to struggle against the force of inclination.

Lord O. Very true, nephew; I am your witness, and will second the motion—shant I, Lovewell? [Smiles, and LOVEWELL bows.]

Sir J. Your lordship's generosity encourages me to tell you that I cannot marry Miss Sterling.

Lord O. I am not at all surprised at it—she's a bitter potion, that's the truth of it; but as you were to swallow it, and not I, it was your business, and not mine. Any thing more?

Sir J. But this, my lord; that I may be permitted to make my addresses to the other sister.

Lord O. O yes, by all means—have you any hopes there, nephew? Do you think he'll succeed, Lovewell? [Smiles and winks at LOVEWELL.]

Love. I think not, my lord. [Gravely.]

Lord O. I think so too; but let the fool try.

Sir J. Will your lordship favour me with your good offices to remove the chief obstacle to the match, the repugnance of Mrs. Heidelberg?

Lord O. Mrs. Heidelberg? Had not you better begin with the young lady first? It will save you a great deal of trouble, wont it, Lovewell? [Smiles.] But do what you please, it will be the same thing to me: wont it, Lovewell? [Conceitedly.] Why don't you laugh at him?

Love. I do, my lord. [Forces a smile.]

Sir J. And your lordship will endeavour to prevail on Mrs. Heidelberg to consent to my marriage with Miss Fanny?

Lord O. I'll speak to Mrs. Heidelberg about the adorable Fanny as soon as possible.

Sir J. Your generosity transports me.

Lord O. Poor fellow, what a dupe! he little thinks who's in possession of the town. [Aside.]

Sir J. And your lordship is not in the least offended at this seeming inconstancy?

Lord O. Not in the least. Miss Fanny's charms will even excuse infidelity. I look upon women as the feræ naturæ—Lawful game—and every man who is qualified, has a natural right to pursue them;—Lovewell as well as you, and you as well as he, and I as well as either of you. Every man shall do his best, without offence to any—what say you; kinsmen?

Sir J. You have made me happy, my lord.

Love. And me, I assure you, my lord.

Lord O. And I am superlatively so—allons donc! To horse and away, boys! to your affairs, and I to mine—suiuons l'amour. [Sings.]
[Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—FANNY'S Apartment.

Enter LOVEWELL and FANNY, followed by BETTY.

Fan. Why did you come so soon, Mr. Lovewell? the family is not yet in bed, and Betty certainly heard somebody listening near the chamber-door.

Bet. My mistress is right, Sir! evil spirits are abroad; and I am sure you are both too good, not to expect mischief from them.

Love. But who can be so curious, or so wicked?

Bet. I think we have wickedness and curiosity enough in this family, Sir, to expect the worse.

Fan. I do expect the worst. Pr'ythee, Betty, return to the outward door, and listen if you hear any body in the gallery; and let us know directly.

Bet. I warrant you, Madam—the Lord bless you both. [Exit.]

Fan. What did my father want with you this evening?

Love. He gave me the key of his closet, with orders to bring from London some papers relating to Lord Ogleby.

Fan. And why did you not obey him?

Love. Because I am certain that his lordship has opened his heart to him about you, and those papers are wanted merely on that account—But as we shall discover all to-morrow, there will be no occasion for them, and it would be idle in me to go.

Fan. Hark!—hark! bless me, how I tremble!—I feel the terrors of guilt. Indeed, Mr. Lovewell, this is too much for me—this situation may have very unhappy consequences. [Weeps.]

Love. But it sha'n't. I would rather tell our story this moment to all the house, and run the risk of maintaining you by the hardest labour, than suffer you to remain in this dangerous perplexity. What! shall I sacrifice all my best hopes and affections, in your dear health and safety, for the mean (and in such case the meanest) consideration—of our fortune? Were we to be abandoned by all our relations, we have that in our hearts and minds will weigh against the most affluent circumstances. I should not have proposed the secrecy of our marriage, but for your sake; and with hopes that the most generous sacrifice you have made to love and me, might be less injurious to you, by waiting a lucky moment of reconciliation.

Fan. Hush! hush! for Heaven's sake, my dear Lovewell; don't be so warm! your generosity gets the better of your prudence; you will be heard, and we shall be discovered. I am satisfied—indeed I am. Excuse this weakness, this delicacy, this what you will. My mind 's at peace—indeed, it is—think no more of it, if you love me!

Love. That one word has charmed me, as it always does, to the most implicit obedience: it would be the worst of ingratitude in me to distress you a moment. [Kisses her.]

Re-enter BETTY.

Bet. [In a low voice.] I'm sorry to disturb you.

Fan. Ha! what's the matter?

Love. Have you heard any body?

Bet. Yes, yes, I have; and they have heard you too, or I'm mistaken—if they had seen you too, we should have been in a fine quandary.

Fan. Pr'ythee, don't prate now, Betty!

Love. What did you hear?

Bet. I was preparing myself, as usual, to take me a little nap—

Love. A nap!

Bet. Yes, Sir, a nap; for I watch much better so than wide awake; and when I had wrapped this handkerchief round my head, for fear of the ear-ache from the key-hole, I thought I heard a kind of a sort of a buzzing, which I first took for a gnat, and shook my head two or three times, and went so with my hand.

Fan. Well—well—and so—

Bet. And so, Madam, when I heard Mr. Lovewell a little loud, I heard the buzzing louder too—and pulling off my handkerchief softly, I could hear this sort of noise.

[Makes an indistinct sort of noise, like speaking.]

Fan. Well, and what did they say?

Bet. O! I could not understand a word of what was said.

Love. The outward door is locked?

Bet. Yes: and I bolted it too, for fear of the worst.

Fan. Why did you? they must have heard you, if they were near.

Bet. And I did it on purpose, Madam, and coughed a little too, that they might not hear Mr. Lovewell's voice—when I was silent, they were silent, and so I came to tell you.

Fan. What shall we do?

Love. Fear nothing; we know the worst; it will only bring on our catastrophe a little too soon but Betty might fancy this noise—she's m the conspiracy, and can make a man a mouse at any time.

Bet. I can distinguish a man from a mouse as well as my betters—I'm sorry you think so ill of me, Sir.

Fan. He compliments you, don't be a fool! Now you have set her tongue a running, she'll mutter for an hour. [To LOVEWELL.] I'll go and hearken myself. [Exit.]

Bet. I'll turn my back upon no girl for sincerity and service. [Half aside, muttering.]

Love. Thou art the first in the world for both; and I will reward you soon, Betty, for one and the other.

Bet. I am not mercenary neither—I can live on a little, with a good carreter.

Re-enter FANNY.

Fan. All seems quiet. Suppose, my dear, you go to your own room—I shall be much easier then—and to-morrow we will be prepared for the discovery.

Bet. You may discover, if you please; but for my part, I shall still be secret.

[Half aside, and muttering.]

Love. Should I leave you now, if they still are upon the watch, we shall lose the advantage of our delay. Besides, we should consult upon to-morrow's business. Let Betty go to her own room, and lock the outward door after her; we can fasten this; and when she thinks all safe, she may return and let me out as usual.

Bet. Shall I, Madam?

Fan. Do let me have my way to-night, and you shall command me ever after.

Love. I live only to oblige you, my sweet Fanny! I'll be gone this moment. [Going.]

Fan. Betty shall go first, and if they lay hold of her—

Bet. They'll have the wrong sow by the ear, I can tell them that. [Going hastily.]

Fan. Softly—softly—Betty! don't venture out, if you hear a noise. Softly, I beg of you! See, Mr. Lovewell, the effects of indiscretion!

Love. But love, Fanny, makes amends for all.

[Exeunt softly.]

SCENE II.—A Gallery leading to several Bed-chambers.

Enter MISS STERLING, leading MRS. HEIDELBERG, in a night-cap.

Miss S. This way, dear Madam, and then I'll tell you all.

Mrs. H. Nay, but niece—consider a little—don't drag me out this figure; let me put on my fly-cap!—If any of my lord's fammaly, or the counsellors at law should be stirring, I should be prodigiously disconcerted.

Miss S. But, my dear Madam, a moment is an age, in my situation. I am sure my sister has been plotting my disgrace and ruin in that chamber!—O! she's all craft and wickedness.

Mrs. H. Well, but softly, Betty!—you are all in emotion—your mind is too much frustrated—you can neither eat, nor drink, nor take your natural rest—compose yourself, child; for if we are not as warisome as they are wicked, we shall disgrace ourselves and the whole fammaly.

Miss S. We are disgraced already, Madam. Sir John Melvil has forsaken me; my lord cares for nobody but himself; or if any body, it is my sister: my father, for the sake of a better bargain, would marry me to a 'Change broker; so that, if you, Madam, don't continue my friend—if you forsake me—if I am to lose my best hopes and consolation—in your tenderness—and affections—I had better—at once—give up the matter—and let my sister enjoy—the fruits of her treachery—trample, with scorn, upon the rights of her elder sister—the will of the best of aunts—and the weakness of a too interested father.

[Pretends to be bursting in tears.]

Mrs. H. Don't Betsy—keep your spirit—I hate whimpering—I am your friend—depend upon me in every particular. But be composed, and tell me what new mischief you have discovered.

Miss S. I had no desire to sleep, and would not undress myself, knowing that my Machiavel sister would not rest till she had broke my heart:—I was so uneasy that I could not stay in my room, but when I thought that all the house was quiet, I sent my maid to discover what was going forward; she immediately came back and told me, that they were in high consultation; that she had heard only, for it was in the dark, my sister's maid conducting Sir John Melvil to her mistress, and then lock the door.

Mrs. H. And how did you conduct yourself in this dilemma?

Miss S. I returned with her, and could hear a man's voice, though nothing that they said distinctly; and you may depend upon it, that Sir John is now in that room, that they have settled the matter, and will run away together before the morning, if we don't prevent them.

Mrs. H. Why, the brazen slut! she has got her sister's husband (that is to be) locked up in her chamber! at night too!—I tremble at the thoughts!

Miss S. Hush, Madam! I hear something?

Mrs. H. You frighten me—let me put on my fly-cap—I would not be seen in this figur for the world.

Miss S. 'Tis dark, Madam; you can't be seen.

Mrs. H. I protest there's a candle coming, and a man too!

Miss S. Nothing but servants; let us retire a moment! [They retire.]

Enter BRUSH, half drunk, laying hold of the CHAMBERMAID, who has a candle in her hand.

Cham. Be quiet, Mr. Brush; I shall drop down with terror!

Brush. But my sweet and most amiable chambermaid, if you have no love, you may hearken to a little reason; that cannot possibly do your virtue any harm.

Cham. But you may do me harm, Mr. Brush, and a great deal of harm too; pray let me go: I am ruined if they hear you; I tremble like an asp.

Brush. But they sha'n't hear us; and if you have a mind to be ruined, it shall be the making of your fortune, you little slut, you! therefore, I say it again, if you have no love, hear a little reason!

Cham. I wonder at your impudence, Mr. Brush, to use me in this manner; this is not the way to keep me company, I assure you. You are a town-rake, I see; and now you are a little in liquor, you fear nothing.

Brush. Nothing, by Heavens! but your frowns, most amiable chambermaid; I am a little electrified, that's the truth on't; I am not used to drink port, and your master's is so heady, that a pint of it oversets a claret drinker. Come now, my dear little spider-brusher!

Cham. Don't be rude! bless me! I shall be ruined—what will become of me?

Brush. I'll take care of you, by all that's honourable.

Cham. You are a base man to use me so—I'll cry out, if you don't let me go. This is Miss Sterling's chamber, that Miss Fanny's, and that Madam Heidelberg's.

Brush. We know all that. And that Lord Ogleby's, and that my lady What-d'ye-call-em's: I don't mind such folks when I'm sober, much less when I am whimsical—rather above that, too.

Cham. More shame for you, Mr. Brush! you terrify me—you have no modesty.

Brush. O, but I have, my sweet spider-brusher—for instance, I reverence Miss Fanny—she's a most delicious morsel, and fit for a prince. With all my horrors of matrimony, I could marry her myself—but for her sister—

Miss S. [Within.] There, there, Madam, all in a story!

Cham. Bless me, Mr. Brush! I heard something!

Brush. Rats, I suppose, that are gnawing the old timbers of this execrable old dungeon—if it was mine, I would pull it down, and fill your fine canal up with the rubbish; and then I should get rid of two damn'd things at once.

Cham. Law! law! how you blaspheme! we shall have the house upon our heads for it.

Brush. No, no, it will last our time; but, as I was saying, the eldest sister—Miss Jezebel—

Cham. Is a fine young lady, for all your evil tongue.

Brush. No—we have smoked her already; and unless she marries our old Swiss, she can have none of us. No, no, she won't do—we are a little too nice.

Cham. You're a monstrous rake, Mr. Brush, and don't care what you say.

Brush. Why, for that matter, my dear, I am a little inclined to mischief; and if you don't have pity upon me, I will break open that door, and ravish Mrs. Heidelberg.

Mrs. H. [Coming forward.] There's no bearing this—you profligate monster!

Cham. Ha! I am undone!

Brush. Zounds! here she is, by all that's monstrous. [Runs off.]

Miss S. A fine discourse you have had with that fellow.

Mrs. H. And a fine time of night it is to be here with that drunken monster.

Miss S. What have you to say for yourself?

Cham. I can say nothing—I'm so frightened, and so ashamed. But indeed I am virtuous—I am virtuous, indeed.

Mrs. H. Well, well—don't tremble so; but tell us what you know of this horrible plot here.

Miss S. We'll forgive you, if you'll discover all.

Cham. Why, Madam, don't let me betray my fellow-servants—I sha'n't sleep in my bed, if I do.

Mrs. H. Then you shall sleep somewhere else to-morrow night.

Cham. O dear! what shall I do?

Mrs. H. Tell us this moment, or I'll turn you out of doors directly.

Cham. Why, our butler has been treating us below in his pantry—Mr. Brush forced us to make a kind of a holiday night of it.

Miss S. Holiday! for what?

Cham. Nay, I only made one.

Miss S. Well, well; but upon what account?

Cham. Because, as how, Madam, there was a change in the family, they said—that his honour, Sir John, was to marry Miss Fanny instead of your ladyship.

Miss S. And so you make a holiday for that—Very fine!

Cham. I did not make it, Ma'am.

Mrs. H. But do you know nothing of Sir John's being to run away with Miss Fanny to-night?

Cham. No, indeed, Ma'am.

Miss S. Nor of his being now locked up in my sister's chamber?

Cham. No, as I hope for mercy, Ma'am.

Mrs. H. Well, I'll put an end to all this directly—do you run to my brother Sterling—

Cham. Now, Ma'am? 'Tis so very late, Ma'am—

Mrs. H. I don't care how late it is. Tell him there are thieves in the house—that the house is on fire—tell him to come here immediately—Go, I say.

Cham. I will, I will, though I'm frightened out of my wits. [Exit.]

Mrs. H. Do you watch here, my dear; and I'll put myself in order to face them. We'll plot 'em, and counterplot 'em too. [Exit into her chamber.]

Miss S. I have as much pleasure in this revenge, as in being made a countess. Ha! they are unlocking the door. Now for it! [Retires.]

FANNY'S door is unlocked, and BETTY comes out. MISS STERLING approaches her.

Bet. [Calling within.] Sir, sir! now's your time—all's clear. [Seeing MISS STERLING.] stay, stay—not yet—we are watched.

Miss S. And so you are, Madam Betty.

[MISS STERLING lays hold of her, while BETTY locks the door, and puts the key into her pocket.]

Bet. [Turning round.] What's the matter, Madam?

Miss S. Nay, that you shall tell my father and aunt, Madam.

Bet. I am no tell-tale, Madam, and no thief; they'll get nothing from me. [Aside.]

Miss S. You have a great deal of courage, Betty, and, considering the secrets you have to keep, you have occasion for it.

Bet. My mistress shall never repent her good opinion of me, Ma'am.

Enter STERLING.

Ster. What's all this? What's the matter? Why am I disturbed in this manner?

Miss S. This creature, and my mistresses, Sir, will explain the matter.

Re-enter MRS. HEIDELBERG, with another head-dress.

Mrs. H. Now I'm prepared for the rancounter—Well, brother, have you heard of this scene of wickedness?

Ster. Not I—but what is it? speak. I was got into my little closet, all the lawyers were in bed, and I had almost lost my senses in the confusion of Lord Ogleby's mortgages, when I was alarmed with a foolish girl, who could hardly speak; and whether it's fire, or thieves, or a rape, I'm quite in the dark.

Mrs. H. No, no, there's no rape, brother!—all parties are willing, I believe.

Miss S. Who's in that chamber?

[Detaining BETTY, who seems to be stealing away.]

Bet. My mistress.

Miss S. And who's with your mistress?

Bet. Why, who should there be?

Miss S. Open the door then, and let us see.

Bet. The door is open, Madam. [MISS STERLING goes to the door.] I'll sooner die than peach.

[Exit, hastily.]

Miss S. The door is locked; and she has got the key in her pocket.

Mrs. H. There's impudence, brother! piping hot from your daughter Fanny's school!

Ster. But zounds! what is all this about? You tell me of a sum total, and you don't produce the particulars.

Mrs. H. Sir John Melvil is locked up in your daughter's bed-chamber. There is the particular.

Ster. The devil he is!—That's bad.

Miss S. And he has been there some time, too.

Ster. Ditto!

Mrs. H. Ditto! worse and worse, I say. I'll raise the house, and expose him to my lord, and the whole fammaly.

Ster. By no means! we shall expose ourselves, sister!—The best way is to insure privately—let me alone! I'll make him marry her to-morrow morning.

Miss S. Make him marry her! this is beyond all patience!—You have thrown away all your affection, and I shall do as much by your obedience; unnatural fathers make unnatural children. My revenge is in my own power, and I'll indulge it. Had they made their escape, I should have been exposed to the derision of the world: but the deriders shall be ridged; and so—Help, help, there! Thieves, thieves!

Mrs. H. Tit-for-tat, Betsy! you are right, my girl.

Ster. Zounds! you'll spoil all—you'll raise the whole family!—The devil's in the girl.

Mrs. H. No, no, the devil's in you, brother; I am ashamed of your principles.—What! would you connive at your daughter's being locked up with her sister's husband? Help! Thieves! thieves, I say!

[Cries out.]

Ster. Sister, I beg of you!—daughter, I beg of you!—If you have no regard for me, consider yourselves!—we shall lose this opportunity of ennobling our blood, and getting above twenty per cent. for our money.

Miss S. What, by my disgrace and my sister's triumph? I have a spirit above such mean considerations: and to show you that it is not a low-bred, vulgar, 'Change-alley spirit—Help, help! Thieves, thieves, I say!

Ster. Ay, ay, you may save your lungs: the house is in an uproar.

Enter CANTON in a night-gown and slippers.

Can. Eh, diable! vat is de raison of dis great noise, dis tintamarre?

Ster. Ask those ladies, Sir; 'tis of their making. Lord O. [Calls within.] Brush! Brush! Canton! Where are you? What's the matter?—[Rings a bell.] Where are you?

Ster. 'Tis my lord calls, Mr. Canton.

Can. I com, mi lor!

[Exit.]

Flow. [Calls within.] A light! a light here!

where are the servants? Bring a light for me and my brothers.

Ster. Lights here! lights for the gentlemen!

[Exit.]

Mrs. H. My brother feels, I see: your sister's turn will come next.

Miss S. Ay, ay, let it go round, Madam, it is the only comfort I have left.

Re-enter STERLING, with lights, before SERGEANT FLOWER, with one boot and a slipper, and TRAVERSE.

Ster. This way, Sir! this way, gentlemen!

Flow. Well but, Mr. Sterling, no danger, I hope? Have they made a burglarious entry? Are you prepared to repulse them? I am very much alarmed about thieves, at circuit time. They would be particularly severe with us gentlemen of the bar.

Trav. No danger, Mr. Sterling—no trespass, I hope?

Ster. None, gentlemen, but of those ladies' making.

Mrs. H. You'll be ashamed to know, gentlemen, that all your labours and studies about this young lady are thrown away—Sir John Melvil is at this moment locked up with this lady's younger sister.

Flow. The thing is a little extraordinary, to be sure; but why were we to be frightened out of our beds for this? Could not we have tried this cause to-morrow morning?

Miss S. But, Sir, by to-morrow morning, perhaps, even your assistance would not have been of any service; the birds now in that cage would have flown away.

Enter LORD OGLEY in his robe-de-chambre, night-cap, &c. leaning on CANTON.

Lord O. I had rather lose a limb than my night's rest. What's the matter with you all?

Ster. Ay, ay, 'tis all over! Here's my lord, too.

Lord O. What's all this shrieking and screaming! Where's my angelic Fanny? She's safe, I hope?

Mrs. H. Your angelic Fanny, my lord, is locked up with your angelic nephew, in that chamber.

Lord O. My nephew! Then will I be excommunicated.

Mrs. H. Your nephew, my lord, has been plotting to run away with Miss Fanny, and Miss Fanny has been plotting to run away with your nephew; and if we had not watched them and called up the fammaly, they had been upon the scamper to Scotland by this time.

Lord O. Look ye, ladies! I know that Sir John has conceived a violent passion for Miss Fanny; and I know, too, that Miss Fanny has conceived a violent passion for another person; and I am so well convinced of the rectitude of her affections, that I will support them with my fortune, my honour, and my life.—Eh, sha'n't I, Mr. Sterling? [Smiling.] What say you?

Ster. [Sulkily.] To be sure, my lord. These bawling women have been the ruin of every thing.

[Aside.]

Lord O. But come, I'll end this business in a trice. If you, ladies, will compose yourselves, and Mr. Sterling will ensure Miss Fanny from violence, I will engage to draw her from her pillow with a whisper through the key-hole.

Mrs. H. The horrid creatures! I say, my lord, break the door open.

Lord O. Let me beg of your delicacy not to be precipitate! Now to our experiment!

[Advancing towards the door.]

Miss S. Now, what will they do? My heart will beat through my bosom.

Re-enter BETTY, with the key.

Bet. There's no occasion for breaking open doors, my lord; we have done nothing that we ought to be ashamed of, and my mistress shall face her enemies. [Going to unlock the door.]

Mrs. H. There's impudence!

Lord O. The mystery thickens. Lady of the bedchamber, [To BETTY.] open the door, and entreat Sir John Melvil (for the ladies will have it that he is there,) to appear, and answer to high crimes and misdemeanors. Call Sir John Melvil into court!

Enter SIR JOHN MELVIL.

Sir J. I am here, my lord.

Mrs. H. Hey-day!

Sir J. What's all this alarm and confusion? There is nothing but hurry in this house! What is the reason of it?

Lord O. Because you have been in that chamber; have been! nay, you are there at this moment, as these ladies have protested, so don't deny it—

Trav. This is the clearest alibi I ever knew, Mr. Sergeant.

Flow. Luce clarius.

Lord O. Upon my word, ladies, if you have often these frolics, it would be really entertaining to pass a whole summer with you. But come, [To BETTY.] open the door, and entreat your amiable mistress to come forth, and dispel all our doubts with her smiles.

Bet. [Opening the door.] Madam, you are wanted in this room. [Pertly.]

Enter FANNY, in great confusion.

Miss S. You see she's ready dressed—and what confusion she's in.

Mrs. H. Ready to pack off, bag and baggage! Her guilt confounds her!

Flow. Silence in the court, ladies!

Fan. I am confounded, indeed, Madam!

Lord O. Don't droop, my beauteous lily! but with your own peculiar modesty declare your state of mind. Pour conviction into their ears, and rapture into mine. [Smiling.]

Fan. I am at this moment the most unhappy—most distressed—the tumult is too much for my heart—and I want the power to reveal a secret, which to conceal has been the misfortune and misery of my— [Faints away.]

LOVEWELL, rushes out of the chamber.

Love. My Fanny in danger! I can contain no longer! Prudence were now a crime; all other cares were lost in this! Speak, speak, speak to me, my dearest Fanny! let me but hear thy voice: open your eyes, and bless me with the smallest sign of life!

[During this speech, they are all in amazement.]

Miss S. Lovewell!—I am easy.

Mrs. H. I am thunderstruck!

Lord O. I am petrified!

Sir J. And I undone.

Fan. [Recovering.] O, Lovewell!—even supported by thee, I dare not look my father nor his lordship in the face.

Ster. What now? Did not I send you to London, Sir?

VOL. I... 5 C

Lord O. Eh!—What! How's this? By what right and title have you been half the night in that lady's bed-chamber?

Love. By that right which makes me the happiest of men; and by a title which I would not forego for any the best of kings could give.

Bet. I could cry my eyes out, to hear his magnanimity.

Lord O. I am annihilated!

Ster. I have been choked with rage and wonder;—but now I can speak. Lovewell, you are a villain;—you have broken your word with me.

Fan. Indeed, Sir, he has not; you forbade him to think of me, when it was out of his power to obey you; we have been married these four months.

Ster. And he sha'n't stay in my house four hours. What baseness and treachery! As for you, you shall repent this step as long as you live, Madam!

Fan. Indeed, Sir, it is impossible to conceive the tortures I have already endured in consequence of my disobedience. My heart has continually upbraided me for it; and though I was too weak to struggle with affection, I feel that I must be miserable for ever without your forgiveness.

Ster. Lovewell, you shall leave my house directly! and you shall follow him, Madam!

Lord O. And if they do, I will receive them into mine. Lookye, Mr. Sterling, there have been some mistakes, which we had all better forget for our own sakes; and the best way to forget them, is to forgive the cause of them; which I do, from my soul. Poor girl! I swore to support her affection with my life and fortune; 'tis a debt of honour, and must be paid. You swore as much too, Mr. Sterling; but your laws in the city will excuse you, I suppose; for you never strike a balance without—errors excepted.

Ster. I am a father, my lord; but for the sake of other fathers, I think I ought not to forgive her, for fear of encouraging other silly girls, like herself, to throw themselves away without the consent of their parents.

Love. I hope there will be no danger of that, Sir. Young ladies, with minds like my Fanny's, would startle at the very shadow of vice; and when they know to what uneasiness only an indiscretion has exposed her, her example, instead of encouraging, will rather serve to quater them.

Mrs. H. Indiscretion, quater? a mighty pretty delicate word to express disobedience!

Lord O. For my part, I indulge my own passions too much to tyrannize over those of other people. Poor souls! I pity them. And you must forgive them too. Come, come, melt a little of your flint, Mr. Sterling!

Ster. Why, why, as to that, my lord—to be sure, he is a relation of yours, my lord—What say you, sister Heidelberg?

Mrs. H. The girl's ruined, and I forgive her.

Ster. Well, so do I then. Nay, no thanks, there's an end of the matter.

Lord O. But, Lovewell, what makes you duno all this while?

Love. Your kindness, my lord: I can scarce believe my own senses; they are all in a tumult of fear, joy, love, expectation, and gratitude! I ever was, and am now more, bound in duty to your lordship. For you, Mr. Sterling, if every moment of my life, spent gratefully in your service, will in some measure compensate the want of fortune, you perhaps will not repent your goodness to me. And you, ladies, I flatter myself will not for the future suspect me of artifice and intrigue. I shall be happy to oblige and serve you. As for you, Sir John—

Sir J. No apologies to me, Lovewell; I do not deserve any. All I have to offer in excuse for what has happened, is my total ignorance of your situation. Had you dealt a little more openly with me, you would have saved me, yourself, and that lady (who I hope will pardon my behaviour,) a great deal of uneasiness. Give me leave, however, to assure you, that, light and capricious as I may have appeared, now my infatuation is over, I have sensibility enough to be ashamed of the part I have acted, and honour enough to rejoice at your happiness.

Love. And now, my dearest Fanny, though we are seemingly the happiest of beings, yet all our joys will be damped, if his lordship's generosity and Mr. Sterling's forgiveness should not be succeeded by the indulgence, approbation, and consent of these our best benefactors.

[To the audience.]

EPILOGUE. BY MR. GARRICK.

SCENE.—An Assembly.

Several Persons at cards, at different tables; among the rest, COLONEL TRILL, LORD MINUM, MRS. QDAVER, and SIR PATRICK MAHONY.

At the Quadrills Table.

Col. T. Ladies, with leave—

2 Lady. Pass!

3 Lady. Pass!

Mrs. Q. You must do more.

Col. T. Indeed I can't.

Mrs. Q. I play in hearts.

Col. T. Encore.

2 Lady. What luck?

Col. T. To-night at Drury-lane is play'd

A comedy, and tout nouvelle—a spade!

Is not Miss Crotchet at the play?

Mrs. Q. My niece

Has made a party, Sir, to damn the piece.

At the Whist Table.

Lord M. I hate a play-house—Trump—It makes me sick.

1 Lady. We're two by honours, Ma'am.

Lord M. And we th' odd trick.

Pray do you know the author, Colonel Trill?

Col. T. I know no poets, Heav'n be prais'd—
—Spadille—

1 Lady. I'll tell you who, my lord.

[Whispers LORD MINUM.

Lord M. What, he again!

"And dwell such daring souls in little men?"
Be whose it will, they down our throats will cram it.

Col. T. O, no—I have a club—the best—we'll damn it.

Mrs. Q. O, bravo, colonel!—Music is my flame.

Lord M. And mine, by Jupiter!—We've won the game.

Col. T. What, do you love all music?

Mrs. Q. No, not Handel's.

And nasty plays—

Lord M. Are fit for Goths and Vandals.

[Rise from the table and pay.

From the Piquet Table.

Sir P. Well, faith and troth, that Shakspeare was no fool!

Col. T. I'm glad you like him, Sir—so ends the pool. [They pay and rise from the table]

Song.—COLONEL TRILL.

I hate all their nonsense,
Their Shakspeares and Johnsons,
Their plays, and their play-house, and bards.
'Tis singing, not saying;
A fig for all playing,
But playing, as we do, at cards.

I love to see Jonas,
Am pleased too with Comus;
Each well the spectator rewards.
So clever, so neat, in
Their tricks and their cheating!
Like them, we would fain deal our cards.

Sir P. King Lare is touching!—And how fine to see

Ould Hamlet's ghost! "To be, or not to be."—
What are your op'ras to Othello's roar?
Oh, he's an angel of a Blackamoor?

Lord M. What! when he chokes his wife!

Col. T. And calls her whore?

Sir P. King Richard calls his horse—And then Macbeth,

When'er he murders—takes away the breath.

My blood runs cold at every syllable,

To see the dagger that's invisible. [All laugh.]

Laugh if you please,—a pretty play—

Lord M. Is pretty.

Sir P. And when there's wit in't—

Col. T. To be sure, 'tis witty.

Sir P. I love the playhouse now—so light and gay

With all those candles—they have ta'en away!

For all your game, what makes it so much brighter?
[All laugh.]

Col. T. Put out the lights, and then—

Lord M. 'Tis so much lighter,

Sir P. Pray, do you mane, Sirs, more than you express?

Col. T. Just as it happens—

Lord M. Either more or less.

Mrs. Q. An't you asham'd, Sir?

[To SIR PATRICK.

Sir P. Me!—I seldom blush:

For little Shakspeare, faith, I'd take a push.

Lord M. News, news! here comes Miss
Crotchet from the play.

Enter MISS CROTCHET.

Mrs. Q. Well, Crotchet, what's the news?

Miss C. We've lost the day.

Col. T. Tell us, dear Miss, all you have heard and seen.

Miss C. I'm tir'd—a chair—here, take my capuchin.

Lord M. And isn't it damn'd, Miss?

Miss C. No, my lord, not quite.

But we shall damn it.

Col. T. When?

Miss C. To-morrow night.

There is a party of us, all of fashion,
Resolv'd to exterminate this vulgar passion:

A playhouse! what a place!—I must forswear it;

A little mischief only makes one bear it.

Such crowds of city folks!—so rude and pressing;

And their horse-laugh so hideously distressing;

When'er we hiss'd, they frown'd and fell a swearing, [ing]

Like their own Guildhall giants—fierce and star

Col. T. What said the folks of fashion? were they cross?

Lord M. The rest have no more judgment than my horse.

Miss C. Lord Grimly said 'twas execrable stuff. Says one—"Why so, my lord?"—My lord took snuff.

In the first act Lord George began to doze, And critics'd the author through his nose; So loud indeed, that as his lordship snor'd, The pit turn'd round, and all the brutes encor'd. Some lords indeed approv'd the author's jokes.

Lord M. We have among us, Miss, some foolish folks.

Miss C. Says poor Lord Simper—"Well, now to my mind, The piece is good;"—but he's both deaf and blind.

Sir P. Upon my soul, a very pretty story! And quality appears in all its glory. There was some merit in the piece, no doubt.

Miss C. O, to be sure!—if one could find it out.

Col. T. But, tell us, Miss, the subject of the play.

Miss C. Why, 'twas a marriage—yes—a marriage—stay—

A lord, an aunt, two sisters—and a merchant— A baronet, two lawyers, a fat sergeant, Are all produc'd—to talk with one another; And about something make a mighty pother! They all go in and out, and to and fro; And talk and quarrel as they come and go— Then go to bed—and then get up—and then— Scream, faint, scold, kiss—and go to bed again.—

[All laugh.]

Such is the play—Your judgment—never sham it.

Col. T. Oh, damn it!

Mrs. Q. Damn it!

I Lady. Damn it!

Miss C. Damn it!

Lord M. Damn it!

Sir P. Well, faith, you speak your minds, and I'll be free—

Good night—this company's too good for me.

[Going.]

Col. T. Your judgment, dear Sir Patrick, makes us proud.

[All laugh.]

Sir P. Laugh if you please, but pray don't laugh so loud. [Exit.]

Recitative.—COLONEL TRILL, MISS CROTCHET, and LORD MINUM.

Col. T. Now the barbarian's gone, Miss, tune your tongue, And let us raise our spirits high with song.

Miss C. Colonel, de tout mon cœur—I've one in petto,

Which you shall join, and make it a duetto.

Lord M. Bella signora, et amico mio,

I too will join, and then we'll make a trio.

Col. T. Come all and join the full-mouth'd chorus:

And drive all tragedy and comedy before us.

[All the company rise and advance to the front of the stage.]

Trio.—COLONEL TRILL, MISS CROTCHET, and LORD MINUM.

Col. T. Would you ever go to see a tragedy?

Miss C. Never, never.

Col. T. A comedy?

Lord M. Never, never.

Live for ever.

Tweedle-dum, and tweedle-dee.

Col. T.

Lord M. } Live for ever.

Miss C. } Tweedle-dum, and tweedle-dee.

Chorus. Would you ever go to see, &c.

THE LIAR:

A FARCE,

IN TWO ACTS.

BY SAMUEL FOOTE, Esq.

REMARKS.

The Mentor of Corneille is the foundation of this farce, which was first produced as a comedy in three acts at Covent Garden. In that state, it was found rather tedious, and not sufficiently pointed with the vis comica; but, reduced to two acts, it proves an agreeable comic treat, mixed with some wholesome satire.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

	DRURY LANE, 1818.
SIR JAMES ELLIOT,.....	Mr. Barnard.
OLD WILDING,.....	Mr. Powell.
YOUNG WILDING,.....	Mr. Elliston.
PAPILLION,.....	Mr. Gatte.
MISS GRANTAM,.....	Miss Boyce.
MISS GODFREY,.....	Mrs. Orger.
KITTY,.....	Mrs. Allsep.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—YOUNG WILDING's Lodgings.

YOUNG WILDING and PAPILLION.

Y. Wild. And am I now, Papillion, perfectly equipped?

Pap. Personne mieux. Nobody better.

Y. Wild. My figure?

Pap. Fait a peindre.

Y. Wild. My air?

Pap. Libre.

Y. Wild. My address?

Pap. Parisienne.

Y. Wild. My hat sits easily under my arm; not like the draggled tail of my tattered academical habit?

Pap. Ah, bien autre chose.

Y. Wild. Why, then adieu, Alma Mater, and bien venu la ville de Londres; farewell to the schools, and welcome to the theatres; presidents, proctors, short commons with long graces, must now give place to plays, bagnios, long tavern bills, with no graces at all.

Pap. Ah, bravo! bravo!

Y. Wild. Well, but my dear Papillion, you must give me the chart du pays. This town is a new world to me: my provident papa, you know, would never suffer me near the smoke of London; and what can be his motive for permitting me now, I can't readily conceive.

Pap. Ni moi.

Y. Wild. I shall, however, take the liberty to conceal my arrival from him for a few days.

Pap. Vous avez raison.

Y. Wild. Well, my Mentor, and how am I to manage? Direct my road: where must I begin? But the debate is, I suppose, of consequence?

Pap. Vraiment.

Y. Wild. How long have you left Paris, Papillion?

Pap. Twelve, thirteen, year.

Y. Wild. I can't compliment you upon your progress in English.

Pap. The accent is difficult.

Y. Wild. But here you are at home.

Pap. C'est vrai.

Y. Wild. No stranger to fashionable places.

Pap. Au fait.

Y. Wild. Acquainted with the fashionable figures of both sexes.

Pap. Sans doute.

Y. Wild. Well, then, open your lecture:—and, d'ye hear, Papillion, as you have the honour to be promoted from the mortifying condition of an humble valet to the important charge of a private tutor, let us discard all distance between us. See me ready to slake my thirst at your fountain of knowledge, my Magnus Apollo.

Pap. Here, then, I disclose my Helicon to my poetical pupil.

Y. Wild. Hey, Papillion?

Pap. Sir?

Y. Wild. What is this? Why you speak English!

Pap. Without doubt.

Y. Wild. But, like a native!

Pap. To be sure.

Y. Wild. And what am I to conclude from all this?

Pap. Why, Sir—But, to be better understood, I believe it will be necessary to give you a short sketch of the principal incidents of my life.

Y. Wild. Prythee, do.

Pap. Why then, you are to know, Sir, that my former situation has been rather above my present condition, having once sustained the dignity of sub-preceptor to one of those cheap, rural academies with which our county of York is so plentifully stocked.

Y. Wild. But to the point: why this disguise? why renounce your country?

Pap. There, Sir, you make a little mistake; it was my country that renounced me.

Y. Wild. Explain.

Pap. In an instant; upon quitting the school, and first coming to town, I got recommended to the compiler of the Monthly Review.

Y. Wild. What, an author too?

Pap. Oh, a voluminous one. The whole region of the belles lettres fell under my inspection; physic, divinity, and the mathematics, my mistress managed herself. There, Sir, like another Aristarch, I dealt out fame and damnation at pleasure. In obedience to the caprice and commands of my master, I have condemned books I never read; and applauded the fidelity of a translation, without understanding one syllable of the original.

Y. Wild. Ah! why, I thought acuteness of discernment, and depth of knowledge, were necessary to accomplish a critic.

Pap. Yes, Sir; but not a monthly one. Our method was very concise. We copy the title-page of a new book; we never go any farther. If we are ordered to praise it, we have at hand about ten words, which, scattered through as many periods, effectually does the business; as "laudable design, happy arrangement, spirited language, nervous sentiment, elevation of thought, conclusive argument." If we are to decry, then we have, "unconnected, flat, false, illiberal, stricture, reprehensible, unnatural." And thus, Sir, we pepper the author, and soon rid our hands of his work.

Y. Wild. A short recipe.

Pap. And yet, Sir, you have all the materials that are necessary: these are the arms with which we engage authors of every kind. To us all subjects are equal; plays or sermons, poetry or politics, music or midwifery, it is the same thing.

Y. Wild. How came you to resign this easy employment.

Pap. It would not answer. Notwithstanding what we say, people will judge for themselves; our work hung upon hand, and all I could get from the publisher was four shillings a-week and my small beer. Poor pittance!

Y. Wild. Poor, indeed.

Pap. Oh, half-starved me.

Y. Wild. What was your next change?

Pap. I was mightily puzzled to choose, when chance threw an old friend in my way that quite retrieved my affairs.

Y. Wild. Pray, who might he be?

Pap. A little bit of a Swiss genius, who had been French usher with me at the same school in the country. I opened my melancholy story to him over three penny-worth of beef a-la-mode in a cellar in St. Ann's. My little foreign friend pursed up his lantern jaws, and, with a shrug of contempt, "Ah, maitre Jean, vous n'avez pas la politique; you have no finesse: to trive here, you must study the folly of your own country."—"How, Monsieur!"—" Taisez-vous: keep-a your tongue. Autrefois I teach you speak French, now I teach-a you to forget English. Go vid me to my lodgement, I vil give you proper dress, den go present yourself to de same hotels, de very same house; you will find all de doors dat was shut in your face as footman Anglois, will fly open demselves to a French valet de chambre."

Y. Wild. Well, Papillion?

Pap. Gad, Sir, I thought it was but an honest artifice, so I determined to follow my friend's advice.

Y. Wild. Did it succeed?

Pap. Better than expectation. My tawny face, long cue, and broken English, was a passe-partout. Besides, when I am out of place, this disguise procures me many resources.

Y. Wild. As how?

Pap. Why, at a pinch, Sir, I am either a teacher of tongues, a friseur, a dentist, or a dancing-master: these, Sir, are hereditary professions to Frenchmen. But now, Sir, to the point: as you were pleased to be so candid with me, I was determined to have no reserve with you. You have studied books, I have studied men; you want advice, and I have some at your service.

Y. Wild. Well, I'll be your customer.

Pap. But guard my secret. If I should be so unfortunate as to lose your place, don't shut me out from every other.

Y. Wild. You may rely upon me.

Pap. In a few years I shall be in a condition to retire from business; but whether I shall settle at my family seat, or pass over to the continent, is as yet undetermined. Perhaps, in gratitude to the country, I may purchase a marquise near Paris, and spend the money I have got by their means generously amongst them.

Y. Wild. A grateful intention. But let us sally. Where do we open?

Pap. Let us see—one o'clock—it is a fine day: the Mall will be crowded.

Y. Wild. Alons.

Pap. But don't stare, Sir: survey every thing with an air of habit and indifference.

Y. Wild. Never fear.

Pap. But I would, Sir, crave a moment's audience, upon a subject that may prove very material to you.

Y. Wild. Proceed.

Pap. You may pardon my presumption; but you have, my good master, one little foible that I could wish you to correct.

Y. Wild. What is it?

Pap. And yet it is a pity too, you do it so very well.

Y. Wild. Prythee, be plain

Pap. You have, Sir, a lively imagination, with a most happy turn for invention.

Y. Wild. Well.

Pap. But now and then in your narratives you are hurried, by a flow of spirits, to border upon the improbable, a little given to the marvellous.

Y. Wild. I understand you: what I am some-what subject to lying?

Pap. Oh, pardon me, Sir; I don't say that; no, no: only a little apt to embellish; that's all. To be sure it is a fine gift, that there is no disputing; but men in general are so stupid, so rigorously attached to matter of fact—And yet this talent of yours is the very soul and spirit of poetry; and why it should not be the same in prose, I can't for my life determine.

Y. Wild. You would advise me, then, not to be quite so poetical in my prose?

Pap. Why, Sir, if you would descend a little to the grovelling comprehension of the million, I think it would be as well.

Y. Wild. I'll think of it.

Pap. Besides, Sir, in this town, people are more smoky and suspicious. Oxford, you know, is the seat of the muses; and a man is naturally permitted more ornament and garniture to his conversation, than they will allow in this latitude.

Y. Wild. I believe you are right. But we shall be late. D'ye hear me, Papillion: if at any time you find me growing too poetical, give me a hint; your advice sha'n't be thrown away. [Exit.]

Pap. I wish it mayn't: but the disease is too rooted to be quickly removed. Lord, how I have sweat for him! yet he is as unembarrassed, easy, and fluent, all the time, as if he really believed what he said. Well, to be sure, he is a great master; it is a thousand pities his genius could not be converted to some public service. I think the government should employ him to answer the Brussels Gazette. I'll be hanged if he is not too many for Monsieur Maubert, at his own weapons. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—The Park.

Enter MISS GRANTAM, YOUNG WILDING, and PAPILLION following.

Y. Wild. Your ladyship's handkerchief, Ma'am.

Miss Gr. I am, Sir, concerned at the trouble—

Y. Wild. A most happy incident for me, Madam; as chance has given me an honour, in one lucky minute, that the most diligent attention has not been able to procure for me in the whole tedious round of a revolving year.

Miss Gr. Is this meant to me, Sir?

Y. Wild. To whom else, Madam? surely, you must have marked my respectful assiduity, my uninterrupted attendance; to plays, operas, balls, routs, and ridottos, I have pursued you like your shadow; I have besieged your door for a glimpse of your exit and entrance, like a distressed creditor, who has no arms against privilege but perseverance.

Pap. So, now, he is in for it; stop him who can.

Y. Wild. In short, Madam, ever since I quitted America, which I take now to be about a year, I have as faithfully guarded the live-long night your ladyship's portal, as a sentinel the powder magazine in a fortified city.

Pap. Quitted America! well pulled.

Miss Gr. You have served in America, then?

Y. Wild. Full four years, Ma'am: and during that whole time, not a single action of consequence, but I had an opportunity to signalize myself; and I think I may, without vanity, affirm, I did not miss the occasion. You have heard of Quebec, I presume?

Pap. What the deuce is he driving at now?

Y. Wild. The project to surprise that place was thought a happy expedient, and the first mounting the breach a gallant exploit. There indeed the whole army did me justice.

Miss Gr. I have heard the honour of that conquest attributed to another name.

Y. Wild. The mere taking the town, Ma'am; but that's a trifle.—But, Madam, it is not to the French alone that my feats are confined: Cherokees, Catabaws, with all the Aws and Ees of the continent, have felt the force of my arms.

Pap. This is too much, Sir.

Y. Wild. Hands off! nor am I less adroit at a treaty, Madam, than terrible in battle. To me we owe the friendship of the Five Nations; and I had the first honour of smoking the pipe of peace with the Little Carpenter.

Miss G. And so young!

Y. Wild. This gentleman, though a Frenchman and an enemy, I had the fortune to deliver from the Mohawks, whose prisoner he had been for nine years. He gives a most entertaining account of their laws and customs; he shall present you with the wampum belt and a scalping-knife. Will you permit him, Madam, just to give you a taste of the military-dance, with a short specimen of their war-whoop.

Pap. For Heaven's sake!

Miss Gr. The place is too public.

Y. Wild. In short, Madam, after having gathered as many laurels abroad as would garnish a Gothic cathedral at Christmas, I returned to reap the harvest of the well-fought field. Here it was my good fortune to encounter you: then was the victor vanquished; what the enemy could never accomplish, your eyes in an instant achieved; prouder to serve here than command in chief elsewhere; and more glorious in wearing your chains, than in triumphing over the vanquished world.

Miss Gr. I see Sir James Elliot coming, and must dismiss him. [Aside.]—Well, Sir, I accept the tendre of your passion, and may find a time to renew our acquaintance; at present it is necessary we should separate.

Y. Wild. Slave to your will, I live but to obey you. But, may I be indulged with the knowledge of your residence?

Miss Gr. Sir!

Y. Wild. Your place of abode?

Miss Gr. Oh, Sir, you can't want to be acquainted with that; you have a whole year stood sentinel at my ladyship's portal.

Y. Wild. Madam, I—I—I—

Miss Gr. Oh, Sir, your servant. Ha, ha, ha! What, you are caught? ha, ha, ha! Well, he has a most intrepid assurance. Adieu, my Mars. Ha, ha, ha! [Exit.]

Pap. That last was an unlucky question, Sir.

Y. Wild. A little mal-a-propos, I must confess.

Pap. A man should have a good memory who deals much in this poetical prose.

Y. Wild. Poh! I'll soon re-establish my credit: but I must know who this girl is. Hark ye, Papillion; could not you contrive to pump out of her footman—I see there he stands—the name of his mistress?

Pap. I will try.

[Exit.]

[WILDING retires to the back of the stage.]

Enter SIR JAMES ELLIOT and SERVANT.

Sir J. Music and an entertainment?

Serv. Yes, Sir.

Sir J. Last night, upon the water?

Serv. Upon the water, last night.

Sir J. Who gave it?

Serv. That, Sir, I can't say.

To them WILDING.

Y. Wild. Sir James Elliot, your most devoted.

Sir J. Ah, my dear Wilding! you are welcome to town.

Y. Wild. You will pardon my impatience; I interrupted you; you seemed upon an interesting subject?

Sir J. Oh, an affair of gallantry.

Y. Wild. Of what kind?

Sir J. A young lady regaled last night by her lover on the Thames.

Y. Wild. As how?

Sir J. A band of music in boats.

Y. Wild. Were they good performers?

Sir J. The best. Then conducted to Marble-hall, where she found a magnificent collation.

Y. Wild. Well ordered?

Sir J. With elegance. After supper, a ball; and, to conclude the night, a firework.

Y. Wild. Was the last well designed?

Sir J. Superb.

Y. Wild. And happily executed?

Sir J. Not a single faux pas.

Y. Wild. And you don't know who gave it?

Sir J. I can't even guess.

Y. Wild. Ha, ha, ha!

Sir J. Why do you laugh?

Y. Wild. Ha, ha, ha! It was me.

Sir J. You!

Pap. You, Sir!

Y. Wild. Moi—me.

Pap. So, so, so; he's entered again.

Sir J. Why, you are fortunate to find a mistress in so short a space of time.

Y. Wild. Short! why, man, I have been in London these six weeks.

Pap. O Lord, O Lord!

Y. Wild. It is true, not caring to encounter my father, I have rarely ventured out but of nights.

Pap. I can hold no longer. Dear Sir—

Y. Wild. Peace, puppy.

Pap. A curb to your poetical vein.

Y. Wild. I shall curb your impertinence.—But since the story is got abroad, I will, my dear friend, treat you with all the particulars.

Sir J. I shall hear it with pleasure—This is a lucky adventure: but he must not know he is my rival. [Aside.]

Y. Wild. Why, Sir, between six and seven my goddess embarked at Somerset-stairs, in one of the companies' barges, gilt and hung with damask, expressly for the occasion.

Pap. Mercy on us!

Y. Wild. At the cabin-door she was accosted by a beautiful boy, who, in the garb of a Cupid, paid her some compliments in verse, of my own composing. The conceits were pretty; allusions to Venus and the sea—the lady and the Thames—no great matter; but, however, well timed, and, what was better, well taken.

Sir J. Doubtless.

Pap. At what a rate he runs!

Y. Wild. As soon as we had gained the centre of the river, two boats, full of trumpets, French-horns, and other martial music, struck up their sprightly strains from the Surry side, which were echoed by a suitable number of lutes, flutes, and hautboys, from the opposite shore. In this state, the oars keeping time, we majestically sailed along, till the arches of the new bridge gave a pause, and an opportunity for an elegant dessert in Dresden

China, by Robinson. Here the repast closed with a few favourite airs from Eliza, Tenducci, and the Maittei.

Pap. Mercy on us!

Y. Wild. Opposite Lambeth, I had prepared a naval engagement, in which Boscawen's victory over the French was repeated: the action was conducted by one of the commanders on that expedition, and not a single incident omitted.

Sir J. Surely, you exaggerate a little.

Pap. Yes, yes, this battle will sink him.

Y. Wild. True to the letter, upon my honour. I sha'n't trouble you with a repetition of our collation, ball, feu d'artifice, with the thousand little incidental amusements that chance or design produced: it is enough to know, that all that could flatter the senses, fire the imagination, or gratify the expectation, was there produced in a lavish abundance.

Sir J. The sacrifice was, I presume, grateful to your deity.

Y. Wild. Upon that subject you must pardon my silence.

Pap. Modest creature!

Sir J. I wish you joy of your success—For the present, you will excuse me.

Y. Wild. Nay, but stay and hear the conclusion.

Sir J. For that I shall seize another occasion. [Exit.]

Pap. Nobly performed, Sir.

Y. Wild. Yes, I think, happily hit off.

Pap. May I take the liberty to offer one question?

Y. Wild. Freely.

Pap. Pray, Sir, are you often visited with these waking dreams?

Y. Wild. Dreams! what dost mean by dreams? Pap. Those ornamental reveries, those frolics of fancy, which, in the judgment of the vulgar, would be deemed absolute fias.

Y. Wild. Why, Papillion, you have but a poor, narrow, circumscribed genius.

Pap. I must own, Sir, I have not sublimity sufficient to relish the full fire of your Pindaric muse.

Y. Wild. No; a plebeian soul! But I will animate thy clay; mark my example, follow my steps, and in time thou may'st rival thy master.

Pap. Very well, Sir, this is all very lively; but remember the travelling pitcher: if you don't one time or other, under favour, lie yourself into some confounded scrape, I will be content to be hanged.

Y. Wild. Do you think so, Papillion?—And whenever that happens, if I don't lie myself out of it again, why then I will be content to be crucified. And so, along after the lady—[Steps short, going out.] Zounds, here comes my father! I must fly. Watch him, Papillion, and bring me word to the Cardigan. [Exeunt separately.]

SCENE III.—A Tavern.

YOUNG WILDING and PAPILLION rising from table.

Y. Wild. Gad, I had like to have run into the old gentleman's mouth.

Pap. It is pretty near the same thing; for I saw him join Sir James Elliot: so your arrival is no longer a secret.

Y. Wild. Why then I must lose my pleasure, and you your preferment: I must submit to the dull decency of a sober family, and you to the customary duties of brushing and powdering. But

I was so fluttered at meeting my father, that I forgot the fair : pr'ythee, who is she ?

Pap. There were two.

Y. Wild. That I saw.

Pap. From her footman, I learned her name was Godfrey.

Y. Wild. And her fortune ?

Pap. Immense.

Y. Wild. Single, I hope ?

Pap. Certainly.

Y. Wild. Then will I have her.

Pap. What, whether she will or no ?

Y. Wild. Yes.

Pap. How will you manage that ?

Y. Wild. By making it impossible for her to marry any one else.

Pap. I don't understand you, Sir.

Y. Wild. Oh, I shall only have recourse to that talent you so mightily admire. You will see, by the circulation of a few anecdotes, how soon I will get rid of my rivals.

Pap. At the expense of the lady's reputation, perhaps.

Y. Wild. That will be as it happens.

Pap. And have you no qualms, Sir ?

Y. Wild. Why, where's the injury ?

Pap. No injury, to ruin her fame !

Y. Wild. I will restore it to her again.

Pap. How ?

Y. Wild. Turn tinker, and mend it myself.

Pap. Which way ?

Y. Wild. The old way ; solder it by marriage : that, you know, is the modern salve for every sore.

Enter WAITER.

Wait. An elderly gentleman to inquire for Mr. Wilding.

Y. Wild. For me ! what sort of being is it ?

Wait. Being, Sir !

Y. Wild. Ay ; how is he dressed ?

Wait. In a tye-wig and snuff-coloured coat.

Pap. Zooks, Sir, it is your father.

Y. Wild. Show him up. [Exit WAITER.]

Pap. And what must I do ?

Y. Wild. Recover your broken English, but preserve your rank ; I have a reason for it.

Enter OLD WILDING.

O. Wild. Your servant, Sir : you are welcome to town.

Y. Wild. You have just prevented me, Sir : I was preparing to pay my duty to you.

O. Wild. If you thought it a duty, you should, I think, have sooner discharged it.

Y. Wild. Sir !

O. Wild. Was it quite so decent, Jack, to be six weeks in town, and conceal yourself only from me.

Y. Wild. Six weeks ! I have scarce been six hours.

O. Wild. Come, come ; I am better informed.

Y. Wild. Indeed, Sir, you are imposed upon. This gentleman (whom first gave me leave to have the honour of introducing to you,) this, Sir, is the Marquis de Chateau Brilliant, of an ancient house in Brittany ; who, travelling through England, chose to make Oxford for some time the place of his residence, where I had the happiness of his acquaintance.

O. Wild. Does he speak English ?

Y. Wild. Not fluently, but understands it perfectly.

Pap. Pray, Sir—

Y. Wild. Any services, Sir, that I can render you here, you may readily command.

Pap. Beaucoup d'honneur.

Y. Wild. This gentleman, I say, Sir, whose quality and country are sufficient securities for his veracity, will assure you, that yesterday we left Oxford together.

O. Wild. Indeed !

Pap. C'est vrai.

O. Wild. This is amazing. I was at the same time informed of another circumstance too, that, I confess, made me a little uneasy, as it interfered with a favourite scheme of my own.

Y. Wild. What could that be, pray, Sir ?

O. Wild. That you had conceived a violent affection for a fair lady.

Y. Wild. Sir !

O. Wild. And had given her very gallant and very expensive proofs of your passion.

Y. Wild. Me, Sir !

O. Wild. Particularly last night ; music, collations, balls, and fireworks.

Y. Wild. Monsieur le Marquis !—And pray, Sir, who could tell you all this ?

O. Wild. An old friend of yours.

Y. Wild. His name, if you please ?

O. Wild. Sir James Elliot.

Y. Wild. Yes ; I thought he was the man.

O. Wild. Your reason.

Y. Wild. Why, Sir, though Sir James Elliot has a great many good qualities, and is upon the whole a valuable man, yet he has one fault which has long determined me to drop his acquaintance.

O. Wild. What may that be ?

Y. Wild. Why you can't, Sir, be a stranger to his prodigious skill in the traveller's talent ?

O. Wild. How !

Y. Wild. Oh, notorious to a proverb. His friends, who are tender of his fame, gloss over his foible, by calling him an agreeable novelist ; and so he is, with a vengeance. Why, he will tell you more lies in an hour, than all the circulating libraries put together will publish in a year.

O. Wild. Indeed !

Y. Wild. Oh, he is the modern Mandeville at Oxford : he was always distinguished by the facetious appellation of the Bouncer.

O. Wild. Amazing !

Y. Wild. Lord, Sir, he is so well understood in his own county, that at the last Hereford assizes, a cause, as clear as the sun, was absolutely thrown away by his being merely mentioned as a witness.

O. Wild. A strange turn !

Y. Wild. Unaccountable. But there, I think, they went a little too far ; for if it had come to an oath, I don't think he would have bounced neither ; but in common occurrences, there is no repeating after him. Indeed, my great reason for dropping him was, that my credit began to be a little suspected too.

Pap. Poor gentleman !

O. Wild. Why, I never heard this of him.

Y. Wild. That may be : but can there be a stronger proof of his practice than the flam he has been telling you of fireworks, and the Lord-knows-what ? And I dare swear, Sir, he was very fluent and florid in his description.

O. Wild. Extremely.

Y. Wild. Yes, that is just his way ; and not a syllable of truth from the beginning to the ending, Marquis ?

Pap. Oh, dat is all a fiction, upon mine honour.

Y. Wild. You see, Sir—

O. Wild. Clearly. I really can't help pitying the poor man. I have heard of people, who, by long habit, become a kind of constitutional liars.

Y. Wild. Your observation is just; that is exactly his case.

Pap. I'm sure it is yours. [Aside.]

O. Wild. Well, Sir, I suppose we shall see you this evening.

Y. Wild. The Marquis has an appointment with some of his countrymen, which I have promised to attend; besides, Sir, as he is an entire stranger in town, he may want my little services.

O. Wild. Where can I see you in about an hour? I have a short visit to make, in which you are deeply concerned.

Y. Wild. I shall attend your commands; but where?

O. Wild. Why, here. Marquis, I am your obedient servant.

Pap. Votre serviteur tres humble.

[Exit OLD W.

Y. Wild. So, Papillion, that difficulty is despatched. I think I am even with Sir James for his tattling.

Pap. Most ingeniously managed:—but are not you afraid of the consequence?

Y. Wild. I don't comprehend you.

Pap. A future explanation between the parties.

Y. Wild. That may embarrass: but the day is distant. I warrant I will bring myself off.

Pap. It is in vain for me to advise.

Y. Wild. Why, to say truth, I do begin to find my system attended with danger. Give me your hand, Papillion—I will reform.

Pap. Ah, Sir!

Y. Wild. I positively will. Why this practice may in time destroy my credit.

Pap. That is pretty well done already. [Aside.] Ay, think of that, Sir.

Y. Wild. Well, if I don't turn out the merest dull matter-of-fact fellow—But, Papillion, I must scribble a billet to my new flame. I think her name is—

Pap. Godfrey; her father, an India governor shut up in the strong room at Calcutta, left her all his wealth: she lives near Miss Grantam, by Grosvenor-square.

Y. Wild. A governor!—Oh ho!—Bushels of rupees and pecks of pagodas, I reckon.—Well, I long to be rummaging—But the old gentleman will soon return: I will hasten to finish my letter.—But, Papillion, what could my father mean by a visit in which I am deeply concerned?

Pap. I can't guess.

Y. Wild. I shall know presently.—To Miss Godfrey, formerly of Calcutta, now residing in Grosvenor-square.—Papillion, I won't tell her a word of a lie.

Pap. You won't, Sir.

Y. Wild. No; it would be ungenerous to deceive a lady. No; I will be open, candid, and sincere.

Pap. If you are, it will be for the first time.

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.

Enter MISS GRANTAM and MISS GODFREY.

Miss God. And you really like this gallant spark?

*Vol. I... 5 D 64

Miss Gr. Prodigious! Oh, I'm quite in love with his assurance! I wonder who he is: he can't have been long in town? A young fellow of his easy impudence must have soon made his way to the best of company.

Miss God. By way of amusement he may prove no disagreeable acquaintance; but you can't surely have any serious designs upon him?

Miss Gr. Indeed but I have.

Miss God. And poor Sir James Elliot is to be discarded at once?

Miss Gr. Oh, no!

Miss God. What is your intention in regard to him?

Miss Gr. Hey!—I can't tell you. Perhaps, if I don't like this new man better, I may marry him.

Miss God. Thou art a strange, giddy girl.

Miss Gr. Quite the reverse; a perfect pattern of prudence; why, would you have me less careful of my person than my purse?

Miss God. My dear?

Miss Gr. Why, I say, child, my fortune being in money, I have some in India-bonds, some in the bank, some on this loan, some on the other; so that if one fund fails, I have a sure resource in the rest.

Miss God. Very true.

Miss Gr. Well, my dear, just so I manage my love affairs. If I should not like this man—if he should not like me—if we should quarrel—if, if—or in short, if any of the ifs should happen, which you know break engagements every day; why, by this means I shall be never at a loss.

Miss God. Quite provident. Well, and pray, on how many different securities have you at present placed out your love?

Miss Gr. Three; the sober Sir James Elliot; the new America-man; and this morning I expect a formal proposal from an old friend of my father.

Miss God. Mr. Wilding?

Miss Gr. Yes: but I don't reckon much upon him: for you know my dear, what can I do with an awkward, raw, college cub! Though, upon second thoughts, that may'n't be too bad neither; for as I must have the fashioning of him, he may be easily moulded to one's mind.

Enter a SERVANT.

Serv. Mr. Wilding, Madam.

Miss Gr. Show him in. [Exit SERVANT.]—You need not go, my dear; we have no particular business.

Miss God. I wonder, now, what she calls particular business.

Enter OLD WILDING.

O. Wild. Ladies, your servant. I wait upon you, Madam, with a request from my son, that he may be permitted the honour of kissing your hand.

Miss Gr. Your son is in town then, Sir?

O. Wild. He came last night, Ma'am; and though but just from the university, I think I may venture to affirm, with as little the air of a pedant as—

Miss Gr. I don't, Mr. Wilding, question the accomplishments of your son; and shall own too, that his being descended from the old friend of my father is, to me, the strongest recommendation.

O. Wild. You honour me, Madam.

Miss Gr. But, Sir, I have something to say—
O. Wild. Pray, Madam, speak out; it is impossible to be too explicit on these important occasions.

Miss Gr. Why then, Sir, to a man of your wisdom and experience, I need not observe, that the loss of a parent to counsel and direct at this solemn crisis, has made a greater degree of personal prudence necessary in me.

O. Wild. Perfectly right, Ma'am.

Miss Gr. We live, Sir, in a very censorious world; a young woman can't be too much on her guard; nor should I choose to admit any man in the quality of a lover, if there was not at least a strong probability—

O. Wild. Of a more intimate connection. I hope, Madam, you have heard nothing to the disadvantage of my son.

Miss Gr. Not a syllable: but you know, Sir, there are such things in nature as unaccountable antipathies, aversions, that we take at first sight. I should be glad there could be no danger of that.

O. Wild. I understand you, Madam: you shall have all the satisfaction imaginable: Jack is to meet me immediately; I will conduct him under your window; and if his figure has the misfortune to displease, I will take care his addresses shall never offend you. Your most obedient servant. [Exit.]

Miss Gr. Now, there is a polite, sensible, old father for you.

Miss God. Yes! and a very discreet, prudent daughter he is likely to have. Oh, you are a great hypocrite, Kitty.

Enter a SERVANT.

Ser. A letter for you, Madam. [To MISS GODFREY.] Sir James Elliot to wait on your ladyship. [To MISS GRANTAM. Exit.]

Miss Gr. Lord, I hope he won't stay long here. He comes, and seems entirely wrapped up in the dismal: what can be the matter now?

Enter SIR JAMES ELLIOT.

Sir J. In passing by your door, I took the liberty, Ma'am, of inquiring after your health.

Miss Gr. Very obliging. I hope, Sir, you received a favourable account.

Sir J. I did not know but you might have caught cold last night.

Miss Gr. Cold! why, Sir, I hope I didn't sleep with my bed-chamber window open.

Sir J. Ma'am!

Miss Gr. Sir!

Sir J. No, Ma'am; but it was rather hazardous to stay so late upon the water.

Miss Gr. Upon the water?

Sir J. Not but the variety of amusements, it must be owned, were a sufficient temptation.

Miss Gr. What can he be driving at now?

Sir J. And pray, Madam, what think you of young Wilding? is not he a gay, agreeable, sprightly—

Miss Gr. I never give my opinion of people I don't know.

Sir J. You don't know him!

Miss Gr. No.

Sir J. And his father I did not meet at your door!

Miss Gr. Most likely you did.

Sir J. I am glad you own that, however, but for one son, you never—

Miss Gr. Set eyes upon him.

Sir J. Really?

Miss Gr. Really?

Sir J. Finely supported. Now, Madam, do you know that one of us is just going to make a very ridiculous figure?

Miss Gr. Sir, I never had the least doubt of your talents for excelling in that way.

Sir J. Ma'am, you do me honour: but it does not happen to fall to my lot upon this occasion, however.

Miss Gr. And that is a wonder!—what, then, I am to be the fool of the comedy, I suppose?

Sir J. Admirably rallied! But I shall dash the spirit of that triumphant laugh.

Miss Gr. I dare the attack. Come on, Sir.

Sir J. Know then and blush, if you are not as lost to shame as dead to decency, that I am no stranger to all last night's transactions.

Miss Gr. Indeed!

Sir J. From your first entering the barge at Somerset-house, to your last landing at Whitehall.

Miss Gr. Surprising!

Sir J. Cupids, collations, feasts, fireworks, all have reached me.

Miss Gr. Why, you deal in magic.

Sir J. My intelligence is as natural as it is infallible.

Miss Gr. May I be indulged with the name of your informer?

Sir J. Freely, Madam. Only the very individual spark to whose folly you were indebted for this gallant profusion.

Miss Gr. But his name?

Sir J. Young Wilding.

Miss Gr. You had this story from him?

Sir J. I had.

Miss Gr. From Wilding!—That is amazing.

Sir J. Oh ho! what, you are confounded at last! and no evasion, no subterfuge, no—

Miss Gr. Look ye, Sir James; what you can mean by this strange story, and very extraordinary behaviour, it is impossible for me to conceive; but if it is meant as an artifice to palliate your infidelity to me, less pains would have answered your purpose.

Sir J. Oh, Madam, I know you are provided.

Miss Gr. Matchless insolence! As you can't expect that I should be prodigiously pleased with the subject of this visit, you won't be surprised at my wishing it as short as possible.

Sir J. I don't wonder you feel pain at my presence; but you may rest secure you will have no interruption for me; and I really think it would be pity to part two people so exactly formed for each other. Your ladyship's servant. [Going.]—But, Madam, though your sex secures you from any farther resentment, yet the present object of your favour may have something to fear.

[Exit.]

Miss Gr. Very well. Now, my dear, I hope you will acknowledge the prudence of my plan. To what a pretty condition I must have been reduced, if my hopes had rested upon one lover alone!

Miss God. But you are sure that your method to multiply may not be the means to reduce the number of your slaves?

Miss Gr. Impossible!—Why, can't you discern that this flax of Sir James Elliot's is a mere fetch to favour his retreat?

Miss God. And you never saw Wilding?

Miss Gr. Never.

Miss God. There is some mystery in this. I have, too, here in my hand, another mortification that you must endure.

Miss Gr. Of what kind?

Miss God. A little allied to the last; it is from the military spark you met this morning.

Miss Gr. What are the contents?

Miss God. Only a formal declaration of love.

Miss Gr. Why, you did not see him.

Miss God. But it seems he did me.

Miss Gr. Might I peruse it?—"Battles—no wounds so fatal—cannon-balls—Cupid—spring a mine—cruelty—die on a counterscarp—eyes—artillery—death—the stranger." It is addressed to you.

Miss God. I told you so.

Miss Gr. You will pardon me, my dear; but I really can't compliment you upon the supposition of a conquest at my expense.

Miss God. That would be enough to make me vain: but why do you think it was so impossible?

Miss Gr. And do you positively want a reason?

Miss God. Positively.

Miss Gr. Why, then, I shall refer you for an answer to a faithful councillor and most accomplished critic.

Miss God. Who may that be?

Miss Gr. The mirror upon your toilet.

Miss God. Perhaps you may differ in judgment.

Miss Gr. Why, can glasses flatter?

Miss God. I can't say I think that necessary.

Miss Gr. Saucy enough!—But come, child, don't let us quarrel upon so whimsical an occasion; time will explain the whole. You will favour me with your opinion of young Wilding at my window.

Miss God. I attend you.

Miss Gr. You will forgive me, my dear, the little hint I dropp'd; it was meant merely to serve you; for indeed, child, there is no quality so insufferable in a young woman as self-conceit and vanity.

Miss God. You are most prodigiously obliging.

Miss Gr. I'll follow you, Miss. [Exit Miss GODFREY.] Pert thing!—She grows immoderately ugly. I always thought her awkward, but she is now an absolute fright.

Miss God. [Within.] Miss, Miss Grantam, your hero's at hand.

Miss Gr. I come.

Miss God. As I live, the very individual stranger!

Miss Gr. No, sure!—Oh Lord, let me have a peep.

Miss God. It is he, it is he, it is he!

Enter OLD WILDING, YOUNG WILDING, and PAPILLION.

O. Wild. There, Marquis, you must pardon me; for though Paris be more compact, yet surely London covers a much greater quantity.—Oh, Jack, look at that corner-house; how d'ye like it?

Y. Wild. Very well; but I don't see any thing extraordinary.

O. Wild. I wish, though, you were the master of what it contains.

Y. Wild. What may that be, Sir?

O. Wild. The mistress, you rogue you: a fine girl, and an immense fortune; ay, and a prudent, sensible wench into the bargain.

Y. Wild. Time enough yet, Sir.

O. Wild. I don't see that: you are, lad, the last of our race, and I should be glad to see some probability of its continuance.

Y. Wild. Suppose, Sir, your were to repeat your endeavours; you have cordially my consent.

O. Wild. No; rather too late in life for that experiment.

Y. Wild. Why, Sir, would you recommend a condition to me, that you disapprove yourself?

O. Wild. Why, sirrah, I have done my duty to the public and my family, by producing you: now, Sir, it is incumbent on you to discharge your debt.

Y. Wild. In the college cant, I shall beg leave to tick a little longer.

O. Wild. Why, then, to be serious, son, this is the very business I wanted to talk with you about. In a word, I wish you married; and by providing the lady of that mansion for the purpose, I have proved myself both a father and a friend.

Y. Wild. Far be it from me to question your care; yet some preparation for so important a change—

O. Wild. Oh, I will allow you a week.

Y. Wild. A little more knowledge of the world.

O. Wild. That you may study at leisure.

Y. Wild. Now all Europe is in arms, my design was to serve my country abroad.

O. Wild. You will be full as useful to it by recruiting her subjects at home.

Y. Wild. You are then resolved?

O. Wild. Fixed.

Y. Wild. Positively?

O. Wild. Peremptorily.

Y. Wild. No prayers—

O. Wild. Can move me.

Y. Wild. How the deuce shall I get out of this toil? [Aside.]—But suppose, Sir, there should be an insurmountable objection?

O. Wild. Oh, leave the reconciling that to me; I am an excellent casuist.

Y. Wild. But I say, Sir, if it should be impossible to obey your commands?

O. Wild. Impossible!—I don't understand you.

Y. Wild. Oh, Sir!—but on my knees first let me crave your pardon.

O. Wild. Pardon! for what?

Y. Wild. I fear I have lost all title to your future favour.

O. Wild. Which way?

Y. Wild. I have done a deed—

O. Wild. Let's hear it.

Y. Wild. At Abingdon, in the county of Berks.

O. Wild. Well?

Y. Wild. I am.

O. Wild. What?

Y. Wild. Already married.

O. Wild. Married!

Pap. Married!

Y. Wild. Married.

O. Wild. And without my consent?

Y. Wild. Compelled; fatally forced. Oh, Sir, did you but know all the circumstances of my sad, sad story, your rage would soon convert itself to pity.

O. Wild. What an unlucky event!—but rise, and let me hear it all.

Y. Wild. The shame and confusion I now feel, render that task at present impossible: I must therefore rely for the relation on the good offices of this faithful friend.

Pap. Me, Sir! I never heard one word of the matter.

O. Wild. Come, Marquis, favour me with the particulars.

Pap. Upon my vard, sare, dis affair has so shock me, dat I am almost as incapable to tell de tale as your son.—[To YOUNG WILDING.]—Dry-a your tears. What can I say, Sir.

Y. Wild. Any thing.—Oh!—[Seems to weep.]

Pap. You see, sare.

O. Wild. Your kind concern at the misfortunes of my family calls for the most grateful acknowledgment.

Pap. Dis is great misfortunes, sans doute.

O. Wild. But if you, a stranger, are thus affected, what must a father feel?

Pap. Oh, beaucoup, a great deal more.

O. Wild. But since the evil is without a remedy, let us know the worst at once. Well, Sir, at Abingdon?

Pap. Yes, at Abingdon.

O. Wild. In the county of Berks?

Pap. Dat is right, in the county of Berks.

Y. Wild. Oh, oh!

O. Wild. Ah, Jack, Jack! are all my hopes then—Though I dread to ask, yet it must be known; who is the girl, pray, Sir?

Pap. De girl, Sir—[Aside to YOUNG WILDING.]—Who shall I say?

Y. Wild. Any body.

Pap. For de girl, I can't say upon my vard.

O. Wild. Her condition?

Pap. Pas grande condition: dat is to be sure. But dere is no help—[Aside to YOUNG WILDING.]—Sir, I am quite a-ground.

O. Wild. Yes, I read my shame in his reserve: some artful hussy.

Pap. Dat may be. Vat you call hussy?

O. Wild. Or perhaps some common creature. But I'm prepared to hear the worst.

Pap. Have you no mercy?

Y. Wild. I'll step to your relief, Sir.

Pap. O lord, a happy deliverance.

Y. Wild. Though it is almost death for me to speak, yet it would be infamous to let the reputation of the lady suffer by my silence. She is, Sir, of an ancient house and unblemished character.

O. Wild. That is something.

Y. Wild. And though her fortune may not be equal to the warm wishes of a fond father, yet—

O. Wild. Her name?

Y. Wild. Miss Lydia Sybthorp.

O. Wild. Sybthorp—I never heard of the name.—But proceed.

Y. Wild. The latter end of last long vacation, I went with Sir James Elliot to pass a few days at a new purchase of his near Abingdon. There, at an assembly, it was my chance to meet and dance with this lady.

O. Wild. Is she handsome?

Y. Wild. Oh, Sir, more beautiful—

O. Wild. Nay, no raptures; but go on.

Y. Wild. But to her beauty she adds politeness, affability, and discretion; unless she forfeited that character by fixing her affection on me.

O. Wild. Modestly observed.

Y. Wild. I was deterred from a public declaration of my passion, dreading the scantiness of her fortune would prove an objection to you. Some private interviews she permitted.

O. Wild. Was that so decent?—But love and prudence, madness and reason.

Y. Wild. One fatal evening, the twentieth of September, if I mistake not, we were in a retired room, innocently exchanging mutual vows, when her father, whom we expected to sup abroad, came suddenly upon us. I had just time to conceal myself in a closet.

O. Wild. What, unobserved by him?

Y. Wild. Entirely. But as my ill stars would have it, a cat, of whom my wife is vastly fond, had a few days before lodged a litter of kittens in the same place; I unhappily trod upon one of the brood; which so provoked the implacable mother, that she flew at me with the fury of a tiger.

O. Wild. I have observed those creatures very fierce in defence of their young.

Pap. I shall hate a cat as long as I live.

Y. Wild. The noise roused the old gentleman's attention: he opened the door, and there discovered your son.

Pap. Unlucky.

Y. Wild. I rushed to the door; but fatally my foot slipt at the top of the stairs, and down I came tumbling to the bottom; the pistol in my hand went off by accident; this alarmed her three brothers in the parlour, who with all their servants, rushed with united force upon me.

O. Wild. And so surprised you!

Y. Wild. No, Sir; with my sword I for some time made a gallant defence, and should have inevitably escaped, but a rawboned, overgrown, clumsy cook-wench, struck at my sword with a kitchen-poker, broke it in two, and compelled me to surrender at discretion; the consequence of which is obvious enough.

O. Wild. Natural. The lady's reputation, your condition, her beauty, your love, all combined to make marriage an unavoidable measure.

Y. Wild. May I hope, then, you rather think me unfortunate than culpable?

O. Wild. Why, your situation is a sufficient excuse: all I blame you for, is, your keeping it a secret from me. With Miss Grantam I shall make an awkward figure; but the best apology is the truth: I'll hasten and explain it to her all—Oh, Jack, Jack, this is a mortifying business.

Y. Wild. Most melancholy.

[Exit OLD WILDING.]

Pap. I am amazed, Sir, that you have so carefully concealed this transaction from me.

Y. Wild. Hey-day; what, do you believe it too?

Pap. Believe it! why, is not the story of the marriage true?

Y. Wild. Not a syllable.

Pap. And the cat, and the pistol, and the poker?

Y. Wild. All invention. And were you really taken in?

Pap. Lord, Sir, how was it possible to avoid it?—Mercy on us! what a collection of circumstances have you crowded together!

Y. Wild. Genius; the mere effects of genius, Papillion. But to deceive you who so thoroughly know me!

Pap. But to prevent that for the future, could you not just give your humble servant a hint when you are bent upon bouncing. Besides, Sir, if you recollect your fixed resolution to reform—

Y. Wild. Ay, as to matter of fancy, the mere sport and frolic of invention; but in case of necessity—why, Miss Godfrey was at stake, and I was forced to use all my finesse!

Enter a SERVANT.

Serv. Two letters, Sir.

[Exit.

Pap. There are two things, in my conscience, my master will never want; a prompt lie, and a ready excuse for telling of it.

[Aside.

Y. Wild. Hum! business begins to thicken upon us: a challenge from Sir James Elliot, and a rendezvous from the pretty Miss Godfrey. They shall both be observed, but in their order; therefore the lady first. Let me see—I have not been twenty hours in town, and I have already got a challenge, a mistress, and a wife; now if I can but get engaged in a chancery suit, I shall have my hands pretty full of employment. Come, Pappillon, we have no time to be idle. [Exeunt.

SCENE III.—An Apartment in MISS GRANTAM'S House.

Enter SERVANT, conducting in OLD WILDING.

Ser. My lady, Sir, will be at home immediately: Sir James Elliot is in the next room waiting her return.

O. Wild. Pray, honest friend, will you tell Sir James that I beg the favour of a word with him? [Exit SERVANT.] This unthinking boy! Half the purpose of my life has been to plan this scheme for his happiness, and in one heedless hour has he mangled all.

Enter SIR JAMES ELLIOT.

Sir, I ask your pardon; but upon so interesting a subject I hope you will excuse my intrusion. Pray, Sir, of what credit is the family of the Sybthorps in Berkshire?

Sir J. Sir?

O. Wild. I don't mean as to property; that I am not so solicitous about; but as to their character. Do they live in reputation? Are they respected in the neighbourhood?

Sir J. The family of the Sybthorps!

O. Wild. Of the Sybthorps.

Sir J. Really I don't know, Sir.

O. Wild. Not know!

Sir J. No; it is the very first time I have heard of the name.

O. Wild. How steadily he denies it! Well done, baronet! I find Jack's account was a just one. [Aside.] Pray, Sir James, recollect yourself.

Sir J. It will be to no purpose.

O. Wild. Come, Sir, your motive for this affected ignorance is a generous but unnecessary proof of your friendship for my son; but I know the whole affair.

Sir J. What affair?

O. Wild. Jack's marriage.

Sir J. What Jack?

O. Wild. My son Jack.

Sir J. Is he married?

O. Wild. Is he married? why you know he is.

Sir J. Not I, upon my honour.

O. Wild. Nay, that is going a little too far; but to remove all your scruples at once, he has owned it himself.

Sir J. He has!

O. Wild. Ay, ay, to me. Every circumstance; going to your new purchase at Abingdon—meeting Lydia Sybthorp at the assembly—their private interviews—surprised by the father—pistol—poker—and marriage; in short, every particular.

Sir J. And this account you had from your son?

O. Wild. From Jack; not two hours ago.

Sir J. I wish you joy, Sir.

O. Wild. Not much of that, I believe.

Sir J. Why, Sir, does the marriage displease you?

O. Wild. Doubtless.

Sir J. Then I fancy you may make yourself easy.

O. Wild. Why so?

Sir J. You have got, Sir, the most prudent daughter-in-law in the British dominions.

O. Wild. I am happy to hear it.

Sir J. For, though she mayn't have brought you much, I'm sure she'll not cost you a farthing.

O. Wild. Ay; exactly Jack's account.

Sir J. She'll be easily jointured.

O. Wild. Justice shall be done to her.

Sir J. No provision necessary for young children.

O. Wild. No, Sir! why not?—I can tell you, if she answers your account, not the daughter of a duke—

Sir J. Ha, ha, ha, ha!

O. Wild. You are merry, Sir.

Sir J. What an unaccountable fellow!

O. Wild. Sir!

Sir J. I beg your pardon, Sir. But with regard to this marriage—

O. Wild. Well, Sir!

Sir J. I take the whole history to be neither more or less than an absolute fable.

O. Wild. How, Sir?

Sir J. Even so.

O. Wild. Why, Sir, do you think my son would dare to impose upon me?

Sir J. He would dare to impose upon any body. Don't I know him?

O. Wild. What do you know?

Sir J. I know, Sir, that his narratives gain him more applause than credit; and that, whether from constitution or habit, there is no believing a syllable he says.

O. Wild. Oh, mighty well, Sir!—He wants to turn the tables upon Jack.—But it won't do; you are forestalled: your novels wont pass upon me.

Sir J. Sir!

O. Wild. Nor is the character of my son to be blasted with the breath of a bouncer.

Sir J. What is this?

O. Wild. No, no, Mr. Mandeville, it wont do; you are as well known here as in your own county of Hereford.

Sir J. Mr. Wilding, but that I am sure this extravagant behaviour owes its rise to some impudent impositions of your son, your age would scarce prove your protection.

O. Wild. Nor, Sir, but that I know my boy equal to the defence of his own honour, should he want a protector in this arm, withered and impotent as you may think it.

Enter MISS GRANTAM.

Miss Gr. Bless me, gentlemen, what is the meaning of this?

Sir J. No more at present, Sir: I have another demand upon your son; we'll settle the whole together.

O. Wild. I am sure he will do you justice.

Miss Gr. How, Sir James Elliot! I flattered myself that you had finished your visits here, Sir. Must I be the eternal object of your outrage? not only insulted in my own person, but in that of my friends! pray, Sir, what right—

O. Wild. Madam, I ask your pardon; a disagreeable occasion brought me here: I come, Madam, to renounce all hopes of being nearer allied to you, my son unfortunately being married already.

Miss Gr. Married!

Sir J. Yes, Madam, to a lady in the clouds: and because I have refused to acknowledge her family, this old gentleman has behaved in a manner very inconsistent with his usual politeness.

O. Wild. Sir, I thought this affair was to be reserved for another occasion; but you it seems—

Miss Gr. Oh, is that the business!—Why, I begin to be afraid that we are here a little in the wrong, Mr. Wilding.

O. Wild. Madam!

Miss Gr. Your son has just confirmed Sir James Elliot's opinion, at a conference under Miss Godfrey's window.

O. Wild. Is it possible?

Miss Gr. Most true; and assigned two most whimsical motives for the unaccountable tale.

O. Wild. What can they be?

Miss Gr. An aversion for me, whom he has seen but once; and an affection for Miss Godfrey, whom I am almost sure he never saw in his life.

O. Wild. You amaze me.

Miss Gr. Indeed, Mr. Wilding, your son is a most extraordinary youth; he has finely perplexed us all. I think, Sir James, you have a small obligation to him.

Sir J. Which I shall take care to acknowledge the first opportunity.

O. Wild. You have my consent. An abandoned profligate! was his father a proper subject for his—But I discard him.

Miss Gr. Nay, now, gentlemen, you are rather too warm; I can't think Mr. Wilding bad-hearted at the bottom. This is a levity—

O. Wild. How, Madam, a levity?

Miss Gr. Take my word for it, no more; inflamed into habit by the approbation of his juvenile friends. Will you submit his punishment to me? I think I have the means in my hands, both to satisfy your resentments, and accomplish his cure into the bargain.

Sir J. I have no quarrel to him, but for the ill offices he has done me with you.

Miss Gr. D'ye hear, Mr. Wilding? I am afraid my opinion with Sir James must cement the general peace.

O. Wild. Madam, I submit to any—

Enter a SERVANT.

Ser. Mr. Wilding, to wait upon you, Madam.

[Exit.]

Miss Gr. He is punctual, I find. Come, good folks, you all act under my direction. You, Sir, will get from your son, by what means you think fit, the real truth of the Abingdon business. You must likewise seemingly consent to his marriage with Miss Godfrey, whom I shrewdly suspect he has, by some odd accident mistaken for me; the lady herself shall appear at your call. Come, Sir James, you will withdraw. I intend to produce another performer, who will want a little instruction. Kitty!

Enter KITTY.

Let John show Mr. Wilding in to his father:

then come to my dressing-room: I have a short scene to give you to study. [Exit KITTY.]—The girl is lively, and I warrant will do her character justice. Come, Sir James. Nay, no ceremony; we must be as busy as bees. [Exeunt.]

O. Wild. This strange boy!—But I must command my temper.

Y. Wild. [Speaks as he enters.]—People to speak with me! see what they want, Papillion.—My father here! that's unlucky enough.

O. Wild. Ha, Jack, what brings you here?

Y. Wild. Why, I thought it my duty to wait upon Miss Grantam, in order to make her some apology for the late unfortunate—

O. Wild. Well, now, that is prudently as well as politely done.

Y. Wild. I am happy to meet, Sir, with your approbation.

O. Wild. I have been thinking, Jack, about my daughter-in-law: as the affair is public, it is not decent to let her continue long at her father's.

Y. Wild. Sir!

O. Wild. Would it not be right to send for her home?

Y. Wild. Doubtless, Sir.

O. Wild. I think so. Why then, to-morrow my chariot shall fetch her.

Y. Wild. The devil it shall! [Aside.]—Not quite so soon, if you please, Sir.

O. Wild. No! why not?

Y. Wild. The journey may be dangerous in her present condition.

O. Wild. What's the matter with her?

Y. Wild. She is big with child, Sir.

O. Wild. An audacious—Big with child! that is unfortunate. But, however, an easy carriage, and short stages, can't hurt her.

Y. Wild. Pardon me, Sir, I dare not trust her: she is six months gone.

O. Wild. Nay, then, there may be danger indeed. But should not I write to her father, just to let him know that you have discovered the secret?

Y. Wild. By all means, Sir, it will make him extremely happy.

O. Wild. Why then, I will about it instantly. Pray, how do you direct to him?

Y. Wild. Abingdon, Berkshire.

O. Wild. True; but his address?

Y. Wild. You need not trouble yourself, Sir: I shall write by this post to my wife, and will send your letter inclosed.

O. Wild. Ay, ay, that will do. [Going.]

Y. Wild. So, I have parried that thrust.

O. Wild. Though, upon second thoughts, Jack, that will rather look too familiar for an introductory letter.

Y. Wild. Sir!

O. Wild. And these country gentlemen are full of punctilios—No, I'll send him a letter apart; so give me his direction.

Y. Wild. You have it, Sir.

O. Wild. Ay, but his name: I have been so hurried that I have entirely forgot it.

Y. Wild. I am sure so have I. [Aside.]—His name—his name, Sir—Hopkins.

O. Wild. Hopkins!

Y. Wild. Yes, Sir.

O. Wild. That is not the same name that you gave me before: that, if I recollect, was either Sydthorp or Sybthorp.

Y. Wild. You are right, Sir; that is his paternal appellation: but the name of Hopkins he took for an estate of his mother's; so he is indiscriminately called Hopkins or Sybthorp: and now I recollect I have his letter in my pocket—he signs himself Sybthorp Hopkins.

O. Wild. There is no end of this: I must stop him at once. Hark ye, Sir: I think you are called my son?

Y. Wild. I hope, Sir, you have no reason to doubt it.

O. Wild. And look upon yourself as a gentleman?

Y. Wild. In having the honour of descending from you.

O. Wild. And that you think a sufficient pretension?

Y. Wild. Sir—pray, Sir—

O. Wild. And by what means do you imagine your ancestors obtained that distinguishing title? by their pre-eminence in virtue, I suppose.

Y. Wild. Doubtless, Sir.

O. Wild. And has it never occurred to you, that what was gained by honour might be lost by infamy?

Y. Wild. Perfectly, Sir.

O. Wild. Are you to learn what redress even the imputation of a lie demands; and that nothing less than the life of the adversary can extinguish the affront?

Y. Wild. Doubtless, Sir.

O. Wild. Then how dare you call yourself a gentleman? you, whose life has been one continued scene of fraud and falsity! And would nothing content you but making me a partner in your infamy? within this hour my life was nearly sacrificed in defence of your fame: but perhaps that was your intention; and the story of your marriage merely calculated to send me out of the world, as a grateful return for bringing you into it.

Y. Wild. For Heaven's sake, Sir!

O. Wild. I am now deaf to your delusions.

Y. Wild. But hear me, Sir, I own the Abingdon business an absolute fiction.

O. Wild. And how dare you—

Y. Wild. I crave but a moment's audience.

O. Wild. Go on.

Y. Wild. Previous to the communication of your intention for me, I accidentally met with a lady, whose charms—

O. Wild. So!—what, here's another marriage trumped out! but that is a stale device. And, pray, Sir, what place does this lady inhabit? come, come, go on; you have a fertile invention, and this is a fine opportunity. Well, Sir, and this charming lady, residing, I suppose, in nubibus—

Y. Wild. No, Sir; in London.

O. Wild. Indeed!

Y. Wild. Nay, more, and at this instant in this house.

O. Wild. And her name—

Y. Wild. Godfrey.

O. Wild. The friend of Miss Grantam?

Y. Wild. The very same, Sir.

O. Wild. Have you spoke to her?

Y. Wild. Parted from her not ten minutes ago; nay, am here by her appointment.

O. Wild. Has she favoured your address?

Y. Wild. Time, Sir, and your approbation, will, I hope.

O. Wild. Look ye, Sir, as there is some little probability in this story, I shall think it worth further inquiry. To be plain with you, I know

Miss Godfrey; am intimate with her family; and though you deserve but little from me, I will endeavour to aid your intention. But if, in the progress of this affair, you practise any of your usual arts; if I discover the least falsehood, the least duplicity; remember, you have lost a father.

Y. Wild. I shall submit without a murmur.

[Exit OLD WILDING.]

Enter PAPILLION.

Now, Papillion, I have news for you. My father has got to the bottom of the whole Abingdon business.

Pap. The deuce!

Y. Wild. We parted this moment. Such a scene!

Pap. And what was the issue?

Y. Wild. Happy beyond my hopes. Not only an act of oblivion, but a promise to plead my cause with the fair.

Pap. With Miss Godfrey!

Y. Wild. Who else?—He is now with her in another room.

Pap. And there is no—you understand me—in all this?

Y. Wild. No, no; that is all over now—my reformation is fixed.

Pap. As a weather-cock.

Y. Wild. Here comes my father.

Enter OLD WILDING.

O. Wild. Well, Sir, I find in this last article you have condescended to tell me the truth: the young lady is not averse to the union: but in order to fix so mutable a mind, I have drawn up a slight contract, which you are both to sign.

Y. Wild. With transport.

O. Wild. I will introduce Miss Godfrey.

[Exit.

Y. Wild. Did not I tell you, Papillion?

Pap. This is amazing, indeed!

Y. Wild. Am not I happy, fortunate?—But they come.

Enter OLD WILDING and MISS GODFREY.

O. Wild. If, Madam, he has not the highest sense of the great honour you do him, I shall cease to regard him.—There, Sir, make your own acknowledgments to that lady.

Y. Wild. Sir!

O. Wild. This is more than you merit; but let your future behaviour testify your gratitude.

Y. Wild. Papillion! Madam! Sir!

O. Wild. What, is the puppy petrified!—Why don't you go up to the lady?

Y. Wild. Up to the lady!—That lady!

O. Wild. That lady!—to be sure. What other lady?—To Miss Godfrey.

Y. Wild. That lady Miss Godfrey?

O. Wild. What is all this?—Hark ye, Sir, I see what you are at; but no trifling; I'll be no more the dupe of your double detestable—Recollect my last resolution; this instant your hand to the contract, or tremble at the consequence.

Y. Wild. Sir, that, I hope, is—might not I—to be sure—

O. Wild. No further evasions! There, Sir.

Y. Wild. Heigh ho! [Signs it.

O. Wild. Very well. Now, Madam, your name, if you please.

Y. Wild. Papillion, do you know who she is?

Pap. That's a question, indeed! don't you, Sir!

Y. Wild. Not I, as I hope to be saved.

Enter a SERVANT.

Serv. A young lady begs to speak with Mr. Wilding.

Y. Wild. With me?

Miss God. A young lady with Mr. Wilding!

Serv. Seems distressed, Madam, and extremely pressing for admittance.

Miss God. Indeed; there may be something in this! You must permit me, Sir, to pause a little: who knows but a prior claim may prevent—

O. Wild. How, Sir, who is this lady?

Y. Wild. It is impossible for me to divine, Sir.

O. Wild. You know nothing of her?

Y. Wild. How should I?

O. Wild. You hear, Madam.

Miss God. I presume your son can have no objection to the lady's appearance.

Y. Wild. Not in the least, Madam.

Miss God. Show her in, John. [Exit SERV.]

O. Wild. No, Madam, I don't think there is the least room for suspecting him: he can't be so abandoned as to—But she is here. Upon my word, a sightly woman.

Enter KITTY as MISS SYBTHORP.

Kit. Where is he?—Oh, let me throw my arms—my life, my—

Y. Wild. Hey-day!

Kit. And could you leave me? and for so long a space? think how the tedious time has lagged along.

O. Wild. Madam!

Kit. But we are met at last, and now will part no more.

Y. Wild. The deuce we wont!

Kit. What, not one kind look; no tender word to hail our second meeting!

Y. Wild. What the devil is all this?

Kit. Are all your oaths, your protestations, come to this? have I deserved such treatment? quitted my father's house, left all my friends, and wandered here alone in search of thee, thou first, last, only object of my love.

O. Wild. To what can all this tend? Hark ye, Sir, unriddle this mystery.

Y. Wild. Davus, non Ædipus, sum. It is beyond me, I confess. Some lunatic escaped from her keeper, I suppose.

Kit. Am I disowned then, contemned, slighted?

O. Wild. Hold; let me inquire into this matter a little. Pray, Madam—You seem to be pretty familiar here.—Do you know this gentleman?

Kit. Too well.

O. Wild. His name?

Kit. Wilding.

O. Wild. So far she is right. Now yours, if you please?

Kit. Wilding.

Omnes. Wilding!

O. Wild. And how came you by that name, pray?

Kit. Most lawfully, Sir: by the sacred band, the holy tie that made us one.

O. Wild. What, married to him!

Kit. Most true.

Omnes. How!

Y. Wild. Sir, may I never—

O. Wild. Peace, monster!—One question more: your maiden name?

Kit. Sybthorp.

O. Wild. Lydia, from Abingdon, in the county of Berks?

Kit. The same.

O. Wild. As I suspected. So then the whole story is true, and the monster is married at last.

Y. Wild. Me, Sir! by all that's—

O. Wild. Eternal dumbness seize thee, measureless liar.

Y. Wild. If not me, hear this gentleman. Marquis—

Pap. Not I; I'll be drawn into some of your scrapes: it is a pit of your own digging; and so get out as well as you can. Meantime I'll shift for myself. [Exit.]

O. Wild. What evasion now, monster?

Miss God. Deceiver!

O. Wild. Liar!

Miss God. Impostor!

Y. Wild. Why, this is a general combination to distract me; but I will be heard. Sir, you are grossly imposed upon: the low contriver of this woman's shallow artifice I shall soon find means to discover: and as to you, Madam, with whom I have been suddenly surprised into a contract, I most solemnly declare this is the first time I ever set eyes on you.

O. Wild. Amazing confidence! did not I bring her at your own request?

Y. Wild. No.

Miss God. Is not this your own letter?

Y. Wild. No.

Kit. Am not I your wife?

Y. Wild. No.

O. Wild. Did not you own it to me?

Y. Wild. Yes—that is—no, no!

Kit. Hear me.

Y. Wild. No.

Miss God. Answer me.

Y. Wild. No.

O. Wild. Have not I—

Y. Wild. No, no, no. Zounds! you are all mad; and if I stay, I shall catch the infection. [Exit.]

Enter SIR JAMES ELLIOT and MISS GRANTAM

Omnes. Ha, ha, ha!

Miss Gr. Finely performed.

O. Wild. You have kept your promise, and I thank you, Madam.

Miss Gr. My medicine was somewhat rough, Sir; but in desperate cases, you know—

O. Wild. If his cure is completed, he will gratefully acknowledge the cause; if not, the punishment comes far short of his crimes. It is needless to pay you any compliments, Sir James; with that lady you can't fail to be happy. I sha'n't venture to hint a scheme I have greatly at heart, till we have undeniable proofs of the success of our operations. To the ladies, indeed, no character is so dangerous as that of a liar:

They in the fairest fames can fix a flaw,
And vanquish females whom they never saw.

TANCRED AND SIGISMUNDA:

A TRAGEDY,

IN FIVE ACTS.

BY JAMES THOMSON, Esq.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

TANCRED, Count of Lecce.

MATTEO SIFFREDI, Lord High Chancellor of Sicily.

EARL OSMOND, Lord High Constable of Sicily.

RODOLPHO, Friend to Tancred, and Captain of the Guards.

SIGISMUNDA, Daughter of Siffredi.

LAURA, Sister of Rodolpho, and Friend to Sigismunda.

Barons, Officers, Guards, &c.

SCENE.—The City of PALERMO in Italy.

PROLOGUE.

BOLD is the man! who, in this nicer age,
Presumes to tread the chaste, corrected stage,
Now, with gay tinsel arts, we can no more
Conceal the want of nature's sterling ore.
Our spells are vanish'd, broke our magic wand,
That us'd to waft you over sea and land.
Before your light the fairy people fade,
The demons fly—the ghost itself is laid.
In vain of martial scenes the loud alarms,
The mighty prompter thundering out to arms,
The playhouse posse clattering from afar,
The close-wedged battle, and the din of war.
Now, even the senate seldom we convene;
The yawning fathers nod behind the scene.
Your taste rejects the glittering, false sublime,
To sigh in metaphor, and die in rhyme.
High rant is tumbled from his gallery throne;
Description, dreams—nay, similes are gone.

What shall we then? to please you how devise,
Whose judgment sits not in your ears nor eyes?
Thrice happy, could we catch great Shakspeare's art,
To trace the deep recesses of the heart:
His simple, plain sublime, to which is given
To strike the soul with darted flame from Heaven:

Could we awake soft Otway's tender wo.
The pomp of verse and golden lines of Rowe.
We to your hearts apply: let them attend;
Before their silent, candid bar we bend.
If warm'd they listen, 'tis our noblest praise:
If cold, they wither all the Muse's bays.

VOL. I. . . . 5 E 65

ACT I.

SCENE I.—The Palace.

Enter SIGISMUNDA and LAURA.

Sig. Ah, fatal day to Sicily! the king
Touches his last moments!

Laura. So 'tis fear'd.

Sig. The death of those distinguish'd by their station,

But by their virtue more, awakes the mind
To solemn dread, and strikes a saddening awe:
Not that we grieve for them, but for ourselves,
Left to the toil of life—And yet the best
Are, by the playful children of this world,
At once forgot, as they had never been.
Laura, 'tis said, the heart is sometimes charged
With a prophetic sadness; such, methinks,
Now hangs on mine. The king's approaching death

Suggests a thousand fears. What troubles thence

May throw the state once more into confusion,
What sudden changes in my father's house
May rise, and part me from my dearest Tancred,
Alarms my thoughts.

Laura. The fears of love-sick fancy!
Perversely busy to torment itself.

But be assured, your father's steady friendship,
Join'd to a certain genius, that commands,
Not kneels to fortune, will support and cherish,
Here in the public eye of Sicily,
This, I may call him, his adopted son,
The noble Tancred, form'd to all his virtues.

769

Sig. Ah, form'd to charm his daughter!—this fair morn
Has tempted far the chase. Is he not yet Return'd?

Laura. No.—When your father to the king, Who now expiring lies, was call'd in haste, He sent each way his messengers to find him; With such a look of ardour and impatience, As if this near event was to Count Tancred Of more importance than I comprehend.

Sig. There lies, my Laura, o'er my Tancred's birth

A cloud I cannot pierce. With princely accost, Nay, with respect, which oft I have observ'd, Stealing at times submissive o'er his features, In Belmont's woods my father rear'd this youth—

Ah, woods! where first my artless bosom learn'd The sighs of love.—He gives him out the son Of an old friend, a baron of Apulia, Who in the late crusado bravely fell. But then 'tis strange; is all his family As well as father dead? and all his friends, Except my sire, the generous, good Siffredi? Had he a mother, sister, brother left, The last remain of kindred; with what pride, What rapture, might they fly o'er earth and sea,

To claim this rising honour of their blood! This bright unknown! this all-accomplish'd youth!

Who charms too much the heart of Sigismunda! Laura, perhaps your brother knows him better, The friend and partner of his freest hours. What says Rodolpho? Does he truly credit This story of his birth?

Laura. He has sometimes, Like you, his doubts; yet, when maturely weigh'd, Believes it true. As for Lord Tancred's self, He never entertain'd the slightest thought That verg'd to doubt; but oft laments his state, By cruel fortune so ill pair'd to yours.

Sig. Merit like his, the fortune of the mind, Beggars all wealth—Then, to your brother, Laura. Laura, Of nothing else. How'er The talk begin, it ends with Sigismunda.

Their morning, noontide, and their evening walks,

Are full of you, and all the woods of Belmont Enamour'd with your name—

Sig. Away, my friend, You flatter—yet the dear delusion charms.

Laura. No, Sigismunda, 'tis the strictest truth, Nor half the truth, I tell you. Even with fondness

My brother talks for ever of the passion, That fires young Tancred's breast. So much it strikes him,

He praises love as if he were a lover. He blames the false pursuits of vagrant youth, Calls them gay folly, a mistaken struggle Against best judging nature. Heaven, he says, In lavish'd bounty form'd the heart for love; In love included all the finer seeds Of honour, virtue, friendship, purest bliss—

Sig. Virtuous Rodolpho!

Laura. Then his pleasing theme He varies to the praises of your lover—

Sig. And what, my Laura, says he on the subject?

Laura. He says that, though he was not nobly born,

Nature has form'd him noble, generous, brave, Truly magnanimous, and warmly scorning Whatever bears the smallest taint of baseness; That every easy virtue is his own; Not learnt by painful labour, but inspir'd, Implanted in his soul.—Chiefly one charm He in his graceful character observes;

That though his passions burn with high impatience, And sometimes, from a noble heat of nature, Are ready to fly off; yet the least check Of ruling reason brings them back to temper, And gentle softness.

Sig. True! Oh, true, Rodolpho! Bless'd be thy kindred worth, for loving his! He is all warmth, all amiable fire, All quick, heroic ardour! temper'd soft With gentleness of heart, and manly reason! If virtue were to wear a human form, To light it with her dignity and flame, Then softening mix her smiles and tender graces;

Oh, she would choose the person of my Tancred! Go on, my friend, go on, and ever praise him; The subject knows no bounds, nor can I tire, While my breast trembles to that sweetest music!

The heart of woman tastes no truer joy, Is never flatter'd with such dear enchantment— 'Tis more than selfish vanity—as when She hears the praises of the man she loves—

Laura. Madam, your father comes.

Enter SIFFREDI.

Sif. [To an ATTENDANT as he enters.] Lord Tancred

Is found?

At. My lord, he quickly will be here. I scarce could keep before him, though he bid me

Speed on, to say he would attend your orders.

Sif. 'Tis well—retire—You too, my daughter, leave me.

Sig. I go, my father, but how fares the king?

Sif. He is no more. Gone to that awful state, Where kings the crown wear only of their virtues.

Sig. How bright must then be his!—This stroke is sudden;

He was this morning well, when to the chase Lord Tancred went.

Sif. 'Tis true. But at his years Death gives short notice—Drooping nature then, Without a gust of pain to shake it, falls.

His death, my daughter, was that happy period Which few attain. The duties of his day Were all discharg'd, and gratefully enjoy'd Its noblest blessings; calm as evening skies Was his pure mind, and lighted up with hopes That open heaven; when for his last long sleep Timely prepar'd, a lassitude of life, A pleasing weariness of mortal joy, Fell on his soul, and down he sunk to rest.

Oh, may my death be such!—He but one wish Left unfulfill'd, which was to see Count Tancred—

Sig. To see Count Tancred!—Pardon me, my lord—

Sif. For what, my daughter?—But, with such emotion,
Why did you start at mention of Count Tancred—

Sig. Nothing—I only hop'd the dying king
Might mean to make some generous just provision

For this worthy charge, this noble orphan.

Sif. And he has done it largely—Leave me now—

I want some private conference with Lord Tancred. [Exit SIGISMUNDA and LAURA.]

My doubts are but too true—If these old eyes
Can trace the marks of love, a mutual passion
Has seiz'd, I fear, my daughter and this prince,
My sovereign now—Should it be so? Ah, there,
There lurks a brooding tempest, that may shake
My long concerted scheme, to settle firm
The public peace and welfare, which the king
Has made the prudent basis of his will—
Away, unworthy views! you shall not tempt me!

Nor interest nor ambition shall seduce
My fix'd resolve—Perish the selfish thought,
Which our own good prefers to that of millions!
He comes, my king, unconscious of his fortune.

Enter TANCRED.

Tan. My Lord Siffredi, in your looks I read
Confirm'd, the mournful news that fly abroad
From tongue to tongue—We then, at last, have lost

The good old king?

Sif. Yes, we have lost a father!

The greatest blessing Heaven bestows on mortals,

And seldom found amidst these wiles of time.

A good, a worthy king!—Hear me, my Tancred,
And I will tell thee, in a few plain words,
How he deserv'd that best, that glorious title.

'Tis nought complex, 'tis clear as truth and virtue.

He lov'd his people, deem'd them all his children;
The good exalted, and depress'd the bad.

He spurnd the flattering crew, with scorn rejected

Their smooth advice that only means themselves,
Their schemes to aggravandize him into baseness;
Nor did he less disdain the secret breath,
The whisper'd tale, that blights a virtuous name.

He sought alone the good of those for whom
He was intrusted with the sovereign power:
Well knowing that a people, in their rights
And industry protected, living safe

Beneath the sacred shelter of the laws,
Encourag'd in their genius, arts, and labours,
And happy each as he himself deserves,
Are ne'er ungrateful. With an unsparing hand

They will for him provide: their filial love
And confidence are his unfailing treasure,
And every honest man his faithful guard.

Tan. A general face of grief o'erspreads the city.

I mark'd the people, as I hither came,
In crowds assembled, struck with silent sorrow,
And pouring forth the noblest praise of tears.

Those, whom remembrance of their former woes,
And long experience of the vain illusions
Of youthful hope, had into wise consent

And fear of change corrected, wrung their hands,
And, often casting up their eyes to heaven,

Gave sign of sad conjecture. Others show'd,
Athwart their grief, or real or affected,
A gleam of expectation, from what chance
A change might bring. A mingled murmur ran Along the streets; and from the lonely court
Of him who can no more assist their fortunes,
I saw the courtier-fry, with eager haste,
All hurrying to Constantia.

Sif. Noble youth!
I joy to hear from thee these just reflections,
Worthy of riper years—But if they seek Constantia, trust me, they mistake their course.

Tan. How! Is she not, my lord, the late king's sister,

Heir to the crown of Sicily? the last
Of our fam'd Norman line, and now our queen?

Sif. Tancred, 'tis true; she is the late king's sister,

The sole surviving offspring of that tyrant
William the Bad—so for his vices styl'd;
Who spilt much noble blood, and sore oppress'd
Th' exhausted land: whence grievous wars arose,

And many a dire convulsion shook the state.

When he, whose death Sicilia mourns to-day,
William, who has and well deserv'd the name
Of Good, succeeding to his father's throne,
Reliev'd his country's woes—But to return;

She is the late king's sister, born some months
After the tyrant's death, but not next heir.

Tan. You much surprise me—May I then presume

To ask who is?

Sif. Come nearer, noble Tancred,
Son of my care. I must, on this occasion,
Consult thy generous heart; which, when conducted

By rectitude of mind and honest virtues,
Gives better counsel than the hoary head—

Then know, there lives a prince, here in Palermo,

The lineal offspring of our famous hero,
Roger the First.

Tan. Great Heaven! how far remov'd
From that our mighty founder?

Sif. His great grandson:
Sprung from his eldest son, who died untimely,
Before his father.

Tan. Ha! the prince you mean,
Is he not Manfred's son? The generous, brave,
Unhappy Manfred! whom the tyrant William,
You just now mention'd, not content to spoil

Of his paternal crown, threw into fetters,
And infamously murder'd?

Sif. Yes, the same.

Tan. By Heavens, I joy to find our Norman reign,

The world's sole light amidst these barbarous ages,

Yet rears its head; and shall not, from the lance,

Pass to the feeble distaff.—But this prince,
Where has he lain conceal'd?

Sif. The late good king,
By noble pity mov'd, contriv'd to save him
From his dire father's unrelenting rage,
And had him rear'd in private, as became His birth and hopes, with high and princely nurture,

Till now, too young to rule a troubled state,
By civil broils most miserably torn,
He in his safe retreat has lain conceal'd,

His birth and fortune to himself unknown;
But when the dying king to me intrusted,
As to the chancellor of the realm, his will,
His successor he nam'd him.

Tan. Happy youth!
He then will triumph o'er his father's foes,
O'er haughty Osmond, and the tyrant's daughter.

Sif. Ay, that is what I dread—the heat of youth;

There lurks, I fear, perdition to the state.
I dread the horrors of rekindled war:
Though dead, the tyrant still is to be fear'd;
His daughter's party still is strong and numerous:
Her friend, Earl Osmond, constable of Sicily,
Experienc'd, brave, high-born, of mighty interest.
Better the prince and princess should by marriage Unite their friends, their interest, and their claims!

Then will the peace and welfare of the land
On a firm basis rise.

Tan. My Lord Siffredi,
If by myself I of this prince may judge,
That scheme will scarce succeed—Your prudent age

In vain will counsel, if the heart forbid it—
But wherefore fear? The right is clearly his;
And, under your direction, with each man
Of worth and steadfast loyalty to back
At once the king's appointment and his birthright,

There is no ground for fear. They have great odds,

Against th' astonish'd sons of violence,
Who fight with awful justice on their side.
All Sicily will rouse, all faithful hearts
Will range themselves around Prince Manfred's son.

For me, I here devote me to the service
Of this young prince; I every drop of blood
Will lose with joy, with transport, in his cause—
Pardon my warmth—but that, my lord, will never

To this decision come.—Then find the prince;
Lose not a moment to awaken in him
The royal soul. Perhaps he now, desponding,
Pines in a corner, and laments his fortune;
That in the narrower bounds of private life
He must confine his aims, those swelling virtues
Which from his noble father he inherits.

Sif. Perhaps, regardless, in the common babe
Of youth, he melts, in vanity and love.
But if the seeds of virtue grow within him,
I will awake a higher sense, a love
That grasps the loves and happiness of millions.

Tan. Why that surmise? Or should he love,
Siffredi,

I doubt not, it is nobly, which will raise
And animate his virtues—Oh, permit me
To plead the cause of youth—Their virtue oft,
In pleasure's soft enchantment lull'd awhile,
Forgets itself; it sleeps and gaily dreams,
Till great occasion rouse it; then, all flame,
It walks abroad, with heighten'd soul and vigour,
And by the change astonishes the world.
Even with a kind of sympathy, I feel
The joy that waits this prince; when all the powers,

Th' expanding heart can wish, of doing good;
Whatever swells ambition, or exalts
The human soul into divine emotions,
All crowd at once upon him.

Sif. Ah, my Tancred,

Nothing so easy as in speculation,
And at a distance seen, the course of honour,
A fair delightful champaign strew'd with flowers.
But when the practice comes; when our foud
passions,

Pleasure and pride, and self-indulgence, throw
Their magic dust around, the prospect roughens;
Then dreadful passes, craggy mountains rise,
Cliffs to be scal'd, and torrents to be stemm'd;
Then toil ensues, and perseverance stern;
And endless combats with our grosser sense,
Oft lost, and oft renew'd; and generous pain
For others felt; and, harder lesson still!
Our honest bliss for others sacrific'd;
And all the rugged task of virtue quells
The stoutest heart of common resolution,
Few get above this turbid scene of strife.
Few gain the summit, breathe that purest air,
That heavenly ether, which untroubled sees
The storm of vice and passion rage below.

Tan. Most true, my lord. But why thus augur ill?

You seem to doubt this prince. I know him not.
Yet, oh, methinks, my heart could answer for
him!

The juncture is so high, so strong the gale
That blows from Heaven, as through the deadest
soul

Might breathe the godlike energy of virtue.

Sif. Hear him, immortal shades of his great fathers!—

Forgive me, Sir, this trial of your heart.

Thou! thou, art he!

Tan. Siffredi!

Sif. Tancred, thou!

Thou art the man of all the many thousands
That toil upon the bosom of this isle,
By Heaven elected to command the rest,
To rule, protect them, and to make them happy!

Tan. Manfred my father! I the last support
Of the fam'd Norman line, that awes the world!
I, who this morning wander'd forth an orphan,
Outcast of all but thee, my second father!
Thus call'd to glory! to the first great lot
Of human-kind!—Oh, wonder-working hand,
That, in majestic silence, sways at will
The mighty movements of unbounded nature;
Oh, grant me, Heaven, the virtues to sustain
This awful burden of so many heroes!

Let me not be exalted into shame,
Set up the worthless pageant of vain grandeur!
Meantime I thank the justice of the king,
Who has my right bequeath'd me. Thee, Siffredi,

I thank thee—Oh, I ne'er enough can thank thee!

Yes, thou hast been—thou art—shalt be my father!

Thou shalt direct my unexperienc'd years,
Shalt be the ruling head, and I the hand.

Sif. It is enough for me—to see my sovereign
Assert his virtues, and maintain his honour.

Tan. I think, my lord, you said the king committed

To you his will. I hope it is not clogg'd
With any base conditions, any clause,
To tyrannize my heart, and to Constantia
Enslave my hand devoted to another.

The hint you just now gave of that alliance,
You must imagine, wakes my fear. But know,
In this alone I will not bear dispute,
Not even from thee, Siffredi!—Let the council

Be straight assembled, and the will there open'd :
Thence issue speedy orders to convene,
This day, ere noon, the senate: where those bar-

rons,
Who now are in Palermo, will attend,
To pay their ready homage to the king,
Their rightful king, who claims his native crown,
And will not be a king by deeds and parchments.

Sig. I go, my liege. But once again permit me

To tell you—Now, is the trying crisis,
That must determine of your future reign.
Oh, with heroic rigour watch your heart!
And to the sovereign duties of the king,
Th' unequal'd pleasures of a god on earth,
Submit the common joys, the common passions,
Nay, even the virtues of the private man.

Tan. Of that no more. They not oppose, but aid,

Invalidate, cherish, and reward each other,
The kind all-ruling wisdom is no tyrant.

[Exit SIFFREDDI.

Now, generous Sigismunda, comes my turn
To show my love was not of thine unworthy,
When fortune bade me blush to look to thee.
But what is fortune to the wish of love?
A miserable bankrupt! Oh, 'tis poor,
'Tis scanty all, what'er we can bestow!
The wealth of kings is wretchedness and want!
Quick, let me find her! taste that highest joy,
Th' exalted heart can know, the mix'd effusion
Of gratitude and love!—Behold she comes!

Enter SIGISMUNDA.

My fluttering soul was all on wing to find thee,
My love, my Sigismunda!

Sig. Oh, my Tancred!

Tell me, what means this mystery and gloom
That lowers around? Just now, involv'd in thought,

My father shot athwart me—You, my lord,
Seem strangely mov'd—I fear some dark event,
From the king's death, to trouble our repose,
That tender calm we in the woods of Belmont
So happily enjoy'd—Explain this hurry
What means it? Say.

Tan. It means that we are happy!

Beyond our most romantic wishes happy!

Sig. You but perplex me more.

Tan. It means, my fairest,

That thou art queen of Sicily; and I
The happiest of mankind! than monarch more!
Because with thee I can adorn my throne.
Manfred, who fell by tyrant William's rage,
Fam'd Roger's lineal issue, was my father.

[Pausing.

You droop, my love; dejected on a sudden;
You seem to mourn my fortune—The soft tear
Springs in thy eye—Oh, let me kiss it off—
Why this, my Sigismunda?

Sig. Royal Tancred,

None at your glorious fortune can like me
Rejoice;—yet me alone, of all Sicilians,
It makes unhappy.

Tan. I should hate it then!

Should throw, with scorn, the splendid ruin from me!

No, Sigismunda, 'tis my hope with thee
To share it, whence it draws its richest value.

Sig. You are my sovereign—I at humble distance—

Tan. Thou art my queen! the sovereign of my soul!

You never reign'd with such triumphant lustre,
Such winning charms, as now; yet thou art still
The dear, the tender, generous Sigismunda!
Who, with a heart exalted far above
Those selfish views that charm the common
breast,

Stoop'd from the height of life and courted beauty,
Then, then, to love me, when I seem'd of fortune
The hopeless outcast, when I had no friend,
None to protect and own me, but thy father.
And wouldst thou claim all goodness to thyself?
Canst thou thy Tancred deem so dully form'd,
Of such gross clay, just as I reach'd the point—
A point my wildest hopes could ne'er imagine—
In that great moment, full of every virtue,
That I should then so mean a traitor prove
To the best bliss and honour of mankind,
So much disgrace the human heart, as then,
For the dead form of flattery and pomp,
The faithless joys of courts, to quit kind truth,
The cordial sweets of friendship and of love,
The life of life! my all, my Sigismunda?
I could upbraid thy fears, call them unkind,
Cruel, unjust, an outrage to my heart,
Did they not spring from love.

Sig. Think not, my lord,

That to such vulgar doubts I can descend.
Your heart, I know, disdains the little thought
Of changing with the vain, external change
Of circumstance and fortune. Rather thence
It would, with rising ardour, greatly feel
A noble pride, to show itself the same.

But, ah! the hearts of kings are not their own.
There is a haughty duty that subjects them
To chains of state, to wed the public welfare,
And not indulge the tender private virtues.
Some high descended princess, who will bring
New power and interest to your throne, demands
Your royal hand—perhaps Constantia—

Tan. She!

Oh, name her not! were I this moment free
And disengag'd as he who never felt
The powerful eye of beauty, never sigh'd
For matchless worth like thine, I should abhor
All thoughts of that alliance. Her fell father
Most basely murder'd mine; and she, his daughter,

Supported by his barbarous party still,
His pride inherits, his imperious spirit,
And insolent pretensions to my throne,
And, canst thou deem me then so poorly tame,
So cool a traitor to my father's blood,
As from the prudent cowardice of state
E'er to submit to such a base proposal?

Detested thought! Oh, doubly, doubly hateful!
From the two strongest passions; from aversion
To this Constantia—and from love to thee.
Custom, 'tis true, a venerable tyrant,
O'er servile man extends a blind dominion:
The pride of kings enslave them; their ambition,
Or interest, lords it o'er the better passions.
But vain their talk, mask'd under specious words
Of station, duty, and of public good.

They whom just Heaven has to a throne exalted,
To guard the rights and liberties of others,
What duty binds them to betray their own?
For me, my free-born heart shall bear no dictates,
But those of truth and honour; wear no chains,
But the dear chains of love, and Sigismunda!
Or if, indeed, my choice must be directed

By views of public good, whom shall I choose
So fit to grace, to dignify a crown,
And beam sweet mercy on a happy people,
As thee, my love? Whom place upon my throne

But thee, descended from the good Siffredi?
'Tis fit that heart be thine, which drew from him
Whate'er can make it worthy thy acceptance.

Sig. Cease, cease to raise my hopes above my duty.

Charm me no more, my Tancred!—Oh, that we
In those bless'd woods, where first you won my soul,

Had pass'd our gentle days; far from the toil
And pomp of courts! Such is the wish of love,
Of love that, with delightful weakness, knows
No bliss, and no ambition but itself.

But in the world's full light, those charming dreams,

Those fond illusions vanish. A wful duties!

The tyranny of men, even your own heart,

Where lurks a sense your passion stifles now,

And proud imperious honour, call you from me.

'Tis all in vain—you cannot hush a voice

That murmurs here—I must not be persuaed!

Tan. [Kneeling.] Hear me, thou soul of all my hopes and wishes!

And witness Heaven, prime source of love and joy!

Not a whole warring world combin'd against me,

Its pride, its splendour, its imposing forms,

Nor interest, nor ambition, nor the face

Of solemn state, not even thy father's wisdom,

Shall ever shake my faith to Sigismunda!

[Trumpets and acclamations heard.]

But hark! the public voice to duties calls me,

Which with unwearied zeal I will discharge;

And thou, yes, thou, shalt be my bright reward—

Yet—ere I go—to hush thy lovely fears,

Thy delicate objections—[Writes his name.]

Take this blank,

Sign'd with my name, and give it to thy father:

Tell him, 'tis my command it be fill'd up

With a most strict and solemn marriage-contract.

How dear each tie! how charming to my soul!

That more unites me to my Sigismunda.

For thee, and for my people's good to live,

Is all the bliss which sovereign power can give.

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Grand Saloon.

Enter SIFFREDI.

Sif. So far 'tis well—The late king's will proceeds

Upon the plan I counsell'd; that Prince Tancred
Shall make Constantia partner of his throne.

Oh, great, oh, wish'd event! whence the dire seeds

Of dark intestine broils, of civil war,

And all its dreadful miseries and crimes,

Shall be for ever rooted from the land.

May these dim eyes, long blasted by the rage

Of cruel faction and my country's woes,

Tir'd with the toils and vanities of life,

Behold this period, then be clos'd in peace!

But how this mighty obstacle surmount,

Which love has thrown betwixt? Love, that disturbs

The schemes of wisdom still; that, wing'd with passion,

Blind and impetuous in its fond pursuits,
Leaves the gray-headed reason far behind.

Alas, how frail the state of human bliss!

When even our honest passions oft destroy it.

I was to blame, in solitude and shades,

Infectious scenes! to trust their youthful hearts.

Would I had mark'd the rising flame that now

Burns out with dangerous force!—My daughter, owns

Her passion for the king; she trembling own'd

it,

With prayers, and tears, and tender supplications,

That almost shook my firmness—And this blank,

Which his rash fondness gave her, shows how much,

To what a wild extravagance he loves—

I see no means—it foils my deepest thought—

How to controul this madness of the king.

That wears the face of virtue, and will thence

Disdain restraint, will, from his generous heart,

Borrow new rage, even speciously oppose

To reason reason—But it must be done.

My own advice, of which I more and more

Approve, the strict conditions of the will,

Highly demand his marriage with Constantia;

Or else her party has a fair pretence—

And all at once is horror and confusion—

How issue from this maze!—The crowding barons

Here summon'd to the palace, meet already,

To pay their homage, and confirm the will.

On a few moments hangs the public fate,

On a few hasty moments—Ha! there shone

A gleam of hope—Yes, with this very paper

I yet will save him—Necessary means

For good and noble ends, can ne'er be wrong.

In that resistless, that peculiar case,

Deceit is truth and virtue—But how hold

This lion in the toil?—Oh, I will form it

Of such a fatal thread, twist it so strong

With all the ties of honour and of duty,

That his most desperate fury shall not break

The honest snare.—Here is the royal hand—

I will beneath it write a perfect, full,

And absolute agreement to the will;

Which read before the nobles of the realm

Assembled, in the sacred face of Sicily,

Constantia present, every heart and eye

Fix'd on their monarch, every tongue applaud-

ing,

He must submit, his dream of love must vanish—

It shall be done—To me, I know 'tis ruin;

But safety to the public, to the king.

I will not reason more, I will not listen

Even to the voice of honour.—No—'tis fix'd!

I here devote me for my prince and country;

Let them be safe, and let me nobly perish!

Behold, Earl Osmond comes, without whose aid

My schemes are all in vain.

Enter OSMOND.

Osm. My Lord Siffredi,
I from the council hasten to Constantia,
And have accomplish'd what we there propos'd.
The princess to the will submits her claims.

She with her presence means to grace the senate,
And of your royal charge, young Tancred's hand,

Accept. At first, indeed, it shock'd her hopes
Of reigning sole, this new, surprising scene
Of Manfred's son, appointed by the king,
With her joint heir—But I so fully show'd
The justice of the case, the public good,
And sure establish'd peace which thence would rise,

Join'd to the strong necessity that urg'd her,
If on Sicilia's throne she meant to sit,
As to the wise disposal of the will
Her high ambition tam'd. Methought, besides,
I could discern, that not from prudence merely
She to this choice submitted.

Sif. Noble Osmond,
You have in this done to the public great
And signal service. Yes, I must avow it;
This frank and ready instance of your zeal,
In such a trying crisis of the state,
When interest and ambition might have warp'd
Your views, I own, this truly generous virtue
Upbraids the rashness of my former judgment.

Osm. Siffredi, no. To you belongs the praise;

The glorious work is yours. Had I not seiz'd,
Improv'd the wish'd occasion to root out
Division from the land, and sav'd my country,
I had been base and infamous for ever.
'Tis you, my lord, to whom the many thousands,

That by the barbarous sword of civil war
Had fallen inglorious, owe their lives; to you
The sons of this fair isle, from her first peers
Down to the swain who tills her golden plains,
Owe their safe homes, their soft domestic hours,
And through late time posterity shall bless you,

You who advis'd this will.—I blush to think
I have so long oppos'd the best good man
In Sicily—With what impartial care
Ought we to watch o'er prejudice and passion,
Nor trust too much the jaundiced eye of party!
Henceforth its vain delusions I renounce,
Its hot determinations, that confine
All merit and all virtue to itself.

To yours I join my hand; with you will own
No interest and no party but my country.
Nor is your friendship only my ambition:
There is a dearer name, the name of father,
By which I should rejoice to call Siffredi.
Your daughter's hand would to the public weal
Unite my private happiness.

Sif. My lord,
You have my glad consent. To be allied
To your distinguish'd family and merit,
I shall esteem an honour. From my soul
I here embrace Earl Osmond as my friend
And son.

Osm. You make him happy. This assent,
So frank and warm, to what I long have wish'd,

Engages all my gratitude; at once,
In the first blossom, it matures our friendship.
I from this moment vow myself the friend
And zealous servant of Siffredi's house.

Enter an OFFICER belonging to the Court.

Off. [To SIFFREDI.] The king, my lord, demands your speedy presence.

Sif. I will attend him straight—Farewell, my lord;

The senate meets: there, a few moments hence
I will rejoin you.

Osm. There, my noble lord,
We will complete this salutary work;
Will there begin a new auspicious era.

[Exeunt SIFFREDI and OFFICER.]

Siffredi gives his daughter to my wishes—
But does she give herself? Gay, young, and flatter'd,

Perhaps engag'd, will she her youthful heart
Yield to my harsher, uncompromising years?
I am not form'd, by flattery and praise,
By sighs and tears, and all the whining trade
Of love, to feed a fair one's vanity;
To charm at once and spoil her. These soft arts

Nor suit my ears nor temper; these be left
To boys and doting age. A prudent father,
By nature charg'd to guide and rule her choice,
Resigns his daughter to a husband's power,
Who, with superior dignity, with reason,
And manly tenderness, will ever love her;
Not first a kneeling slave, and then a tyrant.

Enter BARONS.

My lords, I greet you well. This wondrous day

Unites us all in amity and friendship.
We meet to-day with open hearts and looks,
Not gloom'd by party, scowling on each other,
But all the children of one happy isle,
The social sons of liberty. No pride,
No passion now, no thwarting views divide us:
Prince Manfred's line, at last to William's
join'd,

Combine us in one family of brothers.
This to the late good king's well-ordered will
And wise Siffredi's generous care, we owe.
I truly give you joy. First of you all,
I here renounce those errors and divisions
That have so long disturb'd our peace, and seem'd

Fermenting still, to threaten new commotions—
By time instructed, let us not disdain
To quit mistakes. We all, my lords, have err'd.

Men may, I find, be honest, though they differ.
1st Baron. Who follows not, my lord, the fair example

You set us all, what'er be his pretence,
Loves not, with single and unbiass'd heart,
His country as he ought.

2nd Baron. Oh, beauteous peace!
Sweet union of a state! what else but thou
Gives safety, strength, and glory to a people?
I bow, lord constable, beneath the snow
Of many years; yet in my breast revives
A youthful flame. Methinks, I see again
Those gentle days renew'd that bless'd our isle,
Ere by this wasteful fury of division,
Worse than our Ætna's most destructive fires,
It desolated sunk. I see our plains
Unbounded waving with the gifts of harvest;
Our seas with commerce throng'd; our busy port

With cheerful toil. Our Enna blooms afresh;
A fresh the sweets of thymy Hybla flow.
Our nymphs and shepherds sporting in each vale,

Inspire new song, and wake the pastoral reed—

The tongue of age is fond—Come, come, my sons;
I long to see this prince, of whom the world
Speaks largely well—His father was my friend,
The brave, unhappy Manfred—Come, my lords;
We tarry here too long.

Enter two OFFICERS, keeping off the Crowd.

One of the Crowd. Show us our king,
The valiant Manfred's son, who lov'd the people—

We must, we will behold him—Give us way.

1st Off. Pray, gentlemen, give back—it must not be—

Give back, I pray—on such a glad occasion,
I would not ill entreat the lowest of you.

2d Man of the Crowd. Nay, give us but a glimpse of our young king.

We more than any baron of them all,
Will pay him due allegiance.

2d Off. Friends, indeed

You cannot pass this way—We have strict orders,

To keep for him himself, and for the barons,
All these apartments clear—Go to the gate
That fronts the sea, you there will find admission.

Omes. Long live King Tancred! Manfred's son—huzza! [Crowd goes off.]

1st Off. I do not marvel at their rage of joy.
He is a brave and amiable prince.

When in my Lord Siffredi's house I liv'd,
Ere by his favour I obtain'd this office,
I there remember well the young Count Tancred.

To see him and to love him were the same;
He was so noble in his ways, yet still
So affable and mild—Well, well, old Sicily,
Yet happy days await thee!

2d Off. Grant it, Heaven!

We have seen sad and troublesome times enough,

He is, they say, to wed the late king's sister, Constantia.

1st Off. Friend, of that I greatly doubt.

Or I mistake, or Lord Siffredi's daughter,
The gentle Sigismunda, has his heart.
If one may judge by kindly, cordial looks,
And fond, assiduous care to please each other,
Most certainly they love—Oh, be they bless'd,
As they deserve! It were great pity aught
Should part a matchless pair; the glory he,
And she the blooming grace of Sicily!

2d Off. My Lord Rodolpho comes.

Enter RODOLPHO from the Senate.

Rod. My honest friends,
You may retire. [OFFICERS go out.] A storm is in the wind.

This will perplexes all. No, Tancred never Can stoop to these conditions, which at once
Attack his rights, his honour, and his love.
Those wise old men, those plodding, grave, state
pedants,

Forget thy course of youth; their crooked prudence,

To baseness verging still, forgets to take Into their fine-spun-schemes the generous heart,
That, through the cobweb system bursting, lays
Their labours waste—So will this business prove,

Or I mistake the king—back from the pomp
He seem'd at first to shrink, and round his brow

I mark'd a gathering cloud, when, by his side,
As if design'd to share the public homage,
He saw the tyrant's daughter. But confess'd
At least to me the doubling tempest frown'd,
And shook his swelling bosom, when he heard
Th' unjust, the base conditions of the will.
Uncertain, toss'd in cruel agitation,
He oft, methought, address'd himself to speak,
And interrupt Siffredi; who appear'd,
With conscious haste, to dread that interruption,

And hurried on—But hark! I hear a noise,
As if th' assembly rose—Ha! Sigismunda, Oppress'd with grief, and wrapp'd in pensive sorrow,

Passes along.
[SIGISMUNDA and Attendants pass through the back Scene.]

Enter LAURA

Laura. Your high-prais'd friend, the king,
Is false, most vilely false. The meanest slave
Had shown a nobler heart; nor grossly thus,
By the first bait ambition spread, been gull'd.
He Manfred's son! away! it cannot be!
The son of that brave prince could ne'er betray
Those rights so long usurp'd from his great father.

Which he, this day, by such amazing fortune,
Had just regain'd; he ne'er could sacrifice
All faith, all honour, gratitude, and love,
Even just resentment of his father's fate,
And pride itself; what'er exalts a man
Above the grovelling sons of peasant mud,
All in a moment—And for what? why, truly,
For kind permission, gracious leave, to sit
On his own throne with tyrant William's daughter!

Rod. I stand amaz'd—You surely wrong him Laura.

'There must be some mistake.

Laura. 'There can be none!
Siffredi read his full and free consent
Before th' applauding senate. True, indeed,
A small remain of shame, a timorous weakness,
Even dastardly in falsehood, made him blush
To act this scene in Sigismunda's eye,
Who sunk beneath his perfidy and baseness.
Hence, till to-morrow he adjourn'd the senate!
To-morrow, fix'd with infamy to crown him!
Then leading off his gay, triumphant princess,
He left the poor unhappy Sigismunda
To bend her trembling steps to that sad home
His faithless vows will render hateful to her—
He comes—Farewell—I cannot bear his presence!
[Exit LAURA]

Enter TANCRED and SIFFREDI, meeting.

Tan. Avoid me, hoary traitor! Go, Rodolpho,

Give orders that all passages this way
Be shut—Defend me from a hateful world,
The bane of peace and honour—then return—

[Exit RODOLPHO.]
What! dost thou haunt me still? Oh, monstrous insult!

Unparall'd indignity! Just Heaven!

Was ever king, was ever man so treated,
So trampled into baseness?

Sif. Here, my liege,
Here strike! I nor deserve, nor ask for mercy.

Tan. Distraction!—Oh, my soul!—Hold, reason, hold

Thy giddy seat—Oh, this inhuman outrage
Unhinges thought!

Sif. Exterminate thy servant.

Tan. All, all but this I could have borne—but this!

This daring insolence beyond example!

This murderous stroke, that stabs my peace for ever!

That wounds me there—there! where the human heart

Most exquisitely feels—

Sif. Oh, bear it not,
My royal lord; appease on me your vengeance!

Tan. Did ever tyrant image aught so cruel!
The lowest slave that crawls upon the earth,
Robb'd of each comfort Heaven bestows on mortals,

On the bare ground, has still his virtue left,
The sacred treasure of an honest heart,
Which thou hast dar'd, with rash, audacious hand,

And impious fraud, in me to violate—

Sif. Behold, my lord, that rash audacious hand,

Which not repents its crime—Oh, glorious, happy!

If by my ruin I can save your honour.

Tan. Such honour I renounce; with sovereign scorn

Greatly detest it, and its mean adviser!
Hast thou not dar'd beneath my name to shelter—

My name, for other purposes design'd,
Given from the fondness of a faithful heart,

With the best love o'erflowing—Hast thou not,
Beneath thy sov'reign's name, basely presum'd

To shield a lie—a lie in public utter'd,
To all deluded Sicily? But know,

This poor contrivance is as weak as base.

In such a wretched toil none can be held
But fools and cowards—Soon thy flimsy arts,

Touch'd by my just, my burning indignation,
Shall burst like threads in flame—Thy dotting

prudence

But more secures the purpose it would shake.
Had my resolves been wavering and doubtful,

This would confirm them, make them fix'd as fate;

Thy adds the only motive that was wanting
To urge them on through war and desolation.

What! marry her! Constantia! her! the daughter

Of the fell tyrant who destroy'd my father!
The very thought is madness! Ere thou seest

The torch of Hymen light these hated nuptials,
Thou shalt behold Sicilia wrapt in flames,

Her cities raz'd, her vallies drench'd with slaughter—

Love set aside, my pride assumes the quarrel;
My honour now is up; in spite of thee,

A world combin'd against me, I will give
This scatter'd will in fragments to the winds,

Assert my rights, the freedom of my heart,
Crush all who dare oppose me to the dust,

And heap perdition on thee!

Sif. Sir, 'tis just.
Exhaust on me thy rage; I claim it all.

VOL. L...5 F

But for these public threats thy passion utters,
'Tis what thou canst not do.

Tan. I cannot! ha!
Driven to the dreadful brink of such dishonour,

Enough to make the tamest coward brave,
And into fierceness rouse the mildest nature,

What shall arrest my vengeance? Who?
Sif. Thyself.

Tan. Away! Dare not to justify thy crime!
That, that alone can aggravate its horror,

Add insolence to insolence—perhaps
May make my rage forget—

Sif. Oh, let it burst
On this gray head, devoted to thy service!

But when the storm has vented all its fury,
Thou then must hear—nay more, I know thee wilt—

Wilt hear the calm, yet stronger voice of reason.
Thou must reflect that a whole people's safety,

The weal of trusted millions, should bear down,
Thyself the judge, the fondest partial pleasure.

Thou must reflect that there are other duties,
A nobler pride, a more exalted honour,

Superior pleasures far, that will oblige,
Compel thee, to abide by this my deed,

Unwarranted perhaps in common justice,
But which necessity, even virtue's tyrant,

With awful voice commanded.—Yes, thou must,
In calmer hours, divest thee of thy love,

These common passions of the vulgar breast,
This boiling heat of youth, and be a king,

The lover of thy people!

Tan. Truths, ill employ'd,
Abus'd to colour guilt?—A king! a king!

Yes, I will be a king, but not a slave;
In this will be a king; in this my people

Shall learn to judge how I will guard their rights,
When they behold me vindicate my own.

But have I, say, been treated like a king?—
Heavens! could I stoop to such outrageous usage!

I were a mean, a shameless wretch, unworthy
To wield a sceptre in a land of slaves,

A soil abhorr'd of virtue; should belie
My father's blood, belie those very maxims,

At other times you taught my youth—Siffredi!

[In a softened tone of voice.

Sif. Behold, my prince, thy poor old servant,
Whose darling care, these twenty years, has been

To nurse thee up to virtue; who, for thee,
Thy glory and thy weal, renounces all,

All interest or ambition can pour forth;
What many a selfish father would pursue

Through treachery and crimes: behold him here,
Bent on his feeble knees, to beg, conjure thee,

With tears to beg thee to control thy passion,
And save thyself, thy honour, and thy people!

Kneeling with me, behold the many thousands
To thy protection trusted; fathers, mothers,

The sacred front of venerable age,
The tender virgin, and the helpless infant;

The ministers of Heaven, those who maintain,
Around thy throne, the majesty of rule;

And those whose labour, scorched by winds and sun,
Feeds the rejoicing public; see them all

Here at thy feet conjuring thee to save them
From misery and war, from crimes and rapine!

Can there be aught, kind Heaven, in self-indulgence
To weigh down these, this aggregate of love,

With which compar'd, the dearest private passion
Is but the wafted dust upon the balance?

Turn not away—Oh, is there not some part
In thy great heart, so sensible to kindness,
And generous warmth, some nobler part, to feel
The prayers and tears of these, the mingled voice
Of Heaven and earth?

Tan. There is, and thou hast touch'd it.
Rise, rise, Siffredi!—Oh, thou hast undone me!
Unkind old man!—Oh, ill-entreated Tancred!
Which way soe'er I turn, dishonour rears
Her hideous front—and misery and ruin.
Was it for this you took such care to form me?
For this imbued me with the quickest sense
Of shame; these finer feelings, that ne'er vex
The common mass of mortals, dully happy
In bless'd insensibility? Oh, rather [power
You should have sear'd my heart, taught me that
And splendid interest lord it still o'er virtue;
That, gilded by prosperity and pride,
There is no shame, no meanness; temper'd thus,
I had been fit to rule a venal world.
Alas! what meant thy wantonness of prudence?
Why have you rais'd this miserable conflict
Betwixt the duties of the king and man?
Set virtue against virtue?—Ah, Siffredi!
'Tis thy superfluous, thy unfeeling wisdom,
That has involv'd me in a maze of error
Almost beyond retreat.—But hold, my soul
Thy steady purpose—Toss'd by various pas-
To this eternal anchor keep—There is, [sions
Can be no public without private virtue—
Then, mark me well, observe what I command;
It is the sole expedient now remaining—
To-morrow, when the senate meets again,
Unfold the whole, unravel the deceit;
Nor that alone; try to repair its mischief:
There all thy power, thy eloquence, and interest
Exert to re-instate me in my rights,
And from thy own dark snares to disembroil me.—
Start not, my lord—This must and shall be done!
Or here our friendship ends—Howe'er disguis'd,
Whatever thy pretence, thou art a traitor.

Sif. I should indeed deserve the name of traitor,
And even a traitor's fate, had I so slightly,
From principles so weak, done what I did,
As e'er to disavow it—

Tan. Ha!

Sif. My liege, [courts,
Expect not this—Though practis'd long in
I have not so far learn'd their subtle trade,
To veer obedient with each gust of passion.
I honour thee, I venerate thy orders,
But honour more my duty. Nought on earth
Shall ever shake me from that solid rock,
Nor smiles, nor frowns.—

Tan. You will not then?

Sif. I cannot.

Tan. Away! begone!—Oh, my Rodolpho,
come,
And save me from this traitor! Hence, I say,
Avoid my presence straight! and know, old man,
Thou, my worst foe, beneath the mask of friendship,

Who, not content to trample in the dust
My dearest rights, dost with cool insolence
Persist, and call it duty; hadst thou not
A daughter that protects thee, thou shouldst feel
The vengeance thou deservest.—No reply!
Away! [Exit SIFFREDI.

Enter RODOLPHO.

Rod. What can incense my prince so highly Against his friend Siffredi!

Tan. Friend! Rodolpho,
When I have told thee what this friend has done,
How play'd me like a boy, a base-born wretch,
Who had nor heart nor spirit, thou wilt stand
Amaz'd, and wonder at my stupid patience.

Rod. I heard, with mix'd astonishment and grief,

The king's unjust, dishonourable will,
Void in itself—I saw you stung with rage,
And writhing in the snare; just as I went,
At your command to wait you here—but that
Was the king's deed, not his.

Tan. Oh, he advis'd it!

These many years he has in secret hatch'd
This black contrivance, glories in the scheme,
And proudly plumes him with his traitorous virtue.

But that was nought, Rodolpho, nothing, nothing.
Oh, that was gentle, blameless to what follow'd
I had, my friend, to Sigismunda given,
To hush her fears, in the full gush of fondness,
A blank sign'd with my hand—and he, Oh, Heavens!

Was ever such a wild attempt!—he wrote
Beneath my name an absolute compliance
To this detested will, nay, dar'd to read it
Before myself, on my insulted throne
His idle pageant plac'd—Oh, words are weak
To paint the pangs, the rage, the indignation,
That whirl'd from thought to thought my soul in tempest,

Now on the point to burst, and now by shame
Repress'd—But in the face of Sicily,
All mad with acclamation, what, Rodolpho,
What could I do? the sole relief that rose
To my distracted mind, was to adjourn
Th' assembly till to-morrow—But to-morrow
What can be done?—Oh, it avails not what!
I care not what is done—My only care
Is how to clear my faith with Sigismunda.
She thinks me false! She cast a look that kill'd
me!

Oh! I am base in Sigismunda's eye!

The lowest of mankind, the most perfidious!
Rod. This was a strain of insolence indeed,
A daring outrage of so strange a nature
As stuns me quite—

Tan. Curs'd be my timid prudence,
That dash'd not back, that moment in his face,
The bold presumptuous lie!—and curs'd this
hand,

That, from a start of poor dissimulation,
Led off my Sigismunda's hated rival.
Ah, then! what, poison'd by the false appearance,
What, Sigismunda, were thy thoughts of me?
How, in the silent bitterness of soul,
How didst thou scorn me, hate mankind, thyself,
For trusting to the vows of faithless Tancred!
For such I seem'd—I was—the thought distracts
me!

I should have cast a flattering world aside,
Rush'd from my throne, before them all avow'd her
The choice, the glory of my free-born heart.
And spurn'd the shameful fetters thrown upon it—
Instead of that—confusion!—what I did
Has clinch'd the chain, confirm'd Siffredi's crime,
And fix'd me down to infamy!

Rod. My lord,
Blame not the conduct which your situation
Tore from your tortur'd heart—What could you do?

Had you, so circumstanc'd, in open senate,

Before th' astonish'd public, with no friends
 Prepar'd, no party form'd, affronted thus
 The haughty princess and her powerful faction,
 Supported by this will, the sudden stroke,
 Abrupt and premature, might have recoi'd
 Upon yourself, even your own friends revolted,
 And turn'd at once the public scale against you.
 Besides, consider, had you then detected
 In its fresh guilt this action of Siffredi,
 You must with signal vengeance have chastis'd
 The treasonable deed—Nothing so mean
 As weak, insulted power that dares not punish.
 And how would that have suited with your love;
 His daughter present too? Trust me, your conduct,

Howe'er abhorrent to a heart like yours,
 Was fortunate and wise—Not that I mean,
 E'er to advise submission—

Tan. Heavens! submission—
 Could I descend to bear it, even in thought,
 Despise me, you, the world, and Sigismunda!
 Submission!—No!—To-morrow's glorious light
 Shall flash discovery on the scene of baseness.
 Whatever be the risk, by Heavens, to-morrow,
 I will o'erturn the dirty lie-built schemes
 Of these old men, and show my faithful senate
 That Manfred's son knows to assert and wear,
 With undiminish'd dignity, that crown
 This unexpected day has plac'd upon him.
 By this, my friend, these stormy gusts of pride
 Are foreign to my love—Till Sigismunda
 Be abus'd, my breast is tumult all,
 And can obey no settled course of reason.
 I see her still, I feel her powerful image,
 That look, where with reproach complaint was mix'd,

Big with soft wo, and gentle indignation,
 Which seem'd at once to pity and to scorn me—
 Oh, let me find her! I too long have left
 My Sigismunda to converse with tears,
 A prey to thoughts that picture me a villain.
 But ah! how, clogg'd with this accursed state,
 A tedious world, shall I now find access?
 Her father too—'Ten thousand horrors crowd
 Into the wild, fantastic eye of love—
 Who knows what he may do? Come then, my friend,

And by thy sister's hand, oh, let me steal
 A letter to her bosom—I no longer
 Can bear her absence, by the just contempt
 She now must brand me with, inflam'd to madness.
 Fly, my Rodolpho, fly! engage thy sister
 To aid my letter, and this very evening
 Secure an interview—I would not bear
 This rack another day, nor for my kingdom.
 Till then, deep plung'd in solitude and shades,
 I will not see the hated face of man.
 Thought drives on thought, on passion passions roll;

Her smiles alone can calm my raging soul.

[Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Chamber.

SIGISMUNDA alone, sitting in a disconsolate posture.

Sig. Ah, tyrant prince! ah more than faithless Tancred!

Ungenerous and inhuman in thy falsehood!
 Hadst thou this morning, when my hopeless
 heart,

Submissive to my fortune and my duty,
 Had so much spirit left, as to be willing To give thee back thy vows, ah! hadst thou then Confess'd the sad necessity thy state
 Impos'd upon thee, and with gentle friendship,
 Since we must part at last, our parting soften'd:
 I should indeed—I should have been unhappy,
 But not to this extreme—Amidst my grief,
 I had, with pensive pleasure, cherish'd still
 The sweet remembrance of thy former love,
 Thy image still had dwelt upon my soul,
 And made our guiltless woes not undelightful
 But coolly thus—How couldst thou be so cruel?
 Thus to revive my hopes, to soothe my love,
 And call forth all its tenderness, then sink me
 In black despair—What unrelenting pride
 Possess'd thy breast, that thou couldst bear unmov'd

To see me bend beneath a weight of shame?
 Pangs thou canst never feel! How couldst thou drag me,

In barbarous triumph at a rival's car?
 How make me witness to a sight of horror?
 That hand, which but a few short hours ago,
 So wantonly abus'd my simple faith,
 Before th' attesting world given to another,
 Irrevocably given!—There was a time,
 When the least cloud that hung upon my brow,
 Perhaps imagin'd only, touch'd thy pity.
 Then, brighten'd often by the ready tear,
 Thy looks were softness all; then the quick heart
 In every nerve alive, forgot itself,
 And for each other then we felt alone.
 But now, alas! those tender days are fled;
 Now thou canst see me wretched, pierc'd with anguish,

With studied anguish of thy own creating,
 Nor wet thy harden'd eye—Hold, let me think—
 I wrong thee sure; that thou canst not be so base,
 As meanly in my misery to triumph—
 What is it then?—'Tis fickleness of nature,
 'Tis sickly love extinguish'd by ambition—
 Is there, kind Heaven, no constancy in man?
 No steadfast truth, no generous fix'd affection,
 That can bear up against a selfish world?
 No there is none—Even Tancred is inconstant!

[Rising.]

Hence! let me fly this scene!—Whatever I see,
 These roofs, these walls, each object that surrounds me,

Are tainted with his vows—But whither fly?
 The groves are worse, the soft retreat of Belmont,
 Its deepening glooms, gay lawns, and airy summits,

Will wound my busy memory to torture,
 And all its shades will whisper—faithless Tan-
 cred!

My father comes—How, sunk in this disorder,
 Shall I sustain his presence?

Enter SIFFREDI.

Sif. Sigismunda,
 My dearest child! I grieve to find thee thus
 A prey to tears. I know the powerful cause
 From which they flow, and therefore can excuse them,

But not their wilful, obstinate continuance.
 Come, rouse thee, then, call up thy drooping
 spirit,

Awake to reason from this dream of love,
 And show the world thou art Siffredi's daughter.

Sig. Alas! I am unworthy of that name.

Sif. Thou art indeed to blame; thou hast too rashly

Engag'd thy heart, without a father's sanction. But this I can forgive. The king has virtues, That plead thy full excuse; nor was I void Of blame, to trust thee to those dangerous virtues. Then dread not my reproaches. Though he blames,

Thy tender father pities more than blames thee. Thou art my daughter still; and, if thy heart Will now resume its pride, assert itself, And greatly rise, superior to this trial, I to my warmest confidence again Will take thee, and esteem thee more my daughter.

Sig. Oh, you are gentler far than I deserve! It is, it ever was, my darling pride, To bend my soul to your supreme commands, Your wisest will; and though, by love betray'd—Alas! and punish'd too—I have transgress'd The nicest bounds of duty, yet I feel A sentiment of tenderness, a source Of filial nature springing in my breast, That, should it kill me, shall control this passion, And make me all submission and obedience To you, my honour'd lord, the best of fathers.

Sif. Come to my arms, thou comfort of my age! Thou only joy and hope of these gray hairs! Come, let me take thee to a parent's heart; There, with the kindly aid of my advice, Even with the dew of these paternal tears, Revive and nourish this becoming spirit— Then thou dost promise me, my Sigismunda— Thy father stoops to make it his request— Thou wilt resign thy fond, presumptuous hopes, And henceforth never more indulge one thought That in the light of love regards the king?

Sig. Hopes I have none!—Those by this fatal day Are blasted all—But from my soul to banish, While weeping memory there retains her seat, Thoughts which the purest bosom might have cherish'd, Once my delight, now even in anguish charming, Is more, my lord, than I can promise.

Sif. Absence, and time, the soft'ner of our passions,

Will conquer this. Meantime, I hope from thee A generous great effort; that thou wilt now Exert thy utmost force, nor languish thus Beneath the vain extravagance of love.

Let not thy father blush to hear it said, His daughter was so weak, e'er to admit A thought so void of reason, that a king Should to his rank, his honour, and his glory, The high important duties of a throne,

Even to his throne itself, madly prefer A wild, romantic passion, the fond child Of youthful dreaming thought and vacant hours; That he should quit his Heaven-appointed station, Desert his awful charge, the care of all The toiling millions which this isle contains; Nay more, should plunge them into war and ruin, And all to sooth a sick imagination,

A miserable weakness.—Must for thee, To make thee bless'd, Sicilia be unhappy? The king himself, lost to the nobler sense Of manly praise, become the piteous hero Of some soft tale, and rush on sure destruction? Canst thou, my daughter, let the monstrous thought Possess one moment thy perverted fancy?

Rouse thee, for shame! and if a spark of virtue Lies slumbering in thy soul, bid it blaze forth Nor sink unequal to the glorious lesson, This day thy lover gave thee from his throne.

Sig. Ah, that was not from virtue!—Had, my father,

That been his aim, I yield to what you say; 'Tis powerful truth, unanswerable reason. Then, then, with sad but duteous resignation, I had submitted as became your daughter; But in that moment, when my humbled hopes Were to my duty reconcil'd, to raise them To yet a fonder height than e'er they knew, Then rudely dash them down—There is the sting!

The blasting view is ever present to me— Why did you drag me to a sight so cruel?

Sif. It was a scene to fire thy emulation. Sig. It was a scene of perfidy!—But know, I will do more than imitate the king— For he is false!—I, though sincerely pierc'd With the best, truest passion, ever touch'd A virgin's breast, here vow to Heaven and you, Though from my heart I cannot, from my hopes To cast this prince—What would you more, my father?

Sif. Yes, one thing more—thy father then is happy—

Though by the voice of innocence and virtue Absolv'd we live not to ourselves alone; A rigorous world with peremptory sway, Subjects us all, and even the noblest most. This world from thee, my honour and thy own, Demands one step; a step, by which, convinc'd, The king may see thy heart disdains to wear A chain which his has greatly thrown aside. 'Tis fitting too, thy sex's pride commands thee, To show th' approving world thou canst resign, As well as he, nor with inferior spirit, A passion fatal to the public weal. But above all, thou must root out for ever From the king's breast the least remain of hope, And henceforth make his mentioned love dishonour.

These things my daughter, that must needs be done,

Can but this way be done—by the safe refuge, The sacred shelter of a husband's arms.

And there is one—

Sig. Good Heavens! what means my lord?

Sif. One of illustrious family, high rank, Yet still of higher dignity and merit Who can and will protect thee; one to awe The king himself—Nay, hear me, Sigismunda— The noble Osmond courts thee for his bride And has my plighted word—This day—

Sig. [Kneeling.] My father!

Let me with trembling arms embrace thy knees! Oh, if you ever wish to see me happy;

If e'er in infant years I gave you joy, When, as I prattling twin'd around your neck, You snatch'd me to your bosom, kiss'd my eyes, And melting said you saw my mother there;

Oh, save me from that worst severity Of fate! Oh, outrage not my breaking heart To that degree!—I cannot!—'tis impossible So soon withdraw it, give it to another—

Hear me, my dearest father; hear the voice Of nature and humanity, that plead,

As well as justice, for me!—Not to choose Without your wise direction may be duty; But still my choice is free—that is a right,

Which even the lowest slave can never lose.
And would you thus degrade me?—make me base?

For such it were to give my worthless person
Without my heart, an injury to Osmond,
The highest can be done.—Let me, my lord—
Or I shall die, shall by the sudden change,
Be to distraction shock'd. Let me wear out
My hapless days in solitude and silence,
Far from the malice of a prying world!
At least—you cannot sure refuse me this—
Give me a little time—I will do all,
All I can do, to please you!—Oh, your eye
Sheds a kind beam

Sif. My daughter! you abuse
The softness of my nature—

Sig. Here, my father,
Till you relent, here will I grow for ever!

Sif. Rise, Sigismunda.—Though you touch
my heart,

Nothing can shake th' inexorable dictates
Of honour, duty, and determin'd reason.
Then, by the holy ties of filial love,
Resolve, I charge thee, to receive Earl Osmond,
As suits the man who is thy father's choice,
And worthy of thy hand—I go to bring him—

Sig. Spare me, my dearest father!

Sif. [Aside.] I must rush
From her soft grasp, or nature will betray me!
Oh, grant us, Heaven, that fortitude of mind,
Which listens to our duty, not our passions.—
Quit me, my child!

Sig. You cannot, oh, my father!
You cannot leave me thus!

Sif. Come hither, Laura,
Come to thy friend. Now show thyself a friend.
Combat her weakness; dissipate her tears;
C'erish, and reconcile her to her duty.

[Exit SIFREDDI.]

Enter LAURA.

Sig. Oh, wo on wo! distress'd by love and duty—
Oh, every way unhappy Sigismunda!

Laura Forgive me, Madam, if I blame your grief.

How can you waste your tears on one so false?
Unworthy of your tenderness; to whom
Nought but contempt is due, and indignation?

Sig. You know not half the horrors of my fate;
I might perhaps have learn'd to scorn his falsehood:

Nay, when the first sad burst of tears was past,
I might have rous'd my pride, and scorn'd himself—

But 'tis too much, this greatest last misfortune—
Oh, whither shall I fly? Where hide me, Laura,
From the dire scene my father now prepares?

Laura. What thus alarms you, Madam?

Sig. Can it be?

Can I—ah, no!—at once give to another
My violated heart? in one wild moment?
He brings Earl Osmond to receive my vows.
Oh, dreadful change! for Tancred, haughty Osmond.

Laura. Now, on my soul, 'tis what an outrag'd
heart

Like yours should wish—I should, by Heavens, esteem it

Most exquisite revenge!

Sig. Revenge! on whom?
On my own heart already but too wretched!

Laura. On him! this Tancred! who has basely sold,

For the dull form of despicable grandeur,
His faith, his love!—At once a slave and tyrant!

Sig. Oh, rail at me, at my believing folly,
My vain ill-founded hopes; but spare him, Laura.

Laura. Who rais'd these hopes? who triumphs o'er that weakness?

Pardon the word—You greatly merit him;
Better than him, with all his giddy pomp;
You rais'd him by your smiles when he was nothing.

Where is your woman's pride, that guardian
spirit

Given us to dash the perfidy of man?
Ye powers! I cannot bear the thought with patience—

Yet recent from the most unsparing vows
The tongue of love e'er lavish'd; from your hopes
So vainly, idly, cruelly deluded;
Before the public thus, before your father,
By an irrevocable, solemn deed,
With such inhuman scorn, to throw you from
him:

To give his faithless hand yet warm from thine,
With complicated meanness, to Constantia:
And, to complete his crime, when thy weak limbs
Could scarce support thee, then, of thee regardless,

To lead her off.

Sig. That was indeed a sight
To poison love; to turn it into rage
And keen contempt.—What means this stupid weakness

That hangs upon me? Hence, unworthy tears!
Disgrace my cheek no more! No more, my heart,
For one so coolly false or meanly fickle—
Oh, it imports not which—dare to suggest
The least excuse!—Yes, traitor, I will wring
Thy pride, will turn thy triumph to confusion!
I will not pine away my days for thee,
Sighing to brooks and groves; while, with vain pity,

You in a rival's arms lament my fate—
No, let me perish! ere I tamely be
That soft, that patient, gentle Sigismunda,
Who can console her with the wretched boast,
She was for thee unhappy!—If I am,
I will be nobly so!—Sicilia's daughters
Shall, wondering, see in me a great example
Of one who punish'd an ill-judging heart,
Who made it bow to what it most abhor'd!
Crush'd it to misery! for having thus
So lightly listen'd to a worthless lover!

Laura. At last it mounts, the kindling pride of virtue!

Trust me, thy marriage will embitter his—

Sig. Oh, may the furies light his nuptial torch!
Be it accurs'd as mine! For the fair peace,
The tender joys of hymeneal love,
May jealousy awak'd, and fell remorse,
Pour all their fiercest venom through his breast!—
Where the fates lead, and blind revenge, I follow.—

Let me not think—By injur'd love! I vow,
Thou shalt, base prince! perfidious and inhuman!
Thou shalt behold me in another's arms,
In his thou hatest! Osmond's!

Laura. That will grind
His heart with secret rage: Ay, that will sting
His soul to madness; set him up a terror,
A spectacle of wo to faithless lovers!—

Your cooler thoughts besides, will of the change
Approve, and think it happy. Noble Osmond
From the same stock with him derives his birth,
First of Sicilian barons, prudent, brave,
Of strictest honour, and by all rever'd—

Sig. Talk not of Osmond, but perfidious Tancred!

Rail at him, rail! invent new names of scorn!
Assist me, Laura; lend my rage fresh fuel;
Support my staggering purpose, which already
Begins to fail me—Ah, my vaunts how vain!
How have I lied to my own heart!—Alas,
My tears return, the mighty flood o'erwhelms me!
Ten thousand crowding images distract
My tortur'd thought—And is it come to this?
Our hopes, our vows, our oft repeated wishes,
Breath'd from the fervent soul, and full of Heaven,

To make each other happy—come to this!

Laura. If thy own peace and honour cannot keep

Thy resolution fix'd; yet, Sigismunda,
Oh, think how deeply, how beyond retreat,
Thy father is engag'd.

Sig. Ah, wretched weakness!
That thus enthrals my soul, that chases thence
Each nobler thought—the sense of every duty;
And have I then no tears for thee, my father?
Can I forget thy cares, from helpless years,
Thy tenderness for me? an eye still beam'd
With love; a brow that never knew a frown;
Nor a harsh word thy tongue? Shall I for these Repay thy stooping, venerable age
With shame, disquiet, anguish, and dishonour?
It must not be! Thou first of angels! come,
Sweet filial piety, and firm my breast!
Yes, let one daughter to her fate submit,
Be nobly wretched—but her father happy!—
Laura!—they come! Oh, Heavens I cannot stand

The horrid trial!—Open, open, earth!
And hide me from their view.

Laura. Madam.

Enter SIFFREDI and OSMOND.

Sif. My daughter,
Behold my noble friend, who courts thy hand,
And whom to call my son I shall be proud;
Nor shall I less be pleas'd in this alliance,
To see thee happy.

Osm. Think not, I presume,
Madam, on this your father's kind consent,
To make me bless'd. I love you from a heart,
That seeks your good superior to my own;
And will by every art of tender friendship,
Consult your dearest welfare. May I hope,
Yours does not disavow your father's choice?

Sig. I am a daughter, Sir—and have no power
O'er my own heart—I die—support me, Laura.

Sif. Help—Bear her off—She breathes—my daughter!

Sig. Oh,
Forgive my weakness—soft—my Laura, lead
me—
To my apartment.

Exit SIGISMUNDA and LAURA.
Sif. Pardon me, my lord,
If by this sudden accident alarm'd,
I leave you for a moment. [Exit SIFFREDI.]

Osm. Let me think—
What can this mean?—Is it to me aversion?

Or is it, as I fear'd, she loves another?
Ha!—yes—perhaps the king, the young Count
Tancred;

They were bred up together—Surely that,
That cannot be—Has he not given his hand,
In the most solemn manner, to Constantia?
Does not his crown depend upon the deed?
No—If they lov'd, and this old statesman knew it,
He could not to a king prefer a subject.
His virtues I esteem—nay more, I trust them—
So far as virtue goes—but could he place
His daughter on the throne of Sicily—
Oh, 'tis a glorious bribe, too much for man!
What is it then? I care not what it be.
My honour now, my dignity demands,
That my propos'd alliance, by her father,
And even herself accepted, be not scorn'd.
I love her too—I never knew till now
To what a pitch I love her. Oh, she shot
Ten thousand charms into my inmost soul!
She look'd so mild, so amiably gentle,
She bow'd her head, she glow'd with such confusion,

Such loveliness of modesty! She is,
In gracious mind, in manners, and in person,
The perfect model of all female beauty!
She must be mine—She is!—If yet her heart
Consents not to my happiness, her duty,
Join'd to my tender cares, will gain so much
Upon her generous nature—That will follow.
The man of sense who acts a prudent part,
Not flattering steals, but forms himself the heart.
[Exit.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—The Garden belonging to Sir-FREDI'S House.

Enter SIGISMUNDA and LAURA.

SIGISMUNDA, with a letter in her hand.

'Tis done!—I am a slave!—The fatal vow
Has pass'd my lips!—Methought in those sad moments,

The tombs around, the saints, the darken'd altar,
And all the trembling shrines with horror shook.
But here is still new matter of distress.

Oh, Tancred, cease to persecute me more!
Oh, grudge me not some calmer state of wo;
Some quiet gloom to shade my hopeless days,
Where I may never hear of love and thee!—
Has Laura, too, conspir'd against my peace?
Why did you take this letter:—Bear it back—
I will not court new pain.

[Giving her the letter.]
Laura. Madam, Rodolpho
Urg'd me so much, nay, even with tears conjur'd
me,

But this once more to serve th' unhappy king—
For such he said he was—that though enrag'd,
Equal with thee, at his inhuman falsehood,
I could not to my brother's fervent prayers
Refuse this office—Read it—His excuses
Will only more expose his falsehood.

Sig. No;
It suits not Osmond's wife to read one line
From that contagious hand—she knows too well!

Laura. He paints him out distress'd beyond expression;
Even on the point of madness. Wild as winds,
And fighting seas, he raves. His passions mix,

With ceaseless rage, all in each giddy moment.
He dies to see you, and to clear his faith.

Sig. Save me from that!—That would be worse than all!

Laura. I but report my brother's words; who then

Began to talk of some dark imposition,
That had deceived us all; when interrupted,
We heard your father and Earl Osmond near,
As summon'd to Constantia's court they went.

Sig. Ha! imposition?—Well, if I am doom'd
To be, o'er all my sex, the wretch of love,
In vain I would resist—Give me the letter—
To know the worst is some relief—Alas,
It was not thus, with such dire palpitations,
That, Tancred, once I us'd to read thy letters.

[Attempting to read the letter, gives it to LAURA.]

Ah, fond remembrance blinds me!—Read it, Laura.

Laura. [Reads.] Deliver me, Sigismunda, from that most exquisite misery which a faithful heart can suffer—to be thought base by her, from whose esteem even virtue borrows new charms. When I submitted to my cruel situation, it was not falsehood you beheld, but an excess of love. Rather than endanger that, I for a while gave up my honour. Every moment till I see you, stabs me with severer pangs than real guilt itself can feel. Let me then conjure you to meet me in the garden, toward the close of the day, when I will explain this mystery. We have been most inhumanly abused; and that by the means of the very paper which I gave you, from the warmest sincerity of love, to assure to you the heart and hand of

TANCRED.

Sig. There, Laura, there the dreadful secret sprung!

That paper! ah, that paper! it suggests
A thousand horrid thoughts—I to my father
Gave it; and he perhaps—I dare not cast
A look that way—If yet indeed you love me,
Oh, blast me not, kind Tancred, with the truth!
Oh, pitying, keep me ignorant for ever.
What strange peculiar misery is mine?
Reduc'd to wish the man I love were false!
Why was I hurried to a step so rash?
Repairless wo!—I might have waited, sure,
A few short hours—No duty that forbade—
I ow'd thy love that justice; till this day
Thy love an image of all perfect goodness!
A beam from Heaven that glow'd with every virtue!

And have I thrown this prize of life away?
The piteous wreck of one distracted moment?
Ah, the cold prudence of remorseless age!
Ah, parents, traitors to your children's bliss!
Ah, curs'd, ah, blind revenge!—On every hand
I was betray'd—You, Laura, too, betray'd me!

Laura. Who, who but he, whate'er he writes, betray'd you?

Or false or pusillanimous. For once,
I will with you suppose, that his agreement
To the king's will was forg'd—Though forg'd by whom?

Your father scorns the crime—Yet what avails it?
This, if it clears his truth, condemns his spirit.
A youthful king, by love and honour fir'd,
Patient to sit on his insulted throne,
And let an outrage, of so high a nature,
Unpunish'd pass, uncheck'd, uncontradicted—
Oh, 'tis a meanness equal even to falsehood.

Sig. Laura, no more—We have already judg'd Too largely without knowledge. Oft, what seems
A trifle, a mere nothing, by itself,

In some nice situation turns the scale
Of fate, and rules the most important actions.
Yes, I begin to feel a sad presage!
I am undone, from that eternal source
Of human woes—the judgment of the passions.
But what have I to do with these excuses?
O, cease, my treacherous heart, to give them room
It suits not thee to plead a lover's cause:
Even to lament my fate is now dishonour.
Nought now remains, but with relentless purpose
To shun all interviews, all clearing up
Of this dark scene; to wrap myself in gloom,
In solitude and shades; to there to devour
The silent sorrows ever swelling here;
And since I must be wretched—for I must—
To claim the mighty misery myself,
Engross it all, and spare a hapless father.
Hence, let me fly!—The hour approaches—

Laura. Madam,
Behold he comes—the king—
Sig. Heavens! how escape?
No—I will stay—This one last meeting—Leave me. [Exit LAURA.]

Enter TANCRED.

Tan. And are these long, long hours of torture past?
My life! my Sigismunda!

[Throwing himself at her feet.]
Sig. Rise, my lord.
To see my sovereign thus no more becomes me.
Tan. O, let me kiss the ground on which you tread!

Let me exhale my soul in softest transport!
Since I again behold my Sigismunda! [Rising.]
Unkind! how couldst thou ever deem me false?
How thus dishonour love?—Oh, I could much Imbitter my complaint!—How low were then Thy thoughts of me? How didst thou then affront

The human heart itself? After the vows,
The fervent truth, the tender protestations,
Which mine has often pour'd, to let thy breast,
Whate'er th' appearance was, admit suspicion?
Sig. How! when I heard myself your full consent

To the late king's so just and prudent will?
Heard it before you read, in solemn senate?
When I beheld you give your royal hand
To her, whose birth and dignity of right
Demands that high alliance? Yes, my lord,
You have done well. The man whom Heaven appoints

To govern others, should himself first learn
To bend his passions to the sway of reason.
In all you have done well; but when you bid
My humble hopes look up to you again,
And sooth'd with wanton cruelty my weakness—
That too was well—My vanity deserv'd
The sharp rebuke, whose fond extravagance
Could ever dream to balance your repose,
Your glory, and the welfare of a people.

Tan. Chide on, chide on. Thy soft re-proaches now,
Instead of wounding, only sooth my fondness.
No, no, thou charming consort of my soul!
I never lov'd thee with such faithful ardour,
As in that cruel, miserable moment
You thought me false; when even my honour stoop'd
To wear for thee a baffled face of baseness.
It was thy barbarous father, Sigismunda,

Who caught me in the toil. He turn'd that paper,
Meant for th' assuring bond of nuptial love
To ruin it for ever; he, he wrote
That forg'd consent, you heard, beneath my name.
Nay, dar'd before my outrag'd throne to read it!
Had he not been thy father—Ha! my love!
You tremble, you grow pale!

Sig. Oh, leave me, T'ancred!

Tan. No!—Leave thee!—Never! never till you set

My heart at peace, till these dear lips again
Pronounce thee mine! Without thee, I renounce Myself, my friends, the world—Here on this hand—

Sig. My lord, forget that hand, which never now
Can be to thine united—

Tan. Sigismunda!

What dost thou mean?—Thy words, thy look,
thy manner,

Seem to conceal some horrid secret—Heavens!—

No, that was wild; Distraction fires the thought!

Sig. Inquire no more—I never can be thine.

Tan. What, who shall interpose? Who dares attempt

To brave the fury of an injur'd king,
Who, ere he sees thee ravish'd from his hopes,
Will wrap all blazing Sicily in flames?—

Sig. In vain your power, my lord—'Tis fatal error,

Join'd to my father's unrelenting will,
Has plac'd an everlasting bar betwixt us—
I am—Earl Osmond's—wife.

Tan. Earl Osmond's wife!

[After a long pause, during which they look at one another with the highest agitation, and most tender distress.

Heavens! did I hear thee right? What! married? married!

Lost to thy faithful T'ancred? lost for ever!

Could thou then doom me to such matchless wo,
Without so much as hearing me?—Distraction!

Alas! what hast thou done? Ah, Sigismunda!

Thy rash credulity has done a deed,

Which, of two happiest lovers that ere felt

The blissful power, has made two finish'd wretches!

But—madness!—Sure, thou know'st it cannot be!

This hand is mine! a thousand, thousand vows—

Enter OSMOND.

Osm. [Snatching her hand from the King.]

Madam, this hand, by the most solemn rites,

A little hour ago, was given to me;

And did not sovereign honour now command me,

Never but with my life to quit my claim,

I would renounce it—thus!

Tan. Ha! who art thou?

Presumptuous man!

Sig. [Aside.] Where is my father? Heavens!

[Goes out.]

Osm. One thou shouldst better know—Yes—view me, one

Who can and will maintain his rights and honour,

Against a faithless prince, an upstart king,

Whose first base deed is what a harden'd tyrant

Would blush to act.

Tan. Insolent Osmond! know,

This upstart king will hurl confusion on thee,

And all who shall invade his sacred rights,

Prior to thine—thine, founded on compulsion,

Or infamous deceit, while his proceed

From mutual love, and free, long-plighted faith.

She is, and shall be mine!—I will annul,
By the high power with which the laws invest me,
Those guilty forins in which you have entrapp'd,
Basely entrapp'd to thy detested nuptials,
My queen betroth'd, who has my heart, my hand,
And shall partake my throne—If, haughty lord,
If this thou didst not know, then know it now;
And know, besides, as I have told thee this,
Shouldst thou but think to urge thy treason further—

Than treason more! treason against my love!—
Thy life shall answer for it.

Osm. Ha! my life!—

It moves my scorn to hear thy empty threats.

When was it that a Norman baron's life

Became so vile, as on the frown of kings

To hang?—Of that, my lord, the law must judge:

Or if the law be weak, my guardian sword—

Tan. Dare not to touch it, traitor, lest my rage

Break loose, and do a deed that misbecomes me.

Enter SIFFREDI.

Sif. My gracious lord, what is it I behold!

My sovereign in contention with his subjects?

Surely this house deserves from royal T'ancred

A little more regard, than to be made

A scene of trouble, and unseemly jars.

It grieves my soul, it baffles every hope,

It makes me sick of life, to see thy glory

Thus blasted in the bud.—Heavens! can your highness

From your exalted character descend,

The dignity of virtue; and, instead

Of being the protector of our rights,

The holy guardian of domestic bliss,

Unkindly thus disturb the sweet repose,

The secret peace of families, for which Alone the free-born race of man to laws

And government submitted?

Tan. My lord Siffredi,

Spare thy rebuke. The duties of my station

Are not to me unknown. But thou, old man,

Dost thou not blush to talk of rights invaded,

And of our best our dearest bliss disturb'd?

Thou, who with more than barbarous perfidy

Hast trampled all allegiance, justice, truth,

Humanity itself, beneath thy feet?

Thou know'st thou hast—I could, to thy confusion,

Return thy hard reproaches; but I spare thee

Before this lord, for whose ill-sorted friendship

Thou hast most basely sacrificed thy daughter.

Farewell, my lord.—For thee, lord constable,

Who dost presume to lift thy surly eye

To my soft love, my gentle Sigismunda,

I once again command thee, on thy life—

Yes—chew thy rage—but mark me—on thy life,

No further urge thy arrogant pretensions! [Exit.]

Osm. Ha! Arrogant pretensions! Heaven and earth!

What! arrogant pretensions to my wife?

My wedded wife! Where are we? in a land

Of civil rule, of liberty and laws?—

Not, on my life, pursue them?—Giddy prince!

My life disdains thy nod. It is the gift

Of parent Heaven, who gave me too an arm,

A spirit to defend it against tyrants.

The Norman race, the sons of mighty Rollo,

Who, rushing in a tempest from the north,

Great nurse of generous freemen, bravely won

With their own swords their seats, and still possess them

By the same noble tenure, are not us'd

To hear such language—If I now desist,
Then brand me for a coward! deem me villain!
A traitor to the public! by this conduct
Deceiv'd, betray'd, insulted, tyranniz'd.
Mine is a common cause. My arm shall guard,
Mix'd with my own, the rights of each Sicilian,
Of social life, and of mankind in general.
Ere to thy tyrant rage they fall a prey,
I shall find means to shake thy tottering throne,
Which this illegal, this perfidious usage
Forfeits at once, and crush thee in the ruins!
Constantia is my queen!

Sif. Lord constable,

Let us be steadfast in the right; but let us
Act with cool prudence, and with manly temper,
As well as manly firmness. True, I own,
Th' indignities you suffer are so high,
As might even justify what now you threaten.
But if, my lord, we can prevent the woes,
The cruel horrors of intestine war,
Yet hold untouch'd our liberties and laws;
Oh, let us, rais'd above the turbid sphere
Of little, selfish passions, nobly do it.
Nor to our hot, intemperate pride, pour out
A dire libation of Sicilian blood.

'Tis godlike magnanimity to keep,
When most provok'd, our reason calm and clear,
And execute her will from a strong sense
Of what is right, without the vulgar aid
Of heat and passion, which, though honest, bears us

Often too far. Remember that my house
Protects my daughter still; and, ere I saw her
Thus ravish'd from us by the arm of power,
This hand should act the Roman father's part.
Fear not; be temperate; all will yet be well.
I know the king. At first his passions burst
Quick as the lightning's flash; but in his breast
Honour and justice dwell.—Trust me, to reason
He will return.

Osm. He will!—By Heavens, he shall!—
You know the king—I wish, my Lord Siffredi,
That you had deign'd to tell me all you knew—
And would you have me wait, with duteous patience,

'Till he return to reason? Ye just powers!
When he has planted on our necks his foot,
And trod us into slaves; when his vain pride
Is cloy'd with our submission; if at last,
He finds his arm too weak to shake the frame
Of wide-establish'd order out of joint,
And overturn all justice; then, perchance,
He, in a fit of sickly, kind repentance,
May make a merit to return to reason.
No, no, my lord! there is a nobler way,
To teach the blind oppressive fury reason:
Oft has the lustre of avenging steel
Unseal'd her stupid eyes—The sword is reason!

Enter RODOLPHO with Guards.

Rod. My lord high constable of Sicily,
In the king's name, and by his special order,
I here arrest you prisoner of state.

Osm. What king? I know no king of Sicily,
Unless he be the husband of Constantia.

Rod. Then know him now—behold his royal orders

To bear you to the castle of Palermo.

Sif. Let the big torrent foam its madness off.
Submit, my lord—No castle long can hold
Our wrongs—This, more than friendship or alliance,

VOL. I... 5 G

66*

Confirms me thine; this binds me to thy fortunes,
By the strong tie of common injury,
Which nothing can dissolve—I grieve, Rodol-pho,

To see the reign in such unhappy sort Begin.

Osm. The reign! the usurpation call it!
This meteor king may blaze awhile, but soon
Must spend his idle terrors—Sir, lead on.
Farewell, my lord—more than my life and fortune,

Remember well, is in your hands—my honour!

Sif. Our honour is the same. My son, farewell—

We shall not long be parted. On these eyes
Sleep shall not shed his balm, till I behold thee
Restor'd to freedom, or partake thy bonds.

Even noble courage is not void of blame,
Till nobler patience sanctifies its flame.

[Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Chamber.

SIFFREDI alone.

The prospect lowers around. I found the king,
Though calm'd a little, with subsiding tempest,
As suits his generous nature, yet in love
Abated nought, most ardent in his purpose;
Inexorably fix'd, whate'er the risk,
To claim my daughter, and dissolve this marriage—

I have embark'd, upon a perilous sea,
A mighty treasure. Here the rapid youth,
Th' impetuous passions of a lover-king,
Check my bold purpose; there, the jealous pride,
Th' impatient honour of a haughty lord,
Of the first rank, in interest and dependence
Near equal to the king, forbid retreat.
My honour too, the same unchang'd conviction,
That these my measures were, and still remain,
Of absolute necessity to save
The land from civil fury, urge me on.
But how proceed?—I only faster rush
Upon the desperate evils I would shun.
Whate'er the motive be, deceit, I fear,
And harsh unnatural force, are not the means
Of public welfare, or of private bliss.—
Bear witness, Heaven! thou mind-inspecting eye!
My breast is pure. I have preferr'd my duty,
The good and safety of my fellow-subjects,
To all those views that fire the selfish race
Of mortal men, and mix them in eternal broils.

Enter an OFFICER belonging to SIFFREDI.

Off. My lord, a man of noble port, his face
Wrapp'd in disguise, is earnest for admission.

Sif. Go bid him enter—[OFFICER goes out.
Ha! wrapp'd in disguise!

And at this late, unseasonable hour!
When o'er the world tremendous midnight reigns,
By the dire gloom of raging tempest doubled—

Enter OSMOND, discovering himself.

Sif. What! ha! Earl Osmond, you?—Wet-come, once more,
To this glad roof!—But why in this disguise?
Would I could hope the king exceeds his promise!
I have his faith soon as to-morrow's sun
Shall gild Sicilia's cliffs, you shall be free.—
Has some good angel turn'd his heart to justice?

Osm. It is not by the favour of Count Tancred That I am here. As much I scorn his favour, As I defy his tyranny and threats—
Our friend Goffredo, who commands the castle, On my parole, ere dawn to render back My person, has permitted me this freedom. Know then; the faithless outrage of to-day, By him committed whom you call the king, Has rous'd Constantia's court. Our friends, the friends

Of virtue, justice, and of public faith,
Ripe for revolt, are in high ferment all.
This, this, they say, exceeds whate'er deform'd
The miserable days we saw beneath
William the Bad. This saps the solid base,
At once, of government and private life:
This shameless imposition on the faith,
The majesty of senates, this lewd insult,
This violation of the rights of men;
Added to these, his ignominious treatment
Of her, the illustrious offspring of our kings,
Sicilia's hope, and now our royal mistress.
You know, my lord, how grossly these infringe
The late king's will, which orders, if Count Tan-
cred

Make not Constantia partner of his throne,
That he be quite excluded the succession,
And she to Henry given, king of the Romans,
The potent emperor Barbarossa's son,
Who seeks, with earnest instance, her alliance.
I thence of you, as guardian of the laws,
As guardian of this will, to you intrusted,
Desire, nay, more, demand your instant aid,
To see it put in vigorous execution.

Sif. You cannot doubt, my lord, of my concurrence.

Who, more than I, have labour'd this great point?
'Tis my own plan; and if I drop it now,
I should be justly branded with the shame
Of rash advice, or despicable weakness.
But let us not precipitate the matter.
Constantia's friends are numerous and strong;
Yet, Tancred's, trust me, are of equal force:
E'er since the secret of his birth was known,
The people all are in a tumult hurl'd,
Of boundless joy, to hear their lives a prince
Of mighty Guiscard's line. Numbers, besides,
Of powerful barons, who at heart had pin'd,
To see the reign of their renown'd forefathers
Won by immortal deeds of matchless valour,
Pass from the gallant Normans to the Suevoi,
Will with a kind of rage, espouse his cause—
'Tis so, my lord—be not by passion blinded—
'Tis surely so—Oh, if our prating virtue
Dwells not in words alone—Oh, let us join,
My generous Osmond, to avert these woes,
And yet sustain our tottering Norman kingdom.

Osm. But how, Siffredi, how?—If by soft means

We can maintain our rights, and save our country,
May his unnatural blood first stain the sword,
Who with unpitying fury first shall draw it!

Sif. I have a thought—The glorious work be thine.

But it requires an awful flight of virtue,
Above the passions of the vulgar breast,
And thence from thee I hope it, noble Osmond—
Suppose my daughter, to her God devoted,
Were plac'd within some convent's sacred verge,
Beneath the dread protection of the altar—

Osm. Ere then, by Heavens! I would devoutly shave

My holy scalp, turn wailing monk myself,
And pray incessant for the tyrant's safety.—
What! How! because an insolent invader,
A sacrilegious tyrant, in contempt
Of all those noblest rights, which to maintain
Is man's peculiar pride, demands my wife;
That I shall thus betray the common cause
Of human kind,—famely yield her up,
Even in the manner you propose?—Oh, then
I were supremely vile! degraded! sham'd!
The scorn of manhood! and abhor'd of honour!

Sif. There is, my lord, an honour, the calm
child

Of reason, of humanity, and mercy,
Superior far to this punctilious demon,
That singly minds itself, and oft embroils
With proud barbarian niceties the world.

Osm. My lord, my lord, I cannot brook your prudence;

It holds a pulse unequal to my blood—
Unblemish'd honour is the flower of virtue!
The vivifying soul! and he who slights it,
Will leave the other dull and lifeless dross.

Sif. No more—You are too warm.

Osm. You are too cool.

Sif. 'Too cool, my lord? I were indeed too cool,
Not to resent this language, and to tell thee—
I wish Earl Osmond were as cool as I
To his own selfish bliss—ay, and as warm
To that of others—But of this no more—
My daughter is thy wife—I gave her to thee,
And will, against all force, maintain her thine.
But think not I will catch thy headlong passions,
Whirl'd in a blaze of madness o'er the land;
Or, till the last extremity compel me,
Risk the dire means of war—The king, tomorrow,

Will set you free; and, if, by gentle means
He does not yield my daughter to your arms,
And wed Constantia, as the will requires,
Why then expect me on the side of justice—
Let that suffice.

Osm. It does—Forgive my heat.

My rankled mind, by injuries inflam'd,
May be too prompt to take, and give offence.

Sif. 'Tis past—Your wrongs, I own, may well transport

The wisest mind—But henceforth, noble Os-
mond,

Do me more justice, honour more my truth,
Nor mark me with an eye of squint suspicion—
These jars apart—You may repose your soul
On my firm faith, and unremitting friendship.
Of that I sure have given exalted proof,
And the next sun we see shall prove it further—
Return, my son, and from your friend Goffredo
Release your word. There try, by soft repose,
To calm your breast.

Osm. Bid the vex'd ocean sleep,
Swept by the pinions of the raging north—
But your frail age, by care and toil exhausted,
Demands the balm of all-repairing rest.

Sif. Soon as to-morrow's dawn shall streak the skies,

I, with my friends in solemn state assembled,
Will to the palace, and demand your freedom,
Then by calm reason, or by higher means,
The king shall quit his claim, and, in the face
Of Sicily, my daughter shall be yours.
Farewell!

Osm. My lord, good night. [Exit SIFFREDI.
[After a long pause.] I like him not—

Yes—I have mighty matter of suspicion.
 'Tis plain. I see it lurking in his breast,
 He has a foolish fondness for this king—
 My honour is not safe, while here my wife
 Remains—Who knows but he, this very night,
 May bear her to some convent, as he mentioned—
 The king too—though I smother'd up my rage,
 I mark'd it well—will set me free to-morrow.
 Why not to-night? He has some dark design—
 By Heavens, he has!—I am abus'd most grossly;
 Made the vile tool of this old statesman's schemes;
 Married to one—ay, and he knew it—one
 Who loves young Tancred! Hence her swooning, tears,
 And all her soft distress, when she disgrac'd me,
 By basely giving her perfidious hand
 Without her heart—Hell and perdition! this,
 This is the perfidy!—this is the fell,
 The keen, envenom'd, exquisite disgrace,
 Which, to a man of honour, even exceeds
 The falsehood of the person—But I now
 Will rouse me from the poor tame lethargy,
 By my believing fondness cast upon me.
 I will not wait his crawling timid motions,
 Perhaps to blind me meant, which he to-morrow
 Has promis'd to pursue. No! ere his eyes
 Shall open on to-morrow's orient beam,
 I will convince him that Earl Osmond never
 Was form'd to be his dupe—I know full well
 Th' important weight and danger of the deed:
 But to a man, whom greater dangers press,
 Driven to the brink of infamy and horror,
 Rashness itself, and utter desperation,
 Are the best prudence.—I will bear her off
 This night, and lodge her in a place of safety:
 I have a trusty band that waits not far.
 Hence! let me lose no time—One rapid moment
 Should ardent form, at once, and execute
 A bold design—'Tis fix'd—'Tis done!—yes, then,
 When I have seiz'd the prize of love and honour,
 And with a friend secur'd her; to the castle
 I will repair, and claim Goffredo's promise,
 To rise with all his garrison—My friends
 With brave impatience wait. The mine is laid,
 And only wants my kindling touch to spring.

[Exit.

SCENE II.—SIGISMUNDA'S Apartment.

Enter SIGISMUNDA and LAURA. Thunder.Laura. Heavens! 'tis a fearful night!Sig. Ah! the black rage

Of midnight tempest, or th' assuring smiles

Of radiant morn, are equal all to me.

Nought now has charms or terrors to my breast,

The seat of stupid wo!—Leave me, my Laura.

Kind rest, perhaps, may hush my woes a little.

Oh, for that quiet sleep that knows no morning!

Laura. Madam, indeed I know not how to go.

Indulge my fondness—Let me watch a while

By your sad bed, 'till these dread hours shall pass.

Sig. Alas! what is the toil of elements,

[Thunder.

This idle perturbation of the sky,

To what I feel within?—Oh, that the fires

Of pitying Heaven would point their fury here!

Good night, my dearest Laura.

Laura. Oh, I know not

What this oppression means—But 'tis with pain,

With tears I can persuade myself to leave you—

Well then—Good night, my dearest Sigismunda.

[Exit.

Sig. And am I then alone?—The most undone,

Most wretched being now beneath the cope

Of this affrighting gloom that wraps the world—

I said I did not fear—Ah, me! I feel

A shivering horror run through all my powers!

Oh, I am nought but tumult, fears, and weakness!

And yet how idle fear when hope is gone,

Gone, gone for ever!—Oh thou gentle scene

[Looking towards her bed.

Of sweet repose, where, by th' oblivious draught

Of each sad toilsome day, thy peace restor'd,

Unhappy mortals lose their woes awhile,

Thou hast no peace for me!—What shall I do?

How pass this dreadful night, so big with terror!—Here, with the midnight shades, here will I sit, [Sitting down.

A prey to dire despair, and ceaseless weep

The hours away—Bless me—I heard a noise—

[Starting up.

No—I mistook—nothing but silence reigns,

And awful midnight, round—Again!—Oh, Heavens!

My lord the king!

Enter TANCRED.Tan. Be not alarm'd, my love!Sig. My royal lord, why at this midnight hour,

How came you hither?

Tan. By that secret way

My love contriv'd, when we, in happier days,

Us'd to devote these hours, so much in vain,

To vows of love, and everlasting friendship.

Sig. Why will you thus persist to add new stings

To her distress, who never can be thine?

Oh, fly me! fly! you know—

Tan. I know too much.

Oh, how I could reproach thee, Sigismunda!

Pour out my injur'd soul in just complaints!

But now the time permits not, these swift moments—

I told thee how thy father's artifice

Forc'd me to seem perfidious in thy eyes.

Ah, fatal blindness! not to have observ'd

The mingled pangs of rage and love that shook
me:

When by my cruel public situation

Compell'd, I only feign'd consent, to gain

A little time, and more secure thee mine.

E'er since—a dreadful interval of care!

My thoughts have been employ'd, not without hope,

How to defeat Siffredi's barbarous purpose.

But thy credulity has ruin'd all,

Thy rash, thy wild—I know not what to name it;

Oh, it has prov'd the giddy hopes of man

To be delusion all, and sickening folly!

Sig. Ah, generous Tancred! ah, thy truth destroys me!

Yes, yes, 'tis I, 'tis I alone am false!

My hasty rage, join'd to my tame submission,

More than the most exalted filial duty

Could e'er demand, has dash'd our cup of fate

With bitterness unequal'd—But, alas!

What are thy woes to mine?—to mine, just Heaven!

Now is thy turn of vengeance—hate, renounce me!

Oh, leave me to the fate I well deserve,

To sink in hopeless misery—at least,

Try to forget the worthless Sigismunda!

Tan. Forget thee! No! Thou art my soul itself!
I have no thought, no hope, no wish but thee!
Even this repented injury, the fears,
That rouse me all to madness, at the thought
Of losing thee, the whole collected pains
Of my full heart, serve but to make thee dearer.
Ah, how forget thee!—Much must be forgot,
Ere Tancred can forget his Sigismunda!

Sig. But you, my lord, must make that great effort.

Tan. Can Sigismunda make it?

Sig. Ah, I know not
With what success—But all that feeble woman
And love-entangled reason can perform,
I, to the utmost, will exert to do it.

Tan. Fear not—'Tis done!—If thou canst form the thought,
Success is sure—I am forgot already.

Sig. Ah, Tancred!—But, my lord, respect me more.

Think who I am—What can you now propose?

Tan. To claim the plighted vows which Heaven has heard,

To vindicate the rites of holy love
By faith and honour bound, to which compar'd
These empty forms, which have ensnar'd thy hand,

Are impious guile, abuse, and profanation—
Nay, as a king, whose high prerogative
By this unlicens'd marriage is affronted,
To bid the laws themselves pronounce it void.

Sig. Honour, my lord, is much too proud to catch

At every slender twig of nice distinctions.
These for the unfeeling vulgar may do well:
But those, whose souls are by the nicer rule
Of virtuous delicacy nobly sway'd,
Stand at another bar than that of laws.
Then cease to urge me—Since I am not born
To that exalted fate to be your queen—
Or, yet a dearer name—to be your wife!—
I am the wife of an illustrious lord
Of your own princely blood; and what I am,
I will with proper dignity remain.
Retire, my royal lord.—There is no means
To cure the wounds this fatal day has given.
We meet no more!

Tan. Oh, barbarous Sigismunda!
And canst thou talk this steadily; thus treat me
With such un pitying, unrelenting rigour?
Poor is the love, that rather than give up
A little pride, a little formal pride,
The breath of vanity, can bear to see
The man, whose heart was once so dear to thine,
By many a tender vow so mix'd together,
A prey to anguish, fury, and distraction!
Thou canst not surely make me such a wretch,
Thou canst not, Sigismunda!—Yet relent,
Oh; save us yet!—Rodolpho, with my guards,
Waits in the garden—Let us seize the moments
We ne'er may have again—With more than power

I will assert thee mine, with fairest honour.
The world shall even approve; each honest bosom

Swell'd with a kindred joy to see us happy.

Sig. The world approve! what is the world to me;

The conscious mind is its own awful world.—
And mine is fix'd—Distress me then no more;
Not all the heart can plead, (and it, alas,

Pleas but too much)—

And yet, perhaps, if thou wert not a king,
I know not, Tancred, what I might have done,
Then, then, my conduct, sanctified by love,
Could not be deem'd, by the severest judge,
The mean effect of interest or ambition.
But now, not all my partial heart can plead,
Shall ever shake th' unalterable dictates
That tyrannize my breast.

Tan. 'Tis well—No more—

I yield me to my fate—Yes, yes, inhuman!
Since thy barbarian heart is steel'd by pride,
Shut up to love and pity, here behold me
Cast on the ground, a vile and abject wretch!
Lost to all cares, all dignities, all duties!
Here will I grow, breathe out my faithful soul,
Here at thy feet—Death, death alone shall part us!

Sig. Have you then vow'd to drive me to perdition?

What can I more?—Yes, Tancred, once again
I will forget the dignity my station
Commands me to sustain—for the last time
Will tell thee, that, I fear, no ties, no duty,
Can ever root thee from my hapless bosom.
Oh, leave me! fly me! were it but in pity!—
To see what once we tenderly have lov'd,
Cut off from every hope—cut off for ever!
Is pain thy generosity should spare me,
Then rise, my lord; and if you truly love me,
If you respect my honour, nay, my peace,
Retire! for though th' emotions of my heart
Can ne'er alarm my virtue; yet, alas!
They tear it so, they pierce it with such anguish—
Oh, 'tis too much!—I cannot bear the conflict!

Enter OSMOND.

Osm. Turn, tyrant, turn! and answer to my honour,
For this thy base insufferable outrage!

Tan. Insolent traitor! think not to escape
Thyself my vengeance!

[They fight; OSMOND falls.]

Sig. Help, here! help!—Oh, Heavens!
[Throwing herself down by him.]
Alas, my lord, what meant your headlong rage?
That faith, which I this day, upon the altar,
To you devoted, is unblush'd, pure
As vestal truth; was resolutely yours,
Beyond the power of aught on earth to shake it.

Osm. Perfidious woman! die!—[Shortening his sword, he plunges it into her breast.] and to the grave

Attend a husband, yet but half aveng'd!

Tan. Oh, horror! horror! execrable villain!

Osm. And tyrant! thou!—thou shalt not o'er my tomb
Exult—'Tis well—'tis great! I die content!—

[Dies.]

Enter RODOLPHO and LAURA.

Tan. [Throwing himself down by SIGISMUNDA.]
Quick! here! bring aid!—All in Palermo bring,
Whose skill can save her!—Ah, that gentle bosom

Pours fast the streams of life.

Sig. All aid is vain;

I feel the powerful hand of death upon me—
But, oh! it sheds a sweetness through my fate,
That I am thine again; and without blame
May in my Tancred's arms resign my soul!

Tan. Oh, death is in that voice! so gently mild,
So sadly sweet, as mixes even with mine
The tears of hovering angels!—Mine again!—
And is it thus the cruel fates have join'd us?
Are these the horrid nuptials they prepare
For love like ours?—Is virtue thus rewarded?
Let not my impious rage accuse just Heaven!
Thou, Tancred, thou hast murder'd Sigismunda!
That furious man was but the tool of fate,
I, I the cause.—But I will do thee justice
On this deaf heart! that to thy tender wisdom
Refused an ear—Yes, death shall soon unite us.

Sig. Live, live, my Tancred!—Let my death suffice
To expiate all that may have been amiss.
May it appease the fates, avert their fury
From thy propitious reign! Meantime, of me
And thy glory mindful, live, I charge thee,
To guard our friends, and make thy people happy—

Enter SIFFREDI, fixed in astonishment and grief.

My father!—Oh, how shall I lift my eyes
To thee, my sinking father!

Sif. Awful Heaven!
I am chastis'd—My dearest child!—

Sig. Where am I?
A fearful darkness closes all around—
My friends! We needs must part—I must obey
Th' impetuous call!—Farewell, my Laura! cherish
My poor afflicted father's age—Rodolpho,
Now is the time to watch the unhappy king,
With all the care and tenderness of friendship.—
Oh, my dear father, bow'd beneath the weight
Of age and grief—the victim even of virtue,
Receive my last adieu!—Where art thou, Tancred?

Give me thy hand—But, ah, it cannot save me
From the dire king of terrors, whose cold power
Creeps o'er my heart—Oh!

Tan. How these pangs distract me!
Oh, lift thy gracious eyes!—Thou leav'st me then!

Thou leav'st me, Sigismunda!

Sig. Yet a moment—
I had, my Tancred, something more to say—
Yes—but thy love and tenderness for me,
Sure make it needless—Harbour no resentment
Against my father; venerate his zeal,
That acted from a principle of goodness,
From faithful love to thee—Live, and maintain
My innocence embalm'd, with holiest care
Preserve my spotless memory! Oh,—I die—
Eternal Mercy take my trembling soul!
Oh, 'tis the only sting of death to part
From those we love—from thee—farewell, my Tancred!

[Dies.]

Tan. Thus then!
[Flying to his sword, is held by RODOLPHO.]

Rod. Hold, hold, my lord!—Have you forgot
Your Sigismunda's last request already?

Tan. Off! set me free! Think not to bind me
down,

With barbarous friendship, to the rack of life!
What hand can shut the thousand, thousand gates

Which death still opens to the woes of mortals?—
I shall find means—No power in earth or heaven
Can force me to endure the hateful light,
Thus robb'd of all that lent it joy and sweetness!
Off, traitors, off! or my distracted soul

Will burst indignant from this jail of nature,
To where she beckons yonder—No, mild seraph,
Point not to life—I cannot linger here,
Cut off from thee—the miserable pity,
The scorn of human kind!—A trampled king!
Who let his mean, poor-hearted love, one moment,

To coward prudence stoop! who made it not
The first undoubting action of his reign,
To snatch thee to his throne, and there to shield thee,

Thy helpless bosom, from a ruffian's fury!—
Oh, shame! Oh, agony! Oh, the fell stings
Of late, of vain repentance!—Ha, my brain
Is all on fire! a wild abyss of thought!
Th' infernal world discloses! See! Behold him!
Lo! with fierce smiles he shakes the bloody steel,
And mocks my feeble tears—Hence, quickly,
hence!

Spurn his vile carcass! give it to the dogs!
Expose it to the winds and screaming ravens,
Or hurl it down that fiery steep to hell,
There with his soul to toss in flames for ever.
Ah, impotence of rage! What am I? Where?
Sad, silent, all!—The forms of dumb despair,
Around some mournful tomb.—What do I see?
The soft abode of innocence and love
Turn'd to the house of death! a place of horror!—

Ah, that poor corpse! pale! pale! deform'd with murder!
Is that my Sigismunda?

[Throws herself down by her.
Sif. [After a pathetic pause, looking on the scene before him.]

Have I liv'd
To these enfeebled years, by Heaven reserv'd
To be a dreadful monument of justice?—
Rodolpho, raise the king, and bear him hence
From this distracting scene of blood and death.
Alas! I dare not give him my assistance;
My care would only more inflame his rage.
Behold the fatal work of my dark hand,
That by rude force the passions would command,
That ruthless thought to root them from the breast;

They may be rul'd, but will not be oppress'd.
Taught hence, ye parents, who from nature stray,
And the great ties of social life betray;
Ne'er with your children act a tyrant's part:
'Tis yours to guide, not violate the heart.
Ye vainly wise, who o'er mankind preside,
Behold my righteous woes, and drop your pride;
Keep virtue's simple path before your eyes,
Nor think from evil good can ever rise.

EPILOGUE.

CRAMM'D to the throat with wholesome moral stuff.

Alas, poor audience! you have had enough.
Was ever hapless heroine of a play
In such a piteous plight as ours to-day?
Was ever woman so by love betray'd?
Match'd with two husbands, and yet—die a maid.

But bless me!—hold—what sounds are these I hear—
I see the Tragic Muse herself appear.

The back-scene opens, and discovers a romantic sylvan landscape; from which the Tragic Muse advances slowly to music, and speaks the following lines:

Hence with your flippant epilogue, that tries
To wipe the virtuous tears from British eyes;
That dares my moral, tragic scene profane,
With strains—at best, unsuited, light, and vain.
Hence from the pure unsully'd beams that play
In yon fair eyes where virtue shines—away!

Britons, to you from chaste Castalian groves,
Where dwell the tender, oft unhappy loves;
Where shades of heroes roam, each mighty
name,
And court my aid to rise again to fame;
To you I come, to freedom's noblest seat,
And in Britannia fix my last retreat.

In Greece and Rome, I watch'd the public weal;
The purple tyrant trembled at my steel:
Nor did I less o'er private sorrows reign,
And mend the melting heart with softer pain.
On France and You then rose my brightening star,
With social ray—The arts are ne'er at war.
Oh, as your fire and genius strongly blaze,
As yours are generous freedom's bolder lays,
Let not the Gallic taste leave yours behind,
In decent manners and in life refin'd;
Banish the motley mode, to tag low verse,
The laughing ballad to the mournful hearse.
When through five acts your hearts have learn'd to glow,
Touch'd with the sacred force of honest wo;
Oh, keep the dear impression on your breast,
Nor idly lose it for a wretched jest.

THE BEAUX' STRATAGEM:

A COMEDY,

IN FIVE ACTS.

BY GEORGE FARQUHAR.

REMARKS.

The Author of this play scarcely lived to see the great success of his lively comedy. He is said to have written it in the short space of six weeks, and during an illness, which, at last, carried him off. The frequent representation of this play, and the pleasure it always affords, are proofs of its intrinsic merit.

It was first acted at the Haymarket, in 1707; and was never better supported than by the dramatic corps of the present day.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—An Inn.

The bar-bell rings.—Enter BONIFACE, running.

Bon. Chamberlain, maid, Cherry, daughter Cherry! All asleep, all dead?

Enter CHERRY, running.

Cher. Here, here. Why d'ye bawl so, father? D'ye think we have no ears?

Bon. You deserve to have none, you young mix—the company of the Warrington coach has stood in the hall this hour, and nobody to show them to their chambers.

Cher. And let 'em wait, father: there's neither red coat in the coach, nor footman behind it.

Bon. But they threaten to go to another inn to-night.

Cher. That they dare not, for fear the coachman should overturn them to-morrow. [Ring-ing.] Coming, coming: here's the London coach arrived.

Several People, with trunks, &c. cross the stage.

Bon. Welcome, ladies.

Cher. Very welcome, gentlemen—Chamberlain, show the Lion and the Rose.

[Exit with the Company.]

Enter AIMWELL in a riding-habit. ARCHER as Footman, carrying a portmanteau.

Bon. This way, this way, gentlemen.

Aim. Set down the things; go to the stable, and see my horses well bred.

Arch. I shall, Sir.

[Exit.]

Aim. You're my landlord, I suppose?

Bon. Yes, Sir, I'm old Will Boniface; pretty well known upon this road, as the saying is!

Aim. O, Mr. Boniface, your servant.

Bon. O, Sir,—what will your honour please to drink? as the saying is.

Aim. I have heard your town of Litchfield much famed for ale: I think I'll taste that.

Bon. Sir, I have now in my cellar ten ton of the best ale in Staffordshire: 'tis smooth as oil, sweet as milk, clear as amber, and strong as brandy, and will be just fourteen years old the fifth day of next March, old style.

Aim. You are very exact, I find, in the age of your ale.

Bon. As punctual, Sir, as I am in the age of my children: I'll show you such ale.—Here, tapster, broach number 1706, as the saying is. Sir, you shall taste my anno domino—I have lived in Litchfield, man and boy, above eight and fifty years, and I believe have not consumed eight and fifty ounces of meat.

Aim. At a meal, you mean, if one may guess your sense by your bulk.

Bon. Not in my life, Sir; I have fed purely upon ale: I have eat my ale, drank my ale, and I always sleep upon my ale.

Enter TAPSTER with a tankard.

Now, Sir, you shall see. [Filling it out.] Your worship's health: Ha! delicious—fancy it Burgundy—only fancy it, and 'tis worth ten shillings a quart.

Aim. [Drinks.] 'Tis confounded strong.

Bon. Strong! it must be so, or how would we be strong that drink it?

Aim. And have you lived so long upon this ale, landlord?

Bon. Eight and fifty years, upon my credit, Sir; but it killed my wife, poor woman! as the saying is.

Aim. How came that to pass?

Bon. I don't know how, Sir; she would not let the ale take its natural course, Sir; she was for qualifying it every now and then with a dram, as the saying is: and an honest gentleman, that came this way from Ireland, made her a present of a dozen bottles of usquebaugh—but the poor woman was never well after; but, however, I was obliged to the gentleman, you know.

Aim. Why, was it the usquebaugh that killed her?

Bon. My lady Bountiful said so—she, good lady, did what could be done; she cured her of three tympanies, but the fourth carried her off; but she's happy and I am contented, as the saying is.

Aim. Who's that lady Bountiful you mentioned?

Bon. Od's my life, Sir, we'll drink her health. [Drinks.] My lady Bountiful is one of the best of women: her last husband, Sir Charles Bountiful, left her worth a thousand pounds a year; and I believe she lays out one half on't in charitable uses for the good of her neighbours; in short she has cured more people in and about Litchfield within ten years, than the doctors have killed in twenty, and that's a bold word.

Aim. Has the lady been any other way useful in her generation?

Bon. Yes, Sir, she has a daughter by Sir Charles, the finest woman in all our country, and the greatest fortune; she has a son too, by her first husband, 'squire Sullen, who married a fine lady from London 't'other day; if you please, Sir we'll drink his health.

Aim. What sort of a man is he?

Bon. Why, Sir, the man's well enough; says little, thinks less, and does—nothing at all; faith; but he's a man of great estate, and values nobody.

Aim. A sportsman, I suppose?

Bon. Yes, Sir; he's a man of pleasure; he plays at whist, and smokes his pipe eight and forty hours together, sometimes.

Aim. A fine sportsman, truly! and married, you say?

Bon. Ay, and to a curious woman, Sir.—But he's a—He wants it here, Sir.

[Pointing to his forehead]

Aim. He has it there you mean.

Bon. That's none of my business, he's my landlord, and so a man, you know would not—but 't'cod he's no better than—Sir, my humble service to you. [Drinks.] Though I value not a farthing what he can do me; I pay him his rent at quarter day; I have a good running trade; I have but one daughter, and I can give her—But no matter for that.

Aim. You're very happy, Mr. Boniface; pray, what other company have you in town?

Bon. A power of fine ladies; and then we have the French officers.

Aim. O, that's right; you have a good many of those gentlemen: pray, how do you like their company?

Bon. So well, as the saying is, that I could wish we had as many more of 'em: they're full of money, and pay double for every thing they have; they know, Sir, that we pay good round taxes for the taking of them, and so they are willing to reimburse us a little: one of 'em lodges in my house.

Enter ARCHER.

Arch. Landlord, there are some French gentlemen below that ask for you.

Bon. I'll wait on them—Does your master stay long in town, as the saying is?

[To ARCHER.]

Arch. I can't tell, as the saying is.

Bon. Come from London?

Arch. No.

Bon. Going to London, mayhap?

Arch. No.

Bon. An odd fellow, this. [Bar-bell rings.] I beg your worship's pardon, I'll wait on you in half a minute.

[Exit.]

Aim. The coast is clear, I see—Now, my dear Archer, welcome to Litchfield.

Arch. I thank thee, my dear brother in iniquity.

Aim. Iniquity! pry'thee leave canting; you need not change your style with your dress.

Arch. Don't mistake me, Aimwell, for 'tis still my maxim, that there's no scandal like rags, nor any crime so shameful as poverty. Men must not be poor; idleness is the root of all evil; the world's wide enough, let 'em bustle: fortune has taken the weak under her protection, but men of sense are left to their industry.

Aim. Upon which topic we proceed, and I think luckily hitherto. Would not any man swear now, that I am a man of quality, and you my servant; when, if our intrinsic value were known—

Arch. Come, come, we are the men of intrinsic value, who can strike our fortunes out of ourselves, whose worth is independent of accident in life, or revolutions in government; we have heads to get money, and hearts to spend it.

Aim. As to our hearts, I grant ye they are as willing tits as any within twenty degrees; but I can have no great opinion of our heads from the service they have done us hitherto, unless it be that they brought us from London, hither to Litchfield, made me a lord, and you my servant.

Arch. That's more than you could expect already. But what money have we left?

Aim. But two hundred pounds.

Arch. And our horses, clothes, rings, &c. Why, we have very good fortunes now for moderate people: and let me tell you, that this two hundred pounds, with the experience that we are now masters of, is a better estate than the ten thousand we have spent—our friends, indeed, began to suspect that our pockets were low; but we came off with flying colours, showed no signs of want, either in word or deed.

Aim. Ay, and our going to Brussels was a good pretence enough for our sudden disappearing; and, I warrant you, our friends imagine that we are gone a-volunteering.

Arch. Why, 'faith, if this project fails, it must e'en come to this. I am for venturing one of the hundreds, if you will, upon this knight errantry; but, in case it should fail, we'll reserve the other to carry us to some counterscarp, where we may die, as we lived, in a blaze.

Aim. With all my heart; and we have lived justly, Archer; we can't say that we have spent our fortunes, but that we have enjoyed 'em.

Arch. Right; so much pleasure for so much money; we have had our pennyworths; and had I millions, I would go to the same market again. O London, London! Well, we have had our share, and let us be thankful: past pleasures, for ought I know, are best, such as we are sure of: those to come may disappoint us. But you command for the day, and so I submit.—At Nottingham, you know, I am to be master.

Aim. And at Lincoln, I again.

Arch. Then at Norwich I mount, which, I think, shall be our last stage! for if we fail there, we'll embark for Holland, bid adieu to Venus, and welcome Mars.

Aim. A match! mum.

Enter BONIFACE.

Bon. What will your worship please to have for supper?

Aim. What have you got?

Bon. Sir, we have a delicate piece of beef in the pot, and a pig at the fire.

Aim. Good supper meat, I must confess—I can't eat beef, landlord.

Arch. And I hate pig.

Aim. Hold your prating sirrah! Do you know who you are? [Aside.]

Bon. Please to bespeak something else; I have every thing in the house.

Aim. Have you any veal?

Bon. Veal! Sir, we had a delicate loin of veal on Wednesday last.

Aim. Have you got any fish, or wild fowl?

Bon. As for the fish, truly, Sir, we are an inland town, and indifferently provided with fish, that's the truth on't; but then for wild fowl!—we have a delicate couple of rabbits.

Aim. Get me the rabbits fricasseed.

Bon. Fricasseed! Lard, Sir, they'll eat much better smothered with onions.

Arch. Pshaw! rot your onions.

Aim. Again, sirrah!—Well, landlord, what you please; but hold, I have a small charge of money, and your house is so full of strangers, that I believe it may be safer in your custody than mine: for when this fellow of mine get's drunk, he minds nothing—Here, sirrah, reach me the strong box.

Arch. Yes, Sir—this will give us reputation.

[Aside—brings the box.]

Aim. Here, landlord, the locks are sealed down, both for your security and mine; it holds somewhat above two hundred pounds: if you doubt it, I'll count them to you after supper; but be sure you lay it where I may have it at a minute's warning; for my affairs are a little dubious at present; perhaps I may be gone in half an hour, perhaps I may be your guest till the best part of that be spent; and pray order your hostler to keep my horses ready saddled: but one thing above the rest, I must beg that you will let this fellow have none of your anno domino, as you call it; for he's the most insufferable sot—Here, sirrah, light me to my chamber.

Arch. Yes, Sir. [Exit, lighted by ARCHER.]

Bon. Cherry! daughter Cherry!

Enter CHERRY.

Cher. D'ye call, father?

Bon. Ay, child: you must lay by this box for the gentleman, 'tis full of money.

Cher. Money! is all that money? why sure, father, the gentleman comes down to be chosen parliament-man. Who is he?

Bon. I don't know what to make of him; he talks of keeping his horses ready saddled, and of going, perhaps, at a minute's warning, or of staying, perhaps, till the best part of this be spent.

Cher. Ay! ten to one, father, he's a highwayman.

Bon. A highwayman! Upon my life, girl, you have hit it, and this box is some new purchased booty.—Now, could we find him out, the money were ours.

Cher. He don't belong to our gang.

Bon. What horses have they?

Cher. The master rides upon a black.

Bon. A black! ten to one, the man upon the black mare; and since he don't belong to our fraternity, we may betray him with a safe conscience. I don't think it lawful to harbour any rogues but my own. Lookye, child, as the saying is, we must go cunningly to work; proofs we must have; the gentleman's servant loves drink, I'll ply him that way; and ten to one he loves a wench; you must work him 't'other way.

Cher. Father, would you have me give my secret for his?

Bon. Consider, child, there's two hundred pounds to boot. [Ringing without.] Coming coming—Child, mind your business. [Exit.]

Cher. What a rogue is my father!—My father! I deny it—My mother was a good, generous, free-bearded woman, and I can't tell how far her good nature might have extended for the good of her children. This landlord of mine, for I think I can call him no more, would betray his guest, and his daughter into the bargain—by a footman too!

Enter ARCHER.

Arch. What footman, pray, mistress, is so happy as to be the subject of your contemplation?

Cher. Whoever he is, friend, he'll be but little the better for 't.

Arch. I hope so, for I'm sure you did not think of me.

Cher. Suppose I had!

Arch. Why, then, you're but even with me; for the minute I came in, I was considering in what manner I should make love to you.

Cher. Love to me, friend!

Arch. Yes, child.

Cher. Child! Manners: if you keep a little more distance, friend, it would be much better.

Arch. Distance! good night, saucebox.

[Going.]

Cher. A pretty fellow—I like his pride—Sir! pray, Sir, you see, Sir, [ARCHER returns.] I have the credit to be trusted with your master's fortune here, which sets me a degree above his footman. I hope, Sir, you an't affronted.

Arch. Let me look you full in the face, and I'll tell you whether you can affront me or not—'Sdeath, child, you have a pair of delicate eyes, and you don't know what to do with 'em.

Cher. Why, Sir, don't I see every body?

Arch. Ay, but if some women had them, they would kill every body.—Pr'ythee, instruct me; I would fain make love to you, but I don't know what to say.

Cher. Why, did you never make love to any body before?

Arch. Never to a person of your figure, I can assure you, Madam; my addresses have always been confined to persons within my own sphere; I never aspired so high before. [Sings.]

*But you look so bright,
And are dressed so tight, &c.*

Cher. What can I think of this man? [Aside.] Will you give me that song, Sir?

Arch. Aye, my dear, take it while it is warm. [Kisses her.] Death and fire! her lips are honeycombs.

Cher. And I wish there had been a swarm of bees too, to have stung you for your impudence.

Arch. There's a swarm of Cupids, my little Venus, that has done the business much better.

Cher. This fellow is misbegotten as well as I. [Aside.] What's your name, Sir?

Arch. Name! 'Egad, I have forgot it. [Aside.] Oh, Martin.

Cher. Where was you born?

Arch. In St. Martin's parish.

Cher. What was your father?

Arch. Of—of—St. Martin's parish.

Cher. Then, friend, good night.

Arch. I hope not.

Cher. You may depend upon't.

Arch. Upon what?

Cher. That you're very impudent.

Arch. That you're very handsome.

Cher. That you're a footman.

Arch. That you're an angel.

Cher. I shall be rude.

Arch. So shall I.

Cher. Let go my hand.

Arch. Give me a kiss.

[Kisses her.]

Bon. [Without.] Cherry, Cherry!

Cher. I'm—My father calls! you plaguy devil, how dare you stop my breath so?—Offer to follow me one step, if you dare. [Exit.]

Arch. A fair challenge, by this light; this is a pretty fair opening for an adventure; but we are knight-errants, and so fortune be our guide.

[Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Gallery in LADY BOUNTIFUL'S House.

MRS. SULLEN and DORINDA meeting.

Dor. 'Morrow, my dear sister; are you for church this morning?

Mrs. S. Any where, to pray; for Heaven alone can help me; but I think, Dorinda, there's no form of prayer in the liturgy against bad husbands.

Dor. But there's a form of law at Doctors' Commons; and I swear, sister Sullen, rather than see you thus continually discontented, I would advise you to apply to that: for, besides the part that I bear in your vexatious broils, as being sister to the husband, and friend to the wife, your examples give me such an impression of matrimony, that I shall be apt to condemn my person to a long vacation all its life. But supposing, Madam, that you brought it to a case of separation, what can you urge against your husband? My brother is, first, the most constant man alive.

Mrs. S. The most constant man, I grant ye.

Dor. He never sleeps from you.

Mrs. S. No, he always sleeps with me.

Dor. He allows you a maintenance suitable to your quality.

Mrs. S. A maintenance! Do you take me, Madam, for an hospital child, that I must sit down and bless my benefactors for meat, drink, and clothes? As I take it, Madam, I brought your brother ten thousand pounds, out of which I might expect some pretty things called pleasures.

Dor. You share in all the pleasures the country affords.

Mrs. S. Country pleasures! Racks and torments! Dost think, child, that my limbs were made for leaping of ditches, and clambering over stiles; or, that my parents, wisely foreseeing my future happiness in country pleasures, had early instructed me in the rural accomplishments of drinking fat ale, playing at whist, and smoking tobacco with my husband; or of spreading of plaisters, brewing of diet drinks, and stilling of rosemary-water, with the good old gentlewoman, my mother-in-law?

Dor. I'm sorry, Madam, that it is not more in our power to divert you; I could wish, indeed, that our entertainments were a little more polite, or your taste a little less refined; but pray, Madam, how came the poets and philosophers, that laboured so much in hunting after pleasure, to place it at last in a country life?

Mrs. S. Because they wanted money, child, to find out the pleasures of the town. Did you ever hear of a poet or a philosopher worth ten thousand pounds? If you can show me such a man, I'll lay you fifty pounds, you'll find him somewhere within the weekly bills. Not that I disapprove rural pleasures, as the poets have painted them in their landscapes: every Phillis has her Corydon; every murmuring stream, and every flowery mead, gives fresh alarm to love. Besides, you'll find that the couples were never married. But yonder I see my Corydon, and a sweet swain it is, heaven knows! Come, Dorinda, don't be angry; he's my husband, and your brother; and, between both, is he not a sad brute?

Dor. I have nothing to say to your part of him; you're the best judge.

Mrs. S. O, sister, sister! if ever you marry, beware of a sullen, silent sot, one that's always musing, but never thinks.—There's some diversion in a talking blockhead; and, since the woman must wear chains, I would have the pleasure of hearing 'em rattle a little. Now you shall see: but take this by the way; he came home this morning at the usual hour of four, wakened me out of a sweet dream of something else, by tumbling over the tea-table, which he broke all to pieces. After his man and he had rolled about the room, like sick passengers in a storm, he comes flounce into bed, dead as a salmon into a fishmonger's basket; his feet cold as ice; his breath hot as a furnace—Oh! matrimony! matrimony!—he tosses up the clothes with a barbarous swing over his shoulders, disorders the whole economy of my bed, leaves me half naked, and my whole night's comfort is the tunable serenade of that wakeful nightingale, his nose.—O, the pleasure of counting the melancholy clock by a snoring husband!—But now, sister, you shall see how handsomely, being a well-bred man, he will beg my pardon.

Enter SULLEN.

Sul. My head aches consunedly.

Mrs. S. Will you be pleased, my dear, to drink tea with us this morning; it may do your head good?

Sul. No.

Dor. Coffee, brother?

Sul. Pshaw!

Mrs. S. Will you please dress, and go to church with me? the air may help you.

Sul. Scrub!

Enter SCRUB.

Scrub. Sir!

Sul. What day o' th' week is this?

Scrub. Sunday, an't please your worship.

Sul. Sunday! bring me a dram; and d'ye hear, set out the venison pasty and a tankard of strong beer, upon the hall table: I'll go to breakfast.

[Going.]

Dor. Stay, stay brother, you sha'n't get off so; you were very naughty last night, and must make your wife reparation. Come, come, brother, wont you ask pardon?

Sul. For what?

Dor. For being drunk last night.

Sul. I can afford it, can't I?

Mrs. S. But I can't, Sir.

Sul. Then you may let it alone.

Mrs. S. But I must tell you, Sir, that this is not to be borne.

Sul. I'm glad on't.

Mrs. S. What is the reason, Sir, that you use me thus inhumanly?

Sul. Scrub!

Scrub. Sir!

Sul. Get the things ready to shave my head.

[Exit.]

Mrs. S. Have a care of coming near his temples, Scrub, for fear you meet something there that may turn the edge of your razor. [Exit Scrub.] Inveterate stupidity! did you ever know so hard, so obstinate, a spleen as his? O, sister, sister! I shall never have any good of the beast till I get him to town; London, dear London, is the place for managing and breaking a husband.

Dor. And has not a husband the same opportunities for humbling a wife?

Mrs. S. No, no, child; 'tis a standing maxim in conjugal discipline, that, when a man would enslave his wife, he hurries her into the country; and when a lady would be arbitrary with her husband, she wheedles her booby up to town.—A man dare not play the tyrant in London, because there are so many examples to encourage the subject to rebel. O, Dorinda, Dorinda! a fine woman may do any thing in London. O' my conscience, she may raise an army of forty thousand men.

Dor. I fancy, sister, you have a mind to be trying your power that way here in Litchfield; you have drawn the French count to your colours already.

Mrs. S. The French are a people that can't live without their gallantries.

Dor. And some English that I know, sister, are not averse to such amusements.

Mrs. S. Well, sister, since the truth must out, it may do as well now as hereafter; I think one way to rouse my lethargic, sottish husband, is to give him a rival; security begets negligence in all people, and men must be alarmed to make 'em alert in their duty. Women are like pictures, of no value in the hands of a fool, till he hears men of sense bid high for the purchase.

Dor. This might do, sister, if my brother's understanding were to be convinced into a passion for you; but, I believe, there's a natural aversion on his side: and I fancy, sister, that you don't come much behind him, if you dealt fairly.

Mrs. S. I own it; we are united contradictions, fire and water. But I could be contented, with a great many other wives, to humour the censorious vulgar, and give the world an appearance of living well with my husband, could I bring him to dissemble a little kindness to keep me in countenance.

Dor. But how do you know, sister, but that instead of rousing your husband, by this artifice, to a counterfeited kindness, he should awake in a real fury.

Mrs. S. Let him.—If I can't entice him to the one, I would provoke him to the other.

Dor. But how must I behave myself between ye?

Mrs. S. You must assist me.

Dor. What, against my own brother?

Mrs. S. He's but half a brother, and I'm your entire friend. If I go a step beyond the bounds of honour, leave me; till then, I expect you should go along with me in every thing. The count is to dine here to-day.

Dor. 'Tis a strange thing, sister, that I can't like that man.

Mrs. S. You like nothing; your time is not come. Love and death have their frailties, and strike home one time or other.—You'll pay for all one day, I warrant ye.—But come, my lady's tea is ready, and 'tis almost church-time.

[Exeunt]

SCENE II.—The Inn.

Enter AIMWELL, dressed, and ARCHER.

Aim. And was she the daughter of the house?

Arch. The landlord is so blind as to think so; but I dare swear she has better blood in her veins.

Aim. Why dost think so?

Arch. Because the baggage has a pert je-ne-sçai-quoi; she reads plays, keeps a monkey, and is troubled with vapours.

Aim. By which discoveries, I guess that you know more of her.

Arch. Not yet, 'faith. The lady gives herself airs, forsooth; nothing under a gentleman.

Aim. Let me take her in hand.

Arch. Say one word more o'that, and I'll declare myself, spoil your sport there, and every where else: look ye, Aimwell, every one in his own sphere.

Aim. Right; and therefore you must pimp for your master.

Arch. In the usual forms, good Sir, after I have served myself—But to your business. You are so well dressed, Tom, and make so handsome a figure, that I fancy you may do execution in a country church.

Aim. There's something in that which may turn to advantage. The appearance of a stranger in a country church, draws as many gazers as a blazing star: no sooner he comes into the cathedral, but a train of whispers run buzzing round the congregation in a moment—Who is he? Whence comes he? Do you know him?—Then I, Sir, tips the verger half-a-crown; he pockets the simony, and inducts me into the best pew in the church; I pull out my snuff-box, turn myself round, bow to the bishop, or the dean, if he be the commanding officer, single out a beauty, rivet both my eyes on hers, set my nose a-bleeding by the strength of imagination, and show the whole church my concern, by my endeavouring to hide it! after the sermon, the whole town gives me to her for her lover, and by persuading the lady that I am dying for her, the tables are turned, and she in good earnest falls in love with me.

Arch. There's nothing in this, Tom, without a precedent; but instead of rivetting your eyes on a beauty, try to fix them upon a fortune: that's our business at present.

Aim. Pshaw! no woman can be a beauty without a fortune. Let me alone for a marksman.

Arch. Tom!

Aim. Ay!

Arch. When were you at church before, pray?

Aim. Um—I was there at the coronation.

Arch. And how can you expect a blessing by going to church now?

Aim. Blessing! Nay, Frank, I ask but for a wife. [Exit.]

Arch. Truly, the man is not very unreasonable in his demands. [Exit, at the opposite door.]

Enter BONIFACE and CHERRY.

Bon. Well, daughter, as the saying is, have you brought Martin to confess?

Cher. Pray, father, don't put me upon getting anything out of a man; I'm but young, you know, father, and don't understand wheedling.

Bon. Young! why, you jade, as the saying is, can any woman wheedle that is not young? Your mother was useless at five and twenty. Would you make your mother a whore and me a cuckold, as the saying is? I tell you, his silence confesses it, and his master spends his money so freely, and is so much a gentleman every manner of way, that he must be a highwayman.

Enter GIBBET, in a cloak.

Gib. Landlord, landlord, is the coast clear?

Bon. O, Mr. Gibbet, what's the news?

Gib. No matter; ask no questions; all's fair and honourable. Here, my dear Cherry, [Gives her a bag.] two hundred sterling pounds, as good as ever hanged or saved a rogue; lay 'em by with the rest; and here—three wedding or mourning rings—'tis much the same, you know.—Here, two silver-hilted swords: I took these from fellows that never show any part of their swords but the hilts. Here is a diamond necklace, which the lady hid in the privatest place in the coach, but I found it out. This gold watch I took from a pawnbroker's wife: it was left in her hands by a person of quality; there's the arms upon the case.

Cher. But who had you the money from?

Gib. Ah! poor woman, I pitied her!—from a poor lady just eloped from her husband; she had made up her cargo, and was bound for Ireland as hard as she could drive; she told me of her husband's barbarous usage, and so 'faith I left her half-a-crown. But I had almost forgot, my dear Cherry, I have a present for you.

Cher. What is't?

Gib. A pot of ceruse, my child, that I took out of a lady's under petticoat pocket.

Cher. What, Mr. Gibbet, do you think I paint?

Gib. Why, you jade, your betters do; I'm sure the lady I took it from had a coronet upon her handkerchief—Here, take my cloak, and go secure the premises.

Cher. I will secure 'em. [Exit.]

Bon. But, harkye, where's Hounslow and Bagshot?

Gib. They'll be here to-night.

Bon. D'ye know of any other gentleman o'the pad on the road.

Gib. No.

Bon. I fancy I have two that lodge in the house just now.

Gib. The devil! how do you smoke 'em?

Bon. Why, one is gone to church.

Gib. To church! That's suspicious I must confess.

Bon. And the other is now in his master's chamber; he pretends to be a servant to the other; we'll call him out, and pump him a little.

Gib. With all my heart.

Bon. Mr. Martin! Mr. Martin!

Enter ARCHER, brushing a hat, and singing.

Gib. The roads are consumed deep; I'm as dirty as Old Brentford at Christmas.—A good pretty fellow that;—whose servant are you, friend?

Arch. My master's.

Gib. Really.

Arch. Really.

Gib. That's much. That fellow has been at the bar, by his evasions:—but pray, Sir, what is your master's name?

Arch. Tall, all, dall. [Sings and brushes the hat.]—This is the most obstinate spot—

Gib. I ask you his name?

Arch. Name, Sir—Tall, all, dall—I never asked him his name in my life—Tall, all, dall.

Bon. What think you now?

Gib. Plain, plain; he talks now as if he were before a judge. But pray, friend, which way does your master travel?

Arch. A-horseback.

Gib. Very well again; an old offender—Right—But I mean does he go upwards or downwards?

Arch. Downwards I fear, Sir—T'all, lall.

Gib. I'm afraid thy fate will be a contrary way.

Bon. Ha, ha, ha! Mr. Martin, you are very arch.—This gentleman is only travelling towards Chester, and would be glad of your company, that's all. Come, captain, you'll stay to-night, I suppose; I'll show you a chamber—Come, captain.

Gib. Farewell, friend.

[Exeunt GIBBET and BONIFACE.]

Arch. Captain, your servant.—Captain! a pretty fellow! 'Sdeath! I wonder that the officers of the army don't conspire to beat all scoundrels in red but their own.

Enter CHERRY.

Cher. Gone, and Martin here! I hope he did not listen: I would have the merit of the discovery all my own, because I would oblige him to love me. [Aside.] Mr. Martin, who was that man with my father?

Arch. Some recruiting serjeant, or whipped-out trooper, I suppose.

Cher. All's safe, I find. [Aside.]

Arch. Come, my dear, have you conned over the catechism I taught you last night?

Cher. Come, question me.

Arch. What is love?

Cher. Love is I know not what, it comes I know not how, goes I know not when.

Arch. Very well, an apt scholar. [Chucks her under the chin.] Where does love enter?

Cher. Into the eyes.

Arch. And where go out?

Cher. I won't tell you.

Arch. What are the objects of that passion?

Cher. Youth, beauty, and clean linen.

Arch. The reason?

Cher. The two first are fashionable in nature, and the third at court.

Arch. That's my dear. What are the signs and tokens of that passion?

Cher. A stealing look, a stammering tongue, words improbable, designs impossible, and actions impracticable.

Arch. That's my good child; kiss me—What must a lover do to obtain a mistress?

Cher. He must adore the person that disdains him, he must bribe the chambermaid that betrays him, and court the footman that laughs at him! He must, he must—

Arch. Nay, child, I must whip you, if you don't mind your lesson; he must treat his—

Cher. O! ay. He must treat his enemies with respect, his friends with indifference, and all the world with contempt: he must suffer much, and fear more; he must desire much and hope little; in short he must embrace his ruin, and throw himself away.

Arch. Had ever man so hopeful a pupil as mine! Come, my dear, why is love called a riddle?

Cher. Because, being blind, he leads those that see; and, though a child, he governs a man.

Arch. Mighty well. And why is love pictured blind?

Cher. Because the painters, out of their weakness, or the privilege of their art, choose to hide those eyes they could not draw.

Arch. That's my dear little scholar, kiss me again—And why should love, that's a child, govern a man?

Cher. 'Cause that a child is the end of love.

Arch. Ah, so ends love's catechism—And now, my dear, we'll go in, and make my master's bed.

Cher. Hold, hold, Mr. Martin—you have taken a great deal of pains to instruct me, and what d'ye think I have learned by it?

Arch. What?

Cher. That your discourse and your habit are contradictions, and it would be nonsense in me to believe you a footman any longer.

Arch. 'Oons, what a witch it is!

Cher. Depend upon this, Sir; nothing in that garb shall ever tempt me: for though I was born to servitude, I hate it. Own your condition, swear you love me, and then—

Arch. And then we shall go make my master's bed?

Cher. Yes.

Arch. You must know then, that I am born a gentleman; my education was liberal; but I went to London a younger brother, fell into the hands of sharpers, who stripped me of my money; my friends disowned me, and now my necessity brings me to what you see.

Cher. Then take my hand—promise to marry me before you sleep, and I'll make you master of two thousand pounds.

Arch. How?

Cher. Two thousand pounds that I have this minute in my own custody; so throw off your livery this instant, and I'll go find a parson.

Arch. What said you? a parson?

Cher. What!—do you scruple?

Arch. Scruple! no, no; but—two thousand pounds, you say?

Cher. And better.

Arch. 'Sdeath, what shall I do?—But harkye, child, what need you make me master of yourself and money, when you may have the same pleasure out of me, and still keep your fortune in your own hands?

Cher. Then you won't marry me?

Arch. I would marry you, but—

Cher. O, sweet Sir, I'm your humble servant, you're fairly caught. Would you persuade me that any gentleman who could bear the scandal of wearing a livery, would refuse two thousand pounds, let the condition be what it would—No, no, Sir, but I hope you'll pardon the freedom I have taken, since it was only to inform myself of the respect I ought to pay you. [Going.]

Arch. Fairly bit, by Jupiter!—Hold! hold! and have you actually two thousand pounds?

Cher. Sir, I have my secrets as well as you—when you please to be more open, I shall be more free; and be assured that I have discoveries that will match yours, be they what they will.—In the mean while be satisfied, that no discovery I make shall ever hurt you; but beware of my father.

[Exit.]

Arch. So—we're like to have as many adventures in our inn, as Don Quixote had in his—Let me see—two thousand pounds! if the wench would promise to die when the money were spent, 'egad, one would marry her; but the fortune may go off in a year or two, and the wife may live—

Lord knows how long! Then an innkeeper's daughter! Ay, that's the devil—there, my pride brings me off.

For whatsoever the sages charge on pride,
The angels' fall, and twenty faults beside;
On earth, I'm sure, 'mong us of mortal calling, Pride saves man oft, and woman too, from falling. [Exit.

ACT III.

SCENE I.—LADY BOUNTIFUL'S House.

Enter MRS. SULLEN and DORINDA.

Mrs. S. Ha, ha, ha! my dear sister; let me embrace thee; now we are friends, indeed; for I shall have a secret of yours as a pledge for mine.

Dor. But do you think that I am so weak as to fall in love with a fellow at first sight.

Mrs. S. Pshaw! now you spoil all; why should not we be as free in our friendships as the men? I warrant you, the gentleman has got to his confidant already, has avowed his passion, toasted your health, called you ten thousand angels.

Dor. Your hand, sister; I an't well.

Mrs. S. Shall I send to your mother, child? or shall I send to the gentleman for something for you?—Come, unbosom yourself—the man is perfectly a pretty fellow; I saw him when he first came into church.

Dor. I saw him too, sister, and with an air that shone, methought, like rays about his person.

Mrs. S. Well said, up with it.

Dor. No forward coquette behaviour, no air to set him off, no studied looks, no artful posture,—but nature did it all—

Mrs. S. Better and better—One touch more—Come—

Dor. But then his looks—Did you observe his eyes?

Mrs. S. Yes, yes, I did—his eyes; well, what of his eyes?

Dor. Sprightly, but not wandering; they seemed to view, but never gazed on any thing but me—and then his looks so humble were, and yet so noble, that they aimed to tell me, that he could with pride die at my feet, though he scorned slavery any where else.

Mrs. S. The physic works purely.—How d'ye find yourself now, my dear?

Dor. Hem! much better my dear—Oh, here comes our Mercury!

Enter SCRUB.

Dor. Well, Scrub, what news of the gentleman?

Scrub. Madam, I have brought you a whole packet of news.

Dor. Open it quickly; come.

Scrub. In the first place, I inquired who the gentleman was? They told me he was a stranger. Secondly, I asked what the gentleman was? They answered and said, that they never saw him before. Thirdly, I inquired what countryman he was? They replied, 'twas more than they knew. Fourthly, I demanded whence he came? Their answer was, they could not tell. And fifthly, I asked whither he went? And they replied, they knew nothing of the matter.—And this is all I could learn.

Mrs. S. But what do the people say? Can't they guess?

Scrub. Why some think he's a spy, some guess he's a mountebank, some say one thing, some another; but for my own part, I believe he's a jesuit.

Dor. A jesuit! why a jesuit?

Scrub. Because he keeps his horses always ready saddled, and his footman talks French.

Mrs. S. His footman!

Scrub. Ay, he and the count's footman were gabbering French like two intriguing ducks in a millpond; and I believe they talked of me, for they laughed consuemedly.

Dor. What sort of livery has the footman?

Scrub. Livery! Lord, Madam, I took him for a captain, he's so bedizen'd with lace; and then he has a silver-headed cane dangling at his knuckles:—he carries his hands in his pockets, and walks just so—[Walks in a French air.] and has a fine long periwig tied up in a bag—Lord, Madam, he's clear another sort of a man than I.

Mrs. S. That may easily be.—But what shall we do now, sister?

Dor. I have it.—This fellow has a world of simplicity, and some cunning; the first hides the latter by abundance.—Scrub!

Scrub. Madam!

Dor. We have a great mind to know who this gentleman is, only for our satisfaction.

Scrub. Yes, Madam, it would be a satisfaction, no doubt.

Dor. You must go and get acquainted with his footman, and invite him hither to drink a bottle of your ale, because you're butler to-day.

Scrub. Yes, Madam, I am butler every Sunday.

Mrs. S. O brave, sister! o'my conscience you understand the mathematics already.—'Tis the best plot in the world? Your mother, you know, will be gone to church, my spouse will be got to the alehouse with his scoundrels, and the house will be our own—so we drop in by accident, and ask the fellow some questions ourselves. In the country, you know, any stranger is company, and we're glad to take up with the butler in a country-dance, and happy if he will do us the favour.

Scrub. Oh, Madam, you wrong me; I never refused your ladyship the favour in my life.

Enter GIPSEY.

Gip. Ladies, dinner's upon table.

Dor. Scrub, we'll excuse you waiting.—Go where we order'd you.

Scrub. I shall.

[Exit.

SCENE II.—The Inn.

Enter AIMWELL and ARCHER.

Arch. Well, Tom, I find you're a marksman

Aim. A marksman! who so blind could be as not discern a swan among the ravens?

Arch. Well, but harkye, Aimwell—

Aim. Aimwell! call me Orondates, Cesario Amadis, all that romance can in a lover paint, and then I'll answer. Oh, Archer! I read her thousands in her looks; she looked like Ceres in her harvest: corn, wine, and oil, milk, honey, gardens, groves, and purling streams, played on her plenteous face.

Arch. Her face! her pocket, you mean! the corn, wine, and oil, lie there. In short, she has twenty thousand pounds, that's the English on't.

Aim. Her eyes—

Arch. Are demi-cannons, to be sure; so I wont stand their battery.

[Going.

Aim. Pray, excuse me, my passion must have vent.

Arch. Passion! what a plague, d'ye think these romantic airs will do our business! Were my temper as extravagant as yours, my adventures have something more romantic by half.

Aim. Your adventures?

Arch. Yes.

The nymph who, with her twice one thousand pounds,

With brazen engine hot, and coif clear starch'd,
Can fire the guest in warming of the bed—

There's a touch of sublime Milton for you, and the subject but an innkeeper's daughter. I can play with a girl as an angler does his fish; he keeps it at the end of his line, runs it up the stream, and down the stream, till at last he brings it to hand, tickles the trout, and so whips it into his basket.

Enter BONIFACE.

Bon. Mr. Martin, as the saying is—yonder's an honest fellow below, my Lady Bountiful's butler, who begs the honour that you would go home with him, and see his cellar.

Arch. Do my baise-mains to the gentleman, and tell him I will do myself the honour to wait on him immediately, as the saying is.

Bon. I shall do your worship's commands, as the saying is. [Exit, bowing obsequiously.]

Aim. What do I hear? soft Orpheus play, and fair Toftida sing!

Arch. Pshaw! Damn your raptures; I tell you here's a pump going to be put into the vessel, and the ship will get into harbour, my life on't. You say there's another lady very handsome, there.

Aim. Yes, 'faith.

Arch. I'm in love with her already.

Aim. Can't you give me a bill upon Cherry, in the mean time?

Arch. No, no, 'faith; all her corn, wine, and oil, is engrossed to my market.—And once more I warn you to keep your anchorage clear of mine; for if you fall foul of me, by this light, you shall go to the bottom.—What! make a prize of my little frigate, while I am upon the cruise for you. You're a pretty fellow indeed! [Exit.]

Enter BONIFACE.

Aim. Well, well, I wont—Landlord, have you any tolerable company in the house? I don't care for dining alone.

Bon. Yes, Sir, there's a captain below, as the saying is, that arrived about an hour ago.

Aim. Gentlemen of his coat are welcome every where; will you make a compliment for me, and tell him I should be glad of his company, that's all.

Bon. Who shall I tell him, Sir, would—

Aim. Ha: that stroke was well thrown in.—I'm only a traveller like himself, and would be glad of his company, that's all.

Bon. I obey your commands, as the saying is. [Exit.]

Enter ARCHER.

Arch. 'Sdeath! I had forgot; what title would you give yourself?

Aim. My brother's to be sure; he would never give me any thing else, so I'll make bold with his honour this bout.—You know the rest of your cue!

Arch. Ay, ay.

[Exit.]

Enter GIBBET.

Gib. Sir, I'm yours.

Aim. 'Tis more than I deserve, Sir, for I don't know you.

Gib. I don't wonder at that, Sir, for you never saw me before—I hope.

Aim. And pray, Sir, how came I by the honour of seeing you now? [Aside.]

Gib. Sir, I scorn to intrude upon any gentleman—but my landlord—

Aim. O, Sir, I ask your pardon—you're the captain he told me of.

Gib. At your service, Sir.

Aim. What regiment, may I be so bold?

Gib. A marching regiment, Sir; an old corps

Aim. Very old, if your coat be regimental [Aside.] You have served abroad, Sir?

Gib. Yes, Sir, in the plantations; 'twas my lot to be sent into the worst service; I would have quitted it indeed, but a man of honour you know—Besides, 'twas for the good of my country that I should be abroad—Any thing for the good of one's country—I'm a Roman for that.

Aim. One of the first, I'll lay my life. [Aside.] You found the West Indies very hot, Sir.

Gib. Ay, Sir, too hot for me.

Aim. And where's your company now, captain?

Gib. They a'n't come yet.

Aim. Why, d'ye expect them here?

Gib. They'll be here to-night, Sir.

Aim. Which way do they march?

Gib. Across the country.—The devil's in't if I han't said enough to encourage him to declare—but I'm afraid he's not right, I must tack about.

[Aside.]

Aim. Is your company to quarter at Litchfield?

Gib. In this house, Sir.

Aim. What, all?

Gib. My company is but thin, ha, ha, ha! we are but three, ha, ha, ha!

Aim. You're merry, Sir.

Gib. Ay, Sir, you must excuse me. Sir, I understand the world, especially the art of travelling: I don't care for answering questions directly upon the road—for I generally ride with a charge about me.

Aim. Three or four, I believe.

[Aside.]

Gib. I am credibly informed that there are highwaymen upon this quarter; not, Sir, that I could suspect a gentleman of your figure.—But truly, Sir, I have got such a way of evasion upon the road, that I don't care for speaking truth to any man.

Aim. Your caution may be necessary. Then I presume you're no captain.

Gib. Not I, Sir, captain is a good travelling name, and so I take it; it stops a great many foolish inquiries that are generally made about gentlemen that travel; it gives a man an air of something, and makes the drawers obedient.—And thus far I am a captain, and no further.

Aim. And pray, Sir, what is your true profession?

Gib. O, Sir, you must excuse me—upon my word, Sir, I don't think it safe to tell you.

Aim. Ha, ha! upon my word, I commend you.

Enter BONIFACE.

Well, Mr. Boniface, what's the news?

Bon. There's another gentleman below, as the saying is, that hearing you were but two, would be glad to make the third man, if you'd give him leave.

Aim. What is he?

Bon. A clergyman, as the saying is.

Aim. A clergyman! is he really a clergyman? or is it only a travelling name, as my friend the captain has it?

Bon. Oh, Sir, he's a priest, and chaplain to the French officers in town.

Aim. Is he a Frenchman?

Bon. Yes, Sir, born at Brussels.

Gib. A Frenchman, and a priest! I wont be seen in his company, Sir; I have a value for my reputation, Sir.

Aim. Nay, but, captain, since we are by ourselves—Can he speak English, landlord?

Bon. Very well, Sir; you may know him, as the saying is, to be a foreigner, by his accent, and that's all?

Aim. Then he has been in England before?

Bon. Never, Sir; but he's master of languages, as the saying is; he talks Latin! it does one good to hear him talk Latin.

Aim. Then you understand Latin, Mr. Boniface?

Bon. Not I, Sir, as the saying is; but he talks it so very fast, that I'm sure it must be good.

Aim. Pray desire him to walk up.

Bon. Here he is, as the saying is.

Enter FOIGARD.

Foig. Save you, gentleman, bote.

Aim. A Frenchman! Sir, your most humble servant.

Foig. Och, dear joy, I am your most shervant, and yours alsho.

Gib. Doctor, you talk very good English, but you have a mighty twang of the foreigner.

Foig. My English is very well for the vords, but we foreigners, you know, cannot bring our tongues about the pronunciation so soon.

Aim. A foreigner! a downright Teague, by this light. [Aside.] Were you born in France, doctor?

Foig. I was educated in France, but I was borned at Brussels: I am a subject of the king of Spain, joy.

Gib. What king of Spain, Sir? Speak.

Foig. Upon my soul, joy, I cannot tell you as yet.

Aim. Nay, captain, that was too hard upon the doctor; he's a stranger.

Foig. O let him alone, dear joy, I'm of a nation that is not easily put out of countenance.

Aim. Come, gentlemen, I'll end the dispute: here, landlord, is dinner ready?

Bon. Upon the table, as the saying is.

Aim. Gentlemen—pray—that door—

Foig. No, no, fait, the captain must lead.

Aim. No, doctor, the church is our guide.

Gib. Ay, ay, so it is. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—A GALLERY IN LADY BOUNTIFUL'S HOUSE.

Enter ARCHER and SCRUB, singing and hugging one another; SCRUB with a tankard in his hand, GIPSEY listening at a distance.

Scrub. Tall, all, dall. Come, my dear boy—let's have a song once more.

Arch. No, no, we shall disturb the family—But will you be sure to keep the secret?

Scrub. Pho! upon my honour, as I'm a gentleman.

Arch. 'Tis enough. You must know then, that my master is the Lord Viscount Aimwell; he fought a duel t'other day in London, wounded his man so dangerously, that he thinks fit to withdraw till he hears whether the gentleman's wounds be mortal or not; he never was in this part of England before, so he chose to retire to this place, that's all.

Gip. And that's enough for me. [Exit.]

Scrub. And where were you when your master fought?

Arch. We never know of our master's quarrels.

Scrub. No! if our masters in the country here receive a challenge, the first thing they do, is to tell their wives; the wives tell the servants, the servants alarm the tenants, and in half an hour, you shall have the whole country up in arms.

Arch. To hinder two men from doing what they have no mind for—But if you should chance to talk now of this business?

Scrub. Talk! Ah, Sir, had I not learned the knack of holding my tongue, I had never lived so long in a great family.

Arch. Ay, ay, to be sure, there are secrets in all families.

Scrub. Secrets, O lud!—but I'll say no more—Come, sit down, we'll make an end of our tankard;—Here—

Arch. With all my heart; who knows but you and I may come to be better acquainted, eh?—Here's your ladies' health; you have three I think, and to be sure there must be secrets among them.

Scrub. Secrets! ah, friend, friend! I wish I had a friend.

Arch. Am I not your friend? Come, you and I will be sworn brothers.

Scrub. Shall we?

Arch. From this minute—Give me a kiss—And now, brother Scrub—

Scrub. And now, brother Martin, I will tell you a secret, that will make your hair stand on end.—You must know that I am consumedly in love.

Arch. That's a terrible secret that's the truth on't.

Scrub. That jade, Gipsey, that was with us just now in the cellar, is the arrantest whore that ever wore a petticoat, and I'm dying for love of her.

Arch. Ha, ha, ha!—Are you in love with her person or her virtue, brother Scrub?

Scrub. I should like virtue best, because it is more durable than beauty; for virtue holds good with some women long and many a day after they have lost it.

Arch. In the country, I grant ye, where no woman's virtue is lost till a bastard be found.

Scrub. Ay, could I bring her to a bastard, I should have her all to myself; but I dare not put it upon that lay, for fear of being sent for a soldier—Pray, brother, how do you gentlemen in London like that same pressing act?

Arch. Very ill, brother Scrub—'Tis the worst that ever was made for us; formerly, I remember the good days when we could dun our masters for our wages, and if they refused to pay us, we could have a warrant to carry them before a justice; but now, if we talk of eating, they have a warrant for us, and carry us before three justices.

Scrub. And to be sure we go, if we talk of eating; for the justices wont give their own servants a bad example. Now this is my misfortune—I dare not speak in the house, while that jade Gipsey, dings about like a fury—Once I had the better end of the staff.

Arch. And how comes the change now?

Scrub. Why, the mother of all this mischief is a priest.

Arch. A priest!

Scrub. Ay, a damned son of a whore of Babylon, that came over hither to say grace to the French officers, and eat up our provisions—There's not a day goes over his head without a dinner or supper in his house.

Arch. How came he so familiar in the family?

Scrub. Because he speaks English as if he had lived here all his life, and tells lies as if he had been a traveller from his cradle.

Arch. And this priest, I'm afraid, has converted the affections of your Gipsey.

Scrub. Converted! ay, and perverted, my dear friend—for I am afraid he has made her a whore and a papist—but this is not all; there's the French count and Mrs. Sullen, they're in the confederacy, and for some private ends of their own too, to be sure.

Arch. A very hopeful family yours, brother Scrub; I suppose the maiden lady has her lover too?

Scrub. Not that I know—She's the best of them, that's the truth on't; but they take care to prevent my curiosity, by giving me so much business, that I am a perfect slave: What d'ye think is my place in this family?

Arch. Butler, I suppose.

Scrub. Ah, Lord help your silly head!—I'll tell you—Of a Monday I drive the coach; of a Tuesday I drive the plough; on Wednesday I follow the hounds; on Thursday I dun the tenants; on Friday I go to market; on Saturday I draw warrants; and on Sunday I draw beer.

Arch. Ha, ha, ha! if variety be a pleasure in life, you have enough on't, my dear brother—but what ladies are those?

Scrub. Ours, ours; that upon the right hand is Mrs. Sullen, and the other Mrs. Dorinda—don't mind them; sit still, man.

Enter MRS SULLEN and DORINDA.

Mrs. S. I have heard my brother talk of Lord Aimwell, but they say that his brother is the finer gentleman.

Dor. That's impossible, sister.

Mrs. S. He's vastly rich, and very close, they say.

Dor. No matter for that; if I can creep into his heart, I'll open his breast, I warrant him; I have heard say, that people may be guessed at by the behaviour of their servants; I could wish we might talk to that fellow.

Mrs. S. So do I; for I think he's a very pretty fellow: come this way; I'll throw out a lure for him presently.

[They walk to the opposite side of the stage; MRS. SULLEN drops her fan. ARCHER takes it up, and gives it to her.]

Arch. Corn, wine, and oil, indeed—But I think the wife has the greatest plenty of flesh and blood; she should be my choice—Ay, ay, say you so—Madam—your ladyship's fan.

Mrs. S. O, Sir, I thank you—What a handsome bow the fellow made?

Dor. Bow! why I have known several footmen come down from London, set up here for dancing masters, and carry off the best fortunes in the country.

Arch. [Aside.] That project, for aught I know, had been better than ours—Brother Scrub, why don't you introduce me?

Scrub. Ladies, this is the strange gentleman's servant, that you saw at church to-day: I understood he came from London, and so I invited him to the cellar, that he might show me the newest flourish in whetting my knives.

Dor. And I hope you have made much of him.
Arch. Oh, yes, Madam, but the strength of your ladyship's liquor is a little too potent for the constitution of your humble servant.

Mrs. S. What, then you don't usually drink ale?

Arch. No, Madam, my constant drink is tea, or a little wine and water; 'tis prescribed me by the physicians, for a remedy against the spleen.

Scrub. O la! O la!—A footman have the spleen!

Mrs. S. I thought that distemper had been only proper to people of quality.

Arch. Madam, like all other fashions, it wears out, and descends to their servants; though in a great many of us, I believe, it proceeds from some melancholy particles in the blood, occasioned by the stagnation of wages.

Dor. How affectedly the fellow talks!—How long, pray, have you served your present master?

Arch. Not long; my life has been mostly spent in the service of the ladies.

Mrs. S. And pray, which service do you like best?

Arch. Madam, the ladies pay best; the honour of serving them is sufficient wages; there is a charm in their looks, that delivers a pleasure with their commands, and gives our duty the wings of inclination.

Mrs. S. That flight was above the pitch of a livery:—and, Sir, would not you be satisfied to serve a lady again?

Arch. As groom of the chambers, Madam, but not as a footman.

Mrs. S. I suppose you served as footman before?

Arch. For that reason I would not serve in that post again; for my memory is too weak for the load of messages that the ladies lay upon their servants in London: my Lady Howd'ye, the last mistress I served, called me up one morning, and told me, Martin, go to my Lady All-night with my humble service; tell her I was to wait on her ladyship yesterday, and left word with Mrs. Rebecca, that the preliminaries of the affair she knows of are stopped till we know the concurrence of the person that I know of, for which there are circumstances wanting, which we shall accommodate at the old place; but that, in the mean time, there is a person about her ladyship, that from several hints and surmises, was necessary at a certain time to the disappointments that naturally attend things, that to her knowledge are of more importance—

Mrs. S. } Ha, ha! where are you going, Sir?
Dor. }

Arch. Why, I hav'n't half done.

Scrub. I should not remember a quarter of it.

Arch. The whole how d'ye was about half an hour long; I happened to misplace two syllables, and was turned off, and rendered incapable—

Dor. The pleasantest fellow, sister, I ever saw.—But, friend, if your master be married, I presume you still serve a lady?

Arch. No, Madam, I take care never to come into a married family; the commands of the master and mistress are always so contrary, that 'tis impossible to please both.

Dor. There's a main point gained. My lord is not married, I find. [Aside.]

Mrs. S. But, I wonder, friend, that in so many good services, you had not a better provision made for you?

Arch. I don't know, how, Madam—I am very well as I am.

Mrs. S. Something for a pair of gloves. [Offers money.]

Arch. I humbly beg leave to be excused. My master, Madam, pays me; nor dare I take money from any other hand, without injuring his honour and disobeying his commands.

Scrub. Brother Martin! brother Martin!

Arch. What do you say, brother Scrub?

Scrub. Take the money, and give it me.

[Exeunt ARCHER and SCRUB.]

Dor. This is surprising. Did you ever see so pretty a well-bred fellow?

Mrs. S. The devil take him for wearing that livery.

Dor. I fancy, sister, he may be some gentleman, a friend of my lord's, that his lordship has pitched upon for his courage, fidelity, and discretion, to bear him company in this dress, and who, then to one, was his second.

Mrs. S. It is so, it must be so, it shall be so—For I like him.

Dor. What! better than the count?

Mrs. S. The count happened to be the most agreeable man in the place; and so I chose him to serve me in my design upon my husband. But I should like this fellow better in a design upon myself.

Dor. But now, sister, for an interview with this lord and this gentleman; how shall we bring that about?

Mrs. S. Patience! you country ladies give no quarter. Lookye, Dorinda, if my Lord Aimwell loves you, or deserves you, he'll find a way to see you, and there we must leave it. My business comes now upon the tapis. Have you prepared your brother?

Dor. Yes, yes.

Mrs. S. And how did he relish it?

Dor. He said little, mumbled something to himself, and promised to be guided by me: but here he comes.

[Enter SULLEN.]

Sul. What singing was that I heard just now?

Mrs. S. The singing in your head, my dear; you complained of it all day.

Sul. You're impertinent.

Mrs. S. I was ever so, since I became one flesh with you.

Sul. One flesh! rather two carcasses joined unnaturally together.

Mrs. S. Or rather a living soul coupled to a dead body.

Dor. So, this is fine encouragement for me!

Sul. Yes, my wife shows you what you must do!

Mrs. S. And my husband shows you what you must suffer.

Sul. 'Sdeath, why can't you be silent?

Mrs. S. 'Sdeath, why can't you talk?

Sul. Do you talk to any purpose?

Mrs. S. Do you think to any purpose?

Sul. Sister, harkye—[Whispers.] I sha'n't be home till it be late. [Exit.]

Mrs. S. What did he whisper to you?

Dor. That he would go round the back way, come into the closet, and listen, as I directed him. But let me beg you once more, dear sister, to drop this project; for, as I told you before, instead of awaking him to kindness, you may provoke him to rage; and then who knows how far his brutality may carry him?

Mrs. S. I'm provided to receive him, I warrant you; away! [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Gallery in LADY BOUNTIFUL'S House.

Enter LADY BOUNTIFUL and MRS. SULLEN, DORINDA meeting them.

Dor. News, dear sister, news, news!

[Enter ARCHER, running.]

Arch. Where, where is my Lady Bountiful? Pray, which is the old lady of you three?

Lady B. I am.

Arch. O, Madam, the fame of your ladyship's charity, goodness, benevolence, skill, and ability, have drawn me hither, to implore your ladyship's help in behalf of my unfortunate master, who is at this moment breathing his last.

Lady B. Your master! where is he?

Arch. At your gate, Madam: drawn by the appearance of your handsome house, to view it nearer, and walking up the avenue, within five paces of the court-yard, he was taken ill of a sudden, with a sort of I know not what; but down he fell, and there he lies.

Lady B. Here, Scrub, Gipse!

[Enter SCRUB and GIPSEY.]

All run, get my easy-chair down stairs, put the gentleman in it, and bring him in quickly, quickly.

Arch. Heaven will reward your ladyship for this charitable act.

Lady B. Is your master used to these fits?

Arch. O yes, Madam, frequently. I have known him have five or six of a night.

Lady B. What's his name?

Arch. Lord, Madam, he's dying: a minute's care or neglect may save or destroy his life.

Lady B. Ah, poor gentleman! come, friend, show me the way; I'll see him brought in myself. [Exit ARCH.]

Dor. O, sister, my heart flutters about strangely; I can hardly forbear running to his assistance.

Mrs. S. And I'll lay my life he deserves your assistance more than he wants it: did not I tell you that my lord would find a way to come at you? Love's his distemper, and you must be the physician: put on all your charms, summon all your fire into your eyes, plant the whole artillery of your looks against his breast, and down with him.

Dor. O, sister, I'm but a young gunner, I shall be afraid to shoot for fear the piece should recoil, and hurt myself.

Mrs. S. Never fear, you shall see me shoot before you, if you will.

Dor. No, no, dear sister, you have missed your mark so unfortunately, that I sha'n't care for being instructed by you.

Enter AIMWELL, in a chair, carried by ARCHER and SCRUB, LADY BOUNTIFUL, and GIPSEY. AIMWELL counterfeiting a swoon.

Lady B. Here, here, let's see—the hartshorn drops—Gipsy, a glass of fair water; his fit's very strong. Bless me, how his hands are clenched!

Arch. For shame, ladies, what d'ye do? why don't you help us? Pray, Madam, [To DOR.] take his hand, and open it, if you can, whilst I hold his head. [DORINDA takes his hand.]

Dor. Poor gentleman!—Oh—he has got my hand within his, and squeezes it unmercifully.—

Lady B. 'Tis the violence of his convulsions, child.

Arch. Oh, Madam, he's perfectly possessed in these cases—he'll bite you, if you don't have a care.

Dor. O, my hand, my hand!

Lady B. What's the matter with the foolish girl! I have got this hand open you see with a great deal of ease.

Arch. Ay, but, Madam, your daughter's hand is somewhat warmer than your ladyship's, and the heat of it draws the force of the spirits that way.

Mrs. S. I find, friend, you are very learned in these sort of fits.

Arch. 'Tis no wonder, Madam, for I'm often troubled with them myself; I find myself extremely ill at this minute.

[Looking hard at MRS. SULLEN.]

Mrs. S. [Aside.] I fancy I could find a way to cure you.

Lady B. His fit holds him very long.

Arch. Longer than usual, Madam—

Lady B. Where did his illness take him first, pray?

Arch. To-day at church, Madam.

Lady B. In what manner was he taken?

Arch. Very strangely, my lady. He was of a sudden touched with something in his eyes, which at the first he only felt, but could not tell whether 'twas pain or pleasure.

Lady B. Wind, nothing but the wind.—Your master should never go without a bottle to smell to—Oh! he recovers—the lavender water—some feathers to burn under his nose—Hungary water, to rub his temples—Oh, he comes to himself. Hem a little, Sir, hem—Gipsy, bring the cordial water.

[AIMWELL seems to awake in amaze.]

Dor. How do you, Sir?

Aim. Where am I?

[Rising.]

Sure I have pass'd the gulph of silent death, And now am landed on the Elysian shore. Behold the goddess of those happy plains, Fair Proserpine—let me adore thy bright divinity.

[Kneels to DORINDA, and kisses her hand.]

Mrs. S. So, so, so; I knew where the fit would end.

Aim. Eurydice, perhaps—

How could thy Orpheus keep his word, And not look back on thee?

No treasure but thyself could sure have brib'd him To look one minute off thee.

Lady B. Delirious, poor gentleman.

Arch. Very delirious, Madam—very delirious.

Scrub. Very dolorous, indeed.

Aim. Martin's voice, I think.

Arch. Yes, my lord.—How does your lordship?

Lady B. Lord! did you mind that, girls?

Aim. Where am I?

Arch. In very good hands, Sir. You were taken just now with one of your old fits, under the trees, just by this good lady's house; her ladyship had you taken in, and has miraculously brought you to yourself, as you see—

Aim. I am so confounded with shame, Madam, that I can only now beg pardon—and refer my acknowledgments for your ladyship's care till an opportunity offers of making some amends—I dare be no longer troublesome—Martin, give two guineas to the servants. [Going.]

Dor. Sir, you may catch cold by going so soon into the air; you don't look, Sir, as if you were perfectly recovered.

[ARCH talks to LADY B. in dumb show.]

Aim. That I shall never be, Madam; my present illness is so rooted, that I must expect to carry it to my grave.

Lady B. Come, Sir, your servant has been telling me that you are apt to relapse, if you go into the air—your good manners sha'n't get the better of ours—you shall sit down again, Sir—come, Sir, we don't mind ceremonies in the country.—Here, Gipsy, bring the cordial water.—Here, Sir, my service t'ye—you shall taste my water; 'Tis a cordial, I can assure you, and of my own making.

Scrub. Yes, my lady makes very good water.

Lady B. Drink it off, Sir. [AIMWELL drinks.] And how d'ye find yourself now, Sir?

Aim. Somewhat better—though very faint still.

Lady B. Ay, ay, people are always faint after these fits. Come, girls, you shall show the gentleman the house; 'tis but an old family building, Sir; but you had better walk about, and cool by degrees, than venture immediately into the air. You'll find some tolerable pictures. Dorinda, show the gentleman the way. I must go to the poor woman below. [Exit.]

Dor. This way, Sir.

Aim. Ladies, shall I beg leave for my servant to wait on you? for he understands pictures very well.

Mrs. S. Sir, we understand originals, as well as he does pictures; so he may come along.

[Exit DOR. and AIM.; MRS. S. and ARCH.]

Enter FOIGARD.

Foig. Shave you, master Scrub.

Scrub. Sir, I won't be saved your way—I hate a priest, I abhor the French, and I defy the devil.—Sir, I'm a bold Briton, and will spill the last drop of my blood to keep out popery and slavery.

Foig. Master Scrub, you would put me down in politics, and so I would be spaiking with Mrs. Gipsy.

Scrub. Good Mr. Priest, you can't speak with her; she's sick, Sir; she's gone abroad, Sir; she's—dead two months ago, Sir.

Enter GIPSEY.

Gip. How now, impudence! How dare you talk so saucily to the doctor? Pray, Sir, don't take it ill; for the common people of England are not so civil to strangers, as—

Scrub. You lie, you lie:—'tis the common people, such as you are, that are civilest to strangers.

Gip. Sirrah, I have a great mind to—get you out, I say.

Scrub. I won't.

Gip. You won't, saucebox!—Pray, doctor, what is the captain's name that came to your inn last night?

Scrub. The captain! ah, the devil! there she hampers me again; the captain has me on one side, and the priest on t'other;—so between the gown and the sword I have a fine time on 't.

Gip. What, sirrah, wont you march?

Scrub. No, my dear, I wont march—but I'll walk:—and I'll make bold to listen a little too.

[Goes behind the side scene, and listens.]

Gip. Indeed, doctor, the count has been barbarously treated, that's the truth on 't.

Foig. Ah, Mrs. Gipsey, upon my shoul, now gra, his complainings would mollify the marrow in your bones, and move the bowels of your commiseration: he weeps, and he dances, and he fistles, and he swears, and he laughs, and he stamps, and he sings: in conclusion, joy, he's afflicted a la Françoisé, and a stranger would not know whider to cry or to laugh with him.

Gib. What would you have me do, doctor?

Foig. Nothing, joy, but only to hide the count in Mrs. Sullen's closet, when it is dark.

Gip. Nothing! is that nothing? it would be both a sin and a shame, doctor.

Foig. Here is twenty Louis d'ors, joy, for your shame; and I will give you an absolution for the shin.

Gip. But wont that money look like a bribe?

Foig. Dat is according as you shall take it—if you receive the money beforehand, 'twill be logice, a bribe; but if you stay till afterwards, 'twill be only a gratification.

Gip. Well, doctor, I'll take it logice—But what must I do with my conscience, Sir?

Foig. Leave dat wid me, joy; I am your priest, gra; and your conscience is under my hands.

Gip. But should I put the count into the closet—

Foig. Vell, is dere any shin for a man's being in a closet? one may go to prayers in a closet.

Gip. But if the lady should come into her chamber and go to bed?

Foig. Vell, and is dere any shin in going to bed, joy?

Gip. Ah, but if the parties should meet, doctor?

Foig. Vell den—the parties must be responsible.—Do you be gone after putting the count in the closet; and leave the shins wid themselves—I will come with the count to instruct you in your chamber.

Gip. Well, doctor, your religion is so pure, that I'm resolved to die a martyr to 't.—Here's the key of the garden door; come in the back way, when 'tis late—I'll be ready to receive you; but don't so much as whisper, only take hold of my hand; I'll lead you, and do you lead the count, and follow me. [Exeunt.]

Enter SCRUB.

Scrub. What witchcraft now have these twoimps of the devil been a-hatching here?—There's twenty Louis d'ors! I heard that, and saw the purse: but I must give room to my betters. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Picture Gallery.

Enter AIMWELL, leading DORINDA, and making love in dumb show; MRS. SULLEN and ARCHER.

Mrs. S. Pray, Sir, [To ARCH.] how d'ye like that piece?

Arch. O, 'tis Leda—you find, Madam, how Jupiter came disguised to make love—

Mrs. S. Pray, Sir, what head is that in the corner there?

Arch. O, Madam, 'tis poor Ovid in his exile.

Mrs. S. What was he banished for?

Arch. His ambitious love, Madam. [Bowing.] His misfortune touches me.

Mrs. S. Was he successful in his amours?

Arch. There he has left us in the dark.—He was too much a gentleman to tell.

Mrs. S. If he were secret, I pity him.

Arch. And if he were successful, I envy him.

Mrs. S. How d'ye like that Venus over the chimney?

Arch. Venus! I protest, Madam, I took it for your picture: but now I look again, 'tis not handsome enough.

Mrs. S. Oh, what a charm is flattery! if you would see my picture, there it is, over that cabinet—how d'ye like it?

Arch. I must admire any thing, Madam, that has the least resemblance of you.—But, methinks, Madam—[He looks at the picture and Mrs. SULLEN three or four times, by turns.] Pray, Madam, who drew it?

Mrs. S. A famous hand, Sir.

[Ex. AIM and DOR.]

Arch. A famous hand, Madam! Your eyes, indeed, are featured there; but where's the sparkling moisture and shining fluid, in which they swim? The picture, indeed, has your dimples, but where's the swarm of killing Cupids that should ambush there? These lips too are figured out; but where's the carnation dew, the pouting ripeness, that tempts the taste in the original?

Mrs. S. Had it been my lot to have matched with such a man! [Aside.]

Arch. Your neck too, presumptuous man! what! paint heaven!—A-propos, Madam, in the very next picture is Salmoneus, that was struck dead with lightning for offering to imitate Jove's thunder; I hope you served the painter so, Madam.

Mrs. S. Had my eyes the power of thunder, they should employ their lightning better.

Arch. There's the finest bed in that room, Madam; I suppose 'tis your ladyship's bed-chamber?

Mrs. S. And what then, Sir?

Arch. I think the quilt is the richest that ever I saw—I can't, at this distance, Madam, distinguish the figures of the embroidery: will you give me leave, Madam?

Mrs. S. The devil take his impudence—Sure, if I give him an opportunity, he durst not be rude. I have a great mind to try. [Going—returns.] 'Sdeath! what am I doing!—And alone too!—Sister, sister! [Exit.]

Arch. I'll follow her close—

For where a Frenchman durst attempt to storm, A Briton, sure, may well the work perform.

[Going.]

Enter SCRUB.

Scrub. Martin! brother Martin!

Arch. O brother Scrub, I beg your pardon, I was not a-going: here's a guinea my master ordered you.

Scrub. A guinea! hi, hi, hi, a guinea! eh—by this light it is a guinea; but I suppose you expect one and twenty shillings in change.

Arch. Not at all; I have another for Gipsey.

Scrub. A guinea for her! Fire and Faggot for the witch—Sir, give me that guinea, and I'll discover a plot.

Arch. A plot!

Scrub. Ay, Sir, a plot, a horrid plot.—First, it must be a plot, because there's a woman in 't, secondly, it must be a plot, because there's a priest in 't: thirdly, it must be a plot, because there's French gold in 't: and, fourthly, it must be a plot, because I don't know what to make on 't.

Arch. Nor any body else, I'm afraid, brother Scrub.

Scrub. Truly, I'm afraid so too; for where there's a priest and a woman, there's always a mystery and a riddle.—This I know, that here has been the doctor with a temptation in one hand, and an absolution in the other, and Gipsev has sold herself to the devil; I saw the price paid down, my eyes shall take their oath on 't.

Arch. And is all this bustle about Gipsev?

Scrub. That's not all; I could hear but a word here and there; but I remember they mentioned a count, a closet, a back door, and a key.

Arch. The count! did you hear nothing of Mrs. Sullen?

Scrub. I did hear some words that sounded that way; but whether it was Sullen or Dorinda, I could not distinguish.

Arch. You have told this matter to nobody, brother?

Scrub. Told! no, Sir, I thank you for that; I'm resolved never to speak one word, pro nor con, till we have a peace.

Arch. You are i' th' right, brother Scrub; here's a treaty a-foot between the count and the lady.—The priest and the chambermaid are plenipotentiaries.—It shall go hard, but I'll find a way to be included in the treaty. Where's the doctor now?

Scrub. He and Gipsev are this moment devouring my lady's marmalade in the closet.

Aim. [From without.] Martin, Martin!

Arch. I come, Sir, I come.

Scrub. But you forget the other guinea, brother Martin.

Arch. Here I give it with all my heart. [Exit.]

Scrub. And I take it with all my soul. I'cod, I'll spoil your plotting, Mrs. Gipsev; and if you should set the captain upon me, these two guineas will buy me off. [Exit.]

Enter MRS. SULLEN and DORINDA, meeting.

Mrs. S. Well, sister.

Dor. And well, sister.

Mrs. S. What's become of my lord?

Dor. What's become of his servant?

Mrs. S. Servant! he's a prettier fellow and a finer gentleman by fifty degrees than his master.

Dor. O' my conscience I fancy you could beg that fellow at the gallows' foot.

Mrs. S. O' my conscience I could, provided I could put a friend of yours in his room.

Dor. You desired me, sister, to leave you, when you transgressed the bounds of honour.

Mrs. S. Thou dear, censorious, country girl—What dost mean? You can't think of the man without the bed-fellow, I find.

Dor. I don't find any thing unnatural in that thought.

Mrs. S. How a little love and conversation improve a woman? Why, child, you begin to live—you never spoke before.

Dor. Because I was never spoke to before; my lord has told me, that I have more wit and beauty than any of my sex; and truly I begin to think the man is sincere.

Mrs. S. You are in the right, Dorinda; pride is the life of a woman, and flattery is our daily bread—but I'll lay you a guinea that I had finer things said to me than you had.

Dor. Done—What did your fellow say to you?

Mrs. S. My fellow took the picture of Venus for mine.

Dor. But my lover took me for Venus herself.

Mrs. S. Common cant! had my spark called me a Venus directly, I should have believed him a footman in good earnest.

Dor. But my lover was upon his knees to me.

Mrs. S. And mine was upon his tiptoes to me.

Dor. Mine vowed to die for me.

Mrs. S. Mine swore to die with me.

Dor. Mine kissed my hand ten thousand times.

Mrs. S. Mine has all that pleasure to come.

Dor. Mine spoke the softest moving things.

Mrs. S. Mine had his moving things too.

Dor. Mine offered marriage.

Mrs. S. O lord! d'ye call that a moving thing?

Dor. The sharpest arrow in his quiver, my dear sister:—Why, my twenty thousand pounds may lie brooding here these seven years, and hatch nothing at last but some ill-natured clown, like yours: whereas, if I marry my Lord Aimwell, there will be title, place, and precedence; the park, the play, and the drawing-room; splendour, equipage, noise, and flambeaux—Hey, my Lady Aimwell's servants there—lights, lights, to the stairs—my Lady Aimwell's coach, put forward—stand by; make room for her ladyship—Are not these things moving? What! melancholy of a sudden?

Mrs. S. Happy, happy sister! your angel has been watchful for your happiness, whilst mine has slept, regardless of his charge—Long smiling years of circling joys for you, but not one hour for me! [Weeps.]

Dor. Come, my dear, we'll talk of something else.

Mrs. S. O, Dorinda, I own myself a woman, full of my sex, a gentle, generous soul—easy and yielding to soft desires: a spacious heart, where love and all his train might lodge: and must the fair apartment of my breast be made a stable for a brute to lie in?

Dor. Meaning your husband, I suppose.

Mrs. S. Husband!—No—even husband is too soft a name for him—But, come, I expect my brother here to-night or to-morrow; he was abroad when my father married me: perhaps he'll find a way to make me easy.

Dor. Will you promise not to make yourself uneasy in the mean time with my lord's friend?

Mrs. S. You mistake me, sister—It happens with us, as among the men, the greatest talkers are the greatest cowards; and there's a reason for it; those spirits evaporate in prattle, which might do more mischief if they took another course.—Though, to confess the truth, I do love that fellow;—and if I met him dressed as he should be, and I undressed as I should be—Lookye, sister, I have no supernatural gifts;—I can't swear I could resist the temptation—though I can safely promise to avoid it; and that's as much as the best of us can do. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—The Inn.

Enter AIMWELL and ARCHER, laughing.

Arch. And the awkward kindness of the good, motherly, old gentlewoman—

Aim. And the coming easiness of the young one—Sleath, 'tis a pity to deceive her.

Arch. Nay, if you adhere to those principles, stop where you are.

Aim. I can't stop; for I love her to distraction.

Arch. 'Sdeath, if you love her a hair's breadth beyond discretion, you must go no farther.

Aim. Well, well, any thing to deliver us from sauntering away our idle evenings at White's, Tom's, or Will's—but now—

Arch. Ay, now is the time to prevent all this—Strike while the iron is hot—The priest is the luckiest part of our adventure; he shall marry you and pimp for me.

Aim. But I should not like a woman that can be so fond of a Frenchman.

Arch. Alas, Sir, necessity has no law; the lady may be in distress. But if the plot lies as I suspect—I must put on the gentleman. But here comes the doctor; I shall be ready. [Exit.]

Enter FOIGARD.

Foig. Shave you, noble friend.

Aim. O, Sir, your servant. Pray, doctor, may I crave your name?

Foig. Fat naam is upon me? My name is Foigard, joy.

Aim. Foigard! a very good for a clergyman. Pray, Doctor Foigard, were you ever in Ireland?

Foig. Ireland! No, joy. Fat sort of a plaace is dat shame Ireland? Dey say de people are catched dere when they are young.

Aim. And some of them here when they are old,—as for example—[Takes FOIGARD by the shoulder.] Sir, I arrest you as a traitor against government; you are a subject of England, and this morning showed me a commission, by which you served as chaplain in the French army. This is death by our law, and your reverence must hang for it.

Foig. Upon my shoul, noble friend, dis is strange news you tell me; fader Foigard a subject of England! de son of a burgomaster at Brussels a subject of England! Ubooboo—

Aim. The son of a bog-trotter in Ireland. Sir, your tongue will condemn you before any bench in the kingdom.

Foig. And is my tongue all your evidensh, joy?

Aim. That's enough.

Foig. No, no, joy, for I will never spaak English no more.

Aim. Sir, I have other evidence. Here, Martin, you know this fellow.

Enter ARCHER.

Arch. [In a brogue.] Shave you, my dear cussen, how does your health?

Foig. Ah! upon my soul, dere is my countryman, and his brogue will hang mine. [Aside.] Mynhere, Ick wet neal want hey zacht, ich Universton ewe neet, sacramant.

Aim. Altering your language wont do, Sir; this fellow knows your person, and will swear to your face.

Foig. Faash! Fey, is der de brogue upon my faash, too?

Arch. Upon my salvation dere is, joy.—But, cussen Mackshane, vill you not put a remembrance upon me?

Foig. Mackshane! by St. Patrick, dat ish my name sure enough. [Aside.]

Aim. I fancy, Archer, you have it.

Foig. The devil hang you, joy—By fat acquaintance are you my cussen?

Arch. O, de devil hang yourself, joy, you know we were little boys togeder upon de school, and your foster-moder's son was married upon my nurse's shister, joy, and so we are Irish cussens.

Foig. De devil take de relationship! Vell, joy; and fat school was it?

Arch. I think it was—Ay—'twas Tipperary.

Foig. Now, upon my shoul, joy, it was Kilkenny.

Aim. That's enough for us—self-confession—Come, Sir, we must deliver you into the hands of the next magistrate.

Arch. He sends you to gaol, you're tried next assizes, and away you go swing into purgatory.

Foig. And is it so wid you, cussen?

Arch. It will be so wid you, cussen, if you don't immediately confess the secret between you and Mrs. Gipsey. Lookye, Sir, the gallows or the secret, take your choice.

Foig. The gallows! Upon my shoul I hate that shaame gallows, for it ish a disease dat is fatal to our family.—Vell, den, there is nothing, gentlemen, but Mrs. Sullen would speak wid the count in her chamber at midnight; and dere is no harm, joy, for I am to conduct the count to de plaash myself.

Arch. As I guessed.—Have you communicated the matter to the count?

Foig. I have not seen him since.

Arch. Right again; why then, doctor—you shall conduct me to the lady instead of the count?

Foig. Fat, my cussen to the lady! upon my shoul, gra, dat's too much upon the brogue.

Arch. Come, come, doctor, consider we have got a rope about your neck, and if you offer to squeak, we'll stop your windpipe, most certainly; we shall have another job for you in a day or two, I hope.

Aim. Here's company coming this way; let's into my chamber, and there concert our affairs further.

Arch. Come, my dear cussen, come along.

Foig. Arrah, the devil take our relationship. [Exeunt.]

Enter BONIFACE, HOUNSLOW, and BAGSHOT, at one door, GIBBET at the opposite.

Gib. Well, gentlemen, 'tis a fine night for our enterprise.

Houn. Dark as hell.

Bag. And blows like the devil: our landlord here has shown us the window where we must break in, and tells us the plate stands in the wainscot cupboard in the parlour.

Bon. Ay, ay, Mr. Bagshot, as the saying is, knives and forks, cups and cans, tumblers and tankards—There's one tankard, as the saying is, that's near upon as big as me; it was a present to the 'squire from his godmother, and smells of nutmeg and toast, like an East India ship.

Houn. Then you say we must divide at the stair-head.

Bon. Yes, Mr. Hounslow, as the saying is—At one end of the gallery lies my Lady Bountiful and her daughter, and at the other Mrs. Sullen.—As for the 'squire—

Gib. He's safe enough; I have fairly entered him, and he's more than half seas over already—But such a parcel of scoundrels are got about him there, that egad, I was ashamed to be seen in their companv.

Bon. 'Tis now twelve, as the saying is—Gentlemen, you must set out at one.

Gib. Hounslow, do you and Bagshot see our arms fixed, and I'll come to you presently.

Houn. and Bag. We will.

[Exeunt HOUN. and BAG.]

Gib. Well, my dear Bonny, you assure me that Scrub is a coward?

Bon. A chicken, as the saying is—You'll have no creature to deal with but the ladies.

Gib. And I can assure you, friend, there's a great deal of address and good manners in robbing a lady: I am the most a gentleman that way that ever travelled the road.—But, my dear Bonny, this prize will be a galleon, a Vigo business—I warrant you, we shall bring off three or four thousand pounds.

Bon. In plate, jewels, and money, as the saying is, you may.

Gib. Why, then, Tyburn, I defy thee: I'll get up to town, sell off my horse and arms, but myself some pretty employment in the law, and be as snug and as honest as e'er a long gown of them all.

Bon. And what think you, then, of my daughter Cherry for a wife?

Gib. Lookye, my dear Bonny, Cherry is the goddess I adore, as the song goes; but it is a maxim, that man and wife should never have it in their power to hang one another; for, if they should, the Lord have mercy upon them both.

[Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—The Inn.

Enter BONIFACE.

Bon. Coming, coming—a coach and six foaming horses at this time o'night! some great man, as the saying is, for he scorns to travel with other people.

Enter SIR CHARLES FREEMAN.

Sir C. What, fellow! a public house, and a-bed when other people sleep!

Bon. Sir, I an't a-bed, as the saying is.

Sir C. I see that, as the saying is! Is Mr. Sullen's family a-bed, think ye?

Bon. All but the 'squire himself, Sir, as the saying is: he's in the house.

Sir C. What company has he?

Bon. Why, Sir, there's the constable—Mr. Gage, the exciseman—the hunch-backed barber—and two or three other gentlemen.

Sir C. I find my sister's letters gave me the true picture of her spouse.

Enter SULLEN, drunk.

Bon. Sir, here's the 'squire.

Sul. The puppies left me asleep—Sir.

Sir C. Well, Sir.

Sul. Sir, I am an unfortunate man—I have three thousand pounds a-year, and I can't get a man to drink a cup of ale with me.

Sir C. That's very hard.

Sul. Ay, Sir; and unless you have pity upon me, and smoke one pipe with me, I must e'en go home to my wife, and I had rather go to the devil by one half.

Sir C. But I presume, Sir, you wont see your wife to-night, she'll be gone to-bed—you don't use to lie with your wife in that pickle.

Sul. What! not lie with my wife! Why, Sir, do you take me for an atheist, or a rake?

Sir C. If you hate her, Sir, I think you had better lie from her.

Sul. I think so too, friend—But I am a justice of peace, and must do nothing against the law.

Sir C. Law! as I take it, Mr. Justice, nobody observes law for law's sake, only for the good of those for whom it was made.

Sul. But if the law orders me to send you to gaol, you must lie there, my friend.

Sir C. Not unless I commit a crime to deserve it.

Sul. A crime! oons, an't I married?

Sir C. Nay, Sir, if you call marriage a crime, you must disown it for a law.

Sul. Eh!—I must be acquainted with you, Sir—But, Sir, I should be very glad to know the truth of this matter.

Sir C. Truth, Sir, is a profound sea, and few there be that dare wade deep enough to find out the bottom on't. Besides, Sir, I am afraid the line of your understanding mayn't be long enough.

Sul. Lookye, Sir, I have nothing to say to your sea of truth; but, if a good parcel of land can entitle a man to a little truth, I have as much as any he in the country.

Bon. I never heard your worship, as the saying is, talk so much before.

Sul. Because I never met with a man that I liked before.

Bon. Pray, Sir, as the saying is, let me ask you one question: Are not man and wife one flesh?

Sir C. You and your wife, Mr. Guts, may be one flesh, because you are nothing else—but rational creatures have minds that must be united.

Sul. Minds?

Sir C. Ay, minds, Sir; don't you think that mind takes place of the body?

Sul. In some people.

Sir C. Then the interest of the master must be consulted before that of his servant.

Sul. Sir, you shall dine with me to-morrow—Oons, I always thought that we were naturally one.

Sir C. Sir, I know that my two hands are naturally one, because they love one another, kiss one another, help one another in all the actions of life; but I could not say so much if they were always at cuffs.

Sul. Then, 'tis plain we are two.

Sir C. Why don't you part with her, Sir?

Sul. Will you take her, Sir?

Sir C. With all my heart.

Sul. You shall have her to-morrow morning, and a venison pasty into the bargain.

Sir C. You'll let me have her fortune too?

Sul. Fortune! why, Sir, I have no quarrel to her fortune—I only hate the woman, Sir, and none but the woman shall go.

Sir C. But her fortune, Sir—

Sul. Can you play at whist, Sir?

Sir C. No, truly, Sir.

Sul. Nor at all-fours.

Sir C. Neither.

Sul. Oons! where was this man bred? [Aside.] Burn me, Sir, I can't go home; 'tis but two o'clock.

Sir C. For half an hour, Sir, if you please—but you must consider 'tis late.

Sul. Late! that is the reason I can't go to bed—Come, Sir.

[Exeunt.]

Enter CHERRY; she runs across the stage, and knocks at AIMWELL'S chamber-door. Enter AIMWELL, in his nightcap and gown.

Aim. What's the matter? you tremble, child; you are frightened!

Cher. No, wonder, Sir—but, in short, Sir, this very minute a gang of rogues are gone to rob my Lady Bountiful's house.

Aim. How!

Cher. I dogged them to the very door, and left them breaking in.

Aim. Have you alarmed any body else with the news.

Cher. No, no, Sir; I wanted to have discovered the whole plot, and twenty other things, to your man, Martin; but I have searched the whole house, and can't find him; where is he?

Aim. No matter, child; will you guide me immediately to the house?

Cher. With all my heart, Sir; my Lady Bountiful is my godmother, and I love Miss Dorinda so well—

Aim. Dorinda! the name inspires me! the glory and the danger shall be all my own—Come, my life, let me but get my sword. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Bed-chamber in LADY BOUNTIFUL'S House.

MRS. SULLEN and DORINDA discovered; a table and lights.

Dor. 'Tis very late, sister; no news of your spouse yet?

Mrs. S. No; I'm condemned to be alone till towards four, and then, perhaps, I may be executed with his company.

Dor. Well, my dear, I'll leave you to your rest; you'll go directly to bed, I suppose.

Mrs. S. I don't know what to do; heigho!

Dor. That's a desiring sigh, sister.

Mrs. S. This is a languishing hour, sister.

Dor. And might prove a critical minute, if the pretty fellow were here.

Mrs. S. Here! what, in my bed-chamber, at two o'clock 't' th' morning! I undressed, the family asleep, my hated husband abroad, and my lovely fellow at my feet!—O, gad, sister!

Dor. Thoughts are free, sister, and them I allow you—So, my dear, good night. [Exit.]

Mrs. S. A good rest to my dear Dorinda—Thoughts free! are they so? why, then, suppose him here, dressed like a youthful, gay, and burning bridegroom, [ARCHER steals out of the closet.] with tongue enchanting, eyes bewitching, knees imploring—[Turns a little on one side, and sees ARCHER in the posture she describes.] Ah! [Shrieks, and runs to the other side of the stage.] Have my thoughts raised a spirit? What are you, Sir! a man or a devil?

Arch. A man, a man, Madam. [Rising.]

Mrs. S. How shall I be sure of it?

Arch. Madam, I'll give you demonstration this minute. [Takes her hand.]

Mrs. S. What, Sir! do you intend to be rude?

Arch. Yes, Madam, if you please.

Mrs. S. In the name of wonder, whence came ye?

Arch. From the skies, Madam—I'm a Jupiter in love, and you shall be my Alcmena.

Mrs. S. How came you in?

Arch. I flew in at the window, Madam, your cousin Cupid lent me his wings, and your sister Venus opened the casement.

Mrs. S. I'm struck dumb with admiration.

Arch. And I with wonder.

Mrs. S. What will become of me? [Looks passionately at her.]

Arch. How beautiful she looks!—the teeming, jolly spring smiles in her blooming face, and when she was conceived, her mother smelt to roses, looked on lilies—Lilies unfold their white, their fragrant charms, When the warm sun that darts into their arms.

Mrs. S. Ah! [Shrieks.]

Arch. Oons, Madam, what do you mean? you'll raise the house.

Mrs. S. Sir, I'll wake the dead, before I'll bear this. What! approach me with the freedom of a keeper! I'm glad on 't; your impudence has cured me.

Arch. If this be impudence, [Kneels.] I leave to your partial self; no panting pilgrim, after a tedious, painful voyage, e'er bowed before his saint with more devotion.

Mrs. S. Now, now, I'm ruin'd if he kneels. [Aside.] Rise, thou prostrate engineer; not all thy undermining skill shall reach my heart. Rise, and know that I am a woman without my sex; I can love to all the tenderness of wishes, sighs, and tears.—But go no farther—Still, to convince you that I'm more than woman, I can speak my frailty, confess my weakness even for you—But—

Arch. For me! [Going to lay hold on her.]

Mrs. S. Hold, Sir; build not upon that—for my most mortal hatred follows, if you disobey what I command you now—leave me this minute. If he denies, I'm lost. [Aside.]

Arch. Then you'll promise—

Mrs. S. Any thing, another time.

Arch. When shall I come?

Mrs. S. To-morrow—when you will.

Arch. Your lips must seal the promise.

Mrs. S. Fshaw!

Arch. They must, they must. [Kisses her.] Raptures and paradise! and why not now, my angel? The time, the place, silence, and secrecy, all conspire—And now the conscious stars have pre-ordained this moment for my happiness.

[Takes her in his arms.]

Mrs. S. You will not, cannot, sure.

Arch. If the sun rides fast, and disappoints not mortals of to-morrow's dawn, this night shall crown my joys.

Mrs. S. My sex's pride assist me.

Arch. My sex's strength help me.

Mrs. S. You shall kill me first.

Arch. I'll die with you. [Carrying her off.]

Mrs. S. Thieves! thieves! murder!—

Enter SCRUB, in his breeches, and one shoe.

Scrub. Thieves! thieves! murder! popery!

Arch. Ha! [Draws, and offers to stab SCRUB.]

Scrub. [Kneeling.] O, pray, Sir, spare all I have, and take my life.

Mrs. S. [Holding ARCHER'S hand.] What does the fellow mean?

Scrub. O, Madam, down upon your knees, your marrow-bones—he's one of them.

Arch. Of whom?

Scrub. One of the rogues—I beg your pardon, one of the honest gentlemen, that just now are broke into the house.

Arch. How!

Mrs. S. I hope you did not come to rob me?

Arch. Indeed I did, Madam, but I would have taken nothing but what you might very well have spared; but your crying thieves has waked this dreaming fool, and so he takes them for granted.

Scrub. Granted! 'tis granted, Sir; take all we gave.

Mrs. S. The fellow looks as if he were broke out of Bedlam.

Scrub. Oons, Madam, they're broke into the nouse with fire and sword; I saw them, heard them, they'll be here this minute.

Arch. What! thieves?

Scrub. Under favour, Sir, I think so.

Mrs. S. What shall we do, Sir?

Arch. Madam, I wish your ladyship a good night.

Mrs. S. Will you leave me?

Arch. Leave you! lord, Madam, did not you command me to be gone just now, upon the pain of your mortal hatred.

Mrs. S. Nay, but pray, Sir—

[Takes hold of him.]

Arch. Ha, ha, ha! now comes my turn to be ravished.—You see now, Madam, you must use men one way or other; but take this by the way, good Madam, that none but a fool will give you the benefit of his courage, unless you take his love along with it. How are they armed, friend?

Scrub. With sword and pistol, Sir.

[He gets under the table.]

Arch. Hush! I see a dark lantern coming through the gallery—Madam, be assured I will protect you, or lose my life.

Mrs. S. Your life! no, Sir, they can rob me of nothing that I value half so much; therefore, now, Sir, let me entreat you to be gone.

Arch. No, Madam, I'll consult my own safety for the sake of yours; I'll work by stratagem: have you courage enough to stand the appearance of them.

Mrs. S. Yes, yes; since I have escaped your hands, I can face any thing.

Arch. Come hither, brother Scrub: don't you know me?

Scrub. Eh! my brother, Martin.

Arch. This way—Here—

[ARCHER and SCRUB hide.]

Enter GIBBET, with a dark lantern in one hand, and a pistol in the other.

Gib. Ay, ay, this is the chamber, and the lady alone.

Mrs. S. Who are you, Sir? What would you have? D'ye come to rob me?

Gib. Rob you! Alack-a-day, Madam, I'm only a younger brother, Madam; and so, Madam, if you make a noise, I'll shoot you through the head: but don't be afraid, Madam. [Laying his lantern and pistol upon the table.] These rings, Madam; don't be concerned, Madam; I have a profound respect for you, Madam; your keys, Madam; don't be frighted, Madam; I'm the most of a gentleman—[Searching her pockets.] This necklace, Madam; I never was rude to any lady! I have a veneration—for this necklace.

[Here ARCHER, having come round and seized the pistol, takes GIBBET by the collar, trips up his heels, and claps the pistol to his breast.]

Arch. Hold, profane villain, and take the reward of thy sacrilege.

Gib. Oh! pray, Sir, don't kill me; I an't prepared.

Vol. I. . . . 5 K

68*

Arch. How many are there of them, Scrub?

Scrub. Five and forty, Sir.

Arch. Then I must kill the villain, to have him out of the way.

Gib. Hold! hold! Sir; we are but three, upon my honour.

Arch. Scrub, will you undertake to secure him?

Scrub. Not I, Sir; kill him, kill him!

Arch. Run to Gipseys's chamber; there you'll find the doctor; bring him hither presently. [Exit SCRUB, running.] Come, rogue, if you have a short prayer, say it.

Gib. Sir, I have no prayer at all; the government has provided a chaplain to say prayers for us on these occasions.

Mrs. S. Pray, Sir, don't kill him; you fright me as much as him.

Arch. The dog shall die, Madam, for being the occasion of my disappointment. Sirrah, this moment is your last.

Gib. Sir, I'll give you two hundred pounds to spare my life.

Arch. Have you no more, rascal?

Gib. Yes, Sir, I can command four hundred; but I must reserve two of them to save my life at the sessions.

Enter SCRUB and FOIGARD.

Arch. Here, doctor; I suppose Scrub and you, between you, may manage him.—Lay hold of him.

[FOIGARD lays hold of GIBBET.]

Gib. What! turned over to the priest already—Lookye, doctor, you come before your time; I an't condemned yet, I thank ye.

Foig. Come, my dear joy, I vil secure your body and your shoul too; I will make you a good catholic, and give you an absolution.

Gib. Absolution! can you procure me a pardon, doctor?

Foig. No, joy.

Gib. Then you and your absolution may go to the devil.

Arch. Convey him into the cellar, there bind him. Take the pistol, and if he offers to resist, shoot him through the head,—and come back to us with all the speed you can.

Scrub. Ay, ay; come, doctor, do you hold him fast, and I'll guard him.

[Exit SCRUB, GIBBET, and FOIGARD.]

Mrs. S. But how came the doctor?

Arch. In short, Madam—[Shrieking without.] 'Sdeath! the rogues are at work with the other ladies: I'm vexed I parted with the pistol; but I must fly to their assistance—Will you stay here, Madam, or venture yourself with me?

Mrs. S. Oh, with you, dear Sir, with you.

[Takes him by the arm, and Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—Another Apartment.

Enter HOUNSLOW, dragging in LADY BOUNTIFUL, and BACSHO' hauling in DORINDA. The Rogues with swords drawn.

Houn. Come, come, your jewels, mistress.

Bag. Your keys, your keys, old gentlewoman.

Enter AIMWELL.

Aim. Turn this way, villains; I durst engage an army in such a cause.

[He engages them both.]

Enter ARCHER and MRS. SULLEN.

Arch. Hold! hold! my lord; every man his bird, pray. [Fight; the rogues are disarmed.] Shall we kill the rogues?

Aim. No, no; we'll bind them.

Arch. Ay, ay; here, Madam, lend me your garter. [To Mrs. SULLEN, who stands by him.]

Mrs. S. The devil's in this fellow; he fights, loves, and banters, all in a breath: here's a rope that the rogues brought with them, I suppose.

Arch. Right, right, the rogue's destiny, a rope o hang himself—Come, my lord—this is but a scandalous sort of an office, [Binding the rogues together.] if our adventure should end in this sort of hangman work; but I hope there is something in prospect that—

Enter SCRUB.

Well, Scrub, have you secured your Tartar?

Scrub. Yes, Sir, I left the priest and him disputing about religion.

Aim. And pray carry these gentlemen to reap the benefit of the controversy.

[Delivers the prisoners to SCRUB, who leads them out.]

Mrs. S. Pray, sister, how came my lord here?

Dor. And pray, how came the gentleman here?

Mrs. S. I'll tell you the greatest piece of villainy—

[They talk in dumb show.]

Aim. I fancy, Archer, you have been more successful in your adventure than the house-breakers.

Arch. No matter for my adventure, yours is the principal—Press her this minute to marry you—now while she's hurried between the palpitation of her fear, and the joy of her deliverance; now while the tide of her spirits are at high flood:—throw yourself at her feet, speak some romantic nonsense or other—confound her senses, bear down her reason, and away with her. The priest is now in the cellar, and dare not refuse to do the work.

Aim. But how shall I get off without being observed?

Arch. You a lover, and not find a way to get off!—Let me see.

Aim. You bleed, Archer.

Arch. 'Sdeath, I'm glad on't; this wound will do the business—I'll amuse the old lady and Mrs. Sullen about dressing my wound, while you carry off Dorinda.

Lady B. Gentlemen, could we understand how you would be gratified for the services—

Arch. Come, come, my lady, this is no time for compliments; I'm wounded, Madam.

Lady B. & Mrs. S. How! wounded!

Dor. I hope, Sir, you have received no hurt?

[To AIM.]

Aim. None but what you may cure. [Makes love.]

Lady B. Let me see your arm, Sir—I must have some powder-sugar, to stop the blood—O me! an ugly gash; upon my word, Sir, you must go into bed.

Arch. Ay, my lady, a bed would do very well—Madam, [To Mrs. SULLEN.] will you do me the favour to conduct me to a chamber?

Lady B. Do, do, daughter—while I get the lint, and the probe, and the plaster, ready.

[Runs out one way; AIM carries off Dor. another.]

Arch. Come, Madam, why don't you obey your mother's commands?

Mrs. S. How can you, after what is past, have the confidence to ask me?

Arch. And if you go to that, how can you, after what is past, have the confidence to deny me?

—Was not this blood shed in your defence, and my life exposed for your protection?—Lookye, Madam, I'm none of your romantic fools, that fight giants and monsters for nothing; my valour is downright Swiss; I am a soldier of fortune, and must be paid.

Mrs. S. 'Tis ungenerous in you, Sir, to upbraid me with your services.

Arch. 'Tis ungenerous in you, Madam, not to reward them.

Mrs. S. How! at the expense of my honour!

Arch. Honour! Can honour consist with ingratitude! If you would deal like a woman of honour, do like a man of honour: d'ye think I would deny you in such a case?

Enter GIPSEY.

Gip. Madam, my lady has ordered me to tell you, that your brother is below at the gate.

Mrs. S. My brother! Heavens be praised:—Sir, he shall thank you for your services; he has it in his power.

Arch. Who is your brother, Madam?

Mrs. S. Sir Charles Freeman. You'll excuse me, Sir; I must go and receive him. [Exit.]

Arch. Sir Charles Freeman! 'Sdeath and hell!—my old acquaintance. Now, unless Aimwell has made good use of his time, all our fair machine goes souze into the sea, like the Eddy-stone. [Exit.]

SCENE IV.—A Gallery in the same House.

Enter AIMWELL and DORINDA.

Dor. Well, well, my lord, you have conquered.—Your late generous action will, I hope, plead for my easy yielding; though I must own your lordship had a friend in the fort before.

Aim. The sweets of Hybla dwell upon her tongue. Here, doctor—

Enter FOIGARD, with a book.

Foig. Are you prepared, bote?

Dor. I'm ready; but first, my lord, one word—I have a frightful example of a hasty marriage in my own family; when I reflect upon't, it shocks me. Pray, my lord, consider a little—

Aim. Consider! do you doubt my honour or my love?

Dor. Neither. I do believe you equally just as brave—And were your whole sex drawn out for me to choose, I should not cast a look upon the multitude, if you were absent—But, my lord, I'm a woman:—colours, concealments, may hide a thousand faults in me—Therefore know me better first; I hardly dare affirm I know myself in any thing except my love.

Aim. Such goodness who could injure? I find myself unequal to the task of villain. She has gained my soul, and made it honest like her own—I cannot hurt her. [Aside.] Doctor, retire. [Exit FOIGARD.] Madam, behold your lover and your proselyte, and judge of my passion by my conversion—I'm all a lie, nor dare I give a fiction to your arms; I'm all a counterfeit, except my passion.

Dor. Forbid it, Heaven! a counterfeit!

Aim. I am no lord, but a poor needy man, come, with a mean and scandalous design, to prey upon your fortune!—but the beauties of your mind and person have so won me from myself, that, like a trusty servant, I prefer the interest of my mistress to my own.

Dor. Pray, Sir, who are you?

Aim. Brother to the man whose title I usurped, but stranger to his honour or his fortune.

Dor. Matchless honesty!—Once I was proud, Sir, of your wealth and title, but now am prouder that you want it. Now I can show my regard was justly levelled, and had no aim but love. Doctor, come in.

Enter FOIGARD at one door, GIPSEY at another, who whispers DORINDA.

Your pardon, Sir, we sha'n't want you now, Sir. You must excuse me—I'll wait on you presently.

[Exit with GIPSEY.]

Foig. Upon my shoul, now dis is foolish. [Exit.]
Aim. Gone! and bid the priest depart—It has an ominous look.

Enter ARCHER.

Arch. Courage, Tom—shall I wish you joy?

Aim. No.

Arch. Oons! man, what ha' you been doing?

Aim. O, Archer, my honesty, I fear, has ruined me.

Arch. How?

Aim. I have discovered myself.

Arch. Discovered! and without my consent! What! Have I embarked my small remains in the same bottom with yours, and you dispose of all without my partnership?

Aim. O, Archer, I own my fault.

Arch. After conviction—'Tis then too late for pardon.—You may remember, Mr. Aimwell, that you proposed this folly—As you began, so end it.—Henceforth I'll hunt my fortune singly—So, farewell.

Aim. Stay, my dear Archer, but a minute.

Arch. Stay! What, to be despised, exposed, and laughed at! No, I would sooner change conditions with the worst of the rogues we just now bound, than bear one scornful smile from the proud knight that once I treated as my equal.

Aim. What knight?

Arch. Sir Charles Freeman, brother to the lady that I had almost—But no matter for that; 'tis a cursed night's work, and so I leave you to make the best out.

Aim. Freeman!—One word, Archer. Still I have hopes; methought she received my confession with pleasure.

Arch. 'Sdeath, who doubts it?

Aim. She consented after to the match; and still I dare believe she will be just.

Arch. To herself, I warrant her, as you should have been.

Aim. By all my hopes she comes, and smiling comes.

Enter DORINDA, gaily.

Dor. Come, my dear lord—I fly with impatience to your arms—The minutes of my absence were a tedious year. Where's the priest?

Enter FOIGARD.

Arch. Oons, a brave girl.

Dor. I suppose, my lord, this gentleman is privy to our affairs?

Arch. Yes, yes, Madam, I'm to be your father.

Dor. Come, priest, do your office.

Arch. Make haste, make haste, couple them any way. [Takes AIMWELL'S hand.] Come, Madam, I'm to give you—

Dor. My mind's altered; I wont.

Arch. Eh—

Aim. I'm confounded.

Foig. Upon my shoul, and so is myshelf.

Arch. What's the matter now, Madam?

Dor. Lookye Sir, one generous action deserves another.—This gentleman's honour obliged him to hide nothing from me; my justice engages me to conceal nothing from him; in short, Sir, you are the person that you thought you counterfeited; you are the true Lord Viscount Aimwell, and I wish your lordship joy. Now, priest, you may be gone; if my lord is now pleased with the match, let his lordship marry me in the face of the world.

Aim. Archer, what does she mean?

Dor. Here's a witness for my truth.

Enter SIR CHARLES and MRS. SULLEN.

Sir C. My dear Lord Aimwell, I wish you joy.

Aim. Of what?

Sir C. Of your honour and estate. Your brother died the day before I left London; and all your friends have writ after you to Brussels: among the rest, I did myself the honour.

Arch. Harkye, Sir knight, don't you banter now?

Sir C. 'Tis truth, upon my honour.

Aim. Thanks to the pregnant stars that formed this accident.

Arch. Thanks to the womb of time that brought it forth; away with it.

Aim. Thanks to my guardian angel that led me to the prize.— [Taking DORINDA'S hand.]

Arch. And double thanks to the noble Sir Charles Freeman. My lord, I wish you joy. My lady, I wish you joy—'Egad, Sir Charles, you're the honestest fellow living—'Sdeath, I'm grown strangely airy upon this matter—My lord, how d'ye do!—A word, my lord. Don't you remember something of a previous agreement that entitles me to the moiety of this lady's fortune, which, I think, will amount to ten thousand pounds?

Aim. Not a penny, Archer. You would ha' cut my throat just now, because I would not deceive this lady.

Arch. Ay, and I'll cut your throat still if you should deceive her now.

Aim. That's what I expect; and to end the dispute, the lady's fortune is twenty thousand pounds; we'll divide stakes; take the twenty thousand pounds, or the lady.

Dor. How! Is your lordship so indifferent?

Arch. No, no, no, Madam, his lordship knows very well that I'll take the money; I leave you to his lordship, and so we're both provided for.

Enter FOIGARD.

Foig. Arrah fait, de people do say you be all robbed, joy.

Aim. The ladies have been in some danger, Sir, as you saw.

Foig. Upon my shoul, our inn be robbed too.

Aim. Our inn! By whom?

Foig. Upon my shalvation, our landlord has robbed himself, and run away vid de money.

Arch. Robbed himself?

Foig. Ay fait! and me too, of a hundred pounds.

Arch. Robbed you of a hundred pounds!

Foig. Yes, fait, honey, that I did owe to him.

Aim. Our money's gone, Frank.

Arch. Rot the money, my wench is gone

Spavez-vous quelque-chose de Mademoiselle Cherry?

Sir C. This good company meets opportunely in favour of a design I have in behalf of my unfortunate sister. I intend to part her from her husband—Gentlemen, will you assist me?

Arch. Assist you! 'Sdeath, who would not?

Foig. Ay, upon my shoul, we'll all assist.

Enter SULLEN.

Sul. What's all this? They tell me, spouse, that you had like to have been robbed.

Mrs. S. Truly, spouse, I was pretty near it—had not these two gentlemen interposed.

Sul. How came these gentlemen here?

Mrs. S. That's his way for returning thanks, you must know.

Foig. Ay, but upon my conscience de question be a-propos for all dat.

Sir C. You promised last night, Sir, that you would deliver your lady to me this morning.

Sul. Humph!

Arch. Humph! What do you mean by humph?—Sir, you shall deliver her—In short, Sir, we have saved you and your family; and if you are not civil, we'll unbind the rogues, join with 'em, and set fire to your house—What does the man mean? Not part with his wife.

Foig. Arrah, not part wid your wife! Upon my shoul, de man does not understand common shivility.

Mrs. S. Hold, gentlemen, all things here must move by consent. Compulsion would spoil us. Let my dear and I talk the matter over, and you shall judge between us.

Sul. Let me know, first, who are to be our judges. Pray, Sir, who are you?

Sir C. I am Sir Charles Freeman, come to take away your wife.

Sul. And you, good Sir?

Aim. Thomas Viscount Aimwell, come to take away your sister.

Sul. And you, pray, Sir?

Arch. Francis Archer, Esq. come—

Sul. To take away my mother, I hope—Gentlemen, you're heartily welcome. I never met with three more obliging people since I was born—And now, my dear, if you please, you shall have the first word.

Arch. And the last, for five pounds. [Aside.

Mrs. S. Spouse.

Sul. Rib.

Mrs. S. How long have you been married?

Sul. By the almanack fourteen months;—but by my account, fourteen years.

Mrs. S. 'Tis thereabout by my reckoning.

Foig. Upon my conscience, deir accounts vil agree.

Mrs. S. Pray, spouse, what did you marry for?

Sul. To get an heir to my estate.

Sir C. And have you succeeded?

Sul. No.

Arch. The condition fails on his side—Pray, Madam, what did you marry for?

Mrs. S. To support the weakness of my sex by the strength of his, and to enjoy the pleasures of an agreeable society.

Sir C. Are your expectations answered?

Mrs. S. No.

Foig. Arrah, honeys, a clear caase, a clear caase!

Sir C. What are the bars to your mutual contentment?

Mrs. S. In the first place, I can't drink ale with him.

Sul. Nor can I drink tea with her.

Mrs. S. I can't hunt with you.

Sul. Nor can I dance with you.

Mrs. S. I hate cocking and racing.

Sul. I abhor ombre and piquet.

Mrs. S. Your silence is intolerable.

Sul. Your prating is worse.

Mrs. S. Is there a thing on earth we can agree in?

Sul. Yes—to part.

Mrs. S. With all my heart.

Sul. Your hand.

Mrs. S. Here.

Sul. These hands joined us, these shall part us—Away—

Mrs. S. East.

Sul. West.

Mrs. S. North.

Sul. South; as far as the poles asunder.

Foig. Amen! Upon my shoul, a very pretty shemony.

Sir C. Now, Mr. Sullen, there wants only my sister's fortune to make us easy.

Sul. Sir Charles, you love your sister, and I love her fortune; every one to his fancy.

Arch. Then you wont refund?

Sul. Not a stiver.

Arch. What is her portion?

Sir C. Twenty thousand pounds, Sir.

Arch. I'll pay it. My lord, I thank him, has enabled me. This night's adventure has proved strangely lucky to us all—for Captain Gibbet in his walk has made bold, Mr. Sullen, with your study and escriptoir, and has taken out all the writings of your estate; all the articles of marriage with your lady, bills, bonds, leases, and receipts, to an infinite value; I took 'em from him, and will deliver them to Sir Charles.

[Gives him a parcel of papers and parchments.

Sul. How, my writings! my head aches consumedly. Well, gentlemen, you shall have her fortune, but I can't talk. If you have a mind, Sir Charles, to be merry, and celebrate my sister's wedding, and my divorce, you may command my house! but my head aches consumedly—Scrub, bring me a dram. [Exit.

Foig. And, Scrub, put a little drop on the top for me! [Exit.

Arch. 'T would be hard to guess which of these parties are the better pleased, the couple joined, or the couple parted: the one rejoicing in hopes of an untasted happiness, and the other in their deliverance from an experienced misery.

Both happy in their several states we find;

These parted by consent, and those conjoin'd:

Consent, if mutual, saves the lawyer's fee,

Consent is law enough to set you free.
