FATAL CURIOSITY:

A TRAGEDY,

IN THREE ACTS.

BY GEORGE LILLO.

REMARKS.

THE story of this piece is very simple and affecting, and is said to have been founded on a fact which happened on the western coast of England. The circumstance of a son, long absent from his parents, keeping himself, on his return to visit them, for some time unknown, is unforced; while at the same time their inducement, from the depth of distress and penury, to perpetrate his murder, for the sake of the treasures he had shown them, is productive of some very fine scenes of intermingled horror and tenderness. Mr. Lillo rendered the distresses of common and domestic life as interesting to the audience, as those of kings and heroes; and the ruin brought on private families by an indulgence of avarice, lust, &c. as the havoc made in states and empires by ambition, cruelty, or tyranny. His George Barnwell, Fatal Curiosity, and Arden of Feversham, are all planned on common and well-known stories; yet they have always drawn tears from the audience, and even the critics have laid down their pens to take out the handkerchief.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Room in OLD WILMOT'S House.

Enter OLD WILMOT.

O. Wil. The day is far advanc'd; the cheerful sun

Pursues with vigour his repeated course;

No labour lessens, nor no time decays

His strength or splendour: evermore the same,

From age to age his influence sustains

Dependent worlds, bestows both life and motion

On the dull mass that forms their dusky orbs,

Cheers them with heat, and gilds them with brightness.

Yet man, of jarring elements compos'd,

Who posts from change to change, from the first hour

Of his frail being till his dissolution,

1*

Enjoys the sad prerogative above him,
To think, and to be wretched.—What is life,
To him that's born to die! or what that wisdom,
Whose perfection ends in knowing we know nothing!

Mere contradiction all! a tragic farce,
'Tis tedious though short, and without art elaborate,
Ridiculously sad—

Enter RANDAL.

Where hast been, Randal?

Ran. Not out of Penryn, Sir; but to the strand,
To hear what news from Falmouth since the storm

Of wind last night.

O. Wil. It was a dreadful one.

Ran. Some found it so. A noble ship from India

Ent'ring in the harbour, run upon a rock,
And there was lost.

O. Wil. What 'came of those on board her?

Ran. Some few are sav'd; but much the greater part,
'Tis thought, are perished,

O. Wil. They are past the fear
Of future tempests or a wreck on shore;
Those who escap'd are still expos'd to both.
Where's your mistress?

Ran. I saw her pass the High-street, towards the Minster.

O. Wil. She's gone to visit Charlotte—She doth well.

In the soft bosom of that gentle maid,
There dwells more goodness than the rigid race
Of moral pedants e'er believ'd or taught.
With what amazing constancy and truth
Doth she sustain the absence of our son, Whom more than life she loves! How shun for
him,

Whom we shall ne'er see more, the rich and great;
Who own her charms, and sigh to make her happy.

Since our misfortunes, we have found no friend,
None who regarded our distress, but her;
And she, by what I have observ'd of late,
Is tir'd, or exhausted—curs'd condition!
To live a burden to one only friend,
And blast her youth with our contagious woe!
Who that had reason, soul, or sense, would bear it
A moment longer!—Then, this honest wretch!—
I must dismiss him—Why should I detain
A grateful, gen'rous youth to perish with me?
His service may procure him bread elsewhere.
Though I have none to give him. Pr'ythee
Randal,

How long hast thou been with me?

Ran. Fifteen years.

I was a very child when first you took me,
To wait upon your son, my dear young master!
I oft have wish'd I'd gone to India with him;
Though you, desponding, give him o'er for lost.
I am to blame.—This talk revives your sorrow
For his absence.

O. Wil. That cannot be reviv'd,
Which never died.

Ran. The whole of my intent
Was to confess your bounty, that supplied
The loss of both my parents: I was long
The object of your charitable care.

O. Wil. No more of that.—Thou'st serv'd me longer since

Without reward; so that account is balanc'd,
Or, rather I'm thy debtor. I remember,
When poverty began to show her face
Within these walls, and all my other servants,
Like pamp'rd vermin from a falling house,
Retreated with the plunder they had gain'd,
And left me, too indulgent and remiss
For such ungrateful wretches, to be crush'd
Beneath the ruin they had help'd to make,
That you, more good than wise, refused to leave
me.

Ran. Nay, I beseech you, Sir!—

O. Wil. With my distress,
In perfect contradiction to the world,
Thy love, respect, and diligence increased;
Now all the recompense within my power,
Is to discharge thee, Randal, from my hard,
Unprofitable service.

Ran. Heaven forbid!

Shall I forsake you in your worst necessity?
Believe me, Sir, my honest soul abhors
The barb'rous thought.

O. Wil. What! canst thou feed on air?
I have have not left wherewith to purchase food
For one meal more.

Ran. Rather than leave you thus,
I'll beg my bread and live on others' bounty
While I serve you.

O. Wil. Down, down my swelling heart,
Or burst in silence: 'tis thy cruel fate
Insults thee by his kindness. He is innocent
Of all the pain it gives thee. Go thy ways,
I will no more suppress thy youthful hopes
Of rising in the world.

Ran. 'Tis true; I'm young,
And never tried my fortune, or my genius;
Which may, perhaps, find out some happy means
As yet unthought of, to supply your wants.

O. Wil. Thou tortur'st me—I hate all obligations

Which I can ne'er return. And who art thou,
That I should stoop to take 'em from thy hand?
Care for thyself, but take no thought for me;
I will not want thee—rouble me no more.

Ran. Be not offended, Sir, and I will go:
I ne'er repin'd at your commands before;

But, heaven's my witness, I obey you now
With strong reluctance and a heavy heart.
Farewell, my worthy master! [Going

O. Wil. Farewell—Stay—
As thou art yet a stranger to the world,
Of which, alas! I've had too much experience,
I should, methinks, before we part, bestow
A little counsel on thee. Dry thy eyes—

If thou weep'st thus, I shall proceed no farther.
Dost thou aspire to greatness, or to wealth,
Quit books and the unprofitable search
Of wisdom there, and study human kind:
No science will avail thee without that;
But, that obtain'd, thou need'st not any other.
This will instruct thee to conceal thy views,
And wear the face of probity and honour,
'Till thou hast gain'd thy end; which must be ever

Thy own advantage, at that man's expense
Who shall be weak enough to think thee honest.
Ran. You mock me, sure.

O. Wil. I never was more serious.

Ran. Why should you counsel what you scorn'd to practise?

O. Wil. Because that foolish scorn has been my ruin.

I've been an idiot, but would have thee wiser,
And treat mankind, as they would treat thee,
Randal;

As they deserve, and I've been treated by 'em.
Thou'st seen, by me, and those who now despise
me,

How men of fortune fall, and beggars rise;
Shun my example; treasure up my precepts;
The world's before thee—be a knave and prosper.
What, art thou dumb? [After a long pause.

Ran. Amazement ties my tongue.

Where are your former principles?

O. Wil. No matter;
Suppose I have renounc'd 'em: I have passions,
And love thee still; therefore would have thee
think,

The world is all a scene of deep deceit,
And he who deals with mankind on the square,
Is his own bubble, and undoes himself. [Exit

Ran. Is this the man I thought so wise and just?

What! teach and counsel me to be a villain!
Sure grief has made him frantic, or some fiend
Assumed his shape—I shall suspect my senses.
High-minded he was ever, and impudent;
But pitiful and generous to a fault:
Pleasure he loved, but honour was his idol.
O, fatal change! O, horrid transformation!
So a majestic temple, sunk to ruin,
Becomes the loathsome shelter and abode
Of lurking serpents, toads, and beasts of prey;
And scaly dragons hiss, and lions roar,
Where wisdom taught, and music charmed be-fore.

[Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Parlour in CHARLOTTE'S HOUSE.

Enter CHARLOTTE and MARIA.

Char. What terror and amazement must they
Who die by shipwreck?

[feel]

Mar. 'Tis a dreadful thought!

Char. Ay; is it not, Maria? to descend,
Living and conscious, to that wat'ry tomb!
Alas! had we no sorrows of our own,
The frequent instances of others' woe
Must give a gen'rous mind a world of pain.
But you forget you promised me to sing.
Though cheerfulness and I have long been strangers,

Harmonious sounds are still delightful to me.
There's sure no passion in the human soul,
But finds its food in music—I would hear
The song composed by that unhappy maid,
Whose faithful lover 'scap'd a thousand perils
From rocks, and sands, and the devouring deep:
And after all, being arrived at home,
Passing a narrow brook, was drowned there,
And perished in her sight.

Mar. Cease, cease, heart-easing tears;
Adieu, you flutt'ring fears,
Which seven long tedious years

Taught me to bear.

*Tears are for lighter woes;
Fear, no such danger knows,
As Fate remorseless shows, Endless despair.*

*Dear cause of all my pain,
On the wide stormy main,
Thou wast preserved in vain,
Though still ador'd;
Hadst thou died there unseen.
My wounded eyes had been Saw'd from the direst scene
Maid e'er deplor'd.*

[CHARLOTTE finds a letter.]

Char. What's this?—A letter, superscribed to me!

None could convey it here but you, Maria:
Ungen'rous, cruel maid! to use me thus!
To join with flatt'ring men to break my peace,
And persecute me to the last retreat!

Mar. Why should it break your peace, to hear the sighs
Of honourable love? This letter is—

Char. No matter whence—return it back unopened.

I have no love, no charms, but for my Wilmot,
Nor would have any.

Mar. Alas! Wilmot's dead;
Or, living, dead to you.

Char. I'll not despair;

Patience shall cherish hope, nor wrong his honour
By unjust suspicion. I know his truth,
And will preserve my own. But to prevent
All future, vain, officious impotunity,
Know, thou incessant foe of my repose,
Whether he sleeps, secure from mortal cares,
In the deep bosom of the boist'rous main,
Or, tossed with tempests, still endures its rage,
No second choice shall violate my vows;
High heaven, which heard them, and abhors the perjured,
Can witness, they were made without reserve;
Never to be retracted, ne'er dissolved
By accidents or absence, time or death.

Mar. And did your vows oblige you to support
His haughty parents, to your utter ruin?
Well may you weep to think on what you've done.

Char. I weep to think that I can do no more
For their support. What will become of em—
The hoary, helpless, miserable pair!

Mar. What I can't praise, you force me to admire,
And mourn for you, as you lament for them.
Your patience, constancy, and resignation,
Merit a better fate.

Char. So pride would tell me,
And vain self-love; but I believe them not:
And if, by wanting pleasure, I have gained Humility, I'm richer for my loss.

Mar. You have the heavenly art, still to improve
Your mind by all events. But here comes one,
Whose pride seems to increase with her misfor-
Her faded dress, unfashionably fine, [tunes.
As ill conceals her poverty, as that Strained complaisance her haughty, swelling heart.

Though perishing with want, so far from asking,
She ne'er receives a favour uncompelled;
And while she ruins, scorns to be obliged:
Let me depart, I know she loves me not.

[Exit MARIA.]

Enter AGNES.

Char. This visit's kind.

Agn. Few else would think it so:
Those who would once have thought themselves much honoured

By the least favour, though 'twere but a look,
I could have shown them, now refuse to see me.
'Tis misery enough to be reduced
To the low level of the common herd,
Who, born to begg'ry, envy all above them;
But 'tis the curse of curses, to endure
The insolent contempt of those we scorn.

Char. By scorning, we provoke them to contempt;

And thus offend, and suffer in our turns:
We must have patience.

Agn. No, I scorn them yet.
But there's no end of suff'ring: who can say
Their sorrows are complete? My wretched husband,

Tired with our woes, and hopeless of relief,
Grows sick of life.

And, urged by indignation and despair,
Would plunge into eternity at once,
By foul self-murder.

Char. Gracious heaven, support him!

Agn. His fixed love for me,
Whom he would fain persuade to share his fate,

And take the same, uncertain, dreadful course,
Alone withholds his hand.

Char. And may it ever!

Agn. I've known with him the two extremes of life,

The highest happiness, and deepest woe,
With all the sharp and bitter aggravations
Of such a vast transition. Such a fall
In the decline of life! I have as quick,
As exquisite, a sense of pain as he,
And would do any thing, but die, to end it;
But there my courage fails. Death is the worst
That fate can bring, and cuts off ev'ry hope.

Char. We must not choose but strive to bear our lot

Without reproach or guilt: but by one act
Of desperation we may overthrow
The merit we've been raising all our days;
And lose our whole reward. And now, methinks,
Now more than ever, we have cause to fear,
And be upon our guard. The hand of heaven
Spreads clouds on clouds o'er our benighted heads,
And, wrapp'd in darkness, doubles our distress.
I had, the night last past, repeated twice,
A strange and awful dream: I would not yield
To fearful superstition, nor despise
The admonition of a friendly power
That wish'd my good.

Agn. I've certain plagues enough,
Without the help of dreams to make me wretched.

Char. I would not stake my happiness or duty
On their uncertain credit, nor on aught
But reason, and the known decrees of heaven.
Yet dreams have sometimes shown events to
come,

And may excite to vigilance and care;
My vision may be such and sent to warn us,
(Now we are tried by multiplied afflictions,)
To mark each motion of our swelling hearts,
Lest we attempt to extricate ourselves,
And seek deliverance by forbidden ways;
To keep our hope and innocence entire,
Till we're dismiss'd to join the happy dead,
Or heaven relieves us here.

Agn. Well to your dream.

Char. Methought I sat, in a dark winter's night,

On the wide summit of a barren mountain;
The sharp bleak winds pierc'd through my shivering frame,
And storms of hail, and sleet, and driving rains,
Beat with impetuous fury on my head,
Drenched my chill'd limbs, and poured a deluge round me.

On one hand ever gentle Patience sat,
On whose calm bosom I reclin'd my head;
And on the other silent Contemplation.
At length to my unclose'd and watchful eyes,
That long had roll'd in darkness, dawn appear'd;
And I beheld a man, an utter stranger,
But of a graceful and exalted mien,
Who press'd with eager transport to embrace me.
I shunn'd his arms. But at some words he spoke,
Which I have now forgot, I turn'd again,
But he was gone. And oh! transporting sight!
Your son, my dearest Wilmot, fill'd his place.

Agn. If I regarded dreams, I should expect
Some fair event from yours.

Char. But what's to come,
Though more obscure, is terrible indeed
Methought, we parted soon, and when I sought
him,

You and his father—(yes, you both were there)—
Strove to conceal him from me: I pursued you
Both with my cries, and call'd on heaven and earth
To judge my wrongs, and force you to reveal
Where you had hid my love, my life, my Wilmot!—

Agn. Unless you mean t'affront me, spare the rest.

'Tis just as likely Wilmot should return,
As we become your foes.

Char. Far be such rudeness
From Charlotte's thoughts; but when I heard your name

Self-murder, it reviv'd the frightful image
Of such a dreadful scene.

Agn. You will persist!—

Char. Excuse me; I have done. Being a dream,

I thought, indeed, it could not give offence

Agn. You could not think so, had you thought at all:

But I take nothing ill from thee. Adieu;
I've tarried longer than I first intended,
And my poor husband mourns the while alone.

Char. She's gone abruptly, and I fear displeas'd.
The least appearance of advice or caution
Sets her impatient temper in a flame.
When grief, that well might humble, swells our pride,

And pride increasing, aggravates our grief,
The tempest must prevail till we are lost.
Heaven grant a fairer issue to her sorrows!

[Exit.]

SCENE III.—The Town and Port of Penryn

Enter YOUNG WILMOT and EUSTACE, in Indian habits.

Wil. Welcome, my friend! to Penryn: here we're safe.

Eust. Then we're deliver'd twice; first from the sea,

And then from savage men, who, more remorseless,

Prey on shipwrecked wretches, and spoil and murder those

Whom fatal tempests and devouring waves,
In all their fury, spard.

Wil. It is a scandal,

Though malice must acquit the better sort,
The rude unpolish'd people here in Cornwall
Have long lain under, and with too much justice:
For 'tis an evil, grown almost inveterate,
And asks a bold and skilful hand to cure.

Eust. Your treasure's safe, I hope.

Wil. 'Tis here, thank heaven!

Being in jewels, when I saw our danger,
I hid it in my bosom.

Eust. I observed you;

And wonder how you could command your thoughts,

In such a time of terror and confusion.

Wil. My thoughts were then at home—O England! England!

Thou seat of plenty, liberty, and health,
With transport I behold thy verdant fields,
Thy lofty mountains rich with useful ore,
Thy numerous herds, thy flocks, and winding streams!

After a long and tedious absence, Eustace,
With what delight we breathe our native air,

And tread the genial soil that bore us first !
 'Tis said, the world is ev'ry wise man's country ;
 Yet, after having view'd its various nations,
 I'm weak enough, still to prefer my own,
 To all I've seen beside.—You smile, my friend,
 And think, perhaps, 'tis instinct more than reason.
 Why, be it so. Instinct preceded reason,
 Ev'n in the wisest men, and may sometimes
 Be much the better guide. But, be it either,
 I must confess, that even death itself
 Appear'd to me with twice its native horrors,
 When apprehended in a foreign land.
 Death is, no doubt, in ev'ry place the same :
 Yet nature cast a look towards home, and most,
 Who have it in their power, choose to expire
 Where they first drew their breath.

Eust. Believe me, Wilmot,
 Your grave reflections were not what I smiled at ;
 I own the truth. That we're returned to England,

Affords me all the pleasure you can feel.
 Yet I must think a warmer passion moves you ;
 Thinking of that, I smil'd.

Wil. O Eustace ! Eustace !
 Thou know'st, for I've confess'd to thee, I love ;
 But, having never seen the charming maid,
 Thou canst not know the fierceness of my flame.
 My hopes and fears, like the tempestuous seas
 That we have past, now mount me to the skies,
 Now hurl me down from that stupendous height,
 And drive me to the centre. Did you know
 How much depends on this important hour,
 You would not be surprised to see me thus.
 The sinking fortune of our ancient house
 Compell'd me, young, to leave my native country,
 My weeping parents, and my lovely Charlotte ;
 Who rul'd, and must for ever rule my fate.
 O ! should my Charlotte, doubtful of my truth,
 Or in despair ever to see me more,
 Have given herself to some more happy lover !—
 Destruction's in the thought !—Or should my parents,

Griev'd for my absence and oppressed with want,
 Have sunk beneath their burden, and expir'd,
 While I, too late, was flying to relieve them ;
 The end of all my long and weary travels,
 The hope that made success itself a blessing,
 Being defeated, and for ever lost,
 What were the riches of the world to me ?

Eust. The wretch who fears all that is possible,

Must suffer more than he who feels the worst
 A man can feel, who lives exempt from fear.
 A woman may be false, and friends are mortal ;
 And yet your aged parents may be living,
 And your fair mistress constant.

Wil. True, they may ;
 I doubt, but I despair not—No, my friend !
 My hopes are strong, and lively as my fears ;
 They tell me, Charlotte is as true as fair,
 That we shall meet, never to part again ;
 That I shall see my parents, kiss the tears
 From their pale hollow cheeks, cheer their sad hearts,

And drive that gaping phantom, meagre want,
 For ever from their board ; crown all their days
 To come, with peace, with pleasure and abundance ;

Receive their fond embraces and their blessings,
 And be a blessing to them.

Eust. 'Tis our weakness :—
 Blind to events, we reason in the dark,

VOL. I. . . . B

And fondly apprehend what none e'er found,
 Or ever shall, pleasure and pain unmix'd ;
 And flatter and torment ourselves by turns,
 With what shall never be.

Wil. I'll go this instant
 To seek my Charlotte, and explore my fate.
Eust. What ! in that foreign habit ?

Wil. That's a trifle,
 Not worth my thoughts.
Eust. The hardships you've endur'd,
 And your long stay beneath the burning zone,
 Where one eternal sultry summer reigns,
 Have marr'd the native hue of your complexion ;
 Methinks, you look more like a sun-burnt Indian
 Than a Briton.

Wil. Well, 'tis no matter, Eustace !
 I hope my mind's not altered for the worse ;
 And for my outside—But inform me, friend,
 When I may hope to see you.

Eust. When you please :
 You'll find me at the inn.

Wil. When I have learn'd my doom, expect me
 there.

'Till then farewell !

Eust. Farewell ! success attend you ! [Exeunt.

ACT II.

SCENE I.—CHARLOTTE'S House.

CHARLOTTE enters, in thought ; and, soon after,
 SERVANT.

Serv. Madam, a stranger in a foreign habit
 Desires to see you.

Char. In a foreign habit—
 'Tis strange and unexpected—But admit him.

[Exit SERVANT.
 Who can this stranger be ? I know no foreigner.

WILMOT enters.

—Nor any man like this.

Wil. Ten thousand joys !

[Going to embrace her.

Char. Sir, you are too bold—forebear and let me know

What business brought you here ; or leave the place.

Wil. Perfidious maid ! am I forgot or scorn'd ?

Char. Can I forget a man I never knew ?

Wil. My fears are true : some other has her
 heart :

She's lost—My fatal absence has undone me.

[Aside.
 O ! could thy Wilmot have forgot thee, Charlotte !
Char. Ha ! Wilmot ! say ! what do your words import ?

O gentle stranger ! ease my swelling heart :
 What dost thou know of Wilmot ?

Wil. This I know.

When all the winds of heaven seem'd to conspire
 Against the stormy main, and dreadful peals
 Of rattling thunder deafen'd ev'ry ear,
 And down'd th' affrighten'd mariners' loud cries ;
 When livid lightning spread its sulphurous flames
 Through all the dark horizon, and disclos'd
 The raging seas incens'd to his destruction ;
 When the good ship in which he was embark'd
 Broke, and, o'erwhelm'd by the impetuous surge,
 Sunk to the oozy bottom of the deep,
 And left him struggling with the warring waves
 In that dread moment, in the jaws of death,

When his strength fail'd, and every hope forsook him,
And his last breath press'd towards his trembling lips,
The neighbouring rocks, that echo'd to his moan,
Return'd no sound articulate, but—Charlotte.

Char. The fatal tempest, whose description strikes

The hearer with astonishment, is ceas'd;
And Wilmot is at rest. The fiercer storm
Of swelling passion that o'erwhelms the soul,
And rages worse than the mad foaming seas
In which he perish'd, ne'er shall vex him more.

Wil. Thou seem'st to think he's dead; enjoy that thought;

Persuade yourself, that what you wish is true;
And triumph in your falsehood.—Yes, he's dead;
You were his fate. The cruel winds and waves,
That cast him pale and breathless on the shore,
Spar'd him for greater woes—To know his Charlotte,

Forgetting all her vows to him and heaven,
Had cast him from her thoughts—then, then he died;

But never must have rest. E'en now he wanders,
A sad, repining, discontented ghost,
The unsubstantial shadow of himself,
And pours his plaintive groans in thy deaf ears,
And stalks, unseen, before thee.

Char. 'Tis enough—

Detested falsehood now has done its worst.

And art thou dead?—And would'st thou die, my Wilmot!

For one thou thought'st unjust?—thou soul of truth!

What must be done?—Which way shall I express

Unutterable woe? or how convince
Thy dear departed spirit of the love,
Th' eternal love, and never-failing faith,
Of thy much injur'd, lost, despairing Charlotte?

Wil. Be still, my flutt'ring heart; hope not too soon:

Perhaps I dream, and this is all illusion.

Char. If, as some teach, the spirit after death,
Free from the bonds and ties of sordid earth,
Can trace us to our most conceal'd retreat,
See all we act, and read our very thoughts;
To thee, O Wilmot! kneeling, I appeal:—
If e'er I swerv'd in action, word, or thought,
Or ever wished to taste a joy on earth
That centred not in thee since last we parted,—
May we ne'er meet again, but thy loud wrongs
So close the ear of mercy to my cries,
That I may never see those bright abodes
Where truth and virtue only have admission,
And thou inhabit'st now!

Wil. Assist me, Heaven!

Preserve my reason, memory, and sense!
O moderate my fierce tumultuous joys,
Or their excess will drive me to distraction.
O Charlotte! Charlotte! lovely virtuous maid!
Can thy firm mind, in spite of time and absence,
Remain unshaken, and support its truth;
And yet thy frailer memory retain
No image, no idea, of thy lover?

Why dost thou gaze so wildly? look on me:
Turn thy dear eyes this way; observe me well.

Have scorching climates, time, and this strange habit,

So chang'd and so disguis'd thy faithful Wilmot,
That nothing in my voice, my face, or mien,

Remains, to tell my Charlotte I am he?

[After viewing him sometime, she approaches weeping, and gives him her hand; and then, turning towards him, sinks upon his bosom.]

Why dost thou weep? why dost thou tremble thus?

Why doth thy panting heart and cautious touch
Speak thee but half convinc'd? whence are thy fears?

Why art thou silent? canst thou doubt me still?

Char. No, Wilmot! no; I'm blind with too much light:

O'ercome with wonder, and oppress'd with joy;
This vast profusion of extreme delight,
Rising at once, and bursting from despair,
Defies the aid of words, and mocks description;
But for one sorrow, one sad scene of anguish,
That checks the swelling torrent of my joys,
I could not bear the transport.

Wil. Let me know it:

Give me my portion of thy sorrow, Charlotte!
Let me partake thy grief, or bear it for thee.

Char. Alas! my Wilmot! the sad tears are thine;

They flow for thy misfortunes: I am pierc'd
With all the agonies of strong compassion,
With all the bitter anguish you must feel,
When you shall hear your parents—

Wil. Are no more.

Char. You apprehend me wrong.

Wil. Perhaps I do.

Perhaps you mean to say, the greedy grave

Was satisfied with one, and one is left

To bless my longing eyes.—But which, my Charlotte?

Char. Afflict yourself no more with groundless fears:

Your parents both are living: Their distress,
The poverty to which they are reduc'd,
In spite of my weak aid, was what I mourn'd;
And that in helpless age, to them whose youth
Was crowned with full prosperity, I fear,
Is worse, much worse, than death.

Wil. My joy's complete!

My parents living, and possessed of thee!—
From this bless'd hour, the happiest of my life,
I'll date my rest. My anxious hopes and fears,
My weary travels, and my dangers past,
Are now rewarded all: now I rejoice
In my success, and count my riches gain.
For know, my soul's best treasure! I have wealth

Enough to glut e'en avarice itself:

No more shall cruel want, or proud contempt,

Oppress the sinking spirits, or insult

The hoary heads of those, who gave me being.

Char. 'Tis now, O riches, I conceive your worth;

You are not base, nor can you be superfluous,
But when misplaced in base and sordid hands.

Fly, fly, my Wilmot! leave thy happy Charlotte!

Thy filial piety, the sighs and tears

Of thy lamenting parents, call thee hence.

Wil. I have a friend, the partner of my voyage,
Who in the storm last night, was shipwreck'd with me.

Char. Shipwreck'd last night! O you immortal powers!

What have you suffered? How were you preserved?

Wil. Let that, and all my other strange escapes
And perilous adventures, be the theme
Of many a happy winter night to come.
My present purpose was t'intreat my angel,
To know this friend, this other better Wilmot;
And come with him this evening to my father's:
I'll send him to thee.

Char. I consent with pleasure.

Wil. Heavens! what a night! How shall I bear my joy?
My parents, yours, my friends, all will be mine.
If such the early hopes, the vernal bloom,
The distant prospect of my future bliss,
Then what the ruddy autumn?—What the fruit,
The full possession of thy heavenly charms?
[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Street in Penryn.

Enter RANDAL.

Ran. Poor! poor! and friendless! whither shall I wander,
And to what point direct my views and hopes?
A menial servant!—No—What! shall I live,
Here in this land of freedom, live distinguish'd,
And mark'd the willing slave of some proud subject,

'To swell his useless train for broken fragments;
The cold remains of his superfluous board;
I would aspire to something more and better.
Turn thy eyes then to the prolific ocean,
Whose spacious bosom opens to thy view:
There deathless honour, and unenvied wealth,
Have often crown'd the brave adventurer's toils.
This is the native uncontested right,
The fair inheritance of ev'ry Briton
That dares put in his claim. My choice is made:
A long farewell to Cornwall, and to England.
If I return—But stay, what stranger 's this,
Who, as he views me, seems to mend his pace?

Enter WILMOT.

Wil. Randal! The dear companion of my youth!
Sure lavish fortune means to give me all
I could desire or ask for, this bless'd day,
And leave me nothing to expect hereafter.

Ran. Your pardon, Sir! I know but one on Could properly salute me by the title [earth
You're pleased to give me, and I would not think
That you are he—That you are Wilmot—

Wil. Why?

Ran. Because I could not bear the disappointment
Should I be deceiv'd.

Wil. I am pleased to hear it:
Thy friendly fears better express thy thoughts
Than words could do.

Ran. O! Wilmot! O! my master!
Are you returned?

Wil. I have not embrac'd
My parents—I shall see you at my father's.
Ran. No; I'm discharged from thence—O,
Sir! such ruin.

Wil. I've heard it all, and hasten to relieve 'em,
Sure heaven hath blessed me to that very end:
I've wealth enough: nor shalt thou want a part.

Ran. I have a part already. I am bless'd
In your success, and share in all your joys.

Wil. I doubt it not. But, tell me, dost thou
think,

My parents not suspecting my return,
That I may visit them, and not be known?

Ran. 'Tis hard for me to judge. You are already

Grown so familiar to me, that I wonder
I knew you not at first; yet it may be;
For you're much alter'd, and they think you dead.

Wil. This is certain; Charlotte beheld me long,
And heard my loud reproaches and complaints,
Without remembering she had ever seen me.
My mind at ease grows wanton: I would fain Refine on happiness. Why may I not Indulge my curiosity, and try
If it be possible, by seeing first
My parents as a stranger, to improve
Their pleasure by surprise?

Ran. It may indeed
Enhance your own, to see from what despair
Your timely coming and unhop'd success
Have given you power to raise them.

Wil. I remember,
E'er since we learned together, you excell'd
In writing fairly, and could imitate
Whatever hand you saw, with great exactness.
I therefore beg you'll write, in Charlotte's name
And character, a letter to my father,
And recommend me as a friend of hers
To his acquaintance.

Ran. Sir, if you desire it—
And yet—

Wil. Nay, no objections—'T will save time,
Most precious with me now. For the deception,
If doing what my Charlotte will approve,
'Cause done for me, and with a good intent,
Deserves the name, I'll answer it myself.
If this succeeds, I purpose to defer
Discovering who I am 'till Charlotte comes.
And thou, and all who love me. Ev'ry friend
Who witnesses my happiness to night,
Will, by partaking, multiply my joys.

Ran. You grow luxurious in imagination.
Could I deny you aught, I would not write
This letter. To say true, I ever thought
Your boundless curiosity a weakness.

Wil. What canst thou blame in this?

Ran. Your pardon, Sir!
Perhaps I spoke too freely;
I'm ready to obey your orders.

Wil. I am much thy debtor;
But I shall find a time to quit thy kindness.
O Randal! but imagine to thyself
The floods of transport, the sincere delight
That all my friends will feel, when I disclose
To my astonished parents, my return;
And then confess that I have well contriv'd
By giving others joy, to exalt my own.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—A Room in OLD WILMOT'S
House.

OLD WILMOT and AGNES.

O. Wil. Here, take this Seneca, this haughty pedant

Who, governing the master of mankind,
And awing power imperial, prates of—patience;
And praises poverty—possess'd of millions;
Sell him, and buy us bread. The scantiest meal
The vilest copy of his book e'er purchas'd,
Will give us more relief in this distress,
Than all his boasted precepts. Nay, no tears;
Keep them to move compassion when you beg.

Agn. My heart may break, but never stoop to that.

O. Wil. Nor would I live to see it—But, despatch. [Exit AGNES.]

Where must I charge this length of misery,
That gathers force each moment as it rolls,
And must at last o'erwhelm me, but on hope:
Vain, flattering, delusive, groundless hope,
That has for years deceiv'd? Had I thought
As I do now, as wise men ever think,
When first this hell of poverty o'ertook me,
That power to die implies a right to do it,
And should be used when life becomes a pain,
What plagues had I prevented! True, my wife
Is still a slave to prejudice and fear.
I would not leave my better part, the dear [Weeps.]
Faithful companion of my happier days,
To bear the weight of age and want alone.—
I'll try once more.

Enter AGNES, and after her YOUNG WILMOT.

O. Wil. Return'd, my life! so soon?

Agn. The unexpected coming of this stranger
Prevents my going yet.

Wil. You're, I presume,
The gentleman to whom this is directed.

[Gives a letter.]

What wild neglect, the token of despair,
What indigence, what misery, appears
In this once happy house! What discontent,
What anguish and confusion fill the faces
Of its dejected owners! [Aside.]

O. Wil. Sir, such welcome

As this poor house affords, you may command.
Our ever friendly neighbour—once we hoped
T' have called fair Charlotte by a dearer name—
But we have done with hope—I pray excuse
This incoherence—We had once a son. [Weeps.]

Agn. That you are come from the dear virtuous maid,

Revives in us the mem'ry of a loss,
Which though long since, we have not learned to bear.

Wil. The joy to see them, and the bitter pain
It is to see them thus, touches my soul
With tenderness and grief, that will o'erflow.
They know me not,—and yet, I fear, I shall Defeat my purpose, and betray myself. [Aside.]

O. Wil. The lady calls you, here, her valued friend;

Enough, though nothing more should be implied,
To recommend you to our best esteem—
A worthless acquisition—May she find
Some means that better may express her kindness!

But she, perhaps, hath purpos'd to enrich
You with herself, and end her fruitless sorrow
For one whom death alone can justify
For leaving her so long. If it be so,
May you repair his loss, and be to Charlotte
A second, happier Wilmot! Partial nature,
Who only favours youth, as feeble age
Were not her offspring, or below her care,
Has sealed our doom: no second hopes shall spring
To dry our tears, and dissipate despair.

Agn. The last and most abandoned of our kind!

By heaven and earth neglected, or despised!
The loathsome grave that robb'd us of our son,
And all our joys in him, must be our refuge.

Wil. Let ghosts unpardon'd, or devoted fiends
Fear without hope, and wail in such sad strains;
But grace defend the living from despair.

The darkest hours precede the rising sun;
And mercy may appear when least expected
O. Wil. This I have heard a thousand times repeated,

And have, believing, been as oft deceiv'd.
Wil. Behold in me an instance of its truth.
At sea twice shipwreck'd, and as oft the prey
Of lawless pirates; by the Arabs thrice
Surpris'd and robb'd on shore; and once reduc'd
To worse than these, the sum of all distress
That the most wretched feel on this side hell,
E'en slavery itself: yet here I stand,
Except one trouble that will quickly end,
The happiest of mankind.

O. Wil. A rare example
Of fortune's changes; apter to surprise
Or entertain, than comfort or instruct.
If you would reason from events, be just,
And count, when you escap'd, how many perish'd;
And draw your inference thence.

Agn. Alas! who knows,
But we were render'd childless by some storm,
In which you, though preserv'd, might bear a part?

Wil. How has my curiosity betray'd me
Into superfluous pain! I faint with fondness;
And shall, if I stay longer, rush upon them,
Proclaim myself their son, kiss and embrace
them;

Till their souls, transported with the excess
Of pleasure and surprise, quit their frail mansions,
And leave them breathless in my longing arms.

By circumstances then, and slow degrees,
They must be let into a happiness
Too great for them to bear at once, and live:
That Charlotte will perform: I need not feign
To ask an hour for rest. [Aside.] Sir, I entreat
The favour to retire, where, for a while,
I may repose myself. You will excuse
This freedom, and the trouble that I give you:
'Tis long since I have slept, and nature calls.

O. Wil. I pray, no more; believe we're only troubled,
That you should think any excuse were needful.

Wil. The weight of this is some incumbrance; [Takes a casket out of his bosom, and gives it to his mother.]

And its contents of value: if you please
To take the charge of it, 'till I awake,
I shall not rest the worse. If I should sleep
'Till I am ask'd for, as perhaps I may,
I beg that you would wake me.

Agn. Doubt it not:
Distracted as I am with various woes,
I shall remember that. [Exit, with O. WIL.]

Wil. Merciless grief!
What ravage has it made! how has it chang'd
Her lovely form and mind! I feel her anguish,
And dread, I know not what, from her despair.
My father too—O grant them patience,
Heaven!

A little longer, a few short hours more,
And all their cares, and mine, shall end for ever.
[Exit.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The same.

AGNES enters alone, with the casket in her hand.

Agn. Who should this stranger be! And then this casket—

He says it is of value, and yet trusts it,
As if a trifle to a stranger's hand—

His confidence amazes me—Perhaps
It is not what he says—I'm strongly tempted
To open it and see—No, let it rest.
Why should my curiosity excite me
To search and pry into th' affairs of others,
Who have, t'employ my thoughts, so many cares
And sorrows of my own!—With how much ease
The spring gives way!—Surprising!
My eyes are dazzled, and my ravish'd heart Leaps at the glorious sight—How bright 's the lustre,

How immense the worth of these fair jewels?
Ay, such a treasure would expel for ever
Base poverty, and all its abject train;
Famine; the cold neglect of friends;
The galling scorn or more provoking pity
Of an insulting world—Possess'd of these,
Plenty, content, and power might take their turn,
And lofty pride bare its aspiring head
At our approach, and once more bend before us.—
A pleasing dream! 'Tis past; and now I wake.
For sure it was a happiness to think,
Though but a moment, such a treasure mine.
Nay, it was more than thought—I saw and touched

The bright temptation, and I see it yet—
'Tis here—'tis mine—I have it in possession—
Must I resign it? Must I give it back?
And I, in love with misery and want,
To rob myself, and court so vast a loss?
Retain it then—But how?—There is a way—
Why sink my heart? Why does my blood run cold?

Why am I thrill'd with horror?—'Tis not choice,
But dire necessity, suggests the thought.

Enter OLD WILMOT.

O. Wil. The mind contented, with how little pains

The wand'ring senses yield to soft repose,
And die to gain new life? He's fallen asleep
Already, happy man!—What dost thou think,
My Agnes, of our unexpected guest?
He seems to me a youth of great humanity:
Just ere he clos'd his eyes, that swam in tears,
He wrung my hand and press'd it to his lips;
And with a look that pierc'd me to the soul,
Begg'd me to comfort thee: and—dost thou hear me?—

What art thou gazing on?—Fie, 'tis not well—
This casket was delivered to you closed:
Why have you open'd it? Should this be known,
How mean must we appear?

Agnes. And who shall know it?

O. Wil. There is a kind of pride, a decent dignity,
Due to ourselves; which, spite of our misfortunes,
May be maintain'd, and cherish'd to the last.
To live without reproach and without leave
To quit the world, shows sovereign contempt,
And noble scorn of its relentless malice.

Agnes. Shows sov'reign madness, and a scorn of sense.

Pursue no farther this detested theme:
I will not die, I will not leave the world
For all that you can urge, until compell'd.

O. Wil. To chase a shadow, when the setting
sun,

Is darting his last rays, were just as wise,
As your anxiety for fleeting life,
Now the last means for its support are failing:

Vol. I.

Were famine not as mortal as the sword,
Your warmth might oe excus'd—But take thy choice;

Die how you will, you shall not die alone.

Agnes. Nor live, I hope.

O. Wil. There is no fear of that.

Agnes. Then, we'll live both.

O. Wil. Strange folly! where the means?

Agnes. There those jewels—

O. Wil. Ah!—Take heed!

Perhaps thou dost but try me; yet take heed—
There's nought so monstrous but the mind of man

In some conditions may be brought t'approve;
Theft, sacrilege, treason, and parricide,
When flatt'ring opportunity entic'd,
And desperation drove, have been committed
By those who once would start to hear them
nam'd.

Agnes. And add to these detested suicide,
Which, by a crime much less, we may avoid.

O. Wil. The inhospitable murder of our guest!—
How could'st thou form a thought so very damning,

So advantageous, so secure, and easy;
And yet so cruel, and so full of horror?

Agnes. 'Tis less impety, less against nature,
To take another's life than end our own.

O. Wil. No matter which, the less or greater crime:

Howe'er we may deceive ourselves or others,
We act from inclination, not by rule,
Or none could act amiss.—And that all err,
None but the conscious hypocrite denies.
O! what is man, his excellence and strength,
When in an hour of trial and desertion,
Reason, his noblest power, may be suborn'd
To plead the cause of vile assassination.

Agnes. You're too severe: reason may justly plead

For our own preservation.

O. Wil. Rest contented:

Whate'er resistance I may seem to make,
I am betray'd within: my will's seduc'd,
And my whole soul infected. The desire
Of life returns, and brings with it a train
Of appetites, that rage to be supplied.
Whoever stands to parley with temptation,
Parleys to be o'ercome.

Agnes. Then nought remains,
But the swift execution of a deed
That is not to be thought on or delay'd.

O. Wil. Generous, unhappy man! O! what could move thee

To put thy life and fortune in the hands
Of wretches mad with anguish.

Agnes. By what means
Shall we effect his death?

O. Wil. Why, what a fiend!

How cruel, how remorseless, and impatient,
Have pride and poverty made thee?

Agnes. Barbarous man!

Whose wasteful riots ruin'd our estates,
And drove our son, ere the first down had spread
His rosy cheeks, spite of my sad presages,
Earnest entreaties, agonies, and tears,
To seek his bread 'mongst strangers, and to perish
In some remote, inhospitable land—

The loveliest youth, in person and in mind,
That ever crown'd a groaning mother's pains!
Where was thy pity, where thy patience then,
Thou cruel husband! thou unna'ral father!

Thou most remorseless, most ungrateful man !
To waste my fortune, rob me of my son ;
To drive me to despair, and then reproach me
For being what thou'st made me.

O. Wil. Dry thy tears :
I ought not to reproach thee. I confess
That thou hast suffer'd much : so have we both.
But chide no more ; I'm wrought up to thy purpose.
The poor, ill-fated, unsuspecting victim,
Ere he reclin'd him on the fatal couch,
From which he's ne'er to rise, took off the sash
And costly dagger that thou saw'st him wear ;
And thus, unthinking, furnish'd us with arms
Against himself. Steal to the door,
And bring me word, if he be still asleep.

[Exit AGNES.]

Or I'm deceived, or he pronounc'd himself
The happiest of mankind : Deluded wretch !
Thy thoughts are perishing, thy youthful joys,
Touch'd by the icy hand of grisly death,
Are with'ring in their bloom. But, thought extinguish'd,

He'll never know the loss, nor feel the bitter
Pangs of disappointment. Then I was wrong
In counting him a wretch : to die well pleas'd,
Is all the happiest of mankind can hope for.
To be a wretch, is to survive the loss
Of every joy, and even hope itself,
As I have done. Why do I mourn him then ?
For, by the anguish of my tortur'd soul,
He's to be envied, if compar'd with me. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Room, with YOUNG WILMOT asleep upon a Bed, in the distance.

Enter OLD WILMOT and AGNES.

Agn. The stranger sleeps at present ; but so restless
His slumbers seem, they can't continue long.
Here, I've secur'd his dagger.

O. Wil. O, Agnes ! Agnes ! if there be a hell,
'tis just

We should expect it.

Goes to take the dagger, lets it fall.

Agn. Shake off this panic, and be more yourself.

O. Wil. What's to be done ? On what had we determin'd ?

Agn. You're quite dismay'd.

[Takes up the dagger.]

O. Wil. Give me the fatal steel.
'Tis but a single murder :
Necessity, impatience and despair,
The three wide mouths of that true Cerberus,
Grim Poverty, demand ;—they shall be stopp'd.
Ambition, persecution, and revenge,
Devour their millions daily : and shall I—
But follow me, and see how little cause
You had to think there was the least remain
Of manhood, pity, mercy, or remorse,
Left in this savage breast.

[Going the wrong way.]

Agn. Where do you go ?

The street is that way.

O. Wil. True, I had forgot.

Agn. Quite, quite confounded.

O. Wil. Well, I recover.

I shall find the way. [Retires towards the bed.]

Agn. O, softly ! softly ! The least noise undoes us.

What are we doing ? Misery and want
Are lighter ills than this ! I cannot bear it !—

Stop, hold thy hand !—Inconstant, wretched woman !

What ! doth my heart recoil ?—O, Wilmot ! Wilmot !

What power shall I invoke to aid thee, Wilmot [Scene closes]

SCENE III.—Another Room.

Enter CHARLOTTE, EUSTACE, and RANDAL.

Char. What strange neglect ! The doors are all unbarr'd,
And not a living creature to be seen.

Enter OLD WILMOT and AGNES.

Sir we are come to give and to receive
A thousand greetings.—Ha ! what can this mean ?
Why do you look with such amazement on us ?
Are these your transports for your son's return ?
Where is my Wilmot ? Has he not been here ?
Would he defer your happiness so long ;
Or, could a habit so disguise your son,
That you refus'd to own him ?

Agn. Heard you that ?
What prodigy of horror is disclosing,
To render murder venial !

O. Wil. Prythee, peace :
The miserable damn'd suspend their howling,
And the swift orbs are fix'd in deep attention.

Ran. What mean these dreadful words and frantic air !

That is the dagger my young master wore.

Eus. My mind misgives me. Do not stand to gaze

On these dumb phantoms of despair and horror !
Let us search farther : Randal, show the way.

[Reënt RANDAL, EUSTACE, and CHARLOTTE
Agn. Let life forsake the earth, and light the sun,

And death and darkness bury in oblivion
Mankind and all their deeds, that no posterity
May ever rise to hear our horrid tale,
Or view the grave of such detested parricides.

O. Wil. Curses and deprecations are in vain.

The sun will shine and all things have their course,

When we the curse and burden of the earth,
Shall be absorb'd and mingled with its dust.
Our guilt and desolation must be told,
From age to age, to teach desponding mortals,
How far beyond the reach of human thought Heaven, when incens'd, can punish.—Die thou first. [Stabs AGNES.]

I dare not trust thy weakness.

Agn. Ever kind,

But most in this !

O. Wil. I will not long survive thee.

Agn. Do not accuse thy erring mother, Wilmot !

With too much rigour, when we meet above.

To give thee life for life, and blood for blood,

Is not enough. Had I ten thousand lives,

I'd give them all to speak my penitence,

Deep, and sincere, and equal to my crime.

Oh, Wilmot ! oh, my son ! my son ! [Dies.]

Enter RANDAL and EUSTACE.

Eust. Oh, Wilmot ! Wilmot !

Are these the fruits of all thy anxious cares

For thy ungrateful parents ?—Cruel fiends !

O. Wil. What whining fool art thou, who would'st usurp

My sovereign right of grief ?—Was he thy son ?—

Say! canst thou show thy hands reeking with blood,
 That flow'd, through purer channels, from thy loins?

Compute the sands that bound the spacious ocean,
 And swell their numbers with a single grain;
 Increase the noise of thunder with thy voice;
 Or, when the raging wind lays nature waste,
 Assist the tempest with thy feeble breath!
 But name not thy faint sorrow with the anguish
 Of a curs'd wretch, who only hopes for this

[Stabs himself.

To change the scene, but not relieve his pain.
Ran. A dreadful instance of the last remorse!
 May all our woes end here!

O. Wd. O would they end

A thousand ages hence, I then should suffer
 Much less than I deserve. Yet let me say,

You'll do but justice, to inform the world,
 This horrid deed, that punishes itself,
 Was not intended, thinking him our son;
 For that we knew not, 'till it was too late.
 Proud and impatient under our afflictions,
 While heaven was labouring to make us happy,
 We brought this dreadful ruin on ourselves.
 Mankind may learn—but—oh!—

[Dies.

Ran. Heaven grant they may!

And may thy penitence atone thy crime!

Tend well the hapless Charlotte, and bear hence
 These bleeding victims of despair and pride;
 Toll the death-bell! and follow to the grave
 The wretched parents and ill-fated son. [Exeunt.

THE GUARDIAN:

A COMEDY,

IN TWO ACTS.

BY DAVID GARRICK, Esq.

REMARKS.

Mr. Garrick, perhaps the best judge of the drama that this or any other nation ever produced, has, in the following little piece, presented the theatrical world with a translation of M. Fagan's "Pupille," which was esteemed a very complete little comedy. He has, however, not confined himself to a mere translation, but has, with great judgment, made "such alterations from the original as the difference of the language and manners required." The success with which this piece was attended, so far exceeded the hopes of the author, that he availed himself of "an opportunity to return thanks to the public for their kind indulgence, and to the performers, for their great care."

Mr. Heartly the guardian, originally performed by Mr. Garrick himself, and Miss Harriot, his ward, by Miss Pritchard, are two finely-drawn characters, which were well supported.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Hall at Mr. HEARTLY'S.

Enter Sir C. CLACKIT, YOUNG CLACKIT, and SERVANT.

Sir C. Tell Mr. Heartly, his friend and neighbour, Sir Charles Clackit, would say three words to him.

Serv. I shall, Sir—

[Exit.

Sir C. Now nephew, consider once again, before I open the matter to my neighbour Heartly, what I am going to undertake for you.—Why don't you speak?

Young C. Is it proper and decent, uncle?

Sir C. Pshaw; don't be a fool—but answer me—don't you flatter yourself—What assurance have you that this young lady, my friend's ward, has a liking to you?

Young C. First then—Whenever I see her she never looks at me—That's a sign of love.—Whenever I speak to her she never answers me—Another sign of love.—And whenever I speak to any body else she seems to be perfectly easy—That's a certain sign of love.

Sir C. The devil it is!

Young C. When I am with her, she's always grave; and the moment I get up to leave her, then the poor thing begins—"Stay, you agreeable runaway, stay, I shall soon overcome the fears your presence gives me."—I could say more—But a man of honour, uncle—

Sir C. What, and has she said all these things to you?

Young C. O yes, and ten times more—with her eyes.

Sir C. With her eyes! Eyes are very equivocal, Jack.—However, if the young lady has any liking to you, Mr. Heartly is too much a man of the world, and too much my friend, to oppose the match; so do you walk into the garden, and I will open the matter to him.

Young C. Is there any objection to my staying, uncle? The business will soon be ended. You will propose the match, he will give his consent, I shall give mine, miss is sent for, and l'affaire est fait. [Snapping his fingers.]

Sir C. And so you think that a young beautiful heiress, with forty thousand pounds, is to be had with a scrap of French, and a snap of your finger?—Pr'ythee, get away, and don't provoke me.

Young C. Well, well, I am gone, uncle.—When you come to the point, I shall be ready to make my appearance.—Bon voyage! [Exit.]

Sir C. The devil's in these young fellows, I think.—We send 'em abroad to cure their sheepishness, and they get above proof the other way.

Enter HEARTLY.

Good morrow to you, neighbour.

Heart. And to you, Sir Charles; I am glad to see you so strong and healthy.

Sir C. I can return you the compliment, my friend—Without flattery, you don't look more than thirty-five; and between ourselves, you are on the wrong side of forty—But, mum for that.

Heart. Ease and tranquillity keep me as you see.

Sir C. Why don't you marry, neighbour? A good wife would do well for you.

Heart. For me? you are pleased to be merry, Sir Charles.

Sir C. No, faith, I am serious, and had I a daughter to recommend to you, you should say me nay, more than once, I assure you, neighbour Heartly, before I would quit you.

Heart. I am much obliged to you.

Sir C. And now to my business.—You have no objection, I suppose, to tie up your ward, Miss Harriot, though you have slipped the collar yourself.—Ha, ha, ha!

Heart. Quite the contrary, Sir; I have taken her some time from the boarding school, and brought her home, in order to dispose of her worthily with her own inclination.

Sir C. Her father, I have heard you say, recommended that particular care to you, when she had reached a certain age.

Heart. He did so—And I am the more desirous to obey him scrupulously in this circumstance, as she will be a most valuable acquisition to the person who shall gain her—for, not to mention her fortune which is the least consideration, her sentiments are worthy her birth; she is gentle, modest, and obliging.—In a word, my friend, I never saw youth more amiable or discreet—but perhaps I am a little partial to her.

Sir C. No, no, she is a delicious creature, every body says so.—But I believe, neighbour, something has happened that you little think of.

Heart. What, pray, Sir Charles?

Sir C. My nephew, Mr. Heartly—

Re-enter YOUNG CLACKIT.

Young C. Here I am at your service, Sir.—My uncle is a little unhappy in his manner; but I'll clear the matter in a moment—Miss Harriot, Sir—your ward—

Sir C. Get away, you puppy!

Young C. Miss Harriot, sir, your ward, a most accomplished young lady, to be sure—

Sir C. Thou art a most accomplished coxcomb, to be sure.

Heart. Pray, Sir Charles, let the young gentlemen speak.

Young C. You'll excuse me, Mr. Heartly—My uncle does not set up for an orator—a little confused or so, Sir—You see what I am—But I ought to ask pardon for the young lady and myself.—We are young, Sir.—I must confess we were wrong to conceal it from you—but my uncle, I see is pleased to be angry, and therefore I shall say no more at present.

Sir C. If you don't leave the room this moment, and stay in the garden till I call you—

Young C. I am sorry I have displeased you—I did not think it was mal-a-propos; but you must have your way, uncle—You command—I submit—Mr. Heartly, yours. [Exit.]

Sir C. Puppy! [Aside.] My nephew's a little unthinking, Mr. Heartly, as you see, and therefore I have been a little cautious how I have proceeded in this affair: but indeed he has persuaded me, in a manner, that your ward and he are not ill together.

Heart. Indeed! This is the first notice I have had of it, and I cannot conceive why Miss Harriot should conceal it from me; for I have often assured her that I would never oppose her inclination, though I might endeavour to direct it.

Sir C. You are right, neighbour.—But here she is.

Enter HARRIOT and LUCY.

Har. He is with company—I'll speak to him another time. [Retires.]

Lucy. Young, handsome, and afraid of being seen.—You are very particular, Miss.

[Apart to HARRIOT.]

Heart. Miss Harriot, you must not go.—[HARRIOT returns.] Sir Charles, give me leave to introduce you to this young lady.—[Introduces her.] You know, I suppose, the reason of this gentleman's visit to me?

Har. Sir! [Confused.]

Heart. Don't be disturb'd, I shall not reproach you with any thing but keeping your wishes a secret from me so long.

Har. Upon my word, Sir—Lucy!

Lucy. Well, and Lucy! I'll lay my life 'tis a treaty of marriage.—Is that such a dreadful thing? Oh, for shame, Madam! Young ladies of fashion are not frightened at such things now-a-days.

Heart. [To SIR CHARLES.] We have gone too far, Sir Charles.—We must excuse her delicacy, and give her time to recover:—I had better talk with her alone; we will leave her now.—Be persuaded that no endeavours shall be wanting on my part to bring this affair to a happy and speedy conclusion.

Sir C. I shall be obliged to you, Mr. Heartly.—Young lady, your servant.—What grace and modesty! She is a most engaging creature, and I shall be proud to make her one of my family.

[To HEARTLY.]

Heart. You do us honour, Sir Charles.

[Exeunt SIR CHARLES and HEARTLY.]

Lucy. Indeed, Miss Harriot, you are very particular. You was tired of the boarding school, and yet seem to have no inclination to be married.—What can be the meaning of all this? That smirking old gentleman is uncle to Mr. Clackit; and, my life for it, he has made some proposals to your guardian.

Har. Pr'ythee, don't plague me about Mr. Clackit.

Lucy. But why not, Miss? Though he is a little fantastical, loves to hear himself talk, and is somewhat self-sufficient, you must consider he is young, has been abroad, and keeps good company.—The trade will soon be at an end, if young ladies and gentlemen grow over-nice and exceptuous.

Har. But if I can find one without these faults, I may surely please myself.

Lucy. Without these faults! and is he young, Miss!

Har. He is sensible, modest, polite, affable, and generous; and charms from the natural impulses of his own heart, as much as others disgust by their senseless airs and insolent affectation.

Lucy. Upon my word!—but why have you kept this a secret so long? Your guardian is kind to you beyond conception.—What difficulties can you have to overcome?

Har. Why, the difficulty of declaring my sentiments.

Lucy. Leave that to me, Miss.—But your spark, with all his accomplishments, must have very little penetration not to have discovered his good fortune in your eyes.

Har. I take care that my eyes don't tell too much; and he has too much delicacy to interpret looks to his advantage. Besides he would certainly disapprove my passion; and if I should ever make the declaration, and meet with a denial, I should absolutely die with shame.

Lucy. I'll insure your life for a silver thimble.—But what can possibly hinder your coming together?

Har. His excess of merit.

Lucy. His excess of a fiddlestick!—But come, I'll put you in the way:—you shall trust me with the secret—I'll entrust it again to half a dozen friends; they shall entrust it to half a dozen more; by which means it will travel half the world over in a week's time: the gentleman will certainly hear of it, and then if he is not at your feet in the fetching of a sigh, I'll give up all my perquisites at your wedding.—What is his name, Miss?

Har. I cannot tell you his name—indeed I cannot: I am afraid of being thought too singular.—But why should I be ashamed of my passion? Is the impression which a virtuous character makes upon our hearts such a weakness that it may not be excused?

Lucy. By my faith, Miss, I can't understand you: you are afraid of being thought singular, and you really are so.—I would sooner renounce all the passions in the universe, than have one in my bosom beating and fluttering itself to pieces.

Re-enter HEARTLY.

Heart. Leave us, Lucy.

Lucy. There's something going forward—'tis very hard I can't be of the party. [Aside, exit.]

Heart. She certainly thinks, from the character of the young man, that I shall disapprove of her choice. [Aside.]

Har. What can I possibly say to him? I am as much ashamed to make the declaration, as he would be to understand it. [Aside.]

Heart. Don't imagine that I would know more of your thoughts than you desire I should; but the tender care which I have ever shown, and the sincere friendship which I shall always have for you, give me a right to inquire into every thing that concerns you.—Some friends have spoken to me in particular.—But that is not all—I have lately found you thoughtful, absent, and disturbed.—Be plain with me—has not somebody been happy enough to please you?

Har. I cannot deny it, Sir—yes—somebody indeed has pleased me.—But I must entreat you not to give credit to any idle stories, or inquire further into the particulars of my inclination; for I cannot possibly have resolution enough to say more to you.

Heart. But have you made a choice my dear?

Har. I have, in my own mind, Sir, and 'tis impossible to make a better;—reason, honour, every thing must approve it.

Heart. And how long have you conceived this passion?

Har. Ever since I left the country to live with you. [Sighs.]

Heart. I see your confusion, and will relieve you from it immediately—I am informed of the whole—

Har. Sir!

Heart. Don't be uneasy, for I can with pleasure assure you that your passion is returned with equal tenderness.

Har. If you are not deceived—I cannot be more happy.

Heart. I think I am not deceived;—but after the declaration you have made, and the assurances which I have given you, why will you conceal it any longer? Have I not deserved a little more confidence from you?

Har. You have indeed deserved it, and should certainly have it, were I not well assured that you would oppose my inclinations.

Heart. I oppose 'em! Am I then so unkind to you, my dear Harriot?—Can you in the least doubt of my affection for you!—I promise you that I have no will but yours.

Har. Since you desire it then, I will endeavour to explain myself.

Heart. I am all attention—speak.

Har. And if I do, I feel I shall never be able to speak to you again.

Heart. I see your delicacy is hurt: but let me entreat you once more to confide in me.—Tell me his name, and the next moment I will go to him, and assure him that my consent shall confirm both your happiness.

Har. You will easily find him.—And when you have, pray tell him how improper it is for a young woman to speak first—persuade him to spare my blushes, and to release me from so terrible a situation.—I shall leave him with you—and hope that this declaration will make it impossible for you to mistake me any longer. [Going.]

Enter YOUNG CLACKIT.—HARRIOT remains on the Stage.

Heart. Are we not alone? what can this mean?

Young C. Apropos, faith! Here they are together.

Heart. I did not see him; but now the riddle's explained. [Aside.]

Har. What can he want now—This is the most spiteful interruption. [Aside.]

Young C. By your leave, Mr. Heartly— [Crosses him to go to HARRIOT.] Have I caught you at last, my divine Harriot?—Well, Mr. Heartly, sans façon—But what's the matter?—Things look a little gloomy here;—one mutters to himself and gives me no answer, and the other turns her head and winks at me.—How the devil am I to interpret all this?

Har. I wink at you, Sir!—Did I, Sir?

Young C. Yes, you, my angel—but mum—Mr. Heartly, for heaven's sake, what is all this? Speak, I conjure you, is it life or death with me?

Har. What a dreadful situation I am in!

Young C. Hope for the best.—I'll bring matters about, I warrant you.

Heart. Miss Harriot's will is a law to me; and for you, Sir—the friendship which I have ever professed for your uncle is too sincere not to exert some of it on this occasion.

Har. I shall die with confusion! [Aside.

Young C. I am alive again.—Dear Mr. Heartly, thou art a most adorable creature! What a happiness it is to have to do with a man of sense, who has no foolish prejudices, and can see when a young fellow has something tolerable about him!

Heart. Sir, not to flatter you, I must declare that it is from a knowledge of your friends and family, that I have hopes of seeing you and this young lady happy. I will go directly to your uncle, and assure him that every thing goes on to our wishes.— [Going.

Har. Mr. Heartly—pray, Sir!

Heart. Poor Harriot, I see your distress, and am sorry for it; but it must be got over, and the sooner the better.—Mr. Clackit, my dear, will be glad of an opportunity to entertain you for the little time that I shall be absent. Poor Miss Harriot! [Smiles; Exit.

Young C. Allez, allez, monsieur!—I'll answer for that.—Well, Ma'am, I think every thing succeeds to our wishes.—Be sincere, my adorable—Don't you think yourself a very happy young lady?

Har. I shall be most particularly obliged to you, Sir, if you would inform me what is the meaning of all this.

Young C. Inform you, Miss?—The matter, I believe, is pretty clear:—our friends have understandings—we have affections—and a marriage follows of course.

Har. Marriage, Sir! Pray what relation or particular connection is there between you and me, Sir?

Young C. I may be deceived, faith;—but upon my honour, I always supposed that there was a little smattering of inclination between us.

Har. And have you spoke to my guardian upon this supposition, Sir?

Young C. And are you angry at it?—I believe not.

Har. Indeed, Sir, this behaviour of yours is most extraordinary.

Young C. Upon my soul this is very droll.—What! has not your guardian been here this moment, and expressed all imaginable pleasure at our intended union?

Har. He is in an error, Sir—and had I not been too much astonished at your behaviour, I had undeceived him long before now.

Young C. [Hums a tune.] But pray, Miss, what can be your intention in raising all this confusion in the family, and opposing your own inclinations?

Har. Opposing my own inclinations, Sir?

Young C. Ay, opposing your own inclinations, Madam.

Har. Be assured, Sir, I never in my life had the least thought about you.

Young C. Come, come, I know what I know—Har. Don't make yourself ridiculous, Mr. Clackit.

Young C. Don't you make yourself miserable, Miss Harriot?

Har. I am only so when you persist to torment me.

Young C. And you really believe that you don't love me? [Smiles.

Har. Positively not.

Young C. And you are very sure now that you hate me! [Conceitedly.

Har. Oh! most cordially.

Young C. Poor young lady! I do pity you from my soul.

Har. Then why don't you leave me?

Young C. "She never told her love,

But let concealment, like a worm i' th' bud,

Feed on her damask cheek."

Take warning, Miss, when you once begin to pine in thought, 'tis all over with you; and be assured, since you are obstinately bent to give yourself airs, that if you once suffer me to leave this house in a pet—Do you mind me?—not all your sighing, whining, fits, vapours, and hysterics, shall ever move me to take the least compassion on you—Coute qu'il coute.

Re-enter HEARTLY and Sir CHARLES CLACKIT.

Sir C. There they are, the pretty doves! That is the age, neighbour Heartly, for happiness and pleasure.

Heart. I am willing, you see, to lose no time, which may convince you, Sir Charles, how proud I am of this alliance in our families.

Sir C. 'Gad, I will send for the fiddles, and take a dance myself, and a fig for the gout and rheumatism.—But hold, hold—the lovers' me-thinks are a little out of humour with each other. What is the matter, Jack? Not pouting sure before your time?

Young C. A trifle, Sir—the lady will tell you. [Hums a tune.

Heart. You seem to be troubled, Harriot!—what can this mean?

Har. You have been in an error, Sir, about me;—I did not undeceive you, because I could not imagine that the consequences could have been so serious and so sudden;—but I am now forced to tell you that you have misunderstood me—that you have distressed me.

Heart. How, my dear?

Sir C. What do you say, Miss?

Young C. Mademoiselle is pleased to be out of humour; but I cant blame her; for, upon my honour, I think a little coquetry becomes her.

Sir C. Ay, ay, ay—oh, oh—Is that all? These little squalls seldom overset the lover's boat, but drive it the faster to port—ay, ay, ay—

Young C. Talk to her a little, Mr. Heartly. She is a fine lady, and has many virtues; but she does not know the world.

Heart. For heaven's sake, Miss Harriot, explain this riddle to me.

Har. I cannot, Sir.—I have discovered the weakness of my heart—I have discovered it to you, Sir;—but your unkind interpretations and reproachful looks convince me that I have already said too much. [Exit; HEARTLY muses.

Sir C. Well, but harkye, nephew—this is going a little too far—What have you done to her?

Heart. I never saw her so agitated before.

Young C. Upon my soul, gentlemen, I am as much surprised at it as you can be.—The little brouillerie between us arose upon her persisting that there was no passion, no penchant between us.

Sir C. I'll tell you what, Jack.—There is a certain kind of impudence about you, that I don't approve of.

Young C. But what can the lady object to? I have offered to marry her; is not that a proof sufficient that I like her? A young fellow must have some affection that will go such lengths to indulge it. Ha, ha!

Sir C. Why really, friend Heartly, I don't see how a young man can well do more, or a lady desire more.—What say you neighbour?

Heart. Upon my word, I am puzzled about it—my thoughts upon the matter are so various and so confused.—Every thing I see and hear is so contradictory—is so—She certainly cannot like any body else!

Young C. No, no, I'll answer for that.

Heart. Or she may be fearful then that your passion for her is not sincere; or, like other young men of the times, you may grow careless upon marriage, and neglect her.

Young C. Ha! 'Egad, you have hit it; nothing but a little natural, delicate sensibility—

[Hums a tune.]

Heart. If so, perhaps the violence of her reproaches may proceed from the lukewarmness of your professions.

Young C. Je vous demande pardon—I have sworn to her a hundred and a hundred times, that she should be the happiest of her sex.—But there is nothing surprising in all this; it is the misery of an over-fond heart, to be always doubtful of its happiness.

Heart. And if she marries thee, I fear that she'll be kept in a state of doubt as long as she lives.

[Half aside.]

Re-enter LUCY.

Lucy. Pray, gentlemen, which of you has affronted my mistress? She is in a most prodigious taking yonder, and vows to return into the country again.

Young C. Poor thing!

Heart. I must inquire further into this; her behaviour is too particular for me not to be disturbed at it.

Lucy. She desires that when she has recovered herself, she may talk with you alone, Sir.

[To HEARTLY.]

Heart. I shall with pleasure attend her.

[Exit LUCY.]

Sir C. I would give, old as I am, a leg or an arm to be beloved by that sweet creature as you are, Jack!

Young C. And throw your gout and rheumatism into the bargain, uncle?—Ha, ha, Divine Bacchus. La, la, la, &c.

[Sings.]

Sir C. I wonder what the devil is come to the young fellows of this age, neighbour Heartly?—Why a fine woman has no effect upon 'em.—Is there no method to make 'em less fond of themselves, and more mindful of the ladies?

Heart. Look ye, Mr. Clackit, if Miss Harriot's affections declare for you, she must not be treated with neglect or disdain.—Nor could I bear it, Sir.—Any man must be proud of her partiality to him; and he must be fashionably insensible indeed, who would not make it his darling care to defend from every inquietude the most delicate and tender of her sex.

Sir C. Most nobly and warmly said, Mr. Heartly.—Go to her, nephew directly.—throw yourself at her feet, and swear how much her beauty and virtue have captivated you, and don't let her go till you have set her dear little heart at rest.

Young C. Would you have me say the same thing over and over again?—I can't do it positively.—It is my turn to be piqued now.

Sir C. Damn your conceit, Jack; I can bear it no longer.

Heart. I am very sorry to find that any young lady so near and dear to me, should bestow her heart where there is so little prospect of its being valued as it ought.—However, I shall not oppose my authority to her inclinations; and so—Who waits there?

Enter a SERVANT.

Let the young lady know that I shall attend her commands in the library. [Exit SERVANT.] Will you excuse me, gentlemen?

Sir C. Ay, ay—we'll leave you to yourselves; and pray convince her that I and my nephew are most sincerely her very humble servants.

Young C. O yes, you may depend upon me.

Heart. A very slender dependence truly.

[Aside; Exit.]

Young C. We'll be with you again to know what your tête à tête produces, and in the meantime I am hers—and yours—Adieu. Come uncle—Fal, la, la, la!

Sir C. I could knock him down with pleasure.

[Aside; Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Library.

HEARTLY and a SERVANT discovered.

Heart. Tell Miss Harriot that I am here.—If she is indisposed, I will wait upon her in her own room. [Exit SERVANT.] However mysterious her conduct appears to me, yet still it is to be deciphered.—This young gentleman has certainly touched her.—There are some objections to him, and among so many young men of fashion that fall in her way, she certainly might have made a better choice: she has an understanding to be sensible of this; and, if I am not mistaken, it is a struggle between her reason and her passion that occasions all this confusion.—But here she is.

Enter HARRIOT.

Har. I hope you are not angry, Sir, that I left you so abruptly, without making any apology?

Heart. I am angry that you think an apology necessary.—The matter we were upon was of such a delicate nature, that I was more pleased with your confusion than I should have been with your excuses. You'll pardon me my dear.

Har. I have reflected that the person for whom I have conceived a most tender regard, may, from the wisest motives, doubt of my passion; and therefore I would endeavour to answer all his objections, and convince him how deserving he is of my highest esteem.

Heart. I have not yet apprehended what kind of dispute could arise between you and Mr Clackit:—but I would advise you both to come to a reconciliation as soon as possible.

Har. He still continues in his error, and I cannot undeceive him. [Aside.]

Heart. Shall I take the liberty of telling you, my dear?—[Takes her hand.]—You tremble, Harriot!—What is the matter with you?

Har. Nothing, Sir.—Pray go on.

Heart. I guess whence proceeds all your uneasiness.—You fear that the world will not be so readily convinced of this young gentleman's merit as you are: and indeed I could wish him more deserving of you; but your regard for him gives him a merit he otherwise would have wanted, and almost makes me blind to his failings.

Har. And would you advise me, Sir, to make choice of this gentleman?

Heart. I would advise you, as I always have done, to consult your own heart upon such an occasion.

Har. If that is your advice, I will most religiously follow it; and, for the last time, I am resolved to discover my real sentiments; but as a confession of this kind will not become me, I have been thinking of some innocent stratagem to spare my blushes, and, in part, to relieve me from the shame of a declaration.—Might I be permitted to write to him?

Heart. I think you may my dear, without the least offence to your delicacy: and indeed you ought to explain yourself; your late misunderstanding makes it absolutely necessary.

Har. Will you be kind enough to assist me?—Will you write it for me, Sir?

Heart. Oh, most willingly!—And as I am made a party it will remove all objections.

Har. I will dictate to you in the best manner I am able. [Sighs.]

Heart. Here is pen, ink, and paper; and now, my dear, I am ready.—He is certainly a man of family, and though he has some little faults, time and your virtues will correct them.—Come, what shall I write? [Prepares to write.]

Har. Pray give me a moment's thought;—'tis a terrible task, Mr. Heartily.

Heart. I know it is.—Don't hurry yourself—I shall wait with patience.—Come, Miss Harriot.

Har. [Dictating.] It is in vain for me to conceal from one of your understanding, the secrets of my heart.

Heart. The secrets of my heart. [Writes.]

Har. Though your humility and modesty will not suffer you to perceive it—

Heart. Do you think that he is much troubled with those qualities?

Har. Pray indulge me, Sir.

Heart. I beg your pardon.—Your humility and modesty will not suffer you to perceive it— So.

Har. Every thing tells you, that it is you that I love.

Heart. Very well. [Writes.]

Har. Yes—you that I love.—Do you understand me?

Heart. O! yes, yes—I understand you—that it is you that I love.—This is very plain, my dear.

Har. I would have it so.—And though I am already bound in gratitude to you—

Heart. In gratitude to Mr. Clackit?

Har. Pray write, Sir.

Heart. Well—*in gratitude to you—*I must write what she would have me. [Aside.]

Har. Yet my passion is a most disinterested one—

Heart. Most disinterested one.

Har. And to convince you, that you owe much more to my affections—

Heart. And then?

Har. I could wish that I had not experienced—

Heart. Stay, stay: Had not experienced—

Har. Your tender care of me in my infancy—

Heart. What did you say?—Did I hear right, or am I in a dream? [Aside.]

Har. Why have I declared myself? He'll hate me for my folly. [Aside.]

Heart. Harriot!

Har. Sir!

Heart. To whom do you write this letter?

Har. To—to—Mr. Clackit—Is it not?

Heart. You must not mention then the care of your infancy: it would be ridiculous.

Har. It would indeed:—I own it:—It is improper.

Heart. Then I'll only finish your letter with the usual compliment and send it away.

Har. Yes—send it away—if you think I ought to send it.

Heart. [Troubled.] Ought to send it! Who's there?

Enter a Servant.

Carry this letter. [An action escapes from Harriot, as if to hinder the sending the letter.]—Is it not for Mr. Clackit?

Har. [Peevishly.] Who can it be for?

Heart. [To the Servant.] Here, take this letter to Mr. Clackit. [Gives the letter; exit Servant.]

Har. He disapproves my passion, and I shall die with confusion. [Aside.]

Enter Lucy.

Lucy. The conversation is over, and I may appear. [Aside.]—Sir Charles is without, Sir, and is impatient to know your determination.—May he be permitted to see you?

Heart. I must retire, to conceal my weakness. [Aside; Exit.]

Lucy. Upon my word this is very whimsical.—What is the reason, Miss, that your guardian is gone away without giving me an answer.

Har. What a contempt he must have for me to behave in this manner! [Aside; Exit.]

Lucy. Extremely well this, and equally foolish on both sides!—But what can be the meaning of it?—What a shame is this that I don't know more of this matter, a wench of spirit as I am, a favourite of my mistress, and as inquisitive as I ought to be? It is an affront to my character, and I must have satisfaction immediately.—[Going.] I will go directly to my young mistress, tease her to death till I am at the bottom of this; and if threatening, soothing, scolding, whispering, crying, and lying will not prevail, I will e'en give her warning—and go upon the stage. [Exit.]

Re-enter HEARTLY.

Heart. The more I reflect upon what has passed, the more I am convinced that she did not intend writing to this young fellow.—What am I to think of it then?—Had not my reason made a little stand against my presumption, I might have interpreted some of Harriot's words in my own favour; but—Can it be possible that so young a creature should even cast a thought of that kind upon me?—Upon me!—No, no—

I will do her and myself the justice to acknowledge, that, for a very few slight appearances, there are a thousand reasons that destroy so ridiculous a supposition.

Enter SIR CHARLES CLACKIT.

Sir C. Well, Mr. Heartly, what are we to hope for?

Heart. Upon my word, Sir, I am still in the dark; we puzzle about indeed, but we don't get forward.

Sir C. What the devil is the meaning of all this? There never sure were lovers so difficult to bring together. But have you not been a little too rough with the lady? For as I passed by her but now, she seemed a little out of humour—And, upon my faith, not the less beautiful for a little pouting.

Heart. Upon my word, Sir Charles, what I can collect from her behaviour is, that your nephew is not so much in her good graces as he made you believe.

Sir C. 'Egad, like enough;—But hold, hold; this must be looked a little into—if it is so, I would be glad to know why and wherefore I have been made so ridiculous.—Eh, Master Heartly, does he take me for his fool, his beast, his merry Andrew? By the lord Harry—

Heart. He is of an age Sir Charles—

Sir C. Ay, of an age to be very impatient; but I shall desire him to be less free with his uncle for the future, I assure him.

Re-enter LUCY.

Lucy. I have it, I have it gentlemen! you need not puzzle any more about the matter—I have got the secret.—I know the knighterrant that has wounded our distressed lady.

Sir C. Well, and who, and what, child?

Lucy. What! has she not told you Sir?

[To HEARTLY.]

Heart. Not directly.

Lucy. So much the better.—What pleasure it is to discover a secret, and then tell it to all the world!—I pressed her so much that she at last confessed.

Sir C. Well, what?

Lucy. That, in the first place, she did not like your nephew.

Sir C. And I told the puppy so.

Lucy. That she had a most mortal antipathy for the young men of this age; and that she had settled her affections upon one of riper years, and riper understanding.

Sir C. Indeed!

Lucy. And that she expected from a lover in his autumn more affection, more complaisance, more constancy, and discretion, of course.

Heart. This is very particular.

Sir C. Ay, but it is very prudent for all that.

Lucy. In short, as she had openly declared against the nephew, I took upon me to speak of his uncle.

Sir C. Of me, child?

Lucy. Yes, of you, Sir;—And she did not say me nay—But cast such a look, and fetched such a sigh—that if ever I looked and sighed in my life, I know how it is with her.

Sir C. What the devil!—Why surely—Eh, Lucy! You joke for certain—Mr. Heartly!—Eh!

Lucy. Indeed I do not, Sir.—'Twas in vain for me to say that nothing could be so ridiculous as such a choice.—Nay, Sir, I went a little farther (you'll excuse me,) and told her—"Good God, madam," said I, "why he is old and gouty, asthmatic, rheumatic, sciatic, splenic."—It signified nothing, she had determined.—

Sir C. But you need not have told her all that.—It can't be me.—No, no, it can't be me.

Lucy. But I tell you it is, Sir. You are the man.

Sir C. Say you so?—Why then, monsieur nephew, I shall have a little laugh with you—Ha, ha, ha!—Your betters must be served before you.—But here he comes—Not a word, for your life.—We'll laugh at him most triumphantly—Ha, ha! but mum, mum.

Enter YOUNG CLACKIT.

Young C. Meeting by accident with some artists of the string, and my particular friends, I have brought 'em to celebrate Miss Harriot's and my approaching happiness. [To HEARTLY.]

Sir C. Do you hear the puppy? [To LUCY.]

Heart. It is time to clear up all mistakes.

Sir C. Now for it.

Heart. Miss Harriot, Sir was not destined for you.

Young C. What do you say, Sir?

Heart. That the young lady has fixed her affections upon another.

Young C. Upon another!

Sir C. Yes, Sir, another:—That is English, Sir; and you my translate it into French, if you like it better.

Young C. Very well, Sir, extremely well.

Sir C. And that other, Sir, is one to whom you owe great respect.

Young C. I am his most respectful humble servant.

Sir C. You are a fine youth, my sweet nephew, to tell me a story of a cock and a bull, of you and the young lady, when you have no more interest in her than the czar of Muscovy.

Young C. [Smiles.] But, my dear uncle, don't carry this jest too far—I shall begin to be uneasy: but whoever my precious rival is, he must prepare himself for a little humility; for, be he ever so mighty, my dear uncle, I have that in my pocket will lower his topsails for him.

[Searching his pocket.]

Sir C. Well, what's that?

Young C. A fourteen pounder only, my good uncle—A letter from the young lady.

[Takes it out of his pocket.]

Sir C. What! to you?

Young C. To me, Sir—This moment received, and overflowing with the tenderest sentiments.

Sir C. To you?

Young C. Most undoubtedly.—She approaches me with my excessive modesty—there can be no mistake.

Sir C. What letter is this he chatters about?

[To HEARTLY.]

Heart. One written by me, and dictated by the young lady.

Sir C. What! sent by her to him?

Heart. I believe so.

Sir C. Well, but then—How the devil—Mrs. Lucy!—Eh!—What becomes of your fine story?

Lucy. I don't understand it.

Sir C. Nor I!

Heart. [Hesitating.] Nor—I—

Young C. But I do—And so you will all presently.

Re-enter HARRIOT.

Har. Bless me, Mr. Heartly, what is all this music for in the next room?

Young C. I brought the gentlemen of the string, Mademoiselle, to convince you that I feel as I ought the honour you have done me.—[Showing the letter.]—But, for heaven's sake, be sincere a little with these good folks; they tell me here that I am nobody, and there is another happier than myself.

Har. To hesitate any longer would be injurious to my guardian, his friend, this young gentleman, and my own character. You have all been in an error.—My bashfulness may have deceived you—My heart never did.

Young C. C'est vrai.

Har. Therefore before I declare my sentiments, it is proper that I disavow any engagement:—But at the same time must confess—

Young C. Oh—ho!

Har. With fear and shame confess—

Young C. Courage, Mademoiselle!

Har. That another, not you, Sir, has gained a power over my heart. [To YOUNG CLACKIT.]

Sir C. Another, not you; mind that, Jack. Ha, ha!

Har. It is a power indeed which he despises.—I cannot be deceived in his conduct.—Modesty may tie the tongue of our sex, but silence in him could proceed only from contempt.

Sir C. How prettily she reproaches me!—But I'll soon make it up with her. [Aside.]

Har. As to that letter, Sir, your error there is excusable; and I own myself in that particular a little blameable.—But it was not my fault that it was sent to you; and the contents must have told you that it could not possibly be meant for you. [To YOUNG CLACKIT.]

Sir C. Proof positive, Jack!—Say no more. Now is my time to begin.—Hem!—hem!—Sweet young lady!—hem!—whose charms are so mighty, so far transcending every thing that we read of in history or fable, how could you possibly think that my silence proceeded from contempt? was it natural or prudent, think you, for a man of sixty-five, nay, just entering into his sixty-sixth year—

Young C. O misericorde! what, is my uncle my rival? Nay then, I burst, by Jupiter!—Ha, ha, ha!

Har. Don't imagine, Sir, that to me your age is any fault.

Sir C. [Bowing.] You are very obliging, Madam.

Har. Neither is it, Sir, a merit of that extraordinary nature, that I should sacrifice to it an inclination which I have conceived for another.

Sir C. How is this?

Young C. Another! not you; mind that, uncle.

Lucy. What is the meaning of all this?

Young C. Proof positive, uncle—And very positive.

Sir C. I have been led into a mistake, Madam, which I hope you will excuse; and I have made myself very ridiculous, which I hope I shall forget:—And so, Madam, I am your humble servant.

Heart. What I now see, and the remembrance of what is past, force me to break silence.

Young C. Ay, now for it.—Hear him—hear him.—

Heart. O my Harriot!—I too must be disgraced in my turn.—Can you think that I have seen and conversed with you unmoved?—Indeed I have not.—The more I was sensible of your merit, the stronger were my motives to stifle the ambition of my heart.—But now I can no longer resist the violence of my passion, which casts me at your feet, the most unworthy indeed of all your admirers, but of all the most affectionate.

Har. I have refused my hand to Sir Charles and this young gentleman: the one accuses me of caprice, the other of singularity:—Should I refuse my hand a third time, [smiling,] I might draw upon myself a more severe reproach—and therefore I accept your favour, Sir, and will endeavour to deserve it.

Heart. And thus I seal my acknowledgements and from henceforth devote my every thought, and all my services, to the author of my happiness.

[Kisses her hand.]

Sir C. Well, my dear discreet nephew, are you satisfied with the fool's part you have given me, and played yourself in the farce?

Young C. What would you have me say, Sir? I am too much a philosopher to fret.

Heart. I hope, Sir Charles, that we shall still continue to live as neighbours and friends. For you, my Harriot, words cannot express my wonder or my joy; my future conduct must tell you what a sense I have of my happiness, and how much I shall endeavour to deserve it.

For ev'ry charm that ever yet bless'd youth,
Accept compliance, tenderness, and truth;
My friendly care shall change to grateful love,
And the fond husband still the Guardian prove

THE LYING VALET:

A FARCE,

IN TWO ACTS.

BY DAVID GARRICK, Esq.

REMARKS.

THIS piece was first launched at the Theatre in Goodman's Fields; but Mr. Garrick, who soon quitted that place for the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane, brought his Farce with him. It appears to be founded on an old English Comedy: but it has spirit, incident, and variety, with language well adapted to the characters.

Considerable success attended the numerous early repetitions of this diverting afterpiece, and it forms a useful addition to the stock-list of every Theatre in the kingdom.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

SHARP.....	Mr. Garrick.
GAYLESS.....	Mr. Blakes.
JUSTICE GUTTLE.....	Mr. Taswell.
BEAU TRIPPET.....	Mr. Neal.
DICK.....	Mr. Yates.
MELISSA.....	Miss Bennet.
KITTY PRY.....	Mrs. Clive.
MRS. GADABOUT.....	Mrs. Cross.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—GAYLESS's Lodgings.

Enter GAYLESS and SHARP.

Sharp. How, Sir! shall you be married to-morrow? Eh, I'm afraid you joke with your poor humble servant.

Gay. I tell thee Sharp, last night Melissa consented, and fixed to-morrow for the happy day.

Sharp. 'Tis well she did, Sir, or it might have been a dreadful one for us, in our present condition: all your money spent, your moveables sold, your honour almost ruined, and your humble servant almost starved; we could not possibly have stood it two days longer. But if this young lady will marry you and relieve us, o'my conscience, I'll turn friend to the sex, and think of a wife myself.

Gay. And yet, Sharp, when I think how I have imposed upon her, I am almost resolved to throw myself at her feet, tell her the real situation of my affairs, ask her pardon, and implore her pity.

Sharp. After marriage, with all my heart, Sir.
Gay. What, because I am poor, shall I abandon my honour?

Sharp. Yes, you must, Sir, or abandon me: so pray discharge one of us; for eat I must, and speedily too: and you know very well that that honour of yours will neither introduce you to a great man's table, nor get me credit for a single beef-steak.

Gay. What can I do?

Sharp. Nothing, while honour sticks in your throat: do gulp, master, and down with it.

Gay. Prythee, leave me to my thoughts.

Sharp. Leave you! No, not in such bad company, I assure you. Why you must certainly be a very great philosopher, Sir, to moralize and declaim so charmingly as you do, about honour and conscience, when your doors are beset with bailiffs, and not one single guinea in your pocket to bribe the villains.

Gay. Don't be witty, and give your advice, Sirrah!

Sharp. Do you be wise and take it, Sir. But to be serious; you certainly have spent your fortune, and out-lived your credit, as your pockets and my belly can testify: your father has disowned you; all your friends forsook you, except myself, who am starving with you. Now, Sir, if you marry this young lady, who as yet, thank heaven, knows nothing of your misfortunes, and by that means procure a better fortune than that you squandered away, make a good husband, and turn economist, you still may be happy, may still be Sir William's heir, and the lady too no loser by the bargain. There's reason and argument, Sir.

Gay. 'Twas with that prospect I first made love to her.

Sharp. Pray then make no more objections to the marriage. You see I am reduced to my waistcoat already; and when necessity has undressed me from top to toe, she must begin with you; and then we shall be forced to keep house, and die by inches.—Look you, Sir, if you wont resolve to take my advice, while you have one coat to your back, I must e'en take to my heels, while I have strength to run, and something to cover me: so Sir, wishing you much comfort and consolation with your bare conscience, I am your most obedient and half-starved friend and servant.

[Going.]

Gay. Hold, Sharp, you won't leave me!

Sharp. I must eat, Sir; by my honour and appetite, I must!

Gay. Well then, I am resolved to favour the cheat; and as I shall quite change my former course of life, happy may be the consequences; at least of this I am sure—

Sharp. That you can't be worse than you are at present. [A knocking without.]

Gay. Who's there?

Sharp. Some of your former good friends, who favoured you with money at fifty per cent. and helped you to spend it; and are now become daily mementoes to you of the folly of trusting rogues, and laughing at my advice.

Gay. Cease your impertinence!—to the door!—If they are duns, tell 'em my marriage is now certainly fixed, and persuade 'em still to forbear a few days longer. And do you hear Sharp, if it should be any body from Melissa, say I am not at home, lest the bad appearance we make here should make 'em suspect something to our disadvantage.

Sharp. I'll obey you, Sir; but I'm afraid they will easily discover the consumptive situation of our affairs by my chop-fallen countenance. [Exit.]

Gay. These very rascals, who are now continually dunning and persecuting me, were the very persons who led me to my ruin, partook of my prosperity, and professed the greatest friendship.

Sharp. [Without.] Upon my word, Mrs. Kitty, my master's not at home.

Kitty. [Without.] Lookye, Sharp, I must and will see him.

Gay. Ha, what do I hear? Melissa's maid!—She's coming up stairs. What must I do?—I'll get into this closet and listen. [Exit.]

Re-enter SHARP, with KITTY.

Kitty. I must know where he is, and will know too, Mr. Impertinence!

Sharp. Not of me you won't. [Aside.] He's not within, I tell you, Mrs. Kitty. I dont know myself. Do you think I can conjure?

Kitty. But I know you will lie abominably; therefore don't trifle with me. I come from my mistress, Melissa: you know, I suppose, what's to be done to-morrow morning?

Sharp. Ay, and to-morrow night too, girl!

Kitty. Not if I can help it. [Aside.] But come, where is your master? for see him I must.

Sharp. Pray Mrs. Kitty, what's your opinion of this match between my master and your mistress?

Kitty. Why, I have no opinion of it at all; and yet most of our wants will be relieved by it too; for instance now, your master will get a fortune, that's what I am afraid he wants; my mistress will get a husband, that's what she has wanted for some time; you will have the pleasure of my conversation, and I an opportunity of breaking your head for your impertinence.

Sharp. Madam, I'm your most humble servant! But I'll tell you what, Mrs. Kitty, I am positively against the match; for was I a man of my master's fortune, Kitty. You'd marry if you could, and mend it ha, ha, ha!—Pray Sharp, where does your master's estate lie?

Sharp. Lie, lie!—why, it lies—'faith I can't name any particular place, it lies in so many; his effects are divided, some here and some there; his steward hardly knows himself.

Kitty. Scattered, scattered, I suppose. But harkye, Sharp, what's become of your furniture? You seem to be a little bare here at present.

Sharp. Why you must know, as soon as the wedding was fixed, my master ordered me to remove his goods to a friend's house, to make room for a ball which he designs to give here the day after the marriage.

Kitty. The luckiest thing in the world! for my mistress designs to have a ball and entertainment here to-night before the marriage; and that's my business with your master.

Sharp. The devil it is! [Aside.]

Kitty. She'll not have it public; she designs to invite only eight or ten couple of friends.

Sharp. No more?

Kitty. No more: and she ordered me to desire your master not to order a great entertainment.

Sharp. Oh, never fear.

Kitty. Ten or a dozen little nice things, with some fruit, I believe, will be enough in all conscience.

Sharp. Oh, curse your conscience! [Aside.]

Kitty. And what do you think I have done of my own head?

Sharp. What?

Kitty. I have invited all my lord Stately's servants to come and see you, and have a dance in the kitchen: wont your master be surprised?

Sharp. Much so, indeed!

Kitty. Well, be quick and find out your master, and make what haste you can with your preparations: you have no time to lose. Pr'ythee, Sharp, what's the matter with you? I have not seen you for some time, and you seem to look little thin.

Sharp. Oh, my unfortunate face! [Aside.] I'm in pure health, thank you, Mrs. Kitty; and I'll assure you I have a very good stomach, never better in all my life; and I am full of vigour, hussy!

[Offers to kiss her.]

Kitty. What, with that face!—Well, by by. [Going.—Oh, Sharp, what ill-looking fellows are those, who were standing about your door when I came in? They want your master too, I suppose?

Sharp. Hum! Yes, they are waiting for him. They are some of his tenants out of the country, that want to pay him some money.

Kitty. Tenants! What, do you let his tenants stand in the street?

Sharp. They choose it; as they seldom come to town, they are willing to see as much of it as they can when they do: they are raw, ignorant honest people.

Kitty. Well, I must run home—farewell!—But do you hear? Get something substantial for us in the kitchen: a ham, a turkey, or what you will. We'll be very merry. And be sure to remove the tables and chairs away there too, that we may have room to dance. I can't bear to be confined in my French dances—tal, la, la, la. [Dances.] Well, adieu! Without any compliment, I shall die, if I don't see you soon. [Exit.]

Sharp. And, without any compliment, I pray heaven you may!

Re-enter GAYLESS; they look for some time sorrowfully at each other.

Gay. Oh, Sharp!

Sharp. Oh, master!

Gay. We are certainly undone!

Sharp. That's no news to me.

Gay. Eight or ten couple of dancers—ten or a dozen little nice dishes, with some fruit—my lord Stately's servants—ham and turkey!

Sharp. Say no more; the very sound creates an appetite: and I am sure, of late, I have had no occasion for whetters and provocatives.

Gay. Cursed misfortune! what can we do?

Sharp. Hang ourselves; I see no other remedy; except you have a receipt to give a ball and a supper without meat or music.

Gay. Melissa has certainly heard of my bad circumstances, and has invented this scheme to distress me, and break off this match.

Sharp. I don't believe it, Sir; begging your pardon.

Gay. No! why did her maid then make so strict an inquiry into my fortune and affairs?

Sharp. For two very substantial reasons; the first to satisfy a curiosity natural to her as a woman: the second, to have the pleasure of my conversation, very natural to her as a woman of taste and understanding.

Gay. Pr'ythee be more serious: is not our all at stake?

Sharp. Yes, Sir; and yet that all of ours is of so little consequence, that a man with a very small share of philosophy, may part from it without much pain or uneasiness. However, Sir, I'll convince you, in half an hour, that Mrs. Melissa knows nothing of your circumstances. And I'll tell you what too, Sir; she shan't be here to-night, and yet you shall marry her to-morrow morning.

Gay. How, how, dear Sharp?

Sharp. 'Tis here, here, Sir! warm, warm; and delays will cool it; therefore I'll away to her, and do you be as merry as love and poverty will permit you.

Would you succeed, a faithful friend depute,
Whose head can plan, and front can execute.
[Exeunt]

SCENE II.—MELISSA'S Lodgings.

Enter MELISSA and KITTY.

Mel. You surprise me, Kitty! the master not at home, the man in confusion, no furniture in the house, and ill-looking fellows about the doors! 'Tis all a riddle.

Kitty. But very easy to be explained.

Mel. Pr'ythee explain it then, nor keep me longer in suspense.

Kitty. The affair is this, Madam: Mr. Gayless is over head and ears in debt; you are over head and ears in love: you'll marry him to-morrow; the next day your whole fortune goes to his creditors, and you and your children are to live comfortably upon the remainder.

Mel. I cannot think him base.

Kitty. But I know they are all base. You are very young, and very ignorant of the sex; I am young too, but have more experience: you never was in love before; I have been in love with a hundred, and tried 'em all; and know 'em all to be a parcel of barbarous, perjured, deluding bewitching devils.

Mel. The low wretches you have had to do with, may answer the character you give 'em; but Mr. Gayless—

Kitty. Is a man, Madam.

Mel. I hope so, Kitty, or I would have nothing to do with him.

Kitty. With all my heart. I have given you my sentiments upon the occasion, and shall leave you to your own inclinations.

Mel. Oh, Madam, I am much obliged to you for your great condescension; ha, ha, ha! However, I have so great a regard for your opinion, that had I certain proofs of his villany—

Kitty. Of his poverty you may have a hundred; I am sure I have had none to the contrary.

Mel. Oh, there the shoe pinches. [Aside.]

Kitty. Nay, so far from giving me the usual perquisites of my place, he has not so much as kept me in temper with little endearing civilities; and one might reasonably expect, when a man is deficient one way, that he should make it up in another. [A knocking.]

Mel. See who's at the door. [Exit KITTY.] I must be cautious how I hearken too much to this girl; her bad opinion of Mr. Gayless seems to arise from his disregard of her.

Re-enter KITTY and SHARP.

So, Sharp, have you found your master? Will things be ready for the ball and entertainment?

Sharp. To your wishes, Madam. I have just now bespoke the music and the supper, and wait now for your ladyship's further commands.

Mel. My compliments to your master, and let him know I and my company will be with him by six; we design to drink tea, and play at cards, before we dance.

Kitty. So shall I and my company, Mr. Sharp.

Sharp. Mighty well, Madam!

Mel. Pr'ythee, Sharp, what makes you come without your coat? 'Tis too cool to go so airy, sure.

Kitty. Mr. Sharp, Madam, is of a very hot constitution; ha, ha, ha!

Sharp. If it had been ever so cool, I have had enough to warm me since I came from home, I'm sure; but no matter for that. [Sighs.]

Mel. What d'ye mean?

Sharp. Pray don't ask me Madam; I beseech you don't: let me change the subject.

Kitty. Insist upon knowing it Madam.—My curiosity must be satisfied, or I shall burst. [Aside.]

Mel. I do insist upon knowing; on pain of my displeasure, tell me!

Sharp. If my master should know—I must not tell you, madam, indeed.

Mel. I promise you, upon my honour, he never shall.

Sharp. But can your ladyship insure secrecy from that quarter?

Kitty. Yes, Mr. Jackanapes, for any thing you can say.

Mel. I engage for her.

Sharp. Why then, in short, Madam—I cannot tell you.

Mel. Don't trifle with me.

Sharp. Then since you will have it, Madam, I lost my coat in defence of your reputation.

Mel. In defence of my reputation?

Sharp. I will assure you, Madam, I've suffered very much in defence of it; which is more than I would have done for my own.

Mel. Pr'ythee explain.

Sharp. In short, Madam, you was seen, about a month ago, to make a visit to my master, alone.

Mel. Alone! my servant was with me.

Sharp. What, Mrs. Kitty? So much the worse; for she was looked upon as my property; and I was brought in guilty, as well as you and my master.

Kitty. What, your property, jackanapes?

Mel. What is all this?

Sharp. Why, madam, as I came out but now to make preparation for you and your company to-night, Mrs. Pryabout, the attorney's wife at next door, calls to me: "Harkye, fellow!" says she, "do you and your modest master know that my husband shall indict your house, at the next parish meeting, for a nuisance?"

Mel. A nuisance!

Sharp. I said so—"A nuisance! I believe none in the neighbourhood live with more decency and regularity than I and my master;" as is really the case.—"Decency and regularity!" cries she, with a sneer—"why, Sirrah, does not my window look into your master's bed-chamber? And did not he bring in a certain lady, such a day?" describing you, Madam,—"And did not I see—"

Mel. See! O scandalous! What?

Sharp. Modesty requires my silence.

Mel. Did not you contradict her?

Sharp. Contradict her! Why, I told her I was sure she lied: "for zounds!" said I, for I could not help swearing, "I am so well convinced of the lady's and my master's prudence, that I am sure had they a mind to amuse themselves, they would certainly have drawn the window-curtains."

Mel. What, did you say nothing else? Did not you convince her of her error and impertinence?

Sharp. She swore to such things, that I could do nothing but swear and call names: upon which, out bolts her husband upon me, with a fine taper crab in his hand, and fell upon me with such violence, that, being half delirious I made a full confession.

Mel. A full confession! What did you confess?
Sharp. That my master loved fornication: that you had no aversion to it; that Mrs. Kitty was a bawd, and your humble servant a pimp.

Kitty. A bawd! a bawd! Do I look like a bawd, Madam?

Sharp. And so, Madam, in the scuffle, my coat was torn to pieces, as well as your reputation.

Mel. And so you joined to make me infamous!

Sharp. For heaven's sake, Madam, what could I do? His proofs fell so thick upon me, as witness my head, [Shows his head, plastered,] that I would have given up all the reputations in the kingdom rather than have my brains beat to a jelly.

Mel. Very well!—But I'll be revenged. And did not you tell your master of this?

Sharp. Tell him! No, madam. Had I told him, his love is so violent for you, that he would certainly have murdered half the attorneys in town by this time.

Mel. Very well!—But I'm resolved not to go to your master's to-night.

Sharp. Heavens, and my impudence be praised!

Kitty. Why not, Madam? If you are not guilty, face your accusers.

Sharp. Oh, the devil! ruined again! [Aside.]

To be sure, face 'em by all means, Madam: they can but be abusive, and break the windows a little. Besides, Madam, I have thought of a way to make this affair quite diverting to you: I have a fine blunderbuss, charged with half a hundred slugs, and my master has a delicate, large Swiss broad-sword; and between us, Madam, we shall so pepper and slice 'em, that you will die with laughing.

Mel. What, at murder?

Kitty. Don't fear, Madam, there will be no murder if Sharp's concerned.

Sharp. Murder, Madam! 'Tis self-defence: besides in these sort of skirmishes, there are never more than two or three killed: for, supposing they bring the whole body of militia upon us, down but with a brace of them, and away fly the rest of the covey.

Mel. Persuade me ever so much, I wont go; that's my resolution.

Kitty. Why then, I'll tell you what, Madam; since you are resolved not to go to the supper, suppose the supper was to come to you: 'tis great pity such great preparations as Mr. Sharp has made should be thrown away.

Sharp. So it is, as you say, Mrs. Kitty; but I can immediately run back and unbespeak what I have ordered; 'tis soon done.

Mel. But then what excuse can I send to your master? he'll be very uneasy at my not coming.

Sharp. Oh terribly so!—But I have it: I'll tell him that you were suddenly taken with the vapours, or qualms, or what you please, Madam.

Mel. I'll leave it to you, Sharp, to make my apology; and there's half-a-guinea for you to help your invention.

Sharp. Half-a-guinea!—'Tis so long since I had any thing to do with money, that I scarcely know the current coin of my own country. Oh, Sharp, what talents hast thou! to secure thy master, deceive his mistress, out-lie her chamber-maid, and yet be paid for thy honesty.—But my joy will discover me. [Aside.] Madam, you have eternally fixed Timothy Sharp, your most obedient, humble servant.—Oh, the delights of impudence and a good understanding!

[Aside, and exits.]

Kitty. Ha, ha, ha! Was there ever such a lying varlet! with his slugs and his broad-swords, his attorneys and broken heads and nonsense!—Well, Madam, are you satisfied now? Do you want more proofs?

Mel. Of your modesty I do; but I find you are resolved to give me none.

Kitty. Madam!

Mel. I see through your little mean artifice: you are endeavouring to lessen Mr. Gayless in my opinion, because he has not paid you for services he had no occasion for.

Kitty. Pay me, Madam! I am sure I have very little occasion to be angry with Mr. Gayless for not paying me, when, I believe, 'tis his general practice.

Mel. 'Tis false! He's a gentleman, and a man of honour; and you are—

Kitty. Not in love, I thank heaven!

[Courtesies.]

Mel. You are a fool.

Kitty. I have been in love, but I'm much wiser now.

Mel. Hold your tongue, impertinence!

Kitty. That's the severest thing she has said yet. [Aside.]

Mel. Leave me.

Kitty. Oh, this love, this love, is the devil!

[Exit.]

Mel. We discover our weakness to our servants, make them our confidants, put 'em upon an equality with us, and so they become our advisers. Sharp's behaviour, though I seemed to disregard it, makes me tremble with apprehensions; and though I have pretended to be angry with Kitty for her advice, I think it of too much consequence to be neglected.

Re-enter KITTIE.

Kitty. May I speak, Madam?

Mel. Don't be a fool. What do you want?

Kitty. There is a servant, just come out of the country, says he belongs to Sir William Gayless, and has got a letter for you, from his master, upon very urgent business.

Mel. Sir William Gayless! What can this mean? Where is the man?

Kitty. In the little parlour, Madam.

Mel. I'll go to him.—My heart flutters strangely. [Exit.]

Kitty. O woman, woman, foolish woman! She'll certainly have this Gayless: nay, were she as well convinced of his poverty as I am, she'd have him. Here is she going to throw away fifteen thousand pounds—upon what? He's a man and that's all; and, heaven knows, mere man is but a small consolation now-a-days! [Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I

Enter GAYLESS and SHARP.

Gay. Pr'ythee be serious, Sharp: hast thou really succeeded?

Sharp. To our wishes, Sir. In short, I have managed the business with such skill and dexterity, that neither your circumstances, nor my viceracity are suspected.

Gay. But how hast thou excused me from the ball and entertainment?

Sharp. Beyond expectation, Sir. But in that particular, I was obliged to have recourse to truth, and declare the real situation of your affairs. I told her we had so long disused ourselves to dressing either dinners or suppers, that I was afraid we should be but awkward in our preparations. In short, Sir, at that instant a cursed gnawing seized my stomach, that I could not help telling her, that both you and myself seldom made a good meal, now-a-days, once in a quarter of a year.

Gay. Hell and confusion! have you betrayed me, villain? Did you not tell me, this moment, she did not in the least suspect my circumstances?

Sharp. No more she did, Sir, till I told her.

Gay. Very well!—And was this your skill and dexterity?

Sharp. I was going to tell you, but you wont hear reason. My melancholy face and piteous narration had such an effect upon her generous bowels, that she freely forgives all that's past.

Gay. Does she Sharp?

Sharp. Yes, and desires never to see your face again; and, as a further consideration for so doing, she has sent you half-a-guinea.

[Shows the money.]

Gay. What do you mean?

Sharp. To spend it, spend it, Sir, and regale.

Gay. Villain, you have undone me!

Sharp. What, by bringing you money, when you are not worth a farthing in the whole world? Well, well, then to make you happy again, I'll keep it myself; and wish somebody would take it in their head to load me with such misfortunes.

[Puts up the money.]

Gay. Do you laugh at me, rascal?

Sharp. Who deserves more to be laughed at? ha, ha, ha!—Never for the future, Sir, dispute the success of my negotiations, when even you, who know me so well, can't help swallowing my hook. Why, Sir, I could have played with you backwards and forwards, at the end of my line, till I had put your senses into such a fermentation, that you should not have known, in an hour's time, whether you was a fish or a man.

Gay. Why what is all this you have been telling me?

Sharp. A downright lie, from beginning to end.

Gay. And have you really excused me to her?

Sharp. No, Sir; but I have got this half-guinea to make her excuses to you; and instead of a confederacy between you and me to deceive her, she thinks she has brought me over to put the deceit upon you.

Gay. Thou excellent fellow.

Sharp. Don't lose time, but slip out of the house immediately—the back way, I believe, will be the safest for you—and to her as fast as you can; pretend vast surprise and concern that her indisposition has debarred you the pleasure of her company here to-night. You need know no more—away!

Gay. But what shall we do, Sharp? Here's her maid again.

Sharp. The devil she is! I wish I could poison her: for I'm sure while she lives I can never prosper.

Enter KITTY.

Kitty. Your door was open, so I did not stand upon ceremony.

Gay. I am sorry to hear your mistress is taken so suddenly—

Kitty. Vapours, vapours only, Sir; a few matrimonial omens, that's all; but I suppose Mr. Sharp has made her excuses.

Gay. And tells me I can't have the pleasure of her company to-night. I had made a small preparation; but 'tis no matter: Sharp shall go to the rest of the company, and let them know 'tis put off.

Kitty. Not for the world, Sir: my mistress was sensible you must have provided for her, and the rest of the company; so she is resolved, though she can't, the other ladies and gentlemen shall partake of your entertainment.—She's very good-natured.

Sharp. I had better run and let 'em know 'tis deferred.

[Going.]

Kitty. [Stops him.] I have been with 'em already, and told them my mistress insists upon their coming; and they have already promised to be here: so pray don't be under any apprehensions that your preparations will be thrown away.

Gay. But as I can't have her company, Mrs. Kitty, 'twill be a great pleasure to me, and a greater compliment to her, to defer our mirth; besides, I can't enjoy any thing at present, and she not partake of it.

Kitty. Oh, no, to be sure; but what can I do? My mistress will have it so! and Mrs. Gadabout, and the rest of the company, will be here in a few minutes: there are two or three coachfuls of 'em.

Sharp. Then my master must be ruined, in spite of my parts.

[Aside.]

Gay. 'Tis all over, Sharp.

Sharp. I know it, Sir.

[Apart.]

Gay. I shall go distracted! what shall I do?

[Apart.]

Sharp. Why, Sir, as our rooms are a little out of furniture at present, take 'em into the captain's, that lodges here, and set 'em down to cards: if he should come in the mean time, I'll excuse you to him.

[Apart.]

Kitty. I have disconcerted their affairs, I find. I'll have some sport with them. [Aside.] Pray, Mr. Gayless, don't order too many things: they only make you a friendly visit; the more ceremony, you know, the less welcome. Pray, Sir, let me entreat you not to be profuse. If I can be of service, pray command me; my mistress has sent me on purpose. While Mr. Sharp is doing the business without doors, I may be employed within. If you'll lend me the keys of your side-board, I'll dispose of your plate to the best advantage.

[To SHARP.]

Sharp. Thank you Mrs. Kitty; but it is disposed of already.

[A knocking.]

Kitty. Bless me the company's come! I'll go to the door and conduct them into your presence.

[Exit.]

Sharp. If you'd conduct them into a horse-pond, and wait on them there yourself, we should be more obliged to you.

Gay. I can never support this!

Sharp. Rouse your spirits, and put on an air of gayety, and I don't despair of bringing you off yet.

Gay. Your words have done it effectually.

Re-enter KITTY, with MRS. GADABOUT, her Daughter, and Niece; JUSTICE GUTTLE, TRIPPET, and MRS. TRIPPET.

Mrs. G. Ah, my dear Mr. Gayless!

[Kisses him.]

Gay. My dear widow!

[Kisses her.]

Mrs. G. We are come to give you joy, Mr. Gayless; and here's Mr. Guttle come to give you joy.—Mr. Gayless, Justice Guttle.

Sharp. Oh, destruction! one of the quorum.

[Aside.]

Just. G. Hem! though I had not the honour of any personal knowledge of you, yet, at the instigation of Mrs. Gadabout, I have, without any previous acquaintance with you, thrown aside all ceremony, to let you know that I joy to hear the solemnization of your nuptials is so near at hand.

Gay. Sir, though I cannot answer you with the same elocution, however, Sir, I thank you with the same sincerity.

Mrs. G. Mr. and Mrs. Trippet, Sir; the properest lady in the world for your purpose, for she'll dance for four-and-twenty hours together.

Trip. My dear Charles, I am very angry with you, faith: so near marriage, and not let me know! 'twas barbarous. You thought, I suppose, I should rally you upon it; but dear Mrs. Trippet here has long ago eradicated all my anti-matrimonial principles.

Kitty. Pray ladies, walk into the next room; Mr. Sharp can't lay his cloth till you are set down to cards.

Mrs. G. One thing I had quite forgot: Mr. Gayless, my nephew, who you never saw, will be in town from France presently; so I left word to send him here immediately, to make one.

Gay. You do me honour, Madam.

Sharp. Do the ladies choose cards or supper first?

Gay. Supper! What does the fellow mean?

[Aside.]

Just. G. Oh, the supper by all means; for I have eat nothing to signify since dinner.

Sharp. Nor I, since last Monday was a fortnight.

[Aside.]

Gay. Pray, ladies, walk into the next room.—Sharp get things ready for supper, and call the music.

Sharp. Well said, master.

Mrs. G. Without ceremony, ladies.

[Exit MRS. GAYLESS, TRIPPET, and LADIES.]

Kitty. I'll to my mistress; and let her know every thing is ready for her appearance.

[Aside, and exit.]

Just. G. Pray Mr.—what's your name, don't be long with supper:—but harkye, what can I do in the mean time? suppose you get me a pipe and some good wine; I'll try to divert myself that way till supper's ready.

Sharp. Or suppose, Sir, you was to take a nap till then: there's a very easy couch in that closet.

Just. G. The best thing in the world! I'll take your advice; but be sure to wake me when supper is ready.

[Exit.]

Sharp. Pray heaven, you may not wake till then!—What a fine situation my master is in at present! I have promised him my assistance; but his affairs are in so desperate a way, that I am afraid 'tis out of my skill to recover them. Well, "Fools have fortune," says an old proverb, and a very true one it is; for my master and I are two of the most unfortunate mortals in the creation.

Re-enter GAYLESS.

Gay. Well, Sharp, I have set them down to cards; and now what have you to propose?

Sharp. I have one scheme left, which in all probability may succeed. The good citizen, overloaded with his last meal, is taking a nap in that closet, in order to get him an appetite for yours. I'll pick his pocket, and provide us a supper with the booty.

Gay. Monstrous! for, without considering the villainy of it, the danger of waking him makes it impracticable.

Sharp. If he wakes, I'll smother him, and lay his death to indigestion: a very common death among the justices.

Gay. Pr'ythee, be serious; we have no time to lose. Can you invent nothing to drive them out of the house?

Sharp. I can fire it.

Gay. Shame and confusion so perplex me, I cannot give myself a moment's thought.

Sharp. I have it; did not Mrs. Gadabout say her nephew would be here?

Gay. She did.

Sharp. Say no more, but in to your company. If I don't send them out of the house for the night, I'll at least frighten their stomachs away; and if this stratagem fails, I'll relinquish politics, and think my understanding no better than my neighbours.

Gay. How shall I reward thee, Sharp?

Sharp. By your silence and obedience. Away to your company, Sir. [Exit GAYLESS.] Now, dear Madam Fortune, for once open your eyes, and behold a poor unfortunate man of parts addressing you. Now is your time to convince your foes you are not that blind, whimsical whore they take you for; but let them see, by your assisting me, that men of sense, as well as fools, are sometimes entitled to your favour and protection.— [Goes aside, and cries out] Help, help, help, master! gentlemen, ladies! murder, fire, brimstone! help, help, help!

Re-enter GAYLESS, TRIPPET, and the LADIES, with Cards in their hands, and SHARP enters running, and meets them.

Gay. What's the matter?

Sharp. Matter, Sir! If you don't run this minute with that gentleman, this lady's nephew will be murdered. I am sure 'twas he; he was set upon at the corner of the street by four; he has killed two; and if you don't make haste, he'll be either murdered or took to prison.

Mrs. G. For heaven's sake, gentlemen, run to his assistance. How I tremble for Melissa! this frolic of her's may be fatal. [Aside.]

Gay. Draw, Sir, and follow me.

[Exeunt all but SHARP.]

Re-enter JUSTICE GUTTLE, disordered, as from sleep.

Just. G. What noise and confusion is this?

Sharp. Sir, there's a man murdered in the street.

Just. G. Is that all? Zounds! I was afraid you had thrown the supper down. A plague of your noise! I shan't recover my stomach this half hour.

Re-enter GAYLESS, TRIPPET, and MRS. GADABOUT, with MELISSA, in boys' clothes, dressed in the French manner.

Mrs. G. Well, but my dear Jemmy, you are not hurt, sure?

Mel. A little, with riding post only.

Mrs. G. Mr. Sharp alarmed us all, with an account of your being set upon by four men; that you had killed two, and was attacking the other when he came away; and when we met you at the door, we were running to your rescue.

Mel. I had a small rencounter with half a dozen villains; but finding me resolute they were wise enough to take to their heels. I believe I scratched some of them.

[Lays her hand to her sword.]

Sharp. His vanity has saved my credit. I have a thought come into my head may prove to our advantage, provided Monsieur's ignorance bears any proportion to his impudence. [Aside.]

Mrs. G. Now my fright is over, let me introduce you, my dear, to Mr. Gayless. Sir, this is my nephew.

Gay. Sir, I shall be proud of your friendship.

[Salutes her.]

Mel. I don't doubt but we shall be better acquainted in a little time.

Just. G. Pray, Sir, what news in France?

Mel. Faith, very little that I know of in the political way; I had no time to spend among the politicians. I was—

Gay. Among the ladies, I suppose?

Mel. Too much indeed. Faith I have not philosophy enough to resist their solicitations. You take me?

[Apart to GAYLESS.]

Gay. Yes, to be a most incorrigible fop. [Aside.] 'Sdeath! this puppy's impertinence is an addition to my misery.

[Apart to SHARP.]

Mel. Poor Gayless! to what shifts is he reduced! I cannot bear to see him much longer in this condition; I shall discover myself.

[Apart to MRS. GADABOUT.]

Mrs. G. Not before the end of the play; besides, the more his pain now, the greater his pleasure when relieved from it.

[Apart.]

Trip. Shall we return to our cards? I have a sans prendre here, and must insist you play it out.

Ladies. With all my heart.

Mel. Alons done.

[As they go out, SHARP pulls MELISSA by the Sleeve.]

Sharp. Sir, sir, shall I beg leave to speak with you? Pray did you find a bank-note in your way hither?

Mel. What between here and Dover, do you mean?

Sharp. No, Sir, within twenty or thirty yards of this house.

Mel. You are drunk, fellow.

Sharp. I am undone, Sir, but not drunk, I'll assure you.

Mel. What is all this?

Sharp. I'll tell you, Sir: a little ago my master sent me out, to change a note of twenty pounds; but I unfortunately hearing a noise in the street of "damme, Sir!" and clashing of swords, and "rascal" and "murder!" I runs up to the place, and saw four men upon one; and having heard you was a mettlesome young gentleman I immediately concluded it must be you.

so ran back to call my master; and when I went to look for the note, to change it, I found it gone, either stole or lost: and if I don't get the money immediately, I shall certainly be turned out of my place, and lose my character.

Mel. I shall laugh in his face. [Aside.] Oh, I'll speak to your master about it, and he will forgive you at my intercession.

Sharp. Ah, Sir! you don't know my master.

Mel. I'm very little acquainted with him, but I have heard he's a very good natured man.

Sharp. I have heard so too, but I have felt it otherwise; he has so much good nature, that if I could compound for one broken head a day, I should think myself very well off.

Mel. Are you serious, friend?

Sharp. Lookye, Sir, I take you for a man of honour; there is something in your face that is generous, open, and masculine; you don't look like a foppish, effeminate tell-tale; so I'll venture to trust you. See here, Sir, these are the effects of my master's good nature. [Shows his head.]

Mel. Matchless impudence! [Aside.] Why do you live with him then, after such usage?

Sharp. He's worth a great deal of money; and when he's drunk, which is commonly once a day, he's very free, and will give me any thing! but I design to leave him when he's married, for all that.

Mel. Is he going to be married then?

Sharp. To-morrow, Sir; and between you and I, he'll meet with his match, both for humour and something else too.

Mel. What, she drinks too?

Sharp. Damnably, Sir; but mum. You must know this entertainment was designed for Madam to-night; but she got so very gay after dinner, that she could not walk out of her own house; so her maid, who was half gone too, came here with an excuse, that Mrs. Melissa had got the vapours; and so she had indeed violently, here, here, Sir.

[Points to his head.]

Mel. This is scarcely to be borne. [Aside.] Melissa! I have heard of her: they say she's very whimsical.

Sharp. A very woman, and please your honour; and between you and I, none of the mildest and wisest of her sex. But to return, Sir, to the twenty pounds.

Mel. I am surprised, you, who have got so much money in his service, should be at a loss for twenty pounds, to save your bones at this juncture.

Sharp. I have put all my money out at interest; I never keep above five pounds by me; and if your honour would lend me the other fifteen, and take my note for it— [A knocking.]

Mel. Somebody's at the door.

Sharp. I can give very good security.

[A knocking.]

Mel. Don't let the people wait, Mr.—

Sharp. Ten pounds will do. [A knocking.]

Mel. Allez vous en.

Sharp. Five, Sir.

[A knocking.]

Mel. Je ne puis pas.

Sharp. Je ne puis pas. I find we shan't understand one another; I do but lose time; and if I had any thought, I might have known these young fops return from their travels generally with as little money as improvement. [Exit.]

Mel. Ha, ha, ha! What lies does this fellow invent, and what rogueries does he commit, for his master's service. There never sure was a more faithful servant to his master, or a greater rogue to the rest of mankind. But here he comes again. The plot thickens. I'll in and observe Gayless. [Exit.]

Re-enter SHARP, before several Persons with Dishes in their hands, and a COOK, drunk.

Sharp. Fortune, I thank thee; the most lucky accident! [Aside.] This way, gentlemen, this way.

Cook. I am afraid I have mistook the house. Is this Mr. Treatwell's?

Sharp. The same, the same. What, don't you know me?

Cook. Know you?—Are you sure there was a supper bespoke here?

Sharp. Yes; upon my honour, Mr. Cook: the company is in the next room, and must have gone without had not you brought it. I'll draw a table. I see you have brought a cloth with you; but you need not have done that, for we have a very good stock of linen—at the pawnbroker's. [Aside, and exit; but returns immediately, drawing in a table.] Come, come, my boys, be quick. The company begin to be very uneasy; but I knew my old friend Licksplit here would not fail us.

Cook. Licksplit! I am no friend of yours, so I desire less familiarity.—Licksplit too!

Re-enter GAYLESS.

Gay. What is all this? [Apart to Sharp.]

Sharp. Sir, if the sight of the supper is offensive, I can easily have it removed. [Apart.]

Gay. Prythee, explain thyself Sharp. [Apart.]

Sharp. Some of our neighbours, I suppose, have bespoke this supper; but the cook has drank away his memory, forgot the house, and brought it here: however, Sir, if you dislike it, I'll tell him of his mistake, and send him about his business. [Apart.]

Gay. Hold, hold, necessity obliges me against my inclination to favour the cheat, and feast at my neighbour's expense. [Apart.]

Cook. Hark you, friend, is that your master?

[To SHARP.]

Sharp. Ay, and the best master in the world.

Cook. I'll speak to him then.—Sir, I have, according to your commands, dressed as genteel a supper as my art and your price would admit of.

[To GAY.]

Sharp. Good again, Sir! 'tis paid for.

[Apart to GAY.]

Gay. I don't in the least question your abilities, Mr. Cook; and I am obliged to you for your care.

Cook. Sir, you are a gentleman; and if you would but look over the bill, and approve it, you will over and above return the obligation.

[Pulls out a bill.]

Sharp. Oh, the devil!

Gay. [Looks on the bill.] Very well, I'll send my man to pay you to-morrow.

Cook. I'll spare him that trouble, and take it with me, Sir. I never work but for ready money.

Gay. Ha!

Sharp. Then you wont have our custom. [Aside.] My master is busy now, friend. Do you think he wont pay you?

Cook. No matter what I think; either my meat or my money.

Sharp. 'Twill be very ill-convenient for him to pay you to-night.

Cook. Then I'm afraid it will be ill-convenient to pay me to-morrow; so, d'ye hear—

Re-enter MELISSA.

Gay. Pr'ythee, be advised.—'Sdeath, I shall be discovered! [Takes the COOK aside.]

Mel. What's the matter? [To SHARP.]

Sharp. The cook has not quite answered my master's expectations about the supper, Sir, and he's a little angry at him; that's all.

Mel. Come, come, Mr. Gayless, don't be uneasy; a bachelor cannot be supposed to have things in the utmost regularity; we don't expect it.

Cook. But I do expect it, and will have it.

Mel. What does this drunken fool say?

Cook. That I will have my money, and I wont stay till to-morrow, and—and—

Sharp. Hold, hold! what are you doing? are you mad? [Runs and stops his mouth.]

Mel. What do you stop the man's breath for?

Sharp. Sir, he was going to call you names. Don't be abusive, cook; the gentleman is a man of honour, and said nothing to you. Pray be pacified. You are in liquor.

Cook. I will have my—

Sharp. [Still holding.] Why, I tell you, fool, you mistake the gentleman; he is a friend of my master's, and has not said a word to you.—Pray, good Sir, go into the next room. The fellow's drunk, and takes you for another. [To MELISSA.] You'll repent this when you are sober, friend.—Pray, Sir, don't stay to hear his impertinence.

Gay. Pray, Sir, walk in. He's below your anger. [To MELISSA.]

Mel. Damn the rascal! what does he mean by affronting me?—Let the scoundrel go; I'll polish his brutality, I warrant you. Here's the best reformer of manners in the universe. [Draws his sword.] Let him go, I say.

Sharp. So, so, you have done finely now.—Get away as fast as you can. He's the most courageous, mettlesome man in all England. Why, if his passion was up, he could eat you.—Make your escape you fool.

Cook. I wont.—Eat me! He'll find me damned hard of digestion, though.

Sharp. Pr'ythee, come here; let me speak with you. [Takes COOK aside.]

Re-enter KITTY.

Kitty. Gad's me! Is supper on the table already?—Sir, pray defer it for a few minutes; my mistress is much better, and will be here immediately.

Gay. Will she, indeed? Bless me, I did not expect—but however—Sharp!

Kitty. What success, Madam?

[Apart to MELISSA.]

Mel. As we could wish, girl: but he is in such pain and perplexity, I can't hold it out much longer.

Kitty. Ay, and that holding out is the ruin of half our sex.

Sharp. I have pacified the cook; and if you can but borrow twenty pieces of that young prig, all may go well. You may succeed, though I could not. Remember what I told you.—About it straight, Sir. [Apart to GAYLESS.]

Gay. Sir, sir, I beg to speak a word with you. [To MELISSA.] My servant, Sir, tells me he has had the misfortune, Sir, to lose a note of mine of twenty pounds, which I sent him to receive; and the bankers' shops being shut up, and having very little cash by me, I should be very much obliged to you, if you would favour me with twenty pieces till to-morrow.

Mel. Oh, Sir, with all my heart: [Takes out her purse.] and as I have a small favour to beg of you, Sir, the obligation will be mutual.

Gay. How may I oblige you, Sir?

Mel. You are to be married, I hear, to Melissa!

Gay. To-morrow, Sir.

Mel. Then you'll oblige me, Sir, by never seeing her again.

Gay. Do you call this a small favour, Sir?

Mel. A mere trifle, Sir. Breaking of contracts, suing for divorces, committing adultery, and such like are all reckoned trifles now-a-days; and smart young fellows, like you, and myself, Gayless, should be never out of fashion.

Gay. But pray, Sir, how are you concerned in this affair?

Mel. Oh, Sir, you must know I have a very great regard for Melissa, and indeed she for me; and, by the by, I have a most despicable opinion of you; for, entre nous, I take you, Charles, to be a very great scoundrel.

Gay. Sir!

Mel. Nay, don't look fierce, Sir, and give yourself airs—damme, Sir, I shall be through your body else in the snapping of a finger.

Gay. I'll be as quick as you, villain.

[Draws, and makes at MELISSA.]

Kitty. Hold, hold, murder! you'll kill my mistress—the young gentleman, I mean.

Gay. Ah! her mistress! [Drops his sword.]

Sharp. How! Melissa! Nay, then drive away, cart; all's over now.

Enter all the Company, laughing.

Mrs. G. What, Mr. Gayless, engaging with Melissa before your time? Ha, ha, ha!

Kitty. Your humble servant, good Mr. Politician. [To SHARP.] This is, gentlemen and ladies, the most celebrated and ingenious Timothy Sharp, schemer-general and redoubted squire to the most renowned and fortunate adventurer, Charles Gayless, knight of the woeful countenance—ha, ha, ha!—Oh that dismal face, and more dismal head of yours! [Strikes SHARP upon the head.]

Sharp. 'Tis cruel in you to disturb a man in his last agonies.

Mel. Now, Mr. Gayless!—What, not a word? You are sensible I can be no stranger to your misfortunes, and I might reasonably expect an excuse for your ill treatment of me.

Gay. No, Madam, silence is my only refuge; for to endeavour to vindicate my crimes, would show a greater want of virtue, than even the commission of them.

Mel. Oh, Gayless! 'twas poor to impose upon a woman, and one that loved you too.

Gay. Oh, most unpardonable; but my necessities—

Sharp. And mine, Madam, were not to be matched, I'm sure, o'this side starving.

Mel. His tears have softened me at once. [Aside.] Your necessities, Mr. Gayless, with such real contrition, are too powerful motives not to affect the breast already prejudiced in your favour.—You have suffered too much already for your extravagance; and as I take part in your sufferings, 'tis easing myself to relieve you: know, therefore, all that's past I freely forgive.

Gay. You cannot mean it, sure! I am lost in wonder!

Mel. Prepare yourself for more wonder. You have another friend in masquerade here. Mr. Cook, pray throw aside your drunkenness, and make your sober appearance.—Don't you know that face, Sir?

Cook. Ay, master; what! you have forgot your friend, Dick, as you used to call me?

Gay. More wonder indeed! Don't you live with my father?

Mel. Just after your hopeful servant there had left me, comes this man from Sir William, with a letter to me; upon which (being by that wholly convinced of your necessitous condition) I invented, by the help of Kitty and Mrs. Gadabout, this little plot, in which your friend Dick there has acted miracles, resolving to tease you a little, that you might have a greater relish for a happy turn in your affairs. Now, Sir, read that letter, and complete your joy.

Gay. [Reads.] Madam, I am father to the unfortunate young man, who, I hear, by a friend of mine (that by my desire has been a continual spy upon him) is making his addresses to you. If he is so happy as to make himself agreeable to you, whose character I am charmed with, I shall own him with joy for my son, and forget his former follies.—I am, madam, your most humble servant,

WILLIAM GAYLESS.

P. S.—I will be soon in town myself to congratulate his reformation and marriage.

Oh, Melissa, this is too much! Thus let me show my thanks and gratitude; for here 'tis only due.

[Kneels; she raises him.]

Sharp. A reprieve! a reprieve! a reprieve!

Kitty. I have been, Sir, a most bitter enemy to you; but since you are likely to be a little more conversant with cash than you have been, I am now, with the greatest sincerity, your most obedient friend, and humble servant.

Gay. Oh, Mrs. Pry, I have been too much indulged with forgiveness myself, not to forgive lesser offences in other people.

Sharp. Well then, Madam, since my master has vouchsafed pardon to your handmaid Kitty, I hope you'll not deny it to his footman Timothy.

Mel. Pardon! for what?

Sharp. Only for telling you about ten thousand lies, Madam; and, among the rest, insinuating that your ladyship would——

Mel. I understand you; and can forgive any thing Sharp, that was designed for the service of your master; and if Pry and you will follow our example, I'll give her a small fortune, as a reward for both your fidelities.

Sharp. I fancy, Madam, 'twould be better to halve the small fortune between us, and keep us both single; for as we shall live in the same house, in all probability we may taste the comforts of matrimony and not be troubled with its inconveniences. What say you, Kitty?

Kitty. Do you hear, Sharp; before you talk of the comforts of matrimony, take the comforts of a good dinner, and recover your flesh a little; do puppy.

Sharp. The devil backs her, that's certain, and I am no match for her at any weapon.

Gay. Behold, Melissa, as sincere a convert as ever truth and beauty made. The wild, impetuous sallies of my youth are now blown over, and a most pleasing calm of perfect happiness succeeds.

[Aside.]

Thus Ætna's flames the verdant earth consume,
But milder heat makes drooping nature bloom;
So virtuous love affords us springing joy,
Whilst vicious passions, as they burn, destroy.

Exeunt.

THE GRECIAN DAUGHTER:

A TRAGEDY,

IN FIVE ACTS.

BY ARTHUR MURPHY.

REMARKS.

This tragedy was produced at Drury Lane in 1772. A picture of the Roman Charity, which Mr. Murphy noticed at the house of a celebrated painter, wherein the centinel bursts into tears at "The pious fraud of charity and love," first suggested the idea to our author.

"Perhaps, of all the events recorded in history, that filial piety, on which the fable of this play is founded, may be classed amongst the most affecting—yet it was one of the most hazardous for a dramatist to adopt; for nothing less than complete skill could have given to this singular occurrence effectual force, joined to becoming delicacy. In this arduous effort, Mr. Murphy has evinced the most exact judgment, and the nicest execution."—Inchbald

SCENE—Syracuse.

ACT I.

SCENE I.

Enter MELANTHON and PHILOTAS.

Mel. Yet, a moment; hear, Philotas, hear me.

Phil. No more; it must not be.

Mel. Obdurate man!

Thus wilt thou spurn me, when a king distress'd,
A good, a virtuous, venerable king,
The father of his people, from a throne,
Which long with every virtue he adorn'd,
Torn by a ruffian, by a tyrant's hand,

Groans in captivity? In his own palace
Lives a sequester'd pris'ner? Oh! Philotas,
If thou hast not renounc'd humanity,
Let me behold my sovereign; once again
Admit me to his presence; let me see
My royal master.

Phil. Urge thy suit no further;
Thy words are fruitless; Dionysius' orders
Forbid access; he is our sov'reign now;
'Tis his to give the law, mine to obey.

Mel. Thou canst not mean it: his to give the law!
Detested spoiler!—his! a vile usurper!

Have we forgot the elder Dionysius;
Surnam'd the Tyrant? To Sicilia's throne
The monster, waded through whole seas of blood,
Sore groan'd the land beneath his iron rod,
Till rous'd at length, Evander came from Greece,
Like freedom's genius came, and sent the tyrant,
Stripp'd of the crown, and to his humble rank
Once more reduc'd, to roam, for vile subsistence,
A wand'ring sophist, through the realms of Greece.

Phil. Whate'er his right, to him in Syracuse
All bend the knee; his the supreme dominion,
And death and torment wait his sovereign nod.

Mel. But soon that power shall cease; behold his walls

Now close encircled by the Grecian bands;
Timoleon leads them on; indignant Corinth
Sends her avenger forth, array'd in terror,
To hurl ambition from a throne usurp'd,
And bid all Sicily resume her rights.

Phil. Thou wert a statesman once, Melanthon;
now,

Grown dim with age, thy eye pervades no more
The deep-laid schemes which Dionysius plans.
Know, then, a fleet from Carthage even now
Stems the rough billow; and, ere yonder sun,
That, now declining, seeks the western wave,
Shall to the shades of night resign the world,
Thou'lt see the Punic sails in yonder bay,
Whose waters wash the walls of Syracuse.

Mel. Art thou a stranger to Timoleon's name?
Intent to plan, and circumspect to see
All possible events, he rushes on Resistless in his course! Your boasted master Scarce stands at bay; each hour the strong blockade

Hems him in closer, and ere long thou'lt view
Oppression's iron rod to fragments shiver'd!
The good Evander then—

Phil. Alas, Evander
Will ne'er behold the golden time you look for!

Mel. How! not behold it! Say, Philotas, speak;
Has the fell tyrant, have his felon murderers—

Phil. As yet, my friend, Evander lives.

Mel. And yet
Thy dark, half-hinted purpose—lead me to him;
If thou hast murdered him—

Phil. By heaven, he lives.

Mel. Then bless me with one tender interview.
Thrice has the sun gone down since last these eyes
Have seen the good old king; say, why is this?
Wherefore debarr'd his presence? Thee, Philotas,
The troops obey, that guard the royal pris'ner;
Each avenue to thee is open; thou
Canst grant admittance; let me, let me, see him.

Phil. Entreat no more; the soul of Dionysius
Is ever wakeful; rent with all the pangs
That wait on conscious guilt.

Mel. But when dost thou night—

Phil. Alas it cannot be: but mark my words.
Let Greece urge on her general assault.

Despatch some friend, who may o'erleap the walls,
And tell Timoleon, the good old Evander
Has liv'd three days, by Dionysius' order,
Lock'd up from every sustenance of nature,
And life now wearied out, almost expires.

Mel. If any spark of virtue dwells within thee,
Lead me, Philotas, lead me to his prison.

Phil. The tyrant's jealous care hath mov'd him thence.

Mel. Ha! mov'd him, say'st thou?

Phil. At the midnight hour,
Silent convey'd him up the steep ascent,

To where the elder Dionysius form'd;
On the sharp summit of the pointed rock,
Which overhangs the deep, a dungeon drear;
Cell within cell, a labyrinth of horror,
Deep cavern'd in the cliff, where many a wretch,
Unseen by mortal eye, has groan'd in anguish,
And died obscure, unpitied and unknown.

Mel. Claudestine murderer! Yes, there's the scene

Of horrid massacre. Full oft I've walk'd,
When all things lay in sleep and darkness hush'd.
Yes, oft I've walk'd the lonely sullen beach,
And heard the mournful sound of many a corpse
Plung'd from the rock into the wave beneath,
That murmurs on the shore. And means he thus
To end a monarch's life? Oh grant my prayer;
My timely succour may protect his days:

The guard is yours—

Phil. Forbear; thou plead'st in vain;
And though I feel soft pity throbbing here,
Though each emotion prompts the gen'rous deed,
I must not yield; it were assur'd destruction.
Farewell, despatch a message to the Greeks;
I'll to my station; now thou know'st the worst.

[Exit.

Mel. Oh, lost Evander! Lost Euphrasia too!
How will her gentle nature bear the shock
Of a dear father, thus in ling'ring pangs
A prey to famine, like the veriest wretch
Whom the hard hand of misery hath grip'd?
In vain she'll rage with impotence of sorrow;
Perhaps provoke her fate: Greece arms in vain;
All's lost; Evander dies!

Enter CALIPPUS.

Cal. Where is the king?
Our troops, that sallied to attack the foe,
Retire disorder'd: to the eastern gate
The Greeks pursue: Timoleon rides in blood,
Arm, arm, and meet their fury.

Mel. To the citadel
Direct thy footsteps: Dionysius there
Marshals a chosen band.

Cal. Do thou call forth
Thy hardy veterans; haste, or all is lost!

[Exit; warlike music.
Mel. Now, ye just gods, now look propitious down;

Now give the Grecian sables tenfold edge,
And save a virtuous king! [Warlike music.

Enter EUPHRASIA.

Euph. War on, ye heroes,
Ye great assertors of a monarch's cause!
Let the wild tempest rage. Melanthon, ha!
Didst thou not hear the vast tremendous roar?
Down tumbling from its base the eastern tower
Burst on the tyrant's ranks, and on the plain
Lies an extended ruin.

Mel. Still new horrors
Increase each hour, and gather round our heads.

Euph. The glorious tumult lifts my tow'ring soul.

Once more, Melanthon, once again, my father
Shall mount Sicilia's throne.

Mel. Alas! that hour
Would come with joy to every honest heart;
But no such hour in all the round of time,
I fear the fates, averse, will e'er lead on.

Euph. And still Melanthon, still does pale despair
Depress thy spirit? Lo! Timoleon comes Arm'd with the power of Greece; the brave, the just,

God-like Timoleon! ardent to redress,
He guides the war, and gains upon his prey.
A little interval shall set the victor
Within our gates triumphant.

Mel. Still my fears Forebode for thee. Would thou hadst left this place,
When hence your husband, the brave Phocion,
fled;

Fled with your infant son!
Euph. In duty fix'd,
Here I remain'd, while my brave, gen'rous Phocion
Fled with my child, and from his mother's arms
Bore my sweet little one. Full well thou know'st
The pangs I suffer'd in that trying moment.
Did I not weep? Did I not rave and shriek,
And by the roots tear my dishevell'd hair?
Did I not follow to the sea-beat shore,
Resolved, with him and with my blooming boy,
To trust the winds and waves?

Mel. The pious act, whate'er the fates intend,
Shall merit heart-felt praise.

Euph. Yes, Phocion, go,
Go with my child, torn from this matron breast,
This breast that still should yield its nurture to
him,

Fly with my infant to some happier shore.
If he be safe, Euphrasia dies content.
Till that sad close of all, the task be mine
To tend a father with delighted care,
To smooth the pillow of declining age,
See him sink gradual into mere decay,
On the last verge of life watch every look,
Explore each fond unutterable wish,
Catch his last breath, and close his eyes in peace.

Mel. I would not add to thy afflictions; yet
My heart misgives; Evander's fatal period—

Euph. Still is far off: the gods have sent relief,
And once again I shall behold him king.

Mel. Alas! those glitt'ring hopes but lend a ray

To gild the clouds, that hover o'er your head,
Soon to rain sorrow down, and plunge you deeper
In black despair.

Euph. The spirit-stirring virtue,
That glows within me, ne'er shall know despair.
No, I will trust the gods. Desponding man!
Hast thou not heard with what resistless ardour
Timoleon drives the tumult of the war?
Hast thou not heard him thund'ring at our gates?
The tyrant's pent up in his last retreat;
Anon thou'll see his battlements in dust,
His walls, his ramparts, and his towers, in ruin;
Destruction pouring in on ev'ry side,
Pride and oppression at their utmost need,
And nought to save him in his hopeless hour.

[Flourish of Trumpets.
Mel. Ha! the fell tyrant comes—Beguile his rage,

And o'er your sorrows cast a dawn of gladness.

Enter DIONYSIUS, CALIPPUS, OFFICERS, &c.

Dion. The vain presumptuous Greek! his hopes of conquest,

Like a gay dream, are vanish'd into air.
Proudly elate, and flush'd with easy triumph
O'er vulgar warriors, to the gates of Syracuse
He urg'd the war, till Dionysius' arm
Let slaughter loose, and taught his dastard train
To seek their safety by inglorious flight.

Euph. O Dionysius, if distracting fears
Alarm this throbbing bosom, you will pardon
A frail and tender sex. Till the fury
Of war subside, the wild, the horrid interval
In safety let me soothe to dear delight
In a lov'd father's presence: from his sight,
For three long days, with specious feign'd excuse
Your guards debarr'd me. Oh! while yet he lives,

Indulge a daughter's love; worn out with age,
Soon must he seal his eyes in endless night,
And with his converse charm my ears no more

Dion. Afflicted fair,
Thy couch invites thee. When the tumult's o'er,
Thou'll see Evander with redoubled joy.
Though now unequal to the cares of empire
His age sequester him, yet honours high
Shall gild the evening of his various day.—
Perdiccas, ere the morn's revolving light
Unveil the face of things, do thou despatch
A well-oar'd galley to Hamilcar's fleet;
At the north point of yonder promontory
Let some select officer instruct him
To moor his ships, and issue on the land.

Then may Timoleon tremble: vengeance then Shall overwhelm his camp, pursue his hands
With fatal havoc to the ocean's margin,
And cast their limbs to glut the vulture's famine,
In mangled heaps upon the naked shore. [Exit

Euph. What do I hear? Melanthon, can it be?
If Carthage comes, if her perfidious sons
List in his cause, the dawn of freedom's gone.

Mel. Woe, bitt'rest woe, impends; thou would'st not think—

Euph. How!—Speak! unfold!

Mel. My tongue denies its office.

Euph. How is my father? Say, Melanthon—

Mel. He,

I fear to shock thee with the tale of horror!
Perhaps he dies this moment.—Since Timoleon
First form'd his lines round this beleaguerr'd city,
No nutriment has touch'd Evander's lips.
In the deep caverns of the rock imprison'd,
He pines in bitterest want.

Euph. Well, my heart,
Well to your vital drops forget to flow!

Mel. Despair, alas! is all the sad resource
Our fate allows us now.

Euph. Yet why despair?
Is that the tribute to a father due?
Blood is his due.

Melanthon, come; my wrongs will lend me force;
The weakness of my sex is gone; this arm
Feels tenfold strength; this arm shall do a deed
For heaven and earth, for men and gods to wonder at!

This arm shall vindicate a father's cause.

[Exeunt.

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A wild romantic scene amidst overhanging Rocks; a Cavern on one side.

Enter ARCAS, with a Spear in his hand.

Arc. The gloom of night sits heavy on the world;

And o'er the solemn scene such stillness reigns,
As 'twere a pause of nature; on the beach
No murmur'ing billow breaks; the Grecian tents
Lie sunk in sleep; no gleaming fires are seen;
All Syracuse is hush'd: no stir abroad,

Save ever and anon the dashing oar,
That beats the sullen wave:—And hark!—Was
that

The groan of anguish from Evander's cell,
Piercing the midnight gloom!—It is the sound
Of bustling prows, that cleave the briny deep.
Perhaps at this dead-hour Hamilcar's fleet
Rides in the bay.

Enter PHILotas, from the Cavern.

Phil. What, ho! brave Arcas! ho!

Arc. Why thus desert thy couch?

Phil. Methought the sound

Of distant uproar chas'd affrighted sleep.

Arc. At intervals the oar's resounding stroke
Comes echoing from the main. Save that report,
A death-like silence through the wide expanse
Broods o'er the dreary coast.

Phil. Do thou retire,

And seek repose; the duty of thy watch
Is now perform'd; I take thy post.

Arc. How fares

Your royal pris'ner?

Phil. Arcas, shall I own

A secret weakness? My heart inward melts
To see that suffering virtue. On the earth,
The cold, damp earth, the royal victim lies;
And, while pale famine drinks his vital spirit,
He welcomes death, and smiles himself to rest.
Oh! would I could relieve him! Thou withdraw;
Thy wearied nature claims repose; and now
The watch is mine.

Arc. May no alarm disturb thee. [Exit.]

Phil. Some dread event is lab'ring into birth.

At close of day the sullen sky held forth
Unerring signals. With disastrous glare
The moon's full orb rose crimson'd o'er with blood;
And, lo! athwart the gloom a falling star
Trails a long tract of fire!—What daring step Sounds on the flinty rock? Stand there; what, ho!

Speak, ere thou dar'st advance. Unfold thy purpose:

Who and what art thou?

Euph. [Behind the scenes.] Thou need'st not fear,

It is a friend approaches.

Phil. Ha! what mean

Those plaintive notes?

Euph. Here is no ambush'd Greek,
No warrior to surprise thee on the watch.
An humble suppliant comes.—Alas, my strength
Exhausted quite forsakes this weary frame.

Phil. What voice thus piercing through the gleam of night—

What art thou? what thy errand? quickly say
What wretch, with what intent, at this dread
hour—

Wherefore alarm'st thou thus our peaceful watch?
[Exit.]

Re-enter PHILotas, with EUPHRASIA.

Euphrasia!—

Why, princess, thus anticipate the dawn?
Still sleep and silence wrap the weary world,
The stars in mid career usurp the pole;
The Grecian bands, the winds, the waves, are hush'd;

All things are mute around us; all but you
Rest in oblivious slumber from their cares.

Euph. Yes, all; all rest: the very murder' sleeps;

Guilt is at rest: I only wake to misery.

Phil. How didst thou gain the summit of the rock?

Euph. Give me my father; here you hold him
fetter'd;

Oh! give him to me;—if ever

The touch of nature throbb'd within your breast,
Admit me to Evander; in these caves
I know he pines in want; let me convey
Some charitable succour to a father.

Phil. Alas! Euphrasia, would I dare comply.

Euph. It will be virtue in thee. Thou, like me, Wert born in Greece:—Oh! in thy our common parent—

Nay, stay; thou shalt not fly; Philotas, stay;

You have a father too; think, were his lot
Hard as Evander's; if by felon hands
Chain'd to the earth, with slow-consuming pangs
He felt sharp want, and with an asking eye
Implor'd relief, yet cruel men deny'd it,
Would'st thou not burst through adamantine gates,
Through walls and rocks, to save him? Think,

Philotas,

Of thy own aged sire, and pity mine.

Think of the agonies a daughter feels,
When thus a parent wants the common food,
The bounteous hand of nature meant for all.

Phil. 'Twere best withdraw thee, princess;
thy assistance

Evander wants not; it is fruitless all;

Thy tears, thy wild entreaties, are in vain.

Euph. Ha!—thou hast murder'd him; he is no more;—

I understand thee;—butchers, you have shed
The precious drops of life; yet, e'en in death,
Let me behold him; let a daughter close
With dutiful hand a father's beamless eyes;
Print her last kisses on his honour'd hand,
And lay him decent in the shroud of death

Phil. Alas! this frantic grief can nought avail.
Retire, and seek the couch of balmy sleep,
In this dead hour, this season of repose.

Euph. And dost thou then, inhuman that thou art,

Advise a wretch like me to know repose?

This is my last abode: these caves, these rocks,
Shall ring for ever with Euphrasia's wrongs;
All Sicily shall hear me; yonder deep
Shall echo back an injur'd daughter's cause;
Here will I dwell, and rave, and shriek, and give
These scatter'd locks to all the passing winds;
Call on Evander lost; and, pouring curses,
And cruel gods, and cruel stars invoking,
Stand on the cliff in madness and despair.

Phil. Yet calm this violence; reflect, Euphrasia,
With what severe enforcement Dionysius
Exact obedience to his dread command.
If here thou'rt found—

Euph. Here is Euphrasia's mansion. [Falls
Her fix'd eternal home;—inhuman savages,
Here stretch me with a father's murder'd corpse.

Phil. By heaven,

My heart in pity bleeds.

Her vehemence of grief o'erpowers me quite.
My honest heart condemns the barb'rous deed,
And if I dare—

Euph. And if you dare!—Is that
The voice of manhood? Honest, if you dare
'Tis the slave's virtue! 'tis the utmost limit
Of the base coward's honour.—Not a wretch,
There's not a villain, not a tool of power,
But, silence interest, extinguish fear,
And he will prove benevolent to man

The gen'rous heart does more : will dare-do all That honour prompts.—How dost thou dare to murder ?

Respect the gods, and know no other fear.

Phil. No other fear assails this warlike breast.
I pity your misfortunes ; yes, by heaven,
My heart bleeds for you. Gods ! you've touch'd
my soul !

The gen'rous impulse is not given in vain.
I feel thee, nature, and I dare obey.

Oh ! thou hast conquer'd.—Go, Euphrasia, go,
Behold thy father.

Yet mark my words ; if aught of nourishment
Thou would'st convey, my partners of the watch
Will ne'er consent.

Euph. I will observe your orders :

On any terms, oh ! let me, let me, see him.

Phil. Yon lamp will guide thee through the cavern'd way.

Euph. My heart runs o'er in thanks ; the pious act

Timoleon shall reward ; the bounteous gods,
And thy own virtue, shall reward the deed.

[Enters the cave.

Phil. Prevailing, powerful virtue !—Thou subduest

The stubborn heart, and mould'st it to thy purpose.
Would I could save them !—But though not for
me

The glorious power to shelter innocence,

Yet for a moment to assuage its woes,

Is the best sympathy, the purest joy,

Nature intended for the heart of man,

When thus she gave the social gen'rous tear.

[Exit.

SCENE II.—The inside of the Cavern.

Enter ARCAS and EUPHRASIA.

Arc. No ; on my life, I dare not.

Euph. But a small,

A wretched pittance ; one poor cordial drop

To renovate exhausted drooping age.
I ask no more.

Arc. Not the smallest store

Of scanty nourishment must pass these walls.

Our lives were forfeit else : a moment's parley

Is all I grant ; in yonder cave he lies.

Evan. [Within the Cell.] Oh, struggling nature ! let thy conflict end.

Oh ! give me, give me, rest.

Euph. My father's voice !

It pierces here ! it cleaves my very heart.

I shall expire, and never see him more.

Arc. Repose thee, princess, here, [Draws a couch] here rest thy limbs,

'Till the returning blood shall lend thee firmness.

Euph. The caves, the rocks, re-echo to his groans !

And is there no relief ?

Arc. All I can grant

You shall command. I will unbar the dungeon,

Unloose the chain that binds him to the rock,

And leave your interview without restraint.

[Opens a Cell in the back scene.

Euph. Hold, hold, my heart ! Oh ! how shall
I sustain

The agonizing scene ? [Rises.] I must behold him ;

Nature, that drives me on, will lend me force,

Is that my father ?

Arc. Take your last farewell.

His vigour seems not yet exhausted quite.

You must be brief, or ruin will ensue. [Exit.

Evan. [Raising himself.] Oh ! when shall I get free ?—These ling'ring pangs—

Despatch me, pitying gods, and save my child !

I burn, I burn ; alas ! no place of rest :

[Comes out.

A little air ; once more a breath of air ;

Alas ! I faint ; I die.

Euph. Heart-piercing sight !

Let me support you, Sir.

Evan. Oh ! lend your arm.

Whoe'er thou art, I thank thee ; that kind breeze

Comes gently o'er my senses—lead me forward :

And is there left one charitable hand

To reach its succours to a wretch like me ?

Euph. Well may'st thou ask it. Oh, my breaking heart !

The hand of death is on him.

Evan. Still a little,

A little onward to the air conduct me ;

'Tis well ;—I thank thee ; thou art kind and good,

And much I wonder at this gen'rous pity

Euph. Do you not know me, Sir ?

Evan. Methinks, I know

That voice ; art thou—alas ! my eyes are dim !

Each object swims before me—No, in truth,

I do not know thee.

Euph. Not your own Euphrasia ?

Evan. Art thou my daughter ?

Euph. Oh, my honour'd sire !

Evan. My daughter, my Euphrasia ! come to close

A father's eyes ! Given to my last embrace !

Gods ! do I hold her once again ? Your mercies
Are without number. [Falls on the couch.

I would pour my praise ;

But, oh, your goodness overcomes me quite !

You read my heart ; you see what passes there.

Euph. Alas, he faints ; the gushing tide of transport

Bears down each feeble sense : restore him, heaven !

Evan. All, my Euphrasia, all will soon be well.
Pass but a moment, and this busy globe,

Its thrones, its empires, and its bustling millions,

Will seem a speck in the great void of space.

Yet while I stay, thou darling of my age !

Nay, dry those tears.

Euph. I will, my father.

Evan. Where—

I fear to ask it, where is virtuous Phocion ?

Euph. Fled from the tyrant's power.

Evan. And left thee here

Expos'd and helpless ?

Euph. He is all truth and honour :

He fled to save my child.

Evan. My young Evander !

Your boy is safe, Euphrasia ?—Oh ! my heart !

Alas ! quite gone ; worn out with misery ;

Oh, weak, decay'd, old man !

Euph. Inhuman wretches !

Will none relieve his want ? A drop of water

Might save his life ; and even that's denied him.

Evan. These strong emotions—Oh ! that eager
air—

It is too much—assist me ; bear me hence ;

And lay me down in peace.

Euph. His eyes are fix'd ;

And those pale quiv'ring lips ! He clasps my hand :

What, no assistance ! Monsters, will you thus

Let him expire in these weak, feeble arms ?

Enter PHILOTAS.

Phil. Those wild, those piercing shrieks, will give th' alarm.

Euph. Support him; bear him hence; 'tis all I ask.

Evan. [As he is carried off.] O death! where art thou? Death, thou dread of guilt,

Thou wish of innocence, affliction's friend,
Thir'd nature calls thee; come, in mercy come.
And lay me pillow'd in eternal rest.

My child, where art thou? give me; reach thy hand;

Why dost thou weep? My eyes are dry—Alas!
Quite parch'd my lips—quite parch'd, they cleave together. [Exeunt.]

Re-enter ARCAS.

Arc. The gray of morn breaks through yon eastern clouds.

'Twere time this interview should end: the hour
Now warns Euphrasia hence: what man could dare,

I have indulg'd—Philotas!—ha! the cell
Left void!—Evander gone!—What may this mean?

Philotas, speak!

Re-enter PHILOTAS.

Phil. Oh, vile, detested lot,
Here to obey the savage tyrant's will,
And murder virtue, that can thus behold
Its executioner, and smile upon him.
That piteous sight!

Arc. She must withdraw, Philotas;
Delay undoes us both. The restless main
Glow with the blush of day. The time requires,
Without her further pause, or vain excuse,
That she depart this moment.

Phil. Arcas, yes;
My voice shall warn her of th' approaching danger. [Exit.]

Arc. Would she had ne'er adventur'd to our guard.

I dread th' event; and hark!—the wind conveys
In clearer sound the uproar of the main.
The fates prepare new havoc; on th' event
Depends the fate of empire. Wherefore thus Delays Euphrasia?—Ha! what means, Philotas,
That sudden haste; that pale disorder'd look?

Re-enters PHILOTAS.

Phil. O! I can hold no more at such a sight,
E'en the hard heart of tyranny would melt
To infant softness. Arcas, go, behold
The pious fraud of charity and love;
Behold that unexampl'd goodness; see
Th' expedient sharp necessity has taught her;
Thy heart will burn, will melt, will yearn to view
A child like her.

Arc. Ha!—Say what mystery
Wakes these emotions?

Phil. Wonder-working virtue!
The father foster'd at his daughter's breast!
O, filial piety!—The milk design'd
For her own offspring, on the parent's lip
Allays the parching fever. All her laws
Inverted quite, great nature triumphs still.

Arc. The tale unmans my soul.

Phil. Ye tyrants, hear it,
And learn, that, while your cruelty prepares
Unheard-of torture, virtue can keep pace

With your worst efforts; and can try new modes
To bid men grow enamour'd of her charms.

Arc. Philotas, for Euphrasia, in her cause
I now can hazard all. Let us preserve
Her father for her.

Phil. Oh! her lovely daring
Transcends all praise. By heaven, he shall not die.

Arc. And yet we must be wary. I'll go forth,
And first explore each avenue around,
Lest the fix'd sentinel obstruct your purpose. [Exit.]

Phil. I thank thee, Arcas; we will act like men
Who feel for others' woes—She leads him forth,
And tremblingly supports his drooping age.

Re-enter EUPHRASIA and EVANDER.

Evan. Euphrasia, oh, my child! returning life
Glow's here about my heart. Conduct me forward!
At the last gasp preserv'd! Ha! dawning light;
Let me behold; in faith, I see thee now;
I do indeed: the father sees his child.

Euph. I have reliev'd him—Oh, the joy's too great;

'Tis speechless rapture!

Evan. Blessings, blessings on thee!

Euph. My father still shall live. Alas! Philotas,

Could I abandon that white, hoary head,
That venerable form?—Abandon him
To perish here in misery and famine?

Phil. Thy tears, thou miracle of goodness!
Have triumph'd o'er me. Take him, take your father;

Convey him hence; I do release him to you.

Evan. What said Philotas? Do I fondly dream?
Indeed, my senses are imperfect; yet
Methought I heard him! Did he say, release me?

Phil. Thou art my king, and now no more my prisoner:
Go with your daughter, with that wondrous part-tern

Of filial piety to after times.

Yes, princess, lead him forth; I'll point the path,
Whose soft declivity will guide your steps
To the deep vale, which these o'erhanging rocks Encompass round. You may convey him thence
To some safe shelter. Yet a moment's pause;
I must conceal your flight from ev'ry eye.

Yes, I will save, or perish in their cause. [Exit.]

Evan. Whither, oh! whither shall Evander go?
I'm at the goal of life; 'in the race
Honour has follow'd with no ling'ring step,
But there sits smiling with her laurel'd wreath
To crown my brow, there would I fain make halt,
And not inglorious lay me down to rest.

Euph. And will you then refuse, when thus the gods
Afford a refuge to thee?

Evan. Oh! my child,
There is no refuge for me.

Euph. Pardon, Sir;
Euphrasia's care has form'd a safe retreat;
There may'st thou dwell; it will not long be wanted.

Soon shall Timoleon, with resistless force,
Burst yon devoted walls.

Evan. Timoleon!

Euph. Yes,

The brave Timoleon with the power of Greece;
Another day shall make the city his.

Evan. Timoleon come to vindicate my rights!
Oh! thou shalt reign in Sicily! my child

Shall grace her father's throne. Indulgent heaven!
Four down your blessings on this best of daughters;

To her and Phocion give Evander's crown;
Let them, oh! let them both in virtue wear it,
And in due time transmit it to their boy!

Re-enter PHILOTAS.

Phil. All things are apt; the drowsy sentinel
Lies hush'd in sleep; I'll marshal thee the way Down the steep rock.

Euph. Oh! let us quickly hence.

Evan. The blood but loiters in these frozen veins.

Do you, whose youthful spirit glows with life,
Do you go forth, and leave this mould'ring corpse.
To me had heaven decreed a longer date,
It ne'er had suffer'd a fell monster's reign,
Nor let me see the carnage of my people.
Farewell, Euphrasia; in one lov'd embrace
To these remains pay the last obsequies,
And leave me here to sink to silent dust.

Euph. And will you then, on self-destruction bent,

Reject my prayer, nor trust your fate with me?

Evan. Trust thee! Euphrasia? Trust in thee, my child?

Though life's a burden I could well lay down,
Yet I will prize it, since bestow'd by thee,
Oh! thou art good; thy virtue soars a flight
For the wide world to wonder at; in thee,
Hear it all nature, future ages hear it,
The father finds a parent in his child. [Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Rampart near the Harbour.

Enter DIONISIUS and Officers.

Dion. Base deserters!
Course on their Punic faith! Did they once dare
To grapple with the Greek? Ere yet the main
Was ting'd with blood, they turn'd their ships averse.

May storms and tempests follow in their rear,
And dash their fleet upon the Libyan shore!

Enter CALIPPUS.

Cal. My liege, Timoleon, where the harbour opens,
Has storm'd the forts, and even now his fleet
Pursues its course, and steers athwart the bay.
Through ev'ry street
Despair and terror fly. A panic spreads
From man to man, and superstition sees
Jove arm'd with thunder, and the gods against us.

Dion. With sacred rites their wrath must be appeas'd.

Let instant victims at the altar bleed;
Let incense roll its fragrant clouds to heaven,
And pious matrons and the virgin train,
In slow procession to the temple bear
The image of their gods.

The solemn sacrifice, the virgin throng,
Will gain the popular belief, and kindle
In the fierce soldiery religious rage.
Away, my friends, prepare the sacred rites.

[Exit CAL.]

Enter PHILOTAS.

Philotas, how fares your prisoner?
Has he yet breath'd his last?

Phil. Life ebbs apace;

To-morrow's sun sees him a breathless corse.

Dion. Curse on his ling'ring pangs! Sicilia's crown

No more shall deck his brow; and if the sand
Still loiter in the glass, thy hand, my friend,
May shake it thence.

Phil. It shall, dread Sir; that task
Leave to thy faithful servant.

Dion. Oh! Philotas,
Thou little know'st the cares, the pangs of empire.
The ermin'd pride, the purple that adorns
A conqueror's breast, but serves, my friend, to hide

A heart that's torn, that's mangled with remorse:
Even victory itself plants anguish here,
And round my laurels the fell serpent twines.

Phil. Would Dionysius abdicate his crown,
And sue for terms of peace?

Dion. Detested thought!

No, though ambition teem with countless ills,
It still has charms of power to fire the soul.
Though horrors multiply around my head,
I will oppose them all. The pomp of sacrifice,
But now ordain'd, is mockery to heaven.

'Tis vain, 'tis fruitless; then let daring guilt
Be my inspirer, and consummate all.

Where are those Greeks, the captives of my sword,
Whose desprate valour rush'd within our walls,
Fought near our person, and the pointed lance
Aim'd at my breast?

Phil. In chains they wait their doom.

Dion. Give me to see 'em; bring the slaves before me.

Phil. What, oh! Melanthon, this way lead your prisoners.

Enter MELANTHON, WITH GREEK SOLDIERS, and PHOCION.

Dion. Assassins, and not warriors! do ye come,
When the wide range of battle claims your sword,
Thus do you come against a single life
To wage the war? did not our buckler ring
With all your darts in one collected volley Shower'd on my head? did not your swords at once

Point at my breast, and thirst for regal blood?

Greek Off. We sought thy life. I am by birth a Greek.

An open foe in arms, I meant to slay
The foe of humankind. With rival ardour
We took the field: one voice, one mind, one heart,
All leagu'd, all covenanted: in yon camp
Spirits there are who aim, like us, at glory.
Whene'er you sally forth, whene'er the Greeks
Shall scale your walls, prepare thee to encounter
A like assault. By me the youth of Greece
Thus notify the war they mean to wage.

Dion. Thus then I warn them of my great revenge.

Whoe'er in battle shall become our pris'n'r,
In torments meets his doom.

Greek Off. Then wilt thou see

How vile the body to a mind that pants
For genuine glory. Twice three hundred Greeks Have sworn, like us, to hunt thee through the ranks;

Ours the first lot; we've fail'd; on yonder plain
Appear in arms, the faithful band will meet thee.

Dion. Vile slave, no more. Melanthon, drag 'em hence

To die in misery. Impall'd alive,

The winds shall parch them on the craggy cliff.
Selected from the rest, let one depart
A messenger to Greece, to tell the fate
Her chosen sons, her first adventurers, met.

[Exit.]
Mel. Unhappy men! how shall my care protect Your forfeit lives? Philotas, thou conduct them
To the deep dungeon's gloom. In that recess,
'Midst the wild tumult of eventful war,
We may ward off the blow. My friends farewell;
That officer will guide your steps.

[All but PHOCION and PHILOTAS.]
Pho. Disguis'd
Thus in a soldier's garb, he knows me not.

Melanthon!

Mel. Ha!—those accents!—Phocion here?
Pho. Yes, Phocion here! speak, quickly tell me, say,

How fares Euphrasia?

Mel. Euphrasia lives, and fills the anxious moments

With every virtue. Wherefore venture hither?
Why with rash valour penetrate our gates?

Pho. Could I refrain? Oh! could I tamely wait

Th' event of ling'ring war? with patience count
The lazy-pacing hours, while here in Syracuse
The tyrant keeps all that my heart holds dear?
For her dear sake all danger sinks before me;
For her I burst the barriers of the gate,
Where the deep cavern'd rock affords a passage.
A hundred chosen Greeks pursu'd my steps:
We forc'd an entrance; the devoted guard
Fell victims to our rage; but in that moment
Down from the walls superior numbers came.
The tyrant led them on. We rush'd upon him,
If we could reach his heart, to end the war.
But heaven thought otherwise. Melanthon, say,
I fear to ask it, lives Evander still?

Mel. Alas! he lives imprison'd in the rock.
Thou must withdraw thee hence; regain once more

Timoleon's camp; alarm his slumb'ring rage;
Assail the walls; thou with thy phalanx seek
The subterraneous path; that way at night
The Greeks may enter, and let in destruction
On the astonish'd foe.

Pho. Would'st thou have me
Basely retreat while my Euphrasia trembles
Here on the ridge of peril?

Mel. Yet hear the voice
Of sober age. Should Dionysius' spies
Detect thee here, ruin involves us all:
Thy voice may rouse Timoleon to th' assault,
And bid him storm the works.

Pho. By heaven, I will;
My breath shall wake his rage; this very night,
When sleep sits heavy on the slumb'ring city,
Then Greece unsheaths her sword, and grant revenge

Shall stalk with death and horror o'er the ranks
Of slaughter'd troops, a sacrifice to freedom!
But first let me behold Euphrasia.

Mel. Hush
Thy pent-up valour: to a secret haunt
I'll guide thy steps: there dwell, and in apt time
I'll bring Euphrasia to thy longing arms.

Pho. Oh! lead me to her; that exalted virtue
With firmer nerve shall bid me grasp the jav'lin, Shall bid my sword, with more than lightning's swiftness

Blaze in the front of war, and glut its rage
With blows repeated in the tyrant's veins.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Temple, with a Monument in the middle.

Enter EUPHRASIA, ERIXENE, and other Female Attendants.

Euph. This way my virgins, this way bend your steps.

Lo! the sad sepulchre, where, hears'd in death,
The pale remains of my dear mother lie.
There, while the victims at your altar bleed,
And with your prayers the vaulted roof resounds,
There let me pay the tribute of a tear,
A weeping pilgrim o'er Eudocia's ashes.

Erix. Forbear, Euphrasia, to renew your sorrows.

Euph. My tears have dried their source; then let me here

Pay this sad visit to the honour'd clay,
That moulders in the tomb. These sacred viands
I'll burn, an off'ring to a parent's shade,
And sprinkle with this wine the hallow'd mould.
That duty paid, I will return, my virgins.

[Goes into the Tomb.]
Erix. Look down, propitious powers! behold that virtue,
And heal the pangs that desolate her soul.

Enter PHILOTAS.

Phil. Mourn, mourn, ye virgins; rend your scatter'd garments;
Some dread calamity hangs o'er your heads.
In vain the tyrant would appease with sacrifice
Th' impending wrath of ill-requested heaven.
Ill omens hover over us: at the altar
The victim dropp'd, ere the diviner seer
Had gor'd his knife. The brazen statues tremble,
And from the marble, drops of blood distil.

Erix. Now, ye just gods, if vengeance you prepare,
Now find the guilty head.

Re-enter EUPHRASIA from the Tomb.

Euph. Virgins, I thank you—Oh! more lightly now

My heart expands; the pious act is done,
And I have paid my tribute to a parent.
Ah! wherefore does the tyrant bend his way?

Phil. He flies the altar; leaves the unfinish'd rites.

No god there smiles propitious on his cause.
Fate lifts the awful balance; weighs his life,
The lives of numbers, in the trembling scale.

Euph. Despair and horror mark his haggard looks,

His wild, disorder'd step—Do you retire.
[To Attendants.]

Retire, Philotas; let me here remain,
And give the moments of suspended fate
To pious worship and to filial love.

Phil. Alas! I fear to yield:—awhile I'll leave
thee,

And at the temple's entrance wait thy coming.
[Exit.]

Euph. Now then, Euphrasia, now thou may'st indulge
The purest ecstasy of soul. Come forth,
Thou man of wo, thou man of every virtue

Enter EVANDER from the Monument.

Evân. And does the grave thus cast me up again

With a fond father's love to view thee? thus
To mingle rapture in a daughter's arms?

Euph. How fares my father now?

Evan. Thy aid, Euphrasia,

Has given new life. Thou from this vital stream
Deriv'st thy being; with unheard-of duty
Thou hast repaid it to thy native source.

Euph. Sprung from Evander, if a little portion
Of all his goodness dwell within my heart,
Thou wilt not wonder. Oh! my father,
How didst thou bear thy long, long sufferings?
how

Endure their barb'rous rage?

Evan. My foes but did

To this old frame, what nature's hand must do.
I was but going hence by mere decay
To that futurity which Plato taught,
But thou recall'st me; thou!

Euph. Timoleon too

Invites thee back to life.

Evan. And does he still Urge on the siege?

Euph. His active genius comes
To scourge a guilty race. The Punic fleet
Half lost is swallow'd by the roaring sea.
The shatter'd refuse seek the Libyan shore,
To bear the news of their defeat to Carthage.

Evan. These are thy wonders, heaven! abroad, thy spirit

Moves o'er the deep, and mighty fleets are vanish'd.

Euph. Ha!—Hark!—what noise is that? It comes this way.

Some busy footstep beats the hollow'd pavement.
Oh! Sir, retire—Ye powers!—Philotas!—ha!

Enter PHILOTAS.

Phil. For thee, Euphrasia, Dionysius calls.
Some new suspicion goads him. At yon gate
I stopp'd Calippus, as with eager haste
He bent this way to seek thee. Oh! my sovereign,
My king, my injur'd master, will you pardon
The wrongs I've done thee?

[Kneels to EVANDER.]

Evan. Virtue such as thine,
From the fierce trial of tyrannic power
Shines forth with added lustre.

Phil. Oh; forgive

My ardent zeal; there is no time to waste.
You must withdraw; trust to your faithful friends.
Pass but another day, and Dionysius
Falls from a throne usurp'd.

Evan. But ere he pays

The forfeit of his crimes, what streams of blood Shall flow in torrents round! Methinks, I might Prevent this waste of nature—I'll go forth,
And to my people show their rightful king.

Euph. Banish that thought; forbear; the rash attempt

Were fatal to our hopes; oppress'd, dismay'd,
The people look aghast, and, wan with fear,
None will espouse your cause.

Evan. Yes, all will dare

To act like men;—their king, I gave myself
To a whole people. I made no reserve;
My life was theirs; each drop about my heart
Pledg'd to the public cause; devoted to it;
That was my compact; is the subject's less?

If they are all debas'd, and willing slaves,
The young but breathing to grow gray in bondage,
And the old sinking to ignoble graves,
Of such a race no matter who is king.
And yet I will not think it; no! my people
Are brave and gen'rous; I will trust their valour.

Euph. Yet stay; yet be advis'd.

Phil. As yet, my liege,

No plan is fix'd, and no concerted measure.
Trust to my truth and honour. Witness, gods,
Here in the temple of Olympian Jove
Philotas swears—

Evan. Forbear: the man like thee,
Who feels the best emotions of the heart,
Truth, reason, justice, honour's fine excitements,
Acts by those laws, and wants no other sanction.

Euph. Again, th' alarm approaches; sure destruction

To thee, to all, will follow:—hark! a sound
Comes hollow murmur'ing through the vaulted aisle.
It gains upon the ear. Withdraw, my father;
All's lost if thou art seen.

Phil. And, lo! Calippus

Darts with the lightning's speed across the aisle.

Evan. Thou at the senate-house convene my friends.

Melanthon, Dion, and their brave associates,
Will show that liberty has leaders still.

Anon I'll meet 'em there: [Exit PHILOTAS.] my child farewell:

Thou shalt direct me now. [Exit into the Tomb.]

Euph. [Coming forward.] How my distracted heart throbs wild with fear!

What brings Calippus? wherefore? Save me, heav'n!

Enter CALIPPUS.

Cal. This sullen musing in these drear abodes
Alarms suspicion: the king knows thy plottings,
Thy rooted hatred to the state and him.
His sov'reign will commands thee to repair
This moment to his presence.

Euph. Ha! what means

The tyrant?—I obey. [Exit CALIPPUS.] And, oh!
ye powers,

Ye ministers of heaven! defend my father;
Support his drooping age; and when anon
Avenging justice shakes her crimson steel,
Oh! be the grave at least a place of rest;
That from his covert, in the hour of peace,
Forth he may come to bless a willing people,
And be your own just image here on earth.

[Exit.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—The Citadel.

Enter DIONYSIUS, CALIPPUS, and others.

Dion. And means the Greek to treat of terms of peace?

By heaven, this panting bosom hop'd to meet
His boasted phalanx on th' embattled plain.
And doth he now, on peaceful councils bent,
Despatch his herald!—Let the slave approach.

Enter HERALD.

Now speak thy purpose; what doth Greece impart?

Her. Timoleon, Sir, whose great renown in arms

Is equal'd to by the softer virtues
Of mild humanity that sway his heart,

Sends me his delegate to offer terms,
On which even foes may well accord; on which
The fiercest nature, though it spurn at justice,
May sympathize with his.

Dion. Unfold thy mystery;
Thou shalt be heard.

Her. The gen'rous leader sees,
With pity sees the wild, destructive havoc
Of ruthless war; he hath survey'd around
The heaps of slain that cover yonder field,
And, touch'd with gen'rous sense of human wo,
Weeps o'er his victories.

Dion. Your leader weeps:
Then let the author of those ills thou speak'st of,
Let th' ambitious factor of destruction,
Timely retreat, and close the scene of blood.
Why doth affrighted peace behold his standard
Uprear'd in Sicily? and wherefore here
The iron ranks of war, from which the shepherd
Retires appall'd, and leaves the blasted hopes
Of half the year, while closer to her breast
The mother clasps her infant?

Her. 'Tis not mine
To plead Timoleon's cause; not mine the office
To justify the strong, the righteous, motives
To urge him to the war: the only scope
My deputation aims at, is to fix
An interval of peace, a pause of horror,
That they, whose bodies on the naked shore
Lie, well'ring in their blood, from either host
May meet the last sad rites to nature due,
And decent lie in honourable graves.

Dion. Go tell your leader his pretences are vain.
Let him, with those that live, embark for Greece;
And leave our peaceful plains; the mangled limbs
Of those he murder'd, from my tender care
Shall meet due obsequies.

Her. The hero, Sir,
Wages no war with those who bravely die.
'Tis for the dead I supplicate; for them
We sue for peace; and to the living too
Timoleon would extend it, but the groans
Of a whole people have unsheath'd his sword.
A single day will pay the funeral rites.
To-morrow's sun may see both armies meet
Without hostility, and all in honour;
You to inter the troops who bravely fell;
We, on our part, to give an humble sod
To those who gain'd a footing on the isle,
And by their death have conquer'd.

Dion. Be it so;
I grant thy suit: soon as to-morrow's dawn
Illumes the world, the rage of warring war
In vain shall thirst for blood: and now farewell.
Some careful officer conduct him forth.

[Exit HERALD.]
By heaven the Greek hath offer'd to my sword
An easy prey; a sacrifice to glut
My great revenge. Away, my friends, disperse.
Philotas, waits Euphrasia as we order'd?

Phil. She's here at hand.
Dion. Admit her to our presence.
Rage and despair, a thousand warring passions,
All rise by turns, and piecemeal rend my heart;
Yet ev'ry means, all measures must be tried,
To sweep the Grecian spoiler from the land,
And fix the crown unshaken on my brow.

Enter EUPHRASIA.

Euph. What sudden cause requires Euphrasia's presence?

Dion. Approach, fair mourner, and dispel thy fears.

Thy grief, thy tender duty to thy father,
Has touch'd me nearly. In his lone retreat,
Respect, attendance, ev'ry lenient care
To soothe affliction, and extend his life,
Evander has commanded.

Euph. Vile dissembler!
Detested homicide! [Aside.] And has thy heart
Felt for the wretched?

Dion. Urgencies of state
Abridg'd his liberty; but to his person
All honour hath been paid.

Euph. The righteous gods
Have mark'd thy ways, and will in time repay
Just retribution.

Dion. If to see thy father,
If here to meet him in a fond embrace,
Will calm thy breast, and dry those beauteous
tears,

A moment more shall bring him to your presence.

Euph. Ha! lead him hither! Sir, to move him
now,

Aged, infirm, worn out, with toil and years—
No, let me seek him rather—if soft pity
Has touch'd your heart, oh! send me, send me,
to him.

Dion. Control this wild alarm; with prudent care

Philotas shall conduct him; here I grant
The tender interview.

Euph. Disasterous fate!
Ruin impends!—This will discover all;
I'll perish first; provoke his utmost rage. [Aside.]
Though much I languish to behold my father,
Yet now it were not fit—the sun goes down;
Night falls apace; soon as returning day—

Dion. This night, this very hour, you both must meet.

Together you may serve the state and me.
Thou seeest the havoc of wide-wasting war;
And more, full well you know, are still to bleed.
Thou may'st prevent their fate.

Euph. Oh! give the means,
And I will bless thee for it.

Dion. From a Greek
Torments have wrung the truth. Thy husband,
Phocion—

Euph. Oh! say, speak of my Phocion.

Dion. He; 'tis he
Hath kindled up this war; with treach'rous arts
Inflam'd the states of Greece, and now the traitor
Comes with a foreign aid to wrest my crown.

Euph. And does my Phocion share Timoleon's glory?

Dion. With him invests our walls, and bids rebellion

Erect her standard here.

Euph. Oh! bless him, gods!
Where'er my hero treads the paths of war,
List on his side; against the hostile jav'lin
Uprear his mighty buckler; to his sword
Lend the fierce whirlwind's rage, that he may come

With wreaths of triumph, and with conquests
crown'd,

And a whole nation's voice
Applaud my hero with a love like mine!

Dion. Ungrateful fair! Has not our sov'reign will

On thy descendants fix'd Sicilia's crown?
Have I not vow'd protection to your boy?

Euph. From thee the crown! From thee!
Euphrasia's children
Shall on a nobler basis found their rights,
On their own virtue, and a people's choice.

Dion. Misguided woman!

Euph. Ask of these protection!
The father's valour shall protect his boy.

Dion. Rush not on sure destruction; ere too late

Accept our proffer'd grace. The terms are these:
Instant send forth a message to your husband;
Bid him draw off his Greeks, unmoor his fleet,
And measure back his way. Full well he knows
You and your father are my hostages;
And for his treason both may answer.

Euph. Think'st thou then
So meanly of my Phocion?—Dost thou deem him
Poorly wound up to a mere fit of valour,
To melt away in a weak woman's tear?
Oh! thou dost little know him; know'st but little
Of his exalted soul. With gen'rous ardour
Still will he urge the great, the glorious plan,
And gain the ever honour'd, bright reward
Which fame entwines around the patriot's brow,
And bids for ever flourish on his tomb,
For nations freed, and tyrants laid in dust.

Dion. By heaven, this night Evander breathes his last.

Euph. Better for him to sink at once to rest,
Than linger thus beneath the gripe of famine,
In a vile dungeon, scoop'd with barb'rous skill
Deep in the flinty rock; a monument
Of that fell malice and that black suspicion
That mark'd your father's reign.

Dion. Obdurate woman! obstinate in ill!
Here ends all parley. Now your father's doom
Is fix'd, irrevocably fix'd.

Euph. Thy doom, perhaps,
May first be fix'd: the doom that ever waits
The fell oppressor, from a throne usurp'd Hurl'd headlong down. Think of thy father's fate

At Corinth, Dionysius!

Dion. Ha! this night
Evander dies; and thou, detested fair!
Thou shalt behold him, while inventive cruelty
Pursues his wearied life through every nerve.
I scorn all dull delay. This very night
Shall sate my great revenge. [Exit.

Euph. This night perhaps
Shall whelm thee down, no more to blast creation.
My father, who inhabit'st with the dead,
Now let me seek thee in the lonely tomb,
And tremble there with anxious hope and fear. [Exit.

SCENE II.—The inside of the Temple.

Enter PHOCION and MELANTHON.

Mel. Summon all
Thy would firmness; in that dreary vault
A living king is number'd with the dead.
I'll take my post, near where the pillar'd aisle
Supports the central dome, that no alarm
Surprise you in the pious act. [Exit.

Pho. If here

They both are found, if in Evander's arms
Euphrasia meets my search, the fates atone
For all my suff'rings, all afflictions past.
Yes, I will seek them—ha!—the gaping tomb
Invites my steps—now be propitious, heaven!
[Enters the Tomb.

Enter EUPHRASIA.

Euph. All hail, ye caves of horror!—In this gloom
Divine content can dwell, the heartfelt tear,
Which, as it falls, a father's trembling hand
Will catch, and wipe the sorrows from my eye.
Who's there?—Evander?—Answer—tell me—speak—

Re-enter PHOCION, from the Tomb.

Pho. What voice is that?—Melanthon!

Euph. Ha! Those sounds—
Speak of Evander; tell me that he lives,
Or lost Euphrasia dies.

Pho. Heart-swelling transport!
Art thou Euphrasia? 'tis thy Phocion, love;
Thy husband comes.

Euph. Support me; reach thy hand.

Pho. Once more I clasp thee in this fond embrace.

Euph. What miracle has brought thee to me?

Pho. Love

Inspir'd my heart, and guided all my ways.

Euph. Oh! thou dear wand'rer! But wherefore here?

Why in this place of wo? My tender little one,
Say, is he safe? oh! satisfy a mother;
Speak of my child, or I grow wild at once.
Tell me his fate, and tell me all thy own.

Pho. Your boy is safe, Euphrasia; lives to reign
In Sicily; Timoleon's gen'rous care
Protects him in his camp; dispel thy fears;
The gods once more will give him to thy arms.

Euph. My father lives, sepulchred ere his time
Here in Eudocia's tomb; let me conduct thee

Pho. I came this moment thence.

Euph. And saw Evander?

Pho. Alas! I found him not.

Euph. Not found him there?

And have they then—have the fell murd'ers—
Oh! [Faints.

Pho. I've been too rash; revive, my love, revive!
Thy Phocion calls; the gods will guard Evander,
And save him to reward thy matchless virtue.

Re-enter MELANTHON, with EVANDER.

Evan. Lead me, Melanthon; guide my aged steps:

Where is he? let me see him.

Pho. My Euphrasia,
Thy father lives;—thou venerable man!
Behold—I cannot fly to thy embrace.

Evan. Euphrasia! Phocion too! Yes, both are here:

Oh! let me thus, thus, strain you to my heart.

Euph. Why, my father,
Why thus adventure forth? The strong alarm
O'erwhelm'd my spirits.

Evan. I went forth, my child,
When all was dark, and awful silence round,
To throw me prostrate at the altar's foot,
And crave the care of heaven for thee and thine.
Melanthon there—

Enter PHILOTAS.

Phil. Inevitable ruin hovers o'er you:
The tyrant's fury mounts into a blaze;
Unsated yet with blood, he calls aloud
For thee, Evander; thee his rage hath order'd
This moment to his presence.

Evan. Lead me to him:
His presence hath no terror for Evander.

Euph. Horror! it must not be.

Phil. No; never, never:

I'll resist rather. His policy has granted
A day's suspense from arms; yet even now
His troops prepare, in the dead midnight hour,
With base surprise, to storm Timoleon's camp.

Evan. And doth he grant a false insidious truce,
To turn the hour of peace to blood and horror?

Euph. I know the monster well: when specious seeming Becalm's his looks, the rankling heart within Seems with destruction;

Mountains hurl'd up in air, and moulten rocks,
And all the land with desolation cover'd.

Mel. Now, Phocion, now on thee our hope depends.

Fly to Timoleon; I can grant a passport:
Rouse him to vengeance; on the tyrant turn
His own insidious arts, or all is lost.

Pho. Evander, thou; and thou, my best Euphrasia,

Both shall attend my flight.

Mel. It were in vain;
Th' attempt would hazard all.

Euph. Together here
We will remain, safe in the cave of death;
And wait our freedom from thy conqu'ring arm.

Evan. Oh! would the gods roll back the stream of time,

And give this arm the sinew that it boasted
At Tauromenium, when its force resistless
Mow'd down the ranks of war; I then might guide

The battle's rage, and, ere Evander die,
Add still another laurel to my brow.

Euph. Enough of laurel'd victory your sword
Hath reap'd in earlier days.

Evan. And shall my sword,
When the great cause of liberty invites,
Remain inactive, unperforming quite?
Youth, second youth, rekindles in my veins:
Though worn with age, this arm will know its office;

Will show that victory has not forgot Acquaintance with this hand.—And yet—O shame!

It will not be: the momentary blaze
Sinks and expires: I have surviv'd it all:
Surviv'd my reign, my people, and myself.

Euph. Fly, Phocion, fly! Melanthon will conduct thee.

Mel. And when th' assault begins, my faithful cohorts

Shall form their ranks around this sacred dome.

Pho. And my poor captive friends, my brave companions

Taken in battle, wilt thou guard their lives?

Phil. Trust to my care: no danger shall assail them.

Pho. By heaven, the glorious expectation swells
This panting bosom! Yes, Euphrasia, yes;
While I leave you to the care of heaven.
Fell Dionysius, tremble! ere the dawn
Timoleon thunders at your gates; the rage,
The pent-up rage, of twenty thousand Greeks,
Shall burst at once; and the tumultuous roar
Alarm the astonish'd world.

Evan. Yet, ere thou go'st, young man,
Attend my words: though guilt may oft provoke,
As now it does, just vengeance on its head,
In mercy punish it. The rage of slaughter
Can add no trophy to the victor's triumph;

Conquest is proud, inexorable, fierce;
It is humanity ennobles all.

Pho. Farewell; the midnight hour shall give you freedom.

[Exit with MELANTHON and PHILOTAS.

Euph. Ye guardian deities, watch all his ways.

Evan. Come, my Euphrasia,

Together we will pour

Our hearts in praise, in tears of adoration,
For all the wondrous goodness lavish'd on us.

[Exeunt.

ACT V.

SCENE I.

Enter DIONYSIUS and CALIPPUS.

Dion. Ere the day clos'd, while yet the busy eye Might view their camp, their stations, and their guards,

Their preparations for approaching night,
Didst thou then mark the motions of the Greeks?

Cal. From the watch-tower I saw them: all things spoke

A foe secure, and discipline relax'd.

Dion. Their folly gives them to my sword: are all

My orders issued?

Cal. All.

Dion. The troops retir'd

To gain recruited vigour from repose?

Cal. The city round lies hush'd in sleep.

Dion. Anon,

Let each brave officer, of chosen valour,
Meet at the citadel. An hour at furthest
Before the dawn, 'tis fix'd to storm their camp;
Haste, Calippus,
Fly to thy post, and bid Euphrasia enter.

[Exit CAL.

Evander dies this night: Euphrasia too
Shall be dispos'd of. Curse on Phocion's fraud,
That from my power withdrew their infant boy.
In him the seed of future kings were crush'd,
And the whole hated line at once extinguish'd.

Enter EUPHRASIA.

Dion. Once more approach and hear me; 'tis not now

A time to waste in the vain war of words.

A crisis big with horror is at hand.

I meant to spare the stream of blood, that soon
Shall deluge yonder plains. My fair proposals
Thy haughty spirit has with scorn rejected.

And now, by heaven! here in thy very sight,
Evander breathes his last.

Euph. If yet there's wanting

A crime to fill the measure of thy guilt,
Add that black murder to the dreadful list;
With that complete the horrors of thy reign.

Dion. Woman, beware: Philotas is at hand,
And to our presence leads Evander. All
Thy dark complottings, and thy treach'rous arts,
Have prov'd abortive.

Euph. Ha!—What new event!
And is Philotas false?—Has he betray'd him?

[Aside.

Dion. What, ho! Philotas.

Enter PHILOTAS.

Euph. How my heart sinks within me!

Dion. Where's your pris'n'er?

Phil. Evander is no more.

Dion. Ha!—Death has robb'd me
Of half my great revenge.

Phil. Worn out with anguish,
I saw life ebb apace. With studied art
We gave each cordial drop, alas! in vain;
He heav'd a sigh; invok'd his daughter's name,
Smil'd, and expir'd.

Dion. Bring me his hoary head.

Phil. You'll pardon, Sir, my over-hasty zeal.
I gave the body to the foaming surge,
Down the steep rock despis'd.

Dion. Now then thou feel'st my vengeance.

Euph. Glory in it;

Exult and triumph. Thy worst shaft is sped,
Yet still the unconquer'd mind with scorn can view thee;

With the calm sunshine of the breast can see
Thy power unequal to subdue the soul,
Which virtue form'd, and which the gods protect.

Dion. Philotas, bear her hence, she shall not live;

This moment bear her hence; you know the rest;
Go, see our will obey'd; that done, with all
A warrior's speed attend me at the citadel;

There meet the heroes whom this night shall lead
To freedom, victory, to glorious havoc,
And the destruction of the Grecian name. [Exit.]

Euph. Accept my thanks, Philotas; gen'rous
man!

These tears attest th' emotions of my heart.

But, oh! should Greece defer—

Phil. Dispel thy fears;

Phocion will bring relief; or, should the tyrant
Assault their camp, he'll meet a marshall'd foe.
Let me conduct thee to the silent tomb.

Euph. Ah! there Evander, naked and disarm'd,
Defenceless quite, may meet some ruffian stroke.

Phil. Lo! here a weapon; bear this dagger to
him.

In the dread monument should hostile steps
Dare to approach him, they must enter singly;
This guards the passage; man by man they die.
There may'st thou dwell amidst the wild commotion.

Euph. Ye pitying gods, protect my father
there! [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—The Citadel.

Enter DIONYSIUS, CALIPPUS, and several Officers.

Dion. Ye brave associates, who so oft have shar'd

Our toil and danger in the field of glory,
My fellow-warriors, what no god could promise,
Fortune has given us. In his dark embrace,
Lo! sleep envelops the whole Grecian camp.
Against a foe, the outcasts of their country,
Freebooters, roving in pursuit of prey,
Success, by war or covert stratagem,
Alike is glorious. Then, my gallant friends, What need of words? The gen'rous call of freedom,

Your wives, your children, your invaded rights,
All that can steel the patriot breast with valour,
Expands and rouses in the swelling heart.
Follow the impulsive ardour; follow me,
Your king, your leader; in the friendly gloom
Of night assault their camp: your country's love
And fame eternal shall attend the men
Who march'd through blood and horror, to redeem
From th' invader's power their native land.

Cal. Lead to the onset; Greece shall find we bear

Hearts prodigal of blood, when honour calls
Resolv'd to conquer or to die in freedom.

Dion. Thus I've resolv'd: when the declining moon

Hath veil'd her orb, our silent march begins.

The order thus: Calippus, thou lead forth
Iberia's sons with the Numidian bands,
And line the shore—Perdiccas, be it thine
To march thy cohorts to the mountain's foot,
Where the wood skirts the valley; there make halt

Till brave Amyntor stretch along the vale.
Ourselves, with the embodied cavalry
Clad in their mail'd cuirass, will circle round
To where their camp extends its farthest line;
Unnumber'd torches there shall blaze at once,
The signal of the charge; then, oh! my friends,
On every side let the wild uproar loose,
Bid massacre and carnage stalk around,
Unsparring, unrelenting; drench your swords
In hostile blood, and riot in destruction.

Enter an OFFICER.

Ha! speak; unfold thy purpose.

Off. Instant arm;

To arms, my liege; the foe breaks in upon us;
The subterraneous path is theirs; that way
Their band invades the city, sunk in sleep.

Dion. Treason's at work; detested, treach'rous villains!

Is this their promis'd truce? Away, my friends,
Rouse all the war: fly to your sev'ral posts,
And instant bring all Syracuse in arms.

[Exeunt; warlike music.]

SCENE III.—The inside of the Temple; a Monument in the middle.

Enter EUPHRASIA, ERIXENE, and Female Attendants.

Euph. Which way, Erixene, which way, my virgins,
Shall we direct our steps? What sacred altar
Clasp on our knees?

Erix. Alas! the horrid tumult
Spreads the destruction wide! On every side
The victor's shouts, the groans of murder'd wretches,

In wild confusion rise. Once more descend
Eudocia's tomb; there thou may'st find a shelter.

Euph. Anon, Erixene, I mean to visit,
Perhaps for the last time, a mother's urn.
This dagger there, this instrument of death,
Should fortune prosper the fell tyrant's arms,
This dagger then may free me from his power,
And that dread vault entomb us all in peace.

[Flourish.]

Erix. Hark!

Euph. The din
Of arms with clearer sound advances. Hark!
That sudden burst! Again! They rush upon us!
The portal opens; lo! see there; behold!
War, horrid war, invades the sacred fane;
No altar gives a sanctuary now. [Warlike music.]

Enter DIONYSIUS and CALIPPUS, with several Soldiers.

Dion. Here will I mock their siege; here stand at bay,

And brave 'em to the last.

Euphrasia here! Detested, treach'rous woman,
For my revenge preserv'd! By heaven, tis well;
Vengeance awaits thy guilt, and this good sword
Thus sends thee to atone the bleeding victims
This night has massacred.

Cal. [Holding Dionysius' arm.] My liege forbear;

Her life preserv'd may plead your cause with Greece,

And mitigate your fate.

Dion. Presumptuous slave!

My rage is up in arms; by heaven, she dies.

Enter EVANDER from the Tomb.

Evan. Horror! forbear! Thou murderer, hold thy hand!

The gods behold thee, horrible assassin!

Restrain the blow; it were a stab to heaven;

All nature shudders at it! Will no friend

Arm in a cause like this a father's hand?

Strike at his bosom rather. Lo! Evander,

Prostrate and grovelling on the earth before thee;

He begs to die; exhaust the scanty drops

That lag about his heart; but spare my child,

Dion. Evander!—Do my eyes once more behold him?

May the fiends seize Philotas! Treach'rous slave!

'Tis well thou liv'st; thy death were poor revenge

From any hand but mine. [Offers to strike.]

Euph. No, tyrant, no;

[Rushing before EVANDER.]

I have provok'd your vengeance; through this bosom

Open a passage; first on me, on me,

Exhaust your fury; every power above

Commands thee to respect that aged head;

His wither'd frame wants blood to glut thy rage;

Strike here; these veins are full; here's blood

enough;

The purple tide will gush to glad thy sight.

[A flourish of trumpets.]

Dion. Ha! the fierce tide of war

This way comes rushing on.

[Exit, with Officers.]

Euph. [Embracing EVANDER.] Oh! thus, my father,

We'll perish thus together.

Dion. [Without.] Bar the gates;

Close ev'ry passage, and repel their force.

Evan. And must I see thee bleed? Oh! for a sword!

Bring, bring, me daggers!

Euph. Ha!

Re-enter DIONYSIUS.

Dion. Guards seize the slave,

And give him to my rage.

Evan. [Seized by the Guards.] Oh! spare her, spare her,

Inhuman villains!

Euph. Now, one glorious effort!

Dion. Let me despatch; thou traitor, thus my arm—

Euph. A daughter's arm, fell monster, strikes the blow.

[Stabs him; he falls and dies.]

Behold, all Sicily, behold!—The point

Glow with the tyrant's blood. Ye slaves, [To the Guards.] look there;

Kneel to your rightful king: the blow for freedom

Gives you the rights of men! And, oh! my father,

My ever honour'd sire, it gives thee life.

Evan. My child; my daughter! sav'd again by thee! [Embraces her.]

A flourish of Trumpets. Enter PHOCION, MELANTHON, &c.

Pho. Now let the monster yield. My best Euphrasia!

Euph. My lord! my Phocion! welcome to my heart.

Lo! there the wonders of Euphrasia's arm!

Pho. And is the proud one fallen? The dawn shall see him

A spectacle for public view. Euphrasia!

Evander too! Thus to behold you both—

Evan. To her direct thy looks; there fix thy praise,

And gaze with wonder there. The life I gave her,

Oh, she has us'd it for the noblest ends!

To fill each duty; make her father feel

The purest joy, the heart dissolving bliss,

To have a grateful child. But has the rage

Of slaughter ceas'd?

Pho. It has.

Evan. Where is Timoleon?

Pho. He guards the citadel; there gives his orders

To calm the uproar, and recall from carnage

His conqu'ring troops.

Euph. Oh! once again, my father,

Thy sway shall bless the land. Not for himself

Timoleon conquers; to redress the wrongs

Of bleeding Sicily the hero comes.

Thee, good Melanthon, thee, thou gen'rous man,

His justice shall reward. Thee too, Philotas,

Whose sympathizing heart could feel the touch

Of soft humanity, the hero's bounty,

His brightest honours, shall be lavish'd on thee.

Evander too will place thee near his throne;

And show mankind, even on this shore of being

That virtue still shall meet its sure reward.

Phil. I am rewarded; feelings such as mine

Are worth all dignities; my heart repays me.

Evan. Come, let us seek Timoleon; to his care

I will commend ye both: for now, alas!

Thrones and dominions are no more for me.

To thee I give my crown: yes, thou, Euphrasia,

Shalt reign in Sicily. And, oh! ye powers,

In that bright eminence of care and peril,

Watch over all her ways; conduct and guide

The goodness you inspir'd; that she may prove,

If e'er Jistress like mine invade the land,

A parent to her people; stretch the ray

Of filial piety to times unborn,

That men may hear her unexampled virtue,

And learn to emulate the Grecian Daughter!

[Exeunt.]

EPILOGUE.

WRITTEN BY DAVID GARRICK, ESQ.

The Grecian Daughter's compliments to all;
Begg that for epilogue you will not call;

For leering, giggling, would be out of season,

And hopes by me, you'll hear a little reason,

A father rais'd from death! a nation sav'd!

A tyrant's crimes by female spirit brav'd!

That tyrant stabb'd, and by her nerveless arm,

While virtue's spell surrounding guards could charm!

Can she, this sacred tumult in her breast,
 Turn father, freedom, virtue, all to jest?
 Wake you, ye fair ones, from your sweet repose,
 As wanton zephyrs wake the sleeping rose?
 Dispel those clouds which o'er your eye-lids crept,
 Which our wise bard mistook, and swore you wept?
 Shall she to macaronies life restore,
 Who yawn'd, half dead, and curs'd the tragic bore?
 Dismiss em smirking to their nightly haunt,
 Where dice and cards their moon-struck minds
 enchant?
 Some, muffled like the witches in Mackbeth,
 Brood o'er the magic circle, pale as death!
 Others the caldron go about—about!
 And ruin enters, as the fates run out.
 Bubble, bubble,
 Toil and trouble,
 Passions burn,
 And bets are double!
 Double, double!
 Toil and trouble,
 Passions burn,
 And all is bubble. ●

But jest apart, for scandal forms these tales;
 Falsehood be mute; let justice hold the scales.
 Britons were ne'er enslav'd by evil powers:
 To peace and wedded love they give the midnight hours.
 From slumbers pure no rattling dice can wake
 'em:
 Who make the laws, were never known to break
 'em.
 'Tis false, ye fair, whatever spleen may say,
 That you down folly's tide are borne away.
 You never wish at deep distress to sneer:
 For eyes, though bright, are brighter through a tear.
 Should it e'er be this nation's wretched fate,
 To laugh at all that's good, and wise, and great;
 Let genius rouse, the friend of humankind,
 To break those spells which charm and sink the
 mind:
 Let comedy, with pointed ridicule,
 Pierce to the quick, each knave and vicious fool:
 Let tragedy—a warning to the times,
 Lift high her dagger at exalted crimes;
 Drive from the heart each base, unmanly passion,
 Till virtue triumph in despite of fashion.

THE MAN OF THE WORLD:

A COMEDY,

IN FIVE ACTS.

BY CHARLES MACKLIN.

REMARKS.

This play was performed in Ireland, 1764, under the title of "The True-born Scotsman," and received the applause due to its great merit. It was not till 1781 that official permission was obtained for its representation in London, where it has ever since eminently increased the delights of the rational and legitimate drama. Mr. Macklin sustained the character of Sir Pertinax Macsycophant, which was considered an unequalled performance, till the appearance in it of the late Mr. Cooke, who is generally thought to have exceeded our author in his delineation of this arduous character.

Mr. Macklin's biographer says:—"Beside the merit of this piece in plot, character, sentiment, and diction, it is critically constructed in respect to the three unities of time, place, and action.—If many of our modern dramatic writers (as they are so pleased to call themselves) would consult this comedy as a model, they would be ashamed of dragging so many heterogeneous characters together, so irrelevant to the general business of the scene, and which give the stage more the appearance of a caricature-show, than a faithful representation of life and manners."

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Library.

Enter BETTY and FOOTMAN.

Bet. The postman is at the gate, Sam; pray step and take in the letters.

Sam. John the gardener is gone for them, Mrs. Betty.

Bet. Bid John bring them to me, Sam; tell him, I'm here in the library.

Sam. I will send him to your ladyship in a crack, Madam. [Exit SAM.]

Enter NANNY.

Nan. Miss Constantia desires to speak to you, Mistress Betty.

VOL. I. . . . G

5

Bet. How is she now, Nanny? Any better?

Nan. Something—but very low spirited still. I verily believe it is as you say.

Bet. Nay, I would take my oath of it; I cannot be deceived in that point, Nanny. Ay, she is certainly breeding, depend upon it.

Nan. Why, so the housekeeper thinks too.

Bet. Oh, if she is not, there is no bread in nine loaves; nay, I know the father, the man that ruined her.

Nan. The deuce you do!

Bet. As sure as you are alive, Nanny, or I am greatly deceived—and yet I can't be deceived neither.—Was not that the cook that came galloping so hard over the common just now?

49

Nan. The same: how very hard he galloped: he has been but three quarters of an hour, he says, coming from Hyde-park-corner!

Bet. And what time will the family be down?

Nan. He has orders to have dinner ready by five. There are to be lawyers, and a great deal of company here—He fancies there is to be a private wedding to-night between our young master Charles, and lord Lumbercourt's daughter, the Scotch lady; who, he says, is just come from Bath, on purpose to be married to him.

Bet. Ay, Lady Rodolpha! nay, like enough, for I know it has been talked of a good while—Well, go tell Miss Constantia that I will be with her immediately.

Nan. I shall, Mrs. Betty.

[Exit.]

Bet. So! I find they all begin to suspect her condition; that's pure: it will soon reach my lady's ears, I warrant.

Enter JOHN, with Letters.

Well, John, ever a letter for me?

John. No, Mrs. Betty; but here's one for Miss Constantia.

Bet. Give it me—hum—My lady's hand.

John. And here is one, which the postman says is for my young master—But it is a strange direction. [Reads] To Charles Egerton, Esq.

Bet. Oh, yes, yes! that is for Master Charles, John; for he has dropped his father's name of Maccyophant, and has taken up that of Egerton. The parliament has ordered it.

John. The parliament! Pr'ythee, why so, Mrs. Betty?

Bet. Why, you must know, John, that my lady, his mother, was an Egerton by her father; she stole a match with our old master. Sir Stanley Egerton, that you just mentioned, dying an old bachelor, and mortally hating our old master, and the whole gang of the Maccyophants—he left his whole estate to master Charles, who was his godson; but on condition though, that he should drop his father's name of Maccyophant, and take up that of Egerton; and that is the reason, John, why the parliament has made him change his name.

John. I am glad that master Charles has got the estate, however; for he is a sweet tempered gentleman.

Bet. As ever lived—But come, John, as I know you love Miss Constantia, and are fond of being where she is, I will make you happy. You shall carry her letters to her.

John. Shall I, Mrs. Betty? I am very much obliged to you. Where is she?

Bet. In the housekeeper's room, settling the dessert.—Give me Mr. Egerton's letter, and I will leave it on the table in his dressing-room.—I see it is from his brother Sandy. So, now go and deliver your letter to your sweetheart, John.

John. That I will; and I am much beholden to you for the favour of letting me carry it to her; for though she would never have me, yet I shall always love her, and wish to be near her, she is so sweet a creature—Your servant, Mrs. Betty.

[Exit.]

Bet. Your servant, John; ha! ha! ha! poor fellow, he perfectly doats on her; and daily follows her about with nosegays and fruit—and the first of every thing in the season—Ay, and my young master, Charles, too, is in as bad a way as the gardener—in short, every body loves her, and that is one reason why I hate her—for my part, I wonder what the deuce the men see in her—A creature that was taken in for charity! I am sure she is not so handsome. I wish she was out of the family once; if she was, I might then stand a chance of being my lady's favourite myself. Ay, and perhaps of getting one of my young masters for a sweetheart, or at least the chaplain—but as to him, there would be no such great catch, if I should get him. I will try for him, however: and my first step shall be to let the doctor know all I have discovered about Constantia's intrigues with her spark at Hadley—Yes, that will do; for the doctor loves to talk with me, and always smiles and jokes with me, and he loves to hear me talk—And I verily believe, he! he! he! that he has a sneaking kindness for me, and this story I know will make him have a good opinion of my honesty—And that, I am sure, will be one step towards—Oh! bless me, here he comes, and my young master with him. I'll watch an opportunity to speak with him, as soon as he is alone; for I will blow her up, I am resolved, as great a favourite, and as cunning as she is. [Exit.]

Enter EGERTON and SIDNEY.

Eger. I have done, Sir. You have refused. I have nothing more to say upon the subject—I am satisfied.

Sid. Come, come, correct this warmth, it is the only weak ingredient in your nature, and you ought to watch it carefully. From your earliest youth, your father has honoured me with the care of your education, and the general conduct of your mind; and however singular and morose his behaviour may be towards others, to me he has ever been respectful and liberal. I am now under his roof too; and because I will not abet an unwarrantable passion, in direct opposition to your father's hopes and happiness, you blame—you angrily break from me, and call me unkind.

Eger. Dear Sidney, for my warmth I stand condemned, but for my marriage with Constantia, I think I can justify it upon every principle of filial duty, honour, and worldly prudence.

Sid. Only make that appear, Charles, and you know you may command me.

Eger. I am sensible how unseemly it appears in a son, to descant on the unamiable passions of a parent; but as we are alone, and friends, I cannot help observing in my own defence, that when a father will not allow the use of reason to any of his family—when his pursuit of greatness makes him a slave abroad only to be a tyrant at home—and when, merely to gratify his own ambition, he would marry his son into a family he detests—sure, Sidney, a son thus circumstanced (from the dignity of human nature, and the feelings of a loving heart) has a right not only to protest against the blindness of the parent, but to pursue those measures that virtue and happiness point out.

Sid. The violent temper of Sir Pertinax, I own, cannot on many occasions be defended; but still your intended alliance with lord Lumbercourt—

Eger. Oh! contemptible! a trifling, quaint, debauched, voluptuous, servile fool; the mere lackey of party and corruption; who, for a mean, slavish, factious prostitution of near thirty years, and the ruin of a noble fortune, has had the despicable satisfaction, and the infamous honour, of being kicked up and kicked down—kicked in and out—just as the insolence, compassion, or the convenience of leaders, predominated; and now—being forsaken by all parties,—his whole political consequence amounts to the power of franking a letter, and the right honourable privilege of not paying a tradesman's bill.

Sid. Well, but dear Charles, you are not to wed my lord, but his daughter.

Eger. Who is as disagreeable for a companion, as her father is for a friend or an ally.

Sid. [Laughing.] What, her Scotch accent, I suppose, offends you?

Eger. No;—upon my honour—not in the least. I think it entertaining in her—but were it otherwise—in decency—and indeed in national affection (being a Scotsman myself) I can have no objection to her on that account—besides, she is my near relation.

Sid. So I understand. But, pray, Charles, how came Lady Rodolpha, who I find was born in England, to be bred in Scotland?

Eger. From the dotage of an old, formal, obstinate, stiff, rich, Scotch grandmother; who upon promise of leaving this grandchild all her fortune, would have the girl sent to her to Scotland, when she was but a year old; and there has she been bred up ever since, with this old lady, in all the vanity, splendour, and unlimited indulgence, that fondness and admiration could bestow on a spoiled child, a fancied beauty, and a pretended wit. And is this a woman fit to make my happiness? this, the partner Sidney would recommend me for life? to you, who best know me, I appeal.

Sid. Why, Charles, it is a delicate point, unfit for me to determine—besides, your father has set his heart upon the match—

Eger. All that I know—But still I ask and insist upon your candid judgment—Is she the kind of woman that you think could possibly contribute to my happiness? I beg you will give me an explicit answer.

Sid. The subject is disagreeable—but since I must speak, I do not think she is.

Eger. I know you do not; and I am sure you never will advise the match.

Sid. I never did—I never will.

Eger. You make me happy—which I assure you I never could be, with your judgment against me in this point.

Sid. But pray, Charles, suppose I had been so indiscreet as to have agreed to marry you to Constantia, would she have consented, think you?

Eger. That I cannot say positively; but I suppose so.

Sid. Did you never speak to her then upon that subject?

Eger. In general terms only: never directly requested her consent in form. But I will this very moment—for I have no asylum from my father's arbitrary design, but by Constantia's arms. Pray do not stir from hence. I will return instantly. I know she will submit to your advice, and I am sure you will persuade her to my wish; as my life, my peace, my earthly happiness, depend on my Constantia. [Exit.]

Sid. Poor Charles! he little dreams that I love Constantia too; but to what degree I knew not myself, till he importuned me to join their hands—Yes, I love, but must not be a rival; for he is as dear to me as fraternal fondness—My benefactor, my friend!

Enter BETTY, running up to him.

Bet. I beg your worship's pardon for my intrusion; I hope I do not disturb your reverence.

Sid. Not in the least, Mrs. Betty

Bet. I humbly beg pardon, Sir;—but [I—I—I wanted to break my mind to your honour about a—a—a scruple—that—that lies upon my conscience—and indeed I should not have presumed to trouble you—but that I know you are my young master's friend, and my old master's friend, and my lady's friend, and indeed a friend to the whole family—for to give you your due, Sir, you are as good a preacher as ever went into a pulpit.

Sid. Ha! ha! ha! do you think so, Mrs. Betty?

Bet. Ay, in troth do I—and as good a gentleman too as ever came into a family, and one that never gives a servant a hard word; nor that does any one an ill turn—neither behind one's back, nor before one's face.

Sid. Ha! ha! ha! Why you are a mighty well-spoken woman, Mrs. Betty; and I am mightily beholden to you for your good character of me.

Bet. Indeed, Sir, it is no more than you deserve, and what all the servants say of you.

Sid. I am much obliged to them, Mrs. Betty. But pray what are your commands with me?

Bet. Why, I will tell your reverence—to be sure I am but a servant, as a body may say; and every tub should stand upon its own bottom—but—

[She takes hold of him familiarly, looking first about very cautiously, and speaks in a low familiar tone of great secrecy.]

My young master is now in the china-room;—in close conference with Miss Constantia. I know what they are about—but that is no business of mine—and therefore I made bold to listen a little, because you know, Sir, one would be sure—before one took away any body's reputation.

Sid. Very true, Mrs. Betty—very true, indeed.

Bet. Oh! heavens forbid that I should take away any young woman's good name, unless I had a reason for it—but, Sir—if I am in this place alive—as I listened with my ear close to the door, I heard my young master ask Miss Constantia the plain marriage question—Upon which I started—I trembled—nay, my very conscience stirred within me so—that I could not help peeping through the keyhole.

Sid. Ha! ha! ha! and so your conscience made you peep through the keyhole, Mrs. Betty!

Bet. It did indeed, your reverence. And there I saw my young master upon his knees—Lord bless us! kissing her hand, as if he would eat it! and protesting and assuring her he knew that your worship would consent to the match. And then the tears ran down her cheeks as fast—

Sid. Ay!

Bet. They did indeed, Sir;—I would not tell your reverence a lie for the world.

Sid. I believe it, Mrs. Betty. And what did Constantia say to all this?

Bet. Oh! oh! she is sly enough—She looks as if butter would not melt in her mouth—but all is not gold that glitters—smooth water, you know, runs deepest. I am sorry, very sorry indeed—my young master makes himself such a fool—but—um!—ha!—take my word for it, he is not the man—for though she looks as modest as a maid at a christening—yet—a—when sweet-hearts meet—in the dusk of the evening—and stay together a whole hour—in the dark grove—and and—aha! embrace—and kiss—and—weep at parting—why then—then you know—ah! it is easy to guess all the rest.

Sid. Why; did Constantia meet any body in this manner!

Bet. Oh! heavens! I beg your worship will not misapprehend me! for I assure you, I do not believe they did any harm—that is, not in the grove—at least, not when I was there—and she may be honestly married, for aught I know—She may be very honest, for aught I know—heaven forbid I should say any harm of her—I only say—that they did meet in the dark walk—and perhaps nine months hence—ay, remember, Sir—I said that—a—certain person in this family—nine months hence—may ask me to stand godmother—only remember—for I think I know what's what—when I see it, as well as another.

Sid. No doubt you do, Mrs. Betty.

Bet. I do indeed, Sir; and so your servant, Sir; [Going, returns.] but I hope your worship will not mention my name in this business;—or that you had any item from me about it.

Sid. I shall not, Mrs. Betty.

Bet. For indeed, Sir, I am no busy body, nor do I love fending or proving—and I assure you, Sir, I hate all titling and tattling—and gossiping, and backbiting—and taking away a person's character.

Sid. I observe you do, Mrs. Betty.

Bet. I do, indeed, Sir;—I am the furthest from it of any person in the world

Sid. I dare say you are.

Bet. I am, indeed, Sir; and so, Sir, your humble servant.

Sid. Your servant, Mrs. Betty.

Bet. So! I see he believes every word I say; that's charming—I will do her business for her, I am resolved.

[Aside: exit.]

Sid. What can this ridiculous creature mean—by her dark walk?—I see envy is as malignant in a paltry waiting wench, as in the vainest, or the most ambitious lady of the court. It is always an infallible mark of the basest nature; and merit, in the lowest as in the highest station, must feel the shafts of envy's constant agents—falsehood and slander.

Enter SAM.

Sam. Sir, Mr. Egerton and Miss Constantia desire to speak with you in the china-room.

Sid. Very well, Sam. [Exit SAM.] I will not see them—what's to be done?—inform his father of his intended marriage!—no;—that must not be—for the overbearing temper and ambitious policy of Sir Pertinax would exceed all bounds of moderation. But this young man must not marry Constantia—I know it will offend him—no matter. It is our duty to offend, when the offence saves the man we love from a precipitate action.—Yes, I must discharge the duty of my function and a friend, though I am sure to lose the man whom I intend to serve.

[Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Library.

Enter EGERTON and CONSTANTIA.

Con. Mr. Sidney is not here, Sir.

Eger. I assure you I left him here, and I beg that he would stay till I returned.

Con. His prudence, you see, Sir, has made him retire; therefore we had better defer the subject till he is present.—In the meantime, Sir, I hope you will permit me to mention an affair that has greatly alarmed and perplexed me. I suppose you guess what it is?

Eger. I do not, upon my word!

Con. That's a little strange—You know, Sir, that you and Mr. Sidney did me the honour of breakfasting with me this morning in my little study.

Eger. We had that happiness, Madam.

Con. Just after you left me, upon my opening my book of accounts, which lay in the drawer of the reading desk, to my great surprise—I there found this case of jewels, containing a most elegant pair of ear-rings, a necklace of great value, and two bank-bills, in this pocket-book; the mystery of which, Sir, I presume you can explain.

Eger. I can.

Con. They were of your conveying, then?

Eger. They were, Madam.

Con. I assure you, they startled and alarmed me.

Eger. I hope it was a kind alarm, such as blushing virtue feels, when with her hand she gives her heart—and last consent.

Con. It was not, indeed, Sir.

Eger. Do not say so, Constantia—come, be kind at once; my peace and worldly bliss depend upon this moment.

Con. What would you have me do?

Eger. They love and virtue dictate.

Con. Oh! Sir—experience but too severely proves that such unequal matches as ours never produced aught but contempt and anger in parents, censure from the world—and a long train of sorrow and repentance in the wretched parties, which is but too often entailed upon their hapless issue.

Eger. But that, Constantia, cannot be our condition; for my fortune is independent and ample, equal to luxury and splendid folly; I have the right to choose the partner of my heart.

Con. But I have not, Sir—I am a dependent on my lady—a poor, forsaken, helpless orphan. Your benevolent mother found me, took me to her bosom, and there supplied my parental loss with every tender care, indulgent dalliance, and with all the sweet persuasion that maternal fondness, religious precept, polished manners, and hourly example, could administer. She fostered me; [Weeps]; and shall I now turn viper, and with black ingratitude sting the tender heart that thus has cherished me? Shall I seduce her house's heir, and kill her peace? No—though I loved to the mad extreme of female fondness; though every worldly bliss that woman's vanity or man's ambition could desire, followed the indulgence of my love, and all the contempt and misery of this life the denial of that indulgence, I would discharge my duty to my benefactress, my earthly guardian, my more than parent.

Eger. My dear Constantia! Your prudence, your gratitude, and the cruel virtue of your self-denial, do but increase my love, my admiration, and my misery.

Con. Sir, I must beg you will give me leave to return these bills and jewels.

Eger. Pray do not mention them; sure my kindness and esteem may be indulged so far, without suspicion and reproach—I beg you will accept of them; nay, I insist—

Con. I have done, Sir,—my station here is to obey—I know they are gifts of a virtuous mind, and mine shall convert them to the tenderest and most grateful use.

Eger. Hark! I hear a carriage—it is my father; dear girl, compose yourself—I will consult Sidney and my lady: by their judgment we will be directed;—will that satisfy you?

Con. I can have no will but my lady's; with your leave, I will retire—I would not see her in this confusion.

Eger. Dear girl, adieu! [Exit CONSTANTIA.]

Enter SAM.

Sam. Sir Pertinax and my lady are come, Sir; and my lady desires to speak with you in her own room—Oh! she is here, Sir. [Exit SAM.]

Enter LADY MACSCOPHANT.

Lady M. Dear child I am glad to see you: why did you not come to town yesterday, to attend the levee—your father is incensed to the uttermost at your not being there.

Eger. Madam, it is with extreme regret I tell you, that I can no longer be a slave to his temper, his politics, and his scheme of marrying me to this woman. Therefore you had better consent at once to my going out of the kingdom, and to my taking Constantia with me; for, without her, I never can be happy.

Lady M. As you regard my peace, or your own character, I beg you will not be guilty of so rash a step—you promised me, you would never marry her without my consent. I will open it to your father: pray, dear Charles, be ruled—let me prevail.

Eger. Madam, I cannot marry this lady.

Lady M. Well, well; but do not determine. First patiently hear what your father and Lord Lumbarcourt have to propose, and let them try to manage this business for you with your father—pray do, Charles.

Eger. Madam, I submit.

Lady M. And while he is in this ill humour, I beg you will not oppose him, let him say what he will; when his passion is a little cool, I will try to bring him to reason—but pray do not thwart him.

Sir P. [Without.] Haud your gab, ye scoundrel, and do as you are bid. 'Zounds! ye are so full of your gab. Take the chesnut gelding, return to town, and inquire what is become of my lord.

Lady M. Oh! here he comes, I'll get out of the way. [Exit.]

Sir P. [Without.] Here you, Tomlins.

Tom. [Without.] Sir.

Sir P. [Without.] Where is my son Egerton?

Tom. [Without.] In the library, Sir Pertinax.

Sir P. [Without.] Vary weel, the instant the lawyers come, let me ken it.

Enter SIR PERTINAX.

Sir P. Vary weel—Vary weel—ah, ye are a fine fellow—what have ye to say for yourself—are not ye a fine spark? are ye not a fine spark, I say?—ah! you're a—so you would not come up till the levee?

Eger. Sir, I beg your pardon—but—I—I—I was not very well;—besides—I did not think that—that my presence there was necessary.

Sir P. Sir, it was necessary—I tauld ye it was necessary—and, Sir—I must now tell ye, that the whole tenor of your conduct is most offensive.

Eger. I am sorry you think so, Sir. I am sure I do not intend to offend you.

Sir P. [In anger.] I care not what ye intend—Sir, I tell ye, ye do offend—What is the meaning of this conduct?—neglect the levee!—Sdeath! Sir, your—what is your reason, I say, for thus neglecting the levee, and disobeying my commands?

Eger. Sir, I own—I am not used to levees;—nor do I know how to dispose of myself—nor what to say or do, in such a situation.

Sir P. 'Zounds, Sir! do you not see what others do? gentle and simple; temporal and spiritual; lords, members, judges, generals, and bishops? aw crowding, bustling, pushing foremost intill the middle of the circle, and there waiting, watching, and striving to catch a look or a smile fra the great mon; which they meet with an amicable risibility of aspect—a modest cadence of body—and a conciliating co-operation of the whole mon;—which expresses an officious promptitude for his service, and indicates—that they loock upon themselves as the suppliant appendages of his power, and the enlisted Swiss of his poetical fortune—this, Sir, is what ye ought to do—and this, Sir, is what I never once omitted for these five-and-thirty years—let wha would be meenister.

Eger. [Aside.] Contemtable!

Sir P. What is it that ye mutter, Sir?

Eger. Only a slight reflection, Sir; and not relative to you.

Sir P. Sir, your absenting yourself fra the levee at this juncture is suspicious—it is loocked upon as a kind of disaffection; and aw your countrymen are highly offended with your conduct: for, Sir, they do not loock upon ye as a friend or a weel wisher either to Scotland or Scotsmen.

Eger. Then, Sir, they wrong me, I assure you; but pray, Sir, in what particular can I be charged either with coldness or offence to my country?

Sir P. Why, Sir, ever since your mother's uncle, Sir Stanley Egerton, left ye this three thousand pounds a year, and that ye have, in compliance with his will, taken up the name of Egerton, they think ye are grown proud—that ye have estranged yourself fra the Macscophants—have associated with your mother's family—with the opposition—and with those, again I must tell you, wha do not wish weel till Scotland—besides, Sir, in a conversation the other day, after dinner, at your cousin Campbell Mackenzie's, before a whole table full of your ain relations, did ye not publicly wish—a total extinguishment of aw party, and of aw national distinctions whatever, relative to the three kingdoms. And, ye blockhead—was that a prudent wish—before sae many of your own countrymen, and be damned to ye? Or, was it a filial language to hold before me?

Eger. Sir, with your pardon—I cannot think it unfilial, or imprudent; I own I do wish—most ardently wish, for a total extinction of all parties—particularly that of English, Irish, and Scotch, might never more be brought into contest, or competition; unless, like loving brothers, in generous emulation for one common cause.

Sir P. How, Sir; do ye persist?—what, would ye banish aw party—and aw distinction betwaxt English, Irish, and your ain countrymen?

Eger. I would, Sir.

Sir P. Then damme, Sir—ye are nae true Scot. Ay, Sir, ye may loock as angry as ye will; but again I say—ye are nae true Scot.

Eger. Your pardon, Sir, I think he is the true Scot, and the true citizen, who wishes equal justice to the merit and demerit of every subject of Great Britain.—Amongst whom, Sir, I know but of two distinctions.

Sir P. Weel, Sir, and what are those? what are those?

[Impatiently.]
Eger. The knave and—and the honest man.

Sir P. Pshaw! redeeculous!

Eger. And he who makes any other—let him be of the north or of the south, of the east or of the west, in place or out of place—is an enemy to the whole, and to the virtues of humanity.

Sir P. Ay, Sir! this is your brother's impudent doctrine—for the which I have banished him for ever fra my presence, my heart, and my fortune—Sir, I will have nae son of mine, because truly he has been educate in the English university, presume to speak against his native land—or against my principles. Sir, Scotsmen—Scotsmen, Sir—wherever they meet throughout the globe—should unite and stick together, as it were, in a poeetical phalanx. However—nae mair of that now, I will talk at large till ye about that business anon; in the meantime, Sir, notwithstanding your contempt of my advice, and your disobedience till my commands, I wou'd convince ye of my paternal attention till your welfare, by my management with this voluptuary—this Lord Lumbercourt, whose daughter ye are to marry:—ye ken, Sir, that the fellow has been my patron above these five-and-thirty years.

Eger. True, Sir.

Sir P. Vary weel—and now, Sir, you see by his prodigality he is become my dependant; and accordingly I have made my bargain with him—the deal a bawbee he has in the world but what comes through these clutches; for his whole estate, which has three implectic boroughs upon it—mark—is now in my custody at nurse; the which estate, on my paying off his debts, and allowing him a life-rent of seven thousand per annum, is to be made over till me for my life; and at my death is to descend till ye and your issue—the peerage of Lumbercourt, you ken, will follow of course—so, Sir, you see there are three implectic boroughs, the whole patrimony of Lumbercourt, and a peerage, at one slap—why it is a stroke—a hit—a hit—a capital hit, mon. Zounds! Sir, a man may live a century, and not make sic another hit again!

Eger. It is a very advantageous bargain, no doubt, Sir; but what will my lord's family say to it?

Sir P. Why, mon, he cares not if his family were aw at the deul, so his luxury be but gratified—only let him have his race-horse, till feed his vanity; his polite blacklegs, to advise him in his matches on the turf, cards, and tennis; his harridan, till drink drams wi' him, scrat his face, and burn his periwig, when she is in her maudlin hysterics—the fellow has aw that he wants, and aw that he wishes, in this world—

Enter TOMLINS.

Tom. Lady Rodolpha is come, Sir.

Sir P. And my lord?

Tom. No, Sir, he is about a mile behind, the servant says.

Sir P. Let me know the instant he arrives.

Tom. I shall, Sir.

[Exit.]

Sir P. Step ye oot, Charles, and receive Lady Rodolpha. And I desire, Sir, ye wou'd treat her with ass much respect and gallantry ass possible—for my lord has hinted that ye have been very remiss ass a lover. Adzooks, Charles! ye should admeenister a whole torrent o' flattery till her; for a woman ne'er thinks a man loves her, till he has made an idiot of her understanding by flattery; flattery is the prime bliss o' the sex, the nectar and ambrosia o' their charms; and ye can ne'er gi'e them o'er muckle of it: sae, there's a guid lad, gang and mind yeer flattery. [Exit EGERTON.]
Hah! I must keep a tight hand upon this fellow, I see. I'm frightened oot o' my wits lest his mother's family should seduce him to their party, which would ruin my whole scheme, and break my heart. A fine time o' day indeed for a block-head to turn patriot—when the character is exploded, marked, proscribed; why, the common people, the very vulgar, have found out the jest, and laugh at a patriot now-a-days, just as they do at a conjurer, a magician, or any other impostor in society.

Enter TOMLINS and LORD LUMBERCOURT.

Tom. Lord Lumbercourt.

[Exit.]

Lord L. Sir Pertinax, I kiss your hand.

Sir P. Your lordship's most devoted—I rejoice to see you.

Lord L. You stole a march upon me this morning!—gave me the slip, Mac; though I never wanted your assistance more in my life. I thought you would have called upon me.

Sir P. My dear lord, I beg ten millions of pardons, for leaving town before you—but ye ken that your lordship at dinner yesterday settled that we should meet this morning at the levee?

Lord L. That I acknowledge, Mac—I did promise to be there, I own—but—

Sir P. You did, indeed—and accordingly I was at the levee; and waited there till every mortal was gone, and seeing you did na come, I concluded that your lordship was gone before.

Lord L. To confess the truth, my dear Mac, that old sinner, Lord Freakish, General Jolly, Sir Anthony Soaker, and two or three more of that set, laid hold of me last night at the opera; and, as the General says, I believe, by the intelligence of my head this morning—ha! ha! ha! we drank deep ere we departed—ha! ha! ha! and—

Sir P. Ha! ha! ha! nay, if you were with that party, my lord, I don't wonder at not seeing your lordship at the levee!

Lord L. The truth is, Sir Pertinax, my fellow let me sleep too long for the levee. But I wish I had seen you before you left town—I wanted you dreadfully.

Sir P. I am heartily sorry that I was not in the way; but on what account, my lord, did you want me?

Lord L. Ha! ha! ha! a cursed awkward affair—and—ha! ha! yet I cannot help laughing at it neither; though it vexed me confoundedly.

Sir P. Vexed you, my lord—I wish I had been wi' ye then; but for heaven's sake, my lord, what was it that could possibly vex your lordship?

Lord L. Why, that impudent, teasing, dunning rascal, Mahogany, my upholsterer—you know the fellow!

Sir P. Perfectly, my lord.

Lord L. The impudent scoundrel has sued me up to some infernal kind of a—something or other, in the law, which I think they call an execution!

Sir P. The rascal!

Lord L. Upon which, Sir, the fellow—ha! ha! ha! I cannot help laughing at it—by way of asking pardon, ha! ha! ha! had the modesty to wait on me two or three days ago—to inform my honour, ha! ha! ha! as he was pleased to dignify me—that the execution was now ready to be put in force against my honour, ha! ha! ha!—but that, out of respect to my honour, as he had taken a great deal of my honour's money, he would not suffer his lawyer to serve it—till he had first informed my honour—because he was not willing to affront my honour! ha! ha! ha!—a son of a whore!

Sir P. I never heard of so impudent a dog.

Lord L. Now, my dear Mac! ha! ha! as the scoundrel's apology was so very satisfactory, and his information so very agreeable to my honour—I told him, that in honour I could not do less than to order his honour to be paid immediately.

Sir P. Ha! ha! ha!—vary weel—ye were as complaisant ass the scoundrel till the full, I think, my lord.

Lord L. Ha! ha! ha! to the full; but you shall hear—you shall hear, Mac—so, Sir, with great composure, seeing a smart oaken cudgel, that stood very handily in a corner of my dressing-room—I ordered two of my fellows to hold the rascal, and another to take the cudgel, and return the scoundrel's civility with a good drubbing, as long as the stick lasted!

Sir P. Ha! ha! ha! admirable! as gude a stroke of humour as ever I heard of—and did they drub him soundly, my lord?

Lord L. Oh! most liberally, ha! ha! ha! most liberally; and there I thought the affair would have rested, till I should think proper to pay the scoundrel—but this morning, Sir, just as I was stepping into my chaise—my servants all about me—a fellow, called a tip-staff, stepped up, and begged the favour of my footman, who thrashed the upholsterer, and the two that held him, to go along with him upon a little business to my lord chief justice.

Sir P. The devil!

Lord L. And at the same instant I, in my turn, was accosted by two other very civil scoundrels, who, with a most insolent politeness, begged my pardon, and informed me, that I must not go into my own chaise!

Sir P. How, my lord! not intill your ain carriage!

Lord L. No, Sir—for that they, by order of the sheriff, must seize it, at the suit of a gentleman—one Mr. Mahogany, an upholsterer.

Sir P. An impudent villain!

Lord L. It is all true, I assure you; so you see, my dear Mac, what a damned country this is to live in, where noblemen are obliged to pay their debts, just like merchants, cobblers, peasants, or mechanics.—Is not that a scandal, dear Mac, to a nation.

Sir P. My lord, it is not only a scandal, but a national grievance.

Lord L. Sir, there is not another nation in the world that has such a grievance to complain of. But what concerns me most, I am afraid, my dear

Mac, that the villain will send down to Newmarket, and seize my string of horses.

Sir P. Your string of horses! We must prevent that, at all events:—that would be such a disgrace, I will despatch an express to town directly, to put a stop till the scoundrel's proceedings.

Lord L. Pr'ythee do, my dear Sir Pertinax.

Sir P. Oh! it shall be done, my lord.

Lord L. Thou art an honest fellow, Sir Pertinax, upon honour.

Sir P. Oh, my lord: 'tis my duty to oblige your lordship to the very utmost stretch of my abeefity.

Enter TOMLINS.

Tom. Colonel Toper presents his compliments to you, Sir, and having no family down with him in the country—he and captain Hardbottle, if not inconvenient, will do themselves the honour of taking a family dinner with you.

Sir P. They are two of our militia officers: does your lordship know them?

Lord L. By sight only.

Sir P. I am afraid, my lord, they will interrupt our business.

Lord L. Ha! ha! ha! not at all—not at all—ha! ha! ha! I should like to be acquainted with Toper, they say he is a fine jolly fellow!

Sir P. Oh! very jolly, and very clever. He and the captain, my lord, are reckoned two of the hardest drinkers in the country.

Lord L. Ha! ha! ha! so I have heard—let us have them by all means, Mac; they will enliven the scene—how far are they from you!

Sir P. Just across the meadows—not half a mile, my lord—a step—a step.

Lord L. Oh, let us have the jolly dogs, by all means!

Sir P. My compliments, I shall be proud of their company. [Exit TOMLINS.] Gif ye please, my lord, we wull gang and chat a bit wi' the women. I have not seen lady Rodolpha since she returned fra the Bath; I long to have a little news from her about the company there.

Lord L. Oh! she'll give you an account of them, I'll warrant you. [A very loud laugh without.] Here the hairbrain comes! it must be her by her noise.

Lady R. [Without.] Allons! gude folks—follow me—sans ceremonie!

Enter LADY RODOLPHA, LADY MACSYCOPHANT, EGERTON, and SIDNEY.

Lady R. [Running up to SIR PERTINAX.] Sir Pertinax,—your most devoted—most obsequious, and most obedient vassal. [Courtesies very low.]

Sir P. Lady Rodolpha—down till the ground my congratulations, duty, and affection, sincerely attend your ladyship. [Bowing ridiculously low.]

Lady R. Oh! Sir Pertinax—your humeility is most sublimely complaisant—at present unanswerable—but, Sir, I shall intensely study to return it [Courtesies very low.] fatty fold.

Sir P. Weel, Madam, ha! you luock gaily weel—and how—how is your ladyship after your jaunt till the Bath?

Lady R. Never better, Sir Pertinax—as well as youth, health, riotous spirits, and a careless, happy heart can make me.

Sir P. I am mighty glad till hear it, my lady.

Lord L. Ay, ay,—Rodolpha is always in spirits; Sir Pertinax, Vive la bagatelle, is the philosophy of our family, ha!—Rodolpha,—ha!

Lady R. Traith is it, my lord: and upon honour, I am determin'd it never shall be changed by my consent—weel I vow—ha! ha! ha! ha! ha! Vive la bagatelle would be a most brilliant motto for the chariot of a belle of fashion—what say ye till my fancy, Lady Maccycophant?

Lady M. It would have novelty at least to recommend it, Madam.

Lady R. Which of aw charms is the most delightful that can accompany wit, taste, love, or friendship—for novelty, I take to be the true je ne sçai quoi of all wordly bliss. Cousin Egerton, should not you like to have a wife with Vive la bagatelle upon her wedding chariot?

Eger. Oh! certainly, Madam.

Lady R. Yes—I think it would be quite out of the common, and singularly ailgant.

Eger. Indisputably, Madam—for, as a motto is a word to the wise, or rather a broad hint to the whole world, of a person's taste and principles, Vive la bagatelle would be most expressive, at first sight, of your ladyship's characteristic!

Lady R. Oh, Maister Egerton! you touch my very heart wi' your approbation—ha! ha! ha! that is the vary spirit of my intention, the instant I commence bride. Well, I am immensely proud that my fancy has the approbation of so sound an understanding—so sublime a genius—and so polished, nay, so exquisite a taste, as that of the all-accomplish'd Mr. Egerton.

Sir P. But, Lady Rodolpha, I wish, till ask your ladyship some questions about the company at Bath; they say ye had aw the world there.

Lady R. O, yes!—there was a vary great mob indeed; but vary little company: aw canaille—except our ain party; the place was quite crowded wi' your little purseprood mechanics—an odd kind of queer luocking animals, that ha'e started intill fortunes fra lottery tickets, rich prizes at sea, gambling in Change Alley, and sic like caprices of fortune, and away they aw crood till the Bath, to larn genteelity, and the names, titles, intrigues, and bon mots of us people of fashion—ha! ha! ha!

Omnes. Ha! ha! ha!

Lord L. Ha! ha! ha! I know them—I know the things you mean, my dear, extremely well. I have observed them a thousand times; and wonder'd where the devil they all came from! ha! ha! ha!

Lady M. Pray, Lady Rodolpha, what were your diversions at Bath?

Lady R. Gude faith, my lady, the company were my diversion—and better nae human follies ever afford'd—ha! ha! ha! sic an a maxture—and sic oddits, ha! ha! ha! a perfect gallimowfry! ha! ha! ha! Lady Kunigunda Mackenzie and I used to gang about till every part of this human chaos, ha! ha! on purpose till reconnoitre the monsters, and pick up their frivolities, ha! ha! ha! ha!

Omnes. Ha! ha! ha!

Sir P. Ha! ha! ha! why, that must have been a high entertainment till your ladyship!

Lady R. Superlative, and inexhaustible, Sir Pertinax: ha! ha! ha! Madam, we had in yane group a peer and a sharper—a duchess and a pin-maker's wife—a boarding-school miss and her grandmother—a fat parson, a lean general, and a yellow admiral—ha! ha! all speaking together, and bawling, and fretting, and fuming, and wrangling, and retorting in fierce contention, as if the fame, and the fortune, of aw the parties, were till be the issue of the conflict.

Sir P. Ha! ha! ha! Pray, Madam, what was the object of their furious contantion?

Lady R. Oh! a vary important one, I assure you, Sir Pertinax; of no less consequence, Madam, than how an odd trick at whist was lost, or might have been saved!

Omnes. Ha! ha! ha!

Lady R. In another party, Sir Pertinax, we had what was call'd the cabinet council; which was compos'd of a duke and a haberdasher—a red hot patriot and a sneering courtier—a discard'd statesman and his scribbling chaplain—wi' a busy bawling, muckle-headed, prerogative lawyer—All of whom were every minute ready to gang together by the lugs, about the in and the oot meenistry: ha! ha! ha!

Omnes. Ha! ha! ha!

Sir P. Ha! ha! ha! weel, that was a droll, motley cabinet, I vow. Vary whimsical, upon honour; but they are all great politeecians at Bath, and settle a meenistry there with ass much ease as they do a tune for a country dance!

Lady R. Then, Sir Pertinax, in a retired part of the room—snug—in a by-corner—in close conference, we had a Jew and a beeshop.

Sir P. A Jew and a beeshop! ha! ha! a devilish gude connexion that; and pray, my lady, what were they about?

Lady R. Why, Sir, the beeshop was striving to convert the Jew; while the Jew, by intervals, was sliely picking up intelligence fra the beeshop, about the change in the meenistry, in hopes of making a stroke in the stocks.

Omnes. Ha! ha! ha!

Sir P. Ha! ha! ha! admirable, admirable, I honour the smouse—hah!—it was deevilish clever of him, my lord, deevilish clever, the Jew distilling the beeshop's brains.

Lord L. Yes, yes, the fellow kept a sharp look out; I think it was a fair trial of skill on both sides, Mr. Egerton.

Eger. True, my lord; but the Jew seems to have been in the fairer way to succeed.

Lord L. Oh! all to nothing, Sir: ha! ha! ha! Well, child, I like your Jew and your bishop much—it is monstrous clever, let us have the rest of the history, pray, my dear.

Lady R. Gude traith, my lord, the sum total is, that there we aw danced, and wrangled, and flattered, and slandered, and gambled, and cheated, and mingled, and jumbled—

Omnes. Ha! ha! ha!

Lord L. Well, you are a droll girl, Rodolpha, and upon honour, ha! ha! ha!—you have given us as whimsical a sketch as ever was hit off. What say you, Mr. Sidney?

Sid. Upon my word, my lord, the lady has made me see the whole assembly at Bath, in glaring, pleasing, distinct colours!

Lady R. O, dear Maister Sidney, your approbation makes me as vain as a reigning toast at her looking-glass.

Enter TOMLINS.

Tom. Colonel Toper and Captain Hardbottle are come, Sir.

Sir P. O, vary weel! dinner immediately.

Tom. It is ready, Sir. [Exit TOMLINS.]

Sir P. My lord, we attend your lordship.

Lord L. Lady Mac, your ladyship's hand, if you please. [He leads her out.]

Sir P. Lady Rodolpha, here is an Arcadian swain, that has a hand at your ladyship's devotion!

Lady R. And I, Sir Pertinax, ha'e yane at his — [Gives her hand to EGERTON.] there, Sir,—as to hearts—ye ken, cousin, they are nae brought into the account o' human dealings now-a-days.

Eger. Oh! Madam, they are mere temporary baubles, especially in courtship; and no more to be depended upon than the weather—or a lottery ticket.

Lady R. Ha! ha! ha! twa axcellent seemilies, I vow, Mr. Egerton, axcellent!—for they illustrate the vagaries and inconstancy of my dissipated heart, ass exactly—ass if ye had meant till describe it. [EGERTON leads her out.]

Sir P. Ha! ha! ha! what a vast fund of sperits and good humour she has, Maister Sidney.

Sid. A great fund, indeed, Sir Pertinax.

Sir P. Hah! by this time to-morrow, Maister Sidney, I hope we shall ha'e every thing ready for ye to put the last helping hand till the earthly happiness o' your friend and pupil; and then, Sir, my cares will be over for this life; for as till my other son I expect nae gude of him; nor should I grieve were I to see him in his coffin. But this match—Oh! it will make me the happiest of aw human beings. [Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Library.

Enter SIR PERTINAX and EGERTON.

Sir P. Sir, I will not hear a word about it;—I insist upon it ye are wrong—ye should ha'e paid your court till my lord, and not ha'e scrupled swallowing a bumper or twa—or twanty till oblige him!

Eger. Sir, I did drink his toast in a bumper.

Sir P. Yas, ye did; but how?—how?—just ass a cross-brain takes phesic, wi' wry mouths, and sour faces, whack my lord observed; then, to mend the matter, the moment that he and the colonel got intill a drunken dispute aboot reelegion, ye sliely slunged awa'.

Eger. I thought, Sir, it was time to go, when my lord insisted upon half-pint bumpers.

Sir P. Sir, that was not levelled at you—but at the colonel, the captain, and the commissioner, in order till try their bottoms; but they aw agreed that ye and I should drink oot o' smaw glasses.

Eger. But, Sir, I beg pardon—I did not choose to drink any more.

Sir P. But, Sir, I tell you there was necessity for your drinking more at this particular juncture.

Eger. A necessity! in what respect, Sir?

Sir P. Why, Sir, I have a certain point to carry, independent of the lawyers, with my lord, in this agreement of your marriage, aboot whack, I am affraid we shall ha'e a warm crooked squabble—and therefore I wanted your assistance in it.

Eger. But how, Sir, could my drinking contribute to assist you in your squabble?

Sir P. Yas, Sir, it would ha'e contributed—it might have prevented the squabble.

Eger. How so, Sir?

Sir P. Why, Sir, my lord is proud of ye for a son-in-law, and of your little French songs—your stories, and your bon mots, when ye are in the humour—and gin ye had but staid, and been a leetle jolly, and drank half a score bumpers wi' him, till he got a little tipsy, I am sure when we had him i' that tipsy mood—we might ha'e settled the point amongst ourselves, before the lawyers came—but noow, Sir, I dinna ken what will be the consequence.

Eger. But when a man is intoxicated, would that have been a reasonable time to settle business, Sir?

Sir P. The most seasonable, Sir, the most seasonable; for, Sir, when my lord is in his cups, his suspection and his judgment are baith asleep, and his heart is aw jollity, fun, and gude fellowship—you may then mould his consent to any thing; and can there be a happier moment than that for a bargin, or to settle a dispute wi' a friend? What is it you shrug your shoulders at, Sir?

Eger. At my own ignorance, Sir: for I understand neither the philosophy nor the morality of your doctrine.

Sir P. I ken ye do not, Sir:—and what is worse, ye never wull understand it, ass ye proceed. In yane word, Charles—I ha'e often tauld ye, and noow again I tell ye yance for aw, that every man should be a man o' the world, and should understand the doctrine of pleabeclity; for, Sir, the manoeuvres of pleabeclity are ass necessary to rise in the world, ass wrangling and logical subtlety are to rise at the bar. Why ye see, Sir, I ha'e acquired a noble fortune, a princely fortune, and hoow do ye think I ha'e raised it?

Eger. Doubtless, Sir, by your abilities.

Sir P. Dootless, Sir, ye are a blockhead—nae, Sir, I'll tell ye hoow I raised it, Sir; I raised it by boowing; by boowing, Sir; I naver in my life could stond straight i' th' presence of a great mon; but always bowed, and boowed, and boowed, as it were by instinct.

Eger. How do you mean, by instinct, Sir?

Sir P. Hoow do I mean, by instinct—why, Sir, I mean by—by—by instinct of interest, Sir, which is the universal instinct of mankind, Sir: it is wonderful to think, what a cordial, what an amicable, nay, what an infallible influence, boowing has upon the pride and vanity of human nature; Charles, answer me sincerely, ha'e ye a mind till be convinced of the force of my doctrine, by example and demonstration?

Eger. Certainly, Sir.

Sir P. Then, Sir, as the greatest favour I can confer upon ye, I wull give ye a short sketch of the stages of my boowing; ass an excitement and a landmark for ye till boow by, and as an infallible nostrum for a mon o' the ward till thrive i' the world.

Eger. Sir, I shall be proud to profit by your experience.

Sir P. Vary weel. [They both sit down.] And noow, Sir, ye must recall till your thoughts, that your grandfather was a mon, whose penurious income of half-pay was the sum total of his fortune; and, Sir, aw my proovession fra him was a modicum of Latin, an expertness of areethmick, and a short system of worldly counsel; the chief ingredients of which were, a persevering industry, a reegid economy, a smooth tongue, a pliaabeclity of temper, and a constant attention till make every mon weel pleased wi' himself.

Eger. Very prudent advice, Sir.

Sir P. Therefore, Sir, I lay it before ye—now, Sir, wi' these materials, I set out, a rough raw-boned stripling, fra the north, till try my fortune wi' them here i' the south; and my first step intill the world was a beggarly clerkship in Sawney Gordon's counting-house, here i' the city of London, which, you'll say, afforded but a barren sort of a prospect.

Eger. It was not a very fertile one, indeed, Sir.

Sir P. The reverse, the reverse. Well, Sir, seeing mysel in this unprofitable situation, I reflected deeply, I cast about my thoughts, and concluded that a matrimonial adventure, prudently conducted, would be the readiest gait I could gang for the bettering of my condeition, and accordingly set about it—noow, Sir, in this pursuit—beauty—beauty, ah! beauty often struck mine eyne, and played about my heart, and fluttered, and beet, and knocked, and knocked, but the deel an entrance I ever let it get—for I observed that beauty is generally a prood, vain, saucy, expensive sort of a commodity.

Eger. Very justly observed, Sir.

Sir P. And therefore, Sir, I left it to prodigals and coxcombs, that could afford till pay for it, and in its stead, Sir,—mark—I luocked oot for an ancient, weel-jointured, superannuated dowager:—a consumptive, toothless, phthisicky, wealthy widow—or a shreveeled, cadaverous, neglected piece of deformity, i' th' shape of an ezard, or an empersi-and—or in short, any thing, any thing, that had the siller, the siller; for that was the north star of my affection—do ye take me, Sir? Was nae that right?

Eger. O doubtless, doubtless, Sir.

Sir P. Noow, Sir, where do ye think I gaed to luock for this woman wi' th' siller—nae till court—nae till play-houses, or assemblies—ha, Sir, I gaed till the kirk, till the Anabaptists, Independent, Bradleonian, Muggletonian meetings; till the morning and evening service of churches and chapels of ease; and till the midnight, melting, concealiating love-feasts of the Methodists—and there at last, Sir, I fell upon an old, rich, sour, slighted, antiquated, musty maiden; that luocked—ha! ha! ha! she luocked just like a skeleton in a surgeon's glass-case—noow, Sir, this meeserable object was reelegiously angry wi' hersel, and aw the ward; had nae comfort but in a supernatural, reelegious, enthusiastic deleerium; ha! ha! ha! Sir, she was mad—mad ass a bedlamite.

Eger. Not improbable, Sir; there are numbers of poor creatures in the same enthusiastic condition.

Sir P. Oh! numbers, numbers; now, Sir, this poor, cracked, crazy creature, used to sing, and sigh, and groan, and weep, and wail, and gnash her teeth constantly, morning and evening, at the tabernacle. And ass soon ass I found she had the siller, aha! gude traith, I plumped me doon upo' my knees close by her, cheek-by-jole, and sung, and sighed, and groaned as vehemently ass she could do for the life of her; ay, and turned up the whites of my eyne, till the strings almost cracked again. I watched her attentively; handed her till her chair; waited on her hame; got most reelegiously intimate wi' her in a week; married her in a fortnight; buried her in a month; touched the siller; and wi' a deep suit of mourning, a sorrowful vee sage, and a joyful heart, I began the world again: and this, Sir, was the first effectual boow I ever made till the vanity of human nature: noow, Sir, do ye understand this doctrine?

Eger. Perfectly well Sir.

Sir P. My next boow, Sir, was till your ain mother, whom I ran away wi' fra the boarding-school, by the interest of whose family I got a gude smart place i' th' treasury; and, Sir, my vary next step was intill parliament, the which I entered wi' ass ardent and ass determined an ambition, ass ever ageetated the heart o' Caesar himsel. Sir, I boowed, and watched, and attended, and dangled upo' the then great mon, till I got intill the vary bowels of his confidence—hah! I got my snack of the clothing, the foraging, the contracts, the lottery tickets, and aw the poetical bonuses; till at length, Sir, I became a much wealthier mon than one half of the golden calves I had been so long a boowing to. [He rises, EGERTON rises too.] And was nae that boowing to some purpose, Sir, ha?

Eger. It was, indeed, Sir.

Sir P. But are ye convinced of the gude effects, and of the uteelity of boowing?

Eger. Thoroughly, Sir, thoroughly.

Sir P. Sir, it is infallible—but, Charles, ah! while I was thus boowing and raising this princely fortune, ah! I met many heart sores, and disappointments, fra the want of leateature, ailouquance, and other popular abeelities; Sir, gin I could but ha'e spoken i' th' house, I should ha'e done the deed in half the time; but the instant I opened my mouth there, they aw fell a laughing at me: aw which defeeciencies, Sir, I determined at any expense till have supplied by the polished education of a son, who I hoped would yane day raise the house of Masycoophant till the highest pinnacle of ministeerial ambition; this, Sir, is my plan; I ha'e done my part of it: Nature has done her's; ye are ailouquant, ye are popular; aw parties like ye; and noow, Sir, it only remains for ye to be directed—completion follows.

Eger. Your liberality, Sir, in my education, and the judicious choice you made of the worthy gentleman, to whose virtues and abilities you entrusted me, are obligations I ever shall remember with the deepest filial gratitude.

Sir P. Vary weel, Sir—vary weel; but, Charles, ha'e ye had any conversation yet wi' Lady Rodolpha, aboot the day of yeer marriage, yeer leeveries, yeer equipage, or yeer establishment?

Eger. Not yet, Sir.

Sir P. Pah! why there again now, there again ye are wrong; vary wrong.

Eger. Sir, we have not had an opportunity.

Sir P. Why, Charles, ye are vary tardy in this business.

Lord L. [Singing without.]

What have we with day to do? &c.

Sir P. Oh! here comes my lord!

Lord L. [Singing without.]

Sons of care, 'twas made for you.

Enter LORD LUMBERCOURT, drinking a dish of coffee; TOMLINS waiting, with a salver in his hand.

Sons of care, 'twas made for you.

Very good coffee indeed, Mr. Tomlins.

Sons of care, 'twas made for you.

Here, Mr. Tomlins. [Gives him the cup.]

Tom. Will your lordship please to have another dish?

Lord L. No more, Mr. Tomlins. [Exit TOM-

LINS.] Well, my host of the Scotch pints! we have had warm work.

Sir P. Yes, you pushed the bottle about, my lord, wi' the joy and veegour of a bacchanal.

Lord L. That I did, my dear Mac—no loss of time with me—I have but three motions, old boy, charge!—toast!—fire!—and off we go—ha! ha! ha! that's my exercise.

Sir P. And fine warm exercise it is, my lord, especially with the half-pint glass.

Lord L. It does execution point blank—ay, ay, none of your pinking acorn glasses for me, but your manly, old English, half-pint bumpers, my dear.—Zounds, Sir, they try a fellow's stamina at once. But where's Egerton?

Sir P. Just at hand, my lord; there he stonds, looking at your lordship's picture.

Lord L. My dear Egerton.

Eger. Your lordship's most obedient.

Lord L. I beg your pardon, I did not see you—I am sorry you left us so soon after dinner; had you staid, you would have been highly entertained; I have made such examples of the commissioner the captain, and the colonel.

Eger. So I understand, my lord.

Lord L. But, Egerton, I have slipped from the company, for a few moments, on purpose to have a little chat with you. Rodolpha tells me, she fancies there is a kind of a demur on your side, about your marriage with her.

Sir P. A demur, hoow so, my lord?

Lord L. Why, as I was drinking my coffee with the women, just now, I desired they would fix the wedding night, and the etiquette of the ceremony; upon which the girl burst into a loud laugh, telling me she supposed I was joking, for that Mr. Egerton had never yet given her a single glance, or hint upon the subject.

Sir P. My lord, I have been just this vary instant talking to him about his shyness to the lady.

Enter TOMLINS.

Tom. Counsellor Plausible is come, Sir, and Sergeant Eitherside.

Sir P. Why, then, we can settle this business this vary evening, my lord.

Lord L. As well as in seven years—and to make the way as short as possible, pray, Mr. Tomlins, present your master's compliments and mine to lady Rodolpha, and let her ladyship know we wish to speak to her directly. [Exit TOMLINS.] He shall attack her this instant, Sir Pertinax.

Sir P. Ha! ha! ha! ay! that's excellent, this is doing business effectually, my lord.

Lord L. Oh! I will pit them in a moment, Sir Pertinax—that will bring them into the heat of the action at once; and save a deal of awkwardness on both sides—Oh, here your Dulcinea comes, Sir!

Enter LADY RODOLPHA.

Lady R. Weel, Sir Pertinax, I attend your commands, and yours, my paternal lord.

[She courtesies.]
Lord L. Why then, my filial lady, we are to inform you, that the commission for your ladyship, and this enamoured cavalier, commanding you jointly and inseparably to serve your country, in the honourable and forlorn hope of matrimony, is to be signed this vary evening.

Lady R. This evening, my lord!

Lord L. This evening, my lady: come, Sir Pertinax, let us leave them to settle their liveries, wedding suits, carriages, and all their amorous equipage for the nuptial camp.

Sir P. Ha! ha! ha! excellent! weel, I voov, my lord, ye are a great officer: this is as gude a manoeuvre to bring on a rapid engagement, as the ablest general of them aw could ha'e started.

Lord L. Ay, ay; leave them together, they'll soon come to a right understanding, I warrant you, or the needle and the loadstone have lost their sympathy.

[Exit LORD LUMBERCOURT and SIR PERTINAX.]

Eger. What a dilemma am I in! [Aside.]

Lady R. Why, this is downright tyranny—it has quite damped my spirits, and my betrothed, yonder, seems planet-struck too, I think.

Eger. A whimsical situation mine! [Aside.]

Lady R. Ha! ha! ha! methinks we luock like a couple of cautious generals, that are obliged till take the field, but neither of us seems willing till come to action.

Eger. I protest, I know not how to address her. [Aside.]

Lady R. He wull nae advance, I see—what am I to do? this affair? gude traith, I wull even do as I suppose many brave heroes ha'e done before me; clap a gude face upo' the matter, and so conceal an aching heart under a swaggering countenance. [Aside.] Sir, Sir, ass we ha'e, by the commands of our gude fathers—a business of some little consequence till transact, I hope ye wull excuse my taking the leeberty of recommending a chair till ye.

Eger. [Greatly embarrassed.] Madam, I beg your pardon.

[Hands her a chair, then one for himself.]

Lady R. Aha! he's resolved not to come too near till me, I think.

Eger. A pleasant interview—hem! hem!

[Aside.]
Lady R. Hem! hem! [Mimics him.] He wull not open the congress, I see; then I wull. [Aside.] Come, Sir, whan wull ye begin? [Very loud.]

Eger. [Starts.] Begin! what, Madam.

Lady R. To make love till me.

Eger. Love, Madam?

Lady R. Ay, love, Sir? why, you ha'e never said a word till me yet upo' the subject: nor cast a single glance on me, nor brought forth one tender sigh, nor even yance secretly squeezed my loof. Now, Sir, thoff oor fathers are so tyrannical ass to dispose of us merely for their ain interests, without a single thought of oor hearts or affections; yet, Sir, I hope ye ha'e mair humanity than to think of wedding me, without first admeenistering some of the preleeminaries usual on those occasions.

Eger. Madam, I own your reproach is just; I shall therefore no longer disguise my sentiments, but fairly let you know my heart—

Lady R. Ah! ye are right, ye are right, cousin. Honourably and affectionately right—noow that is what I like of aw things in my swain—ay, ay, cousin, open your heart frankly till me, ass a true lover should; but sit ye down, sit ye down again, I shall return your frankness, and your passion cousin, wi' a melting tenderness, equal to the amorous enthusiasm of an ancient heroine.

Eger. Madam, if you will hear me—

Lady R. But remember ye must begin yee address wi' fervency, and a most rapturous vehemence; for ye are to conseeder, cousin, that our match is nae till arise fra the union of hearts, and a long decorum of ceremonious courtship, but is instantly till start at yance out of necessity or mere accident, ha! ha! ha! just like a match in an ancient romance, where ye ken, cousin, the knight and the damsel are mutually smitten, and dying for each other at first sight; or by an amorous sympathy, before they exchange a single glance.

Eger. Dear Madam, you entirely mistake.

Lady R. So noow, cousin, wi' the true romantic enthusiasm, ye are till suppose me the lady o' the enchanted castle, and ye—ha! ha! ha! ye are to be the knight o' the sorrowful countenance—ha! ha! ha! and, upon honour, ye luock the character admirably, ha! ha!

Eger. Trifling creature!

Lady R. Nay, nay, nay, cousin, gin ye do na begin at yance, the lady o' the enchanted castle will vanish in a twinkling.

Eger. [Rises.] Lady Rodolpha, I know your talent for raillery well; but at present, in my case, there is a kind of cruelty in it.

Lady R. Raillery! upon my honour, cousin, ye mistake me quite and clean. I am serious; very serious; and I have cause till be serious: ay, and vary sad intill the bargain; [Rises.] nay, I will submit my case even till yours!—can ony poor lassie be in a mair lamentable condection [Whining.] than to be sent four hundred miles, by the commands of a positive grandmother, till marry a man who I find has nae mair affection for me than if I had been his wife these seven years.

Eger. Madam, I am extremely sorry.

Lady R. But it is very weel, cousin—vary weel—I see your aversion plain enough—and, Sir, I must tell ye fairly, ye are the ainly mon that ever slighted my person, or that drew tears fra these eyne; but 'tis vary weel. [Cries.] I will return till Scotland to-morrow morning, and let my grandmother know how I have been affronted by your slights, your contempts, and your aversions.

Eger. If you are serious, Madam, your distress gives me a deep concern: but affection is not in our power; and when you know that my heart is irrecoverably given to another woman, I think your understanding and good nature will not only pardon my past coldness and neglect of you, but forgive me when I tell you, I never can have that honour which is intended me, by a connexion with your ladyship.

Lady R. [Starting up.] How, Sir! are ye serious?

Eger. Madam, I am too deeply interested, both as a man of honour and a lover, to act otherwise with you on so tender a subject.

Lady R. And so, ye persait in slighting me.

Eger. I beg your pardon, but I must be explicit—and at once declare, that I never can give my hand where I cannot give my heart.

Lady R. Why, then, Sir, I must tell you, that your declaration is sic an affront ass nae woman o' speerit ought to bear, and here I make a solemn vow never till pardon it—but on yane condection.

Eger. If that condition be in my power, Madam—

Lady R. Sir, it is i' your power.

Eger. Then, Madam, you may command me.

Lady R. Why, then, Sir, the condection is this; ye must here gi'e me your honour, that nae importunity, command, or menace, o' your father—in fine, that nae consideration whatever shall induce you to take me, Rodolpha Lumbercourt, till be your wedded wife.

Eger. Madam! I most solemnly promise, I never will.

Lady R. And I, Sir, in my turn, most solemnly and sincerely thank ye for your resolution, [Courtesies.] and your agreeable aversion, ha! ha! ha! for ye ha'e made me as happy as a poor wretch reprieved in the vary instant of intended execution.

Eger. Pray, Madam, how am I to understand all this?

Lady R. Sir, your frankness and sincerity demand the same behaviour on my side. Therefore, without further disguise or ambiguity, know, Sir, that I myself am ass deeply smitten wi' a certain swain, ass I understand ye are wi' yeer Constantia.

Eger. Indeed, Madam!

Lady R. Oh, Sir, aw my extravagance, levity, and redeeculous behaviour in your presence, noow, and ever since your father prevailed on mine to consent till this match, has been a premeditated scheme, to provoke your gravity and gude sense intill a cordial disgust, and a positive refusal.

Eger. Madam, you have contrived and executed your scheme most happily; but, with your leave, Madam, if I may presume so far—pray who is your lover?

Lady R. In that too I shall surprise you, Sir—he is [Courtesies.] your ain brither. So ye see, cousin Charles, thoff I could nae mingle affections wi' ye, I ha'e nae gaed out o' the family.

Eger. Madam, give me leave to congratulate myself upon your affection—you couldn't have placed it on a worthier object; and whatever is to be our chance in this lottery of our parents, be assured that my fortune shall be devoted to your happiness and his.

Lady R. Generous indeed, cousin, but not a whit nobler, I assure you, than your brother Sandy believes of you; and pray, credit me, Sir, that we shall both remember it, while the heart feels, or memory retains a sense of gratitude: but now, Sir, let me ask one question—pray, how is your mother affected in this business?

Eger. She knows of my passion, and will, I am sure, be a friend to the common cause.

Lady R. Ah! that is lucky, vary lucky—our first step must be to take her advice upon our conduct, so as till keep our fathers in the dark, till we can hit off some measure that will wind them about till our ain purpose, and till the common interest of our ain passions.

Eger. You are very right, Madam, for should my father suspect my brother's affection for your ladyship, or mine for Constantia, there is no guessing what would be the consequence; his whole happiness depends upon his bargain with my lord: for it gives him the possession of three boroughs, and those, Madam, are much dearer to him than the happiness of his children: I am sorry to say it, but to gratify his political rage, he would sacrifice every social tie that is dear to friend or family. [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Library.

Enter SIR PERTINAX and COUNSELLOR PLAUSIBLE.

Sir P. No, no; come away, Counsellor Plausible—come away, I say; let them chew upon it—let them chew upon it.—Why, Counsellor, did ye ever hear so impertinent, so meddling, and so obstinate a blockhead, ass that Sergeant Eitherside? confound the fallow, he has put me out of aw temper!

Plau. He is very positive, indeed, Sir Pertinax, and no doubt was intemperate and rude; but, Sir Pertinax, I would not break up the match notwithstanding: for, certainly, even without the boroughs, it is an advantageous bargain, both to you and your son.

Sir P. But, Plausible, do you think I will give up the nomination till three boroughs? why, I would rather give him twanty, nay, tharty thousand pounds in any other part o' th' bargain—especially at this juncture, when votes are likely to become so valuable—why, mon, if a certain affair comes on, they'll rise above five hundred per cent.

Plau. No doubt they will, Sir Pertinax—but what shall we do in this case? for Mr. Sergeant insists that you positively agreed to my lord's having the nomination to the three boroughs during his own life.

Sir P. Why, yes, in the first sketch of the agreement I believe I did consent; but at that time, mon, my lord's affairs did not appear to be half so desparate ass I noow find they turn out. Sir, he must acquiesce in whatever I demand, for I ha'e gotten him intill sic an hobble, that he canna exist without me.

Plau. No doubt, Sir Pertinax, you have him absolutely in your power.

Sir P. Vary weel; and ought not a mon till make his vantage of it?

Plau. No doubt you ought, no manner of doubt; but, Sir Pertinax, there is a secret spring in this business that you do not seem to perceive, and which I am afraid governs the whole matter respecting these boroughs.

Sir P. What spring do ye mean, Counsellor?

Plau. Why this: I have some reason to think that my lord is tied down, by some means or other, to bring Sergeant Eitherside in, the very first vacancy, for one of those boroughs—now that, I believe, is the sole motive why the sergeant is so very strenuous that my lord should keep the boroughs in his own power, fearing that you might reject him for some man of your own.

Sir P. Oh! my dear Plausible, ye are clever—yes, vary clever—ye ha'e hit upo' the vary string that has made aw this discord—O! I see it—I see it noow; but haud, haud—bide a wee bit—a wee bit, mon—I ha'e a thought come intill my head—yes—I think noow, Plausible, wi' a little twist in oor negociation, that the vary string, properly tuned, may be still made to produce the vary harmony we wish for—ya—yas, I ha'e it—this sergeant I see understands business, and if I am not mistaken knows hoow till take a hint.

Plau. Oh! nobody better, Sir Pertinax, nobody better.

Sir P. Why then, Plausible, the short road is always the best wi' sic a man; ye must even come up till his mark at yance, and let him know fra me, that I will secure him a seat for yane of those vary boroughs.

Plau. Oh! that will do, Sir Pertinax; that will do, I'll answer for it.

Sir P. And further, I beg ye wull let him know, that I think myself obliged till weeder him in this affair ass acting for me ass weel ass for my lord, ass a common friend till baith, and for the service he has already done us, mak' my special compliments till him; and pray let this soft, sterling, bit of paper be my faithful advocate till convince him what my gratitude further intends for his great [Gives him a bank-bill.] equity, in adjusting this agreement betwixt my lord's family and mine.

Plau. Ha! ha! ha! Sir Pertinax, upon my word this is noble—ay, ay! this is an eloquent bit of paper, indeed.

Sir P. Maister Plausible, in aw human dealings the most affectual method is that of ganging at yance till the vary bottom of a mon's heart—for, if we expect that men should serve us, we must first win their affections by serving them—Oh! here they baith come!

Enter LORD LUMBERCOURT and SERGEANT EITHERSIDE.

Lord L. My dear Sir Pertinax, what could provoke you to break off this business so abruptly?—You are really wrong in the point; and if you will give yourself time to recollect, you will find that my having the nomination to the boroughs for my life, was a preliminary article—and I appeal to Mr. Sergeant Eitherside here, whether I did not always understand it so.

Serg. E. I assure you, Sir Pertinax, that in all his lordship's conversation with me upon this business, and in his positive instructions too, we always understood the nomination to be in my lord, durante vita, durante vita—clearly, clearly, beyond the shadow of a doubt.

Sir P. Why then, my lord, till shorten the dispute, aw I can say, in answer till your lordship, is, that there has been a total mistake betwixt us in that point—and therefore the treaty must end here—I give it up—I wash my hands of it for ever—for ever.

Plau. Well but, gentlemen, a little patience, pray. Sure this mistake, some how or other, may be rectified—Mr. Sergeant, pray let you and I step into the next room by ourselves, and reconsider the clause relative to the boroughs, and try if we cannot hit upon some medium that will be agreeable to both parties.

Serg. E. Mr. Plausible, I have already considered the clause fully, an entirely master of the question, and my lord cannot give up the point; it is unkind, unreasonable, to expect it, and I shall never, never—on no account whatsoever shall I ever advise him to give it up.

Plau. Nay, Mr. Sergeant, I beg you will not misapprehend me—do not think I want his lordship to give up any point without an equivalent. Sir Pertinax, will you permit Mr. Sergeant and me to retire for a few moments, to reconsider this point about the three boroughs?

Sir P. Wi' aw my heart and saul, Maister Plausible, ainy thing till accommodate his lordship—ainy thing—ainy thing.

Plau. What say you, my lord?

Lord L. Nay, I submit it entirely to you and Mr. Sergeant.

Plau. Come, Mr. Sergeant, let us retire.

Lord L. Ay, ay, go, Mr. Sergeant, and hear what Mr. Plausible has to say, however.

Serg. E. Nay, I will wait on Mr. Plausible, my lord, with all my heart; but I am sure I cannot suggest the shadow of a reason for altering my present opinion:—impossible, impossible, he cannot give them up; it is an opinion from which I never can depart.

Plau. Well, well, do not be positive, Mr. Sergeant; do not be positive. I am sure, reason, and your client's convenience, will always make you alter your opinion.

Serg. E. Ay, ay, reason, and my client's convenience, Mr. Plausible, will always control my opinion, depend upon it. Ay, ay! there you are right; Sir, I attend you. [Exeunt Lawyers.]

Sir P. I am sorry, my lord, extremely sorry, indeed, that this mistake has happened.

Lord L. Upon honour, and so am I, Sir Pertinax.

Sir P. But come noow, after aw, your lordship must allow ye ha'e been i' the wrong. Come, my dear lord, ye must allow that noow.

Lord L. How so, my dear Sir Pertinax?

Sir P. Not about the boroughs, my lord, for those I do not mind of a habbee—but about yeer distrust of my friendship. Why, do ye think noow, I appeal till your ain breast, my lord; do ye think, I say, that I should ever ha'e refused or slighted your lordship's nomination till these boroughs?

Lord L. Why really I don't think you would, Sir Pertinax; but one must be directed by one's lawyer, you know.

Sir P. Ha! my lord, lawyers are a dangerous species of animals till ha'e any dependence upon—they are always starting punctilios and deeficulties among friends. Why, my dear lord, it is their interest that aw mankind should be at variance; for disagreement is the vary manure wi' which they enrich and fatten the land of leetigation; and as they find that that constantly produces the best crop, depend upon it they will always be sure till lay it on ass thick ass they can.

Lord L. Come, come, my dear Sir Pertinax, you must not be angry with the sergeant for his insisting so warmly on this point—for those boroughs, you know, are my sheet anchor.

Sir P. I know it, my lord; and as an instance of my promptness to study, and my acquiescence till your lordship's inclination, ass I see that this Sergeant Eitherside wishes ye weel, and ye him, I think noow he would be as gude a mon to be returned for yane of those boroughs as could be pitched upon, and ass such I humbly recommend him to your lordship's consideration.

Lord L. Why, my dear Sir Pertinax, to tell you the truth, I have already promised him; he must be in for one of them; and that is one reason why I insisted so strenuously—he must be in.

Sir P. And why not?—why not? is nae yeer word a fiat? and will it nae be always so till me? are ye nait my friend, my patron? and are we nait by this match of our children to be united intill yane interest.

Lord L. So I understand it, I own, Sir Pertinax.

Sir P. My lord, it canna be otherwise—then for heaven's sake, ass your lordship and I ha'e but yane interest for the future, let us ha'e nae mair words aboot these paltry boroughs, but conclude the agreement at yance—just as it stands—otherwise there must be new writings drawn, new consultations of lawyers; new objections and delays will arise, creditors will be impatient and impertinent—so that we shall nae finish the Lord knows when.

Lord L. You are right, you are right; say no more, Mac, say no more—split the lawyers—you judge the point better than all Westminster-hall could—it shall stand as it is—yes, it shall be settled your own way, for your interest and mine are the same, I see plainly. Oh! here the lawyers come—so gentlemen—well, what have ye done—how are your opinions now?

Enter COUNSELLOR PLAUSIBLE and SERGEANT EITHERSIDE.

Serg. E. My lord, Mr. Plausible has convinced me—fully convinced me, that the boroughs should be given up to Sir Pertinax.

Plau. Yes, my lord, I have convinced him—I have laid such arguments before Mr. Sergeant, as were irresistible.

Serg. E. He has, indeed, my lord; for when I come to consider the long friendship that has subsisted between your lordship and Sir Pertinax; the great and mutual advantages that must attend this alliance; the various foreclosings, seizing, distracting, and in short every shape of ruin that the law can assume; all which must be put in force, should this agreement go off; and as Sir Pertinax gives his honour, that your lordship's nomination shall be sacredly observed, why, upon a nearer review of the whole affair, I am convinced that it will be the wiser measure to conclude the agreement just as it is drawn—just as it is drawn, my lord: it cannot be more to your advantage.

Lord L. I am very glad you think so, Mr. Sergeant, because that is my opinion too—so, my dear Eitherside, do you and Plausible despatch the business now as soon as possible.

Serg. E. My lord, every thing will be ready for signing in less than an hour—come, Mr. Plausible, let us go and fill up the blanks, and put the last hand to the writings, on our part.

Plau. I attend you, Mr. Sergeant.

[Exeunt Lawyers.]

Lord L. And while the lawyers are preparing the writings, Sir Pertinax, I will go and saunter with the women.

Sir P. Do, do, my lord, and I will come to you presently.

Lord L. Very well, my dear Mac, I shall expect you. [Exit singing.]

Sir P. So! a leetle flattery, mixed wi' the finesse of a guided promise on yane side, and a quantum sufficit of the aurum palpabile on the other, have at last made me the happiest father in Great Britain, and feel nothing but dignity and elevation. Haud! haud! bide a wee! bide a wee! I ha'e yane leetle mair in this affair till adjust, and then, Sir Pertinax, ye may dictate till fortune herself, and send her till govern feuls; while ye show, and convince the world that wise men always govern her. Wha's there?

Enter SAM.

Tell my son Egerton I would speak wi' him Now I ha'e settled the grand point [Exit. SAM.]

wi' my lord, this I think is the proper juncture till feel the political pulse of my spark, and yance for aw till set it to the exact measure that I would ha'e it constantly beat.

Enter EGERTON.

Come hither, Charles.

Eger. Your pleasure, Sir?

Sir P. About two hours since I told you, Charles, that I received this letter express, complaining of your brother's acteevity at an election i' the north, against a particular friend of mine; which has given great offence; and, Sir, ye are mentioned in the letter, ass weel ass he. To be plain, I must roundly tell ye, that on this interview depends my happiness, ass a mon and a father, and my affection till ye, Sir, ass a son, for the remainder of your days.

Eger. I hope, Sir, I shall never do any thing either to forfeit your affection, or disturb your happiness.

Sir P. I hope so too; but to the point—the fact is this. There has been a motion made this very day, to bring on the grand affair, which is settled for Friday se'nnight: noow, Sir, ass ye are popular, ha'e talents, and are weel heard, it is expected, and I insist upon it, that ye endeavour till atone for yeer misconduct, by preparing and taking a large share in that question, and supporting it wi' aw your poower.

Eger. But, Sir, I hope you will not so exert your influence, as to insist upon my supporting a measure by an obvious prostituted sophistry, in direct opposition to my character and my conscience.

Sir P. Conscience! did ye ever hear any man talk of conscience in poetical maiters? conscience, quotha!—I ha'e been in parliament these three-and-thirty years, and never heard the term made use of before—Sir, it is an unparliamentary word, and ye will be laughed at for it.

Eger. Then, Sir, I must frankly tell you, that you work against my nature—you would connect me with men I despise, and press me into measures I abhor. For know, Sir, that the malignant ferment, which the venal ambition of the times provokes in the heads and hearts of other men—I detest.

Sir P. What are ye aboot, Sir; with your malignant, yeer venal ambeetion, and your romantic nonsense? Sir, every mon should be ambeetious till serve his country—and every mon should be rewarded for it. And pray, Sir, would not ye wish till serve yeer country? answer me that, I say, would not ye wish till serve your country?

Eger. Only show me how I can serve my country, and my life is her's.—Were I qualified to lead her armies, to steer her fleets, and deal her honest vengeance on her insulting foes; or could my eloquence pull down a state leviathan, mighty by the plunder of his country, black with the treasons of her disgrace, and send his infamy down to free posterity, as a monumental terror to corrupt ambition, I would be foremost in such service, and act it with the unremitting ardour of a Roman spirit.

Sir P. Why, ye are mad, Sir; stark, staring, raving mad; certainly the fellow has been bitten by some mad whig or other! ye are vary young—vary young, indeed, in these matters; but experience wull convince ye, Sir, that every mon in public business has twa consciences; mind, Sir, twa consciences; a reelegious and a polectical conscience—you see a maichant, or a shopkeeper, that kens the science of the world, always luocks upon an oath in a custom-house, or behind a counter, only as an oath in business—a thing of course—a mere thing o' course, that has nae-thing till do wi' reelegion; and just so it is at an election, exactly the same—for instance, noow, I am a candidate—pray observe—I gang till a periwig-maker, a hatter, or a hosier, and I give ten, twanty, or tharty guineas, for a periwig, a hat, or a pair of hose, and so on through a majority o' voters; vary weel, what is the consequence? why, this commercial intercourse, ye see, begets a friendship betwixt us, and in a day or twa, these men gang and give me their suffrages. Weel, what is the inference, pray, Sir? can ye, or any lawyer, divine, or casuist, caw this a bribe? nae, Sir, in fair polectical reasoning, it is ainly generosity on the yane side, and gratitude on the ither—so, Sir, let me ha'e na mair of yeer reelegious or philosophical refinements; but prepare—attend—and speak till the question, or ye are nae son o' mine—Sir, I insist upon it.

Enter SAM.

Sam. Sir, my lord says the writings are now ready, and his lordship and the lawyers are waiting for you and Mr. Egerton.

Sir P. Vary weel; we'll attend his lordship. [Exit SAM.] Come, Sir, let us gang down and despatch the business.

[Going, is stopped by EGERTON.]

Eger. Sir, with your permission, I beg you will first hear me a word or two upon this subject.

Sir P. Weel, Sir; what would ye say?

Eger. I have often resolved to let you know [Bows very low.] my aversion to this match.

Sir P. Hoow, Sir?

Eger. But my respect and fear of disobliging you, hitherto kept me silent.

Sir P. Your aversion! hoow dare ye use sic language till me? your aversion! luock you, Sir, I shall cut the matter vary short—Conseeder—my fortune is nae inheritance; aw my ain acquisition; I can make ducks and drakes of it; so do not provoke me, but sign the articles directly.

Eger. I beg your pardon, Sir; but I must be free on this occasion, and tell you at once, that I can no longer dissemble the honest passion that fills my heart for another woman.

Sir P. Hoow! another woman! ah, ye villain, hoow dare ye love another woman without my permission—but what other woman? wha is she? speak, Sir, speak.

Eger. Constantia. [Bowing very low.]

Sir P. Constantia! Oh, ye proffigate! what, a creature taken in for charity?

Eger. Her poverty is not her crime, Sir, but her misfortune; and virtue, though covered with a village garb, is virtue still; therefore, Sir—

Sir P. Haud yeer jabbering, ye villain! haud yeer jabbering! none of yeer romance, or refinement, till me. I ha'e but yane question till ask ye, but yane question, and then I ha'e done wi' ye for ever—for ever—therefore think before ye answer; wull ye marry the lady, or wull ye break my heart?

Eger. Sir, my presence shall not offend you any longer: but when reason and reflection take their turn, I am sure you will not be pleased with yourself for this unpaternal passion. [Going.]

Sir P. Tarry, I command you—and I command ye likewise not to stir till ye ha'e given me yane answer—a defenitive answer—wull ye marry the lady, or wull ye not?

Eger. Since you command me, Sir, know then, that I cannot—will not marry her. [Exit.]

Sir P. Oh! the villain has shot me through the head; he has cut my vitals! I shall run distracted—there never was sic a bargain ass I ha'e made wi' this feulish lord—possession of his whole estate, wi' three boroughs upon it; sax members! why, what an acquisition, what consequent! what dignity, what weight till the house of Macsycophant—O! donn the fellow—three boroughs, only for sending doon six broomsticks—Oh! miserable; ever since this fallow came intill the world have I been secretly preparing him for the seat of ministerial dignity, and sure never, never were times so favourable—every thing conspires; for aw the auld poleetical posthorses are broken-winded, and foundered, and canna get on; and ass till the rising generation, the vanity of surpassing yane another in what they feulishly caw taste and allegiance, binds them hond and foot in the chains of luxury; which wull always set them up till the best bidder; so that if they can but get wherewithal till supply their dissipation, a meenister may convert the poleetical morals of aw sic voluptuaries intill a vote that would sell the nation till Prester John, and their boasted leeberties till the great Mogul. [Exit.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Library.

Enter SIR PERTINAX and BETTY.

Sir P. Come this way, Betty, come this way; ye are a gude girl, and I'll reward you for this discovery. Oh! the villain! offer her marriage!

Bet. It is true, indeed; I would not tell your honour a lie for the world; but in troth it lay upon my conscience, and I thought it my duty to tell your worship.

Sir P. Ye are right, ye are right; it was yer duty to tell me, and I'll reward you for it; ye say Maister Sidney is in love wi' her too—pray, how came you by that intelligence?

Bet. Oh! Sir, I know when folks are in love, let them strive to hide it as much as they will; I know it by Mr. Sidney's eyes, when I see him stealing a sly side-look at her; by his trembling, his breathing short, his sighing when they are reading together—besides, Sir, he made love verses upon her, in praise of her virtue, and her playing upon the music; ay! and I suspect another thing, Sir; she has a sweetheart, if not a husband, not far from hence.

Sir P. Wha! Constantia?

Bet. Ay, Constantia, Sir—Lord, I can know the whole affair, Sir, only for sending over to Hadley, to farmer Hilford's youngest daughter, Sukey Hilford.

Sir P. Then send this instant, and get me a particular account of it.

Bet. That I will, this minute, Sir.

Sir P. In the meantime keep a strict watch upon Constantia—and be sure ye bring me word of whatever new matter ye can pick up aboot her, my son, or this Hadley husband or sweetheart.

Bet. Never fear, Sir.

Sir P. Wha's there?

[Exit]

Enter TOMLINS.

Where is Maister Sidney?

Tom. In the drawing-room, Sir.

Sir P. Tell him I would speak wi' him. [Exit TOMLINS.] Why suppose this Sidney noow should be privy till his friend Charles' love for Constantia—what then, gude traith, it is natural till think that his ain love wull demand the preference—ay, and obtain it too—yas! yas! self—self! is an alloquent advocate on these occasions—for only make it a mon's interest till be a rascal, and I think ye may safely depend upon his integrity in serving himself.

Enter SIDNEY.

Sid. Sir Pertinax, your servant. Mr. Tomlins told me you desired to speak with me.

Sir P. Yes, I wanted till speak wi' ye upon a very singular business.—Maister Sidney, give me yer hond, gin it did na luock like flattery (which I detest,) I would tell ye, Maister Sidney, that ye are an honour till your cloth, yer country, and fill human nature.

Sid. Sir, you are very obliging.

Sir P. Sit ye doon here, Maister Sidney—sit ye doon here by me—my friend. [They sit.] I am under the greatest obligations till ye, for the care ye ha'e taken of Charles—the principles, reelegious, moral, and poleetical, that ye ha'e infused intill him, demand the warmest return of gratitude, baith fra him and fra me.

Sid. Your approbation, Sir, next to that of my own conscience, is the best test of my endeavours, and the highest applause they can receive.

Sir P. Sir, ye deserve it, richly deserve it; and noow, Sir, the same care that ye ha'e had of Charles, the same my wife has taken of her favourite, and sure never were accomplishments, knowledge, or principles, social and reelegious, impressed intill a better nature than Constantia's.

Sid. In truth, Sir, I think so too.

Sir P. She is, besides, a gentewoman, and of ass gude a family as any in this county.

Sid. So I understand, Sir.

Sir P. Sir, her faither had a vast estate; the which he dissipated, and melted in feasting, and friendships, and charities, hospitalities, and sic kind of nonsense—but to the business.—Maister Sidney, I love ye—yas, I love you, and ha'e been luocking out, and contriving hoow till settle ye in the world: Sir, I want till see ye comfortably and honourably fixed at the heed of a respectable family, and gin ye were my ain son, a thousand times, I could na mak' a mair valuable present till ye for that purpose, ass a partner for life, than this same Constantia, wi' sic a fortune doon wi' her ass ye yoursel shall deem to be competent: ay, and an assurance of every canonical contingency in my poower till confer or promote.

Sid. Sir, your offer is noble and friendly; but though the highest station would derive lustre from Constantia's charms and worth; yet, wer she more amiable than love could paint her in the lover's fancy, and wealthy beyond the thirst of the miser's appetite, I could not—would not wed her. [Rises.]

Sir P. Not wed her! odzwins, mon! ye surprise me! why so? what hinders?

[Rises.]

Sid. I beg you will not ask a reason for my refusal; but, briefly and finally, it cannot be, nor is it a subject I can longer converse upon.

Sir P. Weel Sir, I ha'e done, I ha'e done—sit doon, mon—sit doon again—sit ye doon. [They sit.] I shall mention it no more—not but I must confess honestly till ye, friend Sidney, that the match, had ye approved of my proposal, besides profiting you, would ha'e been of singular service till me likewise; hoowever, ye may still sarve me ass effectually ass if ye had married her.

Sid. Then, Sir, I am sure I will most heartily.

Sir P. I believe it, I believe it, friend Sidney, and I thank ye. I ha'e nae friend till depend upon but yourself—my heart is almost broke—I canna help these tears; and to tell ye the fact at yance, your friend Charles is struck wi' a most dangerous malady, a kind of insanity—in short, this Constantia, I am afraid, has cast an evil eye upon him—do ye understand me?

Sid. Not very well, Sir.

Sir P. Why, he is grievously smitten wi' the love of her, and I am afraid will never be cured without a leetle of your assistance.

Sid. Of my assistance! pray, Sir, in what manner?

Sir P. In what manner! Lord, Maister Sidney, how can ye be so dull? Now then, my vary gude friend, gin ye would take an opportunity to speak a gude word for him till the wench, and contrive to bring them together once, why, in a few days after, he would nae care a pinch o' snuff for her. [SIDNEY starts up.] What is the matter wi' ye, mon—what the deevil gars ye start and luock so astonished?

Sid. Sir, you amaze me! In what part of my mind, or conduct, have you found that baseness, which entitles you to treat me with this indignity?

Sir P. Indignity—what indignity do ye mean, Sir? Is asking ye till serve a friend wi' a wench an indignity? Sir, am not I your patron and benefactor, ha'?

Sid. You are, Sir, and I feel your bounty at my heart—but the virtuous gratitude, that sowed the deep sense of it there, does not inform me, that in return, the tutor's sacred function, or the social virtue of the man, must be debased into the pupil's pander, or the patron's prostitute.

Sir P. Hoow! what, Sir, do ye dispute? are ye na my dependant—ha! and do ye hesitate about an ordinary civility, which is practised every day by men and women of the first fashion? Sir, let me tell ye, hoowever nice ye may be, there is nae a dependant about the court that would nae jump at sic an oppertunity till oblige his patron.

Sid. Indeed, Sir, I believe the doctrine of pimping for patrons may be learned in every party school: for where faction and public venality are taught as measures necessary to the prosperity of the Briton and the patriot—there every vice is to be expected.

Sir P. Oho! oho! vary weel, fine insinuations! I ken what ye glance at—yas, ye intend this satire as a slander upon meenisters—ay! ay! fine sedection against government.—Oh! ye villain—ye—ye sirrah—ye are a black sheep, and I'll mark ye, and represent ye: I'll draw your picture—ah! ah! I am glad ye show yourself—yas, yas—ye ha'e taken off the mask at last: ye ha'e been in my service for many years, ye hypocrite! ye impostor—but I never knew your principles before.

Sid. Sir, you never affronted them before; if you had, you should have known them sooner.

Sir P. I ha'e done wi' ye—I ha'e done wi' ye. Ay, ay, noow I can account for my son's conduct; his aversion till courts, till meenisters, levees, public business, and his disobedience till my commands—a perfeedious fellow—ye're a Judas! ye ha'e ruined the morals of my son, ye villain, but I ha'e done wi' ye; however, this I wull prophesy at oor pairing, for your comfort, that gin ye air so vary squeamish in obliging your patron, ye'll never rise in the church.

Sid. Though my conduct, Sir, should not make me rise in her power, I am sure it will in her favour—in the favour of my own conscience too, and in the esteem of all worthy men; and that, Sir, is a power and dignity beyond what patrons of any denomination can confer. [Exit.]

Sir P. What a reegorous, saucy, stiff-necked fallow it is!—I see my folly noow; I am undone by my ain policy! this Sidney was the last man that should ha'e been about my son. The fallow, indeed, hath given him principles that might ha'e done vary weel among the ancient Romans, but are domned unfit for the modern Britons—weel! gin I had a thousand sons, I never would suffer yane of yeer English univarsity bred fellows, till be about a son of mine again; for they ha'e sic an pride of leeterature and character, and sic saucy English notions of leeberty, contenually fermenting in their thoughts, that a man is never sure of one of them; but what am I to do? Zoons, he must nae marry this beggar—I canna sit doon tamely under that—stay, haid a wee; by the blood, I have it—yas! I ha'e hit upon 't.

Enter BETTY.

Bet. Oh! Sir, I have got the whole secret out.

Sir P. About what?

Bet. About Miss Constantia; I have just had all the particulars from farmer Hilford's youngest daughter, Sukey Hilford.

Sir P. Weel, weel, but what is the story? quick, quick, what is it?

Bet. Why, Sir, it is certain that Mrs. Constantia has a sweetheart, or a husband, a sort of a gentleman, or a gentleman's gentleman, they don't know which, that lodges at Gaffer Hodges; for Sukey says she saw them together last night in the dark walk, and Mrs. Constantia was all in tears.

Sir P. Ah! I am afraid this is too gude news till be true.

Bet. Oh! Sir, it is certainly true; besides, Sir, she has just writ a letter to the gallant; and I have sent John Gardener to her, who is to carry it to him to Hadley; now, Sir, if your worship would seize the letter. See, see, Sir, here John comes, with the letter in his hand!

Sir P. Go, go; step ye out, Betty, and leave the fallow till me.

Bet. I will, Sir.

[Exit.]

Enter JOHN, with a packet and a letter.

John. There, go you into my pocket. [Puts up the packet.] There's nobody in the library—so I'll e'en go through the short way; let me see what is the name—Mel—Melt—Oh! no! Melville, at Gaffer Hodges'.

Sir P. What letter is that, Sir?

John. Letter, Sir!

Sir P. Give it me, Sir.

John. An't please your honour, Sir—it it is not mine.

Sir P. Deliver it this instant, Sirrah; or I'll break your head.

John. There, there, your honour.

[Gives the letter to SIR PERTINAX.]

Sir P. Be gone, rascal—this I suppose will let us intill the whole business.

John. You have got the letter, old surly, but the packet is safe in my pocket. I'll go and deliver that, however; for I will be true to poor Mrs. Constantia, in spite of you. [Aside: exit.]

Sir P. [Reading the letter.] Um!—Um!—Um! And bless my eyes with the sight of you. Um! um! Throw myself into your dear arms. Zoouns, this letter is invaluable!

Enter BETTY.

Oh! Betty, ye are an excellent wench, this letter is worth a million.

Bet. Is it as I suspected, Sir, to her sweet-heart?

Sir P. It is—it is! bid Constantia pack out of the house this instant; and let them get the chaise ready to carry her wherever she pleases but first send my wife and son hither.

Bet. I shall, Sir.

Sir P. Do so, be gone. [Exit BETTY.] Aha! Maister Charles, I believe I shall cure your passion for a virtuous beggar noow; I think he canna be so inflated as to be a dupe till a strumpet—let me see—how am I till act noow?—why, like a true poleitician, I must pretend most sincerely, where I intend most deceit.

Enter LADY MACSYCOPHANT and EGERTON.

Weel, Charles, notwithstanding the meesery ye ha'e brought upon me, I ha'e sent for ye and yeer mother, in order till convince ye baith of my affection, and my readiness till forgive; nay, and even till indulge your parvase passion; for since I find this Constantia has got hold of your heart, and that your mother and ye think that ye can never be happy without her, why I'll nae longer oppose your inclinations.

Eger. Dear Sir, you snatch me from the sharpest misery. On my knees, let my heart thank you for this goodness.

Lady M. Let me express my thanks too, and my joy; for had you not consented to his marrying her, we all should have been miserable.

Sir P. Weel, I am glad I ha'e found a way till please ye baith at last—but noow, my dear Charles, suppose noow, that this spotless vestal, this wonder of virtue, this idol of your heart, should be a concealed wanton after aw!

Eger. A wanton, Sir!

[Eagerly.]

Sir P. Or suppose that she should have an engagement of marriage, or an intrigue wi' another mon, and is only making a dupe of ye aw this time; I say, only suppose it, my dear, dear Charles; what would ye think of her?

Eger. I should think her the most deceitful, and the most subtle of her sex, and if possible would never think of her again.

Sir P. Wull ye give me your honour of that?

Eger. Most solemnly, Sir.

Sir P. Enough—I am satisfied. [Cries with joy.] You make me young again; I was afraid ye were fascinated wi' the charms of a crack. Do ye ken this hood?

Eger. Mighty well, Sir.

Sir P. And ye, Madam?

Lady M. As well as I do my own, Sir; it is Constantia's.

Sir P. It is so; and a better evidence it is, than any that can be given by the human tongue; here is a warm, rapturous, lascivious letter, under the hypocritical siren's ain hond; her ain hond, Sir, her ain hond. But judge yourselves—read it.

Eger. [Reads.] I have only time to tell you, that the family came down sooner than I expected, and that I cannot bless my eyes with the sight of you till the evening. The notes and jewels, which the bearer will deliver to you, were presented to me, since I saw you, by the son of my benefactor—

Sir P. Now, mark.

Eger. [Reads.] All which I beg you will convert to your own immediate use, for my heart has no room for any wish, or fortune, but what contributes to your relief and happiness.—

Sir P. Oh, Charles, Charles? do ye see, Sir, what a dupe she makes of you? But mark what follows; mark, Charles, mark.

Eger. [Reads.] Oh, how I long—

Sir P. Mark.

Eger. [Reads.] To throw myself into your dear, dear arms—

Sir P. Mark, mark.

Eger. [Reads.] To sooth your fears, your apprehensions, and your sorrows. I have something to tell you of the utmost moment, but will reserve it till we meet this evening in the dark walk—

In the dark walk!

Sir P. In the dark walk—ah! an evil-eyed curse upon her! yas, yas, she has been often in the dark walk, I believe—but read, read!

Eger. [Reads.] In the meantime, banish all fears, and hope the best, from fortune, and your ever dutiful and ever affectionate Constantia Harrington.

Sir P. There, there's a warm epistle for you! in short, the fact is—the hussy, ye must know, is married till the fallow.

Eger. Not unlikely, Sir.

Lady M. Indeed, by her letter, I believe she is.

Sir P. Noow, Madam, what amends can ye make me for countenancing your son's passion for sic an reptile? and ye, Sir, what ha'e you till say for your disobedience and your frenzy? Oh! Charles! Charles, you'll shorten my days!

[Sits down.]

Eger. Pray, Sir, be patient—compose yourself a moment; I will make you any compensation in my power.

Sir P. Then instantly sign the articles of marriage.

Eger. The lady, Sir, has never yet been consulted, and I have some reason to believe that her heart is engaged to another man.

Sir P. Sir, that is nae business of yours—I know she wull consent; and that's aw we are till consider. Oh! here comes my lord!

Enter LORD LUMBERCOURT.

Lord L. Sir Pertinax, every thing is ready, and the lawyers wait for us.

Sir P. We attend your lordship; where is Lady Rodolpha?

Lord L. Giving some female consolation to poor Constantia. Why, my lady! ha! ha! ha! I hear your vestal, Constantia, has been flirting!

Sir P. Yas, yas, my lord, she is in very gude order for ainy mon that wants a wife, and an heir till his estate, intill the bargain.

Enter TOMLINS.

Tom. Sir, there's a man below, that wants to speak to your honour upon particular business.

Sir P. Sir, I canna speak till any body noow—he must come another time; haud—stay, what, is he a gentleman?

Tom. He looks something like one, Sir; a sort of a gentleman; but he seems to be in a kind of a passion; for when I asked his name, he answered hastily, 'tis no matter, friend, go tell your master there is a gentleman here, that must speak to him directly.

Sir P. Must! ha! very peremptory indeed! prythee let's see this angry sort of a gentleman for curiosity's sake. [Exit TOMLINS.]

Enter LADY RODOLPHA.

Lady R. Oh! my Lady Macsycophant, I am come an humble advocate for a weeping piece of female frailty; who begs she may be permitted to speak till your ladyship, before you finally reprobate her.

Sir P. I beg your pardon, Lady Rodolpha, but it must not be; see her, she shall not.

Lady M. Nay, there can be no harm, my dear in hearing what she has to say for herself.

Sir P. I tell you, it shall not be.

Lady M. Well, well, my dear, I have done, I have done.

Enter TOMLINS and MELVILLE.

Tom. Sir, that is my master.

Sir P. Weel, Sir, pray what is your urgent business wi' me, Sir?

Mel. To shun disgrace and punish baseness.

Sir P. Punish baseness? what does the fallow mean? wha are ye, Sir?

Mel. A man, Sir.

Sir P. A mon, Sir!

Mel. And one whose spirit and fortune once bore as proud a sway as any within this country's limits.

Lord L. You seem to be a soldier, Sir!

Mel. I was, Sir, and have the soldier's certificate, to prove my service—rags and scars: for ten long years, in India's parching clime, I bore my country's cause, and in noblest dangers sustained it with my sword—at length ungrateful peace has laid me down, where welcome war first took me up—in poverty—and the dread of cruel creditors. Paternal affection brought me to my native land, in quest of an only child. I found her, as I thought, amiable as paternal fondness could desire; but foul seduction has snatched her from me; and hither am I come, fraught with a father's anger, and a soldier's honour, to seek the seducer, and glut revenge.

Lady M. Pray, Sir, who is your daughter?

Mel. I blush to own her—but—Constantia.

Omnes. How!

Lady M. Constantia!

Eger. Is Constantia your daughter, Sir?

Mel. She is, and was the only comfort that nature, fortune, or my own extravagance, had left me.

Sir P. Gude traith, then I fancy ye wull find but vary little comfort fra her; for she is nae better than she should be—she has had nae damage in this mansion; but ye may gang till Hadley, till yane farmer Hodges, and there ye may learn the whole story, fra a cheel they call Melville.

Mel. Melville!

Sir P. Yas, Sir; Melville.

Mel. O! would to heaven she had no crime to answer but her commerce with Melville—no, Sir, he is not the man; it is your son, your Egerton, that has seduced her! and here, Sir, are the evidences of his seduction.

Eger. Of my seduction, Sir?

Mel. Of yours, Sir, if your name be Egerton.

Eger. I am that man, Sir; but pray what is your evidence?

Mel. These bills, and these gorgeous jewels—not to be had in her menial state, but at the price of chastity; not an hour since she sent them, impudently sent them, by a servant of this house; contagious infamy started from their touch.

Eger. Sir, perhaps you may be mistaken concerning the terms on which she received them; do you but clear her conduct with respect to Melville, and I will instantly satisfy your fears concerning the jewels and her virtue.

Mel. Sir, you give me new life; you are my better angel—I believe in your words, your looks—know then—I am that Melville.

Sir P. Hoow, Sir! ye that Melville, that was at farmer Hodges'?

Mel. The same, Sir; it was he brought my Constantia to my arms; lodged and secreted me—once my lowly tenant, now my only friend; the fear of inexorable creditors made me change my name from Harrington to Melville, till I could see and consult some who once called themselves my friends.

Eger. Sir, suspend your fears and anger but for a few minutes—I will keep my word with you religiously; and bring your Constantia to your arms, as virtuous and as happy as you could wish her.

[Exeunt LADY MACSYCOPHANT and EGERTON.]

Sir P. The clearing up of this wench's virtue is donned anlucky! I'm afraid it wull ruin aw oor affairs again—hoowever, I ha'e yane stroke still in my heed, that wull secure the bargain wi' my lord, let matters gang as they wull. [Aside.] But I wonder, Maister Melville, that ye did nae pick up some leetle matter of silver in the Indies—Ah! there ha'e been bonny fortunes snapped up there of late years by some of the meelitary blades.

Mel. Very true, Sir; but it is an observation among soldiers, that there are some men who never meet with any thing in the service but blows and ill fortune—I was one of those, even to a proverb.

Sir P. Ah! 'tis pity, Sir; a great pity, noow, that ye did nae get a mogul, or some sic an animal, intill your clutches—Ah! I should like till ha'e the strangling of a nabob—the rummaging of his gold dust, his jewel closet, and aw his magazines of bars and ingots; ha! ha! ha! gude traith, noow, sic an a fellow would be a bonny cheel to bring over till this toown, and till exhibit him riding on an elephant; upon honour, a mon might raise a poll tax by him that would gang near till pay the debts of the nation!

Enter EGERTON, CONSTANTIA, LADY MACSYCO-PHANT, and SIDNEY.

Eger. Sir, I promised to satisfy your fears concerning your daughter's virtue; and my best proof to you and all the world, that I think her not only chaste, but the most deserving of her sex, is, that I have made her the partner of my heart, and the tender guardian of my earthly happiness for life!

Sir P. Hoow married!

Eger. I know, Sir, at present we shall meet your anger—but time, reflection, and our dutiful conduct, we hope, will reconcile you to our happiness.

Sir P. Naver, naver; and could I make ye, her, and aw your issue, beggars—I would move hell, heaven, and earth till effect it.

Lord L. Why, Sir Pertinax, this is a total revolution, and will entirely ruin my affairs.

Sir P. My lord, wi' the consent of your lordship and Lady Rodolpha, I ha'e an expedient till offer, that will not ainly punish that rebellious villain, but answer every end that your lordship and Lady Rodolpha proposed by the intended match wi' him.

Lord L. I doubt it much, Sir Pertinax: I doubt it much: but what is it, Sir? what is your expedient?

Sir P. My lord, I ha'e another son, my son Sandy, he is a gude lad; and provided the lady and your lordship ha'e nae objection till him, every article of that rebel's intended marriage shall be amply fulfilled, upon Lady Rodolpha's union with my younger son, Sandy.

Lord L. Why, that is an expedient, indeed, Sir Pertinax; but what say you, Rodolpha?

Lady R. Nay, nay, my lord, ass I had nae reason till ha'e the least affection till my cousin Egerton, and ass my intended marriage wi' him was entirely an act of obedience till my grandmother, provided my cousin Sandy will be as agreeable till her ladyship, ass my cousin Charles here would ha'e been—I have nae the least objection till the change; ay, ay, upon honour yane brother is ass gude till Rodolpha ass another.

Sir P. I'll answer, Madam, for your grandmother; noow, my lord, what say you?

Lord L. Nay, Sir Pertinax, so the agreement stands, all is right again; come, child, let us be gone. Look ye, Sir Pertinax, let me have no more perplexity or trouble about writings, lawyers, duns, debts, or daughter; only let me be at my ease, and rat me if I care one pinch of snuff if her ladyship concorporates with the cham of Tartary.

[Exit LORD LUMBERCOURT.]

Sir P. Ass to ye, my Lady Macsycophant, I suppose ye concluded, before ye gave your consent till this match, that there would be an end of every thing betwixt ye and me; ye shall ha'e a jointure, but not a bawbee besides, living or dead, shall ye, or any of your issue, ever see of mine; so, Madam, live wi' yeer Constantia, wi' yeer son, and wi' that—that damned black sheep there.

[Exit SIR PERTINAX.]

Lady R. Weel, cousin Egerton, in spite o' the ambeitious frenzy o' your father, and the thoughtless deesipation o' mine, don Cupid has at last carried his point in favour o' his devotees; but I mun noow take my leave with the fag-end of an auld north country wish, brought fra the hospitable land of fair Strathbogie; may mutual love and gude humour ever be the guest of your hearts, the theme of your tongues, and the blighsome phantom of aw your tricky dreams through the rugged road of this crooked, deceitful world; and may our fathers be an example to orsels, that will remind us to treat oor bairns, should heaven croon our endeavours, wi' more lebeerality and affection, than that with which oor fathers have treated us!

[Exit LADY RODOLPHA.]

Eger. You seem melancholy, Sir.

Mel. These precarious turns of fortune, Sir, will press upon the heart: for notwithstanding my Constantia's happiness, and mine in hers, I own I cannot help feeling some regret, that my misfortunes should be cause of any disagreement between a father and the man to whom I am under the most endearing obligations.

Eger. You, Sir, have no share in his disagreement; for had not you been born, from my father's nature, some other cause of his resentment must have happened; and angry vicissitudes have taken their leave of us all: if affluence can procure content and ease, they are within our reach. My fortune is ample, and shall be dedicated to the happiness of this domestic circle.

My scheme, though mock'd by knave, coquette, and fool,

To thinking minds must prove this golden rule:
In all pursuits—but chiefly in a wife,
Not wealth, but morals, make the happy life.

[Exeunt.]

THE APPRENTICE:

A FARCE,

IN TWO ACTS.

BY ARTHUR MURPHY.

REMARKS.

This is an ingenious satire on a pernicious folly prevalent among many young people, who, without the requisite talent, lose their time and reputation in attempts on the works of authors, who would be unable, in such hands, to recognise their own offspring. It was first performed in 1756, at Drury Lane, and has induced a great reform; though many stage-struck heroes still "leave their calling for this idle trade." The performance of Dick, by Mr. John Bannister, and his admirable recitation of the prologue, were fortunate instances of that gentleman's comic versatility.

The marginal references to the numerous quotations, in the character of Dick, from other dramatic writers, interfere so unpleasantly with the text, that they are omitted in the modern editions; they, however, considerably heighten the effect of the piece, and are easily traced by readers at all conversant with the drama.

PROLOGUE.

WRITTEN BY MR. GARRICK.

Spoken by MR. BANNISTER.

PROLOGUES precede the piece—in mournful verse;
As undertakers walk before a hearse;
Whose doleful march may strike the harden'd
mind,
And wake its feelings—for the dead—behind.
To-night, no smuggled scenes from France we show,
'Tis English—English, Sirs!—from top to toe.
Though coarse the colours and the hand un-skill'd,

From real life our little cloth is fill'd.
The hero is a youth,—by Fate design'd
For culling simples,—but whose stage-struck mind
Nor Fate could rule, nor his indentures bind.
A place there is where such young Quixotes
meet;
'Tis call'd the SPOUTING CLUB,—a glorious treat,
Where 'prentic'd kings—alarm the gaping street:
There Brutus starts and stares by midnight taper,
Who, all the day, enacts—a woollen-draper.
There Hamlet's ghost stalks forth with doubled fist,
Cries out with hollow voice,—“ List, list, O list!” 69

And tightens Denmark's prince, a young tobacco-conist.

The spirit, too, cleared from his deadly white,
Rise,—a haberdasher to the sight!

Not young attorneys—have this rage withstood,
But change their pens for truncheons, ink for
blood,

And (change reverse!) die for their country's good.

To check these heroes, and their laurels crop,
To bring 'em back to reason—and their shop,
Our author wrote;—O you, Tom, Jack, Dick,
Will!

Who hold the balance, or who gild the pill!
Who wield the yard, and simpering pay your court,

And, at each flourish, snip an inch too short!
Quit not your shops; there thrift and profit call,
Whilst here, young gentlemen are apt to fall!

[Bell rings.]
But soft!—the prompter calls!—brief let me be—
Here groans you'll hear, and flying apples see,
Be damn'd peasants; farewell!—remember me!

ACT I.

SCENE I.

Enter WINGATE and SIMON.

Win. Nay, nay, but I tell you I am convinced
—I know it is so; and so, friend, don't you think to trifle with me; I know you're in the plot, you scoundrel; and if you don't discover all, I'll—

Sim. Dear heart, Sir, you won't give a body time.

Win. Zookers! a whole month missing, and no account of him far or near!—Sirrah, I say he could not be 'prentice to your master so long, and you live so long in one house, with him, without knowing his haunts and all his ways—and then, varlet, what brings you here to my house so often?

Sim. My master Gargle and I, Sir, are so uneasy about un, that I have been running all over the town since morning to inquire for un; and so in my way I thought I might as well call here.

Win. A villain, to give his father all this trouble. And so you have not heard any thing of him, friend?

Sim. Not a word, Sir, as I hope for mercy, though, as sure as you are there, I believe I can guess what's come on un. As sure as any thing, master, the gipsies have gotten hold on un; and we shall have un come home as thin as a rake, like the young girl in the city, with living upon nothing but crusts and water for six-and-twenty days.

Win. The gipsies have got hold of him, ye blockhead! Get out of the room—Here you, Simon!

Sim. Sir.

Win. Where are you going in such a hurry?
Let me see; what must be done? A ridiculous numskull, with his damned Cassanders and Cloppatras, and trumpery; with his romances, and his Odyssey Popes, and a parcel of rascals not worth a groat! Zookers! I'll not put myself in a passion. Simon, do you step back to your master, my friend Gargle, and tell him I want to speak with him—though I don't know what I should send for him for—a sly, slow, hesitating block-head! he'll only plague me with his physical cant and his nonsense. Why don't you go, you booby, when I bid you?

Sim. Yes, Sir.

[Exit] Win. This fellow will be the death of me a-last! I have been turmoiling for him all the days of my life, and now the scoundrel's run away.
Suppose I advertise the dog?—Ay, but if the villain should deceive me, and happen to be dead, why then he tricks me out of six shillings—my money's flung into the fire.—Zookers, I'll not put myself in a passion; let him follow his nose—
'tis nothing at all to me—what care I?

Re-enter SIMON.

What do you come back for, friend?

Sim. As I was going out, Sir, the post came to the door, and brought this letter.

Win. Let me see it. The gipsies have got hold of him, ha, ha! What a pretty fellow you are! ha, ha!—Why don't you step where I bid you, Sirrah?

Sim. Yes, Sir.

[Exit.] Win. Well, well, I'm resolved, and it shall be so—I'll advertise him to-morrow morning, and promise, if he comes home, all shall be forgiven, and when the blockhead comes, I may do as I please, ha, ha! I may do as I please. Let me see—he had on—slidikins, what signifies what he had on! I'll read my letter, and think no more about him,—Hey! what a plague have we here? [Mutters to himself.] Bristol—a—what's all this?

[Reads.] "Esteemed friend,—Last was twentieth ultimo, since none of thine, which will occasion brevity. The reason of my writing to thee at present, is to inform thee that thy son came to our place with a company of strollers, who were taken up by the magistrato, and committed as vagabonds to jail."—Zookers! I'm glad of it—a villain of a fellow! let him lie there.—"I am sorry thy lad should follow such profane courses; but out of the esteem I bear unto thee,
I have taken thy boy out of confinement, and sent him off for your city in the waggon, which left this four days ago. He is consigned to thy address, being the needful from thy friend and servant,

"EBENEZER BROADBRIM."

Wounds! what did he take the fellow out for?
A scoundrel, rascal! turned stage-player!—I'll never see the villain's face. Who comes there?

Re-enter SIMON.

Sim. I met my master over the way, Sir.
Our cares are over. Here is Mr. Gargle, Sir.

Win. Let him come in—and do you go down stairs, you blockhead. [Exit SIMON.]

Enter GARGLE.

So, friend Gargle, here's a fine piece of work—
Dick's turned vagabond!

Gar. He must be put under a proper regimen directly, Sir.—He arrived at my house within these ten minutes, but in such a trim! He's now below stairs: I judged it proper to leave him there till I had prepared you for his reception.

Win. Death and fire! what could put it into the villain's head to turn buffoon?

Gar. Nothing so easily accounted for: why when he ought to be reading the Dispensatory, there was he constantly reading over plays, and farces, and Shakspeare.

Win. Ay, that damned Shakspeare! I hear the fellow was nothing but a deer-stealer in Warwickshire! I never read Shakspeare. Wounds! I caught the rascal myself reading that nonsensical play of Hamlet, where the prince is keeping company with strollers and vagabonds. A fine example, Mr. Gargle.

Gar. His disorder is of the malignant kind, and my daughter has taken the infection from him. Bless my heart!—she was as innocent as water-gruel, till he spoiled her. I found her the other night in the very fact.

Win. Zookers! you don't say so? caught her in the fact.

Gar. Ay, in the very fact of reading a play-book in bed.

Win. Oh, is that the fact you mean? Is that all? though that's bad enough.

Gar. But I have done for my young madam; I have confined her to her room, and locked up all her books.

Win. Look ye, friend Gargle, I'll never see the villain's face. Let him follow his nose and bite the bridle.

Gar. Sir, I have found out that he went three times a week to a spouting club.

Win. A spouting club, friend Gargle! what's a spouting club?

Gar. A meeting of 'prentices, and clerks, and giddy young men, intoxicated with plays; and so they meet in public houses, to act speeches; there they all neglect business, despise the advice of their friends, and think of nothing but to become actors.

Win. You don't say so? a spouting club! wounds, I believe they are all mad.

Gar. Ay, mad indeed, Sir: madness is occasioned in a very extraordinary manner; the spirits flowing in particular channels—

Win. 'Sdeath, you are as mad yourself as any of them.

Gar. And continuing to run in the same ducts—

Win. Ducks! damn your ducks! Who's below there? Tell that fellow to come up.

Gar. Dear Sir, be a little cool—inflammatory may be dangerous.—Do pray, Sir, moderate your passions.

Win. Pr'ythee be quiet, man; I'll try what I can do. Here he comes.

Enter DICK.

Dick. Now my good father, what's the matter?

Win. So, friend, you have been upon your travels, have you? you have had your frolic? Look ye, young man, I'll not put myself in a passion. But, death and fire, you scoundrel, what right have you to plague me in this manner? do you think I must fall in love with your face, because I am your father?

Dick. A little more than kin, and less than kind. [Aside.]

Win. Ha, ha! what a pretty figure you cut now! Ha, ha! why don't you speak, you blockhead? have you nothing to say for yourself?

Dick. Nothing to say for yourself. What an old prig it is. [Aside.]

Win. Mind me, friend, I have found you out; I see you'll never come to good. Turn stage-player! wounds! you'll not have an eye in your head in a month; ha, ha! you'll have 'em knocked out of the sockets with withered apples—remember, I tell you so.

Dick. A critic too! [Whistles.] Well done old Squaretoes.

Win. Look ye, young man, take notice of what I say: I made my own fortune, and I could do the same again. Wounds! if I were placed at the bottom of Chancery-lane, with a brush and black-ball, I'd make my own fortune again. You read Shakspeare! get Cocker's Arithmetic; you may buy it for a shilling on any stall—best book that ever was wrote.

Dick. Pretty well, that; ingenious, faith! 'Egad, the old fellow has a pretty notion of letters.

[Aside.]

Win. Can you tell how much is five-eighths of three-sixteenths of a pound? Five-eighths of three-sixteenths of a pound. Ay, ay, I see you're a blockhead. Look ye, young man, if you have a mind to thrive in this world, study figures, and make yourself useful—make yourself useful.

Dick. How weary, stale, flat, and unprofitable seem to me all the uses of this world! [Aside.]

Win. Mind the scoundrel now.

Gar. Do, Mr. Wingate, let me speak to him—softly, softly—I'll touch him gently.—Come, come, young man, lay aside this sulky humour, and speak as becomes a son.

Dick. O, Jephtha, judge of Israel, what a treasure hadst thou!

Win. What does the fellow say?

Gar. He relents, Sir. Come, come, young man, he'll forgive.

Dick. They fool me to the top of my bent. 'Gad, I'll hum 'em, to get rid of 'em—a truant disposition, good my lord. No, no, stay, that's not right—I have a better speech. [Aside.] It is as you say—when we are sober, and reflect but ever so little on our follies, we are ashamed and sorry: and yet, the very next minute, we rush again into the very same absurdities.

Win. Well said, lad, well said—Mind me, friend; commanding our own passions, and artfully taking advantage of other people's, is the sure road to wealth. Death and fire!—but I won't put myself in a passion. 'Tis my regard for you makes me speak; and if I tell you you're a scoundrel, 'tis for your good.

Dick. Without doubt, Sir. [Stiffing a laugh.]

Win. If you want any thing, you shall be provided. Have you any money in your pocket? Ha! ha! what a ridiculous numskull you are now! ha! ha! Come, here's some money for you. [Pulls out his money and looks at it.] I'll give it to you another time; and so you'll mind what I say to you, and make yourself useful for the future.

Dick. Else, wherefore breathe I in a Christian land?

Win. Zookers! you blockhead, you'd better stick to your business, than turn buffoon, and get truncheons broke upon your arm, and be tumbling upon carpets.

Dick. I shall in all my best obey you, daddy.

Win. Very well, friend—very well said—you may do your business, than turn buffoon, and get truncheons broke upon your arm, and be tumbling upon carpets.

drel, what right have you to wear a laced waist-coat?—I never wore a laced waistcoat!—never wore one till I was forty.—But I'll not put myself in a passion—go and change your dress, friend.

Dick. I shall, Sir—

I must be cruel, only to be kind;

That's bad begins, but worse remains behind.
Cocker's Arithmetic, Sir?

Win. Ay, Cocker's Arithmetic—study figures, and they'll carry you through the world.

Dick. Yes, Sir. [Stifling a laugh.] Cocker's Arithmetic! [Exit.]

Win. Let him mind me, friend Gargle, and I'll make a man of him.

Gar. Ay, Sir, you know the world.—The young man will do very well—I wish he were out of his time; he shall then have my daughter.

Win. Yes, but I'll touch the cash—he shan't finger it during my life.—I must keep a tight hand over him—[Goes to the door.]—Do ye hear, friend?—Mind what I say, and go home to your business immediately.—Friend Gargle, I'll make a man of him.

Re-enter DICK.

Dick. Who called on Achmet! Did not Barbarossa require me here?

Win. What's the matter now?—Barossa!—Wounds!—What's Barossa?—Does the fellow call me names?—What makes the blockhead stand in such confusion?

Dick. That Barbarossa should suspect my truth!

Win. The fellow's stark, staring mad—get out of the room, you villain, get out of the room.

[Dick stands in a sullen mood.]

Gar. Come, come, young man, every thing is easy; don't spoil all again—go and change your dress, and come home to your business. Nay, nay, be ruled by me. [Thrusts him off.]

Win. I'm very peremptory, friend Gargle; if he vexes me once more, I'll have nothing to say to him. Well, but now I think of it, I have Cocker's Arithmetic below stairs in the counting-house—I'll step and get it for him, and so he shall take it home with him. Friend Gargle, your servant.

Gar. Mr. Wingate, a good evening to you. You'll send him home to his business?

Win. He shall follow you home directly. Five-eighths of three-sixteenths of a pound!—multiply the numerator by the denominator! five times sixteen is ten times eight, ten times eight is eighty, and—a—a—carry one. [Exit.]

Re-enter DICK and SIMON.

Sim. Lord love ye, master—I'm so glad you're come back—come, we had as good e'en gang home to my master Gargle's.

Dick. No, no, Simon, stay a moment—this is but a scurvy coat I have on, and I know my father has always some jemy thing locked up in his closet—I know his ways—he takes 'em in pawn; for he'll never part with a shilling without security.

Sim. Hush! he'll hear us—stay, I believe he's coming up stairs.

Dick. [Goes to the door, and listens.] No, no, no, he's going down, growling and grumbling—ay, say ye so?—Scoundrel, rascal let him bite the bridle.—Six times twelve is seventy two.—All's safe, man; never fear him. Do you stand here—I shall despatch this business in a crack.

Sim. Blessings on him! what is he about now? Why, the door is locked, master.

Dick. Ay, but I can easily force the lock—you shall see me do it as well as any Sir John Brute of 'em all—this right leg—

Sim. Lord love you, master, that's not your right leg.

Dick. Pho! you fool, don't you know I'm drunk? this right leg here is the best lock-smith in England; so, so. [Forces the door, and goes in.]

Sim. He's at his plays again; odds my heart, he's a rare hand, he'll go through with it I'll warrant him. Old Codger must not smoke that I have any concern—I must be main cautious. Lord bless his heart, he's to teach me to act Scrub. He begun with me long ago, and I got as far as the Jesuit before a went out of town:—Scrub—coming, Sir—Lord, ma'am, I've a whole packet full of news; some say one thing, and some say another; but, for my part ma'am, I believe he's a Jesuit—that's main pleasant—I believe he's a Jesuit.

Re-enter DICK.

Dick. I have done the deed;—didst thou not hear a noise?

Sim. No, master; we're all snug.

Dick. This coat will do charmingly; I have bilked the old fellow nicely. In a dark corner of his cabinet, I found this paper; what it is the light will show.—[Reads.] 'I promise to pay;—Ha!—'I promise to pay to Mr. Moneytrap, or order, on demand'—'Tis his hand—a note of his—yet more—'the sum of seven pounds, fourteen shillings, and seven pence, value received by me—London, this 15th June, 1775.'—'Tis wanting what should follow; his name shall follow, but 'tis torn off, because the note is paid.

Sim. O, lud! dear Sir, you'll spoil all. I wish we were well out of the house. Our best way, master, is to make off directly.

Dick. I will, I will; but first help me on with this coat.—Simon, you shall be my dresser; you'll be fine and happy behind the scenes.

Sim. O, lud! it will be main pleasant; I have been behind the screens in the country.

Dick. Have you, where?

Sim. Why, when I lived with the man that showed wild beasties.

Dick. Hark ye, Simon, when I am playing some deep tragedy, and cleave the general ear with horrid speech, you must take out your white pocket handkerchief and cry bitterly.

[Teaches him.]

Sim. But I haven't got a white pocket handkerchief.

Dick. Then I'll lend you mine.

[Pulls out a ragged one.]

Sim. Thank ye, Sir.

Dick. And when I am playing comedy, you must be ready to laugh your guts out, [Teaches him.] for I shall be very pleasant—Toll-de-roll. [Dances.]

Sim. Never doubt me, Sir.

Dick. Very well; now run down and open the street door; I'll follow you in a crack.

Sim. I'm gone to serve you, master.

Dick. To serve thyself—for, look ye, Simon, when I am manager, claim thou of me the care of the wardrobe, with all those moveables, whereof the property-man now stands possessed.

Sim. O, lud! this is charming—hush! I am gone. [Going.]

Dick. Well, but hark ye, Simon, come hither—what money have you about you, Master Matthew?

Sim. But a tester, Sir.

Dick. A tester! that's something of the least, Master Matthew, let's see it.

Sim. You have had fifteen sixpences now.

Dick. Never mind that—I'll pay you all at my benefit.

Sim. I don't doubt that, master—but mum.

Dick. Thus far we run before the wind.—An apothecary!—make an apothecary of me!—what, cramp my genius over a pestle and mortar, or mew me up in a shop, with an alligator stuffed, and a beggarly account of empty boxes!—to be culling simples, and constantly adding to the bills of mortality!—No, no! it will be much better to be pasted up in capitals—The part of Romeo by a young gentleman who never appeared on any stage before!—My ambition fires at the thought.—But hold, mayn't I run some chance of failing in my attempt;—hissed, pelted, laughed at, not admitted into the Green-room.—That will never do.—Down, busy devil, down, down.—Try it again. Loved by the women, envied by the men, applauded by the pit, clapped by the gallery, admired by the boxes.—“Dear colonel, is not he a charming creature?”—“My lord, don't you like him of all things?”—“Makes love like an angel!”—“What an eye he has!”—“Fine legs!”—“I'll certainly go to his benefit.”—Celestial sounds!—And then I'll get in with all the painters, and have myself put up in every print-shop—in the character of Macbeth! “This is a sorry sight.” [Stands in an attitude.] In the character of Richard—“Give me another horse; bind up my wounds.”—This will do rarely—And then I have a chance of getting well married—O, glorious thought!—By heaven I will enjoy it, though but in fancy.—But what's o'clock!—it must be almost nine. I'll away at once: this is club-night.—Egad, I'll go to them for awhile.—The spouters are all met—little they think I'm in town—they'll be surprised to see me.—Off I go, and then for my assignation with my Master Gargle's daughter—poor Charlotte!—she's locked up, but I shall find means to settle matters for her escape; she's a pretty theatrical genis.—If she flies to my arms like a hawk to its perch it will be so rare an adventure, and so dramatic an incident.—

Limbs! do your office, and support me well; Bear me bit to her, then fall me if you can.

[Exit.]

ACT II

SCENE I.—Discovers the Spouting Club.

The President and MEMBERS seated.

Pres. Come, we'll fill a measure the table round. Now good digestion wait on appetite, and health on both. Come give us a speech.

Scots. Come now, I'll gi'e you a touch of Moebeeth.

I Mem. That will be rare. Come, let's have it.

Scots. What dost lie at, mon? I have had muckle applause at Edinburgh, when I enacted in the Reegicede; and now I intend to do Moebeeth

—I seed the degger yesternet, and I thought I should ha'e killed every one that came in my way.

Irish. Stand out of the way, lads, and see me give a touch of Othollo, my dear. [Takes the cork, burns it, and blacks his face.] The devil burn the cork, it here, I'll do it fast enough.

I Mem. Here, here, I'll lend you a helping hand.

[Blacks him; knocking at the door.]

Pres. Open locks, whoever knocks.

Enter DICK.

Dick. How now, ye secret, black, and midnight hags? What is't ye do? How fare the honest partners of my heart? What bloody scene has Roscius now to act? Arrah, my dear cousin Mackshane, won't you put a remembrance on me?

Irish. Ow! but is it mocking you are? Look ye, my dear, if you'd be taking me off—don't you call it taking off!—by my shoul, I'd be making you take yourself off. What, if you're for being obstroporous, I would not matter you three skips of a flea.

Dick. Nay, pr'ythee, no offence, I hope we shall be brother players.

Irish. Ow! then we'd be very good friends; for you know two of a trade can never agree, my dear.

Dick. What do you intend to appear in?

Irish. Othollo, my dear; let me alone; you'll see how I'll bodder 'em; though by my shoul, myself does not know but I'll be frightened when every thing is in a hub-bub, and nothing to be heard, but “Throw him over.” “Over with him.” “Off, off, off the stage.” “Music.” Ow! but may be the dear craters in the boxes will be lucking at my legs, ow! to be sure, the devil burn the luck they'll give 'em.

Dick. I shall certainly laugh in the fellow's face. [Aside.]

Scots. Stay till you hear me gi'e a specimen of elocation.

Dick. What, with that impediment, Sir?

Scots. Impediment! what impediment? I do not leesp, do I? I do not squeent; I am well leemed, am I not?

Irish. By my shoul, if you go to that, I am as well timbered myself as any of them, and shall make a figure in genteel and top comedy.

Scots. I'll give you a specimen of Moebeeth.

Irish. Make haste then, and I'll begin Othollo.

Scots. Is this a dagger that I see before me, &c.

Irish. [Collaring him.] William, be sure you prove my love a whore, &c.

[Another MEMBER comes forward, with his face powdered, and a pipe in his hand.]

Mem. I am thy father's spirit, Hamlet—

Irish. You are my father's spirit? My mother was a better man than ever you was.

Dick. Pho! pr'ythee! you are not fat enough for a ghost.

Mem. I intend to make my first appearance in it for all that; only I'm puzzled about one thing, I want to know, when I come in first, whether I should make a bow to the audience?

Watch. [Behind the scenes.] Past five o'clock, cloudy morning.

Dick. Hey! past five o'clock; 'sdeath, I shall miss my appointment with Charlotte; I have staid too long, and shall lose my proselyte. Come, let us adjourn. We'll scower the watch; confu sion to morality; I wish the constable were married.—Huzza! huzza!

All. Huzza, Huzza! [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Street.

Enter DICK, with a lantern and ladder.

Dick. All's quiet here; the coast's clear—now for my adventure with Charlotte; this ladder will do rarely for the business, though it would be better if it were a ladder of ropes—but hold; have I not seen something like this on the stage? yes I have, in some of the entertainments. Ay, I remember an apothecary, and here about he dwells—this is my Master Gargle's; being dark, the beggar's shop is shut; what, ho! apothecary! but soft, what light breaks through yonder window? It is the east, and Juliet is the sun; arise, fair sun, &c.

CHARLOTTE appears at a window.

Char. Who's there; my Romeo?

Dick. The same, my love, if it not thee displease.

Char. Hush! not so loud; you'll waken my father.

Dick. Alas! there is more peril in thine eye—

Char. Nay, but pry'thee now: I tell you, you'll spoil all. What made you stay so long?

Dick. Chide not, my fair; but let the god of love laugh in thy eyes, and revel in thy heart.

Char. As I am a living soul, you'll ruin every thing; be but quiet, and I'll come down to you.

Dick. No, no, not so fast; Charlotte, let us act the garden scene first—

Char. A fiddlestick for the garden scene.

Dick. Nay, then, I'll act Ranger; up I go, neck or nothing.

Char. Dear heart, you're enough to frighten a body out of one's wits. Don't come up; I tell you there's no occasion for the ladder. I have settled every thing with Simon, and he's to let me through the shop, when he opens it.

Dick. Well, but I tell you I would not give a farthing for it without the ladder, and so up I go; if it was as high as the garret, up I go.

Enter SIMON, at the door.

Sim. Sir, Sir; Madam, Madam—

Dick. Pry'thee be quiet, Simon, I am ascending the high top-gallant of my joy.

Sim. An't please you, master, my young mistress may come through the shop; I am going to sweep it out, and she may escape that way last enow.

Char. That will do purely; and so do you stay where you are, and prepare to receive me.

Sim. Master, leave that there, to save me from being respected.

Dick. With all my heart, Simon.

Enter CHARLOTTE.

Char. O, lud! I'm frightened out of my wits; feel with what a pit-a-pat action my heart beats.

Dick. 'Tis an alarm to love; quick, let me snatch thee to thy Romeo's arms, &c.

Watch. [Behind the scenes.] Past six o'clock, and a cloudy morning.

Dick. Is that the raven's voice I hear?

Sim. No, master, it's the watchman's.

Char. Dear heart, don't let us stand fooling here, as I live and breathe we shall both be taken; do, for heaven's sake, let us make our escape.

Dick. Yes, my dear Charlotte, we will go together;

Together to the theatre we'll go,
There to their ravish'd eyes our skill we'll show.
And point new beauties—to the pit below.

[Exit with CHARLOTTE.]

Sim. And I to sweep my master's shop will go.
[Exit into the house, and shuts the door.]

Enter a WATCHMAN.

Watch. Past six o'clock, and a cloudy morning—Hey-day! what's here? A ladder at Master Gargle's window! I must alarm the family—Ho! Master Gargle!

[Knocks at the door.]

Gar. [Above.] What's the matter? How comes this window to be open? Ha! a ladder! Who's below there?

Watch. I hope you an't robbed, Master Gargle? As I was going my rounds, I found your window open.

Gar. I fear, that is some of that young dog's tricks. Take away the ladder; I must inquire into all this. [Exit.]

Re-enter SIMON like Scrub.

Sim. Thieves! murder! thieves! popery!—

Watch. What's the matter with the fellow?

Sim. Spare all I have, and take my life!

Watch. Any mischief in the house?

Sim. They broke in with fire and sword; they'll be here this minute.

Watch. What, are there thieves in the house?

Sim. With sword and pistol, Sir.

Watch. How many are there of them?

Sim. Five-and-forty.

Watch. Nay, then 'tis time for me to go. [Exit.]

Enter GARGLE.

Gar. Dear heart! dear heart! she's gone, she's gone!—my daughter, my daughter!—What's the fellow in such a fright for?

Sim. Down on your knees, down on your marrow-bones, down on your marrow-bones.

Gar. Get up, you fool, get up. Dear heart, I'm all in a fermentation.

Enter WINGATE.

Win. So, friend Gargle,—you're up early, I see—nothing like rising early—nothing to be got by lying in bed, like a lubberly fellow—what's the matter with you? ha! ha! you look like a—ha! ha!—

Gar. Oh—no wonder—my daughter, my daughter!

Win. Your daughter! what signifies a foolish girl?

Gar. Oh dear heart! dear heart!—out of the window.

Win. Fallen out of the window!—well, she was a woman, and 'tis no matter—if she's dead, she's provided for.—Here, I found the book—could not meet with it last night.—Here, friend Gargle, take the book, and give it that scoundrel of a fellow.

Gar. Lord, Sir, he's returned to his tricks.

Win. Returned to his tricks!—what,—broke loose again?

Gar. Ay, and carried off my daughter with him.

Win. Carried off your daughter—how did the rascal contrive that?

Gar. Oh, dear Sir,—the watch alarmed us awhile ago, and I found a ladder at the window—so I suppose my young Madam made her escape that way.

Win. I'll never see the fellow's face.

Sim. Secrets! secrets!

Win. What, are you in the secret friend?

Sim. To be sure, there be secrets in all families—but, for my part, I'll not speak a word pro or con, till there's a peace.

Win. You won't speak, Sirrah!—I'll make you speak—do you know nothing of this, numscull?

Sim. Who I, Sir?—he came home last night from your house, and went out again directly.

Win. You saw him then—

Sim. Yes, Sir,—saw him to be sure, Sir—he made me open the shop-door for him—he stopped on the threshold, and pointed at one of the clouds, and asked me if it was not like an ouzel?

Win. Like an ouzel—wounds! what's an ouzel?

Gar. And the young dog came back in the dead of night, to steal away my daughter.

Enter a PORTER.

Win. Who are you, pray?—what do you want?

Por. Is one Mr. Gargle here?

Gar. Yes—who wants him?

Por. Here's a letter for you.

Gar. Let me see it. Oh, dear heart!—[Reads.] "To Mr. Gargle, at the Pestle and Mortar"—sidikins, this is a letter from that unfortunate young fellow.

Win. Let me see it, Gargle. [Reads.]

"To Mr. Gargle, &c.

"Most potent, grave, and reverend doctor, my very noble and approved good master, that I have to'en away your daughter it is most true, true I will marry her—'tis true, 'tis pity, and pity 'tis, 'tis true."—What in the name of common sense is all this? "I have done your shop some service, and you know it; no more of that—yet I could wish, that at this time I had not been this thing,"—what can the fellow mean?—"for time may have yet one fated hour to come, which, winged with liberty, may overtake occasion past."—Overtake occasion past!—no, no, time and tide wait for no man—"I expect redress from thy noble sorrows—thine and my poor country's ever,

"R. WINGATE."

Mad as a March hare! I have done with him—let him stay till the shoe pinches, a crack-brained numscull.

Por. An't please ye, Sir, I fancied the gentleman is a little beside himself—he took hold on me here by the collar, and called me villain, and bid me prove his wife a whore—Lord help him, I never see'd the gentleman's spouse in my born days before.

Gar. Is she with him now?

Por. I believe so—there is a likely young woman with him, all in tears.

Gar. My daughter, to be sure.

Por. I fancy, master, the gentleman's under troubles—I brought it from a spunging-house.

Win. From a spunging-house!

Por. Yes, Sir, in Gray's Inn-lane.

Win. Lef him aie there, let him lie there—I am glad of it—

Gar. Do, my dear Sir, let us step to him.

Win. No, not I, let him stay there—this it is to have a genius—ha! ha!—a genius! ha! ha!—a genius is a fine thing indeed!—ha! ha!

[Exit,

Gar. Poor man! he has certainly a fever on his spirits—do you step in with me, honest man, till I slip on my coat, and then I'll go after this unfortunate boy.

Por. Yes, Sir,—'tis in Gray's Inn-lane.

[Exeunt.

SCENE III.—Spunging House.

DICK and BAILIFF at a table, and CHARLOTTE sitting in a disconsolate manner by him.

Bail. Here's my service to you, young gentleman—don't be uneasy—the debt is not much—why do you look so sad?

Dick. Because captivity has robbed me of a just and dear diversion.

Bail. Never look sulky to me—I never see any body ill—come, it has been many a good man's lot—here's my service to you—but we've no liquor—come, we'll have t'other bowl.

Dick. I've now not fifty ducats in the world—yet still I am in love, and pleased with ruin.

Bail. What do you say?—you've fifty shillings, I hope.

Dick. Now, thank heaven! I'm not worth a groat.

Bail. Then there's no credit here, I can tell you that—you must get bail, or go to Newgate—who do you think is to pay house-rent for you?—Such poverty-struck devils as you shan't stay in my house—you shall go to quod, I can tell you that. [Knocking at the door.] Coming, coming, I am coming—I shall lodge you in Newgate, I promise you, before night,—not worth a groat!—you're a fine fellow to stay in a man's house—you shall go to quod. [Exit.

Dick. Come, clear up, Charlotte, never mind this—come, now—let us act the prison-scene in the Mourning Bride.

Char. How can you think of acting speeches, when we're in such distress?

Dick. Nay, but my dear angel—

Enter WINGATE and GARGLE.

Come, now we'll practise an attitude—how many of 'em have you?

Char. Let me see,—one—two—three—and then in the fourth act, and then—O gemini, I have ten at least.

Dick. That will do swimmingly—I've a round dozen myself—come, now begin—you fancy me dead, and I think the same of you—now mind.

[They stand in attitudes.

Win. Only mind the villain.

Dick. O thou soft fleeting form of Lindamira!

Char. Illusive shade of my beloved lord!

Dick. She 'lives, she speaks, and we shall still be happy!

Win. You lie, you villain, you shan't be happy, [Knocks him down.

Dick. [On the ground.] Perdition catch your arm, the chance is thine.

Gar. So, my young madam—I have found you agsin.

Dick. Capulet, forbear; Paris, let loose your hold—she is my wife—our hearts are twined together.

Win. Sirrah! villain! I'll break every bone in your body. [Strikes him.]

Dick. Parents have flinty hearts, no tears can move 'em; children must be wretched.

Win. Get off the ground, you villain; get off the ground.

Dick. 'Tis a pity there are no scene-drawers to lift me.

Win. 'Tis mighty well, young man—zookers! I made my own fortune; and I'll take a boy out of the Blue-coat Hospital, and give him all I have. Look ye here, friend Gargle.—You know I'm not a hard-hearted man—the scoundrel, you know, nas robbed me; so d'ye see, I won't hang him,—I'll only transport the fellow—and so, Mr. Catchpole, you may take him to Newgate.

Gar. Well, but, dear Sir, you know I always intended to marry my daughter into your family; and if you let the young man be ruined, my money must all go into another channel.

Win. How's that?—into another channel! must not lose the handling o' his money—Why, I told you, friend Gargle, I'm not a hard-hearted man. Ha! ha!—why, if the blockhead would but get as many crabbed physical words from Hippocrates and Allen, as he has from his nonsensical trumpery,—ha! ha!—I don't know, between you and I, but he might pass for a very good physician.

Dick. And must I leave thee, Juliet?

Char. Nay, but, prythee now have done with your speeches—you see we are brought to the last distress, and so you had better make it up.

[Apart to DICK.]

Dick. Why, for your sake, my dear, I don't care if I do. [Apart.—Sir, you shall find for the future, that we'll both endeavour to give you all the satisfaction in our power.

Win. Very well, that's right.

Dick. And since we don't go on the stage, 'tis some comfort that the world's a stage, and all the men and women merely players. Some play the upper, some the under, parts, And most assume what 's foreign to their hearts; Thus life is but a tragic-comic jest, And all is farce and mummery at best. [Exeunt.]

EPILOGUE.

ORIGINALLY SPOKEN BY MRS. CLIVE.

Enters, reading a Play-Bill.

A VERY pretty bill,—as I'm alive!
The part of—Nobody—by Mrs. Clive!

A paltry, scribbling fool—to leave me out—He'll say, perhaps—he thought I could not spout Malice and envy to the last degree! And why?—I wrote a farce as well as he; And fairly ventur'd it, without the aid Of prologue dress'd in black, and face in masque-rade.

O pit!—have pity—see how I'm dismay'd! Poor soul!—this canting stuff will never do, Unless, like Bayes, he brings his hangman too. But granting that from these same obsequies, Some pickings to our bard in black arise; Should your applause to joy convert his fear, As Pallas turns to feast—Lordella's bier; Yet 'twould have been a better scheme by half, T' have thrown his weeds aside, and learn'd with me to laugh.

I could have shown him, had he been inclin'd, A spouting junco of the female kind. There dwells a milliner in yonder row, Well dress'd, full voiced, and nobly built for show, Who, when in rage, she scolds at Sue and Sarah; Damn'd, damn'd, dissembler: thinks she's Madam Zara.

She has a daughter too, that deals in lace, And sings—O ponder well—and Chevy Chace, And fain would fill the fair Ophelia's place. And in her cock'd-up hat, and gown of camlet, Presumes on something—touching the Lord Hamlet.

A cousin too she has, with squinting eyes, With waddling gait, and voice like London Cries;

Who, for the stage too short by half a story, Acts Lady Townly—thus—in all her glory. And while she 's traversing the scanty room, Cries—"Lord, my lord, what can I do at home?" In short, there's girls enough for all the fellows, The ranting, whining, starting, and the jealous, The Hotspurs, Romeos, Hamlets, and Othellos. Oh! little do those silly people know What dreadful trials actors undergo. Myself, who most in harmony delight, Am scolding here from morning until night. Then take advice from me, ye giddy things, Ye royal milliners, ye apron'd kings; Young men, beware, and shun your slippery ways,

Study arithmetic, and burn your plays. And you, ye girls, let not our tinsel train Enchant your eyes, and turn your madd'ning brain;

Be timely wise, for oh! be sure of this,
A shop with virtue is the height of bliss.

JANE SHORE:

A TRAGEDY,

IN FIVE ACTS.

BY NICHOLAS ROWE.

REMARKS.

It has been observed, that Rowe seldom moves either pity or terror, but often elevates the sentiments; he seldom pierces the breast, but always delights the ear, and often improves the understanding. This excellent tragedy is always acted with great applause, and will, in one instance at least, prove the author's power to excite a powerful effect: consisting chiefly of domestic scenes and private distress, the play before us is an affecting appeal to pity, especially in the parting of Alicia and Hastings, the interview between Jane Shore and Alicia, and in the catastrophe. In the plot, Rowe has nearly followed the history of this misguided and unhappy fair one, and has produced an impressive moral lesson.

ALICIA,.....	Mrs. Porter	Mrs. Fawcett .

Lords of the Council, &c.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—The Tower.

Enter the DUKE OF GLOSTER, SIR RICHARD RATCLIFFE, and CATESBY.

Glos. Thus far success attends upon our councils,
 And each event has answer'd to my wish;
 The queen and all her upstart race are quell'd;
 Dorset is banish'd, and her brother Rivers,
 Ere this, lies shorter by the head at Pomfret.
 The nobles have, with joint concurrence, nam'd me
 Protector of the realm: my brother's children,
 Young Edward and the little York, are lodg'd
 Here, safe within the Tower. How say you, Sirs,
 Does not this business wear a lucky face?
 The sceptre and the golden wreath of royalty
 Seem hung within my reach.

Sir R. Then take 'em to you,
 And wear them long and worthily; you are

The last remaining male of princely York,
 (For Edward's boys, the state esteems not of 'em,)
 And therefore on your sov'reignty and rule
 The commonweal does her dependence make,
 And leans upon your highness' able hand.

Cates. And yet to-morrow does the council meet,
 To fix a day for Edward's coronation.

Who can expound this riddle?

Glos. That can I.

Those lords are each one my approv'd good friends,
 Of special trust and nearness to my bosom;
 And, howsoever busy they may seem,
 And diligent to bustle in the state,
 Their zeal goes on no further than we lead,
 And at our bidding stays.

Cates. Yet there is one,
 And he amongst the foremost in his power,
 Of whom I wish your highness were assur'd.
 For me, perhaps it is my nature's fault,
 I own I doubt of his inclining much.

Glos. I guess the man at whom your words would point;

Hastings—

Cates. The same.

Glos. He bears me great good will.

Cates. 'Tis true, to you, as to the lord protector, And Gloster's duke, he bows with lowly service; But were he bid to cry, God save king Richard, Then tell me in what terms he would reply. Believe me, I have prov'd the man, and found him: I know he bears a most religious reverence To his dead master Edward's royal memory, And whither that may lead him, is most plain. Yet more—One of that stubborn sort he is, Who, if they once grow fond of an opinion, They call it honour, honesty, and faith, And sooner part with life than let it go.

Glos. And yet this tough, impracticable heart, Is govern'd by a dainty-finger'd girl; Such flaws are found in the most worthy natures; "A laughing, toying, wheedling, whimpering she, Shall make him amble on a gossip's message, And take the distaff with a hand as patient As e'er did Hercules.

Sir R. The fair Alicia,

Of noble birth and exquisite of feature, Has held him long a vassal to her beauty.

Cates. I fear, he fails in his allegiance there; Or my intelligence is false, or else

The dame has been too lavish of her feast, And fed him till he loathes.

Glos. No more, he comes.

Enter LORD HASTINGS.

Lord H. Health, and the happiness of many days,

Attend upon your grace.

Glos. My good lord chamberlain,

We're much beholden to your gentle friendship.

Lord H. My lord, I come an humble suitor to you.

Glos. In right good time. Speak out your pleasure freely.

Lord H. I am to move your highness in behalf Of Shore's unhappy wife.

Glos. Say you, of Shore?

Lord H. Once a bright star, that held her place on high:

The first and fairest of our English dames,

While royal Edward held the sov'reign rule.

Now, sunk in grief and pining with despair,

Her waning form no longer shall incite

Envy in woman, or desire in man.

She never sees the sun, but through her tears,

And wakes to sigh the live-long night away.

Glos. Marry! the times are badly chang'd with her,

From Edward's days to these. Then all was jollity,

Feasting and mirth, light wantonness and laughter,

Piping and playing, minstrelsy and masking,

'Till life fled from us like an idle dream,

A show of mummy without a meaning.

My brother, rest and pardon to his soul,

Is gone to his account; for this his minion,

The revel-rout is done—But you were speaking,

Concerning her—I have been told, that you

Are frequent in your visitation to her.

Lord H. No further, my good lord, than friendly pity

And tender-hearted charity allow.

Glos. Go to: I did not mean to chide you for it.

For, sooth to say, I hold it noble in you

To cherish the distressed.—On with your tale.

Lord H. Thus it is, gracious Sir, that certain officers,

Using the warrant of your mighty name,

With insolence unjust, and lawless power,

Have seiz'd upon the lands which late she held

By grant, from her great master Edward's bounty

Glos. Somewhat of this, but slightly have I heard;

And though some counsellors of forward zeal,

Some of most ceremonious sanctity

And bearded wisdom, often have provok'd

The hand of justice to fall heavy on her;

Yet still, in kind compassion of her weakness,

And tender memory of Edward's love,

I have withheld the merciless stern law

From doing outrage on her helpless beauty.

Lord H. Good heaven, who renders mercy back for mercy,

With open-handed bounty shall repay you:

This gentle deed shall fairly be set foremost,

To screen the wild escapes of lawless passion,

And the long train of frailties flesh is heir to.

Glos. Thus far the voice of pity pleaded only:

Our further and more full extent of grace

Is given to your request. Let her attend,

And to ourself deliver up her griefs.

She shall be heard with patience, and each wrong

At full redress'd. But I have other news,

Which much import us both; for still my fortunes

Go hand in hand with yours: our common foes,

The queen's relations, our new-fangled gentry,

Have fall'n their haughty crests—that for your privacy. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—An apartment in JANE SHORE'S House.

Enter BELMOUR and DUMONT.

Bel. How she has liv'd you have heard my tale already;

The rest your own attendance in her family, Where I have found the means this day to place

you,

And nearer observation, best will tell you.

See with what sad and sober cheer she comes.

Enter JANE SHORE.

Sure, or I read her visage much amiss,

Or grief besets her hard. Save you, fair lady,

The blessings of the cheerful morn be on you,

And greet your beauty with its opening sweets.

Jane S. My gentle neighbour, your good wishes still Pursue my hapless fortunes! ah, good Belmour!

How few, like thee, inquire the wretched out,

And court the offices of soft humanity.

Like thee, reserve their raiment for the naked,

Reach out their bread to feed the crying orphan,

Or mix their pitying tears with those that weep.

Thy praise deserves a better tongue than mine,

To speak and blis thy name. Is this the gentleman,

Whose friendly service you commended to me?

Bel. Madam, it is.

Jane S. A venerable aspect! [Aside]

Age sits with decent grace upon his visage,

And worthily becomes his silver locks;

He wears the marks of many years well spent,

Of virtue, truth well tried, and wise experience;

A friend like this would suit my sorrows well.

Fortune, I fear me, Sir, has meant you ill,

Who pays your merit with that scanty pittance, [To DUMONT]

Which my poor hand and humble roof can give.
But to supply those golden vantages,
Which elsewhere you might find, expect to meet
A just regard and value for your worth,
The welcome of a friend, and the free partnership
Of all that little good the world allows me.

Dum. You over-rate me much; and all my answer

Must be my future truth; let that speak for me,
And make up my deserving.

Jane S. Are you of England?

Dum. No, gracious lady, Flanders claims my birth;

At Antwerp has my constant biding been,
Where sometimes I have known more plenteous days

Than these which now my failing age affords.

Jane S. Alas! at Antwerp! O, forgive my tears!
[Weeping.]

They fall for my offences—and must fall
Long, long, ere they shall wash my stains away.
You knew perhaps—O, grief! O, shame!—my husband.

Dum. I knew him well; but stay this flood of anguish.

The senseless grave feels not your pious sorrows:
Three years and more are past, since I was bid,
With many of our common friends, to wait him
To his last peaceful mansion. I attended,
Sprinkled his clay-cold cheer with holy drops,
According to our church's rev'rend rite,
And saw him laid, in hallow'd ground, to rest.

Jane S. Oh, that my soul had known no joy but him!

That I had liv'd within his guiltless arms,
And dying slept in innocence beside him!
But now his honest dust abhors the fellowship,
And scorns to mix with mine.

Enter a SERVANT.

Serv. The lady Alicia
Attends your leisure.

Jane S. Say, I wish to see her.

[Exit SERVANT.]

Please, gentle Sir, one moment to retire,
I'll wait you on the instant, and inform you
Of each unhappy circumstance, in which
Your friendly aid and counsel much may stead me.

[Exit BELMOUR and DUMONT.]

Enter ALICIA.

Alic. Still, my fair friend, still shall I find you thus?

Still shall these sighs heave after one another,
These trickling drops chase one another still,
As if the posting messengers of grief
Could overtake the hours fled far away,
And make old time come back?

Jane S. No, my Alicia,

Heaven and his saints be witness to my thoughts,
There is no hour of all my life o'er-past,
That I could wish should take its turn again.

Alic. And yet some of those days my friend has known,

Some of those years might pass for golden ones,
At least if womankind can judge of happiness.
What could we wish, we who delight in empire,
Whose beauty is our sov'reign good, and gives us
Our reasons to rebel, and power to reign;
What could we more than to behold a monarch,
Lovely, renown'd, a conqueror, and young,
Bound in our chains, and sighing at our feet?

Jane S. 'Tis true, the royal Edward was a wonder,

The goodly pride of all our English youth;
He was the very joy of all that saw him,
Form'd to delight, to love, and to persuade.
But what had I to do with kings and courts?
My humble lot had cast me far beneath him;
And that he was the first of all mankind,
The bravest, and most lovely, was my curse.

Alic. Sure something more than fortune join'd your loves:

Nor could his greatness, and his gracious form,
Be elsewhere match'd so well, as to the sweetness
And beauty of my friend.

Jane S. Name him no more:

He was the bane and ruin of my peace.
This anguish, and these tears, these are the legacies
His fatal love has left me. Thou wilt see me,
Believe me, my Alicia, thou wilt see me,
Ere yet a few short days pass o'er my head,
Abandon'd to the very utmost wretchedness.
The hand of power has seiz'd almost the whole
Of what was left for needy life's support;
Shortly thou wilt behold me poor, and kneeling
Before thy charitable door for bread.

Alic. Joy of my life, my dearest Shore, forbear
To wound my heart with thy forboding sorrows;
Raise thy sad soul to better hopes than these,
Lift up thy eyes, and let them shine once more,
Bright as the morning sun above the mist.
Exert thy charms, seek out the stern protector,
And sooth his savage temper with thy beauty;
Spite of his deadly, unrelenting, nature,
He shall be mov'd to pity, and redress thee.

Jane S. My form, alas! has long forgot to please:
The scene of beauty and delight is chang'd;
No roses bloom upon my fading cheek,
Nor laughing graces wanton in my eyes;
But haggard grief, lean-looking, sallow care,
And pining discontent, a rueful train,
Dwell on my brow, all hideous and forlorn.
One only shadow of a hope is left me;
The noble-minded Hastings, of his goodness,
Has kindly underta'en to be my advocate,
And move my humble suit to angry Gloster.

Alic. Does Hastings undertake to plead your cause?

But wherefore should he not? Hastings has eyes:
The gentle lord has a right tender heart,
Melting and easy, yielding to impression,
And catching the soft flame from each new beauty;
But yours shall charm him long.

Jane S. Away, you flatterer!

Nor charge his gen'rous meanness with a weakness
Which his great soul and virtue must disdain.
Too much of love thy hapless friend has prov'd.
Too many giddy, foolish, hours are gone,
And in fantastic measures danc'd away:
May the remaining few know only friendship:
So thou, my dearest, truest, best, Alicia,
Vouchsafe to lodge me in thy gentle heart,
A partner there, I will give up mankind,
Forget the transports of increasing passion,
And all the pangs we feel for its decay.

Alic. Live! live and reign for ever in my bosom;
[Embracing.]

Safe and untrivall'd there, possess thy own;
And you, the brightest of the stars above,
Ye saints, that once were women here below,
Be witness of the truth, the holy friendship,
Which here to this my other self I vow
If I not hold her nearer to my soul,

Than every other joy the world can give,
Let poverty, deformity, and shame,
Distraction and despair, seize me on earth,
Let not my faithless ghost have peace hereafter,
Nor taste the bliss of your celestial fellowship!

Jane S. Yes, thou art true, and only thou art true;

Therefore, these jewels, once the lavish bounty
Of royal Edward's love, I trust to thee;
[Giving a Casket.]

Receive this, all that I can call my own,
And let it rest unknown, and safe with thee:
That, if the state's injustice should oppress me,
Strip me of all, and turn me out a wanderer,
My wretchedness may find relief from thee,
And shelter from the storm.

Alic. My all is thine;

One common hazard shall attend us both,
And both be fortunate, or both be wretched.
But let thy fearful, doubting, heart be still;
The saints and angels have thee in their charge,
And all things shall be well. Think not, the good,
The gentle, deeds of mercy thou hast done,
Shall die forgotten all; the poor, the pris'ner,
The fatherless, the friendless, and the widow,
Who daily own the bounty of thy hand,
Shall cry to heaven, and pull a blessing on thee.
Even man, the merciless insulter, man,
Man, who rejoices in our sex's weakness,
Shall pity thee, and with unwon'd goodness
Forget thy failings, and record thy praise.

Jane S. Why should I think that man will do for me,

What yet he never did for wretches like me?
Mark by what partial justice we are judg'd;
Such is the fate unhappy women find,
And such the curse entail'd upon our kind,
That man, the lawless libertine, may rove,
Free and unquestion'd through the wilds of love;
While woman,—sense and nature's easy fool,
If poor weak woman swerve from virtue's rule;
If, strongly charm'd, she leave the thorny way,
And in the softer paths of pleasure stray;
Ruin ensues, reproach and endless shame,
And one false step entirely damns her fame;
In vain, with tears the loss she may deplore,
In vain, look back on what she was before;
She sets, like stars that fall, to rise no more.

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—An Apartment in JANE SHORE'S House.

Enter ALICIA, speaking to JANE SHORE as entering.

Alic. No further, gentle friend; good angels guard you,
And spread their gracious wings about your slumbers.

The drowsy night grows on the world, and now
The busy craftsman, and the o'er-labour'd hind
Forget the travail of the day in sleep:
Care only wakes, and moping pensiveness;
With meagre discontented looks they sit,
And watch the wasting of the midnight taper.
Such vigils must I keep, so wakes my soul,
Restless and self-tormented! O, false Hastings!
Thou hast destroyed my peace.

What noise is that?

[Knocking without.]

What visitor is this, who, with bold freedom,
Breaks in upon the peaceful night and rest,
With such a rude approach?

Enter a SERVANT.

Serv. One from the court,
Lord Hastings (as I think) demands my lady.

Alic. Hastings! Be still, my heart, and try to meet him

With his own arts! with falsehood.—But he comes.

Enter LORD HASTINGS, speaking to a Servant as entering.

Lord H. Dismiss my train, and wait alone without.

Alicia here! Unfortunate encounter!
But be it as it may.

Alic. When humbly, thus,
The great descend to visit the afflicted,
When thus, unmindful of their rest, they come
To sooth the sorrows of the midnight mourner,
Comfort comes with them; like the golden sun,
Dispels the sullen shades with her sweet influence,
And cheers the melancholy house of care.

Lord H. 'Tis true, I would not over-rate a courtesy,

Nor let the coldness of delay hang on it,
To nip and blast its favour, like a frost;
But rather chose, at this late hour, to come,
That your fair friend may know I have prevail'd;
The lord protector has receiv'd her suit,
And means to show her grace.

Alic. My friend! my lord.

Lord H. Yes, lady, yours; none has a right more ample

To tax my power than you.

Alic. I want the words

To pay you back a compliment so courtly;
But my heart guesses at the friendly meaning,
And wo' not die your debtor.

Lord H. 'Tis well, Madam:

But I would see your friend.

Alic. Oh, thou false lord!

I would be mistress of my heaving heart,
Stifle this rising rage, and learn from thee
To dress my face in easy, dull, indiff'rence;
But 'two' not be; my wrongs will tear their way,
And rush at once upon thee.

Lord H. Are you wise?

Have you the use of reason? Do you wake?

What means this raving, this transporting passion?

Alic. O thou cool traitor! thou insulting tyrant!

Dost thou behold my poor, distracted heart,
Thus rent with agonizing love and rage,
And ask me what it means? Art thou not false?
Am I not scorn'd, forsaken, and abandon'd;
Left, like a common wretch, to shame and infamy,
Given up to be the sport of villain's tongues,
Of laughing parasites, and lewd buffoons?
And all because my soul has deated on thee
With love, with truth, and tenderness unutterable!

Lord H. Are these the proofs of tenderness and love?

These endless quarrels, discontents, and jealousies,
These never-ceasing wailings and complainings,
These furious starts, these whirlwinds of the soul,
Which every other moment, rise to madness?

Alic. What proof, alas! have I not given of love?
What have I not abandon'd to thy arms?

Have I not set at nought my noble birth,

A spotless fame, and an unblemish'd race,

The peace of innocence, and pride of virtue?

My prodigality has given thee all ;
And now, I've nothing left me to bestow,
You hate the wretched bankrupt you have made.

Lord H. Why am I thus pursued from place to place,

Kept in the view, and cross'd at every turn ?
In vain I fly, and, like a hunted deer,
Scud o'er the lawns, and hasten to the covert ;
Ere I can reach my safety, you o'ertake me
With the swift malice of some keen reproach,
And drive the winged shaft deep in my heart.

Alic. Hither you fly, and here you seek repose ;
Spite of the poor deceit, your arts are known,
Your pious, charitable, midnight visits.

Lord H. If you are wise, and prize your peace of mind,

Yet take the friendly counsel of my love ;
Believe me true, nor listen to your jealousy.
Let not that devil, which undoes your sex,
That cursed curiosity, seduce you
To hunt for needless secrets, which, neglected,
Shall never hurt your quiet ; but, once known,
Shall sit upon your heart, pinch it with pain,
And banish the sweet sleep for ever from you.
Go to—be yet advis'd.—

Alic. Dost thou in scorn
Preach patience to my rage, and bid me tamely
Sit, like a poor contented idiot, down,
Nor dare to think thou'st wrong'd me ? Ruin seize
thee,

And swift perdition overtake thy treachery !
Have I the least remaining cause to doubt ?
Hast thou endeavour'd once to hide thy falsehood ?
To hide it might have spoke some little tenderness,
And shown thee half unwilling to undo me ;
But thou disdain'st the weakness of humanity ;
Thy words, and all thy actions, have confessed it ;
Even now thy eyes avow it, now they speak,
And insolently own the glorious villany.

Lord H. Well then, I own my heart has broke your chains.

Patient, I bore the painful bondage long,
At length my gen'rous love disdains your tyranny ;
The bitterness and stings of taunting jealousy,
Vexatious days, and jarring, joyless nights,
Have driven him forth to seek some safer shelter,
Where he may rest his weary wings in peace.

Alic. You triumph!—do! and with gigantic pride

Defy impending vengeance. Heaven shall wink ;
No more his arm shall roll the dreadful thunder,
Nor send his lightnings forth : no more his justice
Shall visit the presuming sons of men,
But perjury, like thine, shall dwell in safety.

Lord H. What'e'r my fate decrees for me hereafter,

Be present to me now, my better angel !
Preserve me from the storm that threatens now,
And, if I have beyond atonement sinn'd,
Let any other kind of plague o'ertake me,
So I escape the fury of that tongue.

Alic. Thy prayer is heard—I go—but know,
proud lord,

Howe'er thou scorn'st the weakness of my sex,
This feeble hand may find the means to reach
thee,

Howe'er sublime in power and greatness plac'd,
With roval favour guarded round and grac'd ;
On eagle's wings my rage shall urge her flight,
And hurl thee headlong from thy topmost height ;
Then, like thy fate, superior will I sit,
And view thee fallen, and grov'ling at my feet ;

Vol. 1. . . . L

See thy last breath with indignation go,
And tread thee sinking to the shades below.

Lord H. How fierce a fiend is passion ! With what wildness,

What tyranny untaim'd, it reigns in woman !
Unhappy sex ! whose easy yielding temper
Gives way to every appetite alike :
And love in their weak bosoms is a rage
As terrible as hate, and as destructive.
But soft ye now—for here comes one, disclaims
Strife and her wrangling train ; of equal elements,
Without one jarring atom, was she form'd,
And gentleness and joy make up her being.

Enter JANE SHORE.

Forgive me, fair one, if officious friendship
Intrudes on your repose, and comes thus late
To greet you with the tidings of success.
The princely Gloster has vouchsaf'd your hearing,
To-morrow he expects you at the court ;
There plead your cause, with never-failing beauty,
Speak all your griefs, and find a full redress.

Jane S. Thus humbly let your lowly servant bend ;

Thus let me bow my grateful knee to earth,
And bless your noble nature for this goodness.

Lord H. Rise, gentle dame, you wrong my meaning much,

Think me not guilty of a thought so vain,
To sell my courtesy for thanks like these.

Jane S. 'Tis true, your bounty is beyond my speaking :

But, though my mouth be dumb, my heart shall thank you ;

And when it melts before the throne of mercy,
Mourning and bleeding for my past offences,
My fervent soul shall breathe one prayer for you,
That heaven will pay you back, when most you need,

The grace and goodness you have shown to me.

Lord H. If there be aught of merit in my service,

Impute it there, where most 'tis due, to love ;
Be kind, my gentle mistress, to my wishes,
And satisfy my panting heart with beauty.

Jane S. Alas ! my lord—

Lord H. Why bend thy eyes to earth ?

Wherefore these looks of heaviness and sorrow ?
Why breathes that sigh, my love ? And wherefore falls

This tricking shower of tears, to stain thy sweetness ?

Jane S. If pity dwells within your noble breast,
(As sure it does,) oh, speak not to me thus.

Lord H. Can I behold thee, and not speak of love ?

Even now, thus sadly as thou stand'st before me,
Thus desolate, dejected, and forlorn,
Thy softness steals upon my yielding senses,
Till my soul faints, and sickens with desire ;
How canst thou give this motion to my heart,
And bid my tongue be still ?

Jane S. Cast round your eyes

Upon the high-born beauties of the court ;
Behold, like opening roses, where they bloom,
Sweet to the sense, unsully'd all ; and spotless ;
There choose some worthy partner of your heart,
To fill your arms and bless your virtuous bed ;
Nor turn your eyes this way.

Lord H. What means this peevish, this fantastic change ?

Where is thy wonted pleasantness of face,
Thy wonted graces and thy dimpled smiles?
Where hast thou lost thy wit and sportive mirth?
That cheerful heart, which us'd to dance for ever,
And cast a ray of gladness all around thee?

Jane S. Yes, I will own I merit the reproach;
And for those foolish days of wanton pride,
My soul is justly humbled to the dust:
All tongues, like yours, are licens'd to upbraid me,
Still to repeat my guilt, and urge my infamy,
And treat me like that abject thing I have been.

Lord H. No more of this dull stuff. 'Tis time enough

To whine and mortify thyself with penance,
The present moment claims more gen'rous use;
Thy beauty, night, and solitude, reproach me,
For having talk'd thus long—come, let me press thee, [Laying hold of her.]

Pant on thy bosom, sink into thy arms,
And lose myself in the luxurious flood.

Jane S. Forbear, my lord!—here let me rather die, [Kneeling.]

And end my sorrows and my shame for ever.

Lord H. Away with this perverseness—
'tis too much.

Nay, if you strive—'tis monstrous affection!

Jane S. Retire! I beg you, leave me—[Striving.]

Lord H. Thus to coy it!—

With one who knows you too.—

Jane S. For mercy's sake—

Lord H. Ungrateful woman! Is it thus you pay
My services?—

Jane S. Abandon me to ruin—

Rather than urge me—

Lord H. This way to your chamber;
[Pulling her.]

There if you struggle—

Jane S. Help, O gracious heaven!
Help! Save me! Help! [Exit.]

Enter DUMONT; he interposes.

Dum. My lord! for honour's sake—

Lord H. Hah! What art thou?—Be gone!

Dum. My duty calls me

To my attendance on my mistress here.

Lord H. Avaunt! base groom—

At distance wait, and know thy office better.

Dum. No, my lord—

The common ties of manhood call me now,

And bid me thus stand up in the defence

Of an oppress'd, unhappy, helpless, woman.

Lord H. And dost thou know me, slave?

Dum. Yes, thou proud lord!

I know thee well; I know thee with each advantage,
Which wealth, or power, or noble birth, can give
thee.

I know thee too for one who stains those honours,
And blots a long illustrious line of ancestry,
By poorly daring thus to wrong a woman.

Lord H. 'Tis wondrous well! I see, my saint-like dame,

You stand provided of your braves and ruffians,

To man your cause, and bluster in your brothel.

Dum. Take back the foul reproach, unmanner'd railer!

Nor urge my rage too far, lest thou should'st find

I have as daring spirits in my blood

As thou or any of thy race e'er boasted;

And though no gaudy titles grac'd my birth,

Yet heaven, that made me honest, made me more

Than ever king did, when he made a lord.

Lord H. Insolent villain! henceforth let this teach thee, [Draws and strikes him.]

The distance 'twixt a peasant and a prince.

Dum. Nay then, my lord, [Drawing.] learn you by this, how well

An arm resolv'd can guard its master's life
[They fight; DUMONT disarms LORD

HASTINGS.]

Lord H. Confusion! baffled by a base-born hind!

Dum. Now, haughty Sir, where is our difference now?

Your life is in my hand, and did not honour,

The gentleness of blood, and inborn virtue,

(Howe'er unworthy I may seem to you,)

Plead in my bosom, I should take the forfeit.

But wear your sword again; and know, a lord,

Oppos'd against a man, is but a man.

Lord H. Curse on my failing hand! your better fortune

Has given you 'vantage o'er me; but perhaps

Your triumph may be bought with dear repentance. [Exit.]

Re-enter JANE SHORE.

Jane S. Alas! what have you done? Know
ye the power,

The mightiness, that waits upon this lord?

Dum. Fear not, my worthiest mistress; 'tis a cause

In which heaven's guards shall wait you. O pursue,

Pursue, the sacred counsels of your soul,

Which urge you on to virtue;

Assisting angels shall conduct your steps,

Bring you to bliss, and crown your days with peace.

Jane S. O that my head were laid, my sad eyes clos'd,

And my cold core wound in my shroud to rest!

My painful heart will never cease to beat,

Will never know a moment's peace, till then.

Dum. Would you be happy, leave this fatal
place;

Fly from the court's pernicious neighbourhood;

Where innocence is sham'd, and blushing modesty

Is made the scorn's jest; where hate, deceit,

And deadly ruin, wear the masks of beauty,

And draw deluded fools with shows of pleasure.

Jane S. Where should I fly, thus helpless and forlorn,

Of friends and all the means of life bereft?

Dum. Belmour, whose friendly care still wakes to serve you,

Has found you out a little peaceful refuge,

Far from the court and the tumultuous city.

Within an ancient forest's ample verge,

There stands a lonely but a healthful dwelling,

Built for convenience and the use of life:

Around it, fallows, meads, and pastures fair,

A little garden, and a limpid brook,

By nature's own contrivance seem'd dispos'd;

No neighbours, but a few poor simple clowns,

Honest and true, with a well-meaning priest:

No faction, or domestic fury's rage,

Did e'er disturb the quiet of that place,

When the contending nobles shook the land

With York and Lancaster's disputed sway.

Your virtue there may find a safe retreat

From the insulting powers of wicked greatness.

Jane S. Can there be so much happiness in store?

A cell like that is all my hopes aspire to.

Haste then, and thither let us take our flight,
Ere the clouds gather, and the wintry sky
Descends in storms to intercept our passage.

Dum. Will you then go? You glad my very soul.

Banish your fears, cast all your cares on me:
Plenty and ease, and peace of mind, shall wait you,
And make your latter days of life most happy.
O lady! but I must not, cannot, tell you,
How anxious I have been for all your dangers,
And how my heart rejoices at your safety.
So when the spring renews the flowery field,
And warns the pregnant nightingale to build,
She seeks the safest shelter of the wood,
Where she may trust her little tuneful brood;
Where no rude swains her shady cell may know,
No serpents climb, nor blasting winds may blow;
Fond of the chosen place, she views it o'er,
Sits there, and wanders through the grove no more;
Warbling, she charms it each returning night,
And loves it with a mother's dear delight.

[Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The Court.

Enter ALICIA, with a paper.

Alic. This paper to the great protector's hand
With care and secrecy must be convey'd:
His bold ambition now avows its aim,
To pluck the crown from Edward's infant brow,
And fix it on his own. I know he holds
My faithless Hastings adverse to his hopes,
And much devoted to the orphan king;
On that I build: this paper meets his doubts,
And marks my hated rival as the cause
Of Hastings' zeal for his dead master's sons.
O jealousy! thou bane of pleasing friendship,
How does thy rancour poison all our softness,
And turn our gentle natures into bitterness!
See, where she comes! once my heart's dearest
blessing,

Now my chang'd eyes are blasted with her beauty,
Loath that known face, and sicken to behold her.

Enter JANE SHORE.

Jane S. O my Alicia!

Alic. What new grief is this?
What unforeseen misfortune has surpris'd thee,
That racks thy tender heart thus?

Jane S. O Dumont!

Alic. Say, what of him?

Jane S. That friendly, honest, man,
Whom Belmour brought of late to my assistance,
On whose kind care, whose diligence and faith,
My surest trust was built, this very morn
Was seiz'd on by the cruel hand of power,
Forc'd from my house, and borne away to prison.
Alic. To prison, said you? can you guess the cause?

Jane S. Too well, I fear. His bold defence of me
Has drawn the vengeance of Lord Hastings on
him.

Alic. Lord Hastings! ha!

Jane S. Some fitter time must tell thee
The tale of my hard hap. Upon the present
Hang all my poor, my last remaining, hopes.
Within this paper is my suit contain'd;
Here, as the princely Gloster passes forth,
I wait to give it on my humble knees,

And move him for redress.

[She gives the paper to ALICIA, who opens and seems to read it.]

Alic. Now for a while,
To sting my thoughtless rival to the heart;
To blast her fatal beauties, and divide her
For ever from my perjur'd Hastings' eyes:
Their fashions are the same, it cannot fail.

[Aside: pulling out the other paper.]

Jane S. But see, the great protector comes this way.

Give me the paper, friend.

Alic. For love and vengeance!

[Aside: she gives her the other paper.]

Enter the DUKE OF GLOSTER, SIR RICHARD RATCLIFFE, CATESBY, Courtiers, and other Attendants.

Jane S. [Kneeling.] O noble Gloster, turn thy gracious eye,

Incline thy pitying ear to my complaint;
A poor, undone, forsaken, helpless, woman,
Entreats a little bread for charity,
To feed her wants, and save her life from perishing.

Glos. Arise, fair dame, and dry your wat'ry eyes.

[Receiving the paper, and raising her.]

Beshrew me, but 'twere pity of his heart
That could refuse a boon to such a sultress.
You've got a noble friend to be your advocate;
A worthy and right gentle lord he is,
And to his trust most true. This present now
Some matters of the state detain our leisure;
Those once despatch'd, we'll call for you anon,
And give your griefs redress. Go to! be comforted.

Jane S. Good heavens repay your highness for this pity,

And shower down blessings on your princely
head.

Come, my Alicia, reach thy friendly arm,
And help me to support this feeble frame,
That, nodding, totters with oppressive wo,
And sinks beneath its load.

[Exit JANE S. and ALIC.]

Glos. Now, by my holiday!

Heavy of heart she seems, and sore afflicted.
But thus it is when rude calamity
Lays its strong gripe upon these mincing minions;
The dainty gew-gaw forms dissolve at once,
And shiver at the shock. What says her paper?

[Seeming to read.]

Ha! What is this? Come nearer, Ratcliffe!
Catesby!

Mark the contents, and then divine the meaning.
[He reads.]

*Wonder not, princely Gloster, at the notice
This paper brings you from a friend unknown;
Lord Hastings is inclin'd to call you Master,
And kneel to Richard as to England's king;
But Shore's bewitching wife misleads his heart,
And draws his service to king Edward's sons:
Drive her away, you break the charm that holds
him,*

And he, and all his powers attend on you.

Sir R. 'Tis wonderful!

Cates. The means by which it came
Yet stranger too!

Glos. You saw it given, but now.

Sir R. She could not know the purport.

Glos. No, 'tis plain—
She knows it not, it levels at her life;

Should she presume to prate of such high matters,
The meddling harlot, dear she should abide it.

Cates. What hand so'er it comes from, be assur'd,

It means your highness well——

Glos. Upon the instant,

Lord Hastings will be here; this morn I mean
To prove him to the quick; then if he flinch,
No more but this—away with him at once,
He must be mine or nothing.—But he comes!
Draw nearer this way, and observe me well.

[They whisper.]

Enter LORD HASTINGS.

Lord H. This foolish woman hangs about my heart,

Lingers and wanders in my fancy still;
This coyness is put on, 'tis art and cunning,
And worn to urge desire—I must possess her.
The groom, who lift his saucy hand against me,
Ere this is humbled, and repents his daring.
Perhaps, even she may profit by th' example,
And teach her beauty not to scorn my power.

Glos. This do, and wait me ere the council sits.

[Exeunt RATCLIFFE and CATESBY.]

My lord, you're well encounter'd; here has been
A fair petitioner this morning with us;
Believe me, she has won me much to pity her:
Alas! her gentle nature was not made
To buffet with adversity. I told her
How worthily her cause you had befriended;
How much for your good sake we meant to do,
That you had spoke, and all things should be well.

Lord H. Your highness binds me ever to your service.

Glos. You know your friendship is most potent with us,

And shares our power. But of this enough,
For we have other matters for your ear.
The state is out of tune: distracting fears,
And jealous doubts, jar in our public councils.
Amidst the wealthy city, murmurs rise,
Lewd railings, and reproach on those that rule,
With open scorn of government; hence credit,
And public trust 'twixt man and man are broke.
The golden streams of commerce are withheld,
Which fed the wants of needy hinds and artizans,
Who therefore curse the great, and threat rebellion.

Lord H. The resty knaves are over-run with ease,

As plenty ever is the nurse of faction;
If, in good days, like these, the headstrong herd
Grow madly wanton and repine, it is Because the reins of power are held too slack,
And reverend authority of late
Has worn a face of mercy more than justice.

Glos. Beshrew my heart! but you have well divin'd

The source of these disorders. Who can wonder
If riot and misrule o'erturn the realm,
When the crown sits upon a baby brow?
Plainly to speak, hence comes the gen'ral cry,
And sum of all complaint: 'twill ne'er be well
With England (thus they talk) while children govern.

Lord H. 'Tis true, the king is young: but what of that?

We feel no want of Edward's riper years,
While Gloucester's valour and most princely wisdom
So well support our infant sov'reign's place,
His youth's support, and guardian to his throne.

Glos. The council (much I'm bound to thank 'em for)

Have plac'd a pageant sceptre in my hand,
Barren of power, and subject to control;
Scorn'd by my foes, and useless to my friends.
Oh, worthy lord! were mine the rule indeed,
I think I should not suffer rank offence
At large to lord it in the commonweal;
Nor would the realm be rent by discord thus,
Thus fear and doubt, betwixt disputed titles.

Lord H. Of this I am to learn; as not supposing
A doubt like this——

Glos. Ay, marry, but there is——

And that of much concern. Have you not heard
How, on a late occasion, Doctor Shaw
Has mov'd the people much about the lawfulness
Of Edward's issue? By right grave authority
Of learning and religion, plainly proving,
A bastard scion never should be grafted
Upon a royal stock; from thence at full
Discoursing on my brother's former contract
To lady Elizabeth Lucy, long before
His jolly match with that same buxom widow,
The queen he left behind him——

Lord H. Ill befall

Such meddling priests, who kindle up confusion,
And vex the quiet world with their vain scruples!
By heaven, 'tis done in perfect spite of peace.

Did not the king,
Our royal master, Edward, in concurrence
With his estates assembled, well determine What course the sov'reign rule should take henceforward?

When shall the deadly hate of faction cease,
When shall our long-divided land have rest,
If every peevish, moody, malecontent,
Shall set the senseless rabble in an uproar,
Fright them with dangers, and perplex their brains
Each day with some fantastic giddy change?

Glos. What if some patriot, for the public good,
Should vary from your scheme, new-mould the state?

Lord H. Curse on the innovating hand attempts it!

Remember him, the villain, righteous heaven,
In thy great day of vengeance! Blast the traitor
And his pernicious counsels; who, for wealth,
For power, the pride of greatness, or revenge,
Would plunge his native land in civil wars!

Glos. You go too far, my lord.

Lord H. Your highness' pardon——

Have we so soon forgot those days of ruin,
When York and Lancaster drew forth their battles;

When, like a matron butcher'd by her sons,
Our groaning country bled at every vein;
When murders, rapes, and massacres, prevail'd;
When churches, palaces, and cities blaz'd;
When insolence and barbarism triumph'd,
And swept away distinction: peasants trod
Upon the necks of nobles: low were laid
The reverend crosier and the holy mitre,
And desolation cover'd all the land?
Who can remember this, and not, like me,
Here vow to sheath a dagger in his heart,
Whose damn'd ambition would renew those horrors,

And set once more that scene of blood before us?

Glos. How now! so hot!

Lord H. So brave, and so resolved.

Glos. Is then our friendship of so little moment,
That you could arm your hand against my life?

Lord H. I hope your highness does not think I mean it;
No, heaven forbid that e'er your princely person
Should come within the scope of my resentment.
Glos. O noble Hastings! nay, I must embrace you;
By holy Paul, you're a right honest man!

[Embraces him.
The time is full of danger and distrust,
And warns us to be wary. Hold me not Too apt for jealousy and light surmise,
If, when I meant to lodge you next my heart,
I put your truth to trial. Keep your loyalty,
And live your king and country's best support:
For me, I ask no more than honour gives,
To think me yours, and rank me with your friends.

[Exit.
Lord H. I am not read,
Nor skill'd and practis'd in the arts of greatness,
To kindle thus, and give a scope to passion.
The duke is surely noble: but he touch'd me
Even on the tend'rest point; the master-string
That makes most harmony or discord to me.
I own the glorious subject fires my breast,
And my soul's darling passion stands confess'd;
Beyond or love's or friendship's sacred band,
Beyond myself, I prize my native land:
On this foundation would I build my fame,
And emulate the Greek and Roman name;
Think England's peace bought cheaply with my
blood,
And die with pleasure for my country's good.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—The same.

Enter DUKE OF GLOSTER, RATCLIFFE, and CATESBY.

Glos. This was the sum of all; that he would brook
No alteration in the present state.
Marry, at last, the testy gentleman
Was almost mov'd to bid us bold defiance:
But there I dropp'd the argument, and, changing
The first design and purport of my speech,
I prais'd his good affection to young Edward,
And left him to believe my thoughts like his.
Proceed we then in this foremention'd matter,
As nothing bound or trusting to his friendship.

Sir R. Ill does it thus befall. I could have wish'd
This lord had stood with us.
His name had been of vantage to your highness,
And stood our present purpose much in stead.

Glos. This wayward and perverse declining from us,
Has warrant'd at full the friendly notice,
Which we this morn receiv'd. I hold it certain,
The puling, whining harlot rules his reason,
And prompts his zeal for Edward's bastard brood.

Cates. If she has such dominion o'er his heart,
And turn it at her will, you rule her fate;
And should, by inference and apt deduction,
Be arbiter of his. Is not her bread,
The very means immediate to her being,
The bounty of your hand? Why does she live,
If not to yield obedience to your pleasure,
To speak, to act, to think, as you command!

Sir R. Let her instruct her tongue to bear your message;

Teach every grace to smile in your behalf,
And her deluded eyes to gloat for you;
His ductile reason will be wound about,
Be led and turn'd again, say and unsay,
Receive the yoke, and yield exact obedience.

Glos. Your counsel likes me well, it shall be follow'd,
She waits without, attending on her suit.
Go, call her in, and leave us here alone.

[Reënt RATCLIFFE and CATESBY.
How poor a thing is he, how worthy scorn,
Who leaves the guidance of imperial manhood
To such a paltry piece of stuff as this is!
A moppet made of prettiness and pride;
That oftener does her giddy fancies change,
Than glittering dew-drops in the sun do colour—
Now, shame upon it! was our reason given
For such a use; to be thus puff'd about?
Sure there is something more than witchcraft in
them,
That masters even the wisest of us all.

Enter JANE SHORE.

Oh! you are come most fitly. We have ponder'd
On this your grievance: and though some there are,
Nay, and those great ones too, who would enforce
The rigour of our power to afflict you,
And bear a heavy hand; yet fear not you:
We've ta'en you to our favour: our protection
Shall stand between, and shield you from mishap.

Jane S. The blessings of a heart with anguish broken
And rescu'd from despair, attend your highness.
Alas! my gracious lord, what have I done
To kindle such relentless wrath against me?

Glos. Marry, there are, though I believe them not,

Who say you meddle in affairs of state:
That you presume to prattle like a busy-body,
Give your advice, and teach the lords o' the council
What fits the order of the commonweal.

Jane S. Oh, that the busy world, at least in this,
Would take example from a wretch like me?
None then would waste their hours in foreign
thoughts,

Forget themselves, and what concerns their peace,
To search, with prying eyes, for faults abroad,
If all, like me, consider'd their own hearts,
And wept their sorrows which they found at home.

Glos. Go to; I know your power; and though I trust not

To every breath of fame, I'm not to learn
That Hastings is profess'd your loving vassal.
But fair befall your beauty: use it wisely,
And it may stand your fortunes much in stead,
Give back your forfeit land with large increase,
And place you high in safety and in honour.
Nay, I could point a way, the which pursuing,
You shall not only bring yourself advantage,
But give the realm much worthy cause to thank you.

Jane S. Oh! where or how—can my unworthy hand
Become an instrument of good to any?
Instruct your lowly slave, and let me fly
To yield obedience to your dread command.

Glos. Why, that's well said—Thus then—Observe me well.

The state, for many high and potent reasons,
Deeming my brother Edward's sons unfit
For the imperial weight of England's crown—

Jane S. Alas! for pity.

Glos. Therefore have resolv'd
To set aside their unavailing infancy
And vest the sov'reign rule in abler hands.
This, though of great importance to the public,
Hastings, for very peevishness, and spleen,
Does stubbornly oppose.

Jane S. Does he? Does Hastings?

Glos. Ay, Hastings.

Jane S. Reward him for the noble deed, just heavens!

For this one action, guard him and distinguish him
With signal mercies, and with great deliverance;
Save him from wrong, adversity, and shame,
Let never-fading honours flourish round him,
And consecrate his name, even to time's end.

Glos. How now!

Jane S. The poor, forsaken, royal little ones!
Shall they be left a prey to savage power?
Can they lift up their harmless hands in vain,
Or cry to heaven for help, and not be heard?
Impossible! O gallant, generous, Hastings,
Go on; pursue, assert, the sacred cause:
Stand forth, thou proxy of all-ruling Providence,
And save the friendless infants from oppression.
Saints shall assist thee with prevailing prayers,
And warring angels combat on thy side.

Glos. You're passing rich in this same heavenly speech,

And spend it at your pleasure. Nay, but mark me!
My favour is not bought with words like these.
Go to—you'll teach your tongue another tale.

Jane S. No, though the royal Edward has undone me,

He was my king, my gracious master, still;
He lov'd me too, though 'twas a guilty flame;
And can I—O my heart abhors the thought!
Stand by, and see his children robb'd of right?

Glos. Dare not, even for thy soul, to thwart me further!

None of your arts, your feigning, and your foolery;
Your dainty squeamish coying it to me;
Go—to your lord, your paramour, be gone!
Lisp in his ear, hang wanton on his neck,
And play your monkey gambols o'er to him.
You know my purpose, look that you pursue it,
And make him yield obedience to my will.
Do it—or wo upon the harlot's head.

Jane S. Oh that my tongue had every grace of speech,

Great and commanding, as the breath of kings;
That I had art and eloquence divine,
To pay my duty to my master's ashes,
And plead, till death, the cause of injur'd innocence.

Glos. Ha! Dost thou brave me, minion! Dost thou know

How vile, how very a wretch, my power can make thee?

That I can place thee in such abject state,
As help shall never find thee; where, repining,
Thou shalt sit down, and gnaw the earth for anguish;

Groan to the pitiless winds without return;
Howl, like the midnight wolf amidst the desert,
And curse thy life, in bitterness and misery!

Jane S. Let me be branded for the public scorn,
Turn'd forth and driven to wander like a vagabond,

Be friendless and forsaken, seek my bread
Upon the barren wild and desolate waste,
Feed on my sighs, and drink my falling tears,
Ere I consent to teach my lips injustice,
Or wrong the orphan, who has none to save him

Glos. 'Tis well—we'll try the temper of your heart.

What, ho! Who waits without?

Enter RATCLIFFE, CATESBY, and Attendants.

Go, some of you, and turn this strumpet forth!
Spurn her into the street; there let her perish,
And rot upon a dunghill. Through the city
See it proclaim'd, that none, on pain of death,
Presume to give her comfort, food, or harbour;
Who ministers the smallest comfort, dies.
Her house, her costly furniture and wealth,
We seize on, for the profit of the state.
Away! Be gone!

Jane S. Oh, thou most righteous Judge—
Humbly behold, I bow myself to thee,
And own thy justice in this hard decree:
No longer, then, my ripe offences spare,
But what I merit, let me learn to bear.
Yet, since 'tis all my wretchedness can give,
For my past crimes my forfeit life receive;
No pity for my sufferings here I crave,
And only hope forgiveness in the grave.

[Exit JANE SHORE, guarded by CATESBY and others.]

Glos. So much for this. Your project's at an end.
[To SIR RICHARD.]

This idle toy, this hilding, scorns my power,
And sets us all at nought. See that a guard
Be ready at my call—

Sir R. The council waits
Upon your highness' leisure.

Glos. I'll attend them.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—The Council Chamber.

The DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM, EARL OF DERBY, BISHOP OF ELY, LORD HASTINGS, and others, discovered in council. The DUKE OF GLOSTER enters, and takes his place at the upper end.

Der. In happy times we are assembled here,
To point the day, and fix the solemn pomp,
For placing England's crown, with all due rites,
Upon our sovereign Edward's youthful brow.

Lord H. Some busy, meddling knaves, 'tis said, there are,

As such will still be prating, who presume
To carp and cavil at his royal right;
Therefore, I hold it fitting, with the soonest,
T' appoint the order of the coronation;
So to approve our duty to the king,
And stay the babbling of such vain gainsayers.

Der. We all attend to know your highness' pleasure.
[To GLOSTER.]

Glos. My lords, a set of worthy men you are,
Prudent, and just, and careful for the state;
Therefore, to your most grave determination
I yield myself in all things; and demand
What punishment your wisdom shall think meet
T' inflict upon those damnable contrivers,
Who shall, with potions, charms, and witching drugs,

Practise against our person and our life!

Lord H. So much I hold the king your highness' debtor,

So precious are you to the commonweal,
That I presume, not only for myself,
But in behalf of these my noble brothers,
To say, who'er they be, they merit death.

Glos. Then judge yourselves, convince your eyes of truth:

Behold my arm, thus blasted, dry, and wither'd,
 [Pulling up his sleeves.
 Shrank like a foul abortion, and decay'd,
 Like some untimely product of the seasons,
 Robb'd of its properties of strength and office.
 This is the sorcery of Edward's wife,
 Who, in conjunction with that harlot Shore,
 And other like confederate, midnight hags,
 By force of potent spells, of bloody characters,
 And conjurations horrible to hear,
 Call fiends and spectres from the yawning deep,
 And set the ministers of hell at work,
 To torture and despoil me of my life.

Lord H. If they have done this deed——

Glos. If they have done it!

Talkest thou to me of ifs, audacious traitor!
 Thou art that strumpet witch's chief abettor,
 The patron and comploter of her mischiefs,
 And join'd in this contrivance for my death.
 Nay start not, lords—What, ho! a guard there, Sirs!

Enter Guards.

Lord Hastings, I arrest thee of high treason.
 Seize him, and bear him instantly away.
 He shall not live an hour. By holy Paul,
 I will not dine before his head be brought me.
 Ratcliffe, stay thou, and see that it be done:
 The rest, that love me, and follow me.

[Exit GLOSTER and LORDS.

LORD HASTINGS, SIR RICHARD RATCLIFFE, and Guards, remain.

Lord H. What! and no more but this—How!
 to the scaffold!

Oh, gentle Ratcliffe! tell me, do I hold thee?
 Or, if I dream, what shall I do to wake,
 To break, to struggle, through this dread confusion?

For surely death itself is not so painful
 As is this sudden horror and surprise.

Sir R. You heard the duke's commands to me were absolute.

Therefore, my lord, address you to your shrift,
 With all good speed you may. Summon your course,
 And be yourself; for you must die this instant.

Lord H. Yes, Ratcliffe, I will take thy friendly counsel,

And die as a man should; 'tis somewhat hard,
 To call my scatter'd spirits home at once:
 But since what must be, must be—let necessity
 Supply the place of time and preparation,
 And arm me for the blow. 'Tis but to die,
 'Tis but to venture on the common hazard,
 Which many a time in battle I have run;
 'Tis but to close my eyes and shut out daylight,
 To view no more the wicked ways of men,
 No longer to behold the tyrant Gloster,
 And be a weeping witness of the woes,
 The desolation, slaughter, and calamities,
 Which he shall bring on this unhappy land.

Enter ALICIA.

Alic. Stand off, and let me pass—I will, I must,
 Catch him once more in these despairing arms,
 And hold him to my heart.—O, Hastings! Hastings!

Lord H. Alas! why com'st thou at this dreadful moment,

To fill me with new terrors, new distractions;
 To turn me wild with thy distemper'd rage,
 And shock the peace of my departing soul?
 Away; I pry'thee, leave me!

Alic. Stop a minute——
 Till my full griefs find passage. O, the tyrant!
 Perdition fall on Gloster's head and mine.

Lord H. What means thy frantic grief?

Alic. I cannot speak——

But I have murder'd thee.—Oh, I could tell thee!

Lord H. Speak, and give ease to thy conflicting passion!

Be quick, nor keep me longer in suspense,
 Time presses, and a thousand crowding thoughts
 Break in at once! in this way and that they snatch,
 They tear my hurried soul.—All claim attention,
 And yet not one is heard. Oh! speak, and leave
 me,

For I have business would employ an age,
 And but a minute's time to get it done in.

Alic. That, that's my grief—'tis I that urge thee on,

Thus hunt thee to the toil, sweep thee from earth,
 And drive thee down this precipice of fate.

Lord H. Thy reason is grown wild. Could thy weak hand

Bring on this mighty ruin? If it could,
 What have I done so grievous to thy soul,
 So deadly, so beyond the reach of pardon,
 That nothing but my life can make atonement?

Alic. Thy cruel scorn hath stung me to the heart,

And set my burning bosom all in flames:
 Raving and mad I flew to my revenge,
 And writ I know not what—told the protector,
 That Shore's detested wife, by wiles, had won thee
 To plot against his greatness.—He believ'd it,
 (Oh, dire event of my pernicious counsel!)
 And, while I meant destruction on her head,
 He has turn'd it all on thine.

Lord H. O, thou inhuman! Turn thy eyes
 away,

And blast me not with their destructive beams:
 Why should I curse thee with my dying breath?
 Be gone! and let me die in peace.

Alic. Canst thou, O cruel Hastings, leave me thus?

Hear me, I beg thee—I conjure thee, hear me!
 While, with an agonizing heart, I swear,
 By all the pangs I feel, by all the sorrows,
 The terrors and despair thy loss shall give me,
 My hate was on my rival bent alone.
 Oh! had I once divin'd, false as thou art,
 A danger to thy life, I would have died,
 I would have met it for thee.

Lord H. Now mark! and tremble at heaven's just award:

While thy insatiate wrath and fell revenge
 Pursu'd the innocence which never wrong'd thee,
 Behold, the mischief falls on thee and me:
 Remorse and heaviness of heart shall wait thee,
 And everlasting anguish be thy portion.

For me, the snares of death are wound about me,
 And now, in one poor moment, I am gone.
 Oh! if thou hast one tender thought remaining,
 Fly to thy closet, fall upon thy knees,
 And recommend my parting soul to mercy.

Alic. Oh! yet, before I go for ever from thee,
 Turn thee in gentleness and pity to me,

[Kneeling

And, in compassion of my strong affliction,
 Say, is it possible you can forgive
 The fatal rashness of ungovern'd love?
 For, oh! 'tis certain, if I had not lov'd thee
 Beyond my peace, my reason, fame, and life,
 This day of horror never would have known us.

Lord H. Oh, rise, and let me hush thy stormy sorrows. [Raising her.]

Assuage thy tears, for I will chide no more,
No more upbraid thee, thou unhappy fair one.
I see the hand of heaven is arm'd against me,
And, in mysterious providence, decrees
To punish me by thy mistaken head.
Most righteous doom! for, oh, while I behold thee,
Thy wrongs rise up in terrible array,
And charge thy ruin on me; thy fair fame,
Thy spotless beauty, innocence, and youth,
Dishonour'd, blasted, and betray'd, by me.

Alic. And does thy heart relent for my undoing?
Oh, that inhuman Gloster could be mov'd,
But half so easily as I can pardon!

Lord H. Here, then, exchange we mutual forgiveness:

So may the guilt of all my broken vows,
My perjuries to thee, be all forgotten,
As here my soul acquits thee of my death,
As here I part without one angry thought,
As here I leave thee with the softest tenderness,
Mourning the chance of our disastrous loves,
And begging heaven to bless and to support thee.

Sir R. My lord, despatch; the duke has sent to chide me,

For loitering in my duty——

Lord H. I obey.

Alic. Insatiate, savage, monster! Is a moment
So tedious to thy malice? Oh, repay him,
Thou great Avenger! Give him blood for blood:
Guilt haunts him! fiends pursue him! lightnings blast him!

That he may know how terrible it is,
To want that moment he denies thee now.

Lord H. This rage is all in vain, that tears thy bosom:

Retire, I beg thee;
To see thee thus, thou know'st not how it wounds
me;

Thy agonies are added to my own,
And make the burden more than I can bear.
Farewell—Good angels visit thy afflictions,
And bring thee peace and comfort from above.

Alic. Oh! stab me to the heart, some pitying hand,
Now strike me dead——

Re-enter LORD HASTINGS.

Lord H. One thing I had forgot——
I charge thee, by our present common miseries;
By our past loves, if they have yet a name;
By all the hopes of peace here and hereafter;
Let not the rancour of thy hate pursue
The innocence of thy unhappy friend;
Thou know'st who 'tis I mean; Oh! should'st thou wrong her,
Just heaven shall double all thy woes upon thee,
And make 'em know no end—Remember this,
As the last warning of a dying man.
Farewell, for ever!

[The Guards carry HASTINGS off.]

Alic. For ever! Oh, for ever!
Oh, who can bear to be a wretch for ever!
My rival, too! his last thoughts hung on her,
And, as he parted left a blessing for her:
Shall she be blest, and I be curst, for ever?
No; since her fatal beauty was the cause
Of all my sufferings, let her share my pains;
Let her, like me, of every joy forlorn,
Devote the hour when such a wretch was born;

Cast every good, and every hope, behind;
Detest the works of nature, loathe mankind;
Like me, with cries distracted fill the air,
Tear her poor bosom, rend her frantic hair,
And prove the torments of the last despair. [Exit]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Street.

Enter BELMOUR and DUMONT.

Dum. You saw her, then?

Bel. I met her, as returning
In solemn penance from the public cross.
Before her, certain rascal officers,
Slaves in authority, the knaves of justice,
Proclaim'd the tyrant Gloster's cruel orders.
Around her, numberless, the rabble flow'd,
Should'ring each other, crowding, for a view,
Gaping and gazing, taunting and reviling;
Some pitying—but those, alas, how few!
The most, such iron hearts we are, and such
The base barbarity of humankind,
With insolence and lewd reproach pursu'd her,
Hooting and railing, and with villanous hands
Gath'ring the filth from out the common ways,
To hurl upon her head.

Dum. Inhuman dogs!

How did she bear it?

Bel. With the gentlest patience;
Submissive, sad, and lowly, was her look;
A burning taper in her hand she bore,
And on her shoulders, carelessly confus'd,
With loose neglect, her lovely tresses hung;
Upon her cheek a faintish blush was spread;
Feeble she seem'd, and sorely smit with pain.
While, barefoot as she trod the flinty pavement,
Her footsteps all along were mark'd with blood;
Yet, silent still she pass'd, and unreproving:
Her streaming eyes bent ever on the earth,
Except when, in some bitter pang of sorrow,
To heaven, she seem'd in fervent zeal to raise,
And beg that mercy man denied her here.

Dum. When was this piteous sight?

Bel. These last two days.

You know my care was wholly bent on you,
To find the happy means of your deliverance,
Which but for Hastings' death I had not gain'd
During that time, although I have not seen her,
Yet divers trusty messengers I've sent,
To wait about, and watch a fit convenience
To give her some relief, but all in vain;
A churlish guard attends upon her steps,
Who menace those with death, that bring her comfort,

And drive all succour from her.

Dum. Let 'em threaten;

Let proud oppression prove its fiercest malice;
So heaven befriend my soul, as here I vow
To give her help, and share one fortune with her.

Bel. Mean you to see her thus in your own form?

Dum. I do.

Bel. And have you thought upon the consequence?

Dum. What is there I should fear?

Bel. Have you examin'd

Into your inmost heart, and try'd at leisure
The sev'ral secret springs that move the passions
Has mercy fix'd her empire there so sure,
That wrath and vengeance never may return?

Can you resume a husband's name, and bid
That wakeful dragon, fierce resentment, sleep?

Dum. O, thou hast set my busy brain at work,
And now she musters up a train of images,
Which, to preserve my peace, I had cast aside,
And sunk in deep oblivion—Oh, that form!
That angel face on which my dotage hung!
How I have gaz'd upon her, till my soul
With very eagerness went forth towards her,
And issu'd at my eyes.—Was there a gem
Which the sun ripens in the Indian mine,
Or the rich bosom of the ocean yields?
What was there art could make, or wealth could buy,

Which I have left unsought to deck her beauty?
What could her king do more?—And yet she fled.

Bel. A way with that sad fancy—

Dum. Oh, that day!

The thought of it must live for ever with me.
I met her, Belmour, when the royal spoiler
Bore her in triumph from my widow'd home!
Within his chariot, by his side, she sat,
And listen'd to his talk with downward looks,
'Till, sudden as she chanc'd aside to glance,
Her eyes encounter'd mine—Oh! then, my friend!
Oh! who can paint my grief and her amazement!
As at the stroke of death, twice turn'd she pale;
And twice a burning crimson blush'd all o'er her;
Then, with a shriek heart-wounding, loud she cried,

While down her cheeks two gushing torrents ran
Fast falling on her hands, which thus she wrung—
Mov'd at her grief, the tyrant ravisher,
With courteous action, woo'd her oft to turn;
Earnest he seem'd to plead, but all in vain;
Even to the last she bent her sight towards me,
And follow'd me—till I had lost myself.

Bel. Alas, for pity! Oh! those speaking tears!
Could they be false? did she not suffer with you?
For, though the king by force possess'd her person,
Her unconsenting heart dwelt still with you?
If all her former woes were not enough,
Look on her now; behold her where she wanders,
Hunted to death, distress'd on every side,
With no one hand to help; and tell me then,
If ever misery were known like hers?

Dum. And can she bear it? Can that delicate frame

Endure the beating of a storm so rude?
Can she, for whom the various seasons chang'd
To court her appetite and crown her board,
For whom the foreign vintages were press'd,
For whom the merchant spread his silken stores,
Can she—

Entreat for bread, and want the needful raiment
To wrap her shiv'ring bosom from the weather?
When she was mine, no care came ever nigh her;
I thought the gentlest breeze that wakes the spring
Too rough to breathe upon her; cheerfulness
Danc'd all the day before her, and at night
Soft slumbers waited on her downy pillow.—
Now, sad and shelterless, perhaps she lies,
Where piercing winds blow sharp, and the chill rain

Drops from some pent-house on her wretched head,
Drenches her locks, and kills her with the cold.
It is too much.—Hence with her past offences,
They are aton'd at full.—Why stay we then?
Oh! let us haste, my friend, and find her out.

Bel. Somewhere about this quarter of the town,
I hear the poor abandon'd creature lingers:
Her guard, though set with strictest watch to keep

VOL. I. . . . M.

8*

All food and friendship from her, yet permit her
To wander in the streets, there choose her bed,
And rest her head on what cold stone she pleases.

Dum. Here then let us divide; each in his round

To search her sorrows out; whose hap it is
First to behold her, this way let him lead
Her fainting steps, and meet we here together.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Street.

Enter JANE SHORE, her hair hanging loose on her shoulders, and bare-footed.

Jane S. Yet, yet endure, nor murmur, O my soul!

For are not thy transgressions great and number-
less?

Do they not cover thee like rising floods,
And press thee like a weight of waters down?
Wait then with patience, till the circling hours
Shall bring the time of thy appointed rest,
And lay thee down in death.

And hark! methinks the roar, that late pursu'd me,
Sinks like the murmurs of a falling wind;
And softens into silence. Does revenge
And malice then grow weary, and forsake me?
My guard, too, that observ'd me still so close,
Tire in the task of their inhuman office,
And loiter far behind. Alas! I faint,
My spirits fail at once—this is the door
Of my Alicia—Blessed opportunity!
I'll steal a little succour from her goodness,
Now while no eye observes me.

[She knocks at the door]

Enter SERVANT.

Is your lady,
My gentle friend, at home? Oh! bring me to her.
Serv. Hold, mistress, whither would you?

[Pulling her back.]

Jane S. Do you not know me?

Serv. I know you well, and know my orders too:
You must not enter here—

Jane S. Tell my Alicia,
'Tis I would see her.

Serv. She is ill at ease,
And will admit no visitor.

Jane S. But tell her

'Tis I, her friend, the partner of her heart,
Wait at the door and beg,—

Serv. 'Tis all in vain,—

Go hence, and howl to those that will regard you

[Shuts the door, and exit]

Jane S. It was not always thus; the time has been,

When this unfriendly door, that bars my passage,
Flew wide, and almost leap'd from off its hinges,
To give me entrance here; when this good house
Has pour'd forth all its dwellers to receive me;
When my approaches made a little holiday,
And every face was dress'd in smiles to meet me:
But now 'tis otherwise; and those who bless'd me
Now curse me to my face. Why should I wander,
Stray further on, for I can die even here?

[She sits down at the door.]

Enter ALICIA in disorder, two SERVANTS following.

Alic. What wretch art thou, whose misery and baseness

Hangs on my door; whose hateful whine of wo

Breaks in upon my sorrows, and distracts
My jarring senses with thy beggar's cry?

Jane S. A very beggar, and a wretch, indeed;
One driven by strong calamity to seek
For succours here; one perishing for want,
Whose hunger has not tasted food these three days,
And humbly asks, for charity's dear sake,
A draught of water and a little bread.

Alic. And dost thou come to me, to me, for bread;
I know thee not—Go—hunt for it abroad,
Where wanton hands upon the earth have scatter'd it,

Or cast it on the waters—Mark the eagle,
And hungry vulture, where they wind the prey;
Watch where the ravens of the valley feed,
And seek thy food with them—I know thee not.

Jane S. And yet there was a time, when my Alicia

Has thought unhappy Shore her dearest blessing.
And mourn'd the live-long day she passed without me;

Inclining fondly to me, she has sworn
She lov'd me more than all the world besides.

Alic. Ha! say'st thou? Let me look upon thee
well—

'Tis true—I know thee now—A mischief on thee!
Thou art that fatal fair, that cursed she,
That set my brain a madding. Thou hast robb'd
me;

Thou hast undone me—Murder! O, my Hastings!

See his pale bloody head shouts glaring by me!
Avaunt; and come not near me—

Jane S. To thy hand
I trusted all; gave my whole store to thee,
Nor do I ask it back; allow me but
The smallest pittance, give me but to eat,
Lest I fall down and perish here before thee.

Alic. Nay! tell not me! Where is thy king, thy Edward,

And all thy cringing train of courtiers,
That bent the knee before thee?

Jane S. Oh! for mercy!

Alic. Mercy! I know it not—for I am miserable.
I'll give thee misery, for here she dwells,
This is her house, where the sun never dawns;
The bird of night sits screaming o'er the roof,
Grim spectres weep along the horrid gloom,
And nought is heard but wailings and lamentings.
Hark! something cracks above! it shakes! it totters!

And see the nodding ruin falls to crush me!

'Tis fallen, 'tis here! I felt it on my brain!—

Let her take my counsel:

Why should'st thou be a wretch? Stab, tear thy
heart,

And rid thyself of this detested being:

I wo' not linger long behind thee here.

A waving flood of bluish fire swells o'er me;

And now 'tis out, and I am drown'd in blood.

Ha! what art thou? thou horrid headless trunk!

It is my Hastings! see he wafts me on!

Away! I go! I fly! I follow thee. [Runs off.]

Jane S. Alas! she raves; her brain, I fear, is turn'd;

In mercy look upon her, gracious heaven,

Nor visit her for any wrong to me.

Sure I am near upon my journey's end;

My head runs round, my eyes begin to fail,

And dancing shadows swim before my sight.

I can no more, [Lies down.] receive me, thou cold
earth,

Thou common parent, take me to thy bosom,
And let me rest with thee.

Enter BELMOUR.

Bel. Upon the ground!
Thy miseries can never lay thee lower.
Look up, thou poor afflicted one! thou mourner, Whom none has comforted! Where are thy friends,

The dear companions of thy joyful days,
Whose hearts thy warm prosperity made glad,
Whose arms were taught to grow like ivy round
thee,

And bind thee to their bosoms? Thus, with thee,
Thus let us live, and let us die, they said.

Now where are they?

Jane S. Ah, Belmour! where, indeed? They stand aloof,

And view my desolation from afar!

And yet thy goodness turns aside to pity me.

Alas! there may be danger; get thee gone.

Let me not pull a ruin on thy head.

Leave me to die alone, for I am fallen

Never to rise, and all relief is vain.

Bel. Yet raise thy drooping head; for I am
come

To chase away despair. Behold! where yonder

That honest man, that faithful, brave, Dumont,

Is hastening to thy aid—

Jane S. Dumont! Ha! where?

[Raising herself, and looking about.]
Then heaven has heard my prayer; his very name

Renews the springs of life, and cheers my soul.

Has he then 'scap'd the snare?

Bel. He has; but see—

He comes, unlike to that Dumont you knew,

For now he wears your better angel's form,

And comes to visit you with peace and pardon.

Enter SHORE.

Jane S. Speak, tell me! Which is he? And oh! what would

This dreadful vision! See it comes upon me—
It is my husband—Ah! [She swoons.]

Shore. She faints! support her!

Bel. Her weakness could not bear the strong surprise.

But see, she stirs! And the returning blood

Faintly begins to blush again, and kindle

Upon her ashy cheek—

Shore. So—gently raise her—

[Raising her up.]

Jane S. Ha! what art thou? Belmour!

Bel. How fare you, lady?

Jane S. My heart is thrill'd with horror—

Bel. Be of courage—

Your husband lives! 'tis he, my worthiest friend—

Jane S. Still art thou there!—Still dost thou hover round me!

Oh, save me, Belmour, from his angry shade!

Bel. 'Tis he himself! he lives! look up—

Jane S. I dare not!

Oh! that my eyes could shut him out for ever—

Shore. Am I so hateful then, so deadly to thee,

To blast thy eyes with horror? Since I'm grown

A burden to the world, myself, and thee,

Would I had ne'er surviv'd to see thee more.

Jane S. Oh! thou most injur'd—dost thou live,
indeed?

Fall then, ye mountains, on my guilty head;

Hide me, ye rocks, within your secret caverns;

Cast thy black veil upon my shame, O night!
And shield me with thy sable wing for ever.

Shore. Why dost thou turn away?—Why tremble thus?

Why thus indulge thy fears? and, in despair,
Abandon thy distracted soul to horror?
Cast every black and guilty thought behind thee,
And let 'em never vex thy quiet more.
My arms, my heart, are open to receive thee,
To bring thee back to thy forsaken home,
With tender joy, with fond forgiving love.

Let us haste,
Now while occasion seems to smile upon us,
Forsake this place of shame, and find a shelter.

Jane S. What shall I say to you? But I obey—

Shore. Lean on my arm—

Jane S. Alas! I'm wondrous faint:

But that's not strange, I have not eat these three days.

Shore. Oh! merciless!

Jane S. Oh! I am sick at heart!—

Shore. Thou murd'rous sorrow!

Wo't thou still drink her blood, pursue her still?
Must she then die? O my poor penitent!
Speak peace to thy sad heart; she hears me not:
Grief masters every sense—

Enter CATESBY, with a guard.

Cates. Seize on 'em both, as traitors to the state—

Bel. What means this violence?

[Guards lay hold on SHORE and BELMOUR.]

Cates. Have we not found you,
In scorn of the protector's strict command,
Assisting this base woman, and abetting
Her infamy?

Shore. Infamy on thy head!
Thou tool of power, thou pander to authority!
I tell thee, knave, thou know'st of none so virtuous,
And she that bore thee was an Ethiop to her.

Cates. You'll answer this at full—away with 'em.

Shore. Is charity grown treason to your court?
What honest man would live beneath such rulers?

I am content that we should die together—

Cates. Convey the men to prison; but, for her,
Leave her to hunt her fortune as she may.

Jane S. I will not part with him—for me!
—for me!

Oh! must he die for me?

[Following him as he is carried off; she falls.]

Shore. Inhuman villains!

[Breaks from the Guards.]

Stand off! the agonies of death are on her—
She pulls, she gripes me hard with her cold hand.
Jane S. Was this blow wanting to complete
my ruin?

Oh! let me go, ye ministers of terror.
He shall offend no more, for I will die,
And yield obedience to your cruel master.
Tarry a little, but a little longer,
And take my last breath with you.

Shore. Oh, my love!

Why dost thou fix thy aying eyes upon me,
With such an earnest, such a piteous, look,
As if thy heart were full of some sad meaning
Thou could'st not speak?—

Jane S. Forgive me!—but forgive me!

Shore. Be witness for me, ye celestial hosts,
Such mercy and such pardon as my soul
Accords to thee, and begs of heaven to show thee;
May such befall me at my latest hour,
And make my portion blest or curst for ever.

Jane S. Then all is well, and I shall sleep in peace—

'Tis very dark, and I have lost you now—

Was there not something I would have bequeath'd
you?

But I have nothing left me to bestow,
Nothing but one sad sigh. Oh! mercy, heaven!
[Dies.]

Bel. There fled the soul,
And left her load of misery behind.

Shore. Oh, heavy hour!

Fare thee well— [Kissing her.]
Now execute your tyrant's will, and lead me
To bonds or death, 'tis equally indifferent.

Bel. Let those, who view this sad example, know
What fate attends the broken marriage vow;
And teach their children, in succeeding times,
No common vengeance waits upon these crimes,
When such severe repentance could not save
From want, from shame, and an untimely grave.

[The curtain descends slowly to music.]

WAYS AND MEANS:

A COMEDY,

IN THREE ACTS.

BY GEORGE COLMAN, Esq.

REMARKS.

This Play is an early production of the most successful dramatic writer of the age who though often attacked by those critical paupers,

Who snatch the poet's wreath with envious claws,
And hiss contempt for merited applause;

has neutralised their venom by the universal sanction of his country, and the superior vigour and brilliancy of his writings.—Under the inspiration of the comic Muse, Mr. Colman has produced a variety of excellent comedies, farces, &c. that will never be excelled in the main requisites of dramatic effect and sterling humour.

The three-act comedy before us is well supported throughout;—the whimsicality of Sir David Dunder, the efforts of the lovers, the curiosity of Peery, the wary cunning of Tiptoe, and the general effect of a clever dispersion of pun and laughable situation, are fair claims to frequent representation.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—Anti-Room in an Inn.

PAUL PEERY discovered, in a chair, asleep; bar-bell ringing violently.

Enter MRS. PEERY.

Mrs. P. Why, Paul! why, husband!

Paul P. Eh! What! [Waking.]

Mrs. P. For shame! for shame, Mr. Peery! The bar-bell has been ringing this half hour; and here you sleep like the rusty clapper of it; and scarce stir when you are pulled—and when you are, you only waddle about a little bit, and then stand still till you are pulled again.

Paul P. Prythee, wife, be quiet—You know, I was always famous for giving satisfaction.

Mrs. P. Were you! I wish I could find it out.

Paul P. But what's the matter?

Mrs. P. Packets are the matter—diligences are the matter. Sea and land-cargoes and carriages. Four sea-sick gentlemen, from Calais; and four ladies just stepped out of the mail coach, from Canterbury.—The men, I believe, are making inquiries for the machine to London.

Paul P. Are they? Then show 'em all in one room. I pity the poor gentlemen.—Nothing is so dreadful as sea sickness—so put 'em all together—and they'll only be sick of one another, you know. [Bell rings.]

Enter WAITER.

Wait. Two gentlemen in a post-chaise, with a servant, from London, Sir. [Exit WAITER.]

Mrs. P. Run, Mr. Peery!

Paul P. Ay, ay—You take care of the stage-coaches, and let me alone for the post-chaise gentry.—Here, Lewis, John, William! Show a room, here, to the gentlemen, there!

[Exit, bawling.]

Enter WAITER, showing in one FRENCH and three ENGLISH PASSENGERS, from the Packet.

Wait. Walk in, gentlemen.

Mrs. P. Walk in, gentlemen, if you please. Welcome to England! Welcome to Dover, gentlemen!

1 Pass. So—just six o'clock in the morning—becalmed at sea—not a wink all night—the devil take this packet, say I. I'm rumbled, and tumbled, and jumbled—

Mrs. P. I'm extremely sorry for it, Sir!—

F. Pass. Now, begar, it do me goot.

Mrs. P. I'm vastly happy to hear it—do you choose any refreshment, Sir?

F. Pass. Vous avez raison—I never vas so refresh in all my life.

Mrs. P. I am very glad, indeed, Sir!

2 Pass. I'm damned sick.

Mrs. P. I'm very sorry, I assure you, Sir!

F. Pass. Ma foi, madame have beaucoup de politesse!

2 Pass. Get me a glass of brandy—ti tol, lol—I feel confounded qualmish, but tol, lol, lol, la—I don't like to own a sea-sickness—and—“Britons ever rule the waves.”

[Singing, and smothering his uneasiness.]

F. Pass. Briton rule de vave! I tink de vave rule you, ma foi, ha, ha!

2 Pass. Right, Mounseer! in the present case, I grant you. Packet sailing—mere plain water agrees best with your folks: but, when there is occasion to mix a little of our British spirit with it, why, it's always too much for a French stomach. Now that's the time when an Englishman never feels qualmish at all.

Enter WAITER, showing in four WOMEN.

Mrs. P. Servant, ladies.

1 Wom. Lard! this mail coach is the worst conveyance in the world. It squeezes four people together, like two double letters.

Mrs. P. Disagreeable to be sure, Ma'am!

1 Man. And that infernal packet!

Mrs. P. Nothing can be half so bad, Sir!

2 Man. But then the cabin—

Mrs. P. Except the cabin, your honour!

2 Wom. And riding backward in a coach—ugh!

Mrs. P. I can't conceive any thing so shocking, Ma'am!

F. Pass. Voila la politesse encore!

Mrs. P. Beg pardon, ladies and gentlemen.—But our house is so full at present, we have but one room to spare; the cloth is laid in it for breakfast, and it will be ready directly—hope you will excuse the—

1 Man. Oh! certainly, hostess: travellers, you know—if you'll give me leave, Ma'am.

1 Wom. Sir, you are very obliging.

[The men hand the women.]

Mrs. P. Here, William, wait on the company.

F. Pass. Ah! c'est drole! pair by pair! two by two!

[Exeunt MEN, handing out the WOMEN.]

Mrs. P. Show 'em into Noah's ark, William, d'ye hear? [Bell rings.] Coming! Here, John! Lewis! coming! [Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Room in the Inn.

Enter PAUL PEERY, showing in RANDOM and SCRUPLE.

Paul P. This way, your honours; this way! one step at the door, if you please.

Rand. Step on, Sir, if you please—pay the post-boy, and send in the servant; [PEERY going,] and, harkye, landlord! what's the name of your house?

Paul P. The Ship, your honour. The oldest and best established house in the town, Sir.

Rand. Very well; then give us a better room, and get us some breakfast.

Paul P. It shall be done, Sir. I suppose, gentlemen, you mean to cross to Calais?

Scru. Pshaw!

Paul P. You intend to take water, gentlemen?

Rand. No, Sir, but we intend to take your wine. We may stay here some days, perhaps.

Paul P. Thank your honours! every thing shall be had to your satisfaction; and as far as a cellar and larder can go, I think I—vastly obliged to your honours! Here, Lewis, William, breakfast for two in the Lion, there. [Exit.]

Rand. Well said, my thorough, clumsy, talkative innkeeper!—and now, my dear Scruple, after our night's journey, welcome to Dover. Here we are, you see—not with the old, stale intention of taking a voyage to the continent; but a voyage to the island of Love.

Scru. But suppose we should find neither wind nor tide in our favour?

Rand. Why then we shall be love bound here a little, that's all. But, hang it, why anticipate evils? If we are to be unlucky, the less we think of it the better—confound all thinking, say I.

Scru. Confound thinking, Mr. Random! I'm sure its high time to think—and that very seriously.

Rand. Hey-day! Moralizing! “Confound thinking, Mr. Random!” Yes, Sir, confound thinking:—I'm sure thinking would confound us; and most confoundedly too, Mr. Scruple, at present.

Scru. Yet one can't help having one's doubts.

Rand. Poh! prythee don't doubt at all—doubting is mean and mechanical; and never entered the head or heart of a gentleman. Why, now, if you observe from our own daily experience, the people that doubted most were either our taylorors, or tavern-keepers, or shoemakers; or some such pitiful puppies—Zounds, man, don't be faint-hearted now! we shall never win our fair ladies, at this rate—besides, haven't we all the reasonable hopes in the world?

Scru. Why we are sure of their good wishes, I believe.

Rand. Certainly—and as to any trifling obstacles, such as father and mother, or so—chance must direct us.

Scru. But may not those trifling obstacles you mention—

Rand. Pshaw! doubting again! why you are more of a Mandarin, on a chimney-piece, than a man—there's no touching you but your head begins shaking. Consider, we attacked 'em at Bath, where they were three weeks ago, on a visit to a female friend, without impertinent relations about 'em to give 'em advice—and made, I think, no inconsiderable progress.

Scru. Granted; but they were then suddenly called home to their father's, the baronet's, near Dover, here; who hinted, in his letter, at no very distant match for both of 'em.

Rand. O never fear, if the girls are averse to it; and they, at our parting, like simple damsels in romance, bewailed their cruel fate, while we, like true knights errant, promised to rescue them from confinement. But you had more opportunities with your flame than I: why did not you marry her at once?

Scru. Because I loved her.

Rand. Well, that's some reason too—you would have made a damned unfashionable figure, I confess.

Scru. You mistake me; I had too much honour to impose on my Harriet's amiable simplicity, and have the utmost detestation for marrying merely to make a fortune. In these interested cases, if we keep up appearances, after marriage, the wife becomes a dog and incumbrance; if we throw off the mask, we are making a worthy woman, perhaps, miserable, who has afforded the only means of making her husband easy.

Rand. Mighty romantic, truly! and charming policy for a fellow without a guinea!

Scru. My policy was chosen from the proverb, Random! I thought honesty the best. I confessed to her my embarrassed circumstances.

Rand. Charming!

Scru. Told her I had nothing to boast of but my family; whom my imprudence had disobliged.

Rand. Excellent!

Scru. And thus, by candidly acknowledging myself unworthy her affections, I undesignedly, insured them.

Rand. Pugh! this may do well enough for the grave, sentimental, elder sister; but Kitty's the girl for my taste—young, wild, frank, and ready to run into my arms, without the trouble of dying or sighing. Her mind full of fun, her eyes full of fire, her head full of novels, and her heart full of love—ay, and her pocket full of money, my boy!

Scru. Well, we must now find means to introduce ourselves to the family; I dread encountering the old folks too; people in the country, here, are apt to be suspicious; they ask queer questions sometimes.

Rand. Oh! the mere effect of their situation; where they get more health than polish.

Scru. And yet old country families—

Rand. Are like old country bacon—damned fat and very rusty, Scruple. But come, let's to breakfast, and settle our plan over a cup of coffee. But where the devil's our scoundrel? we only fired him overnight, and have scarce set our eyes on him since.

Scru. What, our joint lacquey? that we engaged for the expedition, to avoid inquiries—to wait on us both—dress us both—and fly on both our errands, like a shuttlecock between two battledores?

Rand. Yes, or like another Atlas, with all our world upon his shoulders. Only look at him, Scruple!

Enter TIPTOE, with a small portmanteau.

Tip. Gentlemen, shall I put down the luggage?

Scru. Ay, on this table

Tip. [Putting it down.] Whew! It's enough to make a man faint to look at it.

Rand. Why, you scoundrel, it's all you have to bring in; and we have contrived, on purpose to make it easy, to put both our clothes in one portmanteau.

Tip. That's the very reason I complain, Sir, You don't know how fatiguing it is to carry double.

Rand. A shrewd fellow this. He may be of use to us. And now we have to inquire, pray, Sir, what may your name be?

Tip. Tiptoe—Tiptoe, gentlemen, at your service. I have seen better days, no offence to your honours—honest Tiptoe once stood above the world; but now—all the world stands upon Tiptoe.

Scru. And pray, Sir, what were you, formerly?

Tip. A decent young man, Sir—that could dress wigs, write a running-hand, and preferred a sober, steady family. I shaved my old master, bottled off his wine, copied his papers, and kept the key of his cabinet and cellar; in short, Sir, I was his prime minister.

Scru. How came you to leave him, Sir?

Tip. Ruined by party, Sir;—some of his papers were missing, and as I kept the key—I—

Rand. Began to be suspected—eh! honest Tiptoe?

Tip. Why, I can't tell how it was, Sir; but the cabinet was against me—the whole house opposed me—and poor Tiptoe, like other great men—

Rand. Was turned out, I take it?

Tip. Oh, fie! no, Sir; I resigned. I then fairly advertised my abilities—"wants a place—can turn his hand to every thing!"—you, gentlemen, bid most for me—here I am, and I hope you'll have no cause to complain of my qualifications.

Scru. He'll make no bad ambassador for us, at least, Random, and now to breakfast, and our plan of operations. If they fail—farewell, dear, dear little England! and yet I am wedded to thee—

Rand. Like modern husbands to their wives, Scruple: it's almost impossible to be seen in one another's company any longer.

[Exeunt RANDOM and SCRUPLE.]

Tip. Very fine company I seem to have got into—hired in one instant, by two men, I had not heard of three moments; set out on a journey at four in the morning, and it had scarce struck five, when I began to suspect they were all sixes and sevens.

Enter a FRENCH WAITER.

Well, friend!

F. Wait. Serviteur, monsieur.

Tip. Friend! oh Lord! no!—It's the enemy.—French waiters creep into shabby Dover inns, like French footmen into large London families. French footmen! more shame for their employers! who starve their own poor countrymen, to feed a set of skinny scoundrels, whose looks give the lie to their living, and prove their master's head in much nicer order than his heart. What, you come to carry up the portmanteau, I suppose?

F. Wait. Oui, de portmanteau, dat belong to—

Tip. Well, take it [Puts it on his shoulder.] and take care of it too, monsieur, d'ye mind; none of your old tricks of running away.

F. Wait. Never you fear; laissez moi faire. "O! de roast oef of Old England."

[Exit, singing.]

Tip. There go all the worldly goods of my two poor masters; and here comes our inquisitive puppy of a landlord. Deuce take the fellow! he asked me more questions at the bar of the inn, than if I had been brought to the bar of the Old Bailey.

Enter PEERY.

Paul P. Ah! my honest friend—sweet, honest Mr. Tiptoe, your servant!

Tip. [Aside.] How did he pick up my name, now?

Paul P. I hope the two worthy gentlemen, I have shown above stairs, have every thing to their satisfaction? Though I say it, that should not say it, Paul Peery, of the Ship, was ever famous for giving satisfaction. Which of the two do you serve, my friend?

Tip. Umph! serve!—why—a—

Paul P. His honour in gray? or—

Tip. Ay.

Paul P. Or the worthy gentleman in green?

Tip. Yes.

Paul P. Umph! Two sweet gentlemen, indeed; and happy is one of 'em in a servant. You seem to give double the attendance of an ordinary footman.

Tip. Why, though I say it, that shouldn't say it—Tim Tiptoe was ever famous for giving satisfaction.

[Mimicking PEERY.]

Paul P. A close fellow! Well, I wish 'em success with all my heart, Mr. Tiptoe. You have lived with 'em a long while, I imagine?

Tip. Why, I have lived with 'em long enough, for that matter, Mr. Peery.

Paul P. They are of property, no doubt?

Tip. Of such property, Master Peery—it's impossible to describe it!

Paul P. Indeed! and where may their property lie at this time?

Tip. I believe all their property lies on the sea coast, at this time.

Paul P. Oh, oh! the sea coast! What, in ships, I imagine?

Tip. Yes; it's all in the ship.

Paul P. So, so! merchants! rich rogues, I'll lay my life. [Aside.] Ah! warm, warm! Good men, Mr. Tiptoe, trusted by every body, I warrant.

Tip. Trusted for a great while too, I promise you.

Paul P. I hope they find every thing to their liking.—Must be civil here. [Aside.] I hope the room suits their honours? I should be sorry to give any offence. I have given 'em a room I give to the best of company.

Tip. Oh, excellent! make no apologies: your room is as good as your company, Master Peery.

Rand. [Without.] Damn your house!—Here! Tiptoe! Tiptoe! you scoundrel!

Tip. Coming directly, Sir.—You are right; you were always famous for giving satisfaction.

Rand. Tiptoe!

Paul P. Hark! is it your master?

Tip. Faith, I do not know. It's either his honour in gray, or the worthy gentleman in green.—Good bye, Master Peery.

Rand. Tiptoe!

Tip. Coming, Sir.

[Exit.]

Paul P. Why, what the devil can these merchants do at Dover? A bit of a smuggling business, perhaps. They must be rich fellows, by the servant's being so saucy—and, then they call about 'em, and abuse the house so kindly!—Oh! your abusive fellows are the best customers in the world; for none pay so well at an inn as those who are always damning the waiters for ill treatment.

[Bar-bell.]

Enter WAITER.

Wait. Sir David Dunder, of Dunder Hall, Sir, has had business in the town before breakfast, and stept in, whilst his horses put to, to go back.

[Exit.]

Paul P. Odds my life! a rich man, a good natured gentleman, and lives but a mile off: the only great man, I know, whose situation never keeps me at a great distance. An odd fellow, too; and takes more money from my house than a tax gatherer; I can never keep a guest for his cursed kind invitations.—But he pays well while he stays. So, William! wife! hostler! rub down the horses, and show up Sir David Dunder.

[Exit.]

PEERY returns, attending SIR DAVID, talking as entering.

Sir D. Pooch, Paul, you're a blockhead—there's two of 'em you tell me?

Paul P. Worth a plum a piece, Sir David.

Sir D. Plums! figs!—How's your wife, Paul, eh?

Paul P. She's pretty—

Sir D. Be quiet—I know she is. And so these two merchants are as rich as—

Paul P. Any thing, your honour.

Sir D. Damned good simile—very new too. Have they taken care of the horses?

Paul P. They're going to—

Sir D. Be quiet—I know it—Merchants! hazard! Vessels are lottery tickets—two blanks to a prize.

Paul P. Right, your honour; and the sea—

Sir D. Is the worst wheel in the world for 'em, Paul; for when once they stick at the bottom, I would not give a farthing for the chance of their coming up. Where do they come from?

Paul P. London—London merchants; and they—

Sir D. I know it, you blockhead—are respected all over the world. London merchants, Paul, are like London porter; a little heavy or so, sometimes; but stout, stiff, heady, old hogsheads, that keep up the vigour of a strong English constitution. Where are they going?

Paul P. I can't tell, Sir David; but if you wish for any intelligence—

Sir D. You can't give it me. Tell 'em I wish to be introduced, d'ye hear? Sir David Dunder, Dunder Hall—you know the form—Bart.; bloody hand, all that—wishes to—Who have we here?

Paul P. The very men, Sir David; coming this way too.

Sir D. Then do you get out on't.

Paul P. So! two more guests going by his cursed invitations.

Sir D. [Looking out.] Gad! they are youngish men for merchants. Well, why the worse? They may be clever fellows, for all that. If so, the younger the better; and a man must be clever indeed, when his enemies can throw nothing but his youth in his teeth.

Enter RANDOM and SCRUPLE.

Rand. Nay, pr'ythee, Scruple, one turn on the quay, and—who is he? Egad, the same queer fellow we observed just now under the window.

Seru. Right, giving orders to his coachman.

Sir D. Gentlemen, your servant.

Both. Sir, your very obedient!

Sir D. My landlord tells me—honest Paul here—You've just left London. Good journey, I hope. Our town of Dover is but an odd, whimsical, sort of a—eh!—and, after the city, you think it a damned dirty, dingy, kind of a—umph?

Seru. Why, Sir, at present, we can't say we are tired of the exchange.

Sir D. The exchange! O, oh! Paul's right—[Aside.] I know it.—The Exchange, as you say, for people in your situation, is much pleasanter.

Seru. Sir! Our situation!

Sir D. Be quiet; my host has let me into your characters.

Rand. The devil he has! And how should he know any thing of—?

Sir D. Nay, don't be angry; no harm: mere inuendo—didn't tell plump—talked of your dealings.

Seru. Dealings!

Rand. Why, zounds! the scoundrel has not presumed to—

Sir D. Must be rich—damned crusty. [Aside.]—You're right, though can't be too cautious. I would not wish to pry. Mean nothing but respect, upon my soul. How many clerks do you keep?

Both. Clerks!

Sir D. Can't do without them, you know. Fine folks though, all you, eh? Props of the public—bulwarks of Britain. Always brought forward as an example to the world. Been in the stocks lately, gentlemen?

Seru. Hell, and the devil!

Sir D. That's right, don't tell. I like you the better. You see what I know of you, and—

Rand. Sir, we suspect what you imagine—and—

Sir D. I know it. You wonder to see me so devilish distant. I live but a mile off—Lady Dunder—a sweet, fine, fat woman—my wife, by the bye—will be happy to entertain gentlemen of—

Rand. How! Lady Dunder your wife?

Seru. Is Lady Dunder your wife, Sir?

[Both in haste.]

Sir D. Hey! my wife! my wife! Why, yes, I think so. She is not yours, is she?

Seru. Oh! you'll pardon us, Sir; only we have heard the name of Sir David Dunder, in this country, before.

Sir D. Like enough; the Dunders are pretty well known, I believe, every where.

Rand. Certainly; indeed, you were the last person in our mouths, Sir David.

Sir D. Pop'd in apropos, eh! Never knew it otherwise. Just like Simon Spungy, our curate; never knocks but at dinner, and always comes in with the cloth. But we are notorious for hospitality to strangers of your stamp; and if you can spare a day or two at Dunder Hall—all in the family way, you know,—Sir David, that's me—Lady and two misses—two fine young women, upon my soul, as any in Kent—tall as hop-poles—will be happy to—eh?

Seru. Sir, you're particularly kind; but—

Rand. We'll attend you with pleasure, Sir David!

Sir D. Will you? that's right. It's close by; quite convenient. And if necessity obliges you to come to the coast here—why, 'tis but a mile.—All in my power. I know your business, and we'll have the horses directly. We shall be at home time enough for a late breakfast. Here—eh! I'll step to coachy myself; but don't, don't abuse honest Paul—meant no harm, upon my soul—mere inuendo—a slight sketch, but no profession specified. Paul is like other inn-keepers, blunders and talks: a damned deal of the bull and mouth about him; but no more meaning than a split crow, or a spread eagle, egad! [Exit.]

Rand. Give me your hand, my boy! the day's our own; the luckiest hit in the world!

Seru. Do you think so?

Rand. Think so! Zounds, what's the matter with you? Isn't the very man we have been following, the first man we have met? Hasn't he thrown open his doors to us, when we only hoped to get in at his window? Isn't he our father-in-law that is to be, and hasn't he given us an invitation?

Seru. Granted: and what then?

Rand. What then? Why then, instead of reconnoitring the whole day round his wall, we have nothing to do but to walk in, whisk away with the girls, and be married immediately.

Seru. And is this to be our return, Mr. Random, for Sir David's kindness?

Rand. Why, how can you make a better, than by giving such a strong proof of your attachment to his family?

Seru. For shame, Random! basely endeavour to injure a man, whose hospitality has brought you under his roof! No, no; our reconnoitring plan indeed—weak as you may think it, I should prefer going to his wall, as you say, I assure you.

Rand. Very likely; the weakest always go there. Remember, however, I scorn a mean action, as much as any man; but, if a good marriage is the readiest road to the reconciliation with our friends, who can, if they choose, make us easy—I see no great injury offered to Sir David, nor his family.

Seru. Why, in that case, to be sure—

Rand. Ay, ay, no more of your cases now, good doctor; but follow my prescriptions, I entreat you. Besides, my father is expected from the South of France every day. He may arrive before we have brought matters to bear; and fathers are apt to spoil sport, you know.

Enter TIPTOE.

Tip. The old gentleman, Sir, with the old coach, is inquiring for you in the court-yard.

Scru. O, Sir David! allons! follow us, Sirrah. We haven't a moment to spare.

Rand. That's right, Scruple! stick close; for he seems so whimsical an old fellow, that he may get into his carriage, drive off, and forget he has ever given us an invitation. Come along, Tiptoe! quick, quick, you scoundrel! [Exeunt.]

Tip. Quick! Zounds! I'm almost dead. All night, bumping down to Dover, on a ragged, raw-boned, post-horse, with a brace of pistols at my knees; and as soon as we arrive, clapt up behind a queer, country coach, with a couple of leather straps in my hand, to be rattled back again! Ah, Tiptoe! Tiptoe! You must get into a sober family again, I see. My running-hand will be all I have left for it at last; for I shall be run off my feet, I find, in a fortnight. [Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Room in the Ship at Dover.

Enter ROUNDLEE and QUIRK.

Round. Why, I told you so all along; but you have no more head than a smooth shilling.

Quirk. No, but I have a mouth, if you would let me open it.

Round. Yes, and then you'd shut it again; just as you do at my dinners; where you have been opening and shutting it, any time these ten years.

Quirk. What! and haven't I deserv'd it? haven't I filled more parcnments for you, than stomachs; more skins than bellies; and closed many an account before I could close my orifice; haven't I given you a character in the courts, good humouredly establishing your reputation, before I regarded my own? Haven't I sworn for you, and roundly too, Mr. Roundlee?

Round. Well, well, I always allowed you had a good swallow.

Quirk. Wasn't I, when you were tottering, friend enough to take out a commission of bankruptcy against you? and didn't I kindly make myself a cruel creditor, and insist upon receiving three parts of your effects?

Round. And haven't I always acknowledged my ruin with gratitude?

Quirk. No, nor any thing else. I have dangled after half the heirs in town, without an acknowledgment; making myself the imaginary friend of their imaginary wants, merely to introduce 'em to you, as a man of honour and secrecy.

Round. Ay, if required.

Quirk. Granted; it says so in the advertisement—and did not they come to you, when, if it was not for me, they would have been accommodated at a genteel end of the town? Instead of which, I trudged 'em through the Strand, towards the Bar, all winter long, with their boots and high collars, for fear of sore throats, to chew your tough chops, in the back parlour. Then they'd clap you on the back, call you by your Christian name, tell damned lies, and swear you were an honest fellow, to make you come down with the ready. And who was the disinterested, moderate man, to settle a proper premium between the parties? Why I, to be sure.

Round. And is there a worse security in the world than your fellows of fashion? Your snug man of business, when he puts his name to a note, is always punctual in his payment; or else we lock him in limbo—safe in the house of bondage. Now, your man of fashion always gets safe in another house; and if he can't duly pay, why he gets duly elected, and I have a false return for my money.

Quirk. That's not the case here, you know.

Round. No, but it's as bad. A pretty wild-goose chase we have had here! Rammed into a post chaise, with more expense than speed; gaping at hops, through a cursed small-beer country, and after two youngsters, who by this time, I take it, have hopped over to Calais. That's another genteel way of chousing an honest creditor. The coast of France is edged with English insolvents. Calais is a King's-bench, and Boulogne little more than a Marshalsea. A parcel of prodigal, webfooted, spendthrifts, come here, and take water like ducks.

Quirk. Yes, but they are lame ducks.

Round. While we, who have hatched 'em like hens, in the shell of their dissipation, stand clucking complaints on the shore, without daring to follow.

Quirk. Come, come, accidents will happen sometimes.

Round. And who brought this accident about, but the dapper Mr. Quirk? with your plaguy politic pate! a thick Simmond's-inn skull, only fit to peep through a pillory. You must be sending me your two, fine, St. James' gentlemen. Damme, there's more poor rogues, I believe, in that parish than in St. Giles! all in a gang too;—knaves of clubs every one of them—and there my two youngsters coaxed me over with a pretty refreshing story of friends in the country, and rich old fathers with fine crazy constitutions; charming churchyard coughs, and pretty touches of the rheumatism; sweet bile, and delightful bad livers! It put one in fine spirits to hear them talk; and you, you booby, to back it!

Quirk. Why, I had it from the best authority. However, young Random's father is abroad for his health; and every body says in a fine, fair way of dying; and then you'll be in a fair way of recovery. The report is current, my old lad.

Round. Yes, and the son got current cash for it; and now he must go abroad too; with a cursed consumptive pocket, I warrant: and that other oily-tongued fellow, Mr. Scruple.

Quirk. But why call me in question? Could not you see for yourself? Didn't they ask you to dine with 'em; and weren't you foolish enough to drink and grow open-hearted? and then when Random told you he'd take you to Shooter's Hill in his phaeton—

Round. Psha! no such thing.

Quirk. And introduce you to Peggy Pattens, who said you had fine eyes, if you did not squint, and a good walk, if you did not stoop—

Round. Hush!

Quirk. Didn't you chuckle, and whisper he was an honest fellow? and though I kept winking, and pulling your sleeve, did not you take notes which were due the day they set off, and give a draft for the three thousand?

Round. Zounds, it's enough to drive one mad to think on't! You got the warrant backed by the Sheriff of Canterbury?

Quirk. Yes, by the Sub, and all may be repaired at last. We have traced 'em truly to this house, and if the tide hasn't served, we may nab 'em yet. Come along, old Round. We'll pump the waiters, sound our host, and success, no doubt, will crown our inquiries. Come along!

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—An Apartment in Dunder Hall.
A Glass Door in the back scene, with a view into the Gardens.

SIR DAVID, LADY DUNDER, RANDOM, and SCRUPLE, discovered at the finish of breakfast.

Rand. We are only mortified, Sir David, as we have not had the pleasure of seeing the young ladies, that we are deprived of their company at breakfast.

Sir D. Pshaw! Nonsense! mustn't mind that—'t'other cup—Eh? [To RANDOM.] Always the case with my girls—Lump o' sugar!—[To SCRUPLE.]

Scru. Not any.

Lady. They are taking their constant morning's round, gentlemen. They always breakfast before the rest of the family; and are generally breathing the air of the shrubbery, while Sir David and I are sipping our tea and chocolate.

Sir D. Be quiet! I know it. Picking posies, gathering daisies and daffy-down-dillies. Pretty pastoral girls, though, I assure you: very like mamma.

Lady. Oh, Sir David.

Sir D. Hush! The very picture of my dear Lady Dunder. Not so plump, perhaps; but all in good time—Bit more muffin!

Scru. The young ladies, Sir David, are happy in their resemblance of so accomplished a mother.

Sir D. Yes; like as three peas. My lady, indeed, has more of the marrow-fat.

[All rise, as having done breakfast.]

Lady. Why people do flatter, I confess. None of our neighbours but are pretty partial to the Dunders. Not an assembly round, but my girls are first called out to move in a minuet; and always stand the head couples in a country dance.

Rand. We make no doubt, Madam. The charms which your ladyship's daughters must inherit—

Sir D. Be quiet.—Asked every where, I promise you. Quite the delight of Dover—Acted all the tragedy parts too, at my friend thing-em-bob's. Harriet got great applause, upon my soul: but Kitty was so cursed comical! did Desdemona one night; gets killed, you know, by a bolster.

Scru. An agreeable amusement! Gentlemen's play-houses are much to be wished for.

Sir D. Fine fun, isn't it? We had a touch of dramatics once ourselves, at the hall here—guttered a kitchen, and filled it with fly-flaps—All gentlemen players, you know.

Rand. A kitchen! And how did your players perform!

Sir D. Players! Pokers! Empty as pots; and as flat as the dresser.

Lady. Oh, fie, Sir David! You know, Sir Simon Squab came from London on purpose; and every body said his Romeo was charming.

Sir D. Eh! gad, that's true: forgot Squab. True, deary;—fine,—very fine, indeed, for a gentleman: his figure, to be sure, wasn't so cleverly cut out for the character. A fat fubby phiz, sunk between a couple of round shoulders, and, damme, he croaked like a toad in a hole. What do you say to a hop in the garden, eh? Look at the lawn!

Rand. Why, at present, Sir David—

Sir D. I know it—Rather not—That's right: no nonsense: I hate excuses. Looks like rain: cursed cloudy; and all that. No ceremony here.

Scru. A little rest after a journey is—

Sir D. Right—By the bye, talking of that, after a journey, I met with Kit—D'ye know Kit Skurry?

Rand. Never heard of him.

Scru. Nor I.

Sir D. An odd, harum-scarum, absent, flighty fish. Old friend of our's; but a damned quiz: got acquainted in the queerest way in the world.

Lady. I've heard Sir David mention—

Sir D. Be quiet. Coming from Paul's one night, where I picked you up in an odd sort of a strange style—

Scru. Why it was rather—

Sir D. Hush! Got into my coach—all alone, dull as hell, dark as the devil: so, to amuse myself, fell fast asleep.

Rand. Entertaining, indeed!

Sir D. Very—I know it. When the carriage came to the hill, rubbed my eyes to wake, out of one corner, and saw Skurry stuck up in the other. I thought coachy had crammed in a corpse.

Rand. It looked rather suspicious.

Sir D. Took him for dead, as I hope to live.

Rand. How did you behave?

Sir D. Sat still: frightened out of my wits, till I got home; and John came out with a candle?

Scru. And how did he explain?

Sir D. Easy enough. Got drunk upon business; going to town; popped into my carriage for the mail-coach, to secure a good place before the rest of the passengers; and as the hostler crossed the yard in the dark, bid him shut the door, and be damned to him. Made us monstrous merry, didn't it, love?

Lady. Extremely.

Sir D. Yes, my lady laughed till she was ready to—Go to the farm, eh? Peep at the pigs?

Lady. Lard, Sir David, how you tease gentlemen to walk, who have scarcely recovered from the rattle of the road: your friends have no relish for pigs now; besides, it's so late, we shall hardly have time to dress for dinner.

Sir D. Eh! gad, that's true. No dinner without dressing.—Wont walk.—Well, do as you like: I leave you here with my dear Lady Dunder. [To Lady D.] Talk to 'em, deary, do; give 'em a sketch of the county. Some Dover scandal, and Canterbury tales quite in your way, love. She knows all about you.

Scru. Indeed!

Sir D. Yes, I told all, just as I had it from Paul. Make her prattle to you, do you hear? Devilish deal of solid sense about her, I assure you.

Rand. That we are convinced of.

Sir D. I'll just take a turn, and abuse my people; see what's going on within and without—house and garden; farm and fire-side: look at the plate and the pantry: gape at the geese, and the ducks, and the dogs, and the hogs, and the logs. Must go—damned sorry: must mind my little cutter of cabbages; an idle, eating, cheating dog; and would sooner be damned than dig. He's of no more use in the garden than Adam: for he steals every apple he can find, and wont even take the pains of grafting a gooseberry bush.

[Exit.
Scru. I hope we don't detain your ladyship from walking?

Lady. By no means: Sir David's horse-walks have given me a dislike to so fatiguing an exercise. I drive round the grounds in a whiskey, now and then—or a canter on a poney—

Rand. But, while Sir David is at his farm, your ladyship has probably your menagerie to attend. Is your ladyship fond of birds in that style?

Lady. Oh, no, I prefer a little canary in my closet, to all the birds of the air in England.

Scru. No getting rid of her, I see—[Aside.] I wonder your ladyship has given up walking too; the air of this garden is delightful.

Rand. Charming! And this lawn before the house here.

[Walking up to the glass door with SCRUPLE.

Enter KITTY, running in with a bundle of flowers, HARRIET following.

Kitty. Oh! mamma, mamma! see what a big bundle of flowers I have got.

Lady. Hush, Kitty—Consider!

Kitty. Eh! what, company? O lud! Two Jemmys, I vow. Do, mamma, introduce us.

Lady. For heaven's sake, girl—Gentlemen, give me leave to introduce—

Kitty. La, mamma, you are so round about always.—I'll go and give 'em one of my best courtesies.—You'll see now: I'll do it in half the time—[The men come from the glass door to the front of the stage. KITTY goes up to RANDOM, begins courtesying, looks in his face, drops the flowers, and screams.]

Kitty. Oh!

Rand. Ha! the young lady's taken ill.

Lady. Mercy on me! Why, girl! why, Kitty! What's the matter with you?

[They put her in a chair.

Kitty. Nothing, mamma—nothing—but something that—

Rand. Something that was in the flowers, Madam, I believe.

Kitty. Yes, yes,—a great—

Rand. A great wasp. I heard it buz by me, as you dropt 'em.

Kitty. Yes, a wasp: it was so. I declare it has so flurried me; seeing what I so little expected.—[Looking at RANDOM.

Rand. How do you find yourself now, Madam? A little flurried still, I'm afraid.

Lady. And I to be without my smelling-bottle too—Bless me, why, Harriet, you give no more assistance than—[SCRUPLE at the beginning of the bustle goes round to HARRIET.]

Har. Excuse me, Madam; but seeing my sister so suddenly taken ill—

Scru. Has quite affected Miss Harriet's spirits. One turn in the air will relieve them. If the young lady will give me leave to attend her into the garden—

Lady. You're extremely kind, Sir: go, my love—Poor, dear, sympathetic girl! The gentleman will assist you.

Scru. I'll take the tenderest care of her, be assured, Madam.

[Exit SCRUPLE with HARRIET through the glass door.

Rand. If your ladyship would favour us with a little hartshorn—

Lady. Lard! that I should be so stupid as to leave my salts on the dressing-table. I'll run for them myself in a minute. Sit still, Kitty, my dear; a little of Dalmahoy's pungent will relieve you presently, I warrant.

[Exit.

Rand. And now, my dear Kitty!

Kitty. [Rising.] Flush, hush! lud! you have frighted me out of my wits: I have hardly breath to ask you a question. Where did you come from? Who brought you here? How long do you stay? And who do you go away with?

Rand. I came from London; brought here by your father; stay till to-night; and go away with you, my angel.—So much for question and answer.

Kitty. With me! you might have asked my consent first, I think.

Rand. Nay, nay, we have no time for forms now. Your mother will be back instantly, and we may want opportunities: your father knows nothing of me nor my friend; but picked us up at the inn with a common invitation: but delays might produce some cross accident to make our designs known, and defeat our plan. The family retires early, I find: we shall order a post-coach to the garden wall at eleven. Now, Kitty, if we could but find the outside of a certain chamber door—

Kitty. O gemini! you must not venture along the gallery. You and Mr. Scruple will be at the farther end of it. All the visitors will sleep there. Papa and mamma next to you, and Harriet and I beyond them. I would not venture out for the world.

Rand. No, but if Scruple and I were to venture.

Kitty. Oh! it would be to no purpose. We shall have nothing to do with it: you may creep about in the dark as much as you please, we won't assist you, I promise you.—We won't—no—we won't even put a chair on the outside of the door, that you may know our room from the others.

Rand. Thanks! thanks! my dear, sweet, charming, bewitching, little—[Embracing her.]

Enter LADY DUNDER, hastily.

Lady. Here are the salts.

Rand. [Changing his tone, but without letting KITTY go.] That's right, Madam: lean upon me: walking about will be of infinite service, I am certain.

Lady. You're very good, indeed, Mr. Random. How are you now, Kitty?

Kitty. Recovered vastly. Much easier since you left us, mamma.—[Quitting RANDOM.]

Lady. Ay, ay, I knew it would be soon over foolish girl, to be in a flutter at such a trifle! but come, we have troubled Mr. Random too much already: we'll take our leaves, and dress for the day.—To be alarmed at an insect indeed!

Kitty. La, mamma, why not?

Rand. Certainly there's more in it than your ladyship imagines.

Lady. Well, well; you're very good—Bu-ha, ha, ha! Sir David will laugh finely at this —tottering in a chair—and—you won't forget to tell it at dinner, I dare say—

Kitty. Well, I deserve to be laughed at, I see: foolish enough, to be sure. Come, mamma— [Taking her arm, and looking archly at RANDOM as she goes out.] You won't forget the chair, I dare say, Mr. Random.

[Exeunt KITTY and LADY.]

Rand. So; this even exceeds my warmest expectations. If Scruple follows Harriet up closely, our success is certain: but he is so shilly shally. Damn it, if he lets her reflect we are lost. Women were never born for reflection; and whenever they have any, it's generally used to turn all our schemes topsy turvy. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—A Garden belonging to Dunder Hall.

HARRIET and SCRUPLE.

Scru. Why, Harriet! why torture me with these needless objections?

Har. Needless! good heavens! How can I accept your proposals? the indelicacy, the consequences which may follow; the steps, too, your friend is taking with my younger sister—

Scru. My life on't, are guided by honour; and the emergency, the occasion, every thing conspires in urging us to take advantage of the moment. The scheme I have proposed is—

Har. In your present situation rash, even to madness: time too, without so hasty a proceeding, may produce circumstances in our favour. A little delay—

Scru. Will occasion, perhaps, an eternal separation: you know my situation; know that, with prudence, (a virtue, which, I confess, I have hitherto neglected,) it may be essentially altered for the better: but the anxieties I shall suffer by delay; the engagements, which the commands of a father may oblige you to subscribe to; all convince me, if your regard continues, you will favour my warmest wishes. This very evening, Harriet—

Har. Impossible! Press no further, I beseech you. The peace of a family depends on my conduct. Parents have ties on me, Mr. Scruple, which I should shudder to violate.

Scru. Absurd! have not they proposed a match for you—

Har. A detested one, I own: but a thousand accidents may prevent its going forward; and, till I see the strongest necessity for securing my own happiness, I dare not risk the happiness of others, so very, very near to me.

Scru. Still, still, Harriet, this delay! why take pleasure in tormenting me?

Har. It is not in my nature: bred up in the country, I have imbibed notions, which the refinement of a town education might term romantic; for I have preferred happiness to splendour; nor have I blushed to own to you, the affections of an honest, generous mind, have much more weight with me than the allurements of pomp and fortune: apprised of these sentiments, tempt me no more, I beg, Sir; nor strive to take advantage of a partiality, which would be ill-placed on one who would recommend to me so inconsiderate a Behaviour. [Warmly.]

Scru. Confusion! But I am to blame, Madam; I have relied too much on that partiality, which I see cannot surmount the slightest obstacles. I see

I have offended; I shall soon quit a house, Madam, where I find my presence is disagreeable— [Going.]

Har. Unkind! ungenerous man! you, too, who read my heart; who see its tenderness, and what this struggle costs me: but prudence urges your departure; go then; I cannot, dare not, follow you: my actions are not at my disposal. Ah! if they were, I'd share my fortunes with you to be happy.

Scru. Dear, sweet simplicity! O, Harriet, forgive my petulance; pardon a passion, whose warmth consumes all bonds. Yes, yes, I will be prudent for your sake, Harriet; and yet I must not lose you; but wish and wait for happier times.

Har. The times will come, assure yourself. My father may put off this match.

Scru. If he should hasten it?

Har. Why then—Nay, nay, you know my weakness.

Scru. Then I will be content; you must at last be mine. [Taking her hand.] Till then I'll watch with anxious care about you; still cherish hopes, still curb them at your bidding. Prudence shall chasten passion; prudence, which, like this fan, my Harriet, tempers the bosom's heat, but never chills it.

Har. Then keep it: [Giving the fan.] keep it as an emblem of your conduct; and when I claim it, which one day, no doubt, I shall, be it from difficulties—removed or yet increasing, or from whatever cause, when once I take it, account me all your own.

Scru. My lovely girl! O may that day—

Sir D. [Without.] Hollo! girls? plague on't, why, where the deuce—[Enters.] Oh! here you are, aha! got acquainted already—that's right: he's as pretty a promising sprig of a—what's he talking of? somewhat sensible? mentioning me?

Scru. We were just talking of you, indeed, Sir David.

Sir D. Like enough; what, you've got my young puss in a corner?

Scru. I was explaining to Miss Harriet, Sir.

Sir D. I know it; isn't she an apt scholar? had it all from me; sticks to a point, keeps close to a subject; harkye, Hal, got news for you; lookee, a letter from London.

Har. About me, papa?

Sir D. Every tittle. Full of flames, settlements, constancy, contracts, peace, and pin-money—made up the match: here it is, [Showing the Letter.] as neat a mixture of love and law; nothing but harmony and business; just like a drum: all music and parchment. You'll stay the wedding, won't you?

Scru. That I'm afraid will be out of my power.

Sir D. Pooh! Prythee, 'twont be long; make us monstrous happy: Random and you now, eh! shall make no noise about it. Just a snug party. Only a few friends, a roasted ox, a blind fiddler, and a hop in the hall.

Scru. May I ask the gentleman's name?

Sir D. Lord Snolts. D'ye know him?

Scru. His person only; which is by no means in his favour: his lordship is somewhat gummy, extremely short too, Sir David.

Sir D. Ha! no great hopes of his growing neither. My lord will be five-and-forty come Lammas, I take it.

Seru. Rather an advanced age to begin making love.

Sir D. Right: we sha'n't lose a moment; he has been making money, however, this long time; rich as a Rabbi.

Seru. Money, I hear, Sir David, is not the only ingredient necessary in matrimony.

Sir D. No: what else?

Seru. The power of Cupid, sometimes.

Sir D. Curse Cupid! he has not a half-penny to buy him breeches. A love match won't light you a candle, egad.

Seru. And yet a stupid, old, ugly husband, is—

Sir D. I know it: like a heavy old fashioned piece of plate—always handsome when he's rich.

Har. [After reading the Letter.] Be here to-morrow! Bless me, this is so sudden, so unexpected!

Sir D. Right! the best way in the world in these cases. All settled now, but the ceremony; that we'll finish as soon as possible.—Marriage is a kind of cold bath, Hal! never stand trembling on the brink: dash away—one plunge, a slight shock, and the business is over.

Har. But you know, papa, I have scarcely ever seen his lordship: it will be so hasty.

Sir D. Be quiet! I know it; married so myself, Hal. Shouldn't have had my dear Lady Dunder, if I had not been hasty. All agreed on before we met; coupled in a quarter of an hour after I saw her; come together as people dance minuets; I bowed, she courtesied, and, egad, I had her by the left hand in a moment.

Seru. But the case here is different. Her ladyship had but little reasons for wishing delay: if all husbands, indeed, had equal accomplishments—

Sir D. Eh! why something in that; men ar'n't all alike; every body is not blessed with manner and style to—eh!—few such figures as I. But Hal, here, is grave, and studies the mind. My lord has told her his already, you know. So as soon as he comes, why—

Har. Let me entreat you, Sir, not to be so precipitate; let me take a little time to—

Sir D. Take time! Pooh, time steals too fast to be taken, now, Hal. My lord leaves London to-morrow, be here to dinner, to church, in the evening to—eh?—why, what ails you? Look as red, and as pale as—

Har. The weather, Sir; nothing more—the heat of the—

Sir D. Odsó, true; forgot that. Been broiling here in the sun, like a lot of negroes: we'll walk to the house, and—

Har. I attend you; but it has really so overcome me—I—almost want strength to follow you. [Embarrassed.] I want—

Seru. Your fan, Madam.

Sir D. Ay, right: a few flaps in the face would bring her about in a second.

Seru. This, Madam, which you have just permitted me the honour of carrying for you.

Sir D. Eh! Did she? Give it her. Take it, Hal.

Har. Shall I, papa?

Sir D. To be sure. Can't well do without it, I think, at present. A mighty civil, dangling, well-bred sort of a—carries it o' purpose for you, you see, to give you on all occasions.

Har. If then, on this occasion, the gentleman will return it. [Hesitating.]

Seru. With the utmost pleasure, believe me, Madam. [Presenting it.]

Sir D. Well done, Dangle, egad! Flap away, Hal. Do you a deal of good.

Har. [Fanning.] How refreshing to the spirits!

Sir D. Yes, so it's a sign. En't it, you?

Seru. Certainly—it is—it is a sign, Sir David.

Sir D. I know it. Women can't do without 'em. All their airs and graces depend upon it. The tap, flap, flirt, crack, peep, pat, and a hundred uses besides, which I have no notion of.

Har. [Fanning.] It would not be proper, if you had, papa.

Sir D. Like enough: but let's in, and open our budget: quite delight my lady with the news; she'll be in a hell of a pucker. A fine fuss with preparations to-morrow, I warrant: up to the neck in beef, gowns, ducks, jewels, ribbons, and puff pastry. Come, Hal. [Going out.] Soon have your swain kissing your hand. [SCRUPLE kisses it.] Come along: soon settle this. Kitty will be coupled next. Cares are all over; and I can now safely swear that most of my uneasiness is behind me. [Exeunt; SCRUPLE courting HARRIET, behind SIR DAVID, in dumb show.]

SCENE IV.—The Ship Inn.

Enter PEERY, meeting ROUNDLEE and QUIRK.

Paul P. I hope, gentlemen, you have every thing to your satisfaction.

Round. I wish we had, with all my heart.

Paul P. I am very sorry any thing should happen amiss. I do all for the best, your honours—for people in post-chaises. [Aside.]

Quirk. Well, and how goes your house? are you tolerably full at present, eh, landlord?

Paul P. Um! Full enough in the larder, your honour. Plenty of fowls, ducks, geese, and pigeons; and butchers' meat in abundance: nut-ton chops, lamb chops—

Round. Damn chops: we don't want victuals, cram us with news.

Quirk. But what company have you? Any body of note now? Any body that makes a noise in your house?

Paul P. Let me see—first, there's my wife—

Round. Psha! we have nothing to do with your wife, man; we want an acquaintance or two.

Quirk. Ay, haven't you two—two young gentlemen, for instance, above stairs?

Paul P. Hum!—there's a very old one in the back parlour.

Round. Oh the devil!

Paul P. Two young gentlemen indeed came down from London about seven this morning, and they—

Both. What! What!

Paul P. Went away about eight, I believe.

Round. Damnation! I thought so.

Quirk. But were they tall or short, or fat or lean, or—

Paul P. Eh! One was in a gray coat, and the other in a green one—Very inquisitive.

[Aside.]
Round. [To QUIRK.] The very clothes we heard at the hotel they sat out in. What shall we do, Quirk? How shall we turn?

Quirk. Back.

Round. Let's inquire further, however—I sup-nose now, landlord, you'd like to see two such gentlemen again in your house?

Paul P. Certainly, your honour! They are friends of yours, I imagine?

Quirk. Why, we should be glad to see 'em again, I promise you. Do you expect 'em back, shortly?

Paul P. Oh yes, in a day or two, I make no doubt.

Round. Indeed! I am rejoiced to hear it.

Paul P. Nay, perhaps sooner—I guess where they are gone; hardly out of sight of Dover.

Quirk. Ah! at Calais, no doubt—or at Boulogne, edging the coast, as you say, Mr. Roundfee.

Paul P. And from what I could gather from the servant, I make no doubt, but their occasions will make them come quickly to our town again.

Round. Rare news, Quirk—you're a very clever, sensible, intelligent fellow, landlord; I am so happy at the thought of seeing my old friends again—gad I—begin to find my stomach returning—so you'll get us a chop, and half a pint of your best port.

Paul P. It shall be done, Sir. Stingy scoundrel! [Aside.] Here, Lewis.

Enter WAITER.

Lay a cloth in the back room, up two pair of stairs, d'ye hear?

Wait. Very well, Sir. There's the packet just put into the harbour, Sir.

Paul P. Ha! Any body particular?

Wait. Mr. Random and another gentleman are coming up the quay, Sir.

Round. Eh! Who?

Quirk. Random! Put back again, by all that's lucky.

Paul P. Odsol! A rare customer! Run, Lewis. [Exit WAITER.] Your snack shall be ready presently, gentlemen, and—

Quirk. But stop and—

Paul P. And every thing to your satisfaction, gentlemen—and—

Round. We want to—

Paul P. Hot, and hot, gentlemen.

Round. Plague of your—

Paul P. And I am your very humble servant, gentlemen! Coming! [Exit, bawling.]

Round. Huzza! rare news, Quirk. The luckiest hit in the world! They are just come on shore, you see, and we shall come in for the cash, at least their persons, which is something towards it, directly. Come, come, we'll send for an officer whilst we are at dinner; and drinking a merry meeting.—Come, my dear Quirk, we'll soon settle the business, I warrant; and then, after our hot post-chaise scamper, and I've made sure of my money, we'll travel back slowly, at our ease, in the dilly. [Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Room in the Ship, at Dover.

Enter OLD RANDOM, leaning on CARNEY.

Old Rand. Gently, gently, good Carney! The cursed sea breeze has got hold of my hip, and I can no more move, at first setting off, than a post horse.

Car. There! there! gently—and now, Mr. Random, many welcomes to England again. We have been feeding on French air, like cameleons, and you have grown as strong and as stout as a camel.

Old Rand. But I have a huge lump of cares on my back, notwithstanding.

Car. But health is the great thing to care about. Why you look as hale and as hearty as ever.

Old Rand. Indeed! do you think so, Carney?

Car. Think! I know it.

Old Rand. It has been of service. Before I went over I was as pale and as puffy—flesh without colour, and my face peeping through a parcel of wrappers.

Car. For all the world like a mummy

Old Rand. How! why don't you see now?—

Car. Oh! quite another thing, Sir.

Old Rand. Another thing, Sir! Why, you booby, I am as well as ever I was in my life, except a few pains, a gout, and a cough.

Car. Very true, Sir.

Old Rand. Very true! Then why are you so very covetive in your congratulations? Oh, the South of France is the best physician in the world—if it can't cure it seldom kills, and that's more than most doctors can say for themselves. Then the pleasant time we have passed together; I nursing myself, and you keeping me company, in my room, all the while I was sick, in a fine, charming, warm climate!

Car. Ay, happy days, indeed, Mr. Random. The walks too I enjoyed, in imagination, looking out of your window.

Old Rand. And so you'd wish to have walked out, and be damned to you! taking your amusement abroad, while poor I was taking physic at home. Here's friendship for you! and a pretty return for the pleasure I found in keeping you close to my bed-side all the day long. Lord! Lord! what few folks feel for any body but themselves!

Car. Nay, I'm sure I suffered as much as you did yourself.

Old Rand. Well, well, you are the best of the bunch, I believe—the only man I can agree with. What can be the reason of it, Carney?

Car. The similarity of our dispositions, no doubt; for I talk, eat, drink, and think, exactly as you do, Mr. Random.

Old Rand. Something in that, I believe—but what a singular, cruel case mine is, that with so many connexions and a family to boot, I find such few proofs of people liking me—Plagued with a profligate dog of a son too—who, because I have indulged in a few trifling pleasures myself, thinks that he must be uninterrupted in his wild vagaries. Zounds! getting children is worse than getting a fever: they keep an incurable heat in one's blood, and cost a devilish deal of money into the bargain.

Car. But there is some prospect of a cure here, I hope?

Old Rand. No, no—past recovery, I promise you. The dog will be deucedly disappointed to see me so stout, again, I fancy. [Coughing.] Eh, Carney?

Car. Impossible, Mr. Random: I can't think him so depraved. I dare say he'll be overjoyed to see you. I am sure, for my part,—[Pompously.]

Old Rand. Ay, ay, you are a good soul, Carney, and don't know what ingratitude means—at least I think you don't, for you are continually telling me so—but he—Didn't I intend to make him my sole heir, and leave him every thing, except my plate, and my pictures, and my houses, and my money? and see his gratitude! You are talking to me from morning to night of regard and attachment; now he has never made half a dozen of those fine professions in his life.

Car. Where is he now?

Old Rand. Rattling all over the town, I suppose, with his friend Mr. Scruple, without a guinea in his pocket; living like other fashionable puppies, on what he has least of, his wits; laughing at every man who has sense enough not to act and dress like himself—and this is ton and fashion now-a-days. Damme, he's hardly fit for any thing. What can I do with him, Carney?

Car. Um! Put him in the Guards, Mr. Random.

Enter PEERY.

Old Rand. Ha! honest Peery!

Paul P. I hope I see you well, Sir? your honour looks charmingly since I had the honour of seeing your honour.

Old Rand. See there! How the alteration strikes strangers. [To CARNEY.] And any news, Master Peery? any thing stirring lately?

Paul P. Nothing particular, except since your honour arrived—

Old Rand. Well, and what happened then? Any body inquiring after me? Who is it?

Paul P. Two very inquisitive people.

Old Rand. Oh! custom-house officers, I imagine.

Paul P. No, they came from London—they've asked a vast deal about your honour. Seem rejoiced to hear your honour's arrived.

Old Rand. Very civil of 'em. I see nothing particular in this, Master Peery.

Paul P. And I believe they have sent for a constable for your honour.

Old Rand. For me, Mr. Peery!

Car. Impossible! For what?

Paul P. Um! Perhaps they think his honour's a spy.

Car. Mercy on us! We shall be both apprehended for runners.

Old Rand. I apprehend that you are a blockhead! runners! Why I can hardly walk, and never spy any thing without spectacles. Why, what's the meaning of all this?

Paul P. I can guess at no other reason they can have for taking up you, who are just come from France—but perhaps your honour may remember some capital crime you have committed. I am sure 'Squire Random, a gentleman of six thousand a year, can never want money.

Enter BAILIFF and Follower.

Bai. Is your name Random, Sir?

Old Rand. Well, Sir, suppose it is?

Bai. Then, Sir, you are my prisoner.

Old Rand. The devil I am?

Bai. At the suit of Ralph Roundfee, money scrivener of London, for three thousand pounds.

Paul P. The 'squire arrested for debt?—it can't be.

Car. I should sooner suspect myself.

Bai. And Mr. Scruple here for the same sum. [Slaps CARNEY'S shoulder.]

Car. Scruple! Who, I?

Old Rand. Scruple! Dick's crony, by Jupiter! and I and poor Carney arrested for the dog's debts as soon as we set foot in England—a profligate a scoundrel! I'll—One moment, if you please—come here, Peery! you see this business?

Paul P. Plain enough.

Old Rand. Do you know of any Mr. Scruple he mentions?

Paul P. Ods! it's the two young merchants, as sure as a gun, that Sir David carried off in his carriage this morning.

Old Rand. Merchants!

Paul P. Yes, and now I recollect, one called the other Scruple, sure enough.

Old Rand. Well, well, you see the mistake—you must be bail in this business.

Paul P. Who, I! Lord, your honour!

Old Rand. Come, no words. Who is this Sir David, you talk of?

Paul P. Sir David Dunder, of Dunder Hall—lives hard by.

Old Rand. Order a post-chaise. I'll drive there immediately.

Paul P. But it's so late, your honour. Past ten o'clock.

Old Rand. No matter: I'll raise the house. Zounds; I'll raise the dead, but I'll be at the bottom of all this directly: and if you are shy about bail, why—I'll leave honest Carney here in pawn, till I come back.

Car. I had rather keep you company, if you please, Mr. Random.

Paul P. Why, as it appears like a mistake, Sir; and I have known you backwards and forwards so long, and your estate—and—

Old Rand. Well, trundle these fellows down stairs. You'll accept of his undertaking.

Bai. We desire no better.

Old Rand. As to this Mr. What's his name? Mr. Roundfee, who is in the house; not a word of it to him, till I return; for particular reasons.

Paul P. Every thing shall be done to your satisfaction, Sir. Come, gentlemen, we'll proceed to the cellar, if you please; the best lock-up house in Christendom.

Car. Mercy on us; what an escape!

Old Rand. An escape! a scoundrel! an abandoned—What do you think now of all this, Carney?

Car. Think! Why, I—What do you think?

Old Rand. That you are a blockhead, not to see the meaning of all this: that my son's a blockhead to behave so; and that I am a greater blockhead than any body to suffer it.—Zounds! I can hardly contain myself. I'll never see his face again. Come along, Carney: I'll be with him, and sooner than he suspects, I believe: I'll unkenel him, I warrant you: I'll disclaim him, I'll discard him, I'll undermine him, I'll undo him—damme, I'll unget him,—That's, disinherit him—He shall rot in a jail: rot me, if he shan't; I'll teach him what it is to run in debt in person, and get arrested by proxy. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Gallery in Dunder Hall.

Four chamber doors at equal distances in the back scene. A chair placed against the farthest door on the right hand; stage dark.

RANDOM opens the second door, on the left.

So! all quiet: not a soul stirring. [Comes forward.] Sir David, good man, thanks to early hours, is snoring away in the next room to me.

I heard him, like a high wind, through the cracks of the old family wainscot. He little dreams of what's to happen before he wakes. Where can Scruple be all this while? He promised to be on the watch, as soon as every thing was silent; but he's so cursed slow, and backward in this business! If I was not pretty sure that one woman is as much as any one can manage, I should be tempted to take his nymph away without waiting for him. It's so damned dark too, that there's no being certain of his door. The chair was a lucky thought; we should have made some confounded mistake without it, I believe. How the plague now shall I make him hear, without disturbing any one else.

Scru. [Opens the farthest door on the left.]
St—St!

Rand. Scruple!

Scru. Random, is it you?

Rand. Yes!—softly!—all's snug. The baronet's as fast as a church.

Scru. And his wife?—

Rand. Pickling, I believe, below stairs in the store-room. The old woman's head is so full of this nonsensical match Sir David has told her of, that she'll be up with the house-keeper, I find, three parts of the night, to make preparations for the wedding.

Scru. 'Sdeath, we shall be discovered: we shall never get out without her hearing us.

Rand. Pooh! never have done with your doubts and objections?

Scru. Surely her being up is an objection of some weight.

Rand. Certainly, she's of great weight in the house—for which reason she's gone quite to the bottom of it. She must have devilish good ears to hear us there; for we shan't come within a mile of her. But have you heard any thing of Tiptoe?

Scru. No: do you expect him.

Rand. Yes: I sent him to Dover, with orders to bring the carriage and horses to the back gate of the garden. It's turned of eleven too, I take it. Look what's o'clock, will you?

Scru. Look! why it requires the eyes of a cat. It's as dark as a dungeon.

Rand. Odso, I had forgot; but he'll be here presently: I have been obliged to let him into the secret: he has procured a key of the back-door, and will slide up to my chamber; which he has had an opportunity of marking, he tells me, in his own way, to give us intelligence.

Scru. Well, if he is but punctual—

Rand. Oh! you may depend upon him: but, till he comes, we may as well prepare our fair companions. I'll try and find out the chair, which is against their dressing-room door; where they are in waiting. [Feeling about.] Their bed-chamber is beyond it; so I may enter without infringing the rules of etiquette, you know.

Scru. Hadn't I better go with you?

Rand. No, no; stay here as an outpost: I shall soon be back.

Scru. Gently, no mistakes now.

Rand. Never fear! So, here's the chair.

Scru. Remember—caution's the word.

Rand. Ay, and expedition too. The house must divide, you know: so the sooner we clear the gallery the better. [Taps; door opens, and he enters into the women's chamber.]

Scru. How awkward I feel in this business!

It's the first time I ever entered into a scheme of this sort; and am now convinced that no man thinks of running away, without being cursedly frightened.

Tiptoe. [Singing without.].—

So great a man, so great a man, I'll be?

Scru. Hark! What's that? Ha! a light. How the devil now am I to find out my room again? It comes nearer and nearer. I must venture. I have three chances to one of doing no mischief; and I dare say my unlucky stars (or rather my want of any stars at all) will direct me to Sir David. So, here's somebody's chamber; I must in, at all hazards. [Goes into the same chamber he came out of.]

Enter TIPTOE, with a dark lantern, singing, and drunk.

Typ. Here I am at last! What a plaguy parcel of turnings and windings, to get up to this old crazy gallery! umph! It has made me as giddy as a goose. Now for my masters, damn my masters! Scamper! Scamper! Scamper!—I won't do—No; never fit for me. Give me a regular, steady, sober family for my money. If it hadn't been for the lantern I begged of the old boy at the inn—I was forced to treat the drunken scoundrel before he would give it me—I might have tumbled over the bannisters. Mr. Random, now I think on't, ordered me to come in the dark! Umph! Gentlemen think no more of servants' necks now-a-days, they think we've one to spare, like the Swan in Lad-lane, I believe. But softly! softly! No noise. I must go to the chamber to tell him the carriage is ready. Let me see, it's the last door but one, at one end of the gallery; but whether it's to the right, or to the left, curse me if I recollect. Stay—[Turning round, and counting the doors.] One, two, three. Damme, how the doors dance! I shall never find the right, if they take it in their heads to run round so confoundedly. I remember, [Taking the chair, and drawing it along.] when I lived with old Lady Hobbles she always sat still at Ranelagh to find out her company. Now, as these gentlemen here, [Pointing to the doors.] choose to take a Ranelagh round, I think I had better sit quiet in the middle of 'em, till any old acquaintance comes by. [Pulls the chair against the next door, and sits down.] Zounds! how fast somebody sleeps, Sir David, perhaps. I wonder if baronets ever snore. What the devil am I to do now? Get my head broke for not calling my master; and my bones broke, if I should happen to call any body else instead of him. As that is the case, I'll call nobody, egad!—I'll e'en go back to the carriage, and wait till they come for me. So, gently, steady.

[Exit, singing.]

Scru. [After a pause, opens the door.] Once more every thing is quiet. I can't conceive who it could be so long with a light in the gallery. I had best give Random notice of what has happened; that in case we are watched, he may be upon his guard. Hereabouts the door must be—[Going to the door RANDOM entered.] Eh! no chair—'sdeath, this is Sir David's! A pretty blunder I should have made! [Goes to the next.] O here it is at last. [Taps at the door.] What a number of accidents this little contrivance has prevented! I had better explain to him what has happened, in the inside of my chamber; for it's dangerous waiting on the outside a moment, I find. What the deuce keeps him so long now? [Taps again; SIR DAVID opens the door in his bed-gown and night-cap.]

Sir D. Well?

Scru. Hush! it's I.

Sir D. I!

Scru. Softly! Softly! Zounds, you are so unguarded! Follow me! Quick, quick! Only follow me, and you shall hear all. [Exit into his own chamber.]

Sir D. Follow me! Damned, if I do though. Can't stir a step without running the risk of breaking my nose. Cursed queer! A fellow in the dark with no name, a rascal to rob the house, perhaps—gad, it has put me all in a twitter.

RANDOM comes out with a bundle from the women's chamber.

Rand. St! St!

Sir D. Eh!

Rand. 'Tis I.

Sir D. So! here's 'tother I. [Aside.]

Rand. Where are you? Here! hold this bundle. [Thrusting it into his hands.] Why, what makes you shake so? Are you cold here?

Sir D. Zounds, a thief!—He'll cut my throat if I cry out. [Aside.]

Rand. For shame, flurried at such a trifle as this! But there's no knowing even one's friends till they're tried, I see.

Sir D. Like enough. Most of your friends have been tried, I dare say. [Aside.]

Rand. Put we shall have a whole cargo to carry. Stay where you are now. Don't stir for your life, and I'll be back in an instant. We'll soon make an end, I warrant you.

[Returns to the women's chamber.]

Sir D. That you will, a pretty public one too, I take it. Mercy on me! How shall I get away? The dog's given me a bundle here as big as a child. I shall be brought in for a new kind of burglary—Cast for breaking into my own house, and hanged for robbing myself of property. My lady's locked up below, I suppose; bound back to back with the old housekeeper: or gagged and ravished, poor quiet soul, with the rest of the family females. If I could but contrive to—

[Feeling about.]

Scru. [Putting out his head.] Hello!

Sir D. Oh, the devil! There's one in every corner, a whole banditti playing at bo-peep.

[Aside.]

Scru. Come, come, don't trifle now; I've something to say to you.

Sir D. The fellow don't know me in the dark. I'll deceive him. [Aside.]

Scru. Nay, this delay will—

Sir D. Hush.

Scru. What's the matter? Any body coming?

Sir D. Yes, yes.

Scru. Ha! we are discovered. In, in.

[Shuts the door.]

Sir D. Now, if I could but crawl down this back stair case.

[Meets RANDOM coming out, and runs against him.]

Rand. Now, my dear Scruple, all's ready.

Sir D. Zounds, it's the two merchants!

[Aside.]

Rand. Our packing is all over.

Sir D. Indeed!

VOL. I. . . . O

Rand. Our two fair ones both equipped for flight.

Sir D. My Harriet?

Rand. Yes, and my Kitty—they'll be in our arms in an instant, you rogue! And we've nothing to do, but to lead 'em to the coach, and away as fast as love, money, and horses, can carry us. Didn't I tell you now, that your doubts were all nonsense? but, 'sdeath, you are so dull about it: your fears have so overcome you, that—why aren't you like me—all rapture, all passion?

Sir D. Hem! [Showing signs of agitation.]

Rand. Ay, this is right now! this is as it should be. But I'll go and bring 'em out. [Going; turns back.] Ha, ha, ha! I can't help laughing to think what a damned clatter Sir David will make by and by. His fat flabby wife too; cackling about the house, like an old hen that has lost her chickens.

Sir D. Old hen! Damme, I wish she had never sat to have brought such a brood.

[Aside.]

Rand. And he too. Did you ever see such a tedious booby in your life? But I'll go and conduct our charge. By the bye, has Tiptoe been here?

Sir D. No.

Rand. Careless scoundrel! But we shall find him at the gate with the carriage, I suppose. Now for it. Now to deliver our damsels from the clutches of an obstinate fool of a father. A block-head, to think to marry women to whom he pleases! No, no: whenever there's any forbidden fruit, it is not in human nature to rest easy till it is tasted. [Feeling for the door.]

Sir D. Liquorish dogs!

[Keeps back.]

Scru. [Coming out.] Why, what could he mean? There's no noise: all's quiet as can be. Random!

Rand. Well.

Scru. Are you ready?

Rand. Yes, yes: didn't I tell you so? We're coming.

Scru. Well, well: Tiptoe has not been here.

Rand. Pshaw! Plague, I know it; you told me so already.

Scru. Did I? When?

Rand. Why, this instant; but you are in such a flutter, you can't remember a word you say. But you have taken care of the bundle I hope?

Scru. Bundle! What bundle?

Rand. That, that I gave you just now.

Scru. Just now! not you, indeed! Why, you're in a flutter yourself.

Rand. Pooh, pooh! I tell you the bundle I brought out of the room. The bundle that—

Scru. Damn the bundle! I never saw it, nor felt it in all my life.

Rand. Now, how can you be so cursed obstinate? I put it into your own hands, and you shook as if you'd an ague.

Scru. Shook! your memory is shook, I believe.

Rand. Gad, I could have sworn I had given it you, but we must not stand upon trifles now. Time's precious.—[Opens the women's door; HARRIET and KITTY come out.] This way, this way. Now, ladies, we attend you.

Kitty. Lud! it's as dark as pitch.

Rand. Never fear.

Har. Heavens! how I tremble.

Scru. Courage now, my Harriet, and we may soon defy every danger.

Rand. Well said, courage! well said Cæsar, egad! 'Sdeath, Madam, if you draw back now, you spoil all. I'll bring you all through, I warrant you.

Har. I fear I shall never bear up. 'The step I am taking, the weight on my spirits—

Rand. Vapours! vapours, from being in the dark; nothing else, believe me, Madam.

Har. My mother too—what will not she feel?

Scru. Nay, pursue this no further.

Kitty. Mamma will be in a sweet bustle, I warrant. Rattling about Sir David's ears for bringing you into the house.

Sir D. [Behind.] Be quiet; I know it.

Kitty. Yes, that's exactly like him for all the world. Gemini, I shall never find my way.

Rand. Stay; take my arm. Come, Madam. Scruple—arm in arm all four, and then for our march.

Sir D. March! damme, but I'll muster among ye, though— [Aside.]

[SIR DAVID comes forward between them.]

KITTY takes hold of SIR DAVID'S and RANDOM'S arms, HARRIET of SIR DAVID'S and SCRUPLE'S; all arm in arm, SIR DAVID in the middle.

Rand. So; thus linked, he must be a cunning and a bold fellow too, that thinks of dividing us.

[Going.—A loud ringing at the bell.]

Scru. Hark! somebody rings at the gate.

Har. Oh mercy! we shall be seen.

Kitty. Lud! there's a light! hide! hide us, for heaven's sake. It's mamma, as sure as I live.

Sir D. [Aloud.] No, no! stay where you are. Come along, my lady; a light will do us a deal of good.

Enter LADY DUNDER, with a light.

Servant, ladies and gentlemen.

Lady. Mercy on me! Sir David! girls! gentlemen!

Scru. Confusion!

Rand. Sir David!

Sir D. Yes, here we are—been frisking about like a parcel of rabbits. Our burrows are all empty.

Lady. Why, what's the meaning of—

Sir D. Be quiet—meaning? treachery—mean to bamboozle us. Dark night, rope ladders, garden gate, and Gretna Green—that's the meaning of it.

Lady. How! and is this the return for—

Sir D. Hush! ay, is this the return for my open, hospitable, generous—I that put salt in your porridge, bread in your mouth, and steaks in your stomach; crammed every thing into you, but gratitude.

Lady. And come here on purpose, I suppose, with a trumped-up story of—

Sir D. Trump! damme, this will be their last trump I take it. And you too! [To the Women.] You! [To HARRIET.] you that I intended to link to a lord; to go and give up a peer for a pedlar; a merchant; a fellow that lives like a lobster by salt water; a culler of pepper and spice; a trader in train oil, Greenland blubber, and China pipkins; or a black dealer in devils to sell at American markets.

Scru. 'Sdeath! What is all this?

Rand. If you'll give us leave, Sir, to—

Sir D. Give! gad, you'd have taken leave without asking. French leave, if I had not been here—have smuggled my goods in the dark, trotted over the Tweed, and been hammered together by a bare-breeched blacksmith. A fine Scotch union, egad! my two rich roses here tied to a pair of poor pitiful thistles! but zounds! I'll have satisfaction.

Lady. For heaven's sake, my dear! cool your choler a little, Sir David.

Sir D. Be quiet. What! have I had a sword bobbing between my legs, at Dover hops, and quiet country meetings, for these twenty years; and now not rub off its rust, in the oily guts of a couple of whale catchers, for what I know to the contrary?

OLD RANDOM and CARNEY, without.

Old Rand. Come along, Carney: late as it is, my gentlemen can't escape now, I believe. [They enter.] Hey-day! the whole family collected!

Rand. My father! a pretty business we have made of it.

Old Rand. I beg pardon for this intrusion,—but if Sir David Dunder is here, and sees the occasion—

Sir D. I know it; see it all already: fine occasion, indeed: and you, too, [To OLD RAND.] act as accomplices, do you?—an old fellow—sham! What, you've a wig, now, I warrant, like a young counsellor's—squeezed over a toupee with a dapper tail peeping out between the ties.

Old Rand. How!

Car. My worthy old friend means, Sir—

Sir D. Hush:—he is an old one, is he? means to run away with my wife, then, I suppose.

Lady. I fancy he'd find it a difficult matter to carry me off.

Old Rand. Run away! Not I. I came here after a couple of youngsters, that—

Sir D. Did you! There they are. 'Take 'em away with you: as pretty a pair as any in England: you may match 'em against all Europe, egad.

Old Rand. So, you are two pretty gentlemen; are not you? And how dare you, Sir, look me in the face, after your profligate proceedings? [To RAND.] Not content neither in contracting debts, but you must have me, your poor father, you dog, arrested for 'em.

Car. Yes, and me too.

Rand. I am at a loss how to comprehend, Sir—

Old Rand. But that rascal, that rogue, Round-fee, I think they call him, he can, I believe. Here have I and poor Carney just been taken in custody for you, at Dover; while you have been playing your pranks at large all over the country.

Sir D. Eh! be quiet.—Cursed ungentle! though in you, if you are his father. Zounds! you have used me worse than they! Get yourself locked up for your son here, with a plague to you! that he and his friend may have time to run off with my daughters.

Old Rand. I! I have withdrawn my countenance long ago, I promise you.

Sir D. Ha! family failing. The son would have withdrawn his countenance too, if I'd let him.

Old Rand. How! what, attempt to—

Sir D. Be quiet.—I am the injured party: let me speak.

Lady. No, Sir David, I'll—

Scru. To end all confusion, I'll speak.

Rand. What the deuce can Doubtful say now, after all.

Seru. It is yourself, Sir David, who have been chiefly to blame.

Rand. He beats me all to nothing. [Aside.] Strangers might have been attended with much more disagreeable consequences. You took our characters from report, I see: characters which we never thought of assuming.

Sir D. Oh, damn Paul!

Seru. Our invitation was unsought; and though our manner of requiring your favours appears unjustifiable, you may congratulate yourself, that instead of being practised upon by men, unworthy your countenance, you have met with gentlemen.

Sir D. Here's two fine fellows! come into my house—going to carry off half on't on their shoulders—and then—I have met with gentlemen.

Seru. Our conduct, Sir David, is not so culpable as you imagine. A chance, like your present invitation, threw us in your daughters' way at Bath, and our continued affection (I think I may answer for my friend) may prove our motives are unguided by interest: as a further proof of it, we disclaim all views of their fortune.—Bestow but their hands, Sir David, and we shall be happy.

Sir D. Eh! zounds! something noble in that too.

Lady. But to think of carrying away our two dear rosy girls here; handsomer than all the pale chits of the county.

Sir D. Hush! handsomer? Ay, and richer too! with pockets full of money: housewives stuffed with bank notes; and work bags crammed with guineas.

Old Rand. Indeed, I begin to think Dick is not such a sad dog as I took him for. Eh! Carney?

Car. I am perfectly of your opinion, Mr. Random.

Lady. And what has the other gentleman to say for himself? [To RANDOM.]

Kitty. Indeed, mamma, we are not much to blame neither.

Rand. Love, Madam, all-powerful love, must plead my excuse; a passion which may once have influenced your ladyship's delicate susceptible bosom.

Lady. Well, I vow the young man—pleads so prettily in his defence, that—

Rand. If your ladyship and my father could forget past occurrences, and join with me in my suit to Sir David for a union with his daughter—I hope my future conduct—

Old Rand. Um!—Why, as things are so, Sir David; and my connexions are pretty considerable—my estate pretty well known—

Car. A good six thousand a year.—I have known my good friend here some time; and have had his property under my eye for these five years.

Old Rand. And his friend, I am happy to tell you, is as well connected as he is.

Sir D. Is he?—Well, as matters are—and my lord might find a flaw here,—an ugly business, not much to his liking; I think we can but in honour be off—so, to prevent cursed country scandal, gabbling girls, ugly old maids, and all that—I think we may as well, my lady?

Lady. As you think proper, Sir David.—Harriet?

Har. We are bound now, Madam, both by inclination and duty, to follow your commands.

Kitty. Yes, mamma, we are both bound.

Sir D. Well, then; there, there! take one another—no words.

Rand. And now, Kitty, I am your prisoner for life.

Old Rand. Remember, Roundfee, though;—there you might have been a prisoner not much to your liking.

Sir D. What! a usurer? Damme, let's duck him.

Old Rand. Oh! he and his gentlemen may be settled with at leisure. Their blunders have left them to our mercy, and they merit none, I promise you;—fellows, whose business it is to prey upon the unthinking, extort from the needy, and live upon the distresses of mankind, deserve very little compassion when they are distressed themselves.

Sir D. I know it. But here, however, they shall have no distresses to prey upon, no moping, melancholy looks now. All's well, I hope, at last, as it ought to be—and nothing ought to give any of us, here, so much pleasure as looking to-night on a set of very merry faces. [Exeunt.]

THE DEVIL TO PAY:

OR,

THE WIVES METAMORPHOSED;

A BALLAD FARCE,

BY CHARLES COFFEY, Esq.

REMARKS.

This well-known little piece had as many hands concerned in its fabrication, as ever clubbed together in a business of so slight importance. It was originally written in three acts by a performer of the name of Jevon, afterwards altered considerably by Messrs. Coffey and Mottley, and again cut into a single act by Theophilus Cibber. From all the above copies, it was reproduced in its present state in 1731, and published with Mr. Coffey's name as the author. The celebrated Mrs. Clive is said to owe the rise of her great reputation to her success in the part of Nell; and Mr. Harper, the original in Jobson, considerably advanced in rank and salary by his excellent performance of that character.

In spite of the impossible absurdity whence all the characters derive their origin, this petite piece is tolerated and even seen with pleasure, from the easy humour of the dialogue, and the natural behaviour of the characters.

SCENE I.—JOBSON'S HOUSE.

Enter JOBSON and NELL.

Nell. Pr'ythee, good Jobson, stay with me to-night, and for once make merry at home.

Job. Peace, peace, you jade, and go spin: for, if I lack any thread for my stitching, I will punish you by virtue of my sovereign authority.

Nell. Ay, marry, no doubt of that, whilst you take your swing at the alehouse, spend your substance, get as drunk as a beast, and then come home like a sot, and use one like a dog.

Job. Nounz! do you prate? Why, how now, brazen-face, do you speak ill of the government? Don't you know, hussy, that I am king in my own house, and that this is treason against my majesty?

Nell. Did ever one hear such stuff? But I pray you now, Jobson, don't go to the alehouse to-night.

Job. Well, I'll humour you for once; but don't grow saucy upon't; for I'm invited by Sir John Loverule's butler, and am to be princely drunk with punch at the hall-place: we shall have a bowl large enough to swim in.

Nell. But they say, husband, the new lady will not suffer a stranger to enter her doors; she grudges even a draught of small beer to her own servants: and several of the tenants have come home with broken heads from her ladyship's own hands, only for smelling strong beer in the house.

Job. A plague on her for a fanatical jade! She has almost distracted the good knight. But she's now abroad, feasting with her relations, and will scarce come home to-night; and we are to have much drink, a fiddle, and merry gambols.

Nell. O, dear husband, let me go with you; we'll be as merry as the night's long.

Job. Why how now, you bold baggage! would you be carried to a company of smooth-faced, eating, drinking, lazy serving-men? No, no, you jade, I'll not be a cuckold.

Nell. I'm sure they would make me welcome: you promised I should see the house; and the family has not been here before, since you married and brought me home.

Job. Why, thou most audacious strumpet, dar'st thou dispute with me, thy lord and master? Get in and spin, or else my strap shall wind about thy ribs most confoundedly.

AIR.

*He that has the best wife,
She's the plague of his life,*

*But for her, who will scold and will quarrel,
Let him cut her off short*

Of her meat and her sport,

*And ten times a day hoop her barrel, brave boys,
And ten times a day hoop her barrel.*

Nell. Well, we poor women must always be slaves, and never have any joy; but you men run and ramble at your pleasure.

Job. Why, you most pestilent baggage, will you be hooped? Be gone.

Nell. I must obey.

[Going.

Job. Stay; now I think on't, here's sixpence for you; get ale and apples, stretch and puff thyself up with lamb's wool, rejoice and revel by thyself, be drunk and wallow in thy own sty, like a grumbling sow as thou art.

*He that has the best wife,
She's the plague of his life, &c.* [Sings.
[Exeunt.

SCENE II.—SIR JOHN LOVERULE'S HOUSE.

Enter BUTLER, COOK, FOOTMAN, COACHMAN, LUCY, LETTICE, &c.

But. I would the blind fiddler and our dancing neighbours were here, that we might rejoice a little, while our termagant lady is abroad: I have made a most sovereign bowl of punch.

Lucy. We had need rejoice sometimes, for our devilish new lady will never suffer it in her hearing.

Enter Blind FIDDLER, JOBSON, and NEIGHBOURS.

But. Welcome, welcome all; this is our wish.—Honest old acquaintance, Goodman Jobson, how dost thou?

Job. By my troth, I am always sharp-set towards punch, and am now come with a firm resolution, though but a poor cobbler, to be as richly drunk as a lord: I am a true English heart, and look upon drunkenness as the best part of the liberty of the subject.

But. Come, Jobson, we'll bring out our bowl of punch in solemn procession; and then for a song to crown our happiness. [Exeunt.

Re-enter JOBSON, BUTLER, &c. with a bowl of Punch.

AIR.

*Come, jolly Bacchus, god of wine,
Crown this night with pleasure;
Let none at cares of life repine,
To destroy our pleasure:*

10

*Fill up the mighty sparkling bowl.
That every true and loyal soul
May drink and sing without control,
To support our pleasure.*

*Thus, mighty Bacchus, shalt thou be Guardian of our pleasure;
That under thy protection we
May enjoy new pleasure.
And as the hours glide away,
We'll in thy name invoke their stay,
And sing thy praises, that we may
Live and die with pleasure.*

But. The king and the royal family in a brim-mer.

AIR.

*Here's a good health to the king,
And send him a prosperous reign;
O'er hills and high mountains
We'll drink dry the fountains,
Until the sun rises again, brave boys,
Until the sun rises again.*

*Then here's to thee, my boy boon,
And here's to thee my boy boon;
As we've tarried all day
For to drink down the sun, [boys,
So we'll tarry and drink down the moon, brave
So we'll tarry and drink down the moon.*

Omnès. Huzza!

Enter SIR JOHN LOVERULE, and LADY LOVE-RULE.

Lady L. O heaven and earth! what's here within my doors? Is hell broke loose? What troops of fiends are here? Sirrah, you impudent rascal, speak!

Sir J. For shame, my dear.—As this is a time of mirth and jollity, it has always been the custom of my house to give my servants liberty in this season, and to treat my country neighbours, that with innocent sports they may divert themselves.

Lady L. I say, meddle with your own affairs, I will govern my own house without your putting in an oar. Shall I ask your leave to correct my own servants?

Sir J. I thought, Madam, this had been my house, and these my tenants and servants.

Lady L. Did I bring a fortune, to be thus abused and snubbed before people? Do you call my authority in question, ungrateful man? Look to your dogs and horses abroad, but it will be my province to govern here; nor will I be controlled by e'era hunting, hawking knight in Christendom.

AIR.—SIR JOHN LOVERULE.

*Ye gods, you gave to me a wife,
Out of your grace and favour,
To be the comfort of my life,
And I was glad to have her;
But if your providence divine
For greater bliss design her,
T' obey your wills at any time,
I'm ready to resign her.*

This is to be married to a continual tempest: strife and noise, canting and hypocrisy, are eternally afloat.—'Tis impossible to bear it long.

Lady L. Ye filthy scoundrels, and odious jades I'll teach you to junket it thus, and steal my provisions; I shall be devoured, at this rate.

But. I thought, Madam, we might be merry once upon a holiday.

Lady L. Holiday, you popish cur! Is one day more holy than another? And if it be, you'll be sure to get drunk upon it, you rogue. [Beats him.] You minx, you impudent flirt, are you jiggling it after an abominable fiddle?

[Lugs Lucy by the ears.

Lucy. O lud! she has pulled off both my ears.
Sir J. Pray, Madam, consider your sex and quality: I blush for your behaviour.

Lady L. Consider your incapacity: you shall not instruct me. Who are you, thus muffled, you buzzard? [She beats them off; JOBSON steals by.

Job. I am an honest, plain, psalm-singing cobbler, Madam: if your ladyship would but go to church, you might hear me above all the rest there.
Lady L. I'll try thy voice here first, villain.

[Strikes him.

Job. Nounz! what a plague, what a devil ails you?

Lady L. O profane wretch! wicked varlet!

Sir J. For shame! your behaviour is monstrous!

Lady L. Was ever poor lady so miserable in a brutish husband as I am? I that am so pious and so religious a woman!

Job. [Sings.] He that has the best wife,

She's the plague of his life;

But for her that will scold and will quarrel.

[Exit.

Lady L. O rogue! scoundrel! villain!

Sir J. Remember modesty.

Lady L. I'll rout you all with a vengeance—I'll spoil your squeaking treble.

[Beats the fiddle about the blind Man's head.

Fid. O murder! murder!

Sir J. Here, poor fellow, take your staff and be gone; there's money to buy you two such; that's your way.

[Exit FIDDLER.

Lady L. Methinks you are very liberal, Sir. Must my estate maintain you in your profuseness?

Sir J. Go up to your closet, pray, and compose your mind.

Lady L. O wicked man! to bid me pray.

Sir J. A man can't be completely cursed, I see, without marriage: but since there is such a thing as separate maintenance, she shall to-morrow enjoy the benefit of it. [Knocking at the door.] Here, where are my servants? must they be frightened from me?—Within there—see who knocks.

Lady L. Within there—Where are my sluts? ye drabs, ye queans—Lights there.

Re-enter BUTLER.

But. Sir, it is a doctor that lives ten miles off; he practises physic, and is an astrologer; your worship knows him very well; he is a cunning man, makes almanacks, and can help people to their goods again.

Enter DOCTOR.

Doc. Sir, I humbly beg your honour's pardon for this unseasonable intrusion: but I am benighted, and 'tis so dark that I can't possibly find my way home; and knowing your worship's hospitality, desire the favour to be harboured under your roof to-night.

Lady L. Out of my house, you lewd conjurer, you magician.

Doc. Here's a turn? Here's a change!—Well, if I have any art, ye shall smart for this. [Aside.

Sir J. You see, friend, I am not master of my own house; therefore, to avoid any uneasiness, go down the lane about a quarter of a mile, and you'll see a cobbler's cottage; stay there a little, and I'll send my servant to conduct you to a tenant's house, where you'll be well entertained.

Doc. I thank you, Sir; I'm your most humble servant—But as for your lady there, she shall this night feel my resentment. [Exit.

Sir J. Come, Madam, you and I must have some conference together.

Lady L. Yes; I will have a conference and a reformation too in this house, or I'll turn it upside down—I will. [Exit.

SCENE III.—JOBSON'S HOUSE.

Enter NELL and the DOCTOR.

Nell. Pray, Sir, mend your draught, if you please; you are very welcome, Sir.

Doc. Thank you heartily, good woman; and to requite your civility, I'll tell you your fortune.

Nell. O, pray do, Sir; I never had my fortune told me in my life.

Doc. Let me behold the lines of your face.

Nell. I am afraid, Sir, 'tis none of the cleanest; I have been about dirty work all this day.

Doc. Come, come, 'tis a good face, be not ashamed of it; you shall show it in greater places suddenly.

Nell. O dear, Sir, I shall be mightily ashamed: I want dacity when I come before great folks.

Doc. You must be confident, and fear nothing; there is much happiness attends you.

Nell. Oh me! this is a rare man; heaven be thanked. [Aside.

Doc. To-morrow, before the sun rise, you shall be the happiest woman in this country.

Nell. How, by to-morrow? a lack-a-day, Sir, how can that be?

Doc. No more shall you be troubled with a surly husband, that rails at, and straps you.

Nell. Lud! how came he to know that? he must be a conjurer! [Aside.] Indeed my husband is somewhat rugged, and in his cups will beat me, but it is not much: he's an honest pains-taking man, and I let him have his way. Pray, Sir, take t'other cup of ale.

Doc. I thank you—Believe me, to-morrow you shall be the richest woman i'th' hundred, and ride in your own coach.

Nell. O father! you jeer me.

Doc. By my art, I do not. But mark my words, be confident, and bear all out, or worse will follow.

Nell. Never fear, Sir, I warrant you—O gemini! a coach.

Enter JOBSON.

Job. Where is this quean? Here, Nell! What a plague, are you drunk with your lamb's wool?

Nell. O husband! here's the rarest man—he has told me my fortune.

Job. Has he so! and planted my fortune too, a lusty pair of horns upon my head—Eh!—Is't not so?

Doc. Thy wife is a virtuous woman, and thou't be happy—

Job. Come out, you hang-dog, you juggler, you cheating, bamboozling villain; must I be cuckolded by such rogues as you are, mackmaticians, and almanack makers?

Nell. P'rythee, peace, husband, we shall be rich, and have a coach of our own.

Job. A coach! a cart, a wheel-barrow, you jade. By the mass, she's drunk, beastly drunk, most confoundedly drunk—Get to bed, you strumpet.

[Beats her.]

Nell. O mercy on us! is this a taste of my good fortune? Oh, you are the devil of a conjurer, sure enough.

[Exit.]

Doc. You had better not have touched her, you surly rogue.

Job. Out of my house you villain.

Doc. Farewell, you paltry slave.

Job. Get out you rogue. [Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—An open Country.

Enter DOCTOR.

AIR.

Doc. My little spirits, now appear,
Nadir and Abishog, draw near;
The time is short, make no delay;
Then quickly haste, and come away:
Nor moon, nor stars afford their light,
But all is wrapped in gloomy night:
Both men and beasts to rest incline,
And all things favour my design.

Spir. [Within.] Say, master, what is to be done?

Doc. My strict commands be sure attend,
For, ere this night shall have an end,
You must this cobbler's wife transform,
And to the knight's the like perform:
With all your most specific charms,
Convey each wife to diff'rent arms;
Let the delusion be so strong,
That none may know the right from wrong.

Spir. All this we will with care perform
In thunder, lightning, and in storm.

[Thunder. Exit Doctor.]

SCENE V.—JOBSON'S House.—The bed in view.

JOBSON discovered at work.

Job. What devil has been abroad to-night? I never heard such claps of thunder in my life; I thought my little hovel would have flown away; but now all is clear again, and a fine star-light morning it is. I'll settle myself to work. They say, winter's thunder is summer's wonder.

AIR.

Of all the trades from east to west,
The cobbler's, past contending,
Is like in time to prove the best,
Which every day is mending.
How great his praise, who can amend
The soles of all his neighbours;
Nor is unmindful of his end,
But to his last still labours.

Lady L. [In bed.] Hey-day! what impudent ballad-singing rogue is that, who dares wake me out of my sleep? I'll have you flayed, you rascal.

Job. What a plague, does she talk in her sleep? or is she drunk still?

AIR.

In Bath a wanton wife did dwell,
As Chaucer he did write,
Who wantonly did spend her time
In many a fond delight.
All on a time so sick she was,
And she at length did die;
And then her soul at Paradise
Did knock most mightily.

Lady L. Why, villain, rascal, screech-owl, who makest a worse noise than a dog hung in the pales, or a hog in a high wind,—where are all my servants? Somebody come and hamstring this rogue. [Knocks.]

Job. Why, how now, you brazen quean! you must get drunk with the conjurer, must you? I'll give you money another time to spend in lamb's wool, you saucy jade, shall I?

Lady L. Monstrous! I can find no bell to ring. Where are my servants? they shall toss him in a blanket.

Job. Ay, the jade's asleep still: the conjurer told her she should keep her coach, and she is dreaming of her equipage. [Sings.]

I will come in, in spite she said,
Of all such churls as thee;
Thou art the cause of all our pain,
Our grief and misery.
Thou first broke the commandment,
In honour of thy wife;
When Adam heard her say these words,
He ran away for life.

Lady L. Why, husband! Sir John! will you suffer me to be thus insulted?

Job. Husband! Sir John! what a plague, has she knighted me? and my name's Zekel too; a good jest, faith.

Lady L. Ha! he's gone, he's not in the bed. Heaven! where am I? Foh! what loathsome smells are here! Canvass sheets, and a filthy ragged curtain; a beastly rug, and a flock bed. Am I awake, or is it all a dream? what rogue is that? Sirrah! where am I? who brought me hither? what rascal are you?

Job. This is amazing—I never heard such words from her before? if I take my strap to you, I'll make you know your husband, I'll teach you better manners, you saucy drab.

Lady L. Oh, astonishing impudence! you my husband, Sirrah? I'll have you hanged, you rogue; I'm a lady. Let me know who has given me a sleeping draught, and conveyed me hither, you dirty varlet?

Job. A sleeping draught! yes, you drunken jade, you had a sleeping draught, with a plague to ye. What, has not your lamb's wool done working yet?

Lady L. Where am I? where has my villainous husband put me? Lucy! Lettice! where are my queans?

Job. Ha, ha, ha! what does she call her maids too? the conjurer has made her mad as well as drunk.

Lady L. He talks of conjurers; sure I am bewitched! ha! what clothes are here? a linsley-woolsey gown, a calico hood, a red baize petticoat; I am removed from my own house by witchcraft. What must I do? What will become of me?

[Horns wind without.]

Job. Hark! the hunters and the merry hounds are abroad. Why, Nell, you lazy jade, 'tis break of day; to work, to work; come, and spin, you drab, or I'll tan your hide for you. What a plague, must I be at work two hours before you in the morning?

Lady L. Why, Sirrah, thou impudent villain, dost thou not know me, you rogue?

Job. Know you, yes I know you well enough, and I'll make you know me before I have done with you.

Lady L. I am Sir John Loverule's lady, how came I here?

Job. Sir John Loverule's lady! no Nell, not quite so bad neither; she plagues every one that comes near her—the whole country curses her.

Lady L. Nay, then I'll hold no longer—you rogue, you insolent villain, I'll teach you better manners.

[Flings the bedstaff and other things at him.]

Job. This is more than ever I saw by her. I never had an ill word from her before. Come, strap, I'll try your mettle; I'll sober you, I warrant you, quean.

[He straps her; she flies at him.]

Lady L. I'll pull your throat out; I'll tear out your eyes; I am a lady, Sirrah. O murder! murder! Sir John Loverule will hang you for this. Murder! murder!

Job. Come, hussy, leave fooling, and come to your spinning, or else I'll lamb you, you never were so lamed since you were an inch long. Take it up you jade.

[She flings it down. He straps her.]

Lady L. Hold, hold! I'll do any thing.

Job. O! I thought I should bring you to yourself again.

Lady L. What shall I do? I can't spin.

[Aside.]

Job. I'll into my stall; 'tis broad day now. [Works and sings.] Hey-day, I think the jade's brain is turned. What, have you forgot to spin, hussy?

Lady L. But I have not forgot to run. I'll e'en try my feet. I shall find somebody in the town, sure, that will succour me. [She runs out.]

Job. What! does she run for it?—I'll after her.

[He runs out.]

SCENE VI.—SIR JOHN LOVERULE'S HOUSE.

NELL discovered in Bed.

Nell. What pleasant dreams I have had to-night! Methought I was in Paradise, upon a bed of violets and roses, and the sweetest husband by my side! Ha, bless me! where am I now? What sweets are these? No garden in the spring can equal them.—Am I on a bed?—The sheets are sarcenet, sure; no linen ever was so fine.—What a gay silken robe have I got!—O heaven! I dream!—Yet if this be a dream, I would not wish to wake again. Sure I died last night and went to heaven, and this is it.

Enter LUCY.

Lucy. Now, must I awake an alarm that will not lie still again till midnight at soonest; the first greeting I suppose will be jade, or slut. [Aside.]—Madam! madam!

Nell. O gemini! who's this? What dost say, sweetheart?

Lucy. Sweetheart! O lud, sweetheart! The best names I have had these three months from her, have been slut or jade. [Aside.]—What gown and ruffles will your ladyship wear to-day?

Nell. What does she mean? Ladyship! gown and ruffles!—Sure I am awake!—Oh! I remember the cunning man, now.

Lucy. Did your ladyship speak?

Nell. Ay, child; I'll wear the same I did yesterday.

Lucy. Mercy upon me!—Child!—Here's a miracle!

[Aside.]

Enter LETTICE.

Let. Is my lady awake?—Have you had her shoe or her slipper at your head yet?

[Apart to LUCY.]

Lucy. Oh, no, I'm overjoyed: she's in the kindest humour!—Go to the bed, and speak to her—Now is your time. [Apart to LETTICE.]

Let. Now 's my time! what, to have another tooth beat out? [Apart.] Madam!

Nell. What dost say, my dear?—O father! What would she have?

Let. What work will your ladyship please to have done to-day?

Nell. Work, child! 'tis holiday; no work to-day.

Let. Oh, mercy! Am I, or thee awake? or do we both dream?—Here 's a blessed change?

[Apart to LUCY.]

Lucy. If it continues, we shall be a happy family. [Apart to LETTICE.]

Let. Your ladyship's chocolate is ready.

Nell. Mercy on me! what 's that? Some garment, I suppose. [Aside.] Put it on then, sweetheart.

Let. Put it on, Madam? I have taken it off; 'tis ready to drink.

Nell. I mean, put it by; I don't care for drinking now.

Enter COOK.

Cook. Now I go, like a bear to the stake, to know her scurvy ladyship's commands about dinner. How many rascally names must I be called?

[Aside.]

Let. Oh, John Cook! you'll be out of your wits to find my lady in so sweet a temper.

[Apart to COOK.]

Cook. What a devil, are they all mad?

[Apart to LETTICE.]

Lucy. Madam, here's the cook come about dinner.

Nell. Oh! there's a fine cook! He looks like one of your gentlefolks. [Aside.]—Indeed, honest man, I'm very hungry now, pray get me a rasher upon the coals, a piece of milk cheese, and some white bread.

Cook. Hey! what 's to do here? my head turns round. Honest man! I looked for rogue and rascal, at least. She's strangely changed in her diet, as well as her humour. [Aside.]—I'm afraid, Madam, cheese and bacon will sit very heavy on your ladyship's stomach in a morning. If you please, Madam, I'll toss you up a white fricassee of chickens, in a trice, Madam; or what does your ladyship think of a veal sweetbread?

Nell. Even what you will, good cook.

Cook. Good cook! good cook! Ah! 'tis a sweet lady. [Apart.]

Enter BUTLER.

Oh! kiss me, chip, I am out of my wits—We have the kindest, sweetest lady.

[Apart to BUTLER.]

But. You shamming rogue, I think you are out of your wits, all of ye; the maids look merrily too. [Apart to COOK.]

Lucy. Here's the butler, Madam, to know your ladyship's orders.

Nell. Oh! pray, Mr. Butler, let me have some small beer when my breakfast comes in.

But. Mr. Butler! Mr. Butler! I shall be turned into stone with amazement. [Aside.]—Would not your ladyship rather have a glass of Frontinac, or Montepulchiano.

Nell. O dear! what hard names are there;

out I must not betray myself. [Aside.]—Well, which you please, Mr. Butler.

Enter COACHMAN.

But. Go, get you in, and be rejoiced, as I am.

[Apart to COACHMAN.

Coach. The cook has been making his game I know not how long. What do you banter too?

[Apart to BUTLER.

Lucy. Madam, the coachman.

Coach. I come to know if your ladyship goes out to-day, and which you'll have, the coach or chariot.

Nell. Good lack-a-day!—I'll ride in the coach, if you please.

Coach. The sky will fall, that's certain. [Exit.

Nell. I can hardly think I am awake yet. How well-pleas'd they all seem to wait upon me!—Oh, notable cunning man!—My head turns round!—I am quite giddy with my own happiness.

AIR.

Though late I was a cobbler's wife,

In cottage most obscure-a,

In plain stuff gown, and short-ear'd coif,

Hard labour did endure-a.

The scene is chang'd, I'm alter'd quite,

And from poor humble Nell-a,

I'll learn to dance, to read, and write,

And from all bear the bell-a. [Exit.

Enter SIR JOHN LOVERULE, meeting his SERVANTS.

But. Oh, Sir! here's the rarest news!

Lucy. There never was the like, Sir! You'll be over-joyed and amazed!

Sir J. What, are ye mad?—What's the matter with ye?—How now? here's a new face in my family!—What's the meaning of all this?

But. Oh, Sir! the family's turned upside-down! We are almost distracted; the happiest people!

Lucy. Ay, my lady, Sir: my lady—

Sir J. What, is she dead?

But. Dead! heaven forbid!—O! she's the best woman; the sweetest lady!

Sir J. This is astonishing!—I must go and inquire into this wonder. If this be true, I shall rejoice indeed.

But. 'Tis true, Sir, upon my honour. Long live Sir John and my lady! Huzza! [Exeunt.

Re-enter NELL.

Nell. I well remember the cunning man warn'd me to bear all out with confidence, or worse, he said, would follow.—I am ashamed, and know not what to do with all this ceremony! I am amazed and out of my senses!—I looked in the glass, and saw a gay fine thing I knew not!—M'cthougt my face was not at all like that I have seen at home in a piece of looking-glass fastened upon the cupboard. But great ladies, they say, have flattering glasses, that show them far unlike themselves, whilst poor folks' glasses represent them e'en just as they are.

Re-enter LUCY.

Lucy. Oh, Madam! here's my master just returned from hunting.

Re-enter SIR JOHN LOVERULE.

Nell. O gemini! this fine gentleman my husband!

[Aside.

VOL. I. . . . P

10*

Sir J. My dear, I am overjoyed to see my family thus transported with ecstasy, which you have occasioned!

Nell. Sir, I shall always be proud to do every thing that may give you delight, or your family satisfaction.

Sir J. By heaven I am charmed!—Dear creature, if thou continuest thus, I had rather enjoy thee than the Indies. But can this be real?—May I believe my senses?

Nell. All that's good above can witness for me, I am in earnest.

[Kneels.

Sir J. Rise, my dearest.—Now am I happy indeed.

DUET.—SIR JOHN LOVERULE and NELL.

Sir J. Was ever man possess'd of
So sweet, so kind a wife?

Nell. Dear Sir, you make me proud.

Be you but kind,

And you shall find

All the good I can boast of,

Shall end but with my life.

Sir J. Give me thy lips.

Nell. First let me, dear Sir, wipe 'em.

Sir J. Was ever so sweet a wife? [Kisses her

Nell. Thank you, dear Sir.

I vow and protest

I ne'er was so kiss'd.

Again, Sir!

Sir J. Again, and again, my dearest,

O may it last for life!

What joy thus to enjoy'd thee!

Nell. What pleasure to behold thee!

Inclin'd again to kiss!

Sir J. How ravishing the bliss!

Nell. I little thought this morning
'Twould ever come to this. [Exeunt

Enter LADY LOVERULE.

Lady L. Here's a fine rout and rioting! You Sirrah, butler, you rogue!

But. Why, how now? Who are you?

Lady L. Impudent varlet! don't you know your lady?

But. Lady!—Here, turn this mad woman out of doors.

Lady L. You rascal—take that, Sirrah.

[Flings a glass at him.

Foot. Have a care, hussy; there's a good pump without; we shall cool your courage for you.

Lady L. You, Lucy, have you forgot me too, you minx?

Lucy. Forgot you, woman! Why, I never remembered you; I never saw you before in my life.

Lady L. Oh, the wicked slut! I'll give you cause to remember me, I will, hussy.

[Pulls her head-dress off.

Lucy. Murder! murder! help!

Re-enter SIR JOHN LOVERULE and NELL.

Sir J. How now? What uproar's this?

Lady L. You, Lettice, your slut! won't you know me neither? [Strikes her.

Let. Help! help!

Sir J. What's to do there?

But. Why, Sir, here's a mad woman calls herself my lady, and is beating and cuffing us all round.

Sir J. Thou my wife? poor creature, I pity thee.—I never saw thee before.

[To LADY LOVERULE

Lady L. Then it is in vain to expect redress from thee, thou wicked contriver of all my misery.

Nell. How am I amazed? Can that be I there, in my clothes, that have made all this disturbance? And yet I am here, to my thinking, in these fine clothes. How can this be? I am so confounded and affrighted, that I begin to wish I was with Zekel Jobson again. [Aside.]

Lady L. To whom shall I apply myself, or whither can I fly?—Heaven! what do I see? Is not that I yonder, in my gown and petticoat I wore yesterday? How can it be? I cannot be in two places at once.

Sir J. Poor wretch! She's stark mad.

Lady L. What, in the devil's name, was I here before I came? Let me look in the glass.—Oh, heavens! I am astonished! I don't know myself!—If this be I that the glass shows me, I never saw myself before.

Sir J. What incoherent madness is this?

Enter JOBSON.

Lady L. There, that's the devil in my likeness, who has robbed me of my countenance.—He here too?

Job. Ay, hussy, and here's my strap, you quean!

Nell. O dear! I'm afraid my husband will beat me; that man on t'other side the room there.

Job. I hope your honours will pardon her; she was drinking with a conjurer last night, and has been mad ever since, and calls herself my Lady Loverule.

Sir J. Poor woman! take care of her; do not hurt her; she may be cured of this.

Job. Yes, and please your worship, you shall see me cure her presently.—Hussy, do you see this?

Nell. O! pray, Zekel, don't beat me!

Sir J. What says my love? Does she infect thee with madness too?

Nell. I am not well; pray lead me in.

[Exeunt NELL and MAIDS.]

Job. I beseech your worship don't take it ill of me; she shall never trouble you more.

Sir J. Take her home, and use her kindly.

Lady L. What will become of me?

[Exeunt JOBSON and LADY LOVERULE.]

Enter FOOTMAN.

Foot. Sir, the doctor who called here last night, desires you will give him leave to speak a word or two with you, upon very earnest business.

Sir J. What can this mean? Bring him in.

Enter DOCTOR.

Doc. Lo! on my knees, Sir, I beg forgiveness for what I have done, and put my life into your hands.

Sir J. What mean you?

Doc. I have exercised my magic art upon your lady; I know you have too much honour to take away my life, since I might still have concealed it, had I pleased.

Sir J. You have now brought me to a glimpse of misery too great to bear. Is all my happiness then turned into vision only?

Doc. Sir, I beg you, fear not; if any harm comes on it, I freely give you leave to hang me.

Sir J. Inform me what you have done.

Doc. I have transformed your lady's face so that she seems the cobbler's wife, and have charmed her face into the likeness of my lady's; and last night, when the storm arose, my spirits conveyed them to each other's bed.

Sir J. Oh, wretch, thou hast undone me! I am fallen from the height of all my hopes, and must still be cursed with a tempestuous wife, a fury whom I never knew quiet since I had her.

Doc. If that be all, I can continue the charm for both their lives.

Sir J. Let the event be what it will, I'll hang you, if you do not end the charm this instant.

Doc. I will, this minute, Sir: and perhaps you'll find it the luckiest of your life: I can assure you, your lady will prove the better for it.

Sir J. Hold, there's one material circumstance I'd know.

Doc. Your pleasure, Sir?

Sir J. Perhaps the cobbler has—you understand me?

Doc. I do assure you, no; for ere she was conveyed to his bed, the cobbler was got up to work, and he has done nought but beat her ever since; and you are like to reap the fruits of his labour. He'll be with you in a minute.—Here he comes.

Re-enter JOBSON.

Sir J. So, Jobson, where's your wife?

Job. An't please your worship, she's here at the door; but indeed I thought I had lost her just now; for as she came into the hall, she fell into such a swoon, that I thought she would never come out on't again; but a tweak or two by the nose, and half a dozen straps, did the business at last.—Here, where are you hussy?

Re-enter LADY LOVERULE.

But. [Holds up the candle, but lets it fall when he sees her.] O heaven and earth! is this my lady?

Job. What does he say? My wife changed to my lady?

Cook. Ay, I thought the other was too good for our lady.

Lady L. Sir, you are the person I have most offended, and here confess I have been the worst of wives in every thing, but that I always kept myself chaste. If you can vouchsafe once more to take me to your bosom, the remainder of my days shall joyfully be spent in duty and observance of your will.

Sir J. Rise, Madam; I do forgive you; and if you are sincere in what you say, you'll make me happier than all the enjoyments in the world without you could do.

Job. What a plague! am I to lose my wife thus?

Re-enter LUCY and LETTICE.

Lucy. Oh, Sir, the strangest accident has happened—it has amazed us!—My lady was in so great a swoon, we thought she had been dead.

Let. And when she came to herself, she proved another woman.

Job. Ha, ha, ha! a bull, a bull!

Re-enter NELL.

Nell. My head turns round; I must go home. O, Zekel, are you there?

Job. O lud! is that fine lady my wife? Egad, I'm afraid to come near her. What can be the meaning of this?

Sir J. This is a happy change, and I'll have it celebrated with all the joy I proclaimed for my late short-lived vision.

Lady L. To me 'tis the happiest day I ever knew.

Sir J. Here Jobson, take thy fine wife.

Job. But one word, Sir.—Did not your worship make a buck of me, under the rose?

Sir J. No, upon my honour, nor ever kissed her lips till I came from hunting; but since she has been the means of bringing about this happy change, I'll give thee five hundred pounds home with her, to buy a stock of leather.

Job. Brave boys! I'm a prince.—The prince of coblers! Come hither and kiss me, Nell; I'll never strap thee more.

Nell. Indeed, Zekel, I have been in such a dream that I'm quite weary of it. Forsooth, Madam, will you please to take your clothes, and let me have mine again.

[To LADY LOVERULE.

Job. Hold your tongue, you fool, they'll serve you to go to church.

[Apart to NELL.

Lady L. No; thou shalt keep them, and I'll preserve thine as relics.

Job. And can your ladyship forgive my strapping your honour so very much?

Lady L. Most freely. The joy of this blessed change sets all things right again.

Sir J. Let us forget every thing that is past, and think of nothing now but joy and pleasure.

AIR.

Lady L. *Let every face with smiles appear,
Be joy in every breast,
Since, from a life of pain and care,
We now are truly bless'd.*

Sir J. *May no remembrance of past time
Our present pleasure soil;
Be aught but mirth and joy a crime,
And sporting all our toil.*

Job. *I hope you'll give me leave to speak,
If I may be so bold:
Nought but the devil, and this good strap,
Could ever tame a scold.* [Exit.

PROLOGUE.

SPOKEN BY MR. THEOPHILUS CIBBER.

IN ancient Greece the comic muse appear'd,
Sworn foe to vice, by virtue's friends rever'd;
Impartial she indulg'd her noble rage,
And satire was the business of the stage.
No reigning ill was from her censure free,
No sex, no age of man, and no degree;
Who'er by passion was, or folly, led,
The laurel'd chief, or sacerdotal head,
The pedant sophist, or imperious dame,
She lash'd the evil, nor conceal'd the name.

How hard the fate of wives in those sad times,
When saucy poets would chastise their crimes!
When each cornuting mate, each rampant jilt,
Had her name branded, on the stage, with guilt!
Each fair may now the comic muse endure,
And join the laugh, though at herself, secure.

Link'd to a patient lord, this night behold
A wilful headstrong termagant, and scold:
Whom, though her husband did what man could do,

The devil only could reclaim like you:
Like you, whose virtues bright embellish life,
And add a blessing to the name of wife.

A merry wag, to mend vexatious brides,
These scenes begun, which shook your father's sides:

And we obsequious to your taste, prolong
Your mirth, by courting the supplies of song:
If you approve, we our desires obtain,
And by your pleasures shall compute our gain.

THE FAIR PENITENT:

A TRAGEDY,

IN FIVE ACTS.

BY NICHOLAS ROWE.

REMARKS.

This tragedy, founded on the Fatal Dowry of Massinger, was produced in 1703, at the theatre in Lincoln's Inn-Fields; and is considered by Dr. Johnson, one of the most pleasing tragedies on the stage.

The story is domestic, and assimilated to common life; and the diction harmonious. The character of Lothario is supposed to have been expanded into Lovelace, by Richardson, in his inimitable romance of Clarissa Harlowe; but the British fair will scarcely sympathise with Calista, for the loss of so unworthy a lover. Some critics have observed, that the title of the play does not correspond with the behaviour of Calista, who at last shows no marks of real contrition, (best testified by amendment,) but is still enamoured of the villanous and vain boaster, who is the cause of her guilt.

Originally intended for the legal profession, and even called to the bar, the success of Rowe in the drama rendered the toils of practice unnecessary; as his noble patrons conferred on him many places of honour and emolument, in all which, it is said, he justified their choice; but alone acquired fame by his dramatic productions.

SCENE.—Sciolto's Palace and the Garden, with some part of the Street near it, in Genoa.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Garden belonging to SCIOLTO'S Palace.

Enter ALTAMONT and HORATIO.

All. Let this auspicious day be ever sacred,
No mourning, no misfortunes, happen on it:
Let it be mark'd for triumphs and rejoicings;
Let happy lovers ever make it holy,
Choose it to bless their hopes, and crown their wishes.

This happy day, that gives me my Calista.

Hor. Yes, Altamont; to-day thy better stars
Are join'd to shed their kindest influence on thee;

Sciolto's noble hand, that rais'd thee first,
Half dead and drooping o'er thy father's grave,
Completes its bounty, and restores thy name
To that high rank and lustre which it boasted,
Before ungrateful Genoa had forgot
The merit of thy god-like father's arms;
Before that country, which he long had serv'd
In watchful councils and in winter camps,
Had cast off his white age to want and wretched-
ness,

And made their court to factions by his ruin.

All. Oh, great Sciolto! Oh, my more than father!

Let me not live, but at thy very name

My eager heart springs up, and leaps with joy.

When I forget the vast, vast debt I owe thee—
Forget! (but 'tis impossible) then let me
Forget the use and privilege of reason,
Be driven from the commerce of mankind,
To wander in the desert among brutes,
To be the scorn of earth, and curse of heaven!

Hor. So open, so unbounded was his goodness,
It reach'd even me, because I was thy friend.
When that great man I lov'd, thy noble father,
Bequeath'd thy gentle sister to my arms,
His last dear pledge and legacy of friendship,
That happy tie made me Sciolto's son;
He call'd us his, and, with a parent's fondness,
Indulg'd us in his wealth, bless'd us with plenty,
Heal'd all our cares, and sweeten'd love itself.

Alt. By heaven, he found my fortunes so abandon'd,

'That nothing but a miracle could raise 'em:
My father's bounty, and the state's ingratitude,
Had stripp'd him bare, nor left him even a grave.
Undone myself, and sinking with his ruin,
I had no wealth to bring, nothing to succour him,
But fruitless tears.

Hor. Yet what thou couldst thou did'st,
And did'st it like a son; when his hard credi-
Urg'd and assisted by Lothario's father, [tors,
(P'oe to thy house, and rival of thy greatness.)
By sentence of the cruel law forbade
His venerable corpse to rest in earth,
Thou gav'st thyself a ransom for his bones;
Heaven, who beheld the pious act, approv'd it.
And bade Sciolto's bounty be its proxy,
To bless thy filial virtue with abundance.

Alt. But see, he comes, the author of my happiness,

The man who sav'd my life from deadly sorrow,
Who bids my days be bless'd with peace and plenty,

And satisfies my soul with love and beauty.

Enter SCIOLTO; he embraces ALTAMONT.

Sci. Joy to thee, Altamont! joy to myself!
Joy to this happy morn, that makes thee mine;
That kindly grants what nature had denied me,
And makes me father of a son like thee.

Alt. My father! Oh, let me unlade my breast,
Pour out the fulness of my soul before you:
Show every tender, every grateful thought,
This wondrous goodness stirs. But 'tis impossible,

And utterance all is vile; since I can only
Swear you reign here, but never tell how much.

Sci. O, noble youth! I swear, since first I knew thee,

Even from that day of sorrow when I saw thee
Adorn'd and lovely in thy filial tears,
The mourner and redeemer of thy father,
I set thee down and seal'd thee for my own:
Thou art my son, even near me as Calista.
Horatio and Lavinia too are mine:

[Embraces HOR.

All are my children, and shall share my heart.
But wherefore waste we thus this happy day?
The laughing minutes summon thee to joy,
And with new pleasures court thee as they pass; [sing,
Thy waiting bride even chides thee for delay—
And swears thou com'st not with a bridegroom's haste.

Alt. Oh! could I hope there was one thought of Altamont,
One kind remembrance in Calista's breast,

The winds, with all their wings, would be too slow,

To bear me to her feet. For, oh, my father!
Amidst the stream of joy that bears me on,
Bless'd as I am, and honour'd in your friendship,
There is one pain that hangs upon my heart.

Sci. What means my son?

Alt. When, at your intercession,
Last night, Calista yielded to my happiness,
Just ere we parted, as I seal'd my vows
With rapture on her lips, I found her cold,
As a dead lover's statue on his tomb:
A rising storm of passion shook her breast,
Her eyes a piteous shower of tears let fall,
And then she sigh'd as if her heart was breaking.
With all the tend'rst eloquence of love
I begg'd to be a sharer in her grief:

But she, with looks averse, and eyes that froze
me,

Sadly replied, her sorrows were her own,
Nor in a father's power to dispose of.

Sci. Away! it is the coz'nage of their sex;
One of their common arts they practise on us:
To sigh and weep then when their hearts beat high

With expectation of the coming joy. [bred,
Thou hast in camps and fighting fields been Unknowing in the subtleties of women;
The virgin bride, who swoons with deadly fear,
To see the end of all her wishes near,
When, blushing, from the light and public eyes,
To the kind covert of the night she flies,
With equal fires to meet the bridegroom moves,
Melts in his arms, and with a loose she loves.

[Exeunt.

Enter LOTHARIO and ROSSANO.

Loth. The father, and the husband!

Ros. Let them pass.

They saw us not.

Loth. I care not if they did;
Ere long I mean to meet 'em face to face,
And gall 'em with my triumph o'er Calista.

Ros. You lov'd her once.

Loth. I lik'd her, would have married her,
But that it pleas'd her father to refuse me,
To make this honourable fool her husband,
For which, if I forget him, may the shame
I mean to brand his name with, stick on mine.

Ros. She, gentle soul, was kinder than her father.

Loth. She was, and oft in private gave me hearing;

Till, by long list'n'ing to the soothing tale,
At length her easy heart was wholly mine.

Ros. I've heard you oft describe her, haughty, insolent, [wonder,
And fierce with high disdain: it moves my
That virtue, thus defended, should be yielded
A prey to loose desires.

Loth. Hear then, I'll tell thee:
Once, in a lone and secret hour of night,
When every eye was closed, and the pale moon
And stars alone shone conscious of the theft,
Flot with the Tuscan grape, and high in blood,
Hap'ly I stole unheeded to her chamber.

Ros. That minute sure was lucky.

Loth. Oh, 'twas great!
I found the fond, believing, love-sick maid,
Loose, unattir'd, warm, tender, full of wishes;
Fierceness and pride, the guardians of her honour, [waking,
Were charm'd to rest and love some was.

Within her rising bosom all was calm,
As peaceful seas that know no storms, and only
Are gently lifted up and down by tides.
I snatch'd the glorious, golden opportunity,
And with prevailing youthful ardour press'd her;
Till, with short sighs, and murmuring reluctance,
The yielding fair one gave me perfect happiness.
Even all the live-long night we pass'd in bliss.
In ecstasies too fierce to last for ever;
At length the morn and cold indiff'rence came:
When, fully satiated with the luscious banquet,
I hastily took leave, and left the banquet
To think on what was past, and sigh alone.

Ros. You saw her soon again?

Loth. Too soon I saw her:

For, oh! that meeting was not like the former:
I found my heart no more beat high with transport,
No more I sigh'd and languish'd for enjoyment;
'Twas past, and reason took her turn to reign,
While every weakness fell before her throne.

Ros. What of the lady?

Loth. With uneasy fondness

She hung upon me, wept, and sigh'd, and swore
She was undone; talk'd of a priest and marriage;
Of flying with me from her father's power;
Call'd every saint and blessed angel down,
To witness for her that she was my wife.
I started at that name.

Ros. What answer made you?

Loth. None; but, pretending sudden pain and illness,

Escap'd the persecution. Two nights since,
By message urg'd, and frequent importunity,
Again I saw her. Straight with tears and sighs,
With swelling breasts, with swooning and distraction,

With all the subtleties and powerful arts
Of wilful woman, lab'ring for her purpose,
Again she told the same dull, nauseous tale.
Unmov'd, I begg'd her spare th' ungrateful subject,
Since I resolv'd, that love and peace of mind
Might flourish long inviolate betwixt us,
Never to load it with the marriage chain;
That I would still retain her in my heart,
My ever gentle mistress and my friend;
But for those other names of wife and husband,
They only meant ill nature, cares, and quarrels.

Ros. How here she this reply?

Loth. At first her rage was dumb, and wanted words; [loud;

But when the storm found way, 'twas wild and
Mad as the priestess of the Delphic god,
Enthusiastic passion swell'd her breast,
Enlarg'd her voice, and ruffled all her form.
Proud, and disdainful of the love I proffer'd,
She call'd me, villain! monster! base betrayer!
At last, in very bitterness of soul,
With deadly imprecations on herself,
She vow'd severely ne'er to see me more;
Then bid me fly this minute; I obey'd,
And, bowing, left her to grow cool at leisure.

Ros. She has relented since, else why this message,

To meet the keeper of her secrets here
This morning?

Loth. See the person whom you nam'd.

Enter LUCILLA.

Well, my ambassadress, what must we treat of?
Come you to menace war and proud defiance,
Or does the peaceful olive grace your message?
Is your fair mistress calmer? does she soften?

And must we love again? perhaps she means
To treat in juncture with her new ally,
And make her husband party to th' agreement.

Luc. Is this well done, my lord? have you put off

All sense of human nature? keep a little,
A little pity to distinguish manhood; [you,
Lest other men, though cruel, should disclaim
And judge you to be number'd with the brutes.

Loth. I see thou'st learn'd to rail.

Luc. I've learn'd to weep:

That lesson my sad mistress often gives me:

By day she seeks some melancholy shade,
To hide her sorrows from the prying world;
At night she watches, all the long, long hours,
And listens to the winds and beating rain,
With sighs as loud, and tears that fall as fast.
Then ever and anon she wrings her hands,
And cries, False, false Lothario!

Loth. Oh, no more!

I swear, thou'lt spoil thy pretty face with crying.
And thou hast beauty that may make thy fortune:
Some keeping cardinal shall dote upon thee,
And barter his church treasure for thy freshness.

Luc. What! shall I sell my innocence and
youth,

For wealth or titles, to perfidious man?

To man, who makes his mirth of our undoing!

The base, profess'd betrayer of our sex!

Let me grow old in all misfortunes else,

Rather than know the sorrows of Calista!

Loth. Does she send thee to chide in her behalf?

I swear thou dost it with so good a grace,

That I could almost love thee for thy frowning.

Luc. Read there, my lord, there, in her own sad lines, [Giving a letter.

Which best can tell the story of her woes,

That grief of heart which your unkindness gives
her.

Loth. [Reads.] Your cruelty—Obedience to my father—Give my hand to Altamont.

By heaven, 'tis well! such ever be the gifts

With which I greet the man whom my soul hates. [Aside.

But to go on—wish—heart—honour—too faithless—weakness—to-morrow—last trouble—lost Calista.

Women, I see, can change as well as men.

She writes me here, forsaken as I am,

That I should bind my brows with mournful willow,

For she has given her hand to Altamont:

Yet tell the fair inconstant—

Luc. How, my lord!

Loth. Nay, no more angry words: say to Calista, [sure;

The humblest of her slaves shall wait her plea-

If she can leave her happy husband's arms,

To think upon so lost a thing as I am.

Luc. Alas! for pity come with gentler looks:

Wound not her heart with this unmanly triumph;

And though you love her not, yet swear you do:

So shall dissembling once be virtuous in you.

Loth. Ha! who comes here?

Luc. The bridegroom's friend, Horatio.

He must not see us here. To-morrow early

Be at the garden gate.

Loth. Bear to my love [her.
My kindest thoughts, and swear I will not fail

[Loth, pulling up the letter hastily, drops it; Exeunt.

Enter HORATIO.

Hor. Sure, 'tis the very error of my eyes!
Waking I dream, or I beheld Lothario;
He seem'd conferring with Calista's woman:
At my approach they started and retir'd.
What business could he have here, and with her?
I know he bears the noble Altamont
Profess'd and deadly hate—What paper 's this?
Ha! To Lothario!—'Sdeath! Calista's name!

[Reads.

*Your cruelty has at length determined me;
and I have resolved this morning to yield a perfect obedience to my father, and to give my hand to Altamont, in spite of my weakness for the false Lothario. I could almost wish I had that heart and that honour to bestow with it, which you have robbed me of;*

Damnation! to the rest—

But, oh! I fear, could I retrieve 'em, I should again be undone by the too faithless, yet too lovely Lothario. This is the last weakness of my pen, and to-morrow shall be the last in which I will indulge my eyes. Lucilla shall conduct you, if you are kind enough, to let me see you: it shall be the last trouble you shall meet with from the lost

CALISTA.

The lost indeed! for thou art gone as far
As there can be perdition. Fire and sulphur!
Hell is the sole avenger of such crimes.
Oh, that the ruin were but all thy own!
Thou wilt even make thy father curse his age:
At sight of this black scroll, the gentle Altamont
(For, oh! I know his heart is set upon thee)
Shall droop and hang his discontented head,
Like merit scorn'd by insolent authority,
And never grace the public with his virtues—
What if I give this paper to her father?
It follows that his justice dooms her dead,
And breaks his heart with sorrow; hard return
For all the good his hand has heap'd on us!
Hold, let me take a moment's thought—

Enter LAVINIA.

Lav. My lord!
Trust me it joys my heart that I have found you.
Inquiring wherefore you had left the company,
Before my brother's nuptial rites were ended,
They told me you had felt some sudden illness.

Hor. It were unjust—No, let me spare my friend,
Lock up the fatal secret in my breast,
Nor tell him that which will undo his quiet.

Lav. What means my lord?

Hor. Ha! said'st thou, my Lavinia?

Lav. Alas! you know not what you make me suffer.

Whence is that sigh? And wherefore are your Severely rais'd to heaven? The sick man thus,
Acknowledging the summons of his fate,
Lifts up his feeble hands and eyes for mercy,
And with confusion thinks upon his exit.

Hor. Oh, no! thou hast mistook my sickness quite:

These pangs are of the soul. Would I had met
Sharpest convulsions, spotted pestilence,
Or any other deadly foe to life,
Rather than heave beneath this load of thought.

Lav. Alas! what is it? Wherefore turn you from me?

Why did you falsely call me your Lavinia,
And swear I was Horatio's better half,
Since now you mourn unkindly by yourself,
And rob me of my partnership of sadness?

Hor. Seek not to know what I would hide from all,

But most from thee. I never knew a pleasure,
Aught that was joyful, fortunate, or good,
But straight I ran to bless thee with the tidings,
And laid up all my happiness with thee:
But wherefore, wherefore should I give thee pain?
Then spare me, I conjure thee; ask no further;
Allow my melancholy thoughts this privilege,
And let 'em brood in secret o'er their sorrows.

Lav. It is enough; chide not, and all is well!
Forgive me if I saw you sad, Horatio,
And ask'd to weep out part of your misfortunes;
I wo' not press to know what you forbid me.
Yet, my lov'd lord, yet you must grant me this,
Forget your cares for this one happy day,
Devote this day to mirth, and to your Altamont;
For his dear sake, let peace be in your looks.
Even now the jocund bridegroom waits your wishes.

He thinks the priest has but half bless'd his marriage,

Till his friend hails him with the sound of joy.

Hor. Oh, never, never, never! Thou art innocent;

Simplicity from ill, pure native truth,
And candour of the mind, adorn thee ever;
But there are such, such false ones, in the world,
'T would fill thy gentle soul with wild amazement,
To hear their story told.

Lav. False ones, my lord!

Hor. Fatally fair they are, and in their smiles
The graces, little loves, and young desires inhabit;

But all that gaze upon 'em are undone;
For they are false, luxurious in their appetites,
And all the heaven they hope for is variety:
One lover to another still succeeds,
Another, and another after that,
And the last fool is welcome as the former;
Till, having lov'd his hour out, he gives place,
And mingles with the herd that went before him.

Lav. Can there be such, and have they peace of mind?

Have they, in all the series of their changing,
One happy hour? If women are such things,
How was I form'd so different from my sex?
My little heart is satisfy'd with you;
You take up all her room as in a cottage
Which harbours some benighted princely stranger,
Where the good man, proud of his hospitality,
Yields all his homely dwelling to his guest,
And hardly keeps a corner for himself.

Hor. Oh, were they all like thee, men would adore 'em,

And all the business of their lives be loving;
The nuptial band should be the pledge of peace,
And all domestic cares and quarrels cease!
The world should learn to love by virtuous rules,
And marriage be no more the jest of fools.

[Exeunt.

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Hall.

Enter CALISTA and LUCILLA.

Cal. Be dumb for ever, silent as the grave;
Nor let thy fond, officious love disturb
My solemn sadness with the sound of joy.
If thou wilt sooth me, tell some dismal tale
Of pining discontent, and black despair:
For, oh! I've gone around through all my thoughts,

But all are indignation, love, or shame,
And my dear peace of mind is lost for ever.

Luc. Why do you follow still that wand'ring fire, [you

That has misled your weary steps, and leaves
Benighted in a wilderness of wo;
That false Lothario! Turn from the deceiver;
Turn, and behold where gentle Altamont
Sighs at your feet, and woos you to be happy.

Cal. Away! I think not of him. My sad soul
Has form'd a dismal, melancholy scene,
Such a retreat as I would wish to find;
An unfrequented vale, o'ergrown with trees
Mossy and old, within whose lonesome shade
Ravens and birds ill-omen'd only dwell:
No sound to break the silence, but a brook
That bubbling winds among the weeds: no mark
Of any human shape that had been there,
Unless a skeleton of some poor wretch,
Who had long since, like me, by love undone,
Sought that sad place out to despair and die in.

Luc. Alas, for pity!

Cal. There I fain would hide me [shame;
From the base world, from malice, and from
For 'tis the solemn counsel of my soul
Never to live with public loss of honour:
'Tis fix'd to die, rather than bear the insolence
Of each affected she that tells my story,
And blesses her good stars that she is virtuous.
To be a tale for fools! Scorn'd by the women,
And pitted by the men! Oh, insupportable!

Luc. Oh, hear me, hear your ever faithful creature!

By all the good I wish, by all the ill
My trembling heart forebodes, let me entreat you Never to see this faithless man again;
Let me forbid his coming.

Cal. On thy life

I charge thee, no: my genius drives me on;
I must, I will behold him once again;
Perhaps it is the crisis of my fate,
And this one interview shall end my cares.
My lab'ring heart, that swells with indignation,
Heaves to discharge the burden; that once done,
The busy thing shall rest within its cell,
And never beat again.

Luc. Trust not to that:

Rage is the shortest passion of our souls:
Like narrow brooks that rise with sudden showers,
It swells in haste, and falls again as soon;
Still as it ebbs the softer thoughts flow in,
And the deceiver, love, supplies its place.

Cal. I have been wrong'd enough to arm my temper

Against the smooth delusion, but, alas!
(Chide not my weakness, gentle maid, but pity me)
A woman's softness hangs about me still;
Then let me blush, and tell thee all my folly.
I swear I could not see the dear betrayer
Kneel at my feet and sigh to be forgiven,
But my relenting heart would pardon all,
And quite forget 'twas he that had undone me.

[Exit Luc.

Ha! Altamont! Calista, now be wary,
And guard thy soul's excesses with dissembling:
Nor let this hostile husband's eyes explore
The warring passions and tumultuous thoughts
That rage within thee, and deform thy reason.

Enter ALTAMONT.

Alt. Be gone, my cares, I give you to the winds,
Far to be borne, far from the happy Altamont;

Calista is the mistress of the year;
She crowns the seasons with auspicious beauty,
And bids even all my hours be good and joyful.

Cal. If I were ever mistress of such happiness,
Oh! wherefore did I play th' unthrifty fool,
And, wasting all on others, leave myself
Without one thought of joy to give me comfort?

Alt. Oh, mighty love! Shall that fair face profane

This thy great festival with frowns and sadness?
I swear it sha'not be, for I will woo thee
With sighs so moving, with so warm a transport,

That thou shalt catch the gentle flame from me,
And kindle into joy.

Cal. I tell thee, Altamont,
Such hearts as ours were never pair'd above:
Ill suited to each other: join'd, not match'd;
Some sullen influence, a foe to both,
Has wrought this fatal marriage to undo us.
Mark but the frame and temper of our minds,
How very much we differ. Even this day,
That fills thee with such ecstasy and transport,
To me brings nothing that should make me
bless it,

Or think it better than the day before,
Or any other in the course of time,
That duly took its turn, and was forgotten.

Alt. If to behold thee as my pledge of happiness,

To know none fair, none excellent, but thee;
If still to love thee with unwearied constancy,
Through every season, every change of life,
Be worth the least return of grateful love,
Then let my Calista bless this day
And set it down for happy.

Cal. 'Tis the day

In which my father gave my hand to Altamont;
As such, I will remember it for ever.

Enter SCIOLTO, HORATIO, and LAVINIA.

Sci. Let mirth go on, let pleasure know no pause,

But fill up every minute of this day.
'Tis yours, my children, sacred to your loves;
The glorious sun himself for you looks gay;
He shines for Altamont and for Calista.
Let there be music, let the master touch
The sprightly string and softly breathing flute,
Till harmony rouse every gentle passion;
Teach the cold maid to lose her fears in love,
And the fierce youth to languish at her feet.
Begin: even age itself is cheer'd with music;
It wakes a glad remembrance of our youth,
Calls back past joys, and warms us into transport. [Musie.

Take care my gates be open, bid all welcome;
All who rejoice with me to-day are friends:
Let each indulge his genius, each be glad,
Jocund, and free, and swell the feast with mirth;
The sprightly bowl shall cheerfully go round,
None shall be grave, nor too severely wise;
Losses and disappointments, cares and poverty,
The rich man's insolence, and great man's scorn,
In wine shall be forgotten all. To-morrow
Will be too soon to think and to be wretched.
Oh grant, ye powers, that I may see these happy!

[Pointing to ALTAMONT and CALISTA
Completely bless'd, and I have life enough!
And leave the rest indifferently to fate.

[Exeunt.

Hor. What if, while all are here intent on revelling,
I privately went forth, and sought Lothario?
'This letter may be forg'd! perhaps the wanton-
ness

Of his vain youth, to stain a lady's fame;
Perhaps his malice, to disturb my friend.
Oh, no! my heart forbodes it must be true.
Methought, even now, I mark'd the starts of guilt [lation

That shook her soul; though damn'd dissimu-Screen'd her dark thoughts, and set to public view

A specious face of innocence and beauty.
With such smooth looks and many a gentle word,

The first fair she beguil'd her easy lord;
Too blind with love and beauty to beware,
He fell unthinking in the fatal snare;
Nor could believe that such a heavenly face
Had bargain'd with the devil to damn her wretched race. [Exit.

SCENE II.—The Garden of SCIOLOTTO'S Palace.

Enter LOTHARIO and ROSSANO.

Loth. To tell thee then the purport of my thoughts;

The loss of this fond paper would not give me
A moment of disquiet, were it not
My instrument of vengeance on this Altamont;
Therefore I mean to wait some opportunity
Of speaking with the maid we saw this morning.

Ros. I wish you, Sir, to think upon the danger
Of being seen; to-day their friends are round 'em;
And any eye that lights by chance on you,
Shall put your life and safety to the hazard.

[Exit.

Enter HORATIO.

Hor. Still I must doubt some mystery of mischief,

Some artifice beneath. Lothario's father!
I knew him well; he was sagacious, cunning,
Fluent in words, and bold in peaceful counsels,
But of a cold, unactive hand in war;
Yet with these coward's virtues, he undid
My unsuspecting, valiant, honest friend.
This son, if fame mistakes not, is more hot,
More open and unartful—

Re-enter LOTHARIO and ROSSANO.

Ha! he's here! [Seeing him.

Loth. Damnation! he again!—This second time

To-day he has cross'd me like my evil genius.

Hor. I sought you, Sir.

Loth. 'Tis well then I am found.

Hor. 'Tis well you are. The man who wrongs
my friend

To the earth's utmost verge I would pursue.
No place, though e'er so holy, should protect him;
No shape that artful fear e'er form'd should hide
him,

Till he fair answer made, and did me justice.

Loth. Ha! dost thou know me? that I am Lothario?

As great a name as this proud city boasts of.
Who is this mighty man, then, this Horatio,
That I should basely hide me from his anger,
Lest he should chide me for his friend's displeasure?

VOL. I. . . Q

11

Hor. The brave, 'tis true, do never shun the light;

Just are their thoughts, and open are their tempers,

Still are they found in the fair face of day,
And heaven and men are judges of their actions.

Loth. Such let 'em be of mine; there's not a purpose

Which my soul e'er fram'd, or my hand acted,
But I could well have bid the world look on,
And what I once durst do, have dar'd to justify.

Hor. Where was this open boldness, this free spirit,

When but this very morning I surpris'd thee,
In base dishonest privacy, consulting
And bribing a poor mercenary wretch,
To sell her lady's secrets, stain her honour,
And, with a forg'd contrivance, blast her virtue?
At sight of me thou fled'st.

Loth. Ha! fled from thee?

Hor. Thou fled'st, and guilt was on thee like a thief,

A pilferer, descried in some dark corner
Who there had lodg'd, with mischievous intent,
To rob and ravage at the hour of rest,
And do a midnight murder on the sleepers.

Loth. Slave! villain! [Offers to draw.

Ros. Hold, my lord! think where you are,
Think how unsafe and hurtful to your honour
It were to urge a quarrel in this place,
And shock the peaceful city with a broil.

Loth. Then, since thou dost provoke my vengeance, know

I would not, for this city's wealth, for all
Which the sea wafts to our Ligurian shore,
But that the joys I reap'd with that fond wanton,
The wife of Altamont, should be as public
As is the noon-day sun, air, earth, or water
Or any common benefit of nature.

Think'st thou I meant that shame should be con-ceal'd?

Oh, no! by hell and vengeance, all I wanted
Was some fit messenger, to bear the news
To the dull doting husband: now I have found
him,

And thou art he.

Hor. I hold thee base enough
To break through law, and spurn at sacred order,
And do a brutal injury like this.

Yet mark me well, young lord, I think Calista
Too nice, too noble, and too great of soul,
To be the prey of such a thing as thou art.

'Twas base and poor, unworthy of a man,
To forge a scroll so villainous and loose,
And mark it with a noble lady's name:

These are the mean, dishonest arts of cowards,
Who, bred at home in idleness and riot,
Ransack for mistresses th' unwholesome stew
And never know the worth of virtuous love.

Loth. Think'st thou I forg'd the letter?
Think so still,

Till the broad shame come staring in thy face,
And boys shall hoot the cuckold as he passes.

Hor. Away! no woman could descend so low.
A skipping, dancing, worthless tribe you are;

Fit only for yourselves, you herd together;
And when the circling glass warms your vain
hearts,

You talk of beauties that you never saw,
And fancy raptures that you never knew.

Loth. But that I do not hold it worth my leisure,

I could produce such damning proof—

Hor. 'Tis false!

You blast the fair with lies, because they scorn you,

Hate you like age, like ugliness and impotence;
Rather than make you bless'd, they would die virgins,

And stop the propagation of mankind.

Loth. It is the curse of fools to be secure,
And that be thine and Altamont's. Dream on;
Nor think upon my vengeance till thou feel'st it.

Hor. Hold, Sir; another word, and then farewell.

Though I think greatly of Calista's virtue,
And hold it far beyond thy power to hurt;
Yet, as she shares the honour of my Altamont,
That treasure of a soldier, bought with blood,
And kept at life's expense, I must not have (Mark me, young Sir) her very name profan'd.
Learn to restrain the license of your speech;
'Tis held you are too lavish. When you are met
Among your set of fools, talk of your dress,
Of dice, of whores, of horses, and yourselves;
'Tis safer, and becomes your understandings.

Loth. What if we pass beyond this solemn order,

And, in defiance of the stern Horatio,
Indulge our gayer thoughts, let laughter loose,
And use his sacred friendship for our mirth?

Hor. 'Tis well, Sir, you are pleasant—

Loth. By the joys

Which my soul yet has uncontrol'd pursu'd,
I would not turn aside from my least pleasure,
Though all thy force were arm'd to bar my way;
But, like the birds, great nature's happy commoners,

That haunt in woods, in meads, and flowery gardens,

Rife the sweets, and taste the choicest fruits,
Yet scorn to ask the lordly owner's leave.

Hor. What liberty has vain presumptuous
youth,

That thou should'st dare provoke me unchastis'd?
But henceforth, boy, I warn thee, shun my walks.
If in the bounds of this forbidden place
Again thou'rt found, expect a punishment,
Such as great souls, impatient of an injury,
Exact from those who wrong 'em much; even
death,

Or something worse: an injur'd husband's vengeance

Shall print a thousand wounds, tear thy fine form,
And scatter thee to all the winds of heaven.

Loth. Is then my way in Genoa prescrib'd
By a dependent on the wretched Altamont?
A talking Sir, that brawls for him in taverns,
And vouches for his valour's reputation?

Hor. Away! thy speech is fouler than thy manners.

Loth. Or, if there be a name more vile, his parasite;

A beggar's parasite!

Hor. Now learn humanity,

[Offers to strike him: ROSSANO interposes.
Since brutes and boys are only taught with blows.

Loth. Damnation! [They draw.

Ros. Hold, this goes no further here.

Loth. Oh, Rossano!

Or give me way, or thou'rt no more my friend.

Ros. Sciolto's servants, Sir, have taken th' alarm;

You'll be oppress'd by numbers. Be advis'd

Or I must force you hence.

Loth. This wo' not brook delay;
West of the town a mile, among the rocks,
Two hours ere noon, to-morrow, I expect thee,
Thy single hand to mine.

Hor. I'll meet thee there.

Loth. To-morrow, oh, my better stars! tomorrow

Exert your influence; shine strongly for me;
'Tis not a common conquest I would gain,
Since love as well as arms must grace my triumph.

[Exeunt LOTHARIO and ROSSANO.

Hor. Two hours ere noon to-morrow! ha! ere that

He sees Calista! Oh, unthinking fool—
What if I urg'd her with the crime and danger?
If any spark from heaven remain unquench'd
Within her breast, my breath perhaps may wake it.

Could I but prosper there, I would not doubt
My combat with that loud vainglorious boaster.
Were you, ye fair, but cautious whom ye trust,
Did you but think how seldom fools are just,
So many of your sex would not in vain
Of broken vows, and faithless men, complain;
Of all the various wretches love has made,
How few have been by men of sense betray'd?
Convinc'd by reason, they your power confess,
Pleas'd to be happy, as you're pleas'd to bless,
And, conscious of your worth, can never love you less. [Exit.

ACT III.

SCENE I.—An Apartment in SCIOLTO'S Palace.

Enter SCIOLTO and CALISTA.

Scio. Now, by my life, my honour, 'tis too much!

Have I not mark'd thee, wayward as thou art,
Perverse and sullen all this day of joy?
When every heart was cheer'd, and mirth went round,
Sorrow, displeasure, and repining anguish,
Sat on thy brow.

Cal. Is then the task of duty half perform'd?
Has not your daughter given herself to Altamont,
Yielded the native freedom of her will
To an imperious husband's lordly rule,
To gratify a father's stern command?

Sci. Dost thou complain?

Cal. For pity, do not frown then,
If, in despite of all my vow'd obedience,
A sigh breaks out, or a tear falls by chance:
For, oh! that sorrow which has drawn your anger,
Is the sad native of Calista's breast.

Sci. Now by the sacred dust of that dear saint
That was thy mother; by her wondrous good-
ness,

Her soft, her tender, most complying sweetness,
I swear, some sullen thought that shuns the light,
Lurks underneath that sadness in thy visage.
But mark me well, though by yon heaven I love
thee

As much, I think, as a fond parent can;
Yet shouldst thou (which the powers above forbid,)

E'er stain the honour of thy name with infamy,
I'll cast thee off, as one whose impious hands
Had rent asunder nature's nearest ties,

Which, once divided, never join again.
To-day I've made a noble youth thy husband!
Consider well his worth; reward his love;
Be willing to be happy, and thou art so.

[Exit SCIOLTO.]

Cal. How hard is the condition of our sex.
Through every state of life the slaves of man!
In all the dear delightful days of youth,
A rigid father dictates to our wills,
And deals out pleasure with a scanty hand.
To his, the tyrant husband's reign succeeds;
Proud with opinion of superior reason,
He holds domestic business and devotion
All we are capable to know, and shuts us
Like cloister'd idiots, from the world's acquaintance,
And all the joys of freedom. Wherefore are we
Born with high souls, but to assert ourselves,
Shake off this vile obedience they exact,
And claim an equal empire o'er the world?

Enter HORATIO.

Hor. She's here! yet, ho! my tongue is at a loss;

Teach me, some power, that happy art of speech,
To dress my purpose up in gracious words;
Such as may softly steal upon her soul,
And never waken the tempestuous passions.
By heaven she weeps!—Forgive me, fair Calista,
If I presume, on privilege of friendship,
To join my grief to yours, and mourn the evils
That hurt your peace, and quench those eyes in tears.

Cal. To steal, unlook'd for, on my private sorrow,

Speaks not the man of honour, nor the friend,
But rather means the spy.

Hor. Unkindly said!

For, oh! as sure as you accuse me falsely,
I come to prove myself Calista's friend.

Cal. You are my husband's friend, the friend of Altamont!

Hor. Are you not one? Are you not join'd by heaven,

Each interwoven with the other's fate?
Then who can give his friendship but to one?
Who can be Altamont's, and not Calista's?

Cal. Force, and the wills of our imperious rulers,

May bind two bodies in one wretched chain:
But minds will still look back to their own choice.

Hor. When souls, that should agree to will the same,

To have one common object for their wishes,
Look different ways, regardless of each other;
Think what a train of wretchedness ensues;
Love shall be banished from the genial bed,
The night shall be lonely and unquiet,
And every day shall be a day of cares.

Cal. Then all the boasted office of thy friendship,

Was but to tell Calista what a wretch she is.
Alas! what needed that?

Hor. Oh! rather say,

I came to tell her how she might be happy;
To sooth the secret anguish of her soul;
To comfort that fair mourner, that forlorn one,
And teach her steps to know the paths of peace.

Cal. Say thou, to whom this paradise is known,
Where lies the blissful region? Mark my way to it,

For oh! 'tis sure I long to be at rest.

Hor. Then to be good is to be happy—Angels
Are happier than mankind, because they're better.

Guilt is the source of sorrow! 'tis the fiend,
Th' avenging fiend, that follows us behind,
With whips and stings. The bless'd know none of this,

But rest in everlasting peace of mind,
And find the height of all their heaven is goodness.

Cal. And what bold parasite's officious tongue
Shall dare to tax Calista's name with guilt?

Hor. None should; but 'tis a busy talking world,

That with licentious breath blows, like the wind,
As freely on the palace as the cottage.

Cal. What mystic riddle lurks beneath thy words,

Which thou wouldst seem unwilling to express,
As if it meant dishonour to my virtue?

Away with this ambiguous shuffling phrase,
And let thy oracle be understood.

Hor. Lothario!

Cal. Ha! What wouldst thou mean by him?
Hor. Lothario and Calista!—Thus they join

Two names, which heaven decreed should never meet.

Hence have the talkers of this populous city
A shameful tale to tell, for public sport,
Of an unhappy beauty, a false fair one,
Who plighted to a noble youth her faith,

When she had given her honour to a wretch.
Cal. Death and confusion! Have I liv'd to this?

Thus to be treated with unmanly insolence?
To be the sport of a loose ruffian's tongue!

Thus to be us'd! thus! like the vilest creature,
That ever was a slave to vice and infamy.

Hor. By honour and fair truth, you wrong me
much;

For, on my soul, nothing but strong necessity
Could urge my tongue to this ungrateful office.

I came with strong reluctance, as if death
Had stood across my way, to save your honour,
Yours and Sciolto's, yours and Altamont's;

Like one who ventures through a burning pile,
To save his tender wife, with all her brood
Of little fondlings, from the dreadful ruin.

Cal. Is this the famous friend of Altamont,
For noble worth and deeds of arms renown'd?

Is this the tale-bearing officious fellow,
That watches for intelligence from eyes?

This wretched Argus of a jealous husband,
That fills his easy ears with monstrous tales,
And makes him toss, and rave, and wreak at length

Bloody revenge on his defenceless wife,
Who guiltless dies, because her fool ran mad?

Hor. Alas! this rage is vain; for if your fame
Or peace be worth your care, you must be calm,
And listen to the means are left to save 'em.

'Tis now the lucky minute of your fate.
By me your genius speaks, by me it warns you,
Never to see that curs'd Lothario more;
Unless you mean to be despis'd, be shunn'd,
By all our virtuous maids and noble matrons;
Unless you have devoted this rare beauty
To infamy, diseases, prostitution—

Cal. Dishonour blast thee, base, unmanner'd slave!

That dar'st forget my birth, and sacred sex,
And shock me with the rude, unhallow'd sound!

Hor. Here kneel, and in the awful face of heaven

Breathe out a solemn vow, never to see,
Nor think, if possible, on him that ruin'd thee;
Or, by my Altamont's dear life, I swear,
'This paper; nay, you must not fly—'This paper,
'This guilty paper shall divulge your shame.

Cal. What mean'st thou by that paper? What contrivance

Hast thou been forging to deceive my father;
To turn his heart against his wretched daughter;
That Altamont and thou may share his wealth?
A wrong like this will make me even forget
The weakness of my sex.—Oh, for a sword,
To urge my vengeance on the villain's head
That forg'd the scroll!

Hor. Behold! Can this be forg'd?

See where Calista's name—

[Showing the letter near.

Cal. To atoms thus, [Tearing it.
Thus let me tear the vile, detested falsehood,
The wicked, lying evidence of shame.

Hor. Confusion!

Cal. Henceforth, thou officious fool,
Meddle no more, nor dare, even on thy life,
To breathe an accent that may touch my virtue.
I am myself the guardian of my honour,
And will not bear so insolent a monitor.

Enter ALTAMONT.

Alt. Where is my life, my love, my charming bride,

Joy of my heart, and pleasure of my eyes?
Disorder'd!—and in tears!—Horatio too!
My friend is in amaze—What can it mean?
Tell me, Calista, who has done thee wrong,
That my swift sword may find out the offender,
And do thee ample justice.

Cal. Turn to him.

Alt. Horatio!

Cal. To that insolent.

Alt. My friend!

Could he do this? Have I not found him just,
Honest as truth itself? and could he break
The sanctity of friendship? Could he wound
The heart of Altamont in his Calista?

Cal. I thought what justice I should find from thee!

Go fawn upon him, listen to his tale,
Thou art perhaps confederate in his mischief,
And wilt believe the legend, if he tells it.

Alt. Oh, impious! what presumptuous wretch shall dare

To offer at an injury like that?
Priesthood, nor age, nor cowardice itself,
Shall save him from the fury of my vengeance.

Cal. The man who dar'd to do it was Horatio;
Thy darling friend; 'twas Altamont's Horatio.
But mark me well; while thy divided heart
Dotes on a villain that has wrong'd me thus,
No force shall drag me to thy hated bed.
Nor can my cruel father's power do more
Than shut me in a cloister: there, well pleas'd,
Religious hardships will I learn to bear,
To fast and freeze at midnight hours of prayer:
Nor think it hard, within a lonely cell,
With melancholy speechless saints to dwell:
But bless the day I to that refuge ran,
Free from the marriage chain, and from that tyrant, man. [Exit.

Alt. She's gone; and as she went, ten thousand fires

Shot from her angry eyes; as if she meant
Too well to keep the cruel vow she made.
Now, as thou art a man, Horatio, tell me,
What means this wild confusion in thy looks;
As if thou wert at variance with thyself,
Madness and reason combating with thee,
And thou wert doubtful which should get the better?

Hor. I would be dumb for ever; but thy fate
Has otherwise decreed it. Thou hast seen
That idol of thy soul, that fair Calista;
Thou hast beheld her tears.

Alt. I have seen her weep;
I have seen that lovely one, that dear Calista,
Complaining, in the bitterness of sorrow,
That thou, my friend Horatio, thou hast wrong'd
her.

Hor. That I have wrong'd her! Had her eyes been fed
From the rich stream which warms her heart, and number'd

For every falling tear a drop of blood,
It had not been too much; for she has ruin'd thee,
Even thee, my Altamont. She has undone thee.

Alt. Dost thou join ruin with Calista's name?
What is so fair, so exquisitely good?
Is she not more than painting can express,
Or youthful poets fancy when they love?
Does she not come, like wisdom or good fortune,
Replete with blessings, giving wealth and honour?

Hor. It had been better thou hadst liv'd a beggar,

And fed on scraps at great men's surly doors,
Than to have match'd with one so false, so fatal.

Alt. It is too much for friendship to allow thee,
Because I tamely bore the wrong thou didst her,
Thou dost avow the barb'rous, brutal part,
And urge the injury even to my face.

Hor. I see she has got possession of thy heart,
She has charm'd thee, like a Syren, to her bed,
With looks of love, and with enchanting sounds:
Too late the rocks and quicksands will appear,
When thou art wreck'd upon the faithless shore,
Then vainly wish thou hadst not left thy friend,
To follow her delusion.

Alt. If thy friendship

Does churlishly deny my love a room,
It is not worth my keeping; I disclaim it.

Hor. Canst thou soon forget what I've been to
thee?

I shar'd the task of nature with thy father,
And form'd with care thy inexperienced youth
To virtue and to arms.

Thy noble father, oh, thou light young man!
Would he have us'd me thus? One fortune fed
us;

For his was ever mine, mine his, and both
Together flourish'd, and together fell.
He call'd me friend, like thee: would he have left
me

Thus for a woman, and a vile one, too?

Alt. Thou canst not, dar'st not mean it! Speak
again,

Say, who is vile; but dare not name Calista.

Hor. I had not spoke at first, unless compell'd
And forc'd to clear myself; but since thus urg'd
I must avow, I do not know a viler.

Alt. Thou wert my father's friend; he lov'd thee well;

A kind of venerable mark of him
Hangs round thee, and protects thee from my vengeance.

I cannot, dare not lift my sword against thee,
But henceforth never let me see thee more.

Hor. I love thee still, ungrateful as thou art,
And must and will preserve thee from dishonour,
Even in spite of thee. [Going out.

Alt. Let go my arm.

Hor. If honour be thy care, if thou wouldst
live

Without the name of credulous, wittol husband,
Avoid thy bride, shun her detested bed,
The joys it yields are dash'd with poison—

Alt. Off!

To urge me but a minute more is fatal.

Hor. She is polluted, stain'd—

Alt. Madness and raging!

But hence—

Hor. Dishonour'd by the man you hate—

Alt. I pry thee loose me yet, for thy own sake,
If life be worth thy keeping—

Hor. By Lothario.

Alt. Perdition take thee, villain, for the falsehood! [Strikes him.

Now, nothing but thy life can make atonement.

Hor. A blow! thou hast us'd me well—

[Draws.

Alt. This to thy heart—

Hor. Yet hold—By heaven his father's in his face! [Tenderness.

Spite of my wrongs, my heart runs o'er with
And I could rather die myself than hurt him.

Alt. Confend thyself; for by my much wrong'd
love,

I swear, the poor evasion shall not save thee.

Hor. Yet hold—thou know'st, I dare.

[They fight.

Enter LAVINIA, who runs between their swords.

Lav. My brother, my Horatio! Is it possible?
Oh, turn your cruel swords upon Lavinia.

If you must quench your impious rage in blood,
Behold, my heart shall give you all her store,
To save those dearer streams that flow from yours.

Alt. 'Tis well thou hast found a safeguard:
none but this,

No power on earth, could save thee from my fury.

Hor. Safety from thee!

Away, vain boy! Hast thou forgot the rev'rence
Due to my arm, thy first, thy great example,
Which pointed out thy way to noble daring,
And show'd thee what it was to be a man?

Lav. What busy, meddling fiend, what foe to goodness,

Could kindle such a discord?

Hor. Ask'st thou what made us foes? 'Twas base ingratitude, [mercy,
'Twas such a sin to friendship, as heaven's That strives with man's untoward, monstrous wickedness,

Unwearied with forgiving, scarce could pardon.
He who was all to me, child, brother, friend,
With barb'rous bloody malice, sought my life.

Alt. Thou art my sister, and I would not make
thee

The lonely mourner of a widow'd bed;
Therefore thy husband's life is safe: but warn
him,

No more to know this hospitable roof.

He has but ill repaid Sciolto's bounty.

We must not meet; 'tis dangerous. Farewell.

[He is going; LAVINIA holds him.

11*

Lav. Stay, Altamont, my brother, stay!

Alt. It cannot, sha' not be—you must not hold
me.

Lav. Look kindly, then.

Alt. Each minute that I stay,
Is a new injury to fair Calista.

From thy false friendship, to her arms I'll fly;
Then own, the joys which on her charms attend,
Have more than paid me for my faithless friend.

[Breaks from LAVINIA, and exit.

Hor. Oh, raise thee, my Lavinia, from the earth.

It is too much; this time of flowing grief,
This wondrous waste of tears, too much to give
To an ungrateful friend, and cruel brother.

Lav. Is there not cause for weeping? Oh,
Horatio!

A brother and a husband were my treasure,
'Twas all the little wealth that poor Lavinia Sav'd from the shipwreck of her father's fortunes.

One half is lost already. If thou leav'st me,
If thou shouldst prove unkind to me, as Altamont,
Whom shall I find to pity my distress,
To have compassion on a helpless wanderer,
And give her where to lay her wretched head?

Hor. Why dost thou wound me with thy soft complaining?

Though Altamont be false, and use me hardly,
Yet think not I impute his crimes to thee.

Talk not of being forsaken; for I'll keep thee
Next to my heart, my certain pledge of happiness.

Lav. Then you will love me still, cherish me
ever,

And hide me from misfortune in your bosom?

Hor. But for the love I owe the good Sciolto,
From Genoa, from falsehood, and inconstancy,
To some more honest, distant clime I'd go;
Nor would I be beholden to my country,
For aught but thee, the partner of my flight.

Lav. And I would follow thee; forsake, for
thee,

My country, brother, friends, even all I have.
Though mine's a little all, yet were it more,
And better far, it should be left for thee,
And all that I would keep should be Horatio.
So, when a merchant sees his vessel lost,
Though richly freighted from a foreign coast,
Gladly for life, the treasure he would give,
And only wishes to escape and live:
Gold and his gains no more employ his mind;
But, driving o'er the billows with the wind,
Cleaves to one faithful plank, and leaves the rest behind. [Exit.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Garden.

LOTHARIO and CALISTA discovered.

Loth. Weep not, my fair; but let the god of
love

Laugh in thy eyes, and revel in thy heart,
Kindle again his torch, and hold it high,
To light us to new joys. Nor let a thought
Of discord, or disquiet past, molest thee;

But to a long oblivion give thy cares,

And let us melt the present hour in bliss.

Cal. Seek not to sooth me with thy false endearments,

To charm me with thy softness: 'tis in vain:
Thou canst no more betray, nor I be ruin'd.

The hours of folly and of fond delight
Are wasted all, and fled; those that remain
Are doom'd to weeping, anguish, and repentance.
I come to charge thee with a long account
Of all the sorrows I have known already,
And all I have to come; thou hast undone me.

Loth. Unjust Calista! dost thou call it ruin
To love as we have done; to melt, to languish,
To wish for somewhat exquisitely happy,
And then be bless'd even to that wish's height?
To die with joy, and straight to live again:
Speechless to gaze, and with tumultuous transport—

Cal. Oh, let me hear no more; I cannot bear it;
'Tis deadly to remembrance. Let that night,
That guilty night, be blotted from the year:
For 'twas the night that gave me up to shame,
To sorrow, to the false Lothario.

Loth. Hear this, ye powers! mark, how the fair deceiver
Sadly complains of violated trust;
She calls me false, even she, the faithless she,
Whom day and night, whom heaven and earth,
have heard

Sighing to vow, and tenderly protest,
Ten thousand times, she would be only mine;
And yet, behold, she has given herself away,
Fled from my arms, and wedded to another,
Even to the man whom most I hate on earth.—

Cal. Art thou so base to upbraid me with a crime,

Which nothing but thy cruelty could cause?
If indignation, raging in my soul
For thy unmanly insolence and scorn,
Urg'd me to do a deed of desperation,
And wound myself to be reveng'd on thee,
Think whom I should devote to death and hell,
Whom curse as my undoer, but Lothario?
Hadst thou been just, not all Sciolto's power,
Not all the vows and prayers of sighing Altamont,
Could have prevail'd, or won me to forsake thee.

Loth. How have I fail'd, in justice or in love?
Burns not my flame as brightly as at first?
Even now my heart beats high, I languish for
thee,

My transports are as fierce, as strong my wishes,
As if thou ne'er hadst bless'd me with thy beauty.

Cal. How didst thou dare to think that I would live

A slave to base desires and brutal pleasures,
To be a wretched wanton for thy leisure,
To toy and waste an hour of idle time with?
My soul disdains thee for so mean a thought.

Loth. The driving storm of passion will have way,

And I must yield before it. Wert thou calm,
Love, the poor criminal whom thou hast doom'd,
Has yet a thousand tender things to plead,
To charm thy rage, and mitigate his fate.

Enter ALTAMONT behind.

Alt. Ha! do I live and wake? [Aside.

Cal. Hadst thou been true, how happy had I been!

Not Altamont, but thou, hadst been my lord.
But wherefore nam'd I happiness with thee?
It is for thee, for thee, that I am curs'd;
For thee my secret soul each hour arraigns me,
Calls me to answer for my virtue stain'd,
My honour lost to thee: for thee it haunts me,
With stern Sciolto vowing vengeance on me,

With Altamont complaining for his wrongs—

Alt. Behold him here— [Coming forward.

Cal. Ah! [Starting

Alt. The wretch! whom thou hast made.

Curses and sorrows hast thou heap'd upon him,
And vengeance is the only good that's left.

[Drawing.

Loth. Thou hast ta'en me somewhat unawares,
'tis true:

But love and war take turns, like day and night,
And little preparation serves my turn,
Equal to both, and arm'd for either field.
We've long been foes; this moment ends our quarrel;

Earth, heaven, and fair Calista, judge the combat!

[They fight; LOTHARIO falls.

Oh, Altamont! thy genius is the stronger!
Thou hast prevail'd!—My fierce, ambitious soul
Declining droops, and all her fires grow pale;
Yet let not this advantage swell thy pride,
I conquer'd in my turn, in love I triumph'd.
Those joys are lodg'd beyond the reach of fate;
That sweet revenge comes smiling to my thoughts,
Adorns my fall, and cheers my heart in dying.

[Dies.

Cal. And what remains for me, beset with shame,
Encompass'd round with wretchedness? There is
But this one way to break the toil, and 'scape.

[She catches up LOTHARIO'S sword, and offers to kill herself; ALTAMONT wrests it from her.

Alt. What means thy frantic rage?

Cal. Off! let me go.

Alt. Oh! thou hast more than murder'd me;
yet still, [horror,

Still art thou here! and my soul starts with
At thought of any danger that may reach thee.

Cal. Think'st thou I mean to live? to be forgiven?

Oh, thou hast known but little of Calista!
If thou hadst never heard my shame, if only
The midnight moon and silent stars had seen
it,

I would not bear to be reproach'd by them,
But dig down deep to find a grave beneath,
And hide me from their beams.

Sci. [Within.] What, ho! my son!

Madness! Is it the voice of thunder, or my father?
Madness! Confusion! let the storm come on,
Let the tumultuous roar drive all upon me;
Dash my devoted bark, ye surges, break it!
'Tis for my ruin that the tempest rises.
When I am lost, sunk to the bottom low,
Peace shall return, and all be calm again.

Enter SCIOLTO.

Sci. Even now Rossano leap'd the garden wall—

Ha! death has been among you—Oh, my fears!
Last night thou hadst a diff'rence with thy friend,
The cause thou gav'st me for it was a damn'd
one.

Didst thou not wrong the man who told the truth?
Answer me quick—

Alt. Oh! press me not to speak;
Even now my heart is breaking, and the mention
Will lay me dead before you. See that body,
And guess my shame! my ruin! Oh, Calista!

Sci. It is enough! but I am slow to execute,
And justice lingers in my lazy hand;
Thus let me wipe dishonour from my name,

And cut thee from the earth, thou stain to goodness—

[Offers to kill CALISTA; ALTAMONT holds him.

Alt. Stay thee, Sciolto, thou rash father, stay, Or turn the point on me, and through my breast Cut out the bloody passage to Calista; So shall my love be perfect, while for her I die, for whom alone I wish'd to live.

Cal. No, Altamont; my heart, that scorn'd thy love, Shall never be indebted to thy pity.

Thus torn, defac'd, and wretched as I seem, Still I have something of Sciolto's virtue. Yes, yes, my father, I applaud thy justice: Strike home, and I will bless thee for the blow; Be merciful, and free me from my pain; 'Tis sharp, 'tis terrible, and I could curse The cheerful day, men, earth, and heaven, and thee,

Even thee, thou venerable, good old man, For being author to a wretch like me.

Sci. Thy pious care has given me time to think, And sav'd me from a crime; then rest, my sword, To honour have I kept thee ever sacred, Nor will I stain thee with a rash revenge. But, mark me well, I will have justice done: Hope not to bear away thy crimes unpunish'd: I will see justice executed on thee, Even to a Roman strictness; and thou, nature, Or whatsoever thou art that plead'st within me, Be still; thy tender strugglings are in vain.

Cal. Then am I doom'd to live, and bear your triumph? [braiding, To groan beneath your scorn and fierce up- Daily to be reproach'd, and have my misery At noon, at noon, at night, told over to me? Is this, is this, the mercy of a father? I only beg to die, and he denies me.

Sci. Hence from my sight! thy father cannot bear thee;

Fly with thy infamy to some dark cell, Where, on the confines of eternal night, Mourning, misfortune, cares, and anguish dwell; Where ugly shame hides her opprobrious head, And death and hell detested rule maintain; There howl out the remainder of thy life, And with thy name may be no more remember'd.

Cal. Yes, I will fly to some such dismal place, And be more curs'd than you can wish I were; This fatal form, that drew on my undoing, Fasting, and tears, and hardships, shall destroy; Nor light, nor food, nor comfort, will I know, Nor aught that may continue hated life. Then when you see me meagre, wan, and chang'd, Stretch'd at my length, and dying in my cave, On that cold earth, I mean shall be my grave, Perhaps you may relent, and sighing say, At length her tears have wash'd her stains away; At length 'tis time her punishment should cease; Die, thou poor suff'ring wretch, and be at peace. [Exit.

Sci. Who of my servants wait there?

Enter two or three SERVANTS.

Raise that body, and bear it in. On your lives Take care my doors be guarded well, that none Pass out, or enter, but by my appointment.

[Exit SERVANTS, with LOTHARIO'S body.

Alt. There is a fatal fury in your visage, It blazes fierce, and menaces destruction, I tremble at the vengeance which you meditate

On the poor, faithless, lovely, dear Calista.

Sci. Hast thou not read what brave Virginius did?

With his own hand he slew his only daughter, To save her from the fierce Decemvir's lust. He slew her yet unspotted, to prevent The shame which she might know. Then what should I do?

But thou hast tied my hand.—I wo' not kill her; Yet, by the ruin she has brought upon us, The common infamy that brands us both, She sha' not scape.

Alt. You mean that she shall die then?

Sci. Ask me not what, nor how, I have resolv'd; For all within is anarchy and uproar.

Oh, Altamont! what a vast scheme of joy Has this one day destroyed? Well did I hope This daughter would have bless'd my latter days; That I should live to see you the world's wonder, So happy, great, and good, that none were like you.

While I, from busy life and care set free, Had spent the evening of my age at home, Among a little prattling race of yours: There, like an old man, talk'd awhile, and then Laid down and slept in peace. Instead of this, Sorrow and shame must bring me to my grave— Oh, damn her! damn her!

Enter a SERVANT.

Serv. Arm yourself, my lord:

Rossano, who but now escap'd the garden, Has gather'd in the street a band of rioters, Who threaten you and all your friends with ruin, Unless Lothario be return'd in safety. [Exit.

Sci. By heaven their fury rises to my wish, Nor shall misfortune know my house alone; But thou, Lothario, and thy race, shall pay me For all the sorrows which my age is curs'd with. I think my name as great, my friends as potent, As any in the state; all shall be summon'd; I know that all will join their hands to ours, And vindicate thy vengeance. When our force Is full and arm'd, we shall expect thy sword To join with us, and sacrifice to justice. [Exit.

Alt. There is a heavy weight upon my senses; A dismal, sullen stillness, that succeeds The storm of rage and grief, like silent death, After the tumult and the noise of life. Would it were death, as sure 'tis wondrous like it, For I am sick of living; my soul's pall'd, She kindles not with anger or revenge; Love was th' informing, active fire within; Now that is quench'd, the mass forgets to move, And longs to mingle with its kindred earth. [Exit.

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A room hung with black.

On one side LOTHARIO'S Body on a Bier; on the other a Table, with a Scull and other bones, a Book and a Lamp on it.—CALISTA is discovered on a couch, in black; her hair hanging loose and disordered. After soft music, she rises and comes forward.

Cal. 'Tis well! these solemn sounds, this pomp of horror, Are fit to feed the frenzy in my soul. Here's room for meditation even to madness, Till the mind burst with thinking. This dull flame

Sleeps in the socket. Sure the book was left
To teach me something;—for instruction then—
He teaches holy sorrow and contrition,
And penitence.—Is it become an art then?
A trick that lazy, dull, luxurious gownmen
Can teach us to do over? I'll no more on't;

[Throwing away the Book.]

I have more real anguish in my heart,
Than all their pedant discipline e'er knew.
What charnel has been rifled for these bones?
Fie! this is pageantry;—they look uncouthly.
But what of that, if he or she that own'd 'em
Safe from disquiet sit, and smile to see
The force their miserable relics play?
But here 's a sight is terrible indeed!
Is this that haughty, gallant, gay Lothario,
That dear, perfidious—Ah!—how pale he looks!
And those dead eyes!
Ascend, ye ghosts, fantastic forms of night,
In all your different dreadful shapes ascend,
And match the present horror, if you can.

Enter SCIOLTO.

Sci. This dread of night, this silent hour of darkness,

Nature for rest ordain'd, and soft repose;
And yet distraction and tumultuous jars
Keep all our frighted citizens awake:
Amidst the general wreck, see where she stands,

[Pointing to CALISTA.]

Like Helen, in the night when Troy was sack'd, Spectatress of the mischief which she made.

Cal. It is Sciolto! Be thyself, my soul,
Be strong to bear his fatal indignation,
That he may see thou art not lost so far,
But somewhat still of his great spirit lives
In the forlorn Calista.

Sci. Thou wert once
My daughter.

Cal. Happy were it I had died,
And never lost that name.

Sci. That's something yet;
Thou wert the very darling of my age:
I thought the day too short to gaze upon thee;
That all the blessings I could gather for thee,
By cares on earth, and by my prayers to heaven,
Were little for my fondness to bestow,
Why didst thou turn to folly then, and curse me?

Cal. Because my soul was rudely drawn from
yours,

A poor, imperfect copy of my father;
It was because I lov'd, and was a woman.

Sci. Hadst thou been honest, thou hadst been a cherub:

But of that joy, as of a gem long lost,
Beyond redemption gone, think we no more.
Hast thou e'er dar'd to meditate on death?

Cal. I have, as on the end of shame and sorrow.

Sci. Ha! answer me! Say, hast thou coolly thought?

'Tis not the stoic's lessons got by rote,
The pomp of words, and pedant dissertations,
That can sustain thee in that hour of terror:
Books have taught cowards to talk nobly of it,
But when the trial comes they stand aghast;
Hast thou consider'd what may happen after it?
How thy account may stand, and what to answer?

Cal. I've turn'd my eyes inward upon myself,
Where foul offence and shame have laid all waste;
Therefore my soul abhors the wretched dwelling,
And longs to find some better place of rest.

Sci. 'Tis justly thought, and worthy of that spirit [Rome]

That dwelt in ancient Latian breasts, when
Was mistress of the world. I would go on,
And tell thee all my purpose; but it sticks
Here at my heart, and cannot find a way.

Cal. Then spare the telling, if it be a pain,
And write the meaning with your poniard here.

Sci. Oh! truly guess'd—seest thou this trembling hand? [Holding up a Dagger.]
Thrice justice urg'd—and thrice the slack'ning sinews

Forgot their office, and confess'd the father.

At length the stubborn virtue has prevail'd;

It must, it must be so—Oh! take it then,

[Gives the Dagger.]

And know the rest untaught.

Cal. I understand you.

It is but thus, and both are satisfied.

[Offers to kill herself; SCIOLTO catches her arm.]

Sci. A moment, give me yet a moment's space.

The stern, the rigid judge has been obey'd;

Now nature, and the father, claim their turns.

I've held the balance with an iron hand,

And put off every tender human thought,

To doom my child to death; but spare my eyes

The most unnatural sight, lest their strings crack,

My old brain split, and I grow mad with horror.

Cal. Ha! is it possible? and is there yet

Some little, dear remain of love and tenderness

For poor, undone Calista, in your heart?

Sci. Oh! when I think what pleasure I took in
thee,

What joys thou gav'st me in thy prattling infancy,

Thy sprightly wit, and early blooming beauty;

How have I stood and fed my eyes upon thee,

Then, lifting up my hands and wond'ring, bless'd
thee;

By my strong grief, my heart even melts within
me;

I could curse nature, and that tyrant honour,

For making me thy father and thy judge;

Thou art my daughter still.

Cal. For that kind word,

Thus let me fall, thus humbly to the earth,

Weep on your feet, and bless you for this good ness.

Oh! 'tis too much for this offending wretch,

This parricide, that murders with her crimes,

Shortens her father's age, and cuts him off

Ere little more than half his years be number'd.

Sci. Would it were otherwise—but thou must die.—

Cal. That I must die, it is my only comfort:

Death is the privilege of human nature,

And life without it were not worth our taking:

Come then,

Thou meagre shade; here let me breathe my last

Charn'd with my father's pity and forgiveness,

More than if angels tun'd their golden viols,

And sung a requiem to my parting soul.

Sci. I'm summon'd hence; ere this my friends expect me.

There is, I know not what of sad presage,

That tells me I shall never see thee more;

If it be so, this is our last farewell,

And these the parting pangs, which nature feels,

When anguish rends the heart-strings—Oh, my daughter! [Exit]

Cal. Now think, thou curs'd Calista, now behold
The desolation, horror, blood, and ruin,
Thy crimes and fatal folly spread around,
That loudly cry for vengeance on thy head;
Yet heaven, who knows our weak imperfect
natures,
How blind with passions, and how prone to evil,
Makes not too strict inquiry for offences,
But is aton'd by penitence and prayer:
Cheap recompense! here 'twould not be receiv'd;
Nothing but blood can make the expiation,
And cleanse the soul from inbred deep pollution.
And see, another injur'd wretch appears,
To call for justice from my tardy hand.

Enter ALTAMONT.

All. Hail to you, horrors! hail, thou house of death!

And thou, the lovely mistress of these shades,
Whose beauty gilds the more than midnight
darkness,
And makes it grateful as the dawn of day.
Oh, take me in a fellow-mourner, with thee,
I'll number groan for groan, and tear for tear;
And when the fountains of thy eyes are dry,
Mine shall supply the stream, and weep for both.

Cal. I know thee well, thou art the injur'd
Altamont;

Thou com'st to urge me with the wrongs I've done thee.

But know I stand upon the brink of life,
And in a moment mean to set me free
From shame and thy upbraiding.

Alt. Falsely, falsely
Dost thou accuse me! O, forbid me not
To mourn thy loss,
To wish some better fate had rul'd our loves,
And that Calista had been mine, and true.

Cal. Oh, Altamont! 'tis hard for souls like mine,

Haughty and fierce, to yield they've done amiss.
But, oh, behold! my proud, disdainful heart,
Bends to thy gentler virtue. Yes, I own,
Such is thy truth, thy tenderness, and love,
That, were I not abandon'd to destruction,
With thee I might have liv'd for ages bless'd,
And died in peace within thy faithful arms.

Enter HORATIO.

Hor. Now mourn indeed, ye miserable pair!
For now the measure of your woes is full.
The great, the good Scioflo dies this moment.

Cal. My father!

Alt. That's a deadly stroke, indeed.
Hor. Not long ago, he privately went forth,
Attended by few, and those unbidden.
I heard which way he took, and straight pursued him;

But found him compass'd by Lothario's faction,
Almost alone, amidst a crowd of foes.
Too late we brought him aid, and drove them back:

Ere that, his frantic valour had provok'd
The death he seem'd to wish for from their swords.

Cal. And dost thou bear me yet, thou patient
earth?

Vol. I. . . . R

Dost thou not labour with thy murderous weight?
And you, ye glittering, heavenly host of stars,
Hide your fair heads in clouds, or I shall blast
you;

For I am all contagion, death, and ruin;
And nature sickens at ine. Rest, thou world,
This parricide shall be thy plague no more;
Thus, thus I set thee free. [Stabs herself.]

Hor. Oh, fatal rashness!

Enter SCIOFLO, pale and bloody, supported by Servants.

Cal. Oh, my heart! [fed]
Well may'st thou fail; for see, the spring that Thy vital stream, is wasted, and runs low.
My father! will you now, at last, forgive me,
If, after all my crimes, and all your sufferings,
I call you once again by that dear name?
Will you forget my shame, and those wide wounds?

Lift up your hand and bless me, ere I go
Down to my dark abode!

Sci. Alas, my daughter!
Thou hast rashly ventur'd in a stormy sea,
Where life, fame, virtue, all were wreck'd and lost. [anguish.]

But sure thou hast borne thy part in all the
And smarted with the pain. Then rest in peace
Let silence and oblivion hide thy name,
And save thee from the malice of posterity;
And may'st thou find with heaven the same forgiveness,

As with thy father here.—Die, and be happy.

Cal. Celestial sounds! peace dawns upon my soul, [mont!]

And every pain grows less—Oh, gentle Alta-
Think not too hardly of me when I'm gone;
But pity me—Had I but early known Thy wondrous worth, thou excellent young
man,

We had been happier both—Now, 'tis too late;
And yet my eyes take pleasure to behold thee;
Thou art their last dear object—Mercy, heaven!

[Dies.]
Sci. Oh, turn thee from that fatal object,
Altamont!

Come near, and let me bless thee ere I die.
To thee and brave Horatio I bequeath
My fortunes—Lay me by thy noble father,
And love my memory as thou hast his;
For thou hast been my son—Oh, gracious
heaven!

Thou that hast endless blessings still in store
For virtue and for filial piety,
Let grief, disgrace, and want be far away;
But multiply thy mercies on his head. [him,]
Let honour, greatness, goodness, still be with
And peace in all his ways— [Dies.]

Hor. The storm of grief bears hard upon his youth,

And bends him, like a drooping flower, to earth.
By such examples are we taught to prove
The sorrows that attend unlawful love.
Death, or some worse misfortune, soon divide
The injur'd bridegroom from his guilty bride.
If you would have the nuptial union last,
Let virtue be the bond that ties it fast.

[Exeunt]

A BOLD STROKE FOR A WIFE:

A COMEDY,

IN FIVE ACTS.

BY MRS. CENTLIVRE.

REMARKS.

The busy variety of this lively comedy, produced at the Theatre, Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, in the year 1713, has always procured it a great share of popular favour; notwithstanding its numerous offences against probability, decorum, and nature.

In the principal characters, there is great scope for that rich comic talent, which is always displayed, to the delight of their audiences, at the Theatres Royal of this great metropolis.

The fair authoress says, in her Prologue,

"To-night we come upon a bold design,
To try to please without one borrow'd line;
Our plot is new and regularly clear,
And not one single tittle from Moliere;
O'er buried poets we with caution tread,
And parish sextons leave to rob the dead."

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Tavern.

COLONEL FEIGNWELL and FREEMAN over a bottle.

Free. Come, colonel, his majesty's health.—
You are as melancholy as if you were in love! I wish some of the beauties of Bath ha'n't snapt your heart.

Col. F. Why, 'faith, Freeman, there is something in't: I have seen a lady at Bath, who has kindled such a flame in me, that all the waters there can't quench.

Free. Is she not to be had, colonel?

Col. F. That's a difficult question to answer; however, I resolve to try; perhaps you may be able to serve me; you merchants know one another. The lady told me herself she was under the charge of four persons.

Free. Odo! 'tis Miss Anne Lovely.

Col. F. The same—do you know her?

Free. Know her? ay—Faith, colonel, your condition is more desperate than you imagine: why, she is the talk and pity of the whole town; and it is the opinion of the learned, that she must die a maid.

Col. F. Say you so? That's somewhat odd, in this charitable city.—She's a woman, I hope?

Free. For aught I know—but it had been as well for her had nature made her any other part of the creation. The man who keeps this house served her father; he is a very honest fellow, and may be of use to you: we'll send for him to take a glass with us: he'll give you her whole history, and 'tis worth your hearing.

Col. F. But may one trust him?

Free. With your life: I have obligations enough upon him, to make him do any thing: I serve him with wine. [Rings.]

Col. F. Nay, I know him very well myself. I once used to frequent a club that was kept here.

Enter DRAWER.

Draw. Gentlemen, d'ye call?

Free. Ay, send up your master.

Draw. Yes, Sir. [Exit.]

Col. F. Do you know any of this lady's guardians, Freeman?

Free. I know two of them very well.

Enter SACKBUT.

Free. Here comes one will give you an account of them all. Mr. Sackbut, we sent for you to take a glass with us. 'Tis a maxim among the friends of the bottle, that as long as the master is in company, one may be sure of good wine.

Sack. Sir, you shall be sure to have as good wine as you send in. Colonel, your most humble servant; you are welcome to town.

Col. F. I thank you, Mr. Sackbut.

Sack. I am as glad to see you as I should a hundred tun of French claret, custom free.—My service to you, Sir, [Drinks.] You don't look so merry as you used to do; aren't you well, colonel?

Free. He has got a woman in his head, landlord: can you help him?

Sack. If 'tis in my power, I shan't scruple to serve my friend.

Col. F. 'Tis one perquisite of your calling.

Sack. Ay, at 'tother end of the town, where you officers use, women are good forcers of trade: a well-customed house, a handsome bar-keeper, with clean obliging drawers, soon get the master an estate; but our citizens seldom do any thing but cheat within the walls.—But as to the lady, colonel, point you at particulars? or have you a good Champagne stomach? Are you in full pay, or reduced, colonel?

Col. F. Reduced, reduced, landlord!

Free. To the miserable condition of a lover!

Sack. Pish! that's preferable to half-pay: a woman's resolution may break before the peace: push her home, colonel, there's no parleying with the fair sex.

Col. F. Were the lady her own mistress, I have some reasons to believe I should soon command in chief.

Free. You know Miss Lovely, Mr. Sackbut?

Sack. Know her! Ay, poor Nancy: I have carried her to school many a frosty morning. Alas! if she's the woman, I pity you, colonel:

her father, my old master, was the most whimsical, out-of-the-way-tempered man I ever heard of, as you will guess by his last will and testament.—This was his only child; and I have heard him wish her dead a thousand times. He died worth thirty thousand pounds, which he left to his daughter, provided she married with the consent of her guardians, but that she might be sure never to do so, he left her in the care of four men, as opposite to each other as the four elements: each has his quarterly rule, and three months in the year she is obliged to be subject to each of their humours; and they are pretty different, I assure you.—She is just come from Bath.

Col. F. 'Twas there I saw her.

Sack. Ay, Sir, the last quarter was her beau guardian's. She appears in all public places during his reign.

Col. F. She visited a lady who boarded in the same house with me: I liked her person, and found an opportunity to tell her so. She replied, she had no objection to mine; but if I could not reconcile contradictions, I must not think of her, for that she was condemned to the caprice of four persons, who never yet agreed in any one thing, and she was obliged to please them all.

Sack. 'Tis most true, Sir: I'll give you a short description of the men, and leave you to judge of the poor lady's condition. One is a kind of a virtuoso, a silly half-witted fellow, but positive and surly, fond of every thing antique and foreign, and wears his clothes of the fashion of the last century, dotes upon travellers, and believes more of Sir John Mandeville than he does of the Bible.

Col. F. That must be a rare odd fellow.

Sack. Another is a change-broker: a fellow that will out-lie the devil for the advantage of stock, and cheat his father that got him in a bargain: he is a great stickler for trade, and hates every man that wears a sword.

Free. He is a great admirer of the Dutch management, and swears they understand trade better than any nation under the sun.

Sack. The third is an old beau, that has May in his fancy and dress, but December in his face and his heels: he admires all new fashions, and those must be French; loves operas, balls, masquerades, and is always the most tawdry of the whole company on a birth-day.

Col. F. These are pretty opposite one to another, truly; and the fourth, what is he, landlord?

Sack. A very rigid quaker, whose quarter began this day. I saw Miss Lovely go in, not above two hours ago. Sir Philip set her down. What think you now, colonel? Is not the poor lady to be pitied?

Col. F. Ay, and rescued too, landlord.

Free. In my opinion, that's impossible.

Col. F. There is nothing impossible to a lover! What would not a man attempt for a fine woman and thirty thousand pounds? Besides, my honour is at stake: I promised to deliver her, and she bid me win her and wear her.

Sack. That's fair, faith!

Free. If it depended upon knight-errantry, I should not doubt your setting free the damsel; but to have avarice, impertinence, hypocrisy, and pride, at once to deal with, requires more cunning than generally attends a man of honour.

Col. F. My fancy tells me I shall come off with glory. I resolve to try, however: Do you know all the guardians, Mr. Sackbut?

Sack. Very well; they all use my house.

Col. F. And will you assist me, if occasion requires?

Sack. In every thing I can, colonel.

Free. I'll answer for him.

Col. F. First I'll attack my beau guardian: who lives he?

Sack. 'Faith, somewhere about St. James'; though to say in what street I cannot: but any chairman will tell you where Sir Philip Modelove lives.

Free. Oh! you'll find him in the Park at eleven every day; at least I never pass through at that hour without seeing him there—But what do you intend?

Col. F. To address him in his own way, and find what he designs to do with the lady.

Free. And what then?

Col. F. Nay, that I can't tell; but I shall take my measures accordingly.

Sack. Well, 'tis a mad undertaking, in my mind; but here 's to your success, colonel.

[Drinks.

Col. F. 'Tis something out of the way, I confess; but fortune may chance to smile, and I succeed.

*Bold was the man who ventur'd first to sea,
But the first vent'ring lovers bolder were.
The path of love's a dark and dang'rous way,
Without a land-mark or one friendly star.
And he, that runs the risk, deserves the fair.*

[Exeunt.

SCENE II.—An Apartment in PRIM'S HOUSE.

Enter MISS LOVELY, and her maid BETTY.

Betty. Bless me, Madam! why do you fret and tease yourself so? This is giving them the advantage, with a witness.

Miss L. Must I be condemned all my life to the preposterous humours of other people, and pointed at by every boy in town!—Oh! I could tear my flesh and curse the hour I was born.—Isn't it monstrously ridiculous that they should desire to impose their quaking dress upon me at these years? When I was a child, no matter what they made me wear; but now—

Betty. I would resolve against it, Madam; I'd see 'em hanged before I'd put on the pinched cap again.

Miss L. Then I must never expect one moment's ease: she has rung such a peal in my ears already, that I shan't have the right use of them this month.—What can I do?

Betty. What can you not do, if you will but give your mind to it? Marry, Madam.

Miss L. What! and have my fortune go to build churches and hospitals?

Betty. Why, let it go.—If the colonel loves you, as he pretends, he'll marry you without a fortune, Madam; and I assure you a colonel's lady is no despicable thing.

Miss L. So you would advise me to give up my own fortune, and throw myself upon the colonel's!

Betty. I would advise you to make yourself easy, Madam.

Miss L. That's not the way, I'm sure. No, no, girl, there are certain ingredients to be mingled with matrimony, without which I may as well change for the worse as the better. When the woman has fortune enough to make the man happy, if he has either honour or good manners, he'll make her easy. Love makes but a slovenly figure in a house, where poverty keeps the door.

Betty. And so you resolve to die a maid, do you, Madam?

Miss L. Or have it in my power to make the man I love master of my fortune.

Betty. Then you don't like the colonel so well as I thought you did, Madam, or you would not take such a resolution.

Miss L. It is because I do like him, Betty, that I do take such a resolution.

Betty. Why, do you expect, Madam, the colonel can work miracles? Is it possible for him to marry you with the consent of all your guardians?

Miss L. Or he must not marry me at all, and so I told him; and he did not seem displeas'd with the news.—He promised to set me free; and I, on that condition, promised to make him master of that freedom.

Betty. Well! I have read of enchanted castles, ladies delivered from the chains of magic, giants killed, and monsters overcome; so that I shall be the less surpris'd if the colonel shall conjure you out of the power of your four guardians: if he does, I am sure he deserves your fortune.

Miss L. And shall have it, girl, if it were ten times as much.—For I'll ingenuously confess to thee, that I do love the colonel above all the men I ever saw:—There's something so jantee in a soldier, a kind of je ne scais quoi air, that makes them more agreeable than all the rest of mankind.—They command regard, as who shall say, We are your defenders; we preserve your beauties from the insults of rude and unpolished foes, and ought to be preferred before those lazy indolent mortals, who, by dropping into their father's estates, set up their coaches, and think to rattle themselves into our affections.

Betty. Nay, Madam, I confess that the army has engrossed all the prettiest fellows—A laced coat and a feather have irresistible charms.

Miss L. But the colonel has all the beauties of the mind as well as the body.—O all ye powers that favour happy lovers, grant that he may be mine! Thou god of love, if thou be'st aught but name, assist my Feignwell!

*Point all thy darts to aid his just design,
And make his plots as prevalent as thine.*

[Exeunt.

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The Park.

SIR PHILIP MODELVE on a bench, with a WOMAN masked.

Sir P. Well but, my dear, are you really constant to your keeper?

Wom. Yes, really, Sir.—Hey-day! who comes yonder? He cuts a mighty figure.

Sir P. Ha! a stranger; by his equipage keeping so close at his heels.—He has the appearance of a man of quality.—Positively French, by his dancing air.

Wom. He crosses, as if he meant to sit down here.

Sir P. He has a mind to make love to thee child.

Enter COLONEL.

Wom. It will be to no purpose if he does.

Sir P. Are you resolved to be cruel then?

Col. F. You must be very cruel indeed, if you can deny any thing to so fine a gentleman, Madam.

[Takes out his watch.

Wom. I never mind the outside of a man.

Col. F. And I'm afraid thou art no judge of the inside.

Sir P. I am positively of your mind, Sir; for creatures of her function seldom penetrate beyond the pocket.

Wom. Coxcombs!

[Aside, and exit.

Sir P. Pray, what says your watch? mine is down.

Col. F. I want thirty-six minutes of twelve, Sir.

[Puts up his watch, and takes out his snuff-box.

Sir P. May I presume, Sir.

Col. F. Sir, you honour me.

[Presenting the box.

Sir P. He speaks good English—though he must be a foreigner. [Aside.]—This snuff is extremely good—and the box prodigious fine: the work is French, I presume, Sir.

Col. F. I bought it in Paris, Sir.—I do think the workmanship pretty neat.

Sir P. Neat! 'tis exquisitely fine, Sir. Pray, Sir, if I may take the liberty of inquiring—what country is so happy to claim the birth of the finest gentleman in the universe? France, I presume.

Col. F. Then you don't think me an Englishman?

Sir P. No, upon my soul, don't I.

Col. F. I am sorry for't.

Sir P. Impossible you should wish to be an Englishman! Pardon me, Sir, this island could not produce a person of such alertness.

Col. F. As this mirror shows you, Sir. [Puts up a pocket-glass to Sir PHILIP'S face.] I know not how to distinguish you, Sir: but your mien and address speak you right honourable.

Sir P. Thus great souls judge of others by themselves—I am only adorned with knighthood: that's all, I assure you, Sir: my name is Sir Philip Modelove.

Col. F. Of French extraction?

Sir P. My father was French.

Col. F. One may plainly perceive it—There is a certain gaiety peculiar to my nation (for I will own myself a Frenchman) which distinguishes us every where.—A person of your figure would be a vast addition to a coronet.

Sir P. I must own I had the offer of a barony about five years ago, but I abhorred the fatigue which must have attended it.—I could never yet bring myself to join with either party.

Col. F. You are perfectly in the right, Sir Philip—a fine person should not embark himself in the slovenly concern of politics: dress and pleasure are objects proper for the soul of a fine gentleman.

Sir P. And love—

Col. F. Oh! that's included under the article of pleasure.

Sir P. Parbleu! il est un homme d'esprit. May I crave your name, Sir?

Col. F. My name is La Feignwell, Sir, at your service.

Sir P. The La Feignwells are French, I know; though the name is become very numerous in Great Britain of late years. I was sure you were French the moment I laid my eyes upon you; I could not come into the supposition of your being an Englishman: this island produces few such ornaments.

Col. F. Are you married, Sir Philip?

Sir P. No; nor do I believe I shall ever enter into that honourable state: I have an absolute tendre for the whole sex.

Col. F. That's more than they have for you, I dare swear. [Aside.] I find I was very much mistaken—I imagined you had been married to that young lady whom I saw in the chariot with you this morning in Gracechurch-street.

Sir P. Who, Nancy Lovely? I am a piece of a guardian to that lady: you must know, her father, I thank him, joined me with three of the most preposterous old fellows—that, upon my soul, I am in pain for the poor girl: she must certainly lead apes, ha, ha!

Col. F. That's a pity, Sir Philip. If the lady would give me leave, I would endeavour to avert that curse.

Sir P. As to the lady, she'd gladly be rid of us at any rate, I believe; and here's the mischief: he who marries Miss Lovely, must have the consent of us all four—or not a penny of her portion.—For my part, I shall never approve of any but a man of figure—and the rest are not only averse to cleanliness, but have each a peculiar taste to gratify.—For my part, I declare I would prefer you to all men I ever saw.

Col. F. And I her to all women—

Sir P. I assure you, Mr. Feignwell, I am for marrying her, for I hate the trouble of a guardian, especially among such wretches; but resolve never to agree to the choice of any one of them—and I fancy they'll be even with me, for they never came into any proposal of mine yet.

Col. F. I wish I had leave to try them, Sir Philip.

Sir P. With all my soul, Sir; I can refuse a person of your appearance nothing.

Col. F. Sir, I am infinitely obliged to you.

Sir P. But do you really like matrimony?

Col. F. I believe I could with that lady.

Sir P. The only point in which we differ.—But you are master of so many qualifications, that I can excuse one fault: for I must think it a fault in a fine gentleman: and that you are such, I'll give it under my hand.

Col. F. I wish you'd give me your consent to marry Miss Lovely, under your hand, Sir Philip.

Sir P. I'll do't, if you'll step into St. James' Coffee-house, where we may have pen and ink—though I can't foresee what advantage my consent will be to you, without you can find a way to get the rest of the guardians.—But I'll introduce you, however. She is now at a quaker's, where I carried her this morning, when you saw us in Gracechurch-street.—I assure you she has an odd ragout of guardians, as you will find when you hear the characters, which I'll endeavour to give you as we go along.—Hey! Pierre, Jaque, Renno.—Where are you all, scoundrels?—Order the chariot to St. James' Coffee-house.

Col. F. Le Noir, La Brun, La Blanc—Mortbleu, ou sont ces coquins la? Allons, Monsieur le Chevalier.

Sir P. Ah, pardonnez moi, Monsieur.

Col. F. Not one step, upon my soul, Sir Philip.

Sir P. The best bred man in Europe, positively.
[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—OBADIAH PRIM'S House.

Enter MISS LOVELY and MRS. PRIM.

Mrs. P. Then thou wilt not obey me: and thou dost really think those fal-lals become thee?
Miss L. I do, indeed.

Mrs. P. Now will I be judged by all sober people, if I don't look more like a modest woman than thou dost, Anne.

Miss L. More like a hypocrite, you mean, Mrs. Prim.

Mrs. P. Ah! Anne, Anne, that wicked Philip Modelove will undo thee.—Satan soffils thy heart with pride, during the three months of his guardianship, that thou becomest a stumblingblock to the upright.

Miss L. Pray, who are they? Are the pinched cap and formal hood the emblems of sanctity? Does your virtue consist in your dress, Mrs. Prim?

Mrs. P. It doth not consist in cut hair, spotted face, and a bare neck.—Oh the wickedness of the generation! the primitive women knew not the abomination of hooped petticoats.

Miss L. No; nor the abomination of cant neither. Don't tell me, Mrs. Prim, dont.—I know you have as much pride, vanity, self-conceit, and ambition among you, couched under that formal habit and sanctified countenance, as the proudest of us all; but the world begins to see your prudery.

Mrs. P. Prudery! What! do they invent new words as well as new fashions? Ah! poor fantastic age, I pity thee.—Poor deluded Anne, which dost thou think most resembleth the saint, and which the sinner, thy dress or mine? Thy naked bosom allureth the eye of the by-stander—encourageth the frailty of human nature—and corrupteth the soul with evil longings.

Miss L. And pray who corrupted your son Tobias with evil longings? Your maid Tabitha wore a handkerchief, and yet he made the saint a sinner.

Mrs. P. Well, well, spit thy malice. I confess Satan did buffet my son Tobias, and my servant Tabitha: the evil spirit was at that time too strong, and they both became subject to its workings—not from any outward provocation—but from an inward call: he was not tainted with the rottenness of the fashions, nor did his eyes take in the drunkenness of beauty.

Miss L. No! that's plainly to be seen.

Mrs. P. Tabitha is one of the faithful: he fell not with a stranger.

Miss L. So! then you hold wenching no crime, provided it be within the pale of your own tribe.—You are an excellent casuist, truly!

Enter OBADIAH PRIM.

Obad. Not stripped of thy vanity yet, Anne! Why dost thou not make her put it off, Sarah?

Mrs. P. She will not do it.

Obad. Verily, thy naked bosom troubleth my outward man: I pray thee hide it, Anne: put on a handkerchief, Anne Lovely.

Miss L. I hate handkerchiefs when 'tis not cold weather, Mr. Prim.

Obad. I have seen thee wear a handkerchief, nay, and a mask to boot, in the middle of July.

Miss L. Ay, to keep the sun from scorching me.

Obad. If thou couldst not bear the sunbeams, how dost thou think man can bear thy beams? Those breasts inflame desire: let them be hid, I say.

Miss L. Let me be quiet, I say. Must I be tormented thus for ever? Sure no woman's condition ever equalled mine! Foppery, folly, avarice, and hypocrisy, are, by turns, my constant companions—I cannot think my father meant this tyranny! No, you usurp an authority which he never intended you should take.

Obad. Hark thee, dost thou call good counsel tyranny? Do I or my wife tyrannise, when we desire thee in all love to put off thy tempting attire?

Miss L. I wish I were in my grave! Kill me rather than treat me thus.

Obad. Kill thee! ha, ha! thou thinkest thou art acting some lewd play sure.—Kill thee? Art thou prepared for death, Anne Lovely? No, no, thou wouldst rather have a husband, Anne.—Thou wantest a gilt coach, with six lazy fellows behind, to flaunt it in the ring of vanity, among the princes and rulers of the land—who pamper themselves with the fatness thereof; but I will take care that none shall squander away thy father's estate; thou shalt marry none such, Anne.

Miss L. Would you marry me to one of your own canting sect.

Obad. Yea, verily, no one else shall ever get my consent, I do assure thee, Anne.

Miss L. And I do assure thee, Obadiah, that I will as soon turn papist, and die in a convent.

Mrs. P. O wickedness!

Miss L. O stupidity!

Obad. O blindness of heart!

Miss L. Thou blinder of the world, don't provoke me—lest I betray your sanctity, and leave your wife to judge of your purity.—What were the emotions of your spirit—when you squeezed Mary by the hand last night in the pantry?—When she told you, you bussed so filthily? Ah! you had no aversion to naked bosoms, when you begged her to show you a little, little, little, bit of her delicious bosom—Don't you remember those words, Mr. Prim?

Mrs. P. What does she say, Obadiah?

Obad. She talketh unintelligibly, Sarah.—Which way did she hear this? This should not have reached the ears of the wicked ones:—verily, it troubleth me. [Aside.]

Enter SERVANT.

Serv. Philip Modelove, whom they call Sir Philip, is below, and such another with him: shall I send them up?

Obad. Yea.

[Exit SERVANT.]

Enter SIR PHILIP MODELOVE and COLONEL FEIGNWELL.

Sir P. How dost thou do, friend Prim? Odsso! my she friend here too! What, are you documenting Miss Nancy? Reading her a lecture upon the pinched coif, I warrant ye!

Mrs. P. I am sure thou didst never read her any lecture that was good.—My flesh so riseth at these wicked ones, that prudence adviseth me to withdraw from their sight. [Exit.]

Col. F. Oh, that I could find means to speak with her! How charming she appears! I wish, I could get this letter into her hand. [Aside.]

Sir P. Well, Miss, I hope thou hast got the better of them.

Miss L. The difficulties of my life are not to be surmounted, Sir Philip.—I hate the impertinence of him as much as the stupidity of the other. [Aside.]

Obad. Verily, Philip, thou wilt spoil this maiden.

Sir P. I find we still differ in opinion; but that we may none of us spoil her, pr'ythee, Prim, let us consent to marry her.—I have sent for our brother guardians to meet me here about this very thing.—Madam, will you give me leave to recommend a husband to you?—Here's a gentleman, whom, in my mind, you can have no objection to.

[Presents COLONEL; she looks another way.]

Miss L. Heaven deliver me from the formal and the fantastic fool!

Col. F. A fine woman—a fine horse, and fine equipage, are the finest things in the universe; and if I am so happy to possess you, Madam, I shall become the envy of mankind, as much as you outshine your whole sex.

[As he takes her hand, he tries to put a letter into it; it drops—PRIM takes it up.]

Miss L. I have no ambition to appear conspicuously ridiculous, Sir. [Turning from him.]

Col. F. So fail the hopes of Feignwell.

Miss L. Ha! Feignwell! 'tis he! What have I done? Prim has the letter, and it will be discovered. [Aside.]

Obad. Friend, I know not thy name, so cannot call thee by it; but thou seest thy letter is unwelcome to the maiden; she will not read it.

Miss L. Nor shall you; [Snatches the letter.] I'll tear it in a thousand pieces, and scatter it, as I will the hopes of all those that any of you shall recommend to me. [Tears the letter.]

Sir P. Ha! Right woman, 'faith!

Col. F. Excellent woman! [Aside.]

Obad. Friend, thy garb savoureth too much of the vanity of the age for my approbation; nothing that resembleth Philip Modelove shall I love; mark that,—therefore, friend Philip, bring no more of thy own apes under my roof.

Sir P. I am so entirely a stranger to the monsters of thy breed, that I shall bring none of them, I am sure.

Col. F. I am likely to have a pretty task by the time I have gone through them all; but she's a city worth taking, and 'egad I'll carry on the siege: if I can but blow up the outworks, I fancy I am pretty secure of the town. [Aside.]

Enter SERVANT.

Serv. Toby Periwinkle and Thomas Trade-love demand to see thee. [To SIR PHILIP.]

Sir P. Bid them come up. [Exit SERVANT.]

Miss L. Deliver me from such an inundation of noise and nonsense. Oh, Feignwell! whatever thy contrivance be, prosper it, heaven.

[Exit.]

Sir P. Sic transit gloria mundi!

Enter PERIWINKLE and TRADELOVE.

These are my brother guardians, Mr. Feignwell.—Pr'ythee, observe the creatures.

[Aside to COLONEL FEIGNWELL.]

Trade. Well, Sir Philip, I obey your summons.

Per. Pray, what have you to offer for the good of Miss Lovely, Sir Philip?

Sir P. First, I desire to know what you intend to do with that lady? Must she be sent to the Indies for a venture—or live an old maid, and then be entered amongst your curiosities, and shown for a monster, Mr. Periwinkle?

Col. F. Humph, curiosities; that must be the virtuoso. [Aside.]

Per. Why, what would you do with her?

Sir P. I would recommend this gentleman to her for a husband, Sir—a person whom I have picked out from the whole race of mankind.

Obad. I would advise thee to shuffle him again with the rest of mankind; for I like him not.

Col. F. Pray, Sir, without offence to your formality, what may be your objections?

Obad. Thy person, thy manners, thy dress, thy acquaintance,—thy every thing, friend.

Sir P. You are most particularly obliging friend. Ha, ha!

Trade. What business do you follow, pray, Sir?

Col. F. Humph, by that question he must be the broker. [Aside.] Business, Sir! the business of a gentleman.

Trade. That is as much as to say, you dress fine, feed high, lie with every woman you like, and pay your surgeon's bills better than your tailor's or your butcher's.

Col. F. The court is much obliged to you, Sir, for your character of a gentleman.

Trade. The court, Sir! What would the court do without us citizens?

Sir P. Without your wives and daughters, you mean, Mr. Tradelove.

Per. Have you ever travelled, Sir?

Col. F. That question must not be answered now. [Aside.] In books I have, Sir.

Per. In books! That's fine travelling indeed!—Sir Philip, when you present a person I like, he shall have my consent to marry Miss Lovely; till when, your servant. [Exit.]

Col. F. I'll make you like me before I have done with you, or I am mistaken. [Aside.]

Trade. And when you can convince me that a beau is more useful to my country than a merchant, you shall have mine; till then, you must excuse me. [Exit.]

Col. F. So much for trade—I'll fit you too. [Aside.]

Sir P. In my opinion this is very inhuman treatment, as to the lady, Mr. Prim.

Obad. Thy opinion and mine happen to differ as much as our occupations, friend: business requireth my presence, and folly thine; and so I must bid thee farewell. [Exit.]

Sir P. Here's breeding for you, Mr. Feignwell!—Gad take me.

Half my estate I'd give to see 'em bit.

Col. F. I hope to bite you all, if my plot hit.

[Exeunt]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Tavern.

COLONEL FEIGNWELL in an Egyptian dress, with SACKBUT.

Sack. A lucky beginning, colonel—you have got the old beau's consent.

Col. F. Ay, he's a reasonable creature; but the other three will require some pains. Shall I pass upon him, think you? 'Egad, in my mind, I look as antique as if I had been preserved in the ark.

Sack. Pass upon him! ay, ay, if you have assurance enough.

Col. F. I have no apprehension from that quarter; assurance is the cockade of a soldier.

Sack. Ay, but the assurance of a soldier differs much from that of a traveller—Can you lie with a good grace?

Col. F. As heartily, when my mistress is the prize, as I would meet the foe when my country called and king commanded: so don't you fear that part: if he don't know me again, I am safe.—I hope he'll come.

Sack. I wish all my debts would come as sure: I told him you had been a great traveller, had many valuable curiosities, and was a person of most singular taste: he seemed transported, and begged me to keep you till he came.

Col. F. Ay, ay, he need not fear my running away.—Let's have a bottle of sack, landlord; our ancestors drank sack.

Sack. You shall have it.

Col. F. And whereabouts is the trap-door you mentioned?

Sack. There's the conveyance, Sir. [Exit.]

Col. F. Now, if I should cheat all these roguish guardians, and carry off my mistress in triumph, it would be what the French call a grand coup d'eclat.—Ods! here comes Periwinkle.—Ah! deuce take this beard; pray Jupiter, it does not give me the slip, and spoil all.

Enter SACKBUT with wine, PERIWINKLE following.

Sack. Sir, this gentleman, hearing you have been a great traveller, and a person of fine speculation, begs leave to take a glass with you: he is a man of a curious taste himself.

Col. F. The gentleman has it in his face and garb; Sir, you are welcome.

Per. Sir, I honour a traveller and men of your inquiring disposition; the oddness of your habit pleases me extremely: 'tis very antique, and for that I like it.

Col. F. 'Tis very antique, Sir:—this habit once belonged to the famous Claudius Ptolemy, who lived in the year one hundred and thirty-five.

Sack. If he keeps up to the sample, he shall lie with the devil for a bean-stack, and win it every straw. [Aside.]

Per. A hundred and thirty-five! why, that's prodigious now!—Well, certainly 'tis the finest thing in the world to be a traveller.

Col. F. For my part, I value none of the modern fashions a fig-leaf.

Per. No more don't I, Sir: I had rather be the jest of a fool than his favourite—I am laughed at here for my singularity.—This coat, you must know, Sir, was formerly worn by that ingenious and very learned person, Mr. John Tradescant, of Lambeth.

Col. F. John Tradescant! Let me embrace you, Sir—John Tradescant was my uncle, by my mother's side; and I thank you for the honour you do his memory; he was a very curious man indeed.

Per. Your uncle, Sir—Nay, then it is no wonder that your taste is so refined; why you have it in your blood.—My humble service to you, Sir; to the immortal memory of John Tradescant, your never-to-be-forgotten uncle. [Drinks.]

Col. F. Give me a glass, landlord.

Per. I find you are primitive, even in your wine: Canary was the drink of our wise forefathers; 'tis balsamic, and saves the charge of 'pothecaries' cordials—Oh! that I had lived in your uncle's days! or rather, that he were now alive!—Oh! how proud he'd be of such a nephew!

Sack. Oh pox! that would have spoiled the jest. [Aside.]

Per. A person of your curiosity must have collected many rarities.

Col. F. I have some, Sir, which are not yet come ashore; as, an Egyptian idol.

Per. Pray what may that be?

Col. F. It is, Sir, a kind of an ape, which they formerly worshipped in that country: I took it from the breast of a female mummy.

Per. Ha, ha! our women retain part of their idolatry to this day; for many an ape lies on a lady's breast, ha, ha!

Sack. A smart old thief. [Aside.]

Col. F. Two tusks of an hippopotamus, two pair of Chinese nut-crackers, and one Egyptian mummy.

Per. Pray, Sir, have you never a crocodile?

Col. F. Humph! the boatswain brought one with a design to show it, but, touching at Rotterdam, and hearing it was no rarity in England, he sold it to a Dutch poet.—Lookye, Sir, do you see this little vial?

Per. Pray you, what is it?

Col. F. This is called polufosboio.

Per. Polufosboio!—It has a rumbling sound.

Col. F. Right, Sir; it proceeds from a rumbling nature.—This water was part of those waves which bore Cleopatra's vessel, when she sailed to meet Antony.

Per. Well, of all that travelled, none had a taste like you.

Col. F. But here's the wonder of the world. This, Sir, is called zona, or moros musphonon: the virtues of this are inestimable.

Per. Moros musphonon! What in the name of wisdom can that be?—to me, it seems a plain belt.

Col. F. This girdle has carried me all the world over.

Per. You have carried it, you mean.

Col. F. I mean as I say.—Whenever I am girded with this, I am invisible! and by turning this little screw, can be in the court of the great mogul, the grand signior, and king George, in as little time as your cook can poach an egg.

Per. You must pardon me, Sir, I can't believe it.

Col. F. If my landlord pleases, he shall try the experiment immediately.

Sack. I thank you kindly, Sir; but I have no inclination to ride post haste to the devil.

Col. F. No, no, you sha'n't stir a foot; I'll only make you invisible.

Sack. But if you could not make me visible again.

Per. Come, try it upon me, Sir; I am not afraid of the devil nor all his tricks.—'Sbud, I'll stand 'em all.

Col. F. There, Sir, put it on.—Come, landlord, you and I must face the east. [They turn.] Is it on, Sir?

Per. 'Tis on. [They turn again.]

Sack. Heaven protect me! where is he?

Per. Why here, just where I was.

Sack. Where, where, in the name of virtue? Ah, poor Mr. Periwinkle!—'Egad, look to't, you had best, Sir; and let him be seen again, or I shall have you burned for a wizard.

Col. F. Have patience, good landlord.

Per. But really don't you see me now?

Sack. No more than I see my grandmother, that died forty years ago.

Per. Are you sure you don't lie? Methinks I stand just where I did, and see you as plain as I did before.

Sack. Ah! I wish I could see you once again.

Col. F. Take off the girdle, Sir.

[He takes it off.]

Sack. Ah, Sir, I am glad to see you with all my heart.

[Embraces him.]

Per. This is very odd; certainly there must be some trick in't.—Pray, Sir, will you do me the favour to put it on yourself?

Col. F. With all my heart.

Per. But first I'll secure the door.

Col. F. You know how to turn the screw, Mr. Sackbut.

Sack. Yes, yes—Come, Mr. Periwinkle, we must turn full east.

[They turn; COLONEL sinks by the trap-door.]

Col. F. 'Tis done; now turn. [They turn.]

Per. Ha! mercy upon me; my flesh creeps upon my bones.—This must be a conjurer, Mr. Sackbut.

Sack. He's the devil, I think.

Per. Oh, Mr. Sackbut, why do you name the devil, when perhaps he may be at your elbow?

Sack. At my elbow! Marry, heaven forbid!

Col. F. Are you satisfied?

[From under the Stage.]

Per. Yes, Sir, yes—How hollow his voice sounds!

Sack. Yours seemed just the same—Faith, I wish this girdle were mine, I'd sell mine no more. Harkye, Mr. Periwinkle, [Takes him aside till the COLONEL rises again.] if he would sell this girdle, you might travel with great expedition.

Col. F. But it is not to be parted with for money.

Per. I am sorry for't, Sir, because I think it the greatest curiosity I ever heard of.

Col. F. By the advice of a learned physiognomist in Grand Cairo, who consulted the lines in my face, I returned to England, where he told me I should find a rarity in the keeping of four men, which I was born to possess for the benefit of mankind: and the first of the four that gave me his consent, I should present him with this girdle—Till I have found this jewel, I shall not part with the girdle.

Per. What can this rarity be? Didn't he name it to you?

Col. F. Yes, Sir: he called it a chaste, beautiful, unaffected woman.

Per. Pish! women are no rarities; women are the very gewgaws of the creation; playthings for boys, who when they write man they ought to throw aside.

Sack. A fine lecture to be read to a circle of ladies!

[Aside.]

Per. What woman is there, dressed in all the pride and foppery of the times, can boast of such a foretop as the cockatoo?

Col. F. I must humour him. [Aside.] Such a skin as the lizard?

Per. Such a shining breast as the humming-bird?

Col. F. Such a shape as the antelope?

Per. Or, in all the artful mixture of their various dresses, have they half the beauty of one box of butterflies?

Col. F. No; that must be allowed. For in part, if it were not for the benefit of mankind, I have nothing to do with them; for they are as in different to me as a sparrow or a flesh-fly.

Per. Pray, Sir, what benefit is the world to reap from this lady?

Col. F. Why, Sir, she is to bear me a son, who shall revive the art of embalming, and the old Roman manner of burying the dead; and for the benefit of posterity, he is to discover the longitude so long sought for in vain.

Per. 'Od! these are valuable things, Mr. Sackbut!

Sack. He hits it off admirably; and t'other swallows it like sack and sugar. [Aside.] Certainly this lady must be your ward, Mr. Periwinkle, by her being under the care of four persons.

Per. By the description, it should—'Egad, if I could get that girdle, I'd ride with the sun, and make the tour of the world in four-and-twenty hours. [Aside.] And you are to give that girdle to the first of the four guardians that shall give his consent to marry that lady, say you, Sir?

Col. F. I am so ordered, when I can find him.

Per. I fancy I know the very woman—her name is Anne Lovely.

Col. F. Excellent!—He said, indeed, that the first letter of her name was L.

Per. Did he really?—Well, that's prodigiously amazing, that a person in Grand Cairo should know any thing of my ward.

Col. F. Your ward!

Per. To be plain with you, Sir, I am one of those four guardians.

Col. F. Are you indeed, Sir? I am transported to find that the man who is to possess this moros musphonon is a person of so curious a taste—Here is a writing drawn up by that famous Egyptian, which if you will please to sign, you must turn your face full north, and the girdle is yours.

Per. If I live till the boy is born, I'll be embalmed, and sent to the Royal Society, when I die.

Col. F. That you shall, most certainly.

Enter DRAWER.

Draw. Here's Mr. Staytape, the tailor, inquires for you, colonel.

Col. F. Who do you speak to, you son of a whore?

Per. Ha! colonel.

Col. F. Confound the blundering dog!

Draw. Why to colonel—

Sack. Get you out, you rascal.

[Kicks him out.]

Draw. What the devil is the matter?

Col. F. This dog has ruined all my schemes, I see by Periwinkle's looks.

Per. How finely I should have been choused

—Colonel, you'll pardon me that I did not give you your title before—it was pure ignorance, faith it was. Pray—hem—hem! Pray, colonel, what post had this learned Egyptian in your regiment?

Col. F. A pox of your sneer! [Aside.] I don't understand you, Sir.

Per. No, that's strange! I understand you, colonel—An Egyptian of Grand Cairo! ha, ha, ha! I am sorry such a well-invented tale should do you no more service. We old fellows can see as far into a millstone as them that pick it. I am not to be tricked out of my trust—mark that.

Col. F. The devil! I must carry it off; I wish I were fairly out. [Aside.] Lookye, Sir, you may make what jest you please, but the stars will be obeyed, Sir; and depend upon't I shall have the lady, and you none of the girdle. Now for Mr. Freeman's part of the plot. [Aside; exit.]

Per. The stars! ha, ha! No star has favoured you, it seems. The girdle! ha, ha, ha! none of your legerdemain tricks can pass upon me. Why, what a pack of trumpery has this rogue picked up—His pagod, polufosbolo, his zonos, moros musphonons, and the devil knows what—But I'll take care—Ha, gone! Ay, 'twas time to sneak off Soho! the house!

Enter SACKBUT.

Where is this trickster? Send for a constable; I'll have this rascal before the lord mayor; I'll Grand Cairo him, with a pox to him—I believe you had a hand in putting this imposture upon me, Sackbut.

Sack. Who, I, Mr. Periwinkle? I scorn it. I perceived he was a cheat, and left the room on purpose to send for a constable to apprehend him, and endeavoured to stop him when he went out—But the rogue made but one step from the stairs to the door, called a coach, leaped into it, and drove away like the devil, as Mr. Freeman can witness, who is at the bar, and desires to speak with you; he is this minute come to town.

Per. Send him in. [Exit SACKBUT.] What a scheme this rogue has laid! How I should have been laughed at, had it succeeded!

Enter FREEMAN, booted and spurred.

Mr. Freeman, I had like to have been imposed on by the veriest rascal—

Free. I am sorry to hear it—The dog flew for't: he had not 'scap'd me, had I been aware of him; Sackbut struck at him, but missed his blow, or he had done his business for him.

Per. I believe you never heard of such a contrivance, Mr. Freeman, as this fellow had found out.

Free. Mr. Sackbut has told me the whole story, Mr. Periwinkle; but now I have something to tell you of much more importance to yourself—I happened to lie one night at Coventry, and knowing your uncle, Sir Toby Periwinkle, I paid him a visit, and, to my great surprise, found him dying.

Per. Dying!

Free. Dying, in all appearance; the servants weeping, the room in darkness; the 'pothecary, shaking his head, told me the doctors had given him over; and then there are small hopes, you know.

Per. I hope he has made his will—he always told me he would make me his heir.

Free. I have heard you say as much, and therefore resolved to give you notice. I should think it would not be amiss if you went down to-morrow morning.

Per. It is a long journey, and the roads very bad.

Free. But he has a great estate, and the land very good—Think upon that.

Per. Why that's true, as you say; I'll think upon it. In the mean time, I give you many thanks for your civility, Mr. Freeman, and should be glad of your company to dine with me.

Free. I am obliged to be at Jonathan's Coffee-house at two, and now it is half an hour after one; if I despatch my business, I'll wait on you; I know your hour.

Per. You shall be very welcome, Mr. Freeman, and so your humble servant. [Exit.]

Re-enter COLONEL FEIGNWELL and SACKBUT.

Free. Ha, ha, ha! I have done your business, colonel; he has swallowed the bait.

Col. F. I overheard all, though I am a little in the dark. I am to personate a highwayman, I suppose—that's a project I am not fond of; for though I may fright him out of his consent, he may fright me out of my life when he discovers me, as he certainly must in the end.

Free. No, no; I have a plot for you without danger; but first we must manage Tradelove—Has the tailor brought your clothes?

Sack. Yes, pox take the thief.

Free. Well, well, no matter; I warrant we have him yet—But now you must put on the Dutch merchant.

Col. F. The deuce of this trading plot—I wish he had been an old soldier, that I might have attacked him in my own way, heard him fight over all the battles of the late war. But, for trade, by Jupiter, I shall never do it.

Sack. Never fear, colonel: Mr. Freeman will instruct you.

Free. You'll see what others do: the coffee-house will instruct you.

Col. F. I must venture, however—But I have a further plot in my head upon Tradelove, which you must assist me in, Freeman; you are in credit with him, I heard you say.

Free. I am, and will scruple nothing to serve you, colonel.

Col. F. Come along then. Now for the Dutchman—Honest Ptolemy, by your leave.

Now must bob-wig and business come in play; A thirty thousand pound girl leads the way.

[Exeunt]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—JONATHAN'S Coffee-house in 'Change Alley.

Enter TRADELOVE and STOCK-JOBBERS, with rolls of paper.

I Stock. South-sea at seven-eighths; who buys?

Trade. Harkye, Gabriel, you'll pay the difference of that stock we transacted for't other day?

Gab. Ay, Mr. Tradelove, here's a note for the money.

Trade. I would fain bite the spark in the brow: coat: he comes very often into the alley, but never employs a broker.

Enter COLONEL FEIGNWELL and FREEMAN.

Trade. Mr. Freeman, your servant. Who is that gentleman?

Free. A Dutch merchant just come to England; but, harkye, Mr. Tradelove—I have a piece of news will get you as much as the French king's death did, if you are expeditious. [Showing him a letter.] Read there; I received it just now from one that belongs to the emperor's minister.

Trade. [Reads.] Sir,—As I have many obligations to you, I cannot miss any opportunity to show my gratitude: this moment my lord has received a private express, that the Spaniards have raised their siege from before Cagliari. If this proves of any advantage to you, it will answer both the ends and wishes of, Sir, your most obliged humble servant,

HENRICUS DUSSELDORP.

P. S. In two or three hours the news will be public.

May one depend upon this, Mr. Freeman?

[Aside to FREEMAN.]

Free. You may—I never knew this person send me a false piece of news in my life.

Trade. Sir, I am much obliged to you: 'egad, 'tis rare news—Who sells South-sea, for next week?

Stock. [All together.] I sell; I, I, I, I, I sell.

1 Stock. I'll sell five thousand for next week, at five eighths.

2 Stock. I'll sell ten thousand, at five eighths, for the same time.

Trade. Nay, nay; hold, hold; not all together, gentlemen: I'll be no bull; I'll buy no more than I can take: will you sell ten thousand pounds, at a half, for any day next week, except Saturday?

1 Stock. I'll sell it you, Mr. Tradelove.

[FREEMAN whispers to one of the Gentlemen.]

1 Gent. The Spaniards raised the siege of Cagliari? I don't believe one word of it.

[Aside.]

2 Gent. Raised the siege! as much as you have raised the Monument.

Free. 'Tis raised, I assure you, Sir.

2 Gent. What will you lay on't?

Free. What you please.

1 Gent. Why I have a brother upon the spot, in the emperor's service: I am certain, if there were any such thing, I should have had a letter.

2 Gent. I'll hold you fifty pounds 'tis false.

Free. 'Tis done.

2 Gent. I'll lay you a brace of hundreds upon the same.

Free. I'll take you.

Trade. I'll lay any man a brace of thousands the siege is raised.

Free. The Dutch merchant is your man to take in. [Aside to TRADELOVE.]

Trade. Does he not know the news?

Free. Not a syllable; if he did he would bet a hundred thousand pounds as soon as one penny—he's plaguy rich, and a mighty man at wagers.

[To TRADELOVE.]

Trade. Say you so?—'Egad, I'll bite him, if possible—Are you from Holland, Sir?

Col. F. Ya, mynheer.

Trade. Had you the news before you came away?

Col. F. What believe you, mynheer?

Trade. What do I believe? Why I believe that the Spaniards have actually raised the siege of Cagliari.

Col. F. What duyvel's news is dat? 'Tis niet waer, mynheer—'tis no true, Sir.

Trade. 'Tis so true, mynheer, that I'll lay you two thousand pounds on it.

Col. F. Two duysend pound, mynheer, 'tis gadaen—dis gentleman sal hold de gelt.

[Gives FREEMAN money.]

Trade. With all my heart—this binds the wager.

Free. You have certainly lost, mynheer; the siege raised indeed.

Col. F. Ik gelay't niet, mynheer Freeman, ik sal ye dumbled honden, if you please.

Free. I am let into the secret, therefore wont win your money.

Trade. Ha, ha, ha! I have snapped the Dutchman, 'faith, ha, ha! this is no ill day's work.—Pray, may I crave your name, mynheer?

Col. F. Myn naem, mynheer? myn naem is Jan Van Tintamirelereletta Heer Van Feignwell.

Trade. Zounds, 'tis a damned long name; I shall never remember it—Myn Heer Van, Tim, Tim, Tim—What the devil is it?

Free. Oh! never heed: I know the gentleman, and will pass my word for twice the sum.

Trade. That's enough.

Col. F. You'll hear of me sooner than you wish, old gentleman, I fancy. [Aside.] You'll come to Sackbut's, Freeman?

[Aside to FREEMAN.]

Free. Immediately. [Aside to the COLONEL.]

Trade. Mr. Freeman, I give you many thanks for your kindness—

Free. I fear you'll repent when you know all.

[Aside.]

Trade. Will you dine with me?

Free. I am engaged at Sackbut's: adieu.

[Exit.]

Trade. Sir, your humble servant. Now I'll see what I can do upon 'Change with my news.

[Exit.]

SCENE II.—The Tavern.

Enter FREEMAN and COLONEL FEIGNWELL.

Free. Ha, ha, ha! the old fellow swallowed the bait as greedily as a gudgeon.

Col. F. I have him, 'faith, ha, ha, ha! His two thousand pounds secure—If he would keep his money, he must part with the lady, ha, ha!

Enter SACKBUT.

Sack. Joy, joy, colonel! the luckiest accident in the world.

Col. F. What say'st thou?

Sack. This letter does your business.

Col. F. [Reads.] To OBADIAH PRIM, Hostler, near the Building called the Monument, in London.

Free. A letter to Prim! How came you by it?

Sack. Looking over the letters our post-woman brought, as I always do, to see what letters are directed to my house, (for she can't read, you must know,) I spied this, directed to Prim, so paid for it among the rest. I have given the old jade a pint of wine, on purpose to delay time, till you see if the letter be of any service; then I'll seal it up again, and tell her I took it by mistake.—I have read it, and fancy you'll like the project.—Read, read, colonel.

Col. F. [Reads.] Friend Prim, there is arrived from Pennsylvania, one Simon Pure, a leader of the faithful, who hath sojourned with us eleven days, and hath been of great comfort to the brethren.—He intendeth for the quarterly meeting in London; I have recommended him to thy house. I pray thee treat him kindly, and let thy wife cherish him, for he's of a weakly constitution—he will depart from us the third day; which is all from thy friend in the faith,

AMINADAB HOLDFAST.

Ha, ha! excellent! I understand you, landlord: I am to personate this Simon Pure, am I not?

Sack. Don't you like the hint?

Col. F. Admirably well!

Free. 'Tis the best contrivance in the world, if the right Simon gets not there before you—

Col. F. No, no, the quakers never ride post; and suppose, Freeman, you should wait at the Bristol coach, that if you see any such person, you might contrive to give me notice—

Free. I will.

[Bell rings.]

Sack. Coming, coming!

[Exit.]

Free. Thou must despatch Periwinkle first—Remember his uncle, Sir Toby Periwinkle, is an old bachelor of seventy-five—that he has seven hundred a year, most in abbey-land—that he was once in love with your mother; shrewdly suspected by some to be your father—That you have been thirty years his steward—and ten years his gentleman—remember to improve these hints.

Col. F. Never fear; let me alone for that—but what's the steward's name?

Free. His name is Pillage.

Col. F. Enough—Now for the country put.

Enter SACKBUT.

Sack. Zounds! Mr. Freeman, yonder is Trade-love in the damned'st passion in the world.—He swears you are in the house—he says you told him you were to dine here.

Free. I did so, ha, ha, ha! he has found himself bit already.

Col. F. The devil! he must not see me in this dress now.

Sack. I told him I expected you here, but you were not come yet.

Free. Very well—make you haste out, colonel, and let me alone to deal with him: where is he?

Sack. In the King's-head.

Free. Ay, ay, very well. Landlord, let him know I am come in—and now, Mr. Pillage, success attend you.

[Exit SACKBUT.]

Col. F. Mr. Proteus rather—

From changing shape, and imitating Jove,

I draw the happy omens of my love.

I'm not the first young brother of the blade,
Who made his fortune in a masquerade.

[Exit.]

Enter TRADELOVE.

Free. Zounds! Mr. Tradelove, we're bit, it seems.

Trade. Bit, do you call it, Mr. Freeman! I'm ruined.—Pox on your news.

Free. Pox on the rascal that sent it me.—

Trade. Sent it you! Why Gabriel Skinfint has been at the minister's, and spoke with him; and he has assured him 'tis every syllable false; he received no such express.

Free. I know it: I this minute parted with my friend, who protested he never sent me any such letter.—Some roguish stock-jobber has done it on purpose to make me lose my money, that's certain: I wish I knew who he was; I'd make him repent it—I have lost three hundred pounds by it.

Trade. What signifies your three hundred pounds to what I have lost? There's two thousand pounds to that Dutchman with a cursed long name, besides the stock I bought: the devil! I could tear my flesh—I must never show my face upon 'Change more;—for, by my soul, I can't pay it.

Free. I am heartily sorry for it! What can I serve you in? Shall I speak to the Dutch merchant, and try to get you time for the payment?

Trade. Time! Ad's heart! I shall never be able to look up again.

Free. I am very much concerned that I was the occasion, and wish I could be an instrument of retrieving your misfortunes; for my own, I value it not. Adso, a thought comes into my head, that, well improved, may be of service.

Trade. Ah! there's no thought can be of any service to me, without paying the money or running away.

Free. How do ye know? What do you think of my proposing Miss Lovely to him? He is a single man—and I heard him say he had a mind to marry an English woman—nay, more than that, he said somebody told him you had a pretty ward—he wished you had betted her instead of your money.

Trade. Ay, but he'd be hanged before he'd take her instead of the money: the Dutch are too covetous for that; besides, he did not know that there were three more of us, I suppose.

Free. So much the better; you may venture to give him your consent, if he'll forgive you the wager. It is not your business to tell him that your consent will signify nothing.

Trade. That's right, as you say; but will he do it, think you?

Free. I can't tell that; but I'll try what I can do with him.—He has promised to meet me here an hour hence; I'll feel his pulse, and let you know. If I find it feasible, I'll send for you; if not, you are at liberty to take what measures you please.

Trade. You must extol her beauty, double her portion, and tell him I have the entire disposal of her, and that she can't marry without my consent—and that I am a covetous rogue, and will never part with her without a valuable consideration.

Free. Ay, ay, let me alone for a pinch.

Trade. 'Egad, if you can bring this to bear, Mr. Freeman, I'll make you whole again: I'll pay the three hundred pounds you lost with all my soul.

Free. Well, I'll use my best endeavours.—Where will you be?

Trade. At home: pray heaven you prosper!—If I were but the sole trustee now, I should not fear it.

[Exit.]

Free. Ha, ha, ha!—he has it.

[Exit.]

SCENE III.—PERIWINKLE'S HOUSE.

Enter PERIWINKLE on one side, a FOOTMAN on the other.

Foot. A gentleman from Coventry inquires for you, Sir.

Per. From my uncle, I warrant you: bring him up.—This will save me the trouble, as well as the expense, of a journey.

Enter COLONEL, as MR. PILLAGE.

Col. F. Is your name Periwinkle, Sir?

Per. It is, Sir.

Col. F. I am sorry for the message I bring.—My old master, whom I served these forty years, claims the sorrow due from a faithful servant to an indulgent master. [Weeps.]

Per. By this I understand, Sir, my uncle, Sir Toby Periwinkle, is dead.

Col. F. He is, Sir, and has left you heir to seven hundred a year, in as good abbey-land as ever paid Peterpence to Rome. I wish you long to enjoy it, but my tears will flow when I think of my benefactor.—[Weeps.] Ah! he was a good man—he has not left many of his fellows, the poor lament him sorely.

Per. I pray, Sir, what office bore you?

Col. F. I was his steward, Sir.

Per. I have heard him mention you with much respect: your name is—

Col. F. Pillage, Sir.

Per. Ay, Pillage, I do remember he called you Pillage. Pray, Mr. Pillage, when did my uncle die?

Col. F. Monday last, at four in the morning. About two he signed his will, and gave it into my hands, and strictly charged me to leave Coventry the moment he expired; and deliver it to you with what speed I could; I have obeyed him, Sir, and there is the will. [Gives it to PERIWINKLE.]

Per. 'Tis very well; I'll lodge it in the Commons.

Col. F. There are two things which he forgot to insert, but charged me to tell you, that he desired you'd perform them as readily as if you had found them written in the will, which is to remove his corpse, and bury him by his father, at St. Paul's, Covent Garden, and to give all his servants mourning.

Per. That will be a considerable charge; a box of all modern fashions. [Aside.] Well! it shall be done, Mr. Pillage, I will agree with one of death's fashion-mongers, called an undertaker, to go down, and bring up the body.

Col. F. I hope, Sir, I shall have the honour to serve you in the same station I did your worthy uncle: I have not many years to stay behind him, and would gladly spend them in the family, where I was brought up.—[Weeps.]—He was a kind and tender master to me.

Per. Pray don't grieve, Mr. Pillage, you shall hold your place, and every thing else which you held under my uncle.—You make me weep to see you so concerned. [Weeps.] He lived to a good old age, and we are all mortal.

Col. F. We are so, Sir, and therefore I must beg you to sign this lease: you'll find, Sir Toby has taken particular notice of it in his will—I could not get it time enough from the lawyer, or he had signed it before he died.

[Gives him a Paper.]

Per. A lease! for what?

Col. F. I rented a hundred a year farm from Sir Toby upon lease, which lease expires at Lady-day next. I desire to renew for twenty years—that's all, Sir.

Per. Let me see. [Looks over the lease.] Very well—Let me see what he says in his will about it. [Lays the lease upon the table, and looks on the will.] Ho, here it is—The farm lying—now in possession of SAMUEL PILLAGE—suffer him to renew his lease—at the same rent.—Very well, Mr. Pillage, I see my uncle does mention it, and I'll perform his will.—Give me the lease.—[COLONEL gives it him, he looks upon it, and lays it upon the table.] Pray you step to the door, and call for pen and ink, Mr. Pillage.

Col. F. I have a pen and ink in my pocket, Sir, [Pulls out an ink-horn.] I never go without that.

Per. I think it belongs to your profession.—[He looks upon the pen while the COLONEL changes the lease and lays down the contract.] I doubt this is but a sorry pen, though it may serve to write my name. [Writes.]

Col. F. Little does he think what he signs.

Per. There is your lease, Mr. Pillage. [Aside, him the paper.] Now I must desire you to make what haste you can down to Coventry, and take care of every thing, and I'll send down the undertaker for the body; do you attend it up, and whatever charges you are at I'll repay you.

Col. F. You have paid me already, I thank you, Sir. [Aside.]

Per. Will you dine with me?

Col. F. I would rather not: there are some of my neighbours whom I met as I came along, who leave the town this afternoon, they told me, and I should be glad of their company down.

Per. Well, well, I won't detain you. I will give orders about mourning. [Exit COLONEL.] Seven hundred a year! I wish he had died seventeen years ago—what a valuable collection of rarities might I have had by this time!—I might have travelled over all the known parts of the globe, and made my own closet rival the Vatican at Rome—Odsso, I have a good mind to begin my travels now—let me see—I am but sixty: my father, grandfather, and great grandfather, reached ninety odd; I have almost forty years good: let me consider! what will seven hundred a year amount to in—ay; in thirty years, I say but thirty—thirty times seven is seven times thirty—that is—just twenty-one thousand pounds—'tis a great deal of money—I may very well reserve sixteen hundred of it for a collection of such rarities as will make my name famous to posterity—I would not die like other mortals, forgotten in a year or two, as my uncle will be—No,

With nature's curious works I'll raise my fame,
That men till doomsday may repeat my name.

[Exit.]

SCENE IV.—A Tavern.

FREEMAN and TRADELOVE over a bottle.

Trade. Come, Mr. Freeman, here's mynheer Jan, Van, Tim, Tam, Tam,—I shall never think of that Dutchman's name.

Free. Mynheer Jan Van Timamtirelereletta Heer Van Feignwell.

Trade. Ay, Heer Van Feignwell: I never heard such a confounded name in my life—here's his health, I say.

Free. With all my heart.

Trade. Faith, I never expected to have found so generous a thing in a Dutchman.

Free. As soon as I told him your circumstances, he replied, he would not be the ruin of any man for the world—and immediately made this proposal himself. Let him take what time he will for the payment, said he; or, if he'll give me his word, I'll forgive him the debt.

Trade. Well, Mr. Freeman, I can but thank you. 'Egad, you have made a man of me again! and if ever I lay a wager more, may I rot in jail.

Free. I assure you, Mr. Tradelove, I was very much concerned, because I was the occasion, though very innocently, I protest.

Trade. I dare swear you was, Mr. Freeman.

Enter COLONEL FEIGNWELL, dressed as a Dutch merchant.

Col. F. Ha, mynheer Tradelove, Ik been soory voor your troubles—maer Ik sal you easie maken, Ik will de gelt die hebben—

Trade. I shall for ever acknowledge the obligation, Sir.

Free. But you understand upon what condition, Mr. Tradelove; Miss Lovely.

Col. F. Ya, de frow sal al te regt setten, mynheer.

Trade. With all my heart, mynheer; you shall have my consent to marry her freely.

Free. Well then, as I am a party concerned between you, mynheer Jan Van Timantirélereletta Heer Van Feignwell shall give you a discharge of your wager under his own hand—and you shall give him your consent to marry Miss Lovely under yours—that is the way to avoid all manner of disputes hereafter.

Col. F. Ya, weeragtig.

Trade. Ay, ay, so it is, Mr. Freeman: I'll give it under mine this minute. [Sits down to write.]

Col. F. And so Ik sal. [Does the same.]

Free. So ho, the house!

Enter DRAWER.

Bid your master come up—I'll see there be wittnesses enough to the bargain. [Aside.]

Enter SACKBUT.

Sack. Do you call, gentlemen?

Free. Ay, Mr. Sackbut, we shall want your hand here.

Trade. There, mynheer, there's my consent as amply as you can desire; but you must insert your own name, for I know not how to spell it: I have left a blank for it.

[Gives the COLONEL a paper.]

Col. F. Ya, Ik sal dat well doen—

Free. Now, Mr. Sackbut, you and I will witness it. [They write.]

Col. F. Daer, mynheer Tradelove, is your discharge. [Gives him a paper.]

Trade. Be pleased to witness this receipt too, gentlemen.

[FREEMAN and SACKBUT put their hands.]

Free. Ay, ay, that we will.

Col. F. Well, mynheer, ye most meer doen, ye most myn voorsprach to de frow syn.

Free. He means you must recommend him to the lady—

Trade. That I will, and to the rest of my brother guardians.

Col. F. Wat voor, de duyvel heb you meer guardians?

Trade. Only three, mynheer.

Col. F. What donder heb ye myn betrocken, mynheer?—Had Ik dat gewoeten, Ik soude eaven met you geweest syn.

Sack. But Mr. Tradelove is the principal, and he can do a great deal with the rest, Sir.

Free. And he shall use his interest, I promise you, mynheer.

Trade. I will say all that ever I can think on to recommend you, mynheer; and if you please, I'll introduce you to the lady.

Col. F. Well, dat is waer—Maer ye must first spreken of myn to de frow, and to oudere gentlemen.

Free. Ay, that's the best way—and then I and the Heer Feignwell will meet you there.

Trade. I will go this moment, upon honour. Your most obedient humble servant. My speaking will do you little good, mynheer: ha, ha! we have bit you, faith: ha, ha!

Well—my debt's discharg'd, and as for Nan, He has my consent—to get her, if he can. [Exit.]

Col. F. Ha, ha, ha! this was a masterpiece of contrivance, Freeman.

Free. He hugs himself with his supposed good fortune, and little thinks the luck's on our side! But come, pursue the fickle goddess, while she's in the mood—Now for the quaker.

Col. F. That's the hardest task.

Of all the counterfeits perform'd by man, A soldier makes the simplest puritan.

[Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—An Apartment in PRIM's House.

MRS. PRIM and MISS LOVELY, in Quaker's dresses, meeting.

Mrs. P. So, now I like thee, Anne: art thou not better without thy monstrous hoop-coat and patches? If heaven should make thee so many black spots upon thy face, would it not fright thee, Anne?

Miss L. If it should turn you inside outward, and show all the spots of your hypocrisy, 'twould fright me worse!

Mrs. P. My hypocrisy! I scorn thy words, Anne: I lay no baits.

Miss L. If you did, you'd catch no fish.

Mrs. P. Well, well, make thy jests—but I'd have thee to know, Anne, that I could have catched as many fish (as thou call'st them) in my time, as ever thou didst with all thy foottraps about thee.

Miss L. Is that the reason of your formality, Mrs. Prim? Truth will out: I ever thought, indeed, there was more design than godliness in the pinched cap.

Mrs. P. Go, thou art corrupted with reading lewd plays, and filthy romances—Ah! I wish thou art not already too familiar with the wicked ones!

Miss L. Too familiar with the wicked ones! Pray, no more of those freedoms, Madam—I am familiar with none so wicked as yourself—How dare you thus talk to me! you, you, you, unworthy woman, you. [Bursts into tears.]

Enter TRADELOVE.

Trade. What, in tears, Nancy? What have you done to her, Mrs. Prim, to make her weep?

Miss L. Done to me! I admire I keep my senses among you; but I will rid myself of your tyranny, if there be either law or justice to be had. I'll force you to give me up my liberty.

Mrs. P. Thou hast more need to weep for thy sins, Anne—Yea, for thy manifold sins.

Miss L. Don't think that I'll be still the fool which you have made me. No, I'll wear what I please—go when and where I please—and keep what company I think fit, and not what you shall direct—I will.

Trade. For my part, I do think all this very reasonable, Miss Lovely; 'tis fit you should have your liberty, and for that very purpose I am come.

Enter PERIWINKLE and OBADIAH PRIM, with a letter in his hand.

Per. I have bought some black stockings of your husband, Mrs. Prim, but he tells me the glover's trade belongs to you; therefore, I pray you look me out five or six dozen of mourning gloves, such as are given at funerals, and send them to my house.

Obad. My friend, Periwinkle, has got a good windfall to-day—seven hundred a year.

Mrs. P. I wish thee joy of it, neighbour.

Trade. What, is Sir Toby dead then?

Per. He is! You'll take care, Mrs. Prim.

Mrs. P. Yea, I will, neighbour.

Obad. This letter recommendeth a speaker; 'tis from Aminadab Holdfast of Bristol: peradventure he will be here this night; therefore, Sarah, do thou take care for his reception.

[Gives her the letter.]

Mrs. P. I will obey thee.

[Exit.]

Obad. What art thou in the dumps for, Anne?

Trade. We must marry her, Mr. Prim.

Obad. Why truly, if we could find a husband worth having, I should be as glad to see her married as thou wouldst neighbour.

Per. Well said, there are but few worth having.

Trade. I can recommend you a man now, that I think you can none of you have an objection to!

Enter SIR PHILIP MODELOVE.

Per. You recommend? Nay, whenever she marries, I'll recommend the husband—

Sir P. What, must it be a whale, or a rhinoceros, Mr. Periwinkle? ha, ha, ha!

Per. He shall be none of the fops at end of the town, with full perukes and empty skulls,—nor yet any of our trading gentry, who puzzle the heralds to find arms for their coaches. No, he shall be a man famous for travels, solidity, and curiosity—one who has searched into the profundity of nature! When heaven shall direct such a one, he shall have my consent, because it may turn to the benefit of mankind.

Miss L. The benefit of mankind! What, would you anatomize me?

Sir P. Ay, ay, Madam, he would dissect you.

Trade. Or, pore over you through a microscope, to see how your blood circulates from the crown of your head to the sole of your foot—ha, ha! but I have a husband for you, a man that knows how to improve your fortune; one that trades to the four corners of the globe.

Miss L. And would send me for a venture perhaps.

Trade. One that will dress you in all the pride of Europe, Asia, Africa, and America—a Dutch merchant, my girl.

Sir P. A Dutchman! ha, ha! there's a husband for a fine lady.—Ya frow, will you meet myn slapen—ha, ha! he'll learn you to talk the language of the hogs, Madam, ha, ha!

Trade. He'll teach you that one merchant is of more service to a nation than fifty coxcombs. 'Tis the merchant makes the belle. How would the ladies sparkle in the box, without the merchant? the Indian diamond! the French brocade! the Italian fan! the Flanders lace! the fine Dutch holland! how would they vent their scandal over the teatables? and where would your beaux have Champagne to toast their mistresses, were it not for the merchant?

Obad. Verily, neighbour Tradelove, thou dost waste thy breath about nothing—All that thou hast said tendeth only to debauch youth, and fill their heads with the pride and luxury of this world.—The merchant is a very great friend to Satan, and sendeth as many to his dominions as the Pope.

Per. Right; I say, knowledge makes the man.

Obad. Yea, but not thy kind of knowledge—it is the knowledge of truth—Search thou for the light within, and not for baubles, friend.

Miss L. Ah, study your country's good, Mr. Periwinkle, and not her insects.—Rid you of your homebred monsters, before you fetch any from abroad.—I dare swear you have maggots enough in your own brain to stock all the virtuosos in Europe with butterflies.

Sir P. By my soul, Miss Nancy's a wit.

Obad. That is more than she can say of thee, friend.—Lookye, 'tis in vain to talk; when I meet a man worthy of her, she shall have my leave to marry him.

Miss L. Provided he be of the faithful—Was there ever such a swarm of caterpillars to blast the hopes of a woman! [Aside.] Know this, that you contend in vain: I'll have no husband of your choosing, nor shall you lord it over me long.—I'll try the power of an English senate—Orphans have been redressed and wills set aside—and none did ever deserve their pity more.—O Feignwell! where are thy promises to free me from these vermin? Alas! the task was more difficult than he imagined!

A harder task than what the poets tell

Of yore, the fair Andromeda befall;

She but one monster fear'd, I've four to fear,

And see no Perseus, no deliverer near. [Exit.]

Enter SERVANT.

Obad. The woman is mad.

Sir P. So are you all, in my opinion. [Exit.]

Serv. [Whispers to OBADIAH.] One Simon Pure inquireth for thee. [Exit.]

Obad. Friend Tradelove, business requireth my presence.

Trade. Oh, I shan't trouble you—Fox take him for an unmannerly dog—However, I have kept my word with my Dutchman, and I'll introduce him too for all you.

Enter COLONEL, in a Quaker's habit.

Obad. Friend Pure, thou art welcome: how is it with friend Holdfast, and all friends in Bristol? Timothy Littleworth, John Slenderbrain, and Christopher Keepfaith?

Col. P. A goodly company! [Aside.] They are all in health, I thank thee for them.

Obad. Friend Holdfast writes me word, that thou camest lately from Pennsylvania: how do all friends there?

Col. P. What the devil shall I say? I know just as much of Pennsylvania as I do of Bristol.

[Aside]

Obad. Do they thrive?

Col. F. Yea, friend, the blessing of their good works fall upon them.

Enter MRS. PRIM and MISS LOVELY.

Obad. Sarah, know our friend Pure.

Mrs. F. Thou art welcome. [He salutes her.]

Col. F. Here comes the sum of all my wishes—How charming she appears even in that disguise!

[Aside.]

Obad. Why dost thou consider the maiden so attentively, friend?

Col. F. I will tell thee: about four days ago I saw a vision—This very maiden, but in vain attire, standing on a precipice, and heard a voice which called me by my name—and bid me put forth my hand and save her from the pit.—I did so, and methought the damsel grew unto my side.

Mrs. P. What can that portend?

Obad. The damsel's conversion—I am persuaded.

Miss L. That's false, I'm sure—

[Aside.]

Obad. Wilt thou use the means, friend Pure?

Col. F. Means! what means? is she not thy daughter, already one of the faithful?

Mrs. P. No, alas! she's one of the ungodly.

Obad. Pray thee mind what this good man will say unto thee: he will teach thee the way thou shouldst walk, Anne.

Miss L. I know my way without his instruction: I hoped to have been quiet when once I had put on your odious formality here.

Col. F. Then thou wearest it out of compulsion, not choice, friend?

Miss L. Thou art in the right of it, friend—

Mrs. P. Art thou not ashamed to mimic the good man! Ah! thou stubborn girl.

Col. F. Mind her not; she hurteth not me—If thou wilt leave her alone with me, I will discuss some few points with her, that may perchance soften her stubbornness, and melt her into compliance.

Obad. Content: I pray thee put it home to her.—Come, Sarah, let us leave the good man with her.

Miss L. [Catching hold of PRIM; he breaks loose; exeunt OBAD. and MRS. P.] What, do you mean to leave me with this old enthusiastical canter? don't think, because I complied with your formality, to impose your ridiculous doctrine upon me.

Col. F. I pray thee, young woman, moderate thy passion.

Miss L. I pray thee, walk after thy leader, you will but lose your labour upon me.—These wretches will certainly make me mad!

Col. F. I am of another opinion! the spirit telleth me I shall convert thee, Anne.

Miss L. 'Tis a lying spirit, don't believe it.

Col. F. Say'st thou so? Why then thou shalt convert me, my angel.

[Catching her in his arms.]

Miss L. [Shrieks.] Ah! monster, hold off, or I'll tear thy eyes out.

Col. F. Hush! for heaven's sake—dost thou not know me? I am Feignwell.

Miss L. Feignwell!

Re-enter OBADIAH PRIM.

Oh, I'm undone! Prim here—I wish with all my soul I had been dumb.

Obad. What is the matter? why didst thou shriek out, Anne?

Miss L. Shriek out! I'll shriek and shriek again cry murder, thieves, or any thing, to drown the noise of that eternal babbler, if you leave me with him any longer.

Obad. Was that all? Fie, fie, Anne.

Col. F. No matter, I'll bring down her stomach, I'll warrant thee—Leave us, I pray thee?

Obad. Fare thee well. Verily, I was afraid the flesh had got the better of the spirit. [Exit.]

Col. F. My charming lovely woman!

[Embraces her.]

Miss L. What meanest thou by this disguise, Feignwell?

Col. F. To set thee free, if thou wilt perform thy promise.

Miss L. Make me mistress of my fortune, and make thy own conditions.

Col. F. This night shall answer all my wishes.—See here I have the consent of three of thy guardians already, doubt not but Prim will make the fourth. [OBADIAH listening.]

Obad. I would gladly hear what arguments the good man useth to bend her. [Aside.]

Miss L. Thy words give me new life, methinks.

Obad. What do I hear?

Miss L. Thou best of men, heaven meant to bless me sure, when I first saw thee.

Obad. He hath mollified her; O wonderful conversion!

Col. F. [Softly.] Ha! Prim listening.—No more, my love, we are observed: seem to be edified, and give 'em hopes that thou wilt turn quaker, and leave the rest to me. [Aloud.] I am glad to find that thou art touched with what I said unto thee, Anne; another time I will explain the other article unto thee: in the meanwhile, be thou dutiful to our friend Prim.

Miss L. I shall obey thee in every thing.

[OBADIAH comes forward.]

Obad. Oh, what a prodigious change is here! thou hast wrought a miracle, friend! Anne, how dost thou like the doctrine he hath preached?

Miss L. So well, that I could talk to him for ever, methinks—I am ashamed of my former folly, and ask your pardon.

Col. F. Enough, enough, that thou art sorry: he is no pope, Anne.

Obad. True, I am no pope, Anne. Verily, thou dost rejoice me exceedingly, friend: will it please thee to walk into the next room, and refresh thyself?—Come, take the maiden by the hand.

Col. F. We will follow thee.

Enter SERVANT.

Serv. There is another Simon Pure, inquireth for thee, master.

Col. F. The devil there is. [Aside.]

Obad. Another Simon Pure! I do not know him, is he any relation of thine?

Col. F. No, friend, I know him not.—Pox take him: I wish he were in Pennsylvania again, with all my soul. [Aside.]

Miss L. What shall I do?

Obad. Bring him up.

Col. F. Humph! then one of us must go down, that's certain.—Now, impudence assist me.

[Aside.]

Enter SIMON PURE.

Obad. What is thy will with me, friend?

Simon. Didst thou not receive a letter from Aminadab Holdfast, of Bristol, concerning one Simon Pure?

Obad. Yes, and Simon Pure is already here, friend.

Col. F. And Simon Pure will stay here, friend, if it be possible. [Aside.]

Simon. That's an untruth, for I am he.

Col. F. Take thou heed, friend, what thou dost say: I do affirm that I am Simon Pure.

Simon. Thy name may be Pure, friend, but not that Pure.

Col. F. Yea, that Pure which my good friend, Aminadab Holdfast, wrote to my friend Prim about: the same Simon Pure that came from Pennsylvania, and sojourned in Bristol eleven days: thou wouldst not take my name from me, wouldst thou?—till I have done with it. [Aside.]

Simon. Thy name! I am astonished!

Col. F. At what? at thy own assurance?

[Going up to him, SIMON PURE starts back.]

Simon. Avaunt, Satan, approach me not: I defy thee, and all thy works.

Miss L. Oh, he'll out-cant him.—Undone, undone for ever. [Aside.]

Col. F. Hark thee, friend, thy sham will not take—Don't exert thy voice, thou art too well acquainted with Satan to start at him, thou wicked reprobate—What can thy design be here?

Enter a SERVANT, who gives PRIM a letter.

Obad. One of these must be a counterfeit, but which I cannot say.

Col. F. What can that letter be?

Simon. Thou must be the devil, friend, that's certain; for no human power can speak so great a falsehood.

Obad. This letter sayeth that thou art better acquainted with that prince of darkness, than any here.—Read that, I pray thee, Simon.

[Gives it to the COLONEL.]

Col. F. [Reads.] There is a design formed to rob your house this night, and cut your throat; and for that purpose there is a man disguised like a quaker, who is to pass for one Simon Pure: the gang, whereof I am one, though now resolved to rob no more, has been at Bristol: one of them came in the coach with the quaker, whose name he hath taken; and, from what he hath gathered from him, formed that design, and did not doubt that he should impose so far upon you as to make you turn out the real Simon Pure, and keep him with you. Make the right use of this.

Adieu.

Excellent well!

[Aside.]

Obad. Dost thou hear this?

[To SIMON PURE.]

Simon. Yea, but it moveth me not; that doubtless is the impostor.

[Pointing at the COLONEL.]

Col. F. Ah! thou wicked one—now I consider thy face, I remember thou didst come up in the leathern conveniency with me—thou hadst a black bob-wig on, and a brown camel coat with brass buttons.—Canst thou deny it, ha?

Simon. Yes, I can, and with a safe conscience, too, friend.

Obad. Verily, friend, thou art the most impudent villain I ever saw.

Miss L. Nay, then, I'll have a fling at him. [Aside.] I remember the face of this fellow at Bath—Ay, this is he that picked my lady Raffle's pocket in the grove—Don't you remember that the mob pumped you, friend?—This is the most notorious rogue—

Simon. What does provoke thee to seek my life? Thou wilt not hang me, wilt thou, wrongfully?

Obad. She will do thee no hurt, nor thou shalt do me none; therefore get thee about thy business, friend, and leave thy wicked course of life, or thou mayest not come off so favourably every where. Simon, I pray thee, put him forth.

Col. F. Go, friend, I would advise thee, and tempt thy fate no more.

Simon. Yes, I will go; but it shall be to thy confusion; for I shall clear myself; I will return with some proofs that shall convince thee, Obadiah, that thou art highly imposed on. [Exit.]

Col. F. Then there will be no staying for me, that's certain—what the devil shall I do?

[Aside.]

Obad. What monstrous works of iniquity are there in this world, Simon?

Col. F. Yea, the age is full of vice—'Sdeath, I am so confounded I know not what to say.

[Aside.]

Obad. Thou art disordered, friend—art thou not well?

Col. F. My spirit is greatly troubled, and something telleth me, that though I have wrought a good work in converting this maiden, this tender maiden, yet my labour will be in vain; for the evil spirit fighteth against her: and I see, yea, I see with the eye of my inward man, that Satan will re-buffet her again, whenever I withdraw myself from her, and she will, yea, this very damsel will return again to that abomination from whence I have retrieved her, as it were, yea, as if it were out of the jaws of the fiend.

Miss L. I must second him. [Aside.] What meaneth this struggling within me? I feel the spirit resisteth the vanities of this world, but the flesh is rebellious, yea, the flesh—I greatly fear the flesh, and the weakness thereof—hum—

Obad. The maid is inspired. [Aside.] Prodigious! The damsel is filled with the spirit—Sarah.

Enter MRS. PRIM.

Mrs. P. I am greatly rejoiced to see such a change in our beloved Anne. I came to tell thee, that supper stayeth for thee.

Col. F. I am not disposed for thy food; my spirit lengthen for more delicious meat!—fain would I redeem this maiden from the tribe of sinners, and break those cords asunder wherewith she is bound—hum—

Miss L. Something whispers in my ears, methinks—that I must be subject to the will of this good man, and from him only must hope for consolation—hum—It also telleth me that I am a chosen vessel to raise up seed to the faithful, and that thou must consent that we two be one flesh according to the word—hum—

Obad. What a revelation is here! This is certainly part of thy vision, friend; this is the maiden's growing unto thy side: ah! with what willingness should I give thee my consent, could I give thee her fortune too—but thou wilt never get the consent of the wicked ones.

Col. F. I wish I was sure of yours. [Aside.]

Obad. Thy soul rejoiceth, yea, rejoiceth, I say, to find the spirit within thee; for lo, it moveth thee with natural agitation—yea, with natural agitation towards this good man—yea, it stirreth, as one may say—yea, verily I say, it stirreth up thy inclination—yea, as one would stir a pudding.

All. Hum!

Miss L. I see, I see! the spirit guiding of thy hand, good Obadiah Prim, and now behold thou art signing thy consent and now I see myself within thy arms, my friend and brother, yea, I am become bone of thy bone, and flesh of thy flesh. [Embracing him.] Hum—

Mrs. P. The spirit hath greatly moved them both—friend Prim, thou must consent; there's no resisting of the spirit!

Obad. Fetch me the pen and ink, Sarah—and my hand shall confess its obedience to the spirit.

[Exit Mrs. PRIM.]

Col. F. I wish it were over. [Aside.]

Re-enter MRS. PRIM, with pen and ink.

Miss L. I tremble lest this quaking rogue should return, and spoil all. [Aside.]

Obad. Here, friend, do thou write what the spirit prompteth, and I will sign it.

[Col. F. sits down.]

Col. F. [Reads.] This is to certify to all whom it may concern, that I do freely give all my right and title in Anne Lovely to Simon Pure, and my full consent that she shall become his wife according to the form of marriage. Witness my hand.

Obad. That's enough—give me the pen.

[Signs it.]

Enter BETTY, running to MISS LOVELY.

Betty. Oh! Madam, Madam, here's the quaking man again: he has brought a coachman, and two or three more.

Miss L. Ruined past redemption!

[Aside to the COLONEL.]

Col. F. No, no; one minute sooner had spoiled all; but now—here's company coming, friend, give me the paper.

[Going to PRIM hastily.]

Obad. Here it is, Simon; and I wish thee nappy with the maiden.

Miss L. 'Tis done; and now, devil, do thy worst.

Enter SIMON PURE, COACHMAN, and others.

Simon. Look thee, friend, I have brought these people to satisfy thee that I am not the impostor which thou didst take me for: this is the man that did drive the leathern conveyency, and brought me from Bristol—and this is—

Col. F. Look ye, friend, to save the court the trouble of examining witnesses—I plead guilty, ha, ha!

Obad. How's this? Is not thy name Pure then?

Col. F. No, really, Sir: I only made bold with this gentleman's name—but here I give it up safe and sound: it has done the business I had occasion for, and now I intend to wear my own, which shall be at his service upon the same occasion at any time.—Ha, ha, ha!

Simon. Oh! the wickedness of the age!

[Exit COACHMAN, &c.]

Obad. I am struck dumb with thy impudence, Anne; thou hast deceived me—and perchance undone thyself.

Mrs. P. Thou art a dissembling baggage, and shame will overtake thee. [Exit.]

Simon. I am grieved to see thy wife so much troubled: I will follow and console her. [Exit]

Enter SERVANT.

Serv. Thy brother guardians inquire for thee here is another man with them.

Miss L. Who can that other man be?

[To Col. F.]

Col. F. 'Tis Freeman, a friend of mine, whom I ordered to bring the rest of the guardians here.

Enter SIR PHILIP MODELOVE, TRADELOVE, PERIWINKLE, and FREEMAN.

Free. Is all safe? Did my letter do you service?

Col. F. All, all's safe! ample service.

Sir P. Miss Nancy, how dost do, child?

Miss L. Don't call me Miss, friend Philip; my name is Anne, thou knowest.

Sir P. What, is the girl metamorphosed?

Miss L. I wish thou wert so metamorphosed. Ah! Philip, throw off that gaudy attire, and wear the clothes becoming thy age.

Obad. I am ashamed to see these men.

[Aside.]

Sir P. My age! the woman is possessed.

Col. F. No, thou art possessed rather, friend.

Trade. Harkye, Miss Lovely, one word with you. [Takes hold of her hand.]

Col. F. This maiden is my wife, thanks to my friend Prim, and thou hast no business with her.

Trade. His wife! harkye, Mr. Freeman.

Per. Why you have made a very fine piece of work of it, Mr. Prim.

Sir P. Married to a quaker! thou art a fine fellow to be left guardian to an orphan truly—there's a husband for a young lady!

Col. F. When I have put on my beau clothes, Sir Philip, you'll like me better—

Sir P. Thou wilt make a very scurvy beau—friend—

Col. F. I believe I can prove it under your hand, that you thought me a very fine gentleman in the Park t'other day, about thirty-six minutes after eleven; will you take a pinch, Sir Philip?—One of the finest snuff-boxes you ever saw.

[Offers him snuff.]

Sir P. Ha, ha, ha! I am overjoyed, 'faith I am, if thou be'st the gentleman—I own I did give my consent to the gentleman I brought here to-day—but whether this is he I can't be positive.

Obad. Canst thou not!—Now I think thou art a fine fellow to be left guardian to an orphan.—Thou shallow-brained shuttlecock, he may be a pickpocket for aught thou dost know.

Per. You would have been two rare fellows to have been intrusted with the sole management of her fortune; would ye not, think ye? But Mr. Tradelove and myself shall take care of her portion.—

Trade. Ay, ay, so we will.—Didn't you tell me the Dutch merchant desired me to meet him here, Mr. Freeman?

Free. I did so, and I am sure he will be here, if you'll have a little patience.

Col. F. What, is Mr. Tradelove impatient? Nay, then, ik ben geroet voor your, he be, Jan Van Timantirelereletta Heer Van Feignwell vergeeten!

Trade. Oh! pox of the name! what have you tricked me too, Mr. Freeman?

Col. F. Tricked, Mr. Tradelove! did not I give you two thousand pounds for your consent fairly? And now do you tell a gentleman he has tricked you?

Per. So, so, you are a pretty guardian, 'faith, to sell your charge: what, did you look upon her as part of your stock?

Obad. Ha, ha, ha! I am glad thy knavery is found out, however—I confess the maiden over-reached me, and I had no sinister end at all.

Per. Ay, ay, one thing or other over-reached you all—but I'll take care he shall never finger a penny of her money, I warrant you—over-reached, quotha! Why I might have been over-reached too, if I had no more wit: I don't know but this very fellow may be him that was directed to me from Grand Cairo t'other day. Ha, ha, ha!

Col. F. The very same.

Per. Are you so, Sir? but your trick would not pass upon me.

Col. F. No, as you say, at that time it did not, that was not my lucky hour—but, harkye, Sir, I must let you into one secret—you may keep honest John Tradescant's coat on, for your uncle, Sir Toby Periwinkle, is not dead—so the charge of mourning will be saved, ha, ha, ha!—Don't you remember, Mr. Pillage, your uncle's steward? Ha, ha, ha!

Per. Not dead! I begin to fear I am tricked too.

Col. F. Don't you remember the signing of a lease, Mr. Periwinkle?

Per. Well, and what signifies that lease, if my uncle is not dead?—Ha! I am sure it was a lease I signed.—

Col. F. Ay, but it was a lease for life, Sir, and of this beautiful tenement, I thank you.

[Takes hold of Miss L.

Omnes. Ha, ha, ha! Neighbour's fare.

Free. So then, I find, you are all tricked, ha, ha!

Per. I am certain I read as plain a lease as ever I read in my life.

Col. F. You read a lease, I grant you; but you signed this contract.

[Showing a paper.

Per. How durst you put this trick upon me, Mr. Freeman? Didn't you tell me my uncle was dying?

Free. And would tell you twice as much to serve my friend, ha, ha!

Sir P. What, the learned and famous Mr. Periwinkle choused too!—Ha, ha, ha!—I shall die with laughing, ha, ha, ha!

Trade. Well, since you have outwitted us all, pray you, what and who are you, Sir?

Sir P. Sir, the gentleman is a fine gentleman.—I am glad you have got a person, Madam, who understands dress and good breeding.—I was resolved she should have one of my choosing.

Trade. A beau! nay, then she is finely helped up.

Miss L. Why beaux are great encouragers of trade, Sir, ha, ha, ha!

Col. F. Look ye, gentlemen—I am the person who can give the best account of myself; and I must beg Sir Philip's pardon, when I tell him, that I have as much aversion to what he calls dress and breeding, as I have to the enemies of my religion. I have had the honour to serve his majesty, and headed a regiment of the bravest fellows that ever pushed bayonet in the throat of a Frenchman; and notwithstanding the fortune this lady brings me, whenever my country wants my aid, this sword and arm are at her service.

And now, my fair, if thou'll but deign to smile,

I meet a recompense for all my toil:

Love and religion ne'er admit restraint,

And force makes many sinners, not one saint;

Still free as air the active mind does rove,

And searches proper objects for its love;

But that once fix'd, 'tis past the power of art

To chase the dear idea from the heart:

'Tis liberty of choice that sweetens life,

Makes the glad husband, and the happy wife

[Exeunt.

MIDAS:

AN ENGLISH BURLETTA,

IN TWO ACTS.

BY KANE O'HARA.

REMARKS.

The mythology of the ancients has furnished subjects for ridicule in this English burletta; but the deities of the heathens were almost too absurd for burlesque. The humour of this piece is considerable, though not always apparent on the stage; aided, however, by the powers of the orchestra, and the great vocal talent usually employed at our royal theatres, it never fails to please and attract. This piece was first performed as an opera, but found its appropriate place as an afterpiece.

ACT I.

SCENE I.

The curtain rising discovers the Heathen Deities, seated amidst the clouds, in full council: they address JUPITER in the following Chorus.

Jove, in his chair,
Of the sky lord mavor,

With his nods
Men and gods
Keeps in awe;
When he winks,
Heaven shrinks;
When he speaks,
Hell squeaks;
Earth's globe is but his taw,

Cock of the school,
He bears despotic rule;
His word,
Though absurd,
Must be law.
Even Fate,
Though so great,
Must not prate;
His bald pate
Jove would cuff,
He's so bluff,
For a straw.
Cow'd deities,
Like mice in cheese,
To stir must cease,
Or gnaw.

Jup. [Rising.] Immortals, you have heard your plaintive sov'reign,
And culprit Sol's high crimes. Shall we who govern,

Brook spies upon us? Shall Apollo trample
On our commands? We'll make him an example.
As for you, Juno, curb your prying temper, or We'll make you, to your cost know—we're your emperor.

Juno. I'll take the law. [To JUPITER.] My proctor, with a summons,
Shall cite you, Sir, t'appear at Doctors' Commons.
Jup. Let him—but first I'll chase from heaven your varlet.

Juno. What, for detecting you and your vile harlot!

AIR.

Think not, lewd Jove,
Thus to wrong my chaste love;
For, spite of your rakehelly godhead,
By day and by night,
Juno will have her right,
Nor be, of dues nuptial, defrauded.
I'll ferret the haunts
Of your female gallants;
In vain you in darkness enclose them;
Your favourite jades
I'll plunge to the shades,
Or into cows metamorphose them.

Jup. Peace, termagant—I swear by Styx, our thunder

Shall hurl him to the earth.—Nay, never wonder,
I've sworn it, gods.

Apol. Hold, hold, have patience,
Papa.—No bowels for your own relations!

AIR.

Be by your friends advised,
Too rash, too hasty dad!
Maugre your bolts and wise head,
The world will think you mad.
What worse can Bacchus teach men,
His roaring bucks, when drunk,
Than break the lamps, beat watchmen,
And stagger to some punk?

Jup. You saucy scoundrel—there, Sir.—Come, disorder,
Down, Phœbus, down to earth, we'll hear no further.

Roll, thunders, roll; blue lightnings flash about
him.

The blab shall find our sky can do without him.
[Thunder and lightning. JUPITER darts a bolt at him; he falls.—JUPITER re-assumes his throne, and the Gods all ascend together singing the initial chorus;

Jove in his chair, &c.

SCENE II.—A Champaign country, with a distant Village.

Violent storm of thunder and lightning. A shepherd sleeping in the field is roused by it, and runs away frightened, leaving his cloak, hat, and guitar, behind him.—APOLLO (as cast from Heaven) falls to the earth, with a rude shock, and lies for a while stunned; at length he begins to move, rises, advances, and looking forward, speaks.

Apol. Zooks! what a crush! a pretty, decent tumble!

Kind usage, Mr. Jove—sweet Sir, your humble.
Well, down I am;—no bones broke, though sore pepper'd!

Here doom'd to stay.—What can I do?—turn shepherd— [Puts on the cloak, &c.

A lucky thought.—In this disguise, Apollo
No more, but Pol the swain, some flock I'll follow.
Nor doubt I, with my voice, guitar, and person,
Among the nymphs to kick up some diversion.

Enter SILENO.

Sil. Whom have we here? a slightly clown!—
and sturdy:

Hum—plays, I see, upon the hurdy-gurdy.
Seems out of place—a stranger—all in tatters;
I'll hire him—he'll divert my wife and daughters.—
Whence, and what art thou, boy?

Pol. An orphan lad, Sir.

Pol is my name—a shepherd once my dad, Sir!
I th' upper parts here—though not born to serving,
I'll now take on, for faith I'm almost starving.

Sil. You've drawn a prize i th' lottery.—So have I too;

Why—I'm the master you could best apply to.

DUET.

Sil. Since you mean to hire for service,
Come with me, you jolly dog;
You can help to bring home harvest,
Tend the sheep, and feed the hog.

Fa, la, la
With three crowns, your standing wages,
You shall daintily be fed;

Bacon, beans, salt beef, cabbages,
Buttermilk, and oaten bread.

Fa, la, la
Come, strike hands, you'll live in clover,
When we get you once at home;
And when daily labour's over,
We'll dance to your strum-strum.

Fa, la, la
Pol. I strike hands, I take your offer,
Farther on I may fare worse;
Zooks, I can no longer suffer
Hungry guts and empty purse.

Fa, la, la
Sil. Do strike hands; 'tis kind I offer;
Pol. I strike hands, and take your offer;
Sil. Farther seeking you'll fare worse;

Pol. Farther on I may fare worse.

Sil. Pity such a lad should suffer,
Pol. Zooks, I can no longer suffer,
Sil. Hungry guts and empty purse,
Pol. Hungry guts and empty purse.

Fa, la, la
[Exeunt, dancing and singing.

SCENE III.—SILENO'S Farm-House.

Enter DAPHNE and NYSA.

Daph. But, Nysa, how goes on Squire Midas' courtship?

Nysa. Your sweet Dametas, pimp to his great worship,
Brought me from him a purse;—but the conditions—
I've cur'd him I believe of such commissions.

Daph. The moon calf! This must blast him with my father.

Nysa. Right. So we're rid of the two frights together.

Both. Ha, ha, ha!—ha, ha, ha!

Enter MYSIS.

Mysis. Hey-day! what mare's nest's found?
—For ever grinning:
Ye rantiholes—is't thus you mind your spinning?

AIR.

Girls are known
To mischief prone,
If ever they be idle.
Who would rear
Two daughters fair
Must hold a steady bridle.
For here they skip,
And there they trip,
And this and that way side.
Giddy maids,
Poor silly jades,
All after men are gadding;
They flirt pell-mell,
Their train to swell,
To coxcomb, coxcomb adding:
To every fop
They're cock-a-hoop,
And set their mothers madding.

Enter SILENO, introducing POL.

Sil. Now, dame and girls, no more let's hear you grumble
At too hard toil;—I chanc'd just now to stumble
On this stout drudge—and hir'd him—fit for labour.

To 'em, lad—then he can play, and sing, and caper.

Mysis. Fine rubbish to bring home; a strolling thrummer!

What art thou good for? speak, thou ragged mummer!

Nysa. Mother, for shame—

Mysis. Peace, saucebox, or I'll maul you.

Pol. Goody, my strength and parts you under-value,

For his or your work, I am brisk and handy,

Daph. A sad cheat else—

Mysis. What you, you jack-a-dandy?

AIR.

Pol. Pray, goody, please to moderate the rancour of your tongue:

Why flash those sparks of fury from your eyes?

Remember, when the judgment's weak,
The prejudice is strong:

A stranger why will you despise?

Ply me,

Try me,

Prove ere you deny me,

If you cast me
Off, you blast me
Never more to rise.

Pray, goody, &c.

Mysis. Sirrah, this insolence deserves a drubbing.

Nysa. With what sweet temper he bears all her snubbing!

Sil. Oons, no more words.—Go, boy, and get your dinner. [Exit POL.]

Fie, why so cross-grain'd to a young beginner?

Nysa. So modest!

Daph. So genteel!

Sil. [To MYSIS.] Not pert, nor lumpish.

Mysis. Would he were hang'd!

Nysa. Daph. La! mother, why so frumpish!

QUARTETTO.

Nysa. Mamma, how can you be so ill-natur'd
To the gentle, handsome swain?

Daph. To a lad so limb'd, so featur'd,
Sure 'tis cruel to give pain.
Sure 'tis cruel, &c.

Mysis. Girls, for you, my fears perplex me,
I'm alarm'd on your account:

Sil. Wife, in vain you tease and vex me,
I will rule, depend upon't.

Nysa. Ah! ah!

Daph. Mamma!

Nysa. Mamma, how can you be so ill-natur'd?

Daph. Ah, ah, to a lad so limb'd and featur'd?

Nysa. To the gentle, handsome swain,

Daph. Sure 'tis cruel to give pain;

Nysa. Sure 'tis cruel to give pain;

Daph. To the gentle, handsome swain.

Mysis. Girls, for you my fears perplex me,
I'm alarm'd on your account.

Sil. Wife, in vain you tease and vex me,
I will rule, depend upon't.

Nysa. Mamma!

Mysis. Pshaw! Pshaw!

Daph. Papa!

Sil. Ah! ah!

Daph. Mamma, how can you be so ill-natur'd,
Sil. Pshaw, pshaw, you must not be so ill-natur'd;

Nysa. Ah, ah, to a lad so limb'd, so featur'd?

Daph. To the gentle, handsome swain.

Sil. He's a gentle, handsome swain.

Nysa. Sure 'tis cruel to give pain.

Mysis. 'Tis my pleasure to give pain.

Daph. Sure 'tis cruel to give pain.

Sil. He's a gentle, handsome swain.

Nysa. To the gentle, handsome swain.

Mysis. To your odious, fav'rite swain.

[Exit.]

SCENE IV.—MIDAS' House.

Enter MIDAS and DAMETAS.

Mid. Nysa, you say, refus'd the guineas British,
Dam. Ah! please your worship—she is wondrous skittish.

Mid. I'll have her, cost what 'twill. Odsbobs,
I'll force her—

Dam. A halter—

Mid. As for madam; I'll divorce her.—
Some favour'd lout incog. our bliss opposes.

Dam. Ay, Pol, the hind, puts out of joint our noses.

Mid. I've heard of that Pol's tricks, of his sly tampering,

To fling poor Pan, but soon I'll send him scampering.

'Sblood, I'll commit him—drive him to the gallows! Where is old Pan?

Dam. Tippling, Sir, at th' alehouse.

Mid. Run fetch him—we shall hit on some expedient

To rout this Pol.

Dam. I fly; [Going: returns.] Sir, your obedient. [Exit.]

Mid. What boots my being squire,
Justice of peace, and quorum;
Churchwarden—knight o' the shire,
And custos rotulorum;
If saucy little Nysa's heart, rebellious,
My squireship slights, and hankers after fellows?

AIR.

Shall a paltry clown, not fit to wipe my shoes,
Dare my amours to cross?

Shall a peasant mix, when Justice Midas woos,
Her nose up at him toss?

No. I'll kidnap—then possess her:

I'll sell her Pol a slave, get mundungus in exchange:

So glut to the height of pleasure,
My love and my revenge.

No: I'll kidnap, &c. [Exit.]

SCENE V.—A Village Alehouse Door.

PAN is discovered sitting at a table, with a tankard, pipes, and tobacco before him; his bagpipes lying by him.

Pan. Jupiter wenches and drinks,
He rules the roast in the sky;
Yet he's a fool if he thinks

That he's as happy as I;

Juno rates him,
And grates him,

And leads his highness a weary life;
I have my lass,

And my glass,
And stroll a bachelor's merry life.
Let him fluster,

And bluster,

Yet cringe to his haridan's furbelow;

To my fair tulips,

I glue lips,

And clink the cannikin here, below.

Enter DAMETAS.

Dam. There sits the old soaker, his pate troubling little

How the world wags, so he gets drink and vittle,—
Hoa, Master Pan—'Gad you've trod on a thistle!
You may pack up your all, Sir, and go whistle.
The wenchies have turn'd tail—to yon buck ranter:
Tickled by his guitar—they scorn your chanter.

AIR.

All round the maypole how they trot.

Hot

Pot,

And good ale have got;

Routing,

Shouting,

At you flouting,

Fleering,

Jeering,

And what not

There is old Sileno frisks like a mad

Lad,

Glad

To see us sad:

Cap'ring,

Vap'ring,

While Pol, scraping,

Coaxes

The lasses

As he did the dad.

Round about, &c.

Enter MYISIS.

Mysis. O Pan! the devil to pay, both my sluts frantic!

Both in their tantrums, for yon cap'ring antic.

But I'll go seek 'em all—and if I find 'em,

I'll drive 'em—as if old Nick were behind 'em.

[Going.]

Pan. Soa, soa,—don't flounce;

Avast—disguise your fury.

Pol we shall trounce;

Midas is judge and jury.

AIR.

Mysis. Sure I shall run with vexation distracted,

To see my purposes thus counteracted!

This way, or that way, or which way soever,

All things run contrary to my endeavour.

Daughters projecting

Their ruin and shame,

Fathers neglecting

The care of their fame;

Nursing in bosom a treacherous viper;

Here's a fine dance—but 'tis he pays the piper.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE VI.—A Wood and Lawn near SILENO'S Farm.

A tender slow symphony: DAPHNE crosses, melancholy and silent; NYSA watching her.

Nysa. O ho; is it so—Miss Daphne in the dumps?

Mum—snug's the word—I'll lead her such a dance

Shall make her stir her stumps.

To all her secret haunts,

Like a shadow I'll follow and watch her;

And, faith, mamma shall hear on't if I catch her.

[Retires.]

Re-enter DAPHNE.

Daph. La; how my heart goes pit-a-pat; what thumping,

E'er since my father brought us home this burp-kin.

AIR.

He's as tight a lad to see to,

As e'er stopt in leather shoe;

And what's better, he'll love me too,

And to him I'll prove true blue.

Though my sister cast a hawk's eye,

I defy what she can do;

He o'erlook'd the little doxy,

I'm the girl he means to woo.

Hither I stole out to meet him,

He'll no doubt my steps pursue;

If the youth prove true, I'll fit him;

If he's false—I'll fit him too.

Enter POL.

Pol. Think o' the devil—'tis said,
He's at your shoulder—
This wench was running in my head,
And pop—behold her.

AIR.

Lovely nymph, assuage my anguish:
At your feet a tender swain,
Prays you will not let him languish,
One kind look would ease his pain.
Did you know the lad who courts you,
He not long needs sue in vain:
Prince of song, of dance, of sports—you
Scarce will meet his like again.
Daph. Sir: you're such an olio
Of perfection in folio,
No damsel can resist you:
Your face so attractive,
Limbs so supple and active,
That, by this light,
At the first sight,
I could have run and kiss'd you.

AIR.

If you can caper, as well as you modulate,
With the addition of that pretty face,
Pan, who was held by our shepherds a god o'late,
Will be kick'd out, and you set in his place.
His beard so frowsy, his gestures so awkward are,
And his bagpipe has so drowsy a drone,
That if they find you, as I did, no backwarder,
You may count on all the girls as your own.
Mysis. [From within.] Pol, Pol, make haste, come hither.

Pol. Death, what a time to call;
Oh! rot your old lungs of leather.

Daph. B'ye, Daph.
B'ye, Pol.

[Exit POL; NYSA comes forward.]

Nysa. Marry come up, forsooth,
Is't me, you forward vixen,
You choose to play your tricks on;
And could your liquorish tooth
Find none but my sweetheart to fix on?

Daph. Marry come up again,
Indeed, my dirty cousin!
Have you a right to every swain?

Nysa. Ay, though a dozen.

DUET.

Daph. My minikin Miss, do you fancy that Pol
Can ever be caught by an infant's doll?

Nysa. Can you, Miss Maypole, suppose he will fall
In love with the giantess of Guildhall?

Daph. Pigmy elf,
Nysa. Colossus itself,

Both. You will lie till you're mouldy upon the shelf.

Daph. You stump o'th' gutter, you hop o' my thumb,
A husband for you must from Lilliput
come.

Nysa. You stalking steeple, you gawky stag,
Your husband must come from Brobdgnag.

Daph. Sour grapes,

Nysa. Lead apes;

Both. I'll humble your vanity, Mistress Trapes.

Daph. Miss, your assurance,
Nysa. And, Miss, your high airs
Daph. Is past all endurance,
Nysa. Are at their last prayers.
Daph. No more of these freedoms, Miss Nysa,
I beg.
Nysa. Miss Daphne's conceit must be lower'd a peg.

Daph. Poor spite!

Nysa. Pride hurt!

Daph. Liver white!

Nysa. Rare sport!

Daph. Do show your teeth, spitfire, do, but you can't bite;

Nysa. This haughtiness soon will be laid in the dirt.

Poor spite, &c.

Pride hurt, &c.

[Exit; squabbling]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Grove.

Enter NYSA, followed by MIDAS.

Mid. Turn, tygress, turn: nay fly not—
I have thee at a why not.
How comes it, little Nysy,
That heart to me so icy
Should be to Pol like tinder,
Burn'd up to a very cinder?

Nysa. Sir, to my virtue ever steady:
Firm as a rock
I scorn your shock;
But why this attack?
A miss can you lack
Who have a wife already?

Mid. Ay, ay, there's the curse—but she is old and sickly;

And would my Nysa grant the favour quickly.
Would she yield now—I swear by the lord Harry,
The moment madam's coffin'd—her I'll marry.

AIR.

O what pleasures will abound
When my wife is laid in ground!

Let earth cover her,

We'll dance over her,

When my wife is laid in ground.

Oh how happy should I be,

Would little Nysa pig with me!

How I'd mumble her,

Touze and tumble her,

Would little Nysa pig with me!

Nysa. Young birds alone are caught with chaff,
At your base scheme I laugh.

Mid. Yet take my vows.—

Nysa. I would not take your bond, Sir,—

Mid. Half my estate—

Nysa. No, nor the whole—my fond Sir. [Exit.]

Mid. Well, master Pol I'll tickle,

For him, at least, I have a rod in pickle:

When he's in limbo,

Not thus our hoity-toity miss

Will stick her arms a-kimbo.

Enter PAN.

Pan. So, 'squire, well met—I flew to know your business.

Mid. Why, Pan, this Pol we must bring him on his knees.

Pan. That were a feat indeed;—a feat to brag on.

Mid. Let's home—we'll there concert it as we wag on;

I'll make him skip—

Pan. As St. George did the dragon. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Lawn before MIDAS' House.

Enter Nysa.

Nysa. Good lack! what is come o'er me!

Daphne has stepp'd before me!

Envy and love devour me,

Pol dotes upon her phiz hard!

'Tis that sticks in my gizzard.

Midas appears now twenty times more hideous:

Ah, Nysa, what resource?—a cloister.

Death alive—yet thither must I run,

And turn a nun,

Prodigious!

AIR.

In these greasy old tatters

His charms brighter shine:

Then his guitar he clatters

With tinkling divine:

But my sister,

Ah! he kiss'd her,

And me he pass'd by;

I'm jealous

Of the fellow's

Bad taste and blind eye. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—MIDAS' Parlour.

MIDAS, MYSIS, and PAN, discovered in consultation over a large bowl of punch, pipes, and tobacco.

Mid. Come, Pan, your toast—

Pan. Here goes our noble umpire.

Mysis. And Pol's defeat—I'll pledge it in a bumper.

Mid. Hang him, in every scheme that whelp has cross'd us.

Mysis. Sure he's the devil himself;

Pan. Or Doctor Faustus.

Mysis. Ah! 'squire—for Pan would you but stoutly stickle,

This Pol would soon be in a wretched pickle.

Pan. You reason right—

Mid. His toby I shall tickle.

Mysis. Look 'squire, I've sold my butter, here the price is

At your command, do but this job for Mysis.

Count 'em—six guineas and an old Jacobus,

Keep Pan, and shame that scape-grace coram nobis.

Mid. Goody, as 'tis your request,

I pocket this here stuff;

And as for that there peasant,

Trust me I'll work his buff.

At the musical struggle

I'll bully and juggle;

My award's

Your sure card;

'Blood, he shall fly his country—that's enough.

Pan. Well said, my lad of wax.

Mid. Let's end the tankard,

I have no head for business till I've drank hard.

Pan. Nor have my guts brains in them till they're addle,

When I'm most rocky, I best sit my saddle.

VOL. I. . . . U

Mid. Well, come, let's take one bouze, and roar a catch,

Then part to our affairs.

Pan. A match.

Mysis. A match.

TRIO.

Mid. Master Pol

And his toll de roll loll,

I'll buffet away from the plain, Sir

Pan. And I'll assist

Your worship's fist

With all my might and main, Sir.

Mys. And I'll have a thump,

Though he is so plump,

And makes such a wounded racket.

Mid. I'll bluff,

Pan. I'll rough,

Mys. I'll huff,

Mid. I'll cuff,

All. And I'll warrant we pepper his jacket.

Mid. For all his cheats,

And wenching feats,

He shall rue on his knees 'em.

Or skip, by goles,

As high as Paul's,

Like ugly witch on besom,

Arraigned he shall be,

Of treason to me!

Pan. And I with my davy will back it,

I'll swear,

Mid. I'll snare,

Mys. I'll tear,

All. O rare!

And I'll warrant we pepper his jacket.

SCENE IV.—A Landscape.

Enter SILENO and DAMETAS, in warm argument.

Sil. My Daph, a wife for thee; the 'squire's base pander!

To the plantations sooner would I send her.

Dam. Sir, your good wife approv'd my offers.

Sil. Name her not, hag of Endor, What knew she of thee but thy coffers?

Dam. And shall this ditch-born whelp, this jack-an-apes,

By dint of congees and of scrapes—

Sil. These are thy slanders and that canker'd hag's—

Dam. A thing made up of pilfer'd rags;

Sil. Richer than thou with all thy brags

Of flocks, and herds, and money bugs.

DUET.

Sil. If a rival thy character draw,
In perfection he'll find out a flaw;
With black he will paint,

Make a de'il of a saint,

And change to an owl a ma-caw.

Dam. Can a father pretend to be wise,

Who his friend's good advice would despise?

Who, when danger is nigh,

Throws his spectacles by,

And blinks through a green girl's eyes?

Sil. You're an impudent pimp and a grub.

Dam. You are fool'd by a beggarly scrub;

Your betters you snub.

Sil. Who will lend me a club,

This insolent puppy to drub?
 You're an impudent pimp and a grub,
Dam. You're cajol'd by a beggarly scrub,
Sil. Who will rot in a powdering tub,
Dam. Whom the prince of impostors I dub;
Sil. A guinea for a club,
Dam. You're bald pate you'll rub,
Sil. This muckworm to drub.
Dam. When you find that your cub,
Sil. Rub off, sirrah, rub, sirrah, rub.
Dam. Is debauch'd by a whipp'd syllabub.

[Exeunt.]

Enter MYSIS, attended by DAPHNE and NYSA.

Mysis. Soh! you attend the trial—we shall drive hence
 Your vagabond—
Sil. I smoke your foul contrivance.
Daph. Ah, Nys, our fate depends upon this issue—
Nysa. Daph—for your sake my claim I here forego;
 And with your Pol much joy I wish you.
Daph. O, gemini, say'st thou me so?
 Dear creature, let me kiss you.
Nysa. Let's kneel, and beg his stay, papa will back us.
Daph. Mamma will storm.
Nysa. What then? she can but whack us.

QUINETTO.

Daph. Mother, sure you never Will endeavour
 To dissever
 From my favour
 So sweet a swain;
 None so clever
 E'er trod the plain.
Nysa. Father, hopes you gave her,
 Don't deceive her,
 Can you leave her
 Sunk for ever
 In pining care?
 Haste and save her
 From black despair.

Daph. Think of his modest grace,
 His voice, shape, and face;

Nysa. Hearts alarming,
Daph. Bosoms warming,
Nysa. Wrath disarming,
Daph. With his soft lay:
Nysa. He's so charming,
 Ay, let him stay,

Both. He's so charming, &c.

Mysis. Sluts, are you lost to shame?
Sil. Wife, wife, be more tame.

Mysis. This is madness!
Sil. Sober sadness!
Mysis. I with gladness
 Could see him swing,
 For his badness.

Sil. 'Tis no such thing.
Dam. Must Pan resign to this fop his employment? [ment?]

Must I to him yield of Daph the enjoy-
Mysis. Ne'er while a tongue I brandish,
 Fop outlandish
 Daph shall blandish.

Dam. Will you reject my income,
 Herds and clinkum?

Sil. Rot and sink 'em.

Dam. Midas must judge.
Mysis. And Pol must fly.
Sil. Zounds, Pol shan't budge.
Mysis. You lie.
Dam. You lie.
Mysis. }
Dam. } You lie, you lie.
Sil. }

Enter MIDAS, enraged, attended by a crowd of Nymphs and Swains.

Mid. Peace, ho! Is hell broke loose? what means this jawing?

Under my very nose this clapper-clawing!

AIR.

What the devil's here to do,
 Ye loggerheads and gipsies?
 Sirrah you, and hussy you,
 And each of you tipsy is:
 But I'll as sure pull down your pride as
 A gun, or as I'm justice Midas!

Chorus. O, tremendous justice Midas!
 Who shall oppose wise justice Midas?

AIR.

Mid. I'm given to understand that you are all in a pother here;
 Disputing whether Pan or Pol shall pipe to you another year.

Do you think your clumsy ears so proper to decide, as

The delicate ears of justice Midas?

Chorus. O, tremendous, &c.

Mid. So you allow it then—ye mobbish rabble?—

Enter POL and PAN, severally.

Oh, here comes Pol and Pan—now stint your gab-
 ble. [ble
 Fetch my great chair—I'll quickly end this squab-

AIR.

Now I'm seated,
 I'll be treated
 Like the sophi on his throne;
 In my presence,
 Scoundrel peasants
 Shall not call their souls their own.
 My behest is,
 He who best is,
 Shall be fix'd musician chief;
 Ne'er the loser
 Shall show nose here.
 But be transported like a thief.

Chorus. O tremendous, &c.

Dam. Masters, will you abide by this condition

Pan. I ask no better.

Pol. I'm all submission.

Pan. Strike up, sweet Sir.

Pol. Sir, I attend your leisure.

Mid. Pan, take the lead,

Pan. Since 'tis your worship's pleasure.

AIR.

A pox on your pother about this or that;
 Your shrieking or squeaking, a sharp or a flat;
 I'm sharp by my bumpers, you're flat, master Pol;
 So here goes a set-to at toll de roll loll.

When beauty her rack of poor lovers would hamper,
 And after Miss Will-o'-the-Wisp the fools scamper;

Ding dong, in sing song, they the lady extol:
Pray what's all this fuss for, but—toll de roll loll.

Mankind are a medley—a chance-medley race;
All start in full cry, to give dame Fortune chase:
There's catch as catch can, hit or miss, luck is all;
And luck's the best tune of life's toll de roll loll.

I've done, please your worship, 'tis rather too long;
[Mid. Not at all.]

I only meant life is but an old song:
The world's but a tragedy, comedy, droll;
Where all act the scene of toll de roll loll.

Mid. By jingo, well perform'd for one of his age;
Now, hang dog, don't you blush to show your visage?

Pol. Why, master Midas, for that matter,
'Tis enough to dash one,
To hear the arbitrator,
In such unseemly fashion,
One of the candidates hespatter,
With so much partial passion.

[MIDAS falls asleep.]

AIR.

Ah, happy hours, how fleeting,
Ye danc'd on down away;
When, my soft vows repeating,
At Daphne's feet I lay:
But from her charms when sunder'd,
As Midas' frowns presage,
Each hour will seem a hundred;
Each day appear an age.

Mid. Silence—this just decree, all at your peril,
Obedient hear—else I shall use you very ill.

THE DECREE.

Pan shall remain,
Pol quit the plain.

Chorus. O, tremendous, &c.

Mid. All bow with me to mighty Pan—enthroned him—
No pouting—and with festal chorus crown him—
[The crowd form two ranks beside the chair, and join in the Chorus, whilst MIDAS crowns him with bays.]

Chorus. See triumphant sits the bard,
Crown'd with bays, his due reward;
Exil'd Pol shall wander far;
Exil'd, twang his faint guitar;
While with echoing shouts of praise,
We the bagpipe's glory raise.

Mid. 'Tis well.—What keeps you here, you ragamuffin?

Go trudge—or do you wait for a good cuffing?

Pol. Now all attend—

[Throws off his disguise, and appears as APOLLO.]

The wrath of Jove for rapine,
Corruption, lust, pride, fraud, there's no escaping.
Tremble, thou wretch; thou stretch'd the utmost tether;

Thou and thy tools shall go to pot together.

AIR.

Dunce I did but sham,
For Apollo I am,
God of music, and king of Parnass;
Thy scurvy decree,
For Pan against me,
I reward with the ears of an ass.

Mid. Detected, balk'd, and small,
On our marrow-bones we fall.

Mysis. Be merciful.

Dam. Be pitiful.

Mid. Forgive us, mighty Sol.—Alas! alas!

FINALE.

Apol. Thou, a Billingsgate quean,

Thou, a pandar obscene, [To MYSIS.
With strumpets and bailiffs shall class;

Thou driven from man, [To MIDAS.

Shalt wander with Pan;
He a stinking old goat, thou an ass, an ass, &c.
Be thou squire—his estate [To SILENO.
To thee I translate.

To you his strong chests, wicked mass;
[To DAPHNE and NYSA.

Live happy, while I,
Recall'd to the sky,
Make all the gods laugh at Midas.

Daph. Sil. Nysa, } To the bright god of day, together with the } Let us dance, sing, and play;
other Nymphs and } Clap hands every lad with Swains. } his lass.

Daph. Now, critics, lie snug,

Not a hiss, groan, or shrug;
Remember the fate of Midas, Midas;
Remember the fate of Midas.

Chorus. Now, critics, lie snug, &c.

DOUGLAS.

A TRAGEDY,

IN FIVE ACTS.

BY JOHN HOME.

REMARKS.

THIS beautiful tragedy, suggested by the old Scots ballad of Gil (or Childe) Morris, was first performed at Edinburgh, in 1736, and in the following year at Covent Garden Theatre. Mr. Home, who was a Scots clergyman, incurred rigorous censure from the elders of the kirk, for adorning the stage with this pathetic and interesting composition. Persecution usually defeats its own purpose: disgracefully expelled the kirk, he resigned his living and preferments, seeking protection from the liberality of England, where the piece was received with well-deserved applause, and its author rewarded with a pension from his late Majesty, then Prince of Wales.

During the representation in Edinburgh, a young North Briton stood up in the pit and exclaimed, with an air of triumph, "Weel, lads what think ye o' Wully Shakspeare now?"

Among other great testimonies to the merit of this play, Mr. David Hume, the historian, gave it a preference to the Merope of Maffei, and to that of Voltaire, which it resembles in its subject; and Mr. Gray observes, in a letter, 1757; "There is one scene (between Matilda and the Peasant) so masterly, that it strikes me blind to all the defects in the world."

ACT I.

SCENE I.—The Court of a Castle, surrounded with woods.

Enter LADY RANDOLPH.

Lady R. Ye woods and wilds, whose melancholy gloom
Accords with my soul's sadness, and draws forth
The voice of sorrow from my bursting heart,
Farewell awhile! I will not leave you long;
For in your shades I deem some spirit dwells,

Who, from the chiding stream, or groaning oak,
Still hears and answers to Matilda's moan.
Oh, Douglas! Douglas! if departed ghosts
Are e'er permitted to review this world,
Within the circle of that wood thou art,
And with the passion of immortals hear'st
My lamentation: hear'st thy wretched wife
Weep for her husband slain, her infant lost.
My brother's timeless death I seem to mourn,
Who perish'd with thee on that fatal day.
But Randolph comes, whom fate has made my lord
To chide my anguish, and defraud the dead.

Enter LORD RANDOLPH.

Lord R. Again these weeds of woe! say dost thou well

To feed a passion which consumes thy life?
The living claim some duty; vainly thou
Bestow'st thy cares upon the silent dead.

Lady R. Silent, alas! is he for whom I mourn:
Childless, without memorial of his name,
He only now in my remembrance lives.

Lord R. Time, that wears out the trace of deepest anguish,
Has pass'd o'er thee in vain.

Sure thou art not the daughter of Sir Malcolm:
Strong was his rage, eternal his resentment:
For when thy brother fell, he smil'd to hear
That Douglas' son in the same field was slain.

Lady R. Oh! rake not up the ashes of my fathers:

Implacable resentment was their crime,
And grievous has the expiation been.

Lord R. Thy grief wrests to its purposes my words.

I never ask'd of thee that ardent love
Which in the breasts of fancy's children burns.
Decent affection and complacent kindness
Were all I wish'd for; but I wish'd in vain.
Hence with the less regret my eyes behold
The storm of war that gathers o'er this land:
If I should perish by the Danish sword,
Matilda would not shed one tear the more.

Lady R. Thou dost not think so: woful as I am,
I love thy merit, and esteem thy virtues.
But whither goest thou now?

Lord R. Straight to the camp,
Where every warrior on the tiptoe stands
Of expectation, and impatient asks
Each who arrives, if he is come to tell,
The Danes are landed.

Lady R. O, may adverse winds
Far from the coast of Scotland drive their fleet!
And every soldier of both hosts return
In peace and safety to his peaceful home!

Lord R. Thou speak'st a woman's, hear a warrior's wish;

Right from their native land, the stormy north
May the wind blow, till every keel is fixed Immoveable in Caledonia's strand!

Then shall our foes repent their bold invasion,
And roving armies shun the fatal shore.

Lady. farewell: I leave thee not alone;

Yonder comes one whose love makes duty light.

[Exit.]

Enter ANNA.

Anna. Forgive the rashness of your Anna's
love:

Urg'd by affection, I have thus presum'd
To interrupt your solitary thoughts;
And warn you of the hours that you neglect,
And lose in sadness.

Lady R. So to lose my hours
Is all the use I wish to make of time.

Anna. To blame thee, lady, suits not with my state:

But sure I am, since death first preyed on man,
Never did sister thus a brother mourn.

What had your sorrows been if you had lost,
In early youth, the husband of your heart?

Lady R. Oh!

Anna. Have I distressed you with officious love,
And ill-tim'd mention of your brother's fate!

Forgive me, lady: humble though I am,
The mind I bear partakes not of my fortune:
So fervently I love you, that to dry
These piteous tears, I'd throw my life away.

Lady R. What power directed thy unconscious tongue

To speak as thou hast done? to name——

Anna. I know not:

But since my words have made my mistress tremble,

I will speak no more; but silent mix
My tears with hers.

Lady R. No, thou shalt not be silent:
I'll trust thy faithful love, and thou shalt be Henceforth the instructed partner of my woes.

But what avails it? Can thy feeble pity
Roll back the flood of never-ebbing time?
Compel the earth and ocean to give up
Their dead, alive?

Anna. What means my noble mistress?

Lady R. Didst thou not ask, what had my sorrows been,

If I in early youth had lost a husband?
In the cold bosom of the earth is lodg'd,
Mangled with wounds, the husband of my youth;
And in some cavern of the ocean lies
My child and his——

Anna. Oh! lady most rever'd!

The tale wrapt up in your amazing words
Deign to unfold.

Lady R. Alas! an ancient feud,
Hereditary evil, was the source
Of my misfortunes. Ruling fate decreed
That my brave brother should in battle save
The life of Douglas' son, our house's foe;
The youthful warriors vow'd eternal friendship.
To see the vaunted sister of his friend,
Impatient, Douglas to Balarmo came,
Under a borrow'd name. My heart he gain'd,
Nor did I long refuse the hand he begg'd:
My brother's presence authoriz'd our marriage.
Three weeks, three little weeks, with wings of
down,

Had o'er us flown, when my lov'd lord was call'd
To fight his father's battles; and with him,
In spite of all my tears, did Malcolm go.
Scarce were they gone, when my stern sire was told,

That the false stranger was lord Douglas' son.
Frantic with rage, the baron drew his sword,
And question'd me. Alone, forsaken, faint,
Kneeling beneath his sword, faltering, I took An oath equivocal, that I ne'er would Wed one of Douglas' name. Sincerity!
Thou first of virtues, let no mortal leave
Thy onward path, (although the earth should gape,
And from the gulf of hell destruction cry,
To take dissimulation's winding way!

Anna. Alas! how few of women's fearful kind
Durst own a truth so hardy!

Lady R. 'Tis the first truth

Is easiest to avow. This moral learn,
This precious moral, from my magic tale.——

In a few days the dreadful tidings came
That Douglas and my brother both were slain.

My lord! my life! my husband!—mighty God!
What had I done to merit such affliction?

Anna. My dearest lady, many a tale of tears
I've listened to; but never did I hear
A tale so sad as this.

Lady R. In the first days
Of my distracting grief, I found myself

As women wish to be who love their lords,
 But who durst tell my father? the good priest
 Who join'd our hands, my brother's ancient tutor,
 With his lov'd Malcolm, in the battle fut:
 They two alone were privy to the marriage.
 On silence and concealment I resolv'd,
 Till time should make my father's fortune mine.
 That very night on which my son was born,
 My nurse, the only confidante I had,
 Set out with him to reach her sister's house:
 But nurse nor infant have I ever seen,
 Or heard of, Anna, since that fatal hour.

Anna. Not seen nor heard of! then perhaps he lives.

Lady R. No. It was dark December; wind and rain

Had beat all night. Across the Carron lay
 The destin'd road, and in its swelling flood
 My faithful servant perish'd with my child.
 Oh! had I died when my lov'd husband fell!
 Had some good angel op'd to me the book
 Of Providence, and let me read my life,
 My heart had broke, when I beheld the sum
 Of ills, which one by one I have endur'd.

Anna. That God, whose ministers good angels are,

Hath shut the book, in mercy to mankind.
 But we must leave this theme: Glenalvon comes:
 I saw him bend on you his thoughtful eyes,
 And hitherwards he slowly stalks his way.

Lady R. I will avoid him. An ungracious person

Is doubly irksome in an hour like this.

Anna. Why speaks my lady thus of Randolph's heir?

Lady R. Because he's not the heir of Randolph's virtues.

Subtle and shrewd, he offers to mankind
 An artificial image of himself:

Yet is he brave and politic in war,
 And stands aloft in these unruly times.

Why I describe him thus I'll tell hereafter.
 Stay and detain him till I reach the castle.

[Exit.

Anna. Oh happiness! where art thou to be found?

I see thou dwellest not with birth and beauty,
 Though grac'd with grandeur, and in wealth array'd;

Nor dost thou, it would seem, with virtue dwell;
 Else had this gentle lady miss'd thee not.

Enter GLENALVON.

Glen. What dost thou muse on, meditating maid?

Like some entranc'd and visionary seer,
 On earth thou stand'st, thy thoughts ascend to heaven.

Anna. Would that I were, e'en as thou say'st, a seer,

To have my doubts by heavenly vision clear'd.

Glen. What dost thou doubt of? What hast thou to do

With subjects intricate? Thy youth, thy beauty,
 Cannot be question'd; think of these good gifts;
 And then thy contemplations will be pleasing.

Anna. Let women view yon monument of woe,
 Then boast of beauty; who so fair as she?

But I must follow; this revolving day
 Awakes the memory of her ancient woes. [Exit.

Glen. So!—Lady Randolph shuns me and by

I'll woo her as the lion woos his brides.

The deed's a doing now, that makes me lord

Of these rich valleys, and a chief of power.

The season is most apt; my sounding steps

Will not be heard amidst the din of arms.

Randolph has liv'd too long; his better fate

Had the ascendant once; and kept me down.

When I had seized the dame, by chance he came,

Rescu'd, and had the lady for his labour:

I scap'd unknown; a slender consolation!

Heaven is my witness, that I do not love

To sow in peril, and let others reap

The jocund harvest. Yet I am not safe;

By love, or something like it, stung, inflam'd,

Madly I blabb'd my passion to his wife,

And she has threaten'd to acquaint him of it.

The way of woman's will I do not know:

But well I know the baron's wrath is deadly.

I will not live in fear; the man I dread

Is as a Dane to me; ay, and the man

Who stands betwixt me and my chief desire—

No bar but he; she has no kinsman near;

No brother, in his sister's quarrel bold;

And for the righteous cause, a stranger's cause,

I knew no chief that will defy Glenalvon. [Exit.

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Court, &c.

Enter SERVANTS and a STRANGER at one door, and LADY RANDOLPH and ANNA at another.

Lady R. What means this clamour? Stranger, speak secure;

Hast thou been wrong'd? have these rude men presum'd

To vex the weary traveller on his way?

I Serv. By us no stranger ever suffer'd wrong:

This man with outcry wild has call'd us forth;

So sore afraid he cannot speak his fears.

Enter LORD RANDOLPH and NORVAL, with their Swords drawn and bloody.

Lady R. Not vain the stranger's fears! how fares my lord?

Lord R. That it fares well, thanks to this gallant youth,

Whose valour sav'd me from a wretched death.

As down the winding dale I walk'd alone,

At the cross way four armed men attack'd me;

Rovers, I judge, from the licentious camp,

Who would have quickly laid Lord Randolph low

Had not this brave and generous stranger come,

Like my good angel, in the hour of fate,

And, mocking danger, made my foes his own.

They turn'd upon him, but his active arm

Struck to the ground, from whence they rose no more,

The fiercest two; the others fled amain,

And left him master of the bloody field.

Speak, Lady Randolph, upon beauty's tongue

Dwell accents pleasing to the brave and bold;

Speak, noble dame, and thank him for thy lord.

Lady R. My lord, I cannot speak what now I feel;

My heart o'erflows with gratitude to heaven,

And to this noble youth, who, all unknown

To you and yours, deliberated not,

Nor paus'd at peril, but, humanely brave,

Fought on your side against such fearful odds.

Have you not learn'd of him whom we should thank?

Whom call the saviour of Lord Randolph's life?

Lord R. I ask'd that question, and he answer'd not;

But I must know who my deliverer is.

[To NORVAL.]

Nor. A low-born man, of parentage obscure,
Who nought can boast, but his desire to be
A soldier, and to gain a name in arms.

Lord R. Whoe'er thou art, thy spirit is ennobled

By the great King of kings; thou art ordain'd
And stamp'd a hero, by the sovereign hand
Of nature! Blush not, flower of modesty
As well as valour, to declare thy birth.

Nor. My name is Norval: on the Grampian hills
My father feeds his flocks; a frugal swain,
Whose constant cares were to increase his store,
And keep his only son, myself, at home.
For I had heard of battles, and I long'd
To follow to the field some warlike lord:
And heaven soon granted what my sire denied.
This moon which rose last night, round as my shield,

Had not yet filled her horns, when, by her light,
A band of fierce barbarians from the hills,
Rush'd like a torrent down upon the vale,
Sweeping our flocks and herds. The shepherds
fled

For safety and for succour. I alone,
With bended bow, and quiver full of arrows,
Hover'd about the enemy, and mark'd
The road he took; then hasted to my friends,
Whom, with a troop of fifty chosen men,
I met advancing. The pursuit I led,
Till we o'ertook the spoil-encumber'd foe.
We fought and conquer'd. Ere a sword was drawn,

An arrow from my bow had pierc'd their chief,
Who wore that day the arms which now I wear.
Returning home in triumph, I disdain'd
The shepherd's slothful life; and having heard
That our good king had summon'd his bold peers
To lead their warriors to the Carron side,
I left my father's house, and took with me
A chosen servant to conduct my steps;
Yon trembling coward, who forsook his master.
Journeying with this intent, I pass'd these towers,
And, heaven directed, came this day to do
The happy deed that gilds my humble name.

Lord R. He is as wise as brave. Was ever tale
With such a gallant modesty rehears'd?
My brave deliverer! thou shalt enter now
A nobler list, and in a monarch's sight
Contend with princes for the prize of fame.
I will present thee to our Scottish king,
Whose valiant spirit ever valour lov'd.

Ah! my Matilda, wherefore starts that tear?

Lady R. I cannot say; for various affections,
And strangely mingled, in my bosom swell;
Yet each of them may well command a tear.
I joy that thou art safe; and I admire
Him and his fortunes who hath wrought thy safety:

Yea, as my mind predicts, with thine his own.
Obscure and friendless he the army sought,
Bent upon peril, in the range of death
Resolv'd to hunt for fame, and with his sword
To gain distinction which his birth denied.
In this attempt, unknown he might have perish'd,
And gain'd, with all his valour, but oblivion.
Now, grac'd by thee, his virtues serve no more
Beneath despair. The soldier now of hope,

He stands conspicuous; fame and great renown
Are brought within the compass of his sword.
On this my mind reflected, whilst thou spoke,
And bless'd the wonder-working Lord of heaven.
Lord R. Pious and grateful ever are thy thoughts!

My deeds shall follow where thou point'st the way.
Next to myself, and equal to Glenalvon,
In honour and command, shall Norval be.

Nor. I know not how to thank you. Rude I arr
In speech and manners: never till this hour
Stood I in such a presence; yet, my lord,
There's something in my breast, which makes me bold

To say, that Norval ne'er will shame thy favour.

Lady R. I will be sworn thou wilt not. Thou shalt be

My knight, and ever, as thou didst to-day,
With happy valour guard the life of Randolph
Lord R. Well hast thou spoke. Let me forbear reply;

We are thy debtors still. Thy high desert
[To NORVAL.]

O'ertops our gratitude. I must proceed,
As was at first intended, to the camp.
Some of my train I see are speeding hither,
Impatient doubtless of their lord's delay.
Go with me, Norval, and thine eyes shall see
The chosen warriors of thy native land,
Who languish for the fight, and beat the air
With brandish'd swords.

Nor. Let us be gone, my lord.

Lord R. [To LADY R.] About the time the declining sun

Shall his broad orbit o'er yon hill suspend,
Expect us to return. This night once more
Within these walls I rest; my tent I pitch
To-morrow in the field. Prepare the feast.
Free is his heart who for his country fights:
He in the eve of battle may resign
Himself to social pleasure: sweetest then,
When danger to a soldier's soul endears
The human joy that never may return.

[Exeunt LORD R. and NOR.]

Lady R. His parting words have struck a fatal truth.

Oh, Douglas! Douglas! tender was the time
When we two parted ne'er to meet again!
How many years of anguish and despair
Has heaven annex'd to those swift passing hours
Of love and fondness.

Wretch that I am! Alas! why am I so?
At every happy parent I repine.
How bless'd the mother of yon happy Norval!
She for a living husband bore her pains,
And heard him bless her when a man was born:
She nurs'd her smiling infant on her breast;
Tended the child, and rear'd the pleasing boy;
She, with affection's triumph, saw the youth
In grace and comeliness surpass his peers:
Whilst I to a dead husband bore a son,
And to the roaring waters gave my child.

Anna. Alas! alas! why will you thus resume
Your grief afresh? I thought that gallant youth
Would for a while have won you from your wo.
On him intent you gazed, with a look
Much more delighted, than your pensive eye
Has deign'd on other objects to bestow.

Lady R. Delighted, say'st thou? Oh! even there mine eye
Found fuel for my life-consuming sorrow;
I thought, that had the son of Douglas liv'd,

He might have been like this young gallant stranger;
And pair'd with him in features and in shape,
In all endowments, as in years, I deem,
My boy with blooming Norval might have number'd.

Whilst thus I mus'd, a spark from fancy fell
On my sad heart, and kindled up a fondness
For this young stranger, wand'ring from his home,
And like an orphan cast upon my care.
I will protect thee, said I to myself,
With all my power, and grace with all my favour.

Anna. Sure, heaven will bless so gen'rous a resolve.

You must, my noble dame, exert your power:
You must awake: devices will be fram'd,
And arrows pointed at the breast of Norval.

Lady R. Glenalvon's false and crafty head will work

Against a rival in his kinsman's love,
If I deter him not; I only can.
Bold as he is, Glenalvon will beware
How he pulls down the fabric that I raise.
I'll be the artist of young Norval's fortune.

Enter GLENALVON.

Glen. Where is my dearest kinsman, noble Randolph?

Lady R. Have you not heard, Glenalvon, of the base—

Glen. I have; and that the villains may not scape,

With a strong band I have begirt the wood.
If they lurk there, alive they shall be taken,
And torture force from them the important secret,
Whether some foe of Randolph's hired their swords,

Or if—

Lady R. That care becomes a kinsman's love.
I have a counsel for Glenalvon's ear.

[Exit ANNA.]

Glen. To him your counsels always are commands.

Lady R. I have not found so; thou art known to me.

Glen. Known!

Lady R. And most certain is my cause of knowledge.

Glen. What do you know? By the most blessed cross,
You much amaze me. No created being,
Yourself except, durst thus accost Glenalvon.

Lady R. Is guilt so bold? and dost thou make a merit

Of thy pretended meekness? this to me,
Who, with a gentleness which duty blames,
Have hitherto conceal'd, what, if indulg'd,
Would make thee nothing! or, what's worse than that,

An outcast beggar, and unpitied too!
For mortals shudder at a crime like thine.

Glen. Thy virtue awes me. First of woman-kind!

Permit me yet to say, that the fond man
Whom love transports beyond strict virtue's bounds,

If he is brought by love to misery,
In fortune ruin'd as in mind forlorn,
Unpitied cannot be. Pity's the alms
Which on such beggars freely is bestow'd;
For mortals know that love is still their lord,
And o'er their vain resolves advances still:

As fire, when kindled by our shepherds, moves
Through the dry heath before the fanning wind.
Lady R. Reserve these accents for some other ear;

To love's apology I listen not.

Mark thou my words: for it is meet thou shouldst.
His brave deliverer, Randolph here retains.

Perhaps his presence may not please thee well:

But, at thy peril, practise ought against him:

Let not thy jealousy attempt to shake

And loosen the good root he has in Randolph,

Whose favourites I know thou hast supplanted.

Thou lookest at me, as if thou wouldst pry

Into my heart. 'Tis open as my speech.

I give this early caution, and put on

The curb, before thy temper breaks away.

The friendless stranger my protection claims;

His friend I am, and be not thou his foe. [Exit.]

Glen. Child that I was to start at my own shadow,

And be the shallow fool of coward conscience!

I am not what I have been; what I should be.

The darts of destiny have almost pierc'd

My marble heart. Had I one grain of faith

In holy legends and religious tales,

I should conclude there was an arm above

That fought against me, and malignant turn'd,

To catch myself, the subtle snare I set.

Why, rape and murder are not simple means!

The imperfect rape to Randolph gave a spouse;

And the intended murder introduc'd

A favourite to hide the sun from me;

And, worst of all, a rival. Burning hell!

This were thy centre, if I thought she lov'd him!

'Tis certain she contemns me; nay, commands me,

And waves the flag of her displeasure o'er me,

In his behalf. And shall I thus be brav'd?

Curb'd, as she calls it, by dame Chastity?

Infernal fiends, if any fiends there are

More fierce than hate, ambition, and revenge,

Rise up, and fill my bosom with your fires.

Darkly a project peers upon my mind,

Like the red moon when rising in the east,

Cross'd and divided by strange colour'd clouds.

I'll seek the slave who came with Norval hither,

And for his cowardice was spurn'd from him.

I've known a follower's rankled bosom breed

Venom most fatal to his heedless lord. [Exit.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The same.

Enter ANNA.

Anna. Thy vassals, Grief, great nature's order break,

And change the noontide to the midnight hour.

Whilst Lady Randolph sleeps, I will walk forth,

And taste the air that breathes on yonder bank.

Sweet may her slumbers be! Ye ministers

Of gracious heaven, who love the human race,

Angels and seraphs, who delight in goodness,

Forsake your skies, and to her couch descend!

There from her fancy chase those dismal forms

That haunt her waking; her sad spirit charm

With images celestial, such as please

The bless'd above upon their golden beds.

Enter SERVANT.

Serv. One of the vile assassins is secur'd.

We found the villain lurking in the wood:

With dreadful imprecations he denies

All knowledge of the crime. But this is not

His first essay: these jewels were conceal'd
In the most secret places of his garment;
Belike the spoils of some that he has murder'd.

Anna. Let me look on them. Ha! here is a heart,

The chosen crest of Douglas' valiant name!
These are no vulgar jewels. Guard the wretch.

[Exit.

Enter SERVANTS, with a PRISONER.

Pris. I know no more than does the child unborn

Of what you charge me with.

I Serv. You say so, Sir!

But torture soon shall make you speak the truth.
Behold, the lady of Lord Randolph comes:
Prepare yourself to meet her just revenge.

Enter LADY RANDOLPH and ANNA.

Anna. Summon your utmost fortitude, before
You speak with him. Your dignity, your fame,
Are now at stake. Think of the fatal secret,
Which in a moment from your lips may fly.

Lady R. Thou shalt behold me, with a desperate heart,

Hear how my infant perish'd. See, he kneels.

Pris. Heaven bless that countenance so sweet and mild!

A judge like thee makes innocence more bold.
Oh, save me, lady, from these cruel men,
Who have attack'd and seiz'd me; who accuse
Me of intended murder. As I hope

For mercy at the judgment-seat of heaven,
The tender lamb, that never nipt the grass,
Is not more innocent than I of murder.

Lady R. Of this man's guilt what proof can ye produce?

I Serv. We found him lurking in the hollow glen.

When view'd and call'd upon, amaz'd he fled.
We overtook him, and enquir'd from whence
And what he was: he said he came from far,
And was upon his journey to the camp.
Not satisfied with this, we search'd his clothes,
And found these jewels, whose rich value plead
Most powerfully against him. Hard he seems,
And old in villany. Permit us try
His stubbornness against the torture's force.

Pris. Oh, gentle lady! by your lord's dear life,
Which these weak hands, I swear did ne'er assail,
And by your children's welfare, spare my age!
Let not the iron tear my ancient joints,
And my gray hairs bring to the grave with pain.

Lady R. Account for these; thine own they cannot be:

For these, I say: be steadfast to the truth;
Detected falsehood is most certain death.

[ANNA removes the SERVANTS, and returns.

Pris. Alas! I'm sore beset! let never man,
For sake of lucre, sin against his soul!
Eternal justice is in this most just!

I, guiltless now, must former guilt reveal.

Lady R. Oh! Anna, hear!—once more I charge thee speak

The truth direct; for these to me foretell
And certify a part of thy narration,
With which, if the remainder tallies not,
An instant and a dreadful death abides thee.

Pris. Then, thus adjur'd, I'll speak to you as just

As if you were the minister of heaven,
Sent down to search the secret sins of men.

Some eighteen years ago I rented land
Of brave Sir Malcolm, then Balarmo's lord;
But, falling to decay, his servants seiz'd
All that I had, and then turn'd me and mine (Four helpless infants and their weeping mother,
Out to the mercy of the winter winds,
A little hovel by the river's side

Receiv'd us; there hard labour, and the skill
In fishing, which was formerly my sport,
Supported life. Whilst thus we poorly liv'd,
One stormy night, as I remember well,
The wind and rain beat hard upon our roof;
Red came the river down, and loud and oft
The angry spirit of the water shriek'd.

At the dead hour of night was heard the cry
Of one in jeopardy. I rose, and ran
To where the circling eddy of a pool,
Beneath the ford, us'd oft to bring within
My reach whatever floating thing the stream
Had caught. The voice was ceas'd; the person lost,
But, looking sad and earnest on the waters,
By the moon's light I saw, whirled round and round,

A basket: soon I drew it to the bank,
And, nestled curious, there an infant lay.

Lady R. Was he alive?

Pris. He was.

Lady R. Inhuman that thou art!

How couldst thou kill what waves and tempests spar'd?

Pris. I am not so inhuman.

The needy man who has known better days,
One whom distress has spited at the world,
Is he whom tempting fiends would pitch upon
To do such deeds as make the prosperous men
Lift up their heads, and wonder who could do them.
And such a man was I: a man declin'd,
Who saw no end of black adversity:

Yet, for the wealth of kingdoms, I would not
Have touch'd that infant with a hand of harm.

Lady R. Ha! dost thou say so? then perhaps he lives!

Pris. Not many days ago he was alive.

Lady R. Oh, God of heaven! did he then die so lately?

Pris. I did not say he died; I hope he lives.

Not many days ago these eyes beheld
Him flourishing in youth, and health, and beauty.

Lady R. Where is he now?

Pris. Alas! I know not where.

Lady R. Oh, fate! I fear thee still. Thou riddler, speak

Direct and clear; else I will search thy soul.

Pris. Fear not my faith, though I must speak
my shame:

Within the cradle where the infant lay,
Was stow'd a mighty store of gold and jewels;
Tempted by which, we did resolve to hide
From all the world this wonderful event,
And like a peasant breed the noble child.
That none might mark the change of our estate,
We left the country, travell'd to the north,
Bought flocks and herds, and gradually brought forth

Our secret wealth. But God's all seeing eye
Beheld our avarice, and smote us sore:
For, one by one, all our own children died,
And he, the stranger, sole remain'd the heir
Of what indeed was his. Fain then would I
Who with a father's fondness lov'd the boy,
Have trusted him, now in the dawn of youth,
With his own secret: but my anxious wife,

Foreboding evil, never would consent.
 Meanwhile the stripling grew in years and beauty;
 And, as we oft observ'd, he bore himself,
 Not as the offspring of our cottage blood;
 For nature will break out, mild with the mild,
 But with the froward he was fierce as fire;
 And night and day he talk'd of war and arms;
 I set myself against his warlike bent;
 But all in vain; for when a desperate band
 Of robbers from the savage mountains came—

Lady R. Eternal Providence! What is thy name?

Pris. My name is 'Norval' and my name he bears.

Lad R. 'Tis he! 'tis he himself! It is my son!
 Oh, sovereign mercy! 'twas my child I saw!

Pris. If I, amidst astonishment and fear,
 Have of your words and gestures rightly judg'd,
 Thou art the daughter of my ancient master;
 The child I rescu'd from the flood is thine.

Lady R. With thee, dissimulation now were vain.

I am indeed the daughter of Sir Malcolm;
 The child thou rescu'dst from the flood is mine.

Pris. Bless'd be the hour that made me a poor man;

My poverty hath sav'd my master's house!

Lady R. Thy words surprise me: sure thou dost not feign!

The tear stands in thine eye; such love from thee
 Sir Malcolm's house deserv'd not; if aright
 Thou told'st the story of thy own distress.

Pris. Sir Malcolm of our barons was the flower;
 The safest friend, the best, the kindest master.
 But ah! he knew not of my sad estate.

After that battle, where his gallant son,
 Your own brave brother, fell, the good old lord
 Grew desperate and reckless of the world;
 And never, as he erst was wont, went forth
 To overlook the conduct of his servants.

By them I was thrust out, and them I blame:
 May heaven so judge me as I judge my master!
 And God so love me as I love his race!

Lady R. His race shall yet reward thee. On thy faith

Depends the fate of thy lov'd master's house.
 Rememb'rst thou a little, lonely hut,
 That like a holy hermitage appears
 Among the cliffs of Carron?

Pris. I remember the cottage of the cliffs.

Lady R. 'Tis that I mean:

There dwells a man of venerable age,
 Who in my father's service spent his youth:
 Tell him I sent thee, and with him remain,
 Till I shall call upon thee to declare,
 Before the king and nobles, what thou now
 To me hast told. No more but this, and thou Shalt live in honour all thy future days;
 Thy son so long shall call thee father still,
 And all the land shall bless the man who sav'd
 The son of Douglas, and Sir Malcolm's heir.
 Remember well my words; if thou shouldst meet
 Him, whom thou call'st thy son, still call him so;
 And mention nothing of his nobler father.

Pris. Fear not that I shall mar so fair a harvest,
 By putting in my sickle ere 'tis ripe,
 Why did I leave my home and ancient dame
 To find the youth, to tell him all I knew,
 And make him wear these jewels on his arm;
 Which might, I thought, be challeng'd and so bring

To light the secret of his noble birth.

[LADY RANDOLPH goes towards the SERVANTS
Lady R. This man is not the assassin you suspected,

Though chance combin'd some likelihood against him.

He is the faithful bearer of the jewels
 To their right owner, whom in haste he seeks.
 'Tis meet that you should put him on his way,
 Since your mistaken zeal hath dragged him hither.

[Re-ent PRISONER and SERVANTS.
 My faithful Anna! dost thou share my joy?
 I know thou dost. Unparallel'd event!

Reaching from heaven to earth, Jehovah's arm
 Snatch'd from the waves, and brings me to my son!
 Judge of the widow, and the orphan's father,
 Accept a widow's and a mother's thanks
 For such a gift! What does my Anna think

Of the young eagle of a valiant nest?
 How soon he gaz'd on bright and burning arms,
 Spurn'd the low dunghill where his fate had thrown him,

And tower'd up to the regions of his sire!
Anna. How fondly did your eyes devour the boy!

Mysterious nature, with the unseen cord
 Of powerful instinct, drew you to your own.

Lady R. The ready story of his birth believ'd, Suppress'd my fancy quite; nor did he owe
 To any likeness my so sudden favour:
 But now I long to see his face again,

Examine every feature, and find out
 The lineaments of Douglas, or my own.
 But, most of all, I long to let him know
 Who his true parents are, to clasp his neck,
 And tell him all the story of his father.

Anna. With wary caution you must bear your self

In public, lest your tenderness break forth,
 And in observers stir conjectures strange.
 To-day the baron started at your tears.

Lady R. He did so, Anna: well thy mistress knows

If the least circumstance, mote of offence,
 Should touch the baron's eye, his sight would be
 With jealousy disorder'd. But the more
 It does behove me instant to declare

The birth of Douglas, and assert his rights.

Anna. Behold, Glenalvon comes.

Lady R. Now I shun him not.

This day I brav'd him in behalf of Norval;
 Perhaps too far; at least my nicer fears
 For Douglas thus interpret.

Enter GLENALVON.

Glen. Noble dame,
 The hovering Dane at last his men hath landed:
 No band of pirates; but a mighty host,
 That come to settle where their valour conquers:
 To win a country, or to lose themselves.
 A nimble courier, sent from yonder camp,
 To hasten up the chieftains of the north,
 Inform'd me as he pass'd, that the fierce Dane
 Had on the eastern coasts of Lothian landed.

Lady R. How many mothers shall bewail their sons!

How many widows weep their husbands slain!
 Ye dames of Denmark, even for you I feel,
 Who sadly sitting on the sea-beat shore,
 Long look for lords that never shall return.

Glen. Off has th' unconquer'd Caledonian sword
 Widow'd the north. The children of the slain
 Come, as I hope, to meet their fathers' fate.
 The monster War, with her infernal brood,

Loud-yelling fury and life-ending pain,
Are objects suited to Glenalvon's soul.
Scorn is more grievous than the pains of death;
Reproach more piercing than the pointed sword.

Lady R. I scorn thee not, but when I ought to scorn;

Nor e'er reproach, but when insulted virtue
Against audacious vice asserts herself.
I own thy worth, Glenalvon; none more apt
Than I to praise thine eminence in arms,
And be the echo of thy martial fame.

No longer vainly feed a guilty passion:
Go and pursue a lawful mistress, Glory.
Upon the Danish crest redeem thy fault,
And let thy valour be the shield of Randolph.

Glen. One instant stay, and hear an alter'd man.
When beauty pleads for virtue, vice abash'd
Flies its own colours, and goes o'er to virtue.
I am your convert; time will show how truly:
And one immediate proof I mean to give.

That youth, for whom your ardent zeal to-day
Somewhat too haughtily defied your slave,
Amidst the shock of armies I'll defend,
And turn death from him, with a guardian arm.

Lady R. Act thus, Glenalvon, and I am thy
friend;

But that's thy least reward. Believe me, Sir,
The truly generous is the truly wise;
And he, who loves not others, lives unblest'd.

[Exit LADY RANDOLPH.]

Glen. Amen! and virtue is its own reward:
I think that I have hit the very tone
In which she loves to speak. Honey'd assent,
How pleasant art thou to the taste of man,
And woman also! flattery direct
Rarely disgusts. They little know mankind
Who doubt its operation: 'tis my key,
And opens the wicket of the human heart.
How far I have succeeded now, I know not;
Yet I incline to think her stormy virtue
Is lull'd awhile: 'tis her alone I fear:

While she and Randolph live, and live in faith
And amity, uncertain is my tenure.
The slave of Norval's I have found most apt;
I show'd him gold, and he has pawn'd his soul
To say and swear whatever I suggest.

Norval, I'm told, has that alluring look,
'T'wixt man and woman, which I have observ'd
To charm the nicer and fantastic dames,
Who are, like Lady Randolph, full of virtue.
In raising Randolph's jealousy, I may
But point him to the truth. He seldom errs,
Who thinks the worst he can of womankind.

[Exit.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—The same.

Enter LORD RANDOLPH, attended.

Lord R. Summon a hundred horse, by break of day,

To wait our pleasure at the castle gate.

Enter LADY RANDOLPH.

Lady R. Alas, my lord I've heard unwelcome news;

The Danes are landed.

Lord R. Ay, no inroad this
Of the Northumbrian, bent to take a spoil:
No sportive war, no tournament essay,
Of some young knight resolv'd to break a spear,
And stain with hostile blood his maiden arms.

The Danes are landed: we must beat them back,
Or live the slaves of Denmark.

Lady R. Dreadful time!

Lord R. The fenceless villages are all forsaken;
The trembling mothers and their children lodg'd
In wall-girt towers and castles! whilst the men
Retire indignant; yet, like broken waves,
They but retire, more awful to return.

Lady R. Immense, as fame reports, the Danish host!

Lord R. Were it as numerous as loud fame reports,

An army knit like ours would pierce it through:
Brothers that shrink not from each other's side,
And fond companions, fill our warlike files:
For his dear offspring, and the wife he loves,
The husband and the fearless father arm;
In vulgar breasts heroic ardour burns.
And the poor peasant mates his daring lord.

Lady R. Men's minds are temper'd, like their swords, for war;

Lovers of danger, on destruction's brink
They joy to rear erect their daring forms.
Hence, early graves; hence, the lone widow's life;
And the sad mother's grief-embitter'd age.

Where is our gallant guest?

Lord R. Down in the vale

I left him managing a fiery steed,
Whose stubbornness had foil'd the strength and skill

Of every rider. But now he comes,
In earnest conversation with Glenalvon.

Enter NORVAL and GLENALVON.

Glenalvon, with the lark arise; go forth
And lead my troops that lie in yonder vale:
Private I travel to the royal camp:
Norval thou goest with me. But say, young man,
Where didst thou learn so to discourse of war,
And in such terms, as I o'erheard to-day?
War is no village science, nor its phrase

A language taught amongst the shepherd swains.

Nor. Small is the skill my lord delights to praise
In him he favours. Hear from whence it came.

Beneath a mountain's brow, the most remote
And inaccessible by shepherds trod,
In a deep cave, dug by no mortal hand,
A hermit liv'd; a melancholy man!

Who was the wonder of our wand'ring swains.
Austere and lonely, cruel to himself

Did they report him; the cold earth his bed,
Water his drink, his food the shepherds' alms.

I went to see him, and my heart was touch'd
With reverence and with pity. Mild he spake,
And, entering on discourse, such stories told,
As made me oft revisit his sad cell.

For he had been a soldier in his youth;
And fought in famous battles, when the peers
Of Europe, by the bold Godfredo led,
Against the usurping infidel display'd

The blessed cross and won the Holy Land.
Pleas'd with my admiration, and the fire
His speech struck from me, the old man would shake

His years away, and act his young encounters
Then, having show'd his wounds, he'd sit him down.

And all the live-long day discourse of war.
To help my fancy, in the smooth green turf,
He cut the figures of the marshall'd hosts;
Describ'd the motions, and explain'd the use
Of the deep column, and the lengthen'd line

The square, the crescent, and the phalanx firm:
For all that Saracen or Christian knew
Of war's vast art, was to this hermit known.

Lord R. Why did this soldier in a desert hide
Those qualities that should have grac'd a camp?

Nor. That too at last I learn'd. Unhappy man!
Returning homewards by Messina's port,
Loaded with wealth and honours bravely won,
A rude and boist'rous captain of the sea
Fasten'd a quarrel on him. Fierce they fought:
The stranger fell, and with his dying breath
Declar'd his name and lineage. Mighty power!
The soldier cried, my brother! Oh, my brother!

Lady R. His brother!
Nor. Yes; of the same parents born;
His only brother. They exchanged forgiveness;
And happy in my mind was he that died;
For many deaths has the survivor suffered.

In the wild desert on a rock he sits,
Or on some nameless stream's untrodden banks,
And ruminates all day his dreadful fate.
At times, alas! not in his perfect mind,
Holds dialogues with his lov'd brother's ghost;
And oft each night forsakes his sullen couch,
To make sad orisons for him he slew.

Lady R. In this dire tragedy were there no more Unhappy persons? did the parents live?

Nor. No, they were dead; kind heaven had clos'd their eyes,
Before their son had shed his brother's blood.

Lord R. Hard is his fate; for he was not to blame!

There is a destiny in this strange world,
Which oft decrees an undeserved doom:
Let schoolmen tell us why—

[Trumpets at a distance.
From whence these sounds?

Enter an OFFICER.

Off. My lord, the trumpets of the troops of Lorn!

The valiant leader hails the noble Randolph.

Lord R. Mine ancient guest! does he the warriors lead?

Has Denmark rous'd the brave old knight in arms?

Off. No; worn with warfare, he resigns the sword.

His eldest hope, the valiant John of Lorn,
Now leads his kindred bands,

Lord R. Glenalvon, go;

With hospitality's most strong request

Entreat the chief. [Exit GLENALVON.

Off. My lord, requests are vain.

He urges on, impatient of delay,
Stung with the tidings of the foe's approach.

Lord R. May victory sit upon the warrior's plume!

Bravest of men! his flocks and herds are safe;

Remote from war's alarms his pastures lie,

By mountains inaccessible secur'd:

Yet foremost he into the plain descends,

Eager to bleed in battles not his own.

I'll go and press the hero to my breast.

[Exit with OFFICER.
Lady R. The soldier's loftiness, the pride and pomp

Investing awful war, Norval, I see,

Transport thy youthful mind.

Nor. Ah! should they not?

Bless'd be the hour I left my father's house!

I might have been a shepherd all my days,
And stole obscurely to a peasant's grave.

Now, if I live, with mighty chiefs I stand:
And, if I fall, with noble dust I lie.

Lady R. There is a generous spirit in thy breast,

That could have well sustain'd a prouder fortune.
This way with me; under you spreading beech

Unseen, unheard, by human eye or ear,

I will amaze thee with a wondrous tale.

Nor. Let there be danger, lady, with the secret:

That I may hug it to my grateful heart,

And prove my faith. Command my sword, my life

These are the sole possessions of poor Norval.

Lady R. Know'st thou these gems?

Nor. Durst I believe mine eyes,

I'd say I knew them, and they were my father's.

Lady R. Thy father's, say'st thou? ah, they were thy father's!

Nor. I saw them once, and curiously inquir'd

Of both my parents, whence such splendour came

But I was check'd, and more could never learn.

Lady R. Then learn of me—thou art not Nor-val's son.

Nor. Not Norval's son?

Lady R. Nor of a shepherd sprung.

Nor. Who am I then?

Lady R. Noble thou art,

For noble was thy sire.

Nor. I will believe—

Oh, tell me further! say, Who was my father?

Lady R. Douglas!

Nor. Lord Douglas, whom to-day I saw?

Lady R. His younger brother.

Nor. And in yonder camp?

Lady R. Alas!

Nor. You make me tremble—Sighs and tears!

Lives my brave father?

Lady R. Ah! too brave, indeed!

He fell in battle ere thyself was born.

Nor. Ah me, unhappy! ere I saw the light!

But does my mother live? I may conclude,

From my own fate, her portion has been sorrow.

Lady R. She lives; but wastes her life in constant wo,

Weeping her husband slain, her infant lost.

Nor. You that are skill'd so well in the sad story

Of my unhappy parents, and with tears

Bewail their destiny, now have compassion

Upon the offspring of the friends you lov'd;

Oh, tell me who and where my mother is!

Oppress'd by a base world, perhaps she bends

Beneath the weight of other ills than grief;

And, desolate, implores of heaven the aid

Her son should give. It is, it must be, so—

Your countenance confesses that she's wretched.

Oh, tell me her condition! Can the sword—

Who shall resist me in a parent's cause?

Lady R. Thy virtue ends her wo—My son!

my son!

I am thy mother, and the wife of Douglas!

[Falls upon his neck.

Nor. Oh, heaven and earth! how wondrous is my fate!

Art thou my mother? Ever let me kneel!

Lady R. Image of Douglas! fruit of fatal love!

All that I owe thy sire I pay to thee.

Nor. Respect and admiration still possess me,

Checking the love and fondness of a son:

Yet I was filial to my humble parents.

But did my sire surpass the rest of men,

As thou exceedest all of womankind?

Lady R. Arise, my son. In me thou dost behold

The poor remains of beauty once admir'd.

Yet in my prime I equal'd not thy father;
His eyes were like the eagle's, yet sometimes Liker the dove's; and, as he pleas'd, he won
All hearts with softness, or with spirit aw'd.

Nor. How did he fall? Sure 'twas a bloody field

When Douglas died! Oh, I have much to ask!

Lady R. Hereafter thou shalt hear the lengthen'd tale

Of all thy father's and thy mother's woes.
At present this—Thou art the rightful heir
Of yonder castle, and the wide domains,
Which now Lord Randolph, as my husband, holds.
But thou shalt not be wrong'd; I have the power
To right thee still. Before the king I'll kneel,
And call Lord Douglas to protect his blood.

Nor. The blood of Douglas will protect itself.

Lady R. But we shall need both friends, and favour, boy,

To wrest thy lands and lordship from the gripe
Of Randolph and his kinsman. Yet I think
My tale will move each gentle heart to pity,
My life incline the virtuous to believe.

Nor. To be the son of Douglas is to me
Inheritance enough! Declare my birth,
And in the field I'll seek for fame and fortune.

Lady R. Thou dost not know what perils and injustice

Await the poor man's valour. Oh, my son!
The noblest blood of all the land's abash'd,
Having no lackey but pale poverty.

Too long hast thou been thus attended, Douglas!
Too long hast thou been deem'd a peasant's child:

The wanton heir of some inglorious chief
Perhaps has scorn'd thee in thy youthful sports,
Whilst thy indignant spirit swell'd in vain.
Such contumely thou no more shalt bear:
But how I purpose to redress thy wrongs
Must be hereafter told. Prudence directs
That we should part before your chief's return.
Retire, and from thy rustic follower's hand
Receive a billet, which thy mother's care,
Anxious to see thee, dictated before
This casual opportunity arose

Of private conference. Its purport mark:
For, as I there appoint, we meet again.
Leave me, my son, and frame thy manners still
To Norval's, not to noble Douglas' state.

Nor. I will remember. Where is Norval now,
That good old man?

Lady R. At hand conceal'd he lies,
A useful witness. But beware, my son,
Of yon Glenalvon; in his guilty breast
Resides a villain's shrewdness, ever prone
To false conjecture. He hath griev'd my heart.

Nor. Has he, indeed? Then let yon false
Glenalvon

Beware of me.

[Exit.

Lady R. There burst the smother'd flame,
O, thou all-righteous and eternal King!
Who father of the fatherless art call'd,
Protect my son! thy inspiration, Lord!
Hath fill'd his bosom with that sacred fire,
Which in the breasts of his forefathers burn'd:
Set him on high, like them, that he may shine
The star and glory of his native land!—
Yonder they come. How do bad women find
Unchanging aspects to conceal their guilt,
When I, by reason and by justice urg'd
Full hardly can dissemble with these men
In nature's pious cause?

Enter LORD RANDOLPH and GLENALVON.

Lord R. Yon gallant chief,
Of arms enamour'd, all repose disclaims.

Lady R. Be not, my lord, by his example sway'd.

Arrange the business of to-morrow now,
And when you enter, speak of war no more.

[Exit.

Lord R. 'Tis so, by heaven! her mien, her voice, her eye,
And her impatience to be gone, confirm it.

Glen. He parted from her now. Behind the mount,
Amongst the trees, I saw him glide along.

Lord R. For sad sequester'd virtue she's re-nown'd.

Glen. Most true, my lord.

Lord R. Yet this distinguish'd dame
Invites a youth, the acquaintance of a day,
Alone to meet her at the midnight hour.
This assignation, [Shows a letter.] the assassin freed,

Her manifest affection for the youth,
Might breed suspicion in a husband's brain,
Whose gentle consort all for love had wedded:
Much more in mine. Matilda never lov'd me.
Let no man, after me, a woman wed,
Whose heart he knows he has not, though she bring

A mine of gold, a kingdom, for her dowry;
For let her seem, like the night's shadowy queen,
Cold and contemplative—he cannot trust her;
She may, she will, bring shame and sorrow on him;
The worst of sorrows, and the worst of shames!

Glen. Yield not, my lord, to such afflicting
thoughts,

But let the spirit of a husband sleep,
Till your own senses make a sure conclusion.
This billet must to blooming Norval go:
At the next turn awaits my trusty spy;
I'll give it him refitted for his master.
In the close thicket take your secret stand;
The moon shines bright, and your own eyes may judge

Of their behaviour.

Lord R. Thou dost counsel well.

Glen. Permit me now to make one slight essay:
Of all the trophies, which vain mortals boast,
By wit, by valour, or by wisdom, won,
The first and fairest in a young man's eye
Is woman's captive heart. Successful love
With glorious fumes intoxicates the mind,
And the proud conqueror in triumph moves,
Air-borne, exalted above vulgar men.

Lord R. And what avails this maxim?

Glen. Much, my lord.

Withdraw a little; I'll accost young Norval,
And with ironical, derisive counsel
Explore his spirit. If he is no more
Than humble Norval, by thy favour rais'd,
Brave as he is, he'll shrink astonish'd from me:
But, if he be the favourite of the fair,
Lov'd by the first of Caledonia's dames,
He'll turn upon me, as the lion turns
Upon the hunter's spear.

Lord R. 'Tis shrewdly thought.

Glen. When we grow loud, draw near. But let my lord

His rising wrath, restrain!— [Exit RANDOLPH
'Tis strange, by heaven!

That she should run full tilt her fond career

To one so little known. She, too, that seem'd
Pure as the winter stream, when ice, emboss'd,
Whitens its course. Even I did think her chaste,
Whose charity exceeds not. Precious sex!
Whose deeds lascivious pass Glenalvon's thoughts!

Enter NORVAL.

His port I love: he's in a proper mood
To chide the thunder, if at him it roar'd.—

[Aside.

Has Norval seen the troops?

Nor. The setting sun

With yellow radiance lighten'd all the vale;
And as the warriors mov'd, each polish'd helm,
Corslet, or spear, glanc'd back his gilded beams.
The hill they climb'd, and, halting at its top,
Of more than mortal size, towering, they seem'd
A host angelic, clad in burning arms.

Glen. Thou talk'st it well; no leader of our host
In sounds more lofty speaks of glorious war.

Nor. If I shall e'er acquire a leader's name,
My speech will be less ardent. Novelty
Now prompts my tongue, and youthful admiration
Vents itself freely; since no part is mine
Of praise pertaining to the great in arms.

Glen. You wrong yourself, brave Sir; your martial deeds
Have rank'd you with the great. But mark me,
Norval:

Lord Randolph's favour now exalts your youth
Above his veterans of famous service.

Let me, who know these soldiers, counsel you.
Give them all honour: seem not to command;
Else they will scarcely brook your late sprung
power,

Which nor alliance props, nor birth adorns.

Nor. Sir, I have been accustomed all my days
To hear and speak the plain and simple truth:
And though I have been told that there are men
Who borrow friendship's tongue to speak their scorn,

Yet in such language I am little skill'd.
Therefore I thank Glenalvon for his counsel,
Although it sounded harshly. Why remind Me of my birth obscure? Why slur my power
With such contemptuous terms?

Glen. I did not mean

To gall your pride, which now I see is great.

Nor. My pride!

Glen. Suppress it, as you wish to prosper.
Your pride's excessive. Yet for Randolph's sake,
I will not leave you to its rash direction.

If thus you swell, and frown at high-born men,
Will high-born men endure a shepherd's scorn?

Nor. A shepherd's scorn!

Glen. Yes; if you presume

To bend on soldiers these disdainful eyes,
What will become of you?

Nor. If this were told!—

[Aside.

Hast thou no fears for thy presumptuous self?

Glen. Ha! dost thou threaten me?

Nor. Didst thou not hear?

Glen. Unwillingly I did; a nobler foe
Had not been question'd thus. But such as thee—

Nor. Whom dost thou think me?

Glen. Norval.

Nor. So I am—

And who is Norval, in Glenalvon's eyes?

Glen. A peasant's son, a wandering beggar boy;
At best no more, even if he speaks the truth.

Nor. False as thou art, dost thou suspect my truth?

Glen. Thy truth! thou'rt all a lie: and false as hell

Is the vainglorious tale thou told'st to Randolph.
Nor. If I were chain'd, unarm'd, and bed-rid old,
Perhaps I should revile: but, as I am,
I have no tongue to rail. The humble Norval
Is of a race who strive not but with deeds.

Did I not fear to freeze thy shallow valour,
And make thee sink too soon beneath my sword,
I'd tell thee—what thou art. I know thee well.

Glen. Dost thou not know Glenalvon born to command

Ten thousand slaves like thee—

Nor. Villain, no more!

[Draws.

Draw, and defend thy life. I did design

To have defied thee in another cause;

But heaven accelerates its vengeance on thee.

Now for my own and Lady Randolph's wrongs.

[They fight.

Enter LORD RANDOLPH.

Lord R. Hold, I command you both. The man that stirs

Makes me his foe.

Nor. Another voice than thine

That threat had vainly sounded, noble Randolph.

Glen. Hear him, my lord; he's wondrous condescending!

Mark the humility of shepherd Norval!

Nor. Now you may scoff in safety.

[Sheathes his sword.

Lord R. Speak not thus,

Taunting each other; but unfold to me

The cause of quarrel, then I judge betwixt you.

Nor. Nay, my good lord, though I revere you
much,

My cause I plead not, nor demand your judgment.

I blush to speak; I will not, cannot, speak

The opprobrious words that I from him have borne:

To the liege lord of my dear native land

I owe a subject's homage; but even him

And his high arbitration I'd reject.

Within my bosom reigns another lord;

Honour, sole judge and umpire of itself.

If my free speech offend you, noble Randolph,

Revoke your favours, and let Norval go

Hence as he came, alone, but not dishonour'd.

Lord R. Thus far I'll mediate with impartial voice:

The ancient foe of Caledonia's land

Now waves her banners o'er her frighted fields.

Suspend your purpose, till your country's arms

Repel the bold invader; then decide

The private quarrel.

Glen. I agree to this.

Nor. And I.

Enter SERVANT.

Serv. The banquet waits.

Lord R. We come.

[Exit, with SERV.

Glen. Norval,

Let not our variance mar the social hour,

Nor wrong the hospitality of Randolph.

Nor frowning anger, nor yet wrinkled hate,

Shall stain my countenance. Smooth thou thy brow;

Nor let our strife disturb the gentle dame.

Nor. Think not so lightly, Sir, of my resentment.

When we contend again, our strife is mortal.

[Exeunt.

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Wood.

Enter DOUGLAS.

Doug. This is the place, the centre of the grove;
Here stands the oak, the monarch of the wood.
How sweet and solemn is this midnight scene!
The silver moon, unclouded, holds her way
Through skies, where I could count each little star;
The fanning west wind scarcely stirs the leaves;
The river, rushing o'er its pebbled bed,
Imposes silence with a stilly sound.
In such a place as this, at such an hour,
If ancestry can be in aught believ'd,
Descending spirits have convers'd with men,
And told the secrets of the world unknown.

Enter OLD NORVAL.

Old N. 'Tis he. But what if he should chide me hence?

His just reproach I fear. [DOUGLAS sees him.
Forgive! forgive!

Canst thou forgive the man, the selfish man,
Who bred Sir Malcolm's heir a shepherd's son?

Doug. Kneel not to me; thou art my father still.
Thy wish'd-for presence now completes my joy.
Welcome to me; my fortunes thou shalt share,
And ever honour'd with thy Douglas live.

Old N. And dost thou call me father? Oh, my son!

I think that I could die to make amends
For the great wrong I did thee. 'Twas my crime,
Which in the wilderness so long conceal'd
The blossom of thy youth.

Doug. Not worse the fruit,
That in the wilderness the blossom blow'd.
Amongst the shepherds, in the humble cot,
I learn'd some lessons, which I'll not forget
When I inhabit yonder lofty towers.
I, who was once a swain, will ever prove
The poor man's friend; and, when my vassals bow,
Norval shall smooth the crested pride of Douglas.

Old N. Let me but live to see thine exaltation!
Yet grievous are my fears. Oh, leave this place,
And those unfriendly towers!

Doug. Why should I leave them?

Old N. Lord Randolph and his kinsman seek your life.

Doug. How know'st thou that?

Old N. I will inform you how.

When evening came, I left the secret place
Appointed for me by your mother's care,
And fondly trod in each accustom'd path
That to the castle leads. Whilst thus I rang'd,
I was alarm'd with unexpected sounds
Of earnest voices. On the persons came,
Unseen I lurk'd, and overheard them name
Each other as they talk'd, lord Randolph this,
And that Glenalvon. Still of you they spoke,
And of the lady: threat'ning was their speech,
Though but imperfectly my ear could hear it.
'Twas strange, they said, a wonderful discovery;
And ever and anon they vow'd revenge.

Doug. Revenge! for what?

Old N. For being what you are,
Sir Malcolm's heir: how else have you offend'd?
When they were gone, I hid me to my cottage,
And there sat musing how I best might find
Means to inform you of their wicked purpose:
But I could think of none. At last, perplex'd,
I issued forth, encompassing the tower,

With many a wearied step and wishful look.
Now Providence hath brought you to my sight,
Let not your too courageous spirit scorn
The caution which I give.

Doug. I scorn it not.

My mother warn'd me of Glenalvon's baseness:
But I will not suspect the noble Randolph.
In our encounter with the vile assassins,
I mark'd his brave demeanour; him I'll trust.

Old N. I fear you will, too far.

Doug. Here in this place

I wait my mother's coming; she shall know
What thou hast told: her counsel I will follow:
And cautious ever are a mother's counsels.
You must depart: your presence may prevent
Our interview.

Old N. My blessing rest upon thee!

Oh, may heaven's hand, which sav'd thee from the wave,
And from the sword of foes, be near thee still;
Turning mischance, if aught hangs o'er thy head,
All upon mine! [Exit.

Doug. He loves me like a parent;
And must not, shall not, lose the son he loves,
Although his son has found a nobler father.
Eventful day! how hast thou chang'd my state!
Once, on the cold and winter-shaded side
Of a bleak hill, mischance had rooted me,
Never to thrive, child of another soil;
Transplanted now to the gay sunny vale,
Like the green thorn of May my fortune flowers.
Ye glorious stars! high heaven's resplendent host!
To whom I oft have of my lot complain'd,
Hear, and record my soul's unalter'd wish!
Dead or alive, let me but be renew'd!
May heaven inspire some fierce gigantic Dane,
To give a bold defiance to our host!
Before he speaks it out, I will accept:
Like Douglas conquer, or like Douglas die.

Enter LADY RANDOLPH.

Lady R. My son! I heard a voice—

Doug. The voice was mine.

Lady R. Didst thou complain aloud to nature's ear,

That thus in dusky shades, at midnight hours,
By stealth the mother and the son should meet.
[They embrace.

Doug. No; on this happy day, this better birthday,

My thoughts and words are all of hope and joy.

Lady R. Sad fear and melancholy still divide
The empire of my breast with hope and joy.
Now hear what I advise—

Doug. First, let me tell

What may the tenour of your counsel change.

Lady R. My heart forebodes some evil.

Doug. 'Tis not good—

At eve, unseen by Randolph and Glenalvon,
The good old Norval in the grove o'erheard
Their conversation; oft they mentioned me
With dreadful threat'nings; you they sometimes nam'd.

'Twas strange, they said, a wonderful discovery;
And ever and anon they vow'd revenge.

Lady R. Defend us, gracious God! we are betray'd.

They have found out the secret of thy birth!
It must be so. That is the great discovery.
Sir Malcolm's heir is come to claim his own;
And they will be reveng'd. Perhaps even now,
Arm'd and prepar'd for murder, they but wait

A darker and more silent hour, to break
Into the chamber where they think thou sleep'st.
This moment, this, heaven hath ordain'd to save
thee!

Fly to the camp, my son!

Doug. And leave you here?
No: to the castle let us go together,
Call up the ancient servants of your house,
Who in their youth did eat your father's bread;
Then tell them loudly, that I am your son.
If in the breasts of men one spark remains
Of sacred love, fidelity, or pity,
Some in your cause will arm. I ask but few
To drive these spoilers from my father's house.

Lady R. Oh, nature, nature! what can check thy force?

Thou genuine offspring of the daring Douglas!
But rush not on destruction: save thyself,
And I am safe. To me they mean no harm.
Thy stay but risks thy precious life in vain.
That winding path conducts thee to the river.
Cross where thou seest a broad and beaten way,
Which, running eastward, leads thee to the camp.
Instant demand admittance to lord Douglas:
Show him these jewels which his brother wore.
Thy look, thy voice, will make him feel the
truth,

Which I by certain proof will soon confirm.

Doug. I yield me, and obey: but yet my heart
Bleeds at this parting. Something bids me stay,
And guard a mother's life. Oft have I read
Of wondrous deeds by one bold arm achiev'd.
Our foes are two; no more: let me go forth,
And see if any shield can guard Glenalvon.

Lady R. If thou regard'st thy mother, or re-ver'st

Thy father's memory, think of this no more.
One thing I have to say before we part:
Long wert thou lost; and thou art found, my child,
In a most fearful season. War and battle
I have great cause to dread. Too well I see
Which way the current of thy temper sets:
To-day I have found thee. Oh! my long-lost hope!

If thou to giddy valour giv'st the rein,
To-morrow I may lose my son for ever.
The love of thee, before thou saw'st the light,
Sustain'd my life when thy brave father fell.
If thou shalt fall, I have nor love nor hope
In this waste world! My son, remember me!

Doug. What shall I say? How can I give you comfort?

The God of battles of my life dispose
As may be best for you! for whose dear sake
I will not bear myself as I resolv'd.
But yet consider, as no vulgar name,
That which I boast, sounds among martial men,
How will inglorious caution suit my claim?
The post of fate unshrinking I maintain.
My country's foes must witness who I am.
On the invaders' heads I'll prove my birth,
'Till friends and foes confess the genuine strain.
If in this strife I fall, blame not your son,
Who, if he live not honour'd, must not live.

Lady R. I will not utter what my bosom feels.
Too well I love that valour which I warn.
Farewell, my son, my counsels are but vain,

And as high heaven hath will'd it, all must be.

Gaze not on me, thou wilt mistake the path;
'I'll point it out again.

*Just as they are separating, enter, from the Wood
LORD RANDOLPH and GLENALVON.*

Lord R. Not in her presence.

Now—

Glen. I'm prepared.
Lord R. No; I command thee, stay.
I go alone: it never shall be said
That I took odds to combat mortal man.
The noblest vengeance is the most complete.

[GLENALVON makes some steps to the same side of the stage, listens, and speaks.]

Glen. Demons of death, come settle on my sword.
And to a double slaughter guide it home!
The lover and the husband both must die.

Lord R. [Without.] Draw, villain! draw!
Doug. [Without.] Assail me not, Lord Randolph;

Not as thou lov'st thyself. [Clashing of swords.]
Glen. [Running out.] Now is the time.

Enter LADY RANDOLPH, at the opposite side of the stage, faint and breathless.

Lady R. Lord Randolph, hear me: all shall be thine own!
But spare! Oh, spare my son!

Enter DOUGLAS, with a sword in each hand.

Doug. My mother's voice!
I can protect thee still.

Lady R. He lives! he lives!
For this, for this, to heaven, eternal praise!
But sure I saw thee fall.

Doug. It was Glenalvon.
Just as my arm had master'd Randolph's sword,
The villain came behind me; but I slew him.

Lady R. Behind thee! ah! thou art wounded!
Oh, my child,

How pale thou look'st! and shall I lose thee now?
Doug. Do not despair: I feel a little faintness,
I hope it will not last. [Leans upon his sword.]

Lady R. There is no hope!
And we must part! the hand of death is on thee!
Oh! my beloved child! O Douglas, Douglas!

[DOUGLAS growing more and more faint.]
Doug. Oh! had I fallen as my brave fathers fell,
Turning with fatal arm the tide of battle,
Like them I should have smil'd and welcom'd
death;

But thus to perish by a villain's hand!
Cut off from nature's and from glory's course,
Which never mortal was so fond to run.

Lady R. Hear, justice, hear! stretch thy avenging arm! [DOUGLAS falls.]

Doug. Unknown I die; no tongue shall speak of me.

Some noble spirits, judging by themselves,
May yet conjecture what I might have prov'd,
And think life only wanting to my fame:
But who shall comfort thee?

Lady R. Despair, despair!
Doug. Oh, had it pleas'd high Heaven to let me live

A little while!—my eyes that gaze on thee
Grow dim apace! my mother—O! my mother!
[Dies; LADY RANDOLPH faints upon the body.]

Enter LORD RANDOLPH and ANNA.

Lord R. Thy words, thy words of truth, have pierc'd my heart:
I am the stain of knighthood and of arms.

Oh! if my brave deliverer survives
The traitor's sword—

Anna. Alas! look there, my lord.

Lord R. The mother and her son! How curs'd am I!

Was I the cause? No: I was not the cause.
Yon matchless villain did seduce my soul
To frantic jealousy.

Anna. My lady lives:

The agony of grief hath but suppress'd
Awhile her powers.

Lord R. But my deliverer 's dead!

Lady R. [Recovering.] Where am I now?
Still in this wretched world?

Grief cannot break a heart so hard as mine.

Lord R. Oh, misery!

Amidst thy raging grief I must proclaim
My innocence.

Lady R. Thy innocence!

Lord R. My guilt

Is innocence compar'd with what thou think'st it.

Lady R. Of thee I think not; what have I to do
With thee, or any thing? My son! my son!
My beautiful! my brave! how proud was I
Of thee and of thy valour! my fond heart
O'erflow'd this day with transport, when I thought
Of growing old amidst a race of thine.
Now all my hopes are dead! A little while
Was I a wife! a mother not so long!
What am I now?—I know—but I shall be
That only whilst I please; for such a son
And such a husband drive me to my fate.

[Exit, running.]

Lord R. Follow her, Anna: I myself would follow,

But in this rage she must abhor my presence:

[Exit ANNA.]

Curs'd, curs'd Glenalvon, he escap'd too well,

VOL. I...Y

15

Though slain and baffled by the hand he hated.
Foaming with rage and fury to the last.
Cursing his conqueror, the felon died.

Re-enter ANNA.

Anna. My lord! my lord!

Lord R. Speak: I can hear of horror.

Anna. Horror, indeed!

Lord R. Matilda!

Anna. Is no more:

She ran, she flew like lightning up the hill:
Nor halted till the precipice she gain'd,
Beneath whose lowering top the river falls
Ingulf'd in rifted rocks: thither she came,
As fearless as the eagle lights upon it,
And headlong down—

Lord R. 'Twas I, alas! 'twas I
That fill'd her breast with fury; drove her down
The precipice of death! Wretch that I am!
Anna. Oh, had you seen her last despairing look!
Upon the brink she stood, and cast her eyes
Down on the deep: then, lifting up her head
And her white hands to heaven, seeming to say,
Why am I forc'd to this? she plung'd herself
Into the empty air.

Lord R. I will not vent,
In vain complaints, the passion of my soul.
Peace in this world I never can enjoy.
These wounds the gratitude of Randolph gave;
They speak aloud, and with the voice of fate
Denounce my doom. I am resolv'd. I'll go Straight to the battle, where the man that makes Me turn aside, must threaten worse than death.
Thou, faithful to thy mistress, take this ring,
Full warrant of my power. Let every rite
With cost and pomp upon their funerals wait:
For Randolph hopes he never shall return.

[The curtain descends slowly to music.]

THE INCONSTANT:

OR,

THE WAY TO WIN HIM:

A COMEDY,

IN FIVE ACTS.

BY GEORGE FARQUHAR, Esq.

REMARKS.

This lively and entertaining comedy was first acted at Drury Lane in 1702. In his preface, the author observes, that he took the hint from Beaumont and Fletcher's Wild Goose Chase, though, in fact, the main plot and several entire scenes were borrowed from that eccentric piece.

The catastrophe of the last act, where Young Mirabel is delivered from the bravoes by the care of Oriana, disguised as his page, was supposed to owe its origin to a similar affair, in which Farquhar himself had some concern when on military duty in France, where the scene is laid.

There are still some over-wrought passages in this play, and some improbabilities, almost beyond the pale of that license so liberally allowed to works of imagination: it is still, however, a great favourite.

The inimitable performance of Bisarre, by Mrs. Jordon, and of Duretete, by Mr. John Bannister, will long be remembered with delight.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—The Street.

Enter DUGARD and his man PETIT, in riding-habits.

Dug. Sirrah, what's a clock?

Pet. Turned of eleven, Sir.

Dug. No more! We have rid a swinging pace from Nemours since two this morning! Petit, run to Rousseau's, and bespeak a dinner at a louis-d'or a head, to be ready by one.

Pet. How many will there be of you, Sir?

Dug. Let me see; Mirabel one, Duretete two, myself three—

Pet. And I four.

Dug. How now, Sir! at your old travelling familiarity! When abroad, you had some freedom for want of better company; but, among my friends at Paris, pray remember your distance—Be gone, Sir—[Exit PETIT.] This fellow's wit was necessary abroad, but he's too cunning for a domestic; I must dispose of him some way else. -

Who's here? Old Mirabel and my sister! my dearest sister!

Enter OLD MIRABEL and ORIANA.

Ori. My brother! Welcome.

Dug. Monsieur Mirabel! I'm heartily glad to see you.

Old Mir. Honest Mr. Dugard, by the blood of the Mirabels, I'm your most humble servant.

Dug. Why, Sir, you've cast your skin sure, you're brisk and gay, lusty health about you, no sign of age but your silver hairs.

Old Mir. Silver hairs! Then they are quick-silver hairs, Sir. Whilst I have golden pockets, let my hairs be silver as they will. Adsbud, Sir, I can dance, and sing, and drink, and—no, I can't wench. But, Mr. Dugard, no news of my son Bob in all your travels?

Dug. Your son's come home, Sir.

Old Mir. Come home! Bob come home! By the blood of the Mirabels, Mr. Dugard, what say ye?

Ori. Mr. Mirabel returned, Sir?

Dug. He's certainly come, and you may see him within this hour or two.

Old Mir. Swear it, Mr. Dugard, presently swear it.

Dug. Sir, he came to town with me this morning; I left him at the Bagnieurs, being a little disordered after riding, and I shall see him again presently.

Old Mir. What! and he was ashamed to ask a blessing with his boots on. A nice dog! Well, and how fares the young rogue? ha?

Dug. A fine gentleman, Sir. He'll be his own messenger.

Old Mir. A fine gentleman! But is the rogue like me still?

Dug. Why yes, Sir; he's very like his mother, and as like you as most modern sons are to their fathers.

Old Mir. Why, Sir, don't you think that I begat him?

Dug. Why yes, Sir; you married his mother, and he inherits your estate. He's very like you, upon my word.

Ori. And pray, brother, what's become of his honest companion, Duretete?

Dug. Who, the captain? The very same he went abroad; he's the only Frenchman I ever knew that could not change. Your son, Mr. Mirabel, is more obliged to nature for that fellow's composition than for his own; for he's more happy in Duretete's folly than his own wit. In short, they are as inseparable as finger and thumb; but the first instance in the world, I believe, of opposition in friendship.

Old Mir. Very well: will he be home to dinner, think ye?

Dug. Sir, he has ordered me to bespeak a dinner for us at Rousseau's, at a louis-d'or a head.

Old Mir. A louis-d'or a head! Well said, Bob; by the blood of the Mirabels, Bob's improved. But Mr. Dugard, was it so civil of Bob to visit Monsieur Rousseau before his own natural father, eh? Harkye, Oriana, what think you now of a fellow that can eat and drink ye a whole louis-d'or at a sitting? He must be as strong as Hercules, life and spirit in abundance. Before Gad, I don't wonder at these men of quality, that their own wives can't serve 'em. A louis-d'or a head! 'tis enough to stock the whole nation with bastards; 'tis, faith. Mr. Dugard, I leave you with your sister. [Exit.]

Dug. Well, sister, I need not ask you how you do, your looks resolve me; fair, tall, well-shaped; you're almost grown out of my remembrance.

Ori. Why truly, brother, I look pretty well, thank nature and my toilet; I eat three meals a day, am very merry when up, and sleep soundly when I'm down.

Dug. But, sister, you remember that upon my going abroad you would choose this old gentleman for your guardian; he's no more related to our family than Prester John, and I have no reason to think you mistrusted my management of your fortune: therefore, pray be so kind as to tell me, without reservation, the true cause of making such a choice.

Ori. Lookye, brother, you were going a rambling, and 'twas proper, lest I should go a rambling too, that somebody should take care of me. Old Monsieur Mirabel is an honest gentleman, was our father's friend, and has a young lady in this house whose company I like, and who has chosen him for her guardian as well as I.

Dug. Who, Mademoiselle Bisarre?

Ori. The same; we live merrily together, without scandal or reproach; we make much of the old gentleman between us; and he takes care of us; we eat what we like, go to bed when we please, rise when we will, all the week we dance and sing, and upon Sundays go first to church, and then to the play.—Now, brother, besides these motives for choosing this gentleman for my guardian, perhaps I had some private reasons.

Dug. Not so private as you imagine, sister; your love to young Mirabel is no secret, I can assure you; but so public that all your friends are ashamed on't.

Ori. O'my word, then my friends are very bashful; though I'm afraid, Sir, that those people are not ashamed enough at their own crimes, who have so many blushes to spare for the faults of their neighbours.

Dug. Ay but, sister, the people say—

Ori. Pshaw, hang the people; their court of inquiry is a tavern, and their informer claret; they think as they drink, and swallow reputations like loaches: a lady's health goes briskly round with the glass, but her honour is lost in the toast.

Dug. Ay; but, sister, there is still something—

Ori. If there be something, brother, 'tis none of the people's something; marriage is my thing, and I'll stick to't.

Dug. Marriage! Young Mirabel marry! He'll build churches sooner. Take heed, sister, though your honour stood proof to his home-bred assaults, you must keep a stricter guard for the future: he has now got the foreign air, and the Italian softness; his wit's improved by converse, his behaviour finished by observation, and his assurances confirmed by success. Sister, I can assure you he has made his conquests; and 'tis a plague upon your sex, to be the soonest deceived by those very men that you know have been false to others.

Ori. For heaven's sake, brother, tell me no more of his faults; for if you do, I shall run mad for him: say no more, Sir; let me but get him into the bands of matrimony, I'll spoil his wandering, I warrant him; I'll lo his business that way, never fear.

Dug. Well, sister, I won't pretend to understand the engagements between you and your lover; I expect when you have need of my council or assistance, you will let me know more of your affairs. Mirabel is a gentleman, and, as far as my honour and interest can reach, you may command me to the furtherance of your happiness: in the meantime, sister, I have a great mind to make you a present of another humble servant; a fellow that I took up at Lyons, who has served me honestly ever since.

Ori. Then why will you part with him?

Dug. He has gained so insufferably on my good humour, that he's grown too familiar; but the fellow's cunning, and may be serviceable to you in your affair with Mirabel. Here he comes.

Enter PETIT.

Well, Sir, have you been at Rousseau's?

Pet. Yes, Sir, and who should I find there but Mr. Mirabel and the captain, hatching as warmly over a tub of ice, as two hen pheasants over a brood.—They would not let me bespeak any thing, for they had dined before I came.

Dug. Come, Sir, you shall serve my sister; I shall still continue kind to you.—Wait on your lady home, Petit. [Exit.]

Pet. A chair, a chair, a chair!

Ori. No, no, I'll walk home, 'tis but next door. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Tavern.

MIRABEL and DURETETE rise from the table.

Mir. Welcome to Paris once more, my dear captain; we have eat heartily, drank roundly, paid plentifully, and let it go for once. I liked every thing but our women, they looked so lean and tawdry, poor creatures! 'tis a sure sign the army is not paid.—Give me the plump Venetian, brisk and sanguine, that smiles upon me like the glowing sun, and meets my lips like sparkling wine, her person shining as the glass, and spirit like the foaming liquor.

Dur. Ah, Mirabel, Italy, I grant you; but for our women here in France, they are such thin brawn-fallen jades.

Mir. There's nothing on this side the Alps worth my humble service 'tye.—Ha, Roma la santa! Italy for my money; their customs, gardens, buildings, paintings, music, polices, wine, and women! the paradise of the world;—not pestered with a parcel of precise old gouty fellows, that would debar their children every pleasure that they themselves are past the sense of; commend me to the Italian familiarity: Here, son, there's fifty crowns; go pay your girl her week's allowance.

Dur. Ay, these are your fathers for you, that understand the necessities of young men; not like our musty dads, who, because they cannot fish themselves, would muddy the water, and spoil the sport of them that can. But now you talk of the plump, what d'ye think of a Dutch woman?

Mir. A Dutch woman's too compact; nay, every thing among them is so; a Dutch man is thick, a Dutch woman is squab, a Dutch horse is round, a Dutch gog is short, a Dutch ship is broad-bottomed; and, in short, one would swear the whole product of the country were cast in the same mould with their cheeses.

Dur. Ay, but, Mirabel, you have forgot the English ladies.

Mir. The women of England were excellent, did they not take such insufferable pains to ruin what nature has made so incomparably well. But come, Duretete, let us mind the business in hand; mistresses we must have, and must take up with the manufacture of the place, and upon a competent diligence we shall find those in Paris shall match the Italians from top to toe.

Dur. Ay, Mirabel, you will do well enough, but what will become of your friend? you know I am so plaguy bashful, so naturally an ass upon these occasions, that—

Mir. Pshaw, you must be bolder, man: travel three years, and bring home such a baby as bashfulness! A great lusty fellow! and a soldier! fie upon it.

Dur. Lookye, Sir, I can visit, and I can ogle a little—as thus, or thus now—but if they chance to give me a forbidding look, as some women, you know, have a devilish cast with their eyes—or if they cry—what d'ye mean? what d'ye take me for? Fie, Sir, remember who I am Sir—A person of quality to be used at this rate! 'egad, I'm struck as flat as a frying pan.

Mir. Words o'course! never mind 'em: turn you about upon your heel with a jantee air; hum out the end of an old song; cut a cross caper, and at her again.

Dur. [Imitates him.] No, hang it, 'twill never do.—Oons, what did my father mean by sticking me up in a university, or to think that I should gain any thing by my head, in a nation whose genius lies all in their heels!—Well, if ever I come to have children of my own, they shall have the education of the country; they shall learn to dance before they can walk, and be taught to sing before they can speak.

Mir. Come, come, throw off that childish humour; put on assurance, there's no avoiding it; stand all hazards, thou'rt a stout lusty fellow, and hast a good estate; look bluff, Hector, you have a good side-box face, a pretty impudent face; so, that's pretty well.—This fellow went abroad like an ox, and is returned like an ass. [Aside]

Dur. Let me see how I look. [Pulls out a pocket-glass, and looks on it.] A side-box face, say you?—Fie, I don't like it, Mirabel.—Fie, Sir, don't abuse your friends. I could not wear such a face as the best countess in Christendom.

Mir. Why an't you, blockhead, as well as I?

Dur. Why, thou hast impudence to set a good face upon a ny thing; I would change half my gold for half thy brass, with all my heart. Who comes here? Odsso, Mirabel, your father?

Enter OLD MIRABEL.

Old Mir. Where's my Bob? dear Bob?

Mir. Your blessing, Sir.

Old Mir. My blessing! Damn ye, ye young rogue; why did not you come to see your father first, Sirrah? My dear boy, I am heartily glad to see thee, my dear child, faith.—Captain Duretete, by the blood of the Mirabels, I'm yours—well, my lads, ye look bravely, faith.—Bob, hast got any money left?

Mir. Not a farthing, Sir.

Old Mir. Why, then, I won't gi' thee a sou.

Mir. I did but jest, here's ten pistoles.

Old Mir. Why, then here's ten more; I love to be charitable to those that don't want it:—Well, and how d'ye like Italy, my boys?

Mir. O the garden of the world, Sir; Rome, Naples, Venice, Milan, and a thousand others—all fine.

Old Mir. Ay, say you so? and they say, that Chiari is very fine too.

Dur. Indifferent, Sir, very indifferent; a very scurvy air; the most unwholesome to a French constitution in the world.

Mir. Pshaw, nothing on't; these rascally gazetteers have misinformed you.

Old Mir. Misinformed me! Oons, Sir, were not we beaten there?

Mir. Beaten, Sir, the French beaten!

Old Mir. Why, how was it, pray, sweet Sir?

Mir. Sir, the captain will tell you.

Dur. No, Sir, your son will tell you.

Mir. The captain was in the action, Sir.

Dur. Your son saw more than I, Sir, for he was a looker on.

Old Mir. Confound you both for a brace of cowards: here are no Germans to overhear you; why don't ye tell me how it was?

Mir. Why, then you must know, that we marched up a body of the finest, bravest, well-dressed fellows in the universe; our commanders at the head of us, all lace and feather, like so many beaux at a ball—I don't believe there was a man of 'em but could dance a charmer, morbleau.

Old Mir. Dance! very well, pretty fellows, faith!

Mir. We capered up to their very trenches, and there saw peeping over a parcel of scarecrow, olive-coloured, gunpowder fellows, as ugly as the devil.

Dur. 'Egad, I shall never forget the looks of them while I have breath to fetch.

Mir. They were so civil indeed as to welcome us with their cannon; but for the rest, we found them such unmannerly, rude, unsoziabie dogs, that we grew tired of their company, and so we even danced back again.

Old Mir. And did ye all come back!

Mir. No, two or three thousand of us stayed behind.

Old Mir. Why Bob, why?

Mir. Pshaw—because they could not come that night.—But come, Sir, we were talking of something else: pray how does your lovely charge, the fair Oriana?

Old Mir. Ripe, Sir, just ripe; you'll find it better engaging with her than with the Germans, let me tell you. And what would you say, my young Mars, if I had a Venus for thee too? come, Bob, your apartment is ready, and pray let your friend be my guest too; you shall command the house between ye, and I'll be as merry as the best of you. [Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—OLD MIRABEL'S HOUSE.

Enter ORIANA and BISARRE.

Bis. And you love this young rake, d'ye?

Ori. Yes.

Bis. In spite of all his ill usage?

Ori. I can't help it.

Bis. What's the matter wi' ye?

Ori. Pshaw!

Bis. O, hang all your Cassandras and Cleopatras for me.—Pr'ythee mind your airs, modes, and fashions; your stays, gowns, and feathers.

Ori. Pr'ythee be quiet Bizarre; you know can be as mad as you when this Mirabel is out of my head.

Bis. I warrant now, you'll play the fool when he comes, and say you love him; eh?

Ori. Most certainly;—I can't dissemble, Bizarre:—besides, 'tis past that, we're contracted.

Bis. Contracted! alack-a-day, poor thing. What you have changed rings, or broken an old broad-piece between you! Well, I must confess, I do love a little coquetting with all my heart! my business should be to break gold with my lover one hour, and crack my promise the next; he should find me one day with a prayer-book in my hand, and with a play-book another; he should have my consent to buy the wedding-ring, and the next moment would laugh in his face.

Ori. O my dear, were there no greater tie upon my heart than there is upon my conscience, I would soon throw the contract out of doors; but the mischief on't is, I am so fond of being tied that I'm forced to be just, and the strength of my passion keeps down the inclination of my sex. But here's the old gentleman.

Enter OLD MIRABEL.

Old Mir. Where's my wenches? where's my two little girls, eh? have a care, look to yourselves, faith, they're a coming, the travellers are a coming. Well! which of you two will be my daughter-in-law now? Bizarre, Bizarre, what say you, mad-cap? Mirabel is a pure wild fellow.

Bis. I like him the worse.

Old Mir. You lie, hussy, you like him the better, indeed you do: what say you, my t'other little Filibert, eh?

Ori. I suppose the gentleman will choose for himself, Sir.

Old Mir. Why, that's discreetly said, and so he shall.

Enter MIRABEL and DURETETE, who salute the Ladies.

Bob, harkye, you shall marry one of these girls, Sirrah.

Mir. Sir, I'll marry 'em both, if you please.

Bis. He'll find that one may serve his turn.

[Aside.]

Old Mir. Both! Why, you young dog, d'ye banter me?—Come, Sir, take your choice.—Duretete, you shall have your choice too; but Robin shall choose first. Come, Sir, begin.

Mir. Let me see.

Old Mir. Well! which d'ye like?

Mir. Both.

Old Mir. But which will you marry?

Mir. Neither.

Old Mir. Neither.—Don't make me angry, now, Bob; pray don't make me angry.—Lookye, Sirrah, if I don't dance at your wedding to-morrow, I shall be very glad to cry at your grave.

Mir. That's a bull, father.

Old Mir. A bull! Why, how now, ungrateful Sir, did I make thee a man, that thou shouldst make me a beast?

Mir. Your pardon, Sir. I only meant your expression.

Old Mir. Harkye, Bob, learn better manners to your father before strangers: I wont be angry this time.—But, oons, if ever you do't it again, you rascal, remember what I say. [Exit.]

Mir. Pshaw, what does the old fellow mean by mewing me up here with a couple of green girls? Come, Duretete, will you go?

Ori. I hope, Mr. Mirabel, you han't forgot—

Mir. No, no, Madam, I han't forgot; I have brought you a thousand little Italian curiosities; I'll assure you, Madam, as far as a hundred pistols would reach, I han't forgot the least circumstance.

Ori. Sir, you misunderstand me.

Mir. Odsso, the relics, Madam, from Rome. I do remember now you made a vow of chastity before my departure; a vow of chastity or something like it; was it not, Madam?

Ori. O, Sir, I'm answered at present. [Exit.]

Mir. She was coming full mouth upon me with 'her' contract—Would I might despatch t'other. [To DUR.]

Dur. Mirabel—that lady there, observe her, she's wondrous pretty, faith, and seems to have but few words; I like her mainly; speak to her, man, pr'ythee speak to her. [Apart to MIRABEL.]

Mir. Madam, here's a gentleman, who declares—

Dur. Madam, don't believe him, I declare nothing—What the devil do you mean, man?

Mir. He says, Madam, that you are as beautiful as an angel.

Dur. He tells a damned lie, Madam; I say no such thing: are you mad, Mirabel? Why, I shall drop down with shame.

Mir. And so, Madam, not doubting but your ladyship may like him as well as he does you, I think it proper to leave you together.

[Going; DUR. holds him.]

Dur. Hold, hold—Why, Mirabel, friend, sure you won't be so barbarous as to leave me alone? Pr'ythee speak to her for yourself, as it were. Lord, Lord, that a Frenchman should want impudence!

Mir. You look mighty demure, Madam—She's deaf, captain. [Apart to DUR.]

Dur. I had much rather have her dumb.

[Apart.]

Mir. The gravity of your air, Madam, promises some extraordinary fruits from your study, which moves us with curiosity to inquire the subject of your ladyship's contemplation. Not a word!

Dur. I hope in the Lord she's speechless; if she be, she's mine this moment.—Mirabel, d'ye think a woman's silence can be natural?—

[Apart.]

Bis. But the forms that logicians introduce, and which proceed from simple enumeration, are dubitable, and proceed only upon admittance—

Mir. Hoity-toity! what a plague have we here? Plato in petticoats.

Dur. Ay, ay, let her go on, man; she talks in my own mother tongue.

Bis. 'Tis exposed to invalidity from a contradictory instance, looks only upon common operations, and is infinite in its termination.

Mir. Rare pedantry.

Dur. Axioms! Axioms! Self evident principles.

Bis. Then the ideas wherewith the mind is preoccupate.—O gentlemen, I hope you'll pardon my cogitation; I was involved in a profound point of philosophy; but I shall discuss it somewhere else, being satisfied that the subject is not agreeable to your sparks that profess the vanity of the times. [Exit.]

Mir. Go thy way, good wife Bias: do you hear

Duretete? Dost hear this starched piece of austerity?

Dur. She's mine, man; she's mine: my own talent to a T. I'll match her in dialects, faith, I was seven years at the university, man, nursed up with Barbara, Celarunt, Darii, Ferio, Baralip-ton! Did you ever know, man, that 'twas metaphysics made me an ass? It was, faith. Had she talked a word of singing, dancing, plays, fashions, or the like, I had fundered at the first step; but as she is—Mirabel, wish me joy.

Mir. You don't mean marriage, I hope?

Dur. No, no, I am a man of more honour.

Mir. Bravely resolved, captain; now for thy credit, warm me this frozen snow-ball, 'twill be a conquest above the Alps.

Dur. But will you promise to be always near me?

Mir. Upon all occasions, never fear.

Dur. Why then you shall see me in two moments make an induction from my love to her hand, from her hand to her mouth, from her mouth to her heart, and so conclude in her bed, categorematic. [Exit.]

Mir. Now the game begins, and my fool is entered.—But here comes one to spoil my sport; now shall I be teased to death with this old-fashioned contract. I should love her too, if I might do it my own way; but she'll do nothing without witnesses, forsooth. I wonder women can be so immodest.

Enter ORIANA.

Well, Madam, why d'ye ye follow me?

Ori. Well, Sir, why do ye shun me?

Mir. 'Tis my humour, Madam, and I'm naturally swayed by inclination.

Ori. Have you forgot our contract, Sir?

Mir. All I remember of that contract is, that it was made some three years ago, and that 's enough in conscience to forget the rest on't.

Ori. 'Tis sufficient, Sir, to recollect the passing of it; for in that circumstance I presume lies the force of the obligation.

Mir. Obligations, Madam, that are forced upon the will are no tie upon the conscience; I was a slave to my passion when I passed the instrument; but the recovery of my freedom makes the contract void.

Ori. Come, Mr. Mirabel, these expressions I expected from the rallery of your humour, but I hope for very different sentiments from your honour and generosity.

Mir. Lookye, Madam, as for my generosity, 'tis at your service, with all my heart: I'll keep you a coach and six horses, if you please, only permit me to keep my honour to myself; for I can assure you, Madam, that the thing called honour is a circumstance absolutely unnecessary in a natural correspondence between male and female; and he's a madman that lays it out, considering its scarcity, upon any such trivial occasions. There's honour required of us by our friends, and honour due to our enemies, and they return it to us again; but I never heard of a man that left but an inch of his honour in a woman's keeping, that could ever get the least account on't.—Consider, Madam, you have no such thing among ye, and 'tis a main point of policy to keep no faith with reprobates—thou art a pretty little reprobate, and so get thee about thy business.

Ori. Well, Sir, even all this I will allow t' the gaiety of your temper; your travels have improved your talent of talking, but they are not of force, I hope, to impair your morals.

Mir. Morals! Why there 'tis again now—I tell thee, child, there is not the least occasion for morals in any business between you and I—Don't you know, that of all commerce in the world there is no such cozenage and deceit as in the traffic between man and woman? We study all our lives long how to put tricks upon one another—No fowler lays abroad more nets for his game, nor a hunter for his prey, than you do to catch poor innocent men—Why do you sit three or four hours at your toilette in a morning? only with a villainous design to make some poor fellow a fool before night. What d'ye sigh for? What d'ye weep for? What d'ye pray for? Why, for a husband. That is, you implore Providence to assist you in the just and pious design of making the wisest of his creatures a fool, and the head of the creation a slave.

Ori. Sir, I am proud of my power, and am resolved to use it.

Mir. Hold, hold, Madam, not so fast—As you have variety of vanities to make coxcombs of us so we have vows, oaths, and protestations, of all sorts and sizes, to make fools of you. And this, in short, my dear creature, is our present condition. I have sworn and lied briskly to gain my ends of you; your ladyship has patched and painted violently to gain your ends of me.—But since we are both disappointed, let us make a drawn battle, and part clear on both sides.

Ori. With all my heart, Sir; give me up my contract, and I'll never see your face again.

Mir. Indeed I won't, child.

Ori. What, Sir, neither do one nor t'other?

Mir. No; you shall die a maid, unless you please to be otherwise upon my terms.

Ori. Sir, you're a—

Mir. What am I, mistress?

Ori. A villain, Sir!

Mir. I'm glad on't—I never knew an honest fellow in my life, but was a villain upon these occasions.—Ha'n't you drawn yourself now into a very pretty dilemma? Ha, ha, ha! the poor lady has made a vow of virginity, when she thought of making a vow for the contrary. Was ever poor woman so cheated into chastity?

Ori. Sir, my fortune is equal to yours, my friends as powerful, and both shall be put to the test, to do me justice.

Mir. What! you'll force me to marry you, will ye?

Ori. Sir, the law shall.

Mir. But the law can't force me to do any thing else, can it?

Ori. Pshaw, I despise thee—monster.

Mir. Kiss and be friends then—Don't cry, child, and you shall have your sugar-plum—Come, Madam, d'ye think I could be so unreasonable as to make you fast all your life long? No, I did but jest, you shall have your liberty; here, take your contract, and give me mine.

Ori. No, I won't.

Mir. Eh! What, is the girl a fool?

Ori. No, Sir, you shall find me cunning enough to do myself justice; and since I must not depend upon your love, I'll be revenged, and force you to marry me out of spite.

Mir. Then I'll beat thee out of spite; and make a most confounded husband.

Ori. O Sir, I shall match ye: a good husband makes a good wife at any time.

Mir. I'll rattle down your china about your ears.

Ori. And I'll rattle about the city to run you in debt for more.

Mir. I'll tear the lace off your clothes, and when you swoon for vexation, you shan't have a penny to buy a bottle of hartshorn.

Ori. And you, Sir, shall have hartshorn in abundance.

Mir. I'll keep as many mistresses as I have coach-horses.

Ori. And I'll keep as many gallants as you have grooms.

Mir. But, sweet Madam, there is such a thing as a divorce.

Ori. But, sweet Sir, there is such a thing as alimony; so, divorce on, and spare not. [Exit.]

Mir. Ay, that separate maintenance is the devil—that's their refuge—o'my conscience, one would take cuckoldom for a meritorious action; because the women are so handsomely rewarded for't. [Exit.]

Enter DURETETE and PETIT.

Dur. And she's mighty peevish, you say?

Pet. O Sir, she's a tongue as long as my leg, and talks so crabbedly, you would think she always spoke Welsh.

Dur. That's an odd language methinks for her philosophy.

Pet. But sometimes she will sit you half a day without speaking a word, and talk oracles all the while by the wrinkles of her forehead, and the motions of her eyebrows.

Dur. Nay, I shall match her in philosophical ogles; faith; that's my talent: I can talk best, you must know, when I say nothing.

Pet. But d'ye ever laugh, Sir?

Dur. Laugh? Won't she endure laughing?

Pet. Why she's a critic, Sir; she hates a jest, for fear it should please her; and nothing keeps her in humour but what gives her the spleen: And then for logic, and all that, you know—

Dur. Ay, ay, I'm prepared: I have been practising hard words, and no sense, this hour, to entertain her.

Pet. Then place yourself behind this screen, that you may have a view of her behaviour before you begin.

Dur. I long to engage her, lest I should forget my lesson.

Pet. Here she comes, Sir, I must fly.

[Exit PETIT; DURETETE stands peeping behind the curtain.]

Enter BISARRE, with a book, and MAID.

Bis. Pshaw, hang books, they sour our temper, spoil our eyes, and ruin our complexions.

[Throws away the book.]

Dur. Eh! the devil such a word there is in all Aristotle.

Bis. Come, wench, let's be free, call in the fiddler, there's nobody near us.

Dur. Would to the Lord there was not.

Bis. Here, friend, a minut!—quicker time; ha—would we had a man or two.

Dur. [Stealing away.] You shall have the devil sooner, my dear dancing philosopher!

Bis. Od's my life!—Here's one.

[Pulls him back.]

Dur. Is all my learned preparation come to this?

Bis. Come, Sir, don't be ashamed, that's my good boy—you're very welcome, we wanted such a one—Come, strike up. I know you dance well, Sir, you're finely shaped for't—Come, come, Sir; quick, quick, you miss the time else.

Dur. But, Madam, I came to talk with you.

Bis. Ay, ay, talk as you dance, talk as you dance, come.

Dur. But we were talking of dialectics.

Bis. Hang dialectics—Mind the time—quick-er, sirrah. [To the fiddler.] Come—and how d'ye find yourself now, Sir?

Dur. In a fine breathing sweat, doctor.

Bis. All the better, patient, all the better—Come, Sir, sing now, sing; I know you sing well; I see you have a singing face, a heavy, dull, sonata face.

Dur. Who, I sing?

Bis. O, you're modest, Sir—but come, sit down; closer, closer—Here, a bottle of wine—Come, Sir, fa, la, la; sing, Sir.

Dur. But, Madam, I came to talk with you.

Bis. O Sir, you shall drink first. Come, fill me a bumper—here, Sir, bless the king.

Dur. Would I were out of his dominions! By this light, she'll make me drunk too. [Aside.]

Bis. O pardon me, Sir, you shall do me right; fill it higher.—Now, Sir, can you drink a health under your leg?

Dur. Rare philosophy that, faith.

Bis. Come, off with it to the bottom.—Now, how d'ye like me, Sir?

Dur. O, mighty well, Madam!

Bis. You see how a woman's fancy varies; sometimes splenetic and heavy, then gay and frolicsome.—And how d'ye like the humour?

Dur. Good Madam, let me sit down to answer you, for I am heartily tired.

Bis. Fie upon't; a young man, and tired! up, for shame, and walk about; action becomes us—a little faster, Sir—What d'ye think now of my lady La Pale, and lady Coquet, the duke's fair daughter? Ha! Are they not brisk lasses? Then there is black Mrs. Bellair, and brown Mrs. Bellface.

Dur. They are all strangers to me, Madam.

Bis. But let me tell you, Sir, that brown is not always despicable.

Dur. Upon my soul, I don't—

Bis. And then you must have heard of the English beau, Spleenamore, how unlike a gentleman—

Dur. Hey—not a syllable on't, as I hope to be saved, Madam.

Bis. No! why then play me a jig. Come, Sir.

Dur. By this light, I cannot; faith, Madam, I have sprained my leg.

Bis. Then sit you down, Sir: and now tell me what's your business with me? What's your errand? Quick, quick, despatch—Odsso, may be you are some gentleman's servant, that has brought me a letter, or a haunch of venison.

Dur. 'Sdeath! Madam, do I look like a carrier?

Bis. O, cry you mercy; I saw you just now, I mistook you, upon my word: you are one of the travelling gentlemen—and pray, Sir, how do all our impudent friends in Italy?

Dur. Madam, I came to wait on you with a more serious intention, than your entertainment has answered.

Bis. Sir, your intention of waiting on me was the greatest affront imaginable, however your expressions may turn it to a compliment; your visit, Sir, was intended as a prologue to a very scurvy play, of which Mr. Mirabel and you so handsomely laid the plot.—“Marry! No, no, I'm a man of more honour.” Where's your honour? Where's your courage now? Ads my life, Sir, I have a great mind to kick you.—Go, go to your fellow-rake now, rail at my sex, and get drunk for vexation, and write a lampoon—But I must have you to know, Sir, that my reputation is above the scandal of a libel, my virtue is sufficiently approved to those whose opinion is my interest: and, for the rest, let them talk what they will; for when I please, I'll be what I please, in spite of you and all mankind; and so, my dear man of honour, if you be tired, con over this lesson, and sit there till I come to you. [Runs off.]

Dur. Tum ti dum. [Sings.] Ha, ha, ha! —“Ads my life, I have a great mind to kick you!” —Oons and confusion! [Starts up.] Was ever man so abused?—Ay, Mirabel set me on.

Re-enter PETIT.

Pet. Well, Sir, how d'ye find yourself?

Dur. You son of a nine-eyed whore, d'ye come to abuse me? I'll kick you with a vengeance, you dog.

[PETIT runs off, and DUR. after him.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The same.

Enter OLD MIRABEL and MIRABEL.

Old Mir. Bob, come hither, Bob.

Mir. Your pleasure, Sir?

Old Mir. Are not you a great rogue, sirrah?

Mir. That's a little out of my comprehension, Sir; for I've heard say that I resemble my father.

Old Mir. Your father is your very humble slave—I tell thee what, child, thou art a very pretty fellow, and I love thee heartily; and a very great villain, and I hate thee mortally.

Mir. Villain, Sir! Then I must be a very impudent one, for I can't recollect any passage of my life that I'm ashamed of.

Old Mir. Come hither, my dear friend; dost see this picture? [Shows him a little picture.]

Mir. Oriana's! Pshaw!

Old Mir. What Sir, won't you look upon't? —Bob, dear Bob, prythee come hither now—Dost want any money, child?

Mir. No, Sir.

Old Mir. Why then here's some for thee; come here now—How canst thou be so hard-hearted, an unnatural, unmanly rascal (don't mistake me, child, I an't angry,) as to abuse this tender, lovely, good-natured, dear rogue?—Why, she sighs for thee, and cries for thee, pouts for thee, and snubs for thee; the poor little heart of it is like to burst—Come, my dear boy, be good-natured like your own father, be now—and then see here, read this—the effigies of the lovely Oriana, with ten thousand pounds to her portion—ten thousand pounds, you dog; ten thousand pounds, you rogue. How dare you refuse a lady with ten thousand pounds, you impudent rascal?

Mir. Will you hear me speak, Sir?

Old Mir. Hear you speak, Sir! If you had ten thousand tongues, you could not out-talk ten thousand pounds, Sir.

Mir. Nay, Sir, if you won't hear me, I'll be gone, Sir! I'll take post for Italy this moment.

Old Mir. Ah! the fellow knows I won't part with him. [Aside.] Well, Sir, what have you to say?

Mir. The universal reception, Sir, that marriage has had in the world, is enough to fix it for a public good, and to draw every body into the common cause; but there are some constitutions like some instruments, so peculiarly singular, that they make terrible music by themselves, but never do well in a concert.

Old Mir. Why this is reason, I must confess; but yet it is nonsense too: for though you should reason like an angel, if you argue yourself out of a good estate, you talk like a fool.

Mir. But, Sir, if you bribe into bondage with the riches of Cæsus, you leave me but a beggar for want of my liberty.

Old Mir. Was ever such a perverse fool heard? 'Sdeath, Sir, why did I give you education? was it to dispute me out of my senses? Of what colour now is the head of this cane? You'll say 'tis white, and ten to one make me believe it too—I thought that young fellows studied to get money.

Mir. No, Sir, I have studied to despise it; my reading was not to make me rich, but happy, Sir.

Old Mir. There he has me again now. [Aside.] But, Sir, did not I marry to oblige you?

Mir. To oblige me, Sir! In what respect, pray?

Old Mir. Why, to bring you into the world, Sir; wa'n't that an obligation?

Mir. And because I would have it still an obligation, I avoid marriage.

Old Mir. How is that, Sir?

Mir. Because I would not curse the hour I was born.

Old Mir. Lookye, friend, you may persuade me out of my designs, but I'll command you out of yours; and though you may convince my reason that you are in the right, yet there is an old attendant of sixty-three, called positiveness, which you, nor all the wits in Italy, shall ever be able to shake: so, Sir, you're a wit, and I'm a father: you may talk, but I'll be obeyed.

Mir. This it is to have the son a finer gentleman than the father; they first give us breeding that they don't understand, then they turn us out of doors 'cause we are wiser than themselves. But I'm a little beforehand with the old gentleman.

[Aside.] Sir, you have been pleased to settle a thousand pounds sterling a year upon me; in return of which, I have a very great honour for you and your family, and shall take care that your only and beloved son shall do nothing to make him hate his father, or to hang himself. So, dear Sir, I'm your very humble servant.

[Runs off.]

Old Mir. Here, sirrah, rogue, Bob, villain!

Enter DUGARD.

Dug. Ah, Sir, 'tis but what he deserves.

Old Mir. 'Tis false, Sir, he don't deserve it; what have you to say against my boy, Sir?

Dug. I shall only repeat your own words.

Old Mir. What have you to do with my words? I have swallowed my words already, I have eaten them up, and how can you come at 'em, Sir?—I say that Bob's an honest fellow, and who dares deny it?

VOL. I. . . . Z

Enter BISARRE.

Bis. That dare I, Sir—I say that your son is a wild, foppish, whimsical, impertinent coxcomb; and were I abused as this gentleman's sister is, I would make it an Italian quarrel, and poison the whole family.

Dug. Come, Sir, 'tis no time for trifling; my sister is abused, you are made sensible of the affront, and your honour is concerned to see her redressed.

Old Mir. Lookye, Mr. Dugard, good words go farthest. I will do your sister justice, but it must be after my own rate; nobody must abuse my son but myself. For although Robin be a sad dog, yet he's nobody's puppy but my own.

Bis. Ay, that's my sweet-natured, kind old gentleman—[Wheeling him.] We will be good then, if you'll join with us in the plot.

Old Mir. Ah, you coaxing young baggage, what plot can you have to wheedle a fellow of sixty-three?

Bis. A plot that sixty-three is only good for, to bring other people together, Sir: a Spanish Plot, less dangerous than that of eighty-eight; and you must act the Spaniard, 'cause your son will least suspect you; and if he should, your authority protects you from a quarrel, to which Oriana is unwilling to expose her brother.

Old Mir. And what part will you act in the business, Madam?

Bis. Myself, Sir. My friend is grown a perfect changeling: these foolish hearts of ours spoil our heads presently; the fellows no sooner turn knaves, but we turn fools. But I am still myself; and he may expect the most severe usage from me, 'cause I neither love him nor hate him. [Exit.]

Old Mir. Well said, Mrs. Paradox; but, Sir, who must open the matter to him?

Dug. Petit, Sir, who is our engineer-general. And here he comes.

Enter PETIT.

Pet. O, Sir, more discoveries! are all friends about us?

Dug. Ay, ay, speak freely.

Pet. You must know, Sir—Od's my life, I'm out of breath; you must know, Sir—you must know—

Old Mir. What the devil must we know, Sir?

Pet. That I have [Pants and blows.] bribed, Sir, bribed—your son's secretary of state.

Old Mir. Secretary of state!—who's that, for heaven's sake?

Pet. His valet-de-chambre, Sir! you must know, Sir, that the intrigue lay folded up with his master's clothes; and when he went to dust the embroidered suit, the secret flew out of the right pocket of his coat, in a whole swarm of your cranbo songs, short-footed odes, and long-legged Pindarics.

Old Mir. Impossible!

Pet. Ah, Sir, he has loved her all along; there was Oriana in every line, but he hates marriage. Now, Sir, this plot will stir up his jealousy, and we shall know by the strength of that how to proceed farther.—Come, Sir, let's about it with speed. [Exeunt.]

Enter MIRABEL and BISARRE, passing carelessly by one another.

Bis. I wonder what she can see in this fellow to like him!

[Aside.]

Mir. I wonder what my friend can see in this girl to admire her!

Bis. A wild, foppish, extravagant rake.

Mir. A light, whimsical, impertinent madcap.

Bis. Whom do you mean, Sir?

Mir. Whom do you mean, Madam?

Bis. A fellow that has nothing left to re-establish him for a human creature, but a prudent resolution to hang himself.

Mir. There is a way, Madam, to force me to that resolution.

Bis. I'll do it with all my heart.

Mir. Then you must marry me.

Bis. Lookye, Sir, don't think your ill manners o me shall excuse your ill usage of my friend, nor by fixing a quarrel here, to divert my zeal for the absent: for I'm resolved, nay, I come prepared, to make you a panegyric that shall mortify your pride like any modern dedication.

Mir. And I, Madam, like a true modern patron, shall hardly give you thanks for your trouble.

Bis. Come, Sir, to let you see what little foundation you have for your dear sufficiency, I'll take you to pieces.

Mir. And what piece will you choose?

Bis. Your heart, to be sure; 'cause I should get presently rid on't; your courage I would give to a Hector, your wit to a play-maker, your honour to an attorney, your body to the physicians, and your soul to its Master.

Mir. I had the oddest dream last night of the duchess of Burgundy; methought the furbelows of her gown were pinned up so high behind, that I could not see her head for her tail.

Bis. The creature don't mind me! [Aside.] Do you think, Sir, that your humourous impertinence can divert me? No, Sir, I'm above any pleasure that you can give, but that of seeing you miserable. And mark me, Sir, my friend, my injured friend, shall yet be doubly happy, and you shall be a husband as much as the rites of marriage, and the breach of them, can make you.

[MIRABEL pulls out a Virgil, and reads to himself.]

Mir. "At regina dolos, (quis fallere possit amantem?)

Dissimulare etiam sperasti, perfide tantum,"
Very true,
"Posse nefas."

By your favour, friend Virgil, 'twas but a rascally trick of your hero to forsake poor Pug so inhumanly.

Bis. I don't know what to say to him. [Aside.] The devil—what's Virgil to us, Sir?

Mir. Very much, Madam; the most a-propos in the world—for what should I chop upon but the very place where the perjured rogue of a lover and the forsaken lady are battling it tooth and nail. Come, Madam, spend your spirits no longer; we'll take an easier method; I'll be Æneas now, and you shall be Dido, and we'll rail by book. Now for you, Madam Dido.

"Nec te noster amor, nec te data dextera quondam, Nec moritura tenet crudeli funere Dido."—

Ah, poor Dido!

Bis. Rudeness, affronts, impatience! I could almost start out even to manhood, and want but a weapon as long as his to fight him upon the spot. What shall I say?

Mir. Now she rants—

"Quæ quibus anteferam? Jam jam nec maxima Juno."

Bis. A man! No, the woman's birth was spirited away.

Mir. Right, right, Madam: the very words.
Bis. And some pernicious elf left in the cradle, with human shape, to palliate growing mischief.

[Speak together, and raise their voices by degrees.]

Mir. "Perfide, sed duris genuit te cautibus horrens

Caucasus, Hyrcanæque admorunt Ubera Tygræs."

Bis. Go, Sir, fly to your midnight revels—

Mir. Excellent!

"I sequere Italiam ventis, pete regna per undas, Spero epidem mediis, si quid pia Numina possunt."

Bis. Now the devil take his impudence! he vexes me so, I don't know whether to cry or laugh at him.

Mir. Bravely performed, my dear Libyan. I'll write the tragedy of Dido, and you shall act the part: but you do nothing at all, unless you fret yourself into a fit, for here the poor lady is stifled with vapours, drops into the arms of her maids; and the cruel, barbarous, deceitful wanderer is in the very next line called pious Æneas.—There's authority for ye.

Sorry indeed Æneas stood

To see her in a pout;

But Jove himself, who ne'er thought good

To stay a second bout,

Commands him off with all his crew,

And leaves poor Dy, as I leave you.

[Runs off.]

Bis. Go thy ways, for a dear, mad, deceitful, agreeable fellow. O my conscience, I must excuse Oriana.

That lover soon his angry fair disarms.

Whose slighting pleases, and whose faults are charms.

Re-enter PETIT, who runs about to every door, and knocks.

Pet. Mr. Mirabel! Sir, where are you? nowhere to be found?

Re-enter MIRABEL.

Mir. What's the matter, Petit?

Pet. Most critically met—Ah, Sir, that one who has followed the game so long, and brought the poor hare just under his paws, should let a mongrel cur chop in, and run away with the puss.

Mir. If your worship can get out of your allegories, be pleased to tell me in three words what you mean!

Pet. Plain, plain, Sir. Your mistress and mine is going to be married.

Mir. I believe you lie, Sir.

Pet. Your humble servant, Sir.

Mir. Come hither, Petit. Married, say you?

Pet. No, Sir, 'tis no matter; I only thought to do you a service, but I shall take care how I confer my favours for the future.

Mir. Sir, I beg ten thousand pardons.

[Bows low.]

Pet. 'Tis enough, Sir—I come to tell you, Sir, that Oriana is this moment to be sacrificed; married past redemption.

Mir. I understand her; she'll take a husband out of spite to me, and then out of love to me she will make him a cuckold. But who is the happy man?

Pet. A lord, Sir.

Mir. I'm her ladyship's most humble servant; a train and a title; hey! Room for my lady's coach! a front row in the box for her ladyship! Lights, lights, for her honour!—Now must I be a constant attender at my lord's levee, to work my way to my lady's couchee—a countess, I presume, Sir.

Pet. A Spanish count, Sir, that Mr. Dugard knew abroad, is come to Paris, saw your mistress yesterday, marries her to-day, and whips her into Spain to-morrow.

Mir. Ay, is it so? and must I follow my cuckold over the Pyrennees? Had she married within the precincts of a billet-doux, I would be the man to lead her to church; but, as it happens, I'll forbid the banns. Where is this mighty don?

Pet. Have a care, Sir; he's a rough, cross-grained piece, and there's no tampering with him. Would you apply to Mr. Dugard, or the lady herself, something might be done; for it is in despite to you that the business is carried so hastily. Odsó, Sir, here he comes. I must be gone. [Exit.]

Re-enter OLD MIRABEL, dressed in a Spanish habit, leading ORIANA.

Ori. Good, my lord, a nobler choice had better suited your lordship's merit. My person, rank, and circumstance expose me as the public theme of railery, and subject me so to injurious usage, my lord, that I can lay no claim to any part of your regard, except your pity.

Old Mir. Breathes he vital air, that dares presume

With rude behaviour to profane such excellence? Show me the man—

And you shall see how my sudden revenge Shall fall upon the head of such presumption.

Is this thing one? [Strutting up to MIRABEL.]

Mir. Sir!

Ori. Good, my lord.

Old Mir. If he, or any he—

Ori. Pray, my lord, the gentleman's a stranger.

Old Mir. O, your pardon, Sir—but if you had—remember, Sir—the lady now is mine, her injuries are mine; therefore, Sir, you understand me—Come, Madam.

[Leads ORIANA to the door; she goes off. MIRABEL runs to his father, and pulls him by the sleeve.]

Mir. Ecoutez, Monsieur le Count.

Old Mir. Your business, Sir?

Mir. Boh!

Old Mir. Boh! What language is that, Sir?

Mir. Spanish, my lord.

Old Mir. What d'ye mean?

Mir. This, Sir. [Trips up his heels.]

Old Mir. A very concise quarrel, truly—I'll bully him. [Aside.] Trinitade Seigneur, give me fair play. [Offers to rise.]

Mir. By all means, Sir. [Takes away his sword.] Now, Seigneur, where's that bombast look and fustian face your countship wore just now? [Strikes him.]

Old Mir. But hold, sirrah, no more jesting; I'm your father, Sir, your father!

Mir. My father! Then by this light I could find in my heart to pay thee. [Aside.] Is the fellow mad? Why sure, Sir, I ha'n't frightened you out of your senses?

Old Mir. But you have, Sir.

Mir. Then I'll beat them into you again.

[Offers to strike him.]
Old Mir. Why, rogue—Bob, dear Bob, don't you know me, child?

Mir. Ha, ha, ha! the fellow's downright distracted! Thou miracle of impudence! wouldst thou make me believe that such a grave gentleman as my father would go a masquerading thus? That a person of threescore and three would run about in a fool's coat to disgrace himself and family? Why, you impudent villain, do you think I will suffer such an affront to pass upon my honoured father, my worthy father, my dear father? 'Seath, Sir, mention my father but once again, and I'll send your soul to thy grandfather this minute! [Offers to stab him.]

Old Mir. Well, well, I am not your father.

Mir. Why then, Sir, you are the saucy, hectoring Spaniard, and I'll use you accordingly.

Old Mir. The devil take the Spaniards, Sir: we have all got nothing but blows since we began to take their part.

Re-enter DUGARD, ORIANA, and PETIT; with MAID. DUGARD runs to MIRABEL, the rest to OLD MIRABEL.

Dag. Fie, fie, Mirabel, murder your father!

Mir. My father! What, is the whole family mad? Give me way, Sir: I won't be held.

Old Mir. No, nor I either; let me be gone, pray.

Mir. My father!

[Offers to go.]

Old Mir. Ay, your dog's face! I am your father; and I have bore as much for thee as your mother ever did.

Mir. O ho! then this was a trick it seems, a design, a contrivance, a stratagem—Oh! how my bones ache!

Old Mir. Your bones, sirrah; why yours?

Mir. Why, Sir, ha'n't I been beating my own flesh and blood all this while? O, Madam. [To ORIANA.] I wish your ladyship joy of your new dignity. Here was a contrivance indeed.

Pet. The contrivance was well enough, Sir; for they imposed upon us all.

Mir. Well, my dear Dulcinea, did your Don Quixote battle for you bravely? My father will answer for the force of my love.

Ori. Pray, Sir, don't insult the misfortunes of your own creating.

Dug. My prudence will be counted cowardice, if I stand tamely now. [Aside.] Comes up between MIRABEL and his sister. Well, Sir!

Mir. Well, Sir! Do you take me for one of your tenants, Sir, that you put on your landlord face at me!

Dug. On what presumption, Sir, dare you assume thus? [Draws.]

Old Mir. What's that to you, Sir? [Draws.]

Pet. Help! help! the lady faints.

Mir. Vapours! vapours! she'll come to herself. If it be an angry fit, a dram of assafetida—If jealousy, hartshorn in water—If the mother, burnt feathers—If grief, ratifia—If it be strait stays or corns, there's nothing like a dram of plain brandy. [Exit.]

Ori. Hold off; give me air—O, my brother, would you preserve my life, endanger not your own; would you defend my reputation, leave it to itself. 'Tis a dear vindication that's purchased by the sword; for though our champion proves victorious, yet our honour is wounded.

Old Mir. Ay, and your lover may be wounded, that's another thing. But I think you are pretty brisk again, my child.

Ori. Ay, Sir, my indisposition was only a pretence to divert the quarrel; the capricious taste of your sex excuses this artifice in ours:

*For often, when our chief perfections fail,
Our chief defects with foolish men prevail.*

[Exit.]

Pet. Come, Mr. Dugard, take courage; there is a way still left to fetch him again.

Old Mir. Sir, I'll have no plot that has any relation to Spain.

Dug. I scorn all artifice whatsoever; my sword shall do her justice.

Pet. Pretty justice, truly! Suppose you run him through the body; you run her through the heart at the same time.

Old Mir. And me through the head—rot your sword, Sir; we'll have plots; come, Petit, let's hear.

Pet. What if she pretended to go into a nunnery, and so bring him about to declare himself?

Dug. That I must confess has a face.

Old Mir. A face! A face like an angel, Sir. Ads my life, Sir, 'Tis the most beautiful plot in Christendom. We'll about it immediately.

[Exit.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—Old Mirabel's House.

Enter Old Mirabel and Dugard.

Dug. The lady abbess is my relation, and privy to the plot.

Old Mir. Ay, ay, this nunnery will bring him about, I warrant ye.

Enter Duretete.

Dur. Here, where are ye all?—O! Mr. Mirabel, you have done fine things for your posterity—And you, Mr. Dugard, may come to answer this—I come to demand my friend at your hands: restore him, Sir, or—

[To Old Mirabel.]

Old Mir. Restore him! What, d'ye think I have got him in my trunk, or my pocket?

Dur. Sir, he's mad, and you're the cause on't.

Old Mir. That may be; for I was as mad as he when I begot him.

Dug. Mad, Sir! what d'ye mean?

Dur. What do you mean, Sir, by shutting up your sister yonder to talk like a parrot through a cage? or a decoy duck, to draw others into the snare? Your son, Sir, because she has deserted him, has forsaken the world; and in three words, has—

[To Old Mirabel.]

Old Mir. Hanged himself!

Dur. The very same—turned friar.

Old Mir. You lie, Sir; 'tis ten times worse. Bob turned friar!—Why should the fellow shave his foolish crown, when the same razor may cut his throat?

Dur. If you have any command, or you any interest over him, lose not a minute; he has thrown himself into the next monastery, and has ordered me to pay off his servants, and discharge his equipage.

Old Mir. Let me alone to ferret him out; I'll sacrifice the abbot, if he receives him; I'll try whether the spiritual or the natural father has the most right to the child.—But, dear captain, what has he done with his estate?

Dur. Settled it upon the church, Sir.

Old Mir. The church! Nay, then the devil won't get him out of their clutches—Ten thousand livres a year upon the church! 'Tis downright sacrilege—Come, gentleman, all hands to work; for half that sum, one of these monasteries shall protect you a traitor from the law, a rebellious wife from her husband, and a disobedient son from his own father.

Dug. But will you persuade me that he's gone to a monastery?

Dur. Is your sister gone to the Filles Repenties? I tell you, Sir, she's not fit for the society of repenting maids.

Dug. Why so, Sir?

Dur. Because she's neither one nor t'other; she's too old to be a maid, and too young to repent.

[Exit.]

SCENE II.—The Inside of a Monastery.

ORIANA discovered in a Nun's habit, with BISARRE.

Ori. I hope, Bisarre, there is no harm in jesting with this religious habit?

Bis. To me, the greatest jest in the habit is taking it in earnest: I don't understand this imprisoning people with the keys of paradise, nor the merit of that virtue which comes by constraint. But I must be gone upon my affairs; I have brought my captain about again.

Ori. But why will you trouble yourself with that coxcomb?

Bis. Because he is a coxcomb; had I not better have a lover like him, that I can make an ass of, than a lover like yours, to make a fool of me. [Knocking below.] A message from Mirabel, I'll lay my life. [She runs to the door.] Come hither, run; thou charming nun, come hither.

Ori. What's the news?

Bis. Don't you see who's below?

Ori. I see nobody but a friar.

Bis. Ah! thou poor blind Cupid! O my conscience, these hearts of ours spoil our heads instantly! the fellows no sooner turn knives than we turn fools. A friar! don't you see a villanous genteel mien under that cloak of hypocrisy?

Ori. As I live, Mirabel turned friar! I hope in heaven, he's not in earnest.

Bis. In earnest? ha, ha, ha! are you in earnest? Now's your time; this disguise he has certainly taken for a passport, to get in and try your resolutions; stick to your habit, to be sure; treat him with disdain, rather than anger: for pride becomes us more than passion; remember what I say, if you would yield to advantage, and hold out the attack; to draw him on, keep him off, to be sure.

*The cunning gamesters never gain too fast,
But lose at first, to win the more at last.*

[Exit.]

Enter Mirabel in a Friar's habit.

Mir. Save you, sister—Your brother, young lady, having a regard for your soul's health, hath sent me to prepare you for the sacred habit by confession.

Ori. That's false; the cloven foot already.

[Aside.] My brother's care I own; and to you, sacred Sir, I confess, that the great crying sin which I have long indulged, and now prepare to expiate, was love.

Mir. She's downright stark mad in earnest; death and confusion, I have lost her! [Aside.] You confess your fault, Madam, in such moving terms, that I could almost be in love with the sin.

Ori. Take care, Sir; crimes, like virtues, are their own rewards; my chief delight became my only grief; he in whose breast I thought my heart secure, turned robber, and despoiled the treasure that he kept.

Mir. Perhaps that treasure he esteems so much, that, like the miser, though afraid to use it, he reserves it safe.

Ori. No, holy father: who can be miser in another's wealth, that's prodigal of his own? His heart was open, shared to all he knew; and what, alas! must then become of mine? but the same eyes that drew this passion in, shall send it out in tears, to which now hear my vow—

Mir. [Discovering himself.] No, my fair angel, but let me repent: here on my knees, behold the criminal that vows repentance his.—Ha! no concern upon her?

Enter OLD MIRABEL.

Old Mir. Where, where's this counterfeit nun?

Ori. Madness! confusion! I'm ruined!

Mir. What do I hear? [Puts on his hood.] What did you say, Sir?

Old Mir. I say she's a counterfeit, and you may be another, for aught I know, Sir; I have lost my child by these tricks, Sir.

Mir. What tricks, Sir?

Old Mir. By a pretended trick, Sir. A contrivance to bring my son to reason, and it has made him stark mad; I have lost him and a thousand pounds a year.

Mir. [Discovering himself.] My dear father, I'm your most humble servant.

Old Mir. My dear boy, welcome ex inferis, my dear boy; 'tis all a trick, she's no more a nun than I am.

Mir. No!

Old Mir. The devil a bit.

Mir. Then thank ye, my dear dad, for the most happy news—And now, most venerable holy sister

[Kneels.

*Your mercy and your pardon I implore,
For the offence of asking it before.*

Lookye, my dear counterfeiting nun, take my advice, be a nun in good earnest; women make the best nuns always when they can't do otherwise.

Ori. O! Sir, how, unhappily have you destroyed what was so near perfection! He is the counterfeit that has deceived you.

Old Mir. Ha! Lookye, Sir, I recant, she is a nun.

Mir. Sir, your humble servant, then I'm a friar this moment.

Old Mir. Was ever an old fool so bantered by a brace o' young ones; hang you both, you're both counterfeits, and my plot's spoiled, that's all.

Ori. Shame and confusion, love, anger, and disappointment, will work my brain to madness.

[Exit.

Mir. Ay, ay; throw by the rags, they have served a turn for us both, and they shall e'en go off together.

[Exit, throwing away the habit.

SCENE III—OLD MIRABEL'S House.

Enter DURETETE, with a letter.

Dur. [Reads.] My rudeness was only a proof of your honour, which I have found so agreeable, that I own myself penitent, and willing to make any reparation upon your first appearance to BISARRE.

Mirabel swears she loves me, and this confirms it; then farewell gallantry, and welcome revenge; 'tis my turn now to be upon the sublime; I'll take her off, I warrant her.

Enter BISARRE.

Well, mistress, do you love me?

Bis. I hope, Sir, you will pardon the modesty of—

Dur. Of what? of a dancing devil?—Do you love me, I say?

Bis. Perhaps I—

Dur. What?

Bis. Perhaps, I do not.

Dur. Ha! abused again! Death, woman, I'll—

Bis. Hold, hold, Sir; I do, I do!

Dur. Confirm it then by your obedience; stand there, and ogle me now, as if your heart, blood, and soul, were like to fly out at your eyes—First, the direct surprise. [She looks full upon him.] Right; next the deux yeux par oblique. [She gives him the side glance.] Right; now depart and languish. [She turns from him and looks over her shoulder.] Very well; now sigh. [She sighs.] Now drop your fan on purpose. [She drops her fan.] Now take it up again: Come now, confess your faults; are you not a proud—say after me.

Bis. Proud.

Dur. Impertinent.

Bis. Impertinent.

Dur. Ridiculous.

Bis. Ridiculous.

Dur. Flirt.

Bis. Puppy.

Dur. Zoons! woman, don't provoke me; we are alone, and you don't know but the devil may tempt me to do you a mischief; ask my pardon immediately.

Bis. I do, Sir; I only mistook the word.

Dur. Cry then: have you got e'er a handkerchief?

Bis. Yes, Sir.

Dur. Cry, then, handsomely; cry like a queen in a tragedy.

[She pretends to cry, bursts out a laughing.

Enter six LADIES, laughing.

Bis. Ha, ha, ha!

Ladies. Ha, ha, ha!

Dur. Hell broke loose upon me, and all the furies fluttered about my ears! Betrayed again!

Bis. That you are, upon my word, my dear captain; ha, ha, ha!

Dur. The Lord deliver me!

I Lady. What! is this the mighty man with the bullface, that comes to frighten ladies?

Bis. A man! It's some great dairy-maid in man's clothes.

Dur. Lookye, dear Christian woman, pray hear me.

Bis. Will you ever attempt a lady's honour again?

Dur. If you please to let me get away with my honour, I'll do any thing in the world.

Bis. Will you persuade your friend to marry mine?

Dur. O yes, to be sure.

Bis. And will you do the same by me?

Dur. Burn me if I do, if the coast be clear.

[Exit.]

Bis. Ha, ha, ha! Come, ladies, we'll go make an end of our tea.

[Exeunt.]

Enter MIRABEL and OLD MIRABEL.

Mir. Your patience, Sir. I tell you I won't marry; and though you send all the bishops in France to persuade me, I shall never believe their doctrine against their practice. You would compel me to that state, which I have heard you curse yourself, when my mother and you have battled it for a whole week together.

Old Mir. Never but once, you rogue, and that was when she longed for six Flanders mares: ay, Sir, then she was breeding of you, which showed what an expensive dog I should have of you.

Enter PETIT.

Well, Petit, how does she now?

Pet. Mad, Sir, con pompos—Ay, Mr. Mirabel, you'll believe that I speak truth now, when I confess that I have told you hitherto nothing but lies; our jesting is come to a sad earnest, she's downright distracted.

Re-enter BISARRE.

Bis. Where is this mighty victor?—The great exploit is done; go triumph in the glory of your conquest, inhuman, barbarous man! O Sir, [To OLD MIRABEL.] your wretched ward has found a tender guardian of you; where her young innocence expected protection, here has she found her ruin.

Old Mir. Ay, the fault is mine; for I believe that rogue wont marry, for fear of begetting such another disobedient son as his father did. I have done all I can, Madam, and now can do no more than run mad for company. [Cries.]

Enter DUGARD, with his sword drawn.

Dug. Away! Revenge, revenge.

Old Mir. Patience, patience, Sir. [OLD MIRABEL holds him.] Bob, draw. [Aside.]

Dug. Patience! The coward's virtue, and the brave man's failing, when thus provoked—Villain!

Mir. Your sister's frenzy shall excuse your madness; and to show my concern for what she suffers, I'll bear the villain from her brother.—Put up your anger with your sword; I have a heart like yours, that swells at an affront received, but melts at an injury given; and if the lovely Oriana's grief be such a moving scene, 'twill find a part within this breast, perhaps as tender as a brother's.

Dug. To prove that soft compassion for her grief, endeavour to remove it.—There, there, behold an object that's infective; I cannot view her, but I am as mad as she.

Enter ORIANA; they place her in a chair.

A sister that my dying parents left with their last words and blessing to my care. Sister, dearest sister.

Old Mir. Ay, poor child, poor child, d'ye know me?

Ori. You! you are Amadis de Gaul, Sir.—Oh! oh my heart! Were you never in love, fair lady? And do you never dream of flowers and gardens?—I dream of walking fires, and tall gigantic sights. Take heed, it comes now—What's that? Pray stand away: I have seen that face sure—How light my head is!

Mir. What piercing charms has beauty even in madness—Come, Madam, try to repose a little.

Ori. I cannot; for I must be up to go to church, and I must dress me, put on my new gown, and be so fine, to meet my love. Hey, ho!—Will not you tell me where my heart lies buried?

Mir. My very soul is touched—Your hand, my fair.

Ori. How soft and gentle you feel! I'll tell you your fortune, friend.

Mir. How she stares upon me!

Ori. You have a flattering face; but 'tis a fine one—I warrant you have five hundred mistresses—Ay, to be sure, a mistress for every guinea in his pocket—Will you pray for me? I shall die tomorrow—And will you ring my passing-bell?

Mir. Do you know me, injured creature?

Ori. No,—but you shall be my intimate acquaintance—in the grave. [Weeps.]

Mir. O tears, I must believe you; sure there's a kind of sympathy in madness; for even I, obdurate as I am, do feel my soul so tossed with storms of passion, that I could cry for help as well as she. [Wipes his eyes.]

Ori. What, have you lost your lover? No, you mock me; I'll go home and pray.

Mir. Stay, my fair innocence, and hear me own my love so loud that I may call your senses to their place, restore 'em to their charming, happy functions, and reinstate myself into your favour.

Bis. Let her alone, Sir, 'tis all too late; she trembles, hold her; her fits grow stronger by her talking; don't trouble her, she don't know you, Sir.

Old Mir. Not know him! what then? she loves to see him for all that.

Re-enter DURETETE.

Dur. Where are you all? What the devil! melancholy, and I here! Are ye sad, and such a ridiculous subject, such a very good jest, among you, as I am?

Mir. Away with this impertinence; this is no place for bagatelle; I have murdered my honour, destroyed a lady, and my desire of reputation is come at length too late; see there.

Dur. What ails her?

Mir. Alas! she's mad.

Dur. Mad! dost wonder at that? By this light, they're all so; they're cozening mad; they're brawling mad; they're proud mad; I just now came from a whole world of mad women, that had almost—What, is she dead?

Mir. Dead! heavens forbid.

Dur. Heavens further it; for 'till they be as cold as a key, there's no trusting them; you're never sure that a woman's in earnest, till she is nailed in her coffin. Shall I talk to her? Are you mad, mistress?

Bis. What's that to you, Sir?

Dur. Oons, Madam, are you there?

[Exit, running.]

Mir. Away, thou wild buffoon; how poor and mean this humour now appears? His follies and my own I here disclaim; this lady's frenzy has restored my senses, and was she perfect now, as once she was, (before you all I speak it,) she should be mine; and as she is, my tears and prayers shall wed her.

Dug. How happy had this declaration been some hours ago.

Bis. Sir, she beckons to you, and waves us to go off; come, come, let's leave 'em.

[Exeunt all but MIR. and ORI.]

Ori. Oh, Sir,

Mir. Speak, my charming angel, if your dear senses have regained their order; speak, fair, and bless me with the news.

Ori. First, let me bless the cunning of my sex, and that happy counterfeited frenzy that has restored to my poor labouring breast the dearest, best beloved, of men.

Mir. 'Tune, all ye spheres, your instruments of joy, and carry round your spacious orbs the happy sound of Oriana's health; her soul, whose harmony was next to yours, is now in tune again; the counterfeiting fair has played the fool.

She was so mad to counterfeit for me;

I was so mad to pawn my liberty:

But now we both are well, and both are free.

Ori. How, Sir, free?

Mir. As air, my dear bedlamite; what, marry a lunatic? Lookye, my dear, you have counterfeited madness so very well this bout, that you'll be apt to play the fool all your life long.—Here, gentlemen.

Ori. Monster! you won't disgrace me?

Mir. O'my faith, but I will; here, come in, gentlemen.—A miracle! a miracle! the woman's dispossessed, the devil's vanished.

Re-enter OLD MIRABEL and DUGARD.

Old Mir. Bless us, was she possessed?

Mir. With the worst of demons, Sir, a marriage-devil, a horrid devil. Mr. Dugard, don't be surprised. I promised my endeavours to cure your sister; no mad doctor in Christendom could have done it more effectually. Take her into your charge; and have a care she don't relapse; if she should, employ me not again, for I am no more infallible than others of the faculty; I do cure sometimes.

Ori. Your remedy, most barbarous man, will prove the greatest poison of my health: for though my former frenzy was but counterfeit, I now shall run into a real madness.

[Exit: OLD MIRABEL follows.]

Dug. This was a turn beyond my knowledge. I'm so confused, I know not how to resent it.

[Exit.]

Mir. What a dangerous precipice have I 'scaped! Was not I just now on the brink of destruction?

Enter DURETETE.

Oh, my friend, let me run into thy bosom; no lark, escaped from the devouring pounces of a hawk, quakes with more dismal apprehension.

Dur. The matter, man!

Mir. Marriage, hanging; I was just at the gallows' foot, the running noose about my neck, and the cart wheeling from me.—Oh—I shan't be myself this month again.

Dur. Did not I tell you so? They are all alike saints or devils.

Mir. Ay, ay; there's no living here with security: this house is so full of stratagem and design, that I must abroad again.

Dur. With all my heart, I'll bear thee company, my lad; I'll meet you at the play; and we'll set out for Italy to-morrow morning.

Mir. A match; I'll go pay my compliment o' leave to my father presently.

Dur. I'm afraid he'll stop you.

Mir. What, pretend a command over me after his settlement of a thousand pounds a year upon me? No, no, he has passed away his authority with the conveyance; the will of a living father is chiefly obeyed for the sake of the dying one.

[Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Street before the Play-house.

Enter MIRABEL and DURETETE, as coming from the play.

Dur. How d'ye like this play?

Mir. I liked the company; the lady, the rich beauty in the front box, had my attention. These impudent poets bring the ladies together to support them, and to kill every body else.

For deaths upon the stage the ladies cry,

But ne'er mind us that in the audience die.

Dur. Hoity-toity; did Phillis inspire you with all this?

Mir. Ten times more; the play-house is the element of poetry, because the region of beauty; the ladies, methinks, have a more inspiring triumphant air in the boxes than any where else; they sit commanding on their thrones with all their subject slaves about them: their best clothes, best looks, shining jewels, sparkling eyes, the treasure of the world in a ring. I could wish that my whole life long were the first night of a new play.

Dur. The fellow has quite forgot his journey. [Aside.] Have you bespoken post horses?

Mir. Grant me but three days, dear Captain, one to discover the lady, one to unfold myself, and one to make me happy; and then I'm yours to the world's end.

Dur. Hast thou the impudence to promise thyself a lady of her figure and quality in so short a time?

Mir. Yes, Sir—I have a confident address, no disagreeable person, and five hundred louis-d'ors in my pocket.

Dur. Five hundred louis-d'ors! You an't mad?

Mir. I tell you she's worth five thousand; one of her black brilliant eyes is worth a diamond as big as her head. I compared her necklace with her looks, and the living jewels out-sparkled the dead one by a million.

Dur. But you have owned to me, that abating Oriana's pretensions to marriage, you loved her passionately; then how can you wander at this rate?

Mir. I longed for a partridge t'other day off the king's plate; but d'ye think, because I could not have it, I must eat nothing?

Enter ORIANA in Boy's clothes, with a letter

Ori. Is your name Mirabel, Sir?

Mir. Yes, Sir.

Ori. A letter from your uncle in Picardy.

[Gives the letter.]

Mir. [Reads.] The bearer is the son of a Protestant gentleman, who, flying for his religion, left me the charge of this youth—A pretty boy—He's fond of some handsome service, that may afford him opportunity of improvement: your care of him will oblige, Yours.
 Hast a mind to travel, child?

Ori. 'Tis my desire, Sir; I should be pleased to serve a traveller in any capacity.

Mir. A hopeful inclination; you shall along with me into Italy as my page.

Dur. I don't think it safe; the rogue's [Noise without.] too handsome—The play's done, and some of the ladies come this way.

Enter LAMORCE, with her train borne up by a PAGE.

Mir. Duretete, the very dear identical, she.

Dur. And what then?

Mir. Why 'tis she.

Dur. And what then, Sir?

Mir. Then! Why!—Lookye, sirrah, the first piece of service I put upon you, is to follow that lady's coach, and bring me word where she lives. [To ORIANA.]

Ori. I don't know the town, Sir, and am afraid of losing myself.

Mir. Pshaw!

Lam. Page, what's become of all my people?

Page. I can't tell, Madam; I can see no sign of your ladyship's coach.

Lam. That fellow is got into his old pranks, and fallen drunk somewhere; none of the footmen there?

Page. Not one, Madam.

Lam. These servants are the plague of our lives; what shall I do?

Mir. By all my hopes, fortune pimps for me; now, Duretete, for a piece of gallantry.

Dur. Why, you won't sure?

Mir. Won't, brute! Let not your servants' neglect, Madam, put your ladyship to any inconvenience, for you can't be disappointed of an equipage whilst mine waits below; and would you honour the master so far, he would be proud to pay his attendance.

Dur. Ay, to be sure.

[Aside.]

Lam. Sir, I won't presume to be troublesome, for my habitation is a great way off.

Dur. Very true, Madam, and he's a little engaged; besides, Madam, a hackney-coach will do as well, Madam.

Mir. Rude beast, be quiet! [To DURETETE.] The further from home, Madam, the more occasion you have for a guard—pray, Madam—

Lam. Lard, Sir—[She declines his entreaties.]

Dur. Ah! the devil's in his impudence; now he wheedles, she smiles; he flatters, she simpers; he swears, she believes; he's a rogue, and she's a w— in a moment. [Aside.]

Mir. Without there! my coach; Duretete, wish me joy. [Hands the lady out.]

Dur. Wish you safe home! Here, you little Picard, go follow your master, and he'll lead you—

Ori. Whither, Sir?

Dur. To the academy, child: 'tis the fashion, with men of quality, to teach their pages their exercise—go.

Ori. Won't you go with him too, Sir? that woman may do him some harm I don't like her.

Dur. Why, how now, Mr. Page, do you start up to give laws of a sudden? do you pretend to rise at court, and disapprove the pleasure of your betters? Lookye, sirrah, if ever you would rise by a great man, be sure to be with him in his little actions: and, as a step to your advancement, follow your master immediately, and make it your hope that he goes to a bagnio.

Ori. Heavens forbid!

[Exit.]

Dur. Now would I sooner take a cart in company of the hangman, than a coach with that woman: what a strange antipathy have I taken against these creatures; a woman to me is aversion upon aversion, a cheese, a cat, a breast of mutton, the squalling of children, the grinding of knives, and the snuff of a candle. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Handsome Apartment

Enter MIRABEL and LAMORCE.

Lam. To convince me, that your service was something more than good breeding, please to lay out an hour of your company upon my desire, as you have already upon my necessity.

Mir. Your desire, Madam, has only prevented my request: my hours! make 'em yours, Madam, eleven, twelve, one, two, three, and all that belong to those happy minutes.

Lam. But I must trouble you, Sir, to dismiss your retinue, because an equipage at my door, at this time of night, will not be consistent with my reputation.

Mir. By all means, Madam, all but one little boy—Here, page, order my coach and servants home, and do you stay; 'tis a foolish country boy, that knows nothing but innocence.

Lam. Innocence, Sir? I should be sorry if you made any sinister constructions of my freedom.

Mir. O Madam, I must not pretend to remark upon any body's freedom, having so entirely forfeited my own.

Lam. Well, Sir, 'twere convenient towards our easy correspondence, that we entered into a free confidence of each other, by mutual declaration of what we are, and what we think of one another.—Now, Sir, what are you?

Mir. In three words, Madam—I am a gentleman, I have five hundred pounds in my pocket, and a clean shirt on.

Lam. And your name is—

Mir. Mustapha.—Now, Madam, the inventory of your fortunes.

Lam. My name is Lamorce; my birth noble; I was married young, to a proud, rude, sullen, impetuous fellow; the husband spoiled the gentleman; crying ruined my face, till at last I took heart, leaped out of a window, got away to my friends, sued my tyrant, and recovered my fortune—I lived from fifteen to twenty to please a husband; from twenty to forty I'm resolved to please myself, and from thence upwards I'll humour the world.

Mir. Ha, ha, ha! I rejoice in your good fortune with all my heart.

Lam. O, now I think on't, Mr. Mustapha, you have got the finest ring there, I could scarcely believe it right; pray let me see it.

Mir. Hum! Yes, Madam, 'tis, 'tis right—but, but, but, but it was given me by my mother, an old family ring, Madam, an old-fashioned family ring.

Lam. Ay, Sir—If you can entertain yourself for a moment, I'll wait on you immediately. [Exit.]

Mir. Certainly the stars were in a strange intriguing humour when I was born—Ay, this night should I have had a bride in my arms, and that I should like well enough: but what should I have to-morrow night? The same. And what next night? The same. And what next night? The very same. Soup for breakfast, soup for dinner, soup for supper, and soup for breakfast again—But here 's variety. [Runs towards the door.]

Enter four BRAVOES with LAMORCE, MIRABEL starts back.

She comes, she comes—Hum, hum—Bitch—Murdered, murdered, to be sure! The cursed strumpet! To make me send away my servants—Nobody near me! These cut-throats always make sure work. What shall I do? I have but one way. [Aside.] Are these gentlemen your relations, Madam?

Lam. Yes, Sir.

Mir. Gentlemen, your most humble servant; Sir, your most faithful; yours, Sir, with all my heart; your most obedient—come, gentlemen. [Salutes all round.] Please to sit—no ceremony, next the lady, pray, Sir. [All sit.]

Lam. Well, Sir, and how d'ye like my friends?

Mir. O Madam, the most finished gentlemen! I was never more happy in good company in my life; I suppose, Sir, you have travelled?

1 Bra. Yes, Sir.

Mir. Which way, may I presume?

1 Bra. In a western barge, Sir.

Mir. Ha, ha, ha! very pretty; facetious, pretty, gentleman!

Lam. Ha, ha, ha! Sir, you have got the prettiest ring upon your finger there—

Mir. Ah! Madam, 'tis at your service, with all my heart. [Offering the ring.]

Lam. By no means, Sir, a family ring!

Mir. No matter, Madam. Seven hundred pounds, by this light. [Aside.]

2 Bra. Pray, Sir, what 's o'clock?

Mir. Hum! Sir, I have left my watch at home.

2 Bra. I thought I saw the string of it just now—

Mir. Od's my life, Sir, I beg your pardon; here it is—but it don't go. [Puts it up.]

Lam. O dear, Sir, an English watch; Tompion's, I presume.

Mir. D'ye like it, Madam?—no ceremony—'tis at your service, with all my heart and soul—Tompion's! Hang ye. [Aside.]

1 Bra. But, Sir, above all things, I admire the fashion and make of your sword-hilt.

Mir. I'm mighty glad you like it, Sir.

1 Bra. Will you part with it, Sir?

Mir. I won't sell it.

1 Bra. Not sell it, Sir?

Mir. No, gentlemen—but I'll bestow it with all my heart. [Offers it.]

1 Bra. O, Sir, we rob you.

Mir. That you do, I'll be sworn. [Aside.] I have another at home, pray, Sir—Gentlemen, you're too modest; have I any thing else that you fancy? Sir, will you do me a favour? [To the first BRAVO.] I am extremely in love with that wig which you wear; will you do me the favour to change with me?

1 Bra. Lookye, Sir, this is a family wig, and I would not part with it; but if you like it—

Mir. Sir, your most humble servant.

1 Bra. Madam, your most humble slave. [They change wigs.]

[Goes up foppishly to the Lady, and salutes her.]

2 Bra. The fellow's very liberal; shall we murder him? [Apart.]

1 Bra. No, no! I want but a handsome pretence to quarrel with him, for you know we must act like gentlemen. Here, some wine—[Wine brought.] Sir, your good health.

[Pulls MIRABEL by the nose.]

Mir. Oh! Sir, your most humble servant: a pleasant frolic enough, to drink a man's health, and pull him by the nose: ha, ha, ha! the pleasantest pretty-humoured gentleman.

Lam. Help the gentleman to a glass.

[MIR. drinks.]

1 Bra. How d'ye like the wine, Sir?

Mir. Very good o' the kind, Sir: but I tell ye what, I find we're all inclined to be frolicsome, and 'egad, for my own part, I was never more disposed to be merry; let's make a night on't, ha!—This wine is pretty, but I have such Burgundy at home.—Lookye, gentlemen, let me send for half a dozen flasks of my Burgundy; I defy France to match it;—'Twill make us all life, all air, pray, gentlemen.

2 Bra. Eh! Shall us have his Burgundy?

[Apart.]

1 Bra. Yes, faith, we'll have all we can; here call up the gentleman's servant. [Apart.]—What think you, Lamorce?

Lam. Yes, yes. [Apart.] Your servant is a foolish country boy, Sir; he understands nothing but innocence.

Mir. Ay, ay, Madam.—Here, page!

Enter ORIANA.

Take this key, and go to my butler, order him to send half a dozen flasks of the red Burgundy, marked a thousand; and be sure you make haste; I long to entertain my friends here, my very good friends.

Omnes. Ah, dear Sir!

1 Bra. Here, child, take a glass of wine—Your master and I have changed wigs, honey, in a frolic. Where had you this pretty boy, honest Mustapha?

Ori. Mustapha! [Aside.]

Mir. Out of Picardy—this is the first errand he has made for me, and if he does it right, I'll encourage him.

Ori. The red Burgundy, Sir?

Mir. The red marked a thousand; and be sure you make haste.

Ori. I shall, Sir. [Exit.]

1 Bra. Sir, you were pleased to like my wig have you any fancy for my coat?—Lookye, Sir, it has served a great many honest gentlemen very faithfully.

Mir. The insolence of these dogs is beyond their cruelty. [Aside.]

Lam. You're melancholy, Sir.

Mir. Only concerned, Madam, that I should have no servant here but this little boy—he'll make some confounded blunder, I'll lay my life on't; I would not be disappointed of my wine for the universe.

Lam. He'll do well enough, Sir; but supper 's ready; will you please to eat a bit, Sir?

Mir. O, Madam, I never had a better stomach in my life.

Lam. Come then—we have nothing but a plate of soup.

Mir. Ah! the marriage soup I could dispense with now.

[Aside; exit, handing the Lady.]

2 Bra. Shall we despatch him?

3 Bra. To be sure. I think he knows me.

1 Bra. Ay, ay, dead men tell no tales; I ha'n't the confidence to look a man in the face after I have done him an injury, therefore we'll murder him.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—OLD MIRABEL'S HOUSE.

Enter DURETETE.

Dur. My friend has forsaken me, I have abandoned my mistress, my time lies heavy upon my hands, and my money burins in my pocket.—But now I think on't, my myrmidons are upon duty to-night; I'll fairly stroll down to the guard, and nod away the night with my honest lieutenant over a flask of wine, a good story, and a pipe of tobacco.

[Going off.]

Enter BISARRE.

Bis. Who comes there? Stand!

Dur. Hey dey, now she's turned dragoon.

Bis. Lookye, Sir, I'm told you intend to travel again.—I design to wait on you as far as Italy.

Dur. Then I'll travel into Wales.

Bis. Wales! What country's that?

Dur. The land of mountains, child, where you're never out of the way, 'cause there's no such thing as a high road.

Bis. Rather always in a high road, 'cause you travel all upon hills;—but bet as it will, I'll jog along with you.

Dur. But we intend to sail to the East Indies.

Bis. East or West, 'tis all one to me; I'm tight and light, and the fitter for sailing.

Dur. But suppose we take through Germany, and drink hard?

Bis. Suppose I take through Germany, and drink harder than you?

Dur. 'Sdeath, woman, will you go to the guard with me, and smoke a pipe?

Bis. Allons donc!

Dur. The devil's in the woman.—Suppose I hang myself?

Bis. There I'll leave you.

Dur. And a happy riddance; the gallows is welcome.

Bis. Hold, hold, Sir! [Catches him by the arm as he is going.] one word before we part.

Dur. Let me go, Madam—

Bis. Stir, if you dare.—Come, Sir, stand there now, and ogle me. [He frowns upon her.] Now a languishing sigh! [He groans.] Now run and take my fan—faster. [He runs and takes it up.] Now play with it handsomely.

Dur. Ay, ay. [He tears it to pieces.]

Bis. Hold, hold, dear, humorous coxcomb; captain, spare my fan, and I'll—Why, you rude, inhuman monster, don't you expect to pay for this?

Dur. Yes, Madam, there's twelvenpence; for that is the price on't.

Bis. Sir, it cost a guinea.

Dur. Well, Madam, you shall have the sticks again. [Throws them to her, and exit.]

Bis. Ha, ha, ha! ridiculous, below my concern. I must follow him, however, to know if he can give me any news of Oriana. [Exit.]

SCENE IV.—LAMORCE'S LODGINGS.

Enter MIRABEL.

Mir. Bloody hell-hounds, I overheard you!—Was not I two hours ago the happy, gay, rejoicing Mirabel? How did I plume my hopes in a fair coming prospect of a long scene of years Life courted me with all the charms of vigour youth, and fortune; and to be torn away from all my promised joys is more than death; the manner too, by villains.—O my Oriana, this very moment might have blessed me in thy arms, and my poor boy! the innocent boy!—Confusion!—But hush! they come: I must dissemble still—

Enter the four BRAVOES.

No news of my wine, gentlemen?

1 Bra. No, Sir; I believe your country booby has lost himself, and we can wait no longer for't—True, Sir, you're a pleasant gentleman; but I suppose you understand our business.

Mir. Sir, I may go near to guess at your employments; you, Sir, are a lawyer, I presume, you a physician, you a scrivener, and you a stock-jobber.—All cut-throats, 'egad. [Aside.]

4 Bra. Sir, I am a broken officer; I was cashiered at the head of the army for a coward; so I took up the trade of murder to retrieve the reputation of my courage.

3 Bra. I am a soldier too, and would serve my king; but I don't like the quarrel, and I have more honour than to fight in a bad cause.

2 Bra. I was bred a gentleman, and I have no estate, but I must have my whore and my bottle, through the prejudice of education.

1 Bra. I am a ruffian too, by the prejudice of education; I was bred a butcher. In short, Sir, if your wine had come, we might have trifled a little longer.—Come, Sir, which sword will you die by? mine, Sir?

2 Bra. Or mine?

3 Bra. Or mine?

4 Bra. Or mine?

[Draws.]

[Draws.]

[Draws.]

Mir. I scorn to beg my life; but to be butchered thus! [Knocking.] O, there's the wine—this moment for my life or death.

Enter ORIANA.

Lost, for ever lost!—Where's the wine, child?

Ori. Coming up, Sir.

[Faintly.]

[Stamps.]

Enter DURETETE and six of the grand Musqueteers; the Ruffians drop their Swords; exit ORIANA.

Mir. The wine, the wine, the wine! Youth, pleasure, fortune, days, and years, are now my own again.—Ah, my dear friends, did not I tell you this wine would make me merry!—Dear captain, these gentlemen are the best natured, facetious, witty creatures that ever you knew.

Enter LAMORCE.

Lam. Is the wine come, Sir?

Mir. O yes, Madam, the wine is come—see there! [Pointing to the Soldiers.] Your ladyship has got a very fine ring upon your finger.

Lam. Sir, 'tis at your service.

Mir. O ho! is it so? Thou dear seven hundred pounds, thou'rt welcome home again with all my heart—Ad's my life, Madam, you have got the finest built watch there! Tompion's, I presume?

Lam. Sir, you may wear it.

Mir. O, Madam, by no means; 'tis too much—

Rob you of all! [Takes it from her.] Good, dear, time, thou'rt a precious thing; I'm glad I have retrieved thee. [Puts it up.] What, my friends neglected all this while! Gentlemen, you'll pardon my complaisance to the lady.—How now?—Is it civil to be so out of humour at my entertainment, and I so pleased with yours?—Captain, you're surprised at all this; but we're in our frolics, you must know.—Some wine here.

Enter Servant, with wine.

Come, captain, this worthy gentleman's health.

[Tweaks the first BRAVO by the nose; he roars.]

But now—where's my dear, dear deliverer, my boy, my charming boy?

1 Bra. I hope some of our crew below stairs have despatched him.

Mir. Villain! what sayest thou? Despatched! I'll have ye all tortured, racked, torn to pieces alive, if you have touched my boy.—Here, page! page! page!

Dur. Here, gentlemen, be sure you secure those fellows. [Runs out.]

1 Bra. Yes, Sir, we know you and your guard will be very civil to us.

Dur. Now for you, Madam—He, he, he!—I'm so pleased to think that I shall be revenged of one woman before I die.

Dur. Take 'em to justice.

[Guards carry off BRAVOES.]

Enter OLD MIRABEL, DUGARD, and BISARRE.

Old Mir. Robin, Robin, where's Bob? where's my boy?—What, is this the lady? a pretty vixen, faith!—Harkye, child, because my son was so civil as to oblige you with a coach, I'll treat you with a cart, indeed I will.

Dug. Ay, Madam,—and you shall have a swinging equipage, three or four thousand footmen at your heels at least.

Dur. No less becomes her quality.

Bis. Faugh! the monster!

Dur. Monster! ay, you're all a little monstrous, let me tell you.

Re-enter MIRABEL.

Old Mir. Ah, my dear Bob, art thou safe, man?

Mir. No, no, Sir, I'm ruined! the savor of my life is lost!

Old Mir. No, he came and brought us the news.

Mir. But where is he?

Re-enter ORIANA.

Ha! [Runs and embraces her.] My dear preserver, what shall I do to recompense your trust?

Father, friends, gentlemen, behold the youth that has relieved me from the most ignominious death.—Command me, child; before you all, before my late so kind indulgent stars, I swear to grant whate'er you ask.

Ori. To the same stars, indulgent now to me, I will appeal as to the justice of my claim; I shall demand but what was mine before—the just performance of your contract to Oriana.

[Discovers herself.]

Omnes. Oriana!

Ori. In this disguise I resolved to follow you abroad, counterfeited the letter that got me into your service; and so, by this strange turn of fate, I became the instrument of your preservation.

Dur. Mirabel, you're caught.

Mir. Caught! I scorn the thought of imposition! Caught! No, 'tis my voluntary act; this was no human stratagem; but by my providential stars, designed to show the dangers wandering youth incurs by the pursuit of an unlawful love, to plunge me headlong in the snares of vice, and then to free me by the hands of virtue: here on my knees I humbly beg my fair preserver's pardon; my thanks are needless, for myself I owe. And now for ever do protest me yours.

Old Mir. Tal, al, di, dal. [Sings.] Kiss me, daughter—no, you shall kiss me first. [To LAMORCE.] for you're the cause on't. Well, Bisarre, what say you to the captain?

Bis. I like the beast well enough; but I don't understand his paces so well as to venture him in a strange road.

Old Mir. But marriage is so beaten a path that you can't go wrong.

Bis. Ay, 'tis so beaten, that the way is spoiled.

Dur. There is but one thing should make me thy husband—I could marry thee to-day for the privilege of beating thee to-morrow.

Old Mir. Come, come, you may agree for all this. Mr. Dugard, are not you pleased with this?

Dug. So pleased, that if I thought it might secure your son's affection to my sister, I would double her fortune.

Mir. Fortune! has she not given me mine? my life, my estate, my all, and what is more, her virtuous self.—Behold the foil [Pointing to LAMORCE.] that sets this brightness off! [To ORIANA.] Here, view the pride [To ORIANA.] and scandal of the sex. [To LAMORCE.]

What liberty can be so tempting there,

[To LAMORCE.]

As a soft, virtuous, am'rous bondage here?

[To ORIANA.]

THE MAYOR OF GARRATT:

A FARCE,

IN TWO ACTS.

BY SAMUEL FOOTE, Esq.

REMARKS.

This humorous and entertaining piece was first performed at the Haymarket Theatre, in 1763.—The sketch of character here is bold and coarse, but calculated for the multitude. Major Sturgeon, the city militia officer, is highly wrought, and was admirably performed by Mr. Foote, who received an applause not less merited than that which is bestowed on the exertions of Mr. Downton, in his inimitable keeping of the same character. Bruin is a sample not absolutely unparalleled within the sound of Bow bells, and Jerries we meet every day.

The main incident of this piece is derived from a popular burlesque on our parliamentary elections: this takes place after every general election, when the successful candidate, selected as the most deformed and stupid individual of the multitude, is chaired at Garratt Lane, in the parish of Wandsworth, and receives the honour of knighthood from his constituents. A considerable sum is squandered by the mob on these occasions, and the forms of election are strictly observed: the several candidates are taught to deliver an oration, replete with popular sentiments and promises; that they will lower the prices of gin, bread, beer, &c.; make old women bishops; and that they will not accept any place in the House. Sir Jeffrey Dunstan, a roguish and very deformed mendicant, well known in London, was for many years Mayor of Garratt, and Sir Harry Dinsdale succeeded him in his titles and honours, and in his sinecure of Garratt, which differs chiefly from other sinecures, by the absence of a good salary.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—SIR JACOB JOLLUP'S House at Garratt.

Enter SIR JACOB JOLLUP.

Sir J. Roger!

Enter ROGER.

Roger. Anan, Sir!

Sir J. Sir, sirrah! and why not Sir Jacob, you rascal? Is that all your manners? Has his majesty dubbed me a knight for you to make me a mister? Are the candidates near upon coming?

Roger. Nic Goose, the tailor, from Putney, they say, will be here in a crack, Sir Jacob.

Sir J. Has Margery fetched in the linen?

Roger. Yes, Sir Jacob.

Sir J. Are the pigs and the poultry locked up in the barn?

Roger. Safe, Sir Jacob.

Sir J. And the plate and spoons in the pantry?
Roger. Yes, Sir Jacob.

Sir J. Then give me the key; the mob will soon be upon us; and all is fish that comes to their net. Has Ralph laid the cloth in the hall?

Roger. Yes, Sir Jacob.

Sir J. Then let him bring out the turkey and chine, and be sure there is plenty of mustard; and, d'ye hear, Roger, do you stand yourself at the gate, and be careful who you let in.

Roger. I will, Sir Jacob.

Sir J. So, now I believe things are pretty secure. But I can't think what makes my daughters so late ere they—[A knocking at the gate.] Who is that, Roger?

Roger. [Without.] Justice Sturgeon, the fishmonger, from Brentford.

Sir J. Gad's my life! and major to the Middlesex militia. Usher him in, Roger.

Enter MAJOR STURGEON.

I could have wished you had come a little sooner, Major Sturgeon.

Maj. S. Why, what has been the matter, Sir Jacob?

Sir J. There has, major, been here an impudent pill-monger, who has dared to scandalize the whole body of the bench.

Maj. S. Insolent companion! had I been here, I would have mittimus'd the rascal at once.

Sir J. No, no, he wanted the major more than the magistrate: a few smart strokes from your cane would have fully answered the purpose.—Well, major, our wars are done; the rattling drum and squeaking life now wound our ears no more.

Maj. S. True, Sir Jacob, our corps is disembodied; so the French may sleep in security.

Sir J. But, major, was it not rather late in life for you to enter upon the profession of arms?

Maj. S. A little awkward in the beginning, Sir Jacob: the great difficulty they had was, to get me to turn out my toes; but use, use reconciles all them kind of things: why, after my first campaign, I no more minded the noise of the guns than a flea-bite.

Sir J. No!

Maj. S. No. There is more made of those matters than they merit. For the general good, indeed, I am glad of the peace: but as to my single self—and yet we have had some desperate duty, Sir Jacob.

Sir J. No doubt.

Maj. S. Oh! such marchings and counter-marchings, from Brentford to Ealing, from Ealing to Acton, from Acton to Uxbridge; the dust flying, sun scorching, men sweating!—Why, there was our last expedition to Hounslow; that day's work carried off Major Molassas. Bunhill-fields never saw a braver commander! He was an irreparable loss to the service.

Sir J. How came that about?

Maj. S. Why, it was partly the major's own fault: I advised him to pull off his spurs before he went upon action: but he was resolute, and would not be ruled.

Sir J. Spirit—zeal for the service.

Maj. S. Doubtless. But to proceed: in order to get our men in good spirits, we were quartered at Thistleworth the evening before. At day-break our regiment formed at Hounslow town's end, as it might be about here. The major made a fine disposition: on we marched, the men all in high spirits, to attack the gibbet where Gardel is hanging; but, turning down a narrow lane to the left, as it might be about there, in order to possess a pig-sty, that we might take the gallows in flank, and at all events secure a retreat, who should come by but a drove of fat oxen for Smithfield. The drums beat in the front, the dogs barked in the rear, the oxen set up a gallop: on they came thundering upon us, broke through our ranks in an instant, and threw the whole corps in confusion.

Sir J. Terrible!

Maj. S. The major's horse took to his heels; away he scoured over the heath. That gallant commander stuck both his spurs into the flank, and for some time held by his mane; but, in crossing a ditch, the horse threw up his head, gave the major a dowse in the chops, and plumped him into a gravel-pit, just by the powder mills.

Sir J. Dreadful!

Maj. S. Whether from the fall or the fright, the major moved off in a month. Indeed, it was an unfortunate day for us all.

Sir J. As how?

Maj. S. Why, as Captain Cucumber, Lieutenant Pattypan, Ensign Tripe, and myself, were returning to town in the Turnham-green stage, we were stopped near the Hammersmith turnpike, and robbed and stripped by a single footpad.

Sir J. An unfortunate day indeed!

Maj. S. But, in some measure to make me amends, I got the major's commission.

Sir J. You did?

Maj. S. O yes. I was the only one of the corps that could ride; otherwise we always succeeded of course: no jumping over heads, no underhand work among us; all men of honour; and I must do the regiment the justice to say, there never was a set of more amiable officers.

Sir J. Quiet and peaceable.

Maj. S. As lambs, Sir Jacob. Excepting one boxing bout at the Three Compasses in Acton, between Captain Sheers and the Colonel, concerning a game at all-fours, I don't remember a single dispute.

Sir J. Why, that was mere mutiny; the captain ought to have been broke.

Maj. S. He was; for the colonel not only took away his cockade, but his custom: and I don't think poor Captain Sheers has done a stitch for him since.

Sir J. But you soon supplied the loss of Molassas?

Maj. S. In part only: no, Sir Jacob, he had great experience; he was trained up to arms from his youth; at sixteen, he trailed a pike in the Artillery-ground; at eighteen, got a company in the Smithfield pioneers; and by the time he was twenty, was made aid-de-camp to Sir Jeffrey Grub, knight, alderman, and colonel of the yellow.

Sir J. A rapid rise!

Maj. S. Yes, he had a genius for war; but what I wanted in practice, I made up by doubling my diligence. Our porter at home had been a sergeant of marines; so, after shop was shut up at night, he used to teach me my exercise; and he had not to deal with a dunce, Sir Jacob.

Sir J. Your progress was great.

Maj. S. Amazing. In a week I could shoulder, and rest, and poize, and turn to the right, and wheel to the left; and in less than a month I could fire without winking or blinking.

Sir J. A perfect Hannibal.

Maj. S. Ah, and then I learned to form lines and hollows, and squares, and evolutions, and revolutions. Let me tell you, Sir Jacob, it was lucky that monsieur kept his myrmidons at home, or we should have peppered his flat-bottomed boats.

Sir J. Ay, marry, he had a marvellous escape.

Maj. S. We would a taught him what a Briton can do, who is fighting pro arvis and focus.

Sir J. Pray now, major, which do you look upon as the best disciplined troops, the London regiments, or the Middlesex militia?

Maj. S. Why, Sir Jacob, it does not become me to say? but, lack-a-day, they have never seen any service—Holiday soldiers! Why, I don't believe, unless indeed upon a lord mayor's day, and that mere matter of accident, that they were ever wet to the skin in their lives.

Sir J. Indeed!

Maj. S. No! soldiers for sunshine; cockneys; they have not the appearance, the air, the freedom, the jenny sequoi that—Oh, could you but see me salute! You have never a spontoon in the house?

Sir J. No; but we could get you a shove-pike.

Maj. S. No matter. Well, Sir Jacob, and how are your fair daughters, sweet Mrs. Sneak, and the lovely Mrs. Bruin; is she as lively and as brilliant as ever?

Sir J. Oh, oh, now the murder is out; this visit was intended for them: come, own now, major, did not you expect to meet with them here? you officers are men of such gallantry!

Maj. S. Why, we do tickle up the ladies, Sir Jacob: there is no resisting a red coat.

Sir J. True, true, major.

Maj. S. But that is now all over with me: "Farewell to the plumed steeds, and neighing troops," as the black man says in the play; like the Roman censor, I shall retire to my Savine field, and there cultivate bagages.

Sir J. Under the shade of your laurels.

Maj. S. True: I have done with the major, and now return to the magistrate; cedunt arma togge.

Mob. [Without.] Huzza!

Re-enter ROGER.

Sir J. What's the matter now, Roger?

Roger. The electors desire to know if your worship has any body to recommend?

Sir J. By no means; let them be free in their choice; I sha'n't interfere.

Roger. And if your worship has any objection to Crispin Heeltap, the cobbler, being returning officer?

Sir J. None, provided the rascal can keep himself sober. Is he there?

Roger. Yes, Sir Jacob. Make way there; stand farther off from the gate: Here is Madam Sneak in a chair along with her husband.

Maj. S. 'Gadso, you will permit me to convoy her in. [Exit.]

Sir J. Now here is one of the evils of war. This Sturgeon was as pains-taking a Billingsgate-broker as any in the bills of mortality. But the fish is got out of his element; the soldier has quite demolished the citizen.

Re-enter MAJOR STURGEON, leading in MRS. SNEAK.

Mrs. S. Dear major, I demand a million of pardons. I have given you a profusion of trouble; but my husband is such a goose-cap, that I can't get no good out of him at home or abroad.—Jerry, Jerry Sneak!—Your blessing, Sir Jacob.

Sir J. Daughter, you are welcome to Garratt.

Mrs. S. Why, Jerry Sneak! I say.

Enter JERRY SNEAK, with a band-box and a hoop-petticoat under his arm, and cardinal, &c.

Sneak. Here, lovy.

Mrs. S. Here, looby: there, lay these things in the hall; and then go and look after the horse. Are you sure you have got all the things out of the chaise?

Sneak. Yes, chuck.

Mrs. S. Then give me my fan.

[JERRY drops the things in searching his pocket for the fan.]

Mrs. S. Did ever mortal see such a—I declare, I am quite ashamed to be seen with him abroad: go, get you gone out of my sight.

Sneak. I go, lovy. Good day to my father-in-law.

Sir J. I am glad to see you, son Sneak; but where is your brother Bruin and his wife?

Sneak. He will be here anon, father, Sir Jacob; he did but just step into the Alley to gather how tickets were sold.

Sir J. Very well, son Sneak. [Exit SNEAK]

Mrs. S. Son! yes, and a pretty son you have provided.

Sir J. I hope all for the best: why, what terrible work there would have been, had you married such a one as your sister; one house could never have contained you. Now, I thought this meek mate—

Mrs. S. Meek! a mushroom! a milksop!

Sir J. Look ye, Molly, I have married you to a man; take care you don't make him a monster.

[Exit SIR J.]

Mrs. S. Monster! Why, major, the fellow has no more heart than a mouse. Had my kind stars indeed allotted me a military man, I should, doubtless, have deported myself in a beeseemingly manner.

Maj. S. Unquestionably, Madam.

Mrs. S. Nor would the major have found, had it been my fortune to intermarry with him, that Molly Jollup would have dishonoured his cloth.

Maj. S. I should have been too happy.

Mrs. S. Indeed Sir, I reverence the army; they are all so brave, so polite, so every thing a woman can wish.

Maj. S. Oh, Madam—

Mrs. S. So elegant, so genteel, so obliging: and then the rank; why, who would dare to affront the wife of a major?

Maj. S. No man with impunity; that I take the freedom to say, Madam.

Mrs. S. I know it, good Sir. Oh! I am a stranger to what I have missed.

Maj. S. Oh, Madam!—Let me die, but she has infinite merit. [Aside.]

Mrs. S. Then to be joined to a sneaking, slovenly cit: a paltry, prying, pitiful pin-maker!

Maj. S. Melancholy!

Mrs. S. To be jostled and crammed with the crowd; no respect, no place, no precedence; to be choked with the smoke of the city; no country jaunts but to Islington; no balls but at Pewterers' hall.

Maj. S. Intolerable!

Mrs. S. I see, Sir, you have a proper sense of my sufferings.

Maj. S. And would shed my best blood to relieve them.

Mrs. S. Gallant gentleman!

Maj. S. The brave must favour the fair.

Mrs. S. Intrepid major!

Maj. S. Divine Mrs. Sneak!

Mrs. S. Obliging commander!

Maj. S. Might I be permitted the honour—

Mrs. S. Sir!

Maj. S. Just to ravish a kiss from your hand?

Mrs. S. You have a right to all we can grant.

Maj. S. Courteous, condescending, complying—Hum—Ha!

Re-enter JERRY SNEAK.

Sneak. Chuck, my brother and sister Bruin are just turning the corner; the Clapham stage was quite full, and so they came by vater.

Mrs. S. I wish they had all been soused in the Thames.—A prying, impertinent puppy!

Maj. S. Next time I will clap a sentinel to secure the door.

Mrs. S. Major Sturgeon, permit me to withdraw for a moment; my dress demands a little repair.

Maj. S. Your ladyship's most entirely devoted.

Mrs. S. Ladyship! he is the very Broglio and Belleisle of the army!

Sneak. Shall I wait upon you, dove?

Mrs. S. No, dolt; what, would you leave the major alone? Is that your manners, you mongrel?

Maj. S. Oh, Madam, I can never be alone; your sweet idea will be my constant companion.

Mrs. S. Mark that: I am sorry, Sir, I am obligated to leave you.

Maj. S. Madam—

Mrs. S. Especially with such a wretched companion.

Maj. S. Oh, Madam—

Mrs. S. But as soon as my dress is restored, I shall fly to relieve your distress.

Maj. S. For that moment I shall wait with the greatest impatience.

Mrs. S. Courteous commander!

Maj. S. Paragon of women!

Mrs. S. Adieu!

Maj. S. Adieu! [Exit Mrs. Sneak.]

Sneak. Notwithstanding, Sir, all my chicken has said, I am special company when she is not by.

Maj. S. I doubt not, Master Sneak.

Sneak. If you would but come one Thursday night to our club, at the Nag's-head in the Poultry, you would meet some roaring, rare boys, i'faith; there's Jemmy Perkins, the packer; little Tom Simkins, the grocer; honest Master Muzzle, the midwife—

Maj. S. A goodly company.

Sneak. Ay, and then sometimes we have the choice spirits from Comus' court, and we crack jokes, and are so jolly and funny. I have learnt myself to sing "An old woman clothed in gray;" but I durst not sing out loud, because my wife would overhear me: and she says as how I bawl worse than the broom-man.*

Maj. S. And you must not think of disobliging your lady.

Sneak. I never does: I never contradicts her, not I.

Maj. S. That's right: she is a woman of infinite merit.

Sneak. O, a power! And don't you think she is very pretty withal?

Maj. S. A Venus!

Sneak. Yes, werry like Venus.—Mayhap you have known her some time?

Maj. S. Long.

Sneak. Belike before she was married?

Maj. S. I did Master Sneak.

Sneak. Ay, when she was a virgin. I thought you was an old acquaintance, by your kissing her hand; for we ben't quite so familiar as that.—But then indeed we ha'n't been married a year.

Maj. S. The mere honeymoon.

Sneak. Ay, ay, I suppose we shall come to it by degrees.

Bruin. [Without.] Come along, Jane; why you are as pury and lazy, you jade—

Enter BRUIN and MRS. BRUIN; BRUIN with a cotton cap on; his wife with his wig, great coat, and fishing-rod.

Come, Jane, give me my wig: you slut, how you have towlsed the curls! Master Sneak, a good morning to you. Sir, I am your humble servant unknown.

Re-enter ROGER.

Roger. Mrs. Sneak begs to speak with th'major.

Maj. S. I will wait on the lady immediately.

Sneak. Don't tarry an instant; you can't think how impatient she is. [Exit MAJOR.] A good morning to you, brother Bruin: you have had a warn walk across the fields.

Mrs. B. Good lord, I am all in a muck—

Bruin. And who may you thank for it, hussy? if you had got up time enough, you might have secured the stage; but you are a lazy lie-abed—

Mrs. B. There's Mr. Sneak keeps my sister a chay.

Bruin. And so he may; but I know better what to do with my money.

Mrs. B. For the matter of that, we can afford it well enough as it is.

Bruin. And how do you know that? Who told you as much, Mrs. Mixen? I hope I know the world better than to trust my concerns with a wife: no, no, thank you for that, Mrs. Jane.

Mrs. B. And pray who is more fitterer to be trusted?

Bruin. Hey-day! Why, the wench is bewitch'd: come, come, let's have none of your palaver here.—Take twelve-pence and pay the waterman.—But first see if he has broke none of the pipes:—and, d'ye hear, Jane, be sure to lay the fishing-rod safe. [Exit Mrs. BRUIN.]

Sneak. Odds me, how finely she's managed! what would I give to have my wife as much under!

Bruin. It is all your own fault, brother Sneak.

Sneak. D'ye think so? She is a sweet pretty creature.

* An alteration in this sentence is generally made to introduce a comic song, for which see p. 195.

Bruin. A vixen.

Sneak. Why, to say the truth, she does now and then hector a little; and, between ourselves, domineers like the devil. O Lord, I lead the life of a dog. Why, she allows me but two shillings a week for my pocket.

Bruin. No!

Sneak. No, man; 'tis she that receives and pays all: and then I am forced to trot after her to church, with her cardinal, pattens, and prayer-book, for all the world as if I was still a 'prentice.

Bruin. Zounds! I would souse them all in the kennel.

Sneak. I durst not. And then at table, I never gets what I loves.

Bruin. The devil!

Sneak. No; she always helps me herself to the tough drumsticks of the turkeys, and the damned fat flaps of shoulders of mutton. I don't think I have eat a bit of under-crust since we have been married. You see, brother Bruin, I am almost as thin as a lath.

Bruin. An absolute skeleton!

Sneak. Now, if you think I could carry my point, I would so swinge and leather my lambkin; 'God, I would so curry and claw her!

Bruin. By the lord Harry, she richly deserves it.

Sneak. Will you, brother, lend me a lift?

Bruin. Command me at all times.

Sneak. Why then, I will verily pluck up a spirit; and the first time she offers to—

Mrs. S. [Without.] Jerry, Jerry Sneak!

Sneak. 'Gad's my life, sure as a gun that's her voice: lookye, brother, I don't choose to breed a disturbance in another body's house; but as soon as ever I get home—

Bruin. Now is your time.

Sneak. No, no; it would not be decent.

Mrs. S. [Without.] Jerry! Jerry!

Sneak. I come, lovy. But you will be sure to stand by me?

Bruin. Trot, nincompoop.

Sneak. Well, if I don't—I wish—

Mrs. S. [Without.] Where is this lazy puppy a-loitering?

Sneak. I come, chuck, as fast as I can. Good Lord, what a sad life do I lead! [Exit.]

Bruin. Ex quovis lingua: who can make a silk purse of a sow's ear?

Re-enter SIR JACOB.

Sir J. Come, son Bruin, we are all seated at table, man; we have but just time for a snack; the candidates are near upon coming.

Bruin. A poor, paltry, mean-spirited.—Damn it, before I would submit to such a—

Sir J. Come come, man; don't be so crusty.

Bruin. I follow, Sir Jacob. Damme, when once a man gives up his prerogative, he might as well give up—But, however, it is no bread and butter of mine.—Jerry! Jerry!—Zounds, I would Jerry and jerk her too. [Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.

SIR JACOB JOLLUP, MAJOR STURGEON, BRUIN, MRS. BRUIN, JERRY SNEAK, and MRS. SNEAK, discovered on SIR JACOB'S garden wall.—Enter MOP, with HEELTAP at their head; some crying a Goose, others a Mug, and others a Primmer.

Heel. Silence, there; silence!

1 Mob. Hear neighbour Heeltap.

2 Mob. Ay, ay, hear Crispin.

3 Mob. Ay, ay, hear him, hear Crispin: he will put us into the model of the thing at once.

Heel. Why then, silence! I say.

All. Silence!

Heel. Silence, and let us proceed, neighbours with all the decency and confusion usual upon these occasions.

1 Mob. Ay, ay, there is no doing without that.

All. No, no, no.

Heel. Silence then, and keep the peace; what, is there no respect paid to authority: am not I the returning officer?

All. Ay, ay, ay.

Heel. Chosen by yourselves, and approved of by Sir Jacob?

All. True, true.

Heel. Well then, be silent and civil; stand back there, that gentleman without a shirt, and make room for your betters. Where's Simon Snuffle, the sexton?

Snuffle. Here.

Heel. Let him come forward; we appoint him our secretary: for Simon is a scollard, and can read written hand; and so let him be respected accordingly.

3 Mob. Room for Master Snuffle.

Heel. Here, stand by me: and let us, neighbours, proceed to open the premunire of the thing: but first, your reverence to the lord of the manor: a long life and a merry one to our landlord, Sir Jacob! Huzza!

Mob. Huzza!

Sneak. How fares it, honest Crispin?

Heel. Servant, Master Sneak. Let us now open the premunire of the thing, which I shall do briefly, with all the loquacity possible; that is, in a medium way; which, that we may the better do it, let the secretary read the names of the candidates, and what they say for themselves; and then we shall know what to say of them. Master Snuffle, begin.

Snuffle. [Reads.] "To the worthy inhabitants of the ancient corporation of Garratt. Gentlemen, your votes and interests are humbly requested in favour of Timothy Goose, to succeed our late worthy mayor, Mr. Richard Dripping, in the said office, he being—"

Heel. This Goose is but a kind of gosling, a sort of sneaking scoundrel. Who is he?

Snuffle. A journeyman tailor from Putney.

Heel. A journeyman tailor! A rascal, has he the impudence to transpire to be mayor? D'ye consider, neighbours, the weight of this office? Why, it is a burden for the back of a porter; and can you think that this cross-legg'd, cabbage-eating son of a cucumber, this whey-faced ninny, who is but the ninth part of a man, has strength to support it?

1 Mob. No Goose! no Goose!

2 Mob. A Goose!

Heel. Hold your hissing, and proceed to the next.

Snuffle. [Reads.] "Your votes are desired for Mathew Mug."

Mob. A Mug! a Mug!

Heel. Oh, oh, what you are all ready to have a touch of the tankard! but fair and soft, good neighbours, and, unless I am mistaken, you will find him a damned bitter draught.

1 Mob. A Mug! a Mug!

2 Mob. Hear him; hear Master Heeltap.

1 Mob. A Mug! a Mug!

Heel. Harkee, you fellow, with your mouth full of mug, let me ask you a question: bring him forward. Pray is not this Matthew Mug, a victualler?

3 Mob. I believe he may.

Heel. And lives at the sign of the Adam and Eve?

3 Mob. I believe he may.

Heel. Now answer upon your honour, and as you are a gentleman, what is the present price of a quart of home-brewed at the Adam and Eve?

3 Mob. I don't know.

Heel. You lie, sirrah: an't it a groat?

3 Mob. I believe it may.

Heel. Oh, may be so. Now, neighbours, here 's a pretty rascal; this same Mug, because, d'ye see, state affairs would not jog glibly without laying a farthing a quart upon ale, this scoundrel, not contented to take things in a medium way, has had the impudence to rise it a penny.

Mob. No Mug! no Mug!

Heel. So, I thought I should crack Mr. Mug. Come, proceed to the next, Simon.

Snuffte. The next upon the list is Peter Primmer, the schoolmaster.

Heel. Ay, neighbours, and a sufficient man: let me tell you, Master Primmer is the man for my money; a man of learning, that can lay down the law; why, adzooks, he is wise enough to puzzle the parson: and then, how you have heard him oration at the Adam and Eve, of a Saturday night, about Russia and Prussia. 'Ecod, George Gage the exciseman is nothing at all to un.

4 Mob. A Primmer!

Heel. Ay, if the folks above did but know him. Why, lads, he will make us all statesmen in time.

2 Mob. Indeed!

Heel. Why he swears as how, all the miscarriages are owing to the great people's not learning to read.

3 Mob. Indeed!

Heel. "For," says Peter, says he, "if they would but once submit to be learned by me, there is no knowing to what a pitch the nation might rise."

1 Mob. Ay, I wish they would.

Sneak. Crispin, what is Peter Primmer a candidate?

Heel. He is, Master Sneak.

Sneak. Lord, I know him, mun, as well as my mother: why, I used to go to his lectures to Pewterers' hall, long with deputy Firkin.

Heel. Like enough.

Sneak. Odds me, brother Bruin, can you tell me what is become of my wife?

Bruin. She is gone off with the major.

Sneak. Mayhap to take a walk in the garden. I will go and take a peep at what they are doing. [Exit.]

Mob. [Without.] Huzza!

Heel. Gad-so! the candidates are coming.

[Exeunt MOB, &c.]

Re-enter SIR JACOB JOLLIF, BRUIN, and MRS. BRUIN, through the garden gate.

Sir J. Well, son Bruin, how d'ye relish the corporation of Garratt?

Bruin. Why, lookye, Sir Jacob, my way is always to speak what I think: I don't approve on't at all.

Vol. I. . . . 2 B.

17

Mrs. B. No!

Sir J. And what's your objection?

Bruin. Why, I was never over-fond of your Maygames: besides, corporations are too serious things; they are edge-tools, Sir Jacob.

Sir J. That they are frequently tools, I can readily grant: but I never heard much of their edge.

Mrs. B. Well now, I protest I am pleased with it mightily.

Bruin. And who the devil doubts it? You women folks are easily pleased.

Mrs. B. Well, I like it so well, that I hope to see one every year.

Bruin. Do you? Why then you will be dunnably bit; you may take your leave, I can tell you: for this is the last you shall see.

Sir J. Fie, Nr. Bruin, how can you be such a bear? Is that a manner of treating your wife.

Bruin. What, I suppose you would have me such a snivelling sot as your son-in-law Sneak, to truckle and cringe, to fetch and to—

Re-enter JERRY SNEAK, in a violent hurry.

Sneak. Where's brother Bruin? O Lord! brother, I have such a dismal story to tell you.

Bruin. What 's the matter.

Sneak. Why, you know I went into the garden to look for my wife and the major, and there I hunted and hunted as sharp as if it had been for one of my own minikins; but the deuce a major or madam could I see; at last, a thought came into my head to look for them up in the summer-house.

Bruin. And there you found them?

Sneak. I'll tell you: the door was locked; and then I looked through the key-hole: and there, Lord ha' mercy upon us! [Whispers.] as sure as a gun.

Bruin. Indeed! Zounds, why did not you break open the door?

Sneak. I durst not. What, would you have me set my wit to a soldier? I warrant the major would have knocked me down with one of his boots.

Bruin. Very well! Pretty doings! you see, Sir Jacob, these are the fruits of indulgence. You may call me a bear, but your daughter shall never make me a beast. [MOB huzzas.]

Sir J. Hey-day! What, is the election over already?

Re-enter CRISPIN HEELTAP, &c.

Heel. Where is Master Sneak?

Sneak. Here, Crispin.

Heel. The ancient corporation of Garratt, in consideration of your great parts and abilities, and out of respect to their landlord, Sir Jacob, have unanimously chosen you mayor.

Sneak. Me! huzza! Good Lord, who would have thought it? But how came Master Primmer to lose it?

Heel. Why, Phil Fleam had told the electors, that Master Primmer was an Irishman; and so they would none of them give their vote for a foreigner.

Sneak. So then I have it for certain: huzza! Now, brother Bruin, you shall see how I'll manage my madam. 'Gad, I'll make her know I am a man of authority; she shan't think to bullock and domineer over me.

Mrs. S. [Without.] Jerry! Jerry!

Bruin. Now for it, Sneak; the enemy's at hand.

Sneak. You promise to stand by me, brother Bruin?

Bruin. Tooth and nail.

Sneak. Then now for it; I am ready, let her come when she will.

Re-enter MRS. SNEAK.

Mrs. S. Where is the puppy?

Sneak. Yes, yes, she is axing for me.

Mrs. S. So, sot; what, is this true that I hear? Sneak. May be 'tis, may be tan't; I don't choose to trust my affairs with a woman.—Is that right, brother Bruin?

Bruin. Fine! don't bate her an inch. [Apert.]

Sneak. Stand by me. [Apert.]

Mrs. S. Hey-day! I am amazed! Why, what is the meaning of this?

Sneak. The meaning is plain; that I am grown a man, and vil do what I please, without being accountable to nobody.

Mrs. S. Why, the fellow is surely bewitched.

Sneak. No, I am unwitched, and that you shall know to your cost; and since you provoke me, I will tell you a bit of my mind; what, I am the husband, I hope?

Bruin. That's right; at her again. [Apert.]

Sneak. Yes, and you sha'n't think to hector and domineer over me as you have done; for I'll go to the club when I please, and stay out as late as I list, and row in a boat to Putney on Sundays, and visit my friends at Vitsontide, and keep the key of the till, and help myself at table to vhat wittles I like; and I'll have a bit of the brown.

Bruin. Bravo, brother Sneak, the day's your own. [Apert.]

Sneak. An't it? Why, I did not think it vas in me. Shall I tell her all I know? [Apert.]

Bruin. Every thing. You see she is struck dumb. [Apert.]

Sneak. As an oyster. [Apert.] Besides, Madam, I have something further to tell you: 'ecod, if some folks go into gardens with majors, mayhap other people may go into garrets with maids.—There, I gave it her home, brother Bruin. [Apert.]

Mrs. S. Why, noodle! jackanapes! harkye, who am I?

Sneak. Come, don't go to call names. Am I? why, my wife, and I am your master.

Mrs. S. My master! you paltry, puddling puppy! you sneaking, shabby, scrubby, snivelling whelp!

Sneak. Brother Bruin, don't let her come near me. [Apert.]

Mrs. S. Have I, sirrah, demeaned myself to wed such a thing, such a reptile as thee? Have I not made myself a by-word to all my acquaintance? Don't all the world cry, Lord, who would have thought it? Miss Molly Jollup to be married to Sneak; to take up at last with such a noodle as he?

Sneak. Ay, and glad enough you could catch me; you know you was pretty near your last legs.

Mrs. S. Was there ever such a confident cur? My last legs! Why, all the country knows I could have picked and choosed where I would. Did not I refuse 'Squire Ap-Griffith from Wales? Did not Counsellor Crab come a courting a twelve-month? Did not Mr. Wort, the great brewer of Brentford, make an offer that I should keep my post-chay?

Sneak. Nay, brother Bruin, she has had werry good proffers, that is certain. [Apert.]

Mrs. S. My last legs!—but I can rein my passion no longer; let me get at the villain.

Bruin. O fie, sister Sneak.

Sneak. Hold her fast. [Apert.]

Mrs. S. Mr. Bruin, unhand me; what, is it you that have stirred up these coals then? He is set on by you to abuse me.

Bruin. Not I; I would only have a man behave like a man.

Mrs. S. What, and you are to teach him, I warrant. But here comes the major.

Re-enter MAJOR STURGEON.

Oh, major! such a riot and rumpus! Like a man, indeed! I wish people would mind their own affairs, and not meddle with matters that does not concern them;—but all in good time; I shall one day catch him alone, when he has not his bullies to back him.

Sneak. Adod, that's true, brother Bruin: what shall I do when she has me at home, and nobody by but ourselves? [Apert.]

Bruin. If you get her once under, you may do with her whatever you will.

Maj. S. Lookye, Master Bruin, I don't know how this behaviour may suit with a citizen; but were you an officer, and Major Sturgeon upon your court-martial—

Bruin. What then?

Maj. S. Then? why then you would be broke.

Bruin. Broke! and for what?

Maj. S. What! read the articles of war. But these things are out of your spear; points of honour are for the sons of the sword.

Sneak. Honour! if you come to that, where was your honour when you got my wife in the garden?

Maj. S. Now, Sir Jacob, this is the curse of our cloth: all suspected for the faults of a few.

Sneak. Ay, and not without reason. I heard of your tricks at the King of Bohemy, when you was campaigning about, I did. Father Sir Jacob, he is as wicious as an old ram.

Maj. S. Stop whilst you are safe, Master Sneak; for the sake of your amiable lady, I pardon what is past—but for you— [To BRUIN.]

Bruin. Well.

Maj. S. Dread the whole force of my fury.

Bruin. Why, lookye, Major Sturgeon, I don't much care for your poppers and sharps, because why, they are out of my way; but if you will doff with your boots, and box a couple of bouts—

Maj. S. Box! box!—Blades! bullets! bag-shot!

Mrs. S. Not for the world, my dear major; oh, risk not so precious a life. Ungrateful wretches! and is this the reward for all the great feats he has done? After all his marchings, his souings, his sweatings, his swimnings, must his dear blood be spilt by a broker?

Maj. S. Be satisfied, sweet Mrs. Sneak; these little farcasas we soldiers are subject to; trifles, bagatailes, Mrs. Sneak. But, that matters may be conducted in a military manner, I will get our chaplain to pen me a challenge. Expect to hear from my adjutant. [To BRUIN.]

Mrs. S. Major! Sir Jacob! what, are you all leagued against his dear life? A man! yes, a very manly action indeed, to set married people a quarrelling, and ferment a difference between hushand and wife : if you were a man, you would not stand by and see a poor woman beat and abused by a brute, you would not.

Sneak. O Lord, I can hold out no longer, why, brother Bruin, you have set her a weeping. My life, my lowy, don't weep : did I ever think I should have made my Molly to weep ?

Mrs. S. Last legs! you lubberly—

[Strikes him.]

Sir J. Oh, fie, Molly!

Mrs. S. What, are you leagued against me, Sir Jacob ?

Sir J. Pr'ythee, don't expose yourself before the whole parish. But what has been the occasion of this ?

Mrs. S. Why, has not he gone and made himself the fool of the fair? Mayor of Garratt, indeed! ecod, I could trample him under my feet.

Sneak. Nay, why should you grudge me my purfarmor ?

Mrs. S. Did you ever hear such an oaf? Why thee will be pointed at wherever thee goest. Lookye, Jerry, mind what I say; go get 'em to choose somebody else, or never come near me again.

Sneak. What shall I do, father Sir Jacob ?

Sir J. Nay, daughter, you take this thing in too serious a light; my honest neighbours thought to compliment me: but come, we'll settle the business at once. Neighbours, my son Sneak being seldom amongst us, the duty will never be done; so we will get our honest friend, Heeltap, to execute the office: he is, I think, every way qualified.

Mob. A Heeltap!

Heel. What, do you mean as Master Jeremy's deputy ?

Sir J. Ay, ay, his locum tenens.

Sneak. Do, Crispin, do be my locum tenens.

Heel. Give me your hand, Master Sneak, and to oblige you I will be the locum tenens.

Sir J. So, that is settled: but now to heal the other breach: come, major, the gentlemen of your cloth seldom bear malice; let me interpose between you and my son.

Maj. S. Your son-in-law, Sir Jacob, does deserve a castigation; but on recollection, a cit would but sully my arms. I forgive him.

Sir J. That's right. As a token of amity, and to celebrate our feast, let us call in the fiddles. Now if the major had but his shoes, he might join in a country dance.

Maj. S. Sir Jacob, no shoes; a major must be never out of his boots; always ready for action. Mrs. Sneak will find me lightsome enough.

Sneak. What, are all the women engaged? why then my locum tenens and I will jig together. Forget and forgive, major.

Maj. S. Freely.

Nor be it said, that after all my toil,

I stain'd my regimentals by a broil.

To you I dedicate boots, sword, and shield,

Sir J. As harmless in the chamber as the field.

[Exeunt.]

In the character of Jerry Sneak, it has been usual to introduce the following comic song, of

ROBINSON CRUSOE.

*When I was a lad, my fortune was bad,
My grandfather I did lose, O;
I'll bet you a can, you have heard of the man,
His name it was Robinson Crusoe.*

*Oh! poor Robinson Crusoe,
Tinky ting tang, tinky ting tang,

*You've read in a book of a voyage he took,
While the raging whirlwinds blew so;
That the ship with a shock fell plump on a rock,
Near drowning poor Robinson Crusoe.*

Oh! poor, &c.

*Poor soul! none but he escap'd on the sea,
Ah! Fate, Fate! how could you do so;
'Till at length he was thrown on an island unknown
Which received poor Robinson Crusoe.*

Oh! poor, &c.

*But he sav'd from on board a gun and a sword,
And another old matter or two, so;
That by dint of his thrift he manag'd to shift
Pretty well, for poor Robinson Crusoe.*

Oh! poor, &c.

*He wanted something to eat, and couldn't get meat,
The cattle away from him flew so;
That but for his gun he'd been sorely undone,
And starv'd, would poor Robinson Crusoe.*

Oh! poor, &c.

*And he happen'd to save from the merciless wate
A poor parrot, I assure you 'tis true, so;
That, when he came home from a wearisome roam,
Us'd to cry out, poor Robinson Crusoe.*

Oh! poor, &c.

*Then he got all the wood' that ever he could,
And he stuck it together with glue, so;
That he made him a hut in which he might put
The carcass of Robinson Crusoe.*

Oh! poor, &c.

*While his man Friday kept the house snug and hay,
To be sure 'twas his business to do so,
They liv'd friendly together, less like servant than neighbour.*

Liv'd Friday and Robinson Crusoe.

Oh! poor, &c.

*Then he wore a large cap, and a coat without nap,
And a beard as long as a Jew, so,
That, by all that's civil, he look'd like a devil
More than poor Robinson Crusoe.*

Oh! poor, &c.

*At length, within hail, he saw a stout sail,
And he took to his little canoe, so;
When he reach'd the ship, they gave him a trip,
Back to England brought Robinson Crusoe.*

Oh! poor, &c.

BARBAROSSA:

A TRAGEDY,

IN FIVE ACTS.

BY DR. BROWNE.

REMARKS.

The advantage of Garrick in Achmet, and Mossop in Barbarossa, when this play first appeared in 1755, contributed more to its success than the invention of the author, who has evidently borrowed his design from other dramatic productions; particularly, from the tragedy of Merope, and in some delineations of character from Tamercans and the Morning Bride.

Master Betty made his first appearance before a London audience, in the interesting character of Achmet, in this play; and was received with loud laughter, which ended in tumultuous applause at his surprising ability and genuine grace.

It is here correctly given, as then performed.

SCENE.—The Royal Palace of Algiers.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—An Apartment in the Palace.

Enter OTHMAN and a SLAVE.

Oth. A stranger, say'st thou, that inquires of Othman?

Slave. He does; and waits admittance.

Oth. Did he tell

His name and quality?

Slave. That he declined:

But call'd himself thy friend.

Oth. Conduct the stranger to me.

[Exit SLAVE.]

Perhaps some worthy citizen, returned
From voluntary exile, to Algiers,
Once known in happier days.

Enter SADI.

Ah, Sadi here!

My honoured friend!

Sadi. Stand off—pollute me not:

These honest arms, though worn with want, disdain

Thy gorgeous trappings, earned by foul dishonour.

Oth. Forbear thy rash reproaches; for beneath

This habit, which to thy mistaken eye

Confirms my guilt, I wear a heart as true

As Sadi's to my king.

Sadi. Why then beneath

This cursed roof, this black usurper's palace,

Dar'st thou to draw infected air, and live

The slave of insolence!

O shame to dwell

With murder, lust, and rapine! did he not

Come from the depths of Barea's solitude,

196

With fair pretence of faith and firm alliance ?
 Did not our grateful king, with open arms,
 Receive him as his guest ? O fatal hour !
 Did he not then with hot, adult'rous eye,
 Gaze on the Queen Zaphira ? Yes, 'twas lust,
 Lust gave th' infernal whisper to his soul,
 And bade him murder, if he would enjoy !
 Yet thou, pernicious traitor, unabash'd
 Canst wear the murderer's badge.

Oth. Mistaken man !

Yet still I love thee :
 Still unprovok'd by thy intemperate zeal,
 Could passion prompt me to licentious speech,
 Bethink thee—might I not reproach thy flight
 With the foul names of fear and perfidy ?
 Didst thou not fly, when Barbarossa's sword
 Reek'd with the blood of thy brave countrymen ?
 What then did I ?—Beneath this hated roof,
 In pity to thy widow'd queen—

Sadi. In pity ?

Oth. Yes, Sadi ! Heaven is witness, pity sway'd
 me.

With honest guile I did enrol my name
 In the black list of Barbarossa's friends :
 In hope, that some propitious hour might rise,
 When heaven would dash the murderer from his throne,

And give young Selim to his orphan'd people.

Sadi. Indeed ! canst thou be true ?

Oth. By heaven, I am.

Sadi. Why then dissemble thus ?

Oth. Have I not told thee ?

I held it vain, to stem the tyrant's power,
 By the weak efforts of an ill-tim'd rage.

Sadi. I find thee honest ; and with pride

Will join thy counsels.

Can aught, my friend, be done ?

Can aught be dar'd ?

Oth. We groan beneath the scourge.

This very morn, on false pretence of vengeance
 For the foul murder of our honour'd king,
 Five guiltless wretches perish'd on the rack.

Sadi. O my devoted country !

But say, the widow'd queen—my heart bleeds for
 her.

Oth. Hemm'd round by terrors,

Within this cruel palace, once the seat
 Of every joy, through seven long tedious years,
 She mourns her murder'd lord, her exil'd son,
 Her people fallen : the murderer of her lord,
 Returning now from conquest o'er the Moors,
 Tempts her to marriage ; but with noble firmness,
 Surpassing female, she rejects his vows,
 Scorning the horrid union. Meantime he,
 With ceaseless hate, pursues her exil'd son,
 The virtuous youth, even into foreign climes.
 Ere this, perhaps, he bleeds. A murd'ring ruffian
 Is sent to watch his steps, and plunge the dagger
 Into his guiltless breast.

Sadi. Is this thy faith !

Tamely to witness to such deeds of horror !

Give me thy poignard ? lead me to the tyrant.

What though surrounding guards—

Oth. Repress thy rage.

Thou wilt alarm the palace, wilt involve
 Thyself, thy friend, in ruin. Haste thee hence ;
 Haste to the remnant of our loyal friends.
 And let maturer councils rule thy zeal.

Sadi. Yet let us ne'er forget our prince's wrongs :
 Remember, Othman, (and let vengeance rise)
 How in the pangs of death, and in his gore
 Wek'ting, we found our prince !

17*

His royal blood,
 The life-blood of his people, o'er the bath
 Ran purple ! Oh, remember ! and revenge !

Oth. Doubt not my zeal. But haste, and seek our friends.

Near to the western port Almanzor dwells,
 Yet uneduc'd by Barbarossa's power.
 He will disclose to thee, if aught be heard
 Of Selim's safety, or (what more I dread)
 Of Selim's death. Thence best may our resolve
 Be drawn hereafter. But let caution guide thee.

Sadi. I obey thee.

Near to the western port, thou say'st ?

Oth. Even there.

Close by the blasted palm-tree, where the mosque
 O'erlooks the city. Haste thee hence, my friend.
 I would not have thee found within these walls.

[Flourish.

And hark—these warlike sounds proclaim the approach

Of the proud Barbarossa, with his train.

Begone—

Sadi. May dire disease and pestilence
 Hang o'er his steps !—Farewell — Remember,
 Othman,

Thy queen's, thy prince's, and thy country's wrong.

[Exit.

Oth. When I forget them be contempt my lot !

Enter BARBAROSSA, Guards, &c.

Bar. Valiant Othman,
 Are those vile slaves impal'd ?

Oth. My lord, they are.

Bar. Did not the rack extort confession from them ?

Oth. They died obdurate : while the melting crowd

Wept at their groans and anguish.

Bar. Curse on their womanish hearts !

But why sits

That sadness on thy brow ? for oft I find thee
 Musing and sad ; while joy for my return,

My sword victorious, and the Moors o'erthrown,
 Resounds through all my palace.

Oth. Mighty warrior !

The soul, intent on offices of love,
 Will oft neglect or scorn the weaker proof,
 Which smiles or speech can give.

Bar. Well : be it so.

To guard Algiers from anarchy's misrule,
 I sway the regal sceptre.

But 'tis strange,

That when, with open arms, I would receive Young Selim ; would restore the crown, which
 death

Reft from his father's head—he scorns my bounty,
 And proudly kindles war in foreign climes,
 Against my power, who sav'd his bleeding country.

Enter ALADIN.

Aladin. Brave prince, I bring thee tidings
 Of high concernment to Algiers and thee.
 Young Selim is no more.

Oth. Selim no more !

Bar. Why that astonishment ?

He was our bitterest foe.

Oth. So perish all thy causeless enemies !

Bar. How died the prince, and where ?

Aladin. The rumour tells

That, flying to Oran, he there begg'd succour
 From Ferdinand of Spain, t' invade Algiers.

Bar. From Christian dogs !

Oth. How! league with infidels!

Aladin. And there held council with the haughty Spaniard,

To conquer and dethrone thee; but in vain:
For in a dark encounter with two slaves,
Wherein the one fell by his youthful arm,
Selim at length was slain.

Bar. Ungrateful boy!

Oft have I courted him to meet my kindness;
But still in vain; he shunn'd me like a pestilence;
Nor could I e'er behold him, since the down
Cover'd his manly cheek.—How many years
Numbered he?

Oth. I think, scarce thirteen, when his father died,

And now some twenty.

Bar. Othman, now for proof
Of undissembled service.—Well I know,
Thy long experienc'd faith hath placed thee high
In the queen's confidence:

Othman, she must be won.
Plead thou my cause of love:

Make her but mine,
And such unsought reward shall crown thy zeal,
As shall outsoar thy wishes.

Oth. Mighty king,
Where duty bids, I go.

Bar. Then haste thee, Othman,
Ere yet the rumour of her son's decease
Hath reach'd her ear;

Tell her, I come, borne on the wings of love!—
Haste—fly—I follow thee. [Exit OTHMAN.

Now, Aladin,

Now fortune bears us to the wish'd-for port:
This was the rock I dreaded. Dost not think
Th' attempt was greatly daring?

Aladin. Bold as needful.

What booteth it, to cut the old serpent off,
While the young adder nested in his place?

Bar. True: Algiers is mine,
Without a rival.

Yet I wonder much,
Omar returns not: Omar, whom I sent
On this high trust. I fear, 'tis he hath fallen.
Didst thou not say, two slaves encounter'd Selim?

Aladin. Ay, two; 'tis rumour'd so.

Bar. And that one fell?

Aladin. Even so:—by Selim's hand; while his companion

Planted his happier steel in Selim's heart.

Bar. Omar, I fear, is fallen. From my right hand

I gave my signet to the trusty slave;
And bade him send it, as the certain pledge
Of Selim's death; if sickness or captivity,
Or wayward fate, should thwart his quick return.

Aladin. The rumour yet is young; perhaps foreruns

The trusty slave's approach.

Bar. We'll wait the event.

Meantime give out, that now the widow'd queen
Hath dried her tears, prepar'd to crown my love
By marriage rites; spread wide the flattering tale:
For, if persuasion win not her consent,
Power shall compel.

This night my will devotes to feast and joy,
For conquest o'er the Moor. Hence, Aladin,
And see the night-watch close the palace round.
Now to the queen. [Exit ALADIN.

Enter IRENE.

My wayward daughter—Still with thy follv thwart

Each purpose of my soul? Why these sullen
tears?

Irene. Let not these tears offend my father's eye;

They are the tears of pity. From the queen
I come, thy suppliant.

Bar. What wouldst thou urge?

Irene. Thy dread return from war,
And proffer'd love, have open'd every wound,
The soft and lenient hand of time had clos'd.

If ever gentle pity touch'd thy heart,
Urge not thy harsh command
To see her; her distracted soul is bent
To mourn in solitude. She asks no more.

Bar. She mocks my love. Had not war,
And great ambition, call'd me from Algiers,
Ere this, my power had reach'd what she demes
But there's a cause, which touches on my peace,
And bids me brook no more her false delays.

Irene. Oh, frown not thus! Sure, pity ne'er deserv'd

A parent's frown! but look more kindly on me,
Let thy consenting pity mix with mine,
And heal the woes of weeping majesty.
Unhappy queen!

Bar. What means that gushing tear?

Irene. Oh, never shall Irene taste of peace,
While poor Zaphira mourns.

Bar. Dry up thy tears. What! damp the general triumph,
That echoes through Algiers! which now shall piece

The vaulted heaven, as soon as fame shall spread
Young Selim's death, my empire's bitterest foe.

Irene. O generous Selim! [Weeps.

Bar. Ah! there's more in this?

Tell me, Irene:—on thy duty, tell me,
Why, at this detested name of Selim,
Afresh thy sorrow streams?

Irene. Yes, I will tell thee,
For he is gone, and dreads thy hate no more;
My father knows, that scarce five moons are past,
Since the Moors seiz'd and sold me at Oran,—
A hopeless captive in a foreign clime.

Bar. Too well I know, and rue the fatal day.
But what of this?

Irene. Oft have I told thee,
How, midst the throng, a youth appear'd: his eye
Bright as the morning star.

Bar. And was it Selim?

Did he redeem thee?

Irene. With unsparing hand
He paid th' allotted ransom: at his feet I wept,
Dissolv'd in tears of gratitude and joy.

But when I told my quality and birth,
He started at the name of Barbarossa!
And thrice turn'd pale. Yet, with recovery mild,
"Go to Algiers," he cried; "protect my mother,
And be to her what Selim is to thee."

Even such, my father, was the generous youth,
Who, by the hands of bloody men,
Lies number'd with the dead.

Bar. Amazement chills me!
Was this thy unknown friend conceal'd from me?
False—faithless child!

Irene. Could gratitude do less? [mo
He said, thy wrath pursu'd him; thence conjur'd
Not to reveal his name.

Bar. Thou treacherous maid!

To stoop to freedom from thy father's foe!

Irene. Alas, my father!

He never was thy foe.

Bar. What! plead for Selim!
O coward! traitress to thy father's glory!
Hence from my sight!
Beware thee;—shun the queen: nor taint her ear
With Selim's fate.—Yes she shall crown my love;
Or by our prophet, she shall dread my power.

[Exit.

Irene. Unhappy queen!
To what new scenes of horror art thou doom'd!
She but entreats to die
In her dear father's tent; thither, good queen,
My care shall speed thee, while suspicion sleeps.
What tho' my frowning father pour his rage
On my defenceless head; yet innocence
Shall yield her firm support, and conscious virtue
Gild all my days. Could I but save Zaphira, Till the storm beat; I'll weep and pray, till she,
Bereft of her lov'd lord—of every joy bereft,
And heaven forget, my father e'er was cruel.

[Exit.

ACT II.

SCENE I.—Another Apartment.

Enter ZAPHIRA.

Zaph. When shall I be at peace? O righteous
Heaven,
Strengthen my fainting soul, which fain would rise,
To confidence in thee!—But woes on woes
O'erwhelm me! first my husband—now my son!
Both dead!—both slaughter'd by the bloody hand
Of Barbarossa!

Enter OTHMAN.

O faithful Othman!
Our fears were true:—my Selim is no more!
Oth. Has then the fatal secret reach'd thine ear?
Inhuman tyrant!
Zaph. Strike him, Heaven, with thunder!
Nor let Zaphira doubt thy Providence.
Oth. 'Twas that we fear'd. Oppose not Heaven's high will,
Nor struggle with the tenfold chain of fate,
That links thee to thy woes! Oh, rather yield,
And wait the happier hour, when innocence
Shall weep no more. My honour'd queen,
Tha king—

Zaph. Whom styl'st thou king?Oth. 'Tis Barbarossa.—Zaph. Tyrant!

Does he assume the name of king?

Oth. He does.

Zaph. O title vilely purchas'd! by the blood
Of innocence! by treachery and murder!
May Heaven, incens'd, pour down its vengeance
on him,

Blast all his joys, and turn them into horror;
Till frenzy rise, and bid him curse the hour
That gave his crimes their birth! My faithful
Othman,

My sole surviving comfort! can no means be found,
To fly these black'ning horrors that surround me?

Oth. That hope is vain! The tyrant knows thy hate.

Hence, day and night, his watchful guards
Surround thee. Rouse not then his anger;
Let soft persuasion and mild eloquence
Redeem that liberty, which stern rebuke
Would rob thee of for ever.

Zaph. Cruel task!

An injured queen

To kneel for liberty! and, oh! to whom?
Even to the murderer of her lord and son!
O, perish first, Zaphira! yes, I'll die!
For what is life to me? my dear, dear lord!
My hapless child!—yes, I will follow you.

Oth. Wilt thou not see him, then?Zaph. I will not, Othman;

Or if I do, with bitter imprecation,
More keen than poison shot from serpent's tongues,
I'll pour my curses on him!

Oth. Will Zaphira

Thus meanly sink in woman's fruitless rage,
When she should wake revenge?

Zaph. Revenge?—O tell me—
Tell me but how? what can a helpless woman?

Oth. Gain but the tyrant's leave, and reach thy
father:

Pour thy complaints before him: let thy wrongs
Kindle his indignation to pursue
This vile usurper, till unceasing war
Blast his ill-gotten power.

Zaph. Ah, say'st thou, Othman?

Thy words have shot like lightning through my frame;

And all my soul's on fire!—Thou faithful friend!
Yes—with more gentle speech I'll sooth his pride—
Regain my freedom; reach my father's tents;
There paint my countless woes. His kindling
rage

Shall wake the valleys into honest vengeance:
The sudden storm shall pour on Barbarossa;
And every glowing warrior steep his shaft
In deadlier poison, to revenge my wrongs.

Oth. There spoke the queen. But as thou lov'st thy freedom,
Touch not on Selim's death. Thy soul will kindle,
And passion mount in flames that will consume
thee.

Zaph. My murder'd son! Yes to revenge thy
death,

I'll speak a language which my heart disdains.

Oth. Peace, peace! the tyrant comes: now in jur'd queen,
Plead for thy freedom, hope for just revenge,
And check each rising passion. [Exit OTHMAN.

Enter BARBAROSSA.

Bar. Hail, sovereign fair! in whom
Beauty and majesty conspire to charm!
Behold the conqu'ror.

Zaph. O Barbarossa!

No more the pride of conquest e'er can charm
My widow'd heart? With my departed lord
My love lies buried?
Then turn thee to some happier fair, whose heart
May crown thy growing love with love sincere;
For I have none to give.

Bar. Love ne'er should die:

'Tis the soul's cordial;—'tis the fount of life;
Therefore should spring eternal in the breast:
One subject lost, another should succeed;
And all our life be love.

Zaph. Urge me no more: thou might'st with equal hope

Woo the cold marble weeping o'er a tomb,
To meet thy wishes! But, if gen'rous love
Dwell in thy breast, vouchsafe me proof sincere:
Give me safe convoy to the native vales
Of dear Mutija, where my father reigns.

Bar. Oh, blind to proffer'd bliss! what, fondly quit

This pomp

Of empire, for an Arab's wand'ring tent,
Where the mock chieftain leads his vagrant tribes
From plain to plain, and faintly shadows out
The majesty of kings!—Far other joys
Here shall attend thy call.

To thee, exalted fair! submissive realms Shall bow the neck; and swarthy kings and queens,

From the far distant Niger and the Nile,
Drawn captive at my conqu'ring chariot wheels,
Shall kneel before thee.

Zaph. Pomp and power are toys,
Which even the mind at ease may well disdain;
But, ah! what mockery is the finsel pride
Of splendour, when, by wasting woes, the mind
Lies desolate within;—such, such is mine!
O'erwhelm'd with ills, and dead to every joy;
Envy me not this last request, to die
In my dear father's tents!

Bar. Thy suit is vain—

Zaph. Thus kneeling at thy feet—I do beseech
thee.

Bar. Thou thankless fair!
Thus to repay the labours of my love!
Had I not seiz'd the throne when Selim died,
Ere this, thy foes had laid Algiers in ruin:
I check'd the warring powers, and gave you peace.
Make thee but mine,
I will descend the throne, and call thy son
From banishment to empire.

Zaph. Oh my heart!
Can I bear this?—
Inhuman tyrant! Curses on thy head!
May dire remorse and anguish haunt thy throne,
And gender in thy bosom fell despair!
Despair, as deep as mine!

Bar. What means Zaphira?
What means this burst of grief?

Zaph. Thou fell destroyer!
Had not guilt steel'd thy heart, awak'ning conscience
Would flash conviction on thee, and each look,
Shot from these eyes, be arm'd with serpent horrors,

To turn thee into stone!—Relentless man!
Who did the bloody deed? Oh tremble, guilt,
Where'er thou art!—Look on me,—tell me, tyrant!
Who slew my blameless son?

Bar. What envious tongue
Hath dar'd to taint my name with slander?
Thy Selim lives: nay more, he soon shall reign,
If thou consent to bless me.

Zaph. Never! Oh, never—Sooner would I roam
An unknown exile through the torrid climes
Of Africa, sooner dwell with wolves and tigers,
Than mount with thee my murder'd Selim's
throne?

Bar. Rash queen, forbear! think on thy captive
state;
Remember, that within these palace walls
I am omnipotent:—yield thee then:
Avert my gathering horrors that surround thee,
And dread the power incens'd.

Zaph. Dares thy licentious tongue pollute mine
ear

With that foul menace!—Tyrant, dread'st thou not

I'h' all-seeing eye of Heaven, its lifted thunder,
And all the redd'ning vengeance which it stores
For crimes like thine?—Yet know, Zaphira scorns
thee.

Though robb'd by thee of every dear support,

No tyrant's threat can awe the free-born soul,
That greatly dares to die. [Exit ZAPHIRA]

Bar. Where should she learn the tale of Selim's
death?

Could Othman dare to tell it? If he did,
My rage shall sweep him, swifter than the whirl wind,

To instant death!—

Enter ALADIN.

O Aladin!
Timely thou com'st, to ease my lab'ring thought,
That swells with indignation and despair.

This stubborn woman—
Aladin. What, unconquer'd still?

Bar. The news of Selim's fate hath reach'd her ear.

Whence could this come?
Aladin. I can resolve the doubt.
A female slave, attendant on Zaphira,
O'erheard the messenger who brought the tale,
And gave it to her ear.

Bar. Perdition seize her!
Nor threats can move, nor promise now allure,
Her haughty soul: nay, she defies my power;
And talks of death, as if her female form
Inshrin'd some hero's spirit.

Aladin. Let her rage foam.
I bring thee tidings that will ease thy pain.

Bar. Say'st thou?—Speak on—O give me quick relief!

Aladin. The gallant youth is come, who slew her son.

Bar. Who, Omar?
Aladin. No; unhappy Omar fell
By Selim's hand. But Achmet, whom he join'd
His brave associate, so the youth bids tell thee,
Reveng'd his death, by Selim's.

Bar. Gallant youth!
Bears he the signet?

Aladin. Ay.
Bar. That speaks him true.—Conduct him,
Aladin. [Exit ALADIN]

This is beyond my hope. The secret pledge
Restor'd, prevents suspicion of the deed,
While it confirms it done

Enter SELIM disguised as ACHMET, and ALADIN.

Selim. Hail, mighty Barbarossa! as the pledge
[Kneels.]

Of Selim's death, behold thy ring restor'd:—
That pledge will speak the rest.

Bar. Rise, valiant youth!
But first, no more a slave—I give thee freedom.
Thou art the youth, whom Omar (now no more)
Join'd his companion in this brave attempt?

Selim. I am.

Bar. Then tell me how you sped.—Where found ye
That insolent?

Selim. We found him at Oran,
Plotting deep mischief to thy throne and people.

Bar. Well ye repaid the traitor.—

Selim. As we ought.
While night drew on, we leap'd upon our prey.
Full at his heart brave Omar aim'd the poignard,
Which Selim shunning, wrench'd it from his hand.
Then plung'd it in his breast. I hasted on,
Too late to save, yet I reveng'd my friend:

My thirsty dagger with repeated blows
Search'd every artery: they fell together,

Gasping in folds of mortal enmity;
And thus in frowns expir'd.

Bar. Well hast thou sped:
Thy dagger did its office, faithful Achmet!
And high reward shall wait thee.—One thing
more—

Be the thought fortunate!—Go, seek the queen.
For know, the rumour of her Selim's death
Hath reach'd her ear: hence dark suspicions rise,
Glancing at me. Go, tell her, that thou saw'st
Her son expire;—that, with his dying breath,
He did conjure her to receive my vows,
And give her country peace.

Enter OTHMAN.

Most welcome, Othman;
Behold this gallant stranger. He hath done
The state good service. Let some high reward
Await him, such as may o'erpay his zeal.
Conduct him to the queen, for he hath news
Worthy her ear, from her departed son;
Such as may win her love—Come, Aladin,
The banquet waits our presence;—festal joy
Laughs in the mantling goblet; and the night,
Illumin'd by the taper's dazzling beam,
Rivals departed day.

[Exeunt BARBAROSSA and ALADIN.]

Selim. What anxious thought
Rolls in thine eye, and heaves thy lab'ring breast?
Why join'st thou not the loud excess of joy,
That riots through the palace?

Oth. Dar'st thou tell me,
On what dark errand thou art here?

Selim. I dare.
Dost thou not perceive the savage lines of blood
Deform my visage? Read'st not in mine eye
Remorseless fury? I am Selim's murderer.

Oth. Selim's murderer!
Selim. Start not from me.
My dagger thirsts not but for regal blood—
Why this amazement?

Oth. Amazement! No—'tis well; 'tis as it should be—

He was indeed a foe to Barbarossa.
Selim. And therefore to Algiers. Was it not so?

Why dost thou pause? What passion shakes thy frame?

Oth. Fate, do thy worst! I can no more dissemble;

Can I unmov'd behold the murd'ring ruffian, Smear'd with my prince's blood? Go, tell the tyrant,

Othman defies his power; that, tired with life,
He dares his bloody hand, and pleads to die.

Selim. What, didst thou love this Selim?
Oth. All men lov'd him.

He was of such unmix'd and blameless quality,
That envy, at his praise, stood mute, nor dar'd
To sully his fair name! Remorseless tyrant!

Selim. I do commend thy faith. And since thou lov'st him,

I'll whisper to thee, that with honest guile
I have deceiv'd this tyrant, Barbarossa:
Selim is yet alive.

Oth. Alive!
Selim. Nay, more—
Selim is in Algiers.

Oth. Impossible!
Selim. Nay, if thou doubt'st, I'll bring him hither, straight.

Oth. Not for an empire!
VOL. I. . 2 C

Thou might'st as well bring the devoted lamb
Into the tiger's den.

Selim. But I'll bring him
Hid in such deep disguise, as shall deride
Suspicion, though she wear the lynx's eyes.
Not even thyself couldst know him.

Oth. Yes, sure: too sure, to hazard such an awful trial.

Selim. Yet seven revolving years, worn out
In tedious exile, may have wrought such change
Of voice and feature, in the state of youth,
As might elude thine eye.

Oth. No time can blot
The mem'ry of his sweet majestic mien,
The lustre of his eye! besides, he wears
A mark indelible, a beauteous scar,
Made on his forehead by a furious pard,
Which, rushing on his mother, Selim slew.

Selim. A scar?
Oth. Ay, on his forehead.
Selim. What, like this! [Lifting his turban.]
Oth. Whom do I see?—am I awake?—my prince! [Kneels.]

My honour'd, honour'd king!
Selim. Rise faithful Othman:

Thus let me thank thy truth! [Embraces him.]
Oth. O happy hour!

Selim. Why dost thou tremble thus? Why grasp my hand?
And why that ardent gaze? Thou can'st not doubt me!

Oth. Ah, no! I see thy sire in every line.—
How did my prince escape the murd'rer's hand?

Selim. I wrench'd the dagger from him; and gave back

That death he meant to bring. The ruffian wore
The tyrant's signet.—Take this ring, he cried,
The sole return my dying hand can make thee
For its accurs'd attempt: this pledge restor'd,
Will prove thee slain. Safe may'st thou see Algiers,

Unknown to all.—This said, th' assassin died.
Oth. But how to gain admittance, thus unknown?

Selim. Disguis'd as Selim's murderer I come:
Th' accomplice of the deed: the ring restor'd,
Gain'd credence to my words.

Oth. Yet, ere thou cam'st, thy death was rumour'd here.

Selim. I spread the flatt'ring tale, and sent it hither;

That babbling rumour, like a lying dream,
Might make belief more easy. Tell me, Othman,
And yet I tremble to approach the theme,—
How fares my mother? does she still retain
Her native greatness?

Oth. Still:—In vain the tyrant Tempts her to marriage, though with impious threats

Of death or violation.
Selim. May kind Heaven

Strengthen her virtue, and by me reward it!
When shall I see her, Othman?

Oth. Yet, my prince,
I tremble for thy presence.

Selim. Let not fear
Sully thy virtue: 'tis the lot of guilt [fear?]
To tremble. What hath innocence to do with

Oth. Still my heart
Forbodes some dire event.—O quit these walls!

Selim. Not till a deed be done, which every ty-
Shall tremble when he hears. [rant]

Oth. What means my prince? [blood,

Selim. To take just vengeance for a father's
A mother's sufferings, and a people's groans.

Oth. Alas, my prince! thy single arm is weak
To combat multitudes.

Selim. Therefore I come,
Clad in this murder's guise.—Ere morning shines,
This, Othman!—this—shall drink the tyrant's blood. [Shows a dagger.

Oth. Heaven shield thy life.—Let caution rule
Thy zeal!

Selim. Nay, think not that I come
Blindly impell'd by fury or despair:
For I have seen our friends, and parted now
From Sadi and Almanzor.

Oth. Say—what hope?

My soul is all attention—

Selim. Mark me, then;
A chosen band of citizens this night
Will storm the palace: while the glutt'd troops
Lie drench'd in surfeit, the confederate city, Bold through despair, have sworn to break their chain

By one wide slaughter. I, mean time, have gain'd
The palace, and will wait th' appointed hour,
To guard Zaphira from the tyrant's rage,
Amid the deathful uproar.

Oth. Heaven protect thee—
'Tis dreadful—what's the hour?

Selim. I left our friends
In secret council. Ere the dead of night,
Brave Sadi will report their last resolves.—
Now lead me to the queen.—

Oth. Brave prince, beware!
Her joy's or fear's excess, would sure betray thee.
Thou shalt not see her, till the tyrant perish!

Selim. I must.—I feel some secret impulse urge
me.

Who knows that 'tis not the last parting interview
We ever shall obtain?

Oth. Then, on thy life,
Do not reveal thyself.—Assume the name
Of Selim's friend; sent to confirm her virtue,
And warn her that he lives.

Selim. It shall be so: I yield me to thy will.

Oth. Thou greatly daring youth! May angels watch,

And guard thy upright purpose! That Algiers
May reap the blessings of a virtuous reign,
And all thy godlike father shine in thee!

Selim. Oh, thou hast rous'd a thought, on which revenge [here,—
Mounts with redoubled fire!—Yes, here, even Beneath this very roof, my honour'd father
Shed round his blessings, till accursed treach'ry
Stole on his peaceful hour! O, blessed shade!

[Kneels.
If yet thou hover'st o'er thy once lov'd clime,
Now aid me to redress thy bleeding wrongs!
Infuse thy mighty spirit in my breast,
Thy firm and dauntless fortitude, unaw'd
By peril, pain, or death! that, undismay'd,
I may pursue the just intent, and dare
Or bravely to revenge, or bravely die. [Exeunt.

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The Palace.

Enter IRENE.

Irene. Can air-drawn visions mock the waking eye?

It was his image!—

This way, sure, he mov'd.

But, oh, how chang'd! He wears no gentle smiles,
But terror in his frown. He comes.—'Tis he—
For Othman points him thither, and departs.

Disguis'd, he seeks the queen: secure, perhaps,
And heedless of the ruin that surrounds him,
O, generous Selim! can I see thee thus
And not forewarn such virtue of its fate!
Forbid it, gratitude!

Enter SELIM.

Selim. Be still, ye sighs!
Ye struggling tears of filial love, be still.
Down, down, fond heart!

Irene. Why, stranger, dost thou wander here?

Selim. Oh, ruin! [Shunning her.

Irene. Bless'd is Irene! Bless'd, if Selim lives!

Selim. Am I betray'd!

Irene. Betray'd to whom? To her

Whose grateful heart would rush on death to save
thee!

Selim. It was my hope
That time had veil'd all semblance of my youth,
And thrown the mask of manhood o'er my visage.
Am I then known?

Irene. To none, but love and me—

To me, who late beheld thee at Oran:

Who saw thee here, beset with unseen peril,
And flew to save the guardian of my honour.

Selim. 'Thou sum of every worth! Thou heaven of sweetness!

How could I pour forth all my soul before thee,
In vows of endless truth! It must not be!
This is my destin'd goal! The mansion drear,
Where grief and anguish dwell! where bitter tears,
And sighs, and lamentations, choke the voice,
And quench the flame of love!

Irene. Yet, virtuous prince,
Though love be silent, gratitude may speak.

Hear, then, her voice, which warns thee from these walls.

Mine be the grateful task, to tell the queen
Her Selim lives. Ruin and death enclose thee.
O, speed thee hence, while yet destruction sleeps!

Selim. Would it were possible!

Irene. What can prevent it?

Selim. Justice! Fate, and justice

A murder'd father's wrongs?

Irene. Justice, said'st thou?

That word hath struck me, like a peal of thunder!
Thine eye, which wont to melt with gentle love,
Now glares with terror! Thy approach by night—
Thy dark disguise, thy looks and fierce demeanour,
Yes, all conspire to tell me, I am lost!

Ah! prince, take heed! I have a father too!

Think, Selim, what Irene must endure,

Should she be guilty of a father's blood.

Selim. Come on, then. Lead me to him. Glut thine eye

With Selim's blood—

Irene. Was e'er distress like mine!

O, Selim, can I see my father perish!

Quit, O quit these walls!

Heaven will ordain some gentler, happier means,

To heal thy woes! Thy dark attempt is big

With horror and destruction! Generous prince!

Resign thy dreadful purpose and depart!

Selim. May not I see Zaphira, ere I go?

Thy gentle pity will not, sure, deny us

The mournful pleasure of a parting tear?

Irene. Go, then, and give her peace. But fly these walls

As soon as morning shincs. Else, though despair Drive me to madness; yet—to save a father! O, Selim! spare my tongue the horrid sentence! Fly! ere destruction seize thee. [Exit IRENE.]

Selim. Death and ruin! Must I then fly? what! coward like, betray My father, mother, friends! Vain terrors, hence! Danger looks big to fear's deluded eye: But courage, on the heights and steep of fate, Dares snatch her glorious purpose from the edge Of peril; and, while sick'ning caution shrinks, Or, self-betray'd, falls headlong down the steep, Calm resolution, unappall'd, can walk The giddy brink, secure. Now to the queen. How shall I dare to meet her, thus unknown! How stifle the warm transports of my heart, That pants at her approach! Who waits Zaphira?

Enter a female SLAVE.

Slave. Whence this intrusion, stranger, at an hour Destin'd to rest?

Selim. I come to seek the queen, On matter of such import, as may claim Her speedy audience.

Slave. Thy request is vain. Even now the queen hath heard the mournful tale Of her son's death, and drown'd in grief she lies. Thou canst not see her.

Selim. Tell the queen, I come On message from her dear, departed son; And bring his last request.

Slave. I'll haste to tell her. [Exit.]
Selim. O, ill-dissembling heart! my every limb Trembles with grateful terror! 'Would to Heaven I had not come! Some look, or starting tear, Will sure betray me. Honest guile assist My falt'ring tongue!

Enter ZAPHIRA.

Zaph. Where is this pious stranger? Say, generous youth, whose pity leads thee thus To seek the weeping mansions of distress! Didst thou behold in death my hapless son? Didst thou receive my Selim's parting breath? Did he remember me?

Selim. Most honour'd queen! Thy son,—forgive these gushing tears that flow To see distress like thine!

Zaph. I thank thy pity! 'Tis generous thus to feel for others' wo!—What of my son? Say, didst thou see him die?

Selim. By Barbarossa's dread command I come, To tell thee that these eyes alone beheld Thy son expire.

Zaph. Relentless fate!—that I should be denied The mournful privilege to see him die! To clasp him in the agony of death, And catch his parting soul? Oh, tell me all, All that he said and look'd? Deep in my heart That I may treasure every parting word, Each dying whisper of my dear, dear son!

Selim. Let not my words offend—what if he said,

Go, tell my hapless mother, that her tears Have stream'd too long: then bid her weep no more:

Bid her forget the husband and the son, In Barbarossa's arms!

Zaph. O, basely false! Thou art some creeping slave to Barbarossa, Sent to surprise my unsuspecting heart! Vile slave begone!—My son betray me thus! Could he have e'er conceiv'd so base a purpose, My griefs for him should end in great disdain!—But he was brave, and scorn'd a thought so vile! Wretched Zaphira! How art thou become The sport of slaves!—

Selim. Yet hope for peace, unhappy queen! Thy woes May yet have end.

Zaph. Why weep'st thou, crocodile? Thy treacherous tears are vain.

Selim. My tears are honest. I am not what thou think'st.

Zaph. What art thou then?

Selim. Oh, my full heart!—I am—thy friend, and Selim's.

I came not to insult, but heal thy woes— Now check thy heart's wild tumult, while I tell thee—

Perhaps—thy son yet lives.

Zaph. Lives! O, gracious Heaven! Do I not dream! say, stranger,—didst thou tell me, Perhaps my Selim lives?—What do I ask? Wild, wild, and fruitless hope!—What mortal power

Can e'er re-animate his mangled corpse, Shoot life into the cold and silent tomb, Or bid the ruthless grave give up its dead?

Selim. O, powerful nature! thou wilt sure betray me! [Aside.]

Thy Selim lives: for since his rumour'd death, I saw him at Oran.

Zaph. O, generous youth, who art thou?—From what clime

Comes such exalted virtue, as dares give A pause to grief like mine?

Selim. A friendless youth, self-banish'd with thy son;

Long his companion in distress and danger: One who rever'd thy worth in prosperous days, And more reveres thy virtue in distress.

Zaph. O, gentle stranger!—Mock not my woes, But tell me truly,—does my Selim live?

Selim. He does, by Heaven!

Zaph. O generous Heaven! thou at length o'erpay'st

My bitterest pangs, if my dear Selim lives! And does he still remember His father's wrongs, and mine.

Selim. He bade me tell thee, That in his heart indelibly are stamp'd His father's wrongs, and thine: that he but waits

Till awful justice may unsheath her sword, And lust and murder tremble at her frown!

That till the arrival of that happy hour, Deep in his soul the hidden fire shall glow,

And his breast labour with the great revenge!

Zaph. Eternal blessings crown my virtuous son! Selim. Much honour'd queen, farewell.

Zaph. Not yet,—not yet;—indulge a mother's love!

In thee, the kind companion of his griefs, Methinks I see my Selim stand before me. Depart not yet. A thousand fond prayers Crowd on my mind. Wishes, and prayers, and tears,

Are all I have to give. O, bear him these! Selim. Take comfort, then; for know, thy son o'erjoy'd

To rescue thee, would bleed at every vein!—
Bid her, he said, yet hope we may be bless'd!
Bid her remember that the ways of Heaven,
Though dark, are just: that oft some guardian
power

Attends, unseen, to save the innocent!
But if high Heaven decrees our fall!—Oh bid her Firmly to wait the stroke, prepar'd alike
To live or die! and then he wept, as I do.

Zaph. O, righteous Heaven!
Protect his tender years!
Be thou his guide through dangers and distress!
Soften the rigours of his cruel exile,
And lead him to his throne! [Exit.]

Selim. Now, swelling heart,
Indulge the luxury of grief! flow, tears!
And rain down transport in the shape of sorrow!
Yes, I have sooth'd her woes; have found her noble:

And, to have given this respite to her pangs,
O'erpays all pain and peril!—Powerful virtue!
How infinite thy joys, when even thy griefs
Are pleasing!—Thou, superior to the frowns
Of fate, canst pour thy sunshine o'er the soul,
And brighten wo to rapture!

Enter OTHMAN and SADI.

Honour'd friends!
How goes the night?

Sadi. 'Tis well nigh midnight.

Oth. What! in tears, my prince?

Selim. But tears of joy: for I have seen Zaphira,

And pour'd the balm of peace into her breast:
Think not these tears unnerve me, valiant friends;
They have but harmoniz'd my soul; and wak'd
All that is man within me, to disdain
Peril, or death—What tidings from the city?

Sadi. All, all, is ready. Our confed'rate friends
Burn with impatience, till the hour arrive.

Selim. What is the signal of the appointed hour?

Sadi. The midnight watch gives signal of our meeting:

And when the second watch of night is rung,
The work of death begins.

Selim. Speed, speed, ye minutes!

Now let the rising whirlwind shake Algiers,
And justice guide the storm! Scarce two hours
hence—

Sadi. Scarce more than one.

Selim. Oh, as ye love my life,

Let your zeal hasten on the great event:
The tyrant's daughter found, and knew me here,
And half suspects the cause.

Oth. Too daring prince,
Retire with us! her fears will sure betray thee!

Selim. What! leave my helpless mother here a prey

To cruelty and lust—I'll perish first:
This very night the tyrant threatens violence:
I'll watch his steps: I'll haunt him through the palace:

And, should he meditate a deed so vile,
I'll hover o'er him, like an unseen pestilence,
And blast him in his guilt!

Sadi. Intrepid prince!

Worthy of empire!—Yet accept my life,
My worthless life: do thou retire with Othman;
I will protect Zaphira.

Selim. Think'st thou, Sadi,
That, when the trying hour of peril comes,
Selim will shrink into a common man!

Worthless were he to rule, who dares not claim
Pre-eminence in danger. Urge no more:
Here shall my station be; and, if I fall,
O, friends, let me have vengeance!—Tell me now,
Where is the tyrant?

Oth. Revelling at the banquet.

Selim. 'Tis good. Now tell me how our powers are destin'd?

Sadi. Near every port, a secret band is posted—
By these, the watchful sentinels must perish:
The rest is easy; for the glutted troops
Lie drown'd in sleep.

Almanzor, with his friends, will circle round
The avenues of the palace. Othman and I Will join our brave confederates (all sworn To conquer or to die,) and burst the gates
Of this foul den. Then, tremble, Barbarossa!

Selim. Oh, how the approach of this great hour Fires all my soul! but, valiant friends, I charge
you,

Reserve the murderer to my just revenge;
My poignard claims his blood.

Oth. Forgive me, prince! [Irene—]

Forgive my doubts!—Think—should the fair

Selim. Thy doubts are vain. I would not spare the tyrant,

Though the sweet maid lay weeping at my feet;
Nay, should he fall by any hand but mine,
By Heaven I'd think my honour'd father's blood
Scarce half reveng'd! My love, indeed, is strong!
But love shall yield to justice!

Sadi. Gallant prince,
Bravely resolv'd!

Selim. But is the city quiet?

Sadi. All, all, is hush'd. Throughout the empty streets,

Nor voice nor sound; as if th' inhabitants,
Like the presaging herds, that seek the covert
Ere the loud thunder rolls, had inly felt
And shunn'd th' impending uproar.

Oth. There is a solemn horror in the night, too,
That pleases me; a general pause through nature:
The winds are hush'd—

Sadi. And as I pass'd the beech,
The lazy billow scarce could lash the shore:
No star peeps through the firmament of heaven—

Selim. And lo! where eastward, o'er the sullen wave,

The waning moon, depriv'd of half her orb,
Rises in blood: her beam, well nigh extinct,
Faintly contends with darkness— [Bell tolls
Hark—what meant
That tolling bell?

Oth. It sounds the midnight watch.

Sadi. This was the signal—

Come, Othman, we are call'd: the passing minutes
Chide our delay: brave Othman, let us hence.

Selim. One last embrace!—nor doubt, but crown'd with glory

We soon shall meet again. But oh! remember—
Amid the tumult's rage, remember mercy!
Stain not a righteous cause with guiltless blood!
Warn our brave friends, that we unsheath the
sword,

Not to destroy, but save! nor let blind zeal,
Or wanton cruelty, e'er turn its edge
On age or innocence! or bid us strike
Where the most pitying angel in the skies,
That now looks on us from his bless'd abode,
Would wish that we should spare.

Oth. So may we prosper,
As mercy shall direct us!

Selim. Farewell, friends!

Sadi. Intrepid prince, farewell!

[Exeunt ORTHMAN and SADI.]

Selim. Now sleep and silence
Brood o'er the city.—The devoted sentinel
Now takes his lonely stand, and idly dreams
Of that to-morrow he shall never see.
In this dread interval, O busy thought,
From outward things descend into thyself!
Search deep my heart! bring with thee awful conscience,

And firm resolve! that in th' approaching hour
Of blood and horror, I may stand unmov'd;
Nor fear to strike where justice calls, nor dare
To strike where she forbids! [Exit.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—An Apartment in the Palace.

Enter IRENE and ALADIN.

Irene. But didst thou tell him, Aladin, my fears Brook no delay?

Aladin. I did.

Irene. Why comes he not?

Oh, what a dreadful dream!—'Twas surely more
Than troubled fancy: never was my soul Shook with such hideous phantoms!—Still he lingers!

Return, return; and tell him, that his daughter
Dies, till she warn him of his threat'ning ruin.

Aladin. Behold, he comes. [Exit ALADIN.]

Enter BARBAROSSA and Guards.

Bar. Thou bane of all my joys!
Some gloomy planet surely rul'd thy birth!
Even now thy ill tim'd fear suspends the banquet,
And damps the festal hour.

Irene. Forgive my fear!

Bar. What fear, what phantom hath possess'd thy brain?

Irene. Oh, guard thee from the terrors of this
night;

For terrors lurk unseen.

Bar. What terror? speak.

Say, what thou dread'st, and why! I have a soul
To meet the blackest dangers undismay'd.

Irene. Let not my father check with stern rebuke,

The warning voice of nature. For even now,
Retir'd to rest, soon as I clos'd mine eyes,
A horrid vision rose—Methought I saw
Young Selim rising from the silent tomb:
Mangled and bloody was his corpse: his hair
Clotted with gore; his glaring eyes on fire!
Dreadful he shook a dagger in his hand.
By some mysterious power he rose in air.
When, lo! at his command, this yawning roof
Was cleft in twain, and gave the phantom entrance!

Swift he descended with terrific brow,
Rush'd on my guardless father at the banquet,
And plung'd his furious dagger in thy breast!

Bar. Wouldst thou appal me by a brainsick vision?
Get thee to rest.

Irene. Yet hear me, dearest father!

Bar. Provoke me not.—

Irene. What shall I say, to move him?
Merciful Heaven, instruct me what to do!

Enter ALADIN.

Bar. What mean thy looks?—Why dost thou gaze so wildly?

Aladin. I hastened to inform thee, that even now
Rounding the watch, I met the brave Abdallah,
Breathless with tidings of a rumour dark,
That young Selim is yet alive—

Bar. May plagues consume the tongue
That broach'd the falsehood!—'Tis not possible—
What did he tell thee further?

Aladin. More he said not;
Save only, that the spreading rumour wak'd
A spirit of revolt.

Irene. O, gracious father!

Bar. The rumour's false—And yet, your coward fears

Infect me!—What!—shall I be terrified
By midnight visions?—I'll not believe it.

Aladin. But this gathering rumour—
Think but on that my lord.

Bar. Infernal darkness

Swallow the slave that rais'd it!—Hark thee,
Aladin,

Find out this stranger, Achmet; and forthwith
Let him be brought before me.

[Exeunt two guards.]

Irene. O my father!

I do conjure thee, as thou lov'st thy life,
Retire, and trust thee to thy faithful guards—
See not this Achmet.

Bar. Not see him?

If he prove false,—if hated Selim live,
I'll heap such vengeance on him—

Irene. Mercy! mercy!

Bar. Mercy to whom?

Irene. To me—and to thyself:

To him—to all.—Thou think'st I rave; yet true
My visions are, as ever prophet utter'd,
When Heaven inspires his tongue!

Bar. Ne'er did the moon-struck madman rave with dreams

More wild than thine!—Get thee to rest;
Call Achmet hither.

Irene. Thus prostrate on my knees:—O see him not,

Selim is dead!—indeed the rumour's false,
There is no danger near;—or, if there be,
Achmet is innocent!

Bar. Off, frantic wretch!

Hence—to thy chamber, on thy duty hence?

Irene. Cruel fate!

What have I done?—Heaven shield my dearest
father!

Heaven shield the innocent—undone Irene!
Whatever the event, thy doom is misery.

[Exit IRENE.]

Bar. Her words are wrapt in darkness.—Aladin,
Forthwith send Achmet hither.—Then, with speed,
Double the sentinels. [Exit ALADIN.]

Infernal guilt!
How dost thou rise in every hideous shape
Of rage and doubt, suspicion and despair,
To rend my soul!

Enter SELIM and two Guards.

Come hither, slave!

Hear me, and tremble! Art thou what thou seem'st?

Selim. Ha!—

Bar. Dost thou pause?—By hell, the slave's confounded!

Selim. That Barbarossa should suspect my truth!

Bar. Take heed! for by the hovering powers of vengeance,

If I do find thee treach'rous, I'll doom thee
To death and torment, such as human thought Ne'er yet conceiv'd! Thou com'st beneath the guise

Of Selim's murderer.—Now tell me:—is not
That Selim yet alive?

Selim. Selim alive!

Bar. Perdition on thee? dost thou echo me?
Answer me quick, or die! [Draws his dagger.]

Selim. Yes, freely strike—
Already hast thou given the fatal wound,
And pierc'd my heart with thy unkind suspicion;
Oh, could my dagger find a tongue to tell
How deep it drank his blood!—but since thy doubt
'Thus wrongs my zeal,—behold my breast—strike
here—

For hold is innocence.

Bar. I scorn the task, [Puts up his dagger.]
Time shall decide thy doom:—Guards, mark me
well.

See that ye watch the motions of this slave:
And if he meditates 't escape your eye,
Let your good sabres cleave him to the chine.

Selim. I yield me to thy will, and when thou know'st

That Selim lives, or see'st his hated face,
Then wreak thy vengeance on me.

Bar. Bear him hence.—

Yet, on your lives, await me within call.
I will have deeper inquisition made.

[Exeunt SELIM and Guards.]

Call Zaphira. [Exit a slave.]
If Selim lives—then, what is Barbarossa?
My throne's a bubble, that but floats in air,
Till marriage rites declare Zaphira mine.
I will not brook delay. By love and vengeance,
This hour decides her fate:

Enter ZAPHIRA.

Well, haughty fair!
Hath reason yet subdu'd thee?—Wilt thou hear
The voice of love?

Zaph. Why dost thou vainly urge me?
Thou know'st my fix'd resolve.

Bar. Can aught but frenzy
Rush on perdition?

Zaph. Therefore shall no power
E'er make me thine!

Bar. Nay, sport not with my rage
Know, that thy final hour of choice is come!

Zaph. I have no choice. Think'st thou I e'er will wed
The murderer of my lord?

Bar. Take heed, rash queen!
Tell me thy last resolve.

Zaph. Then hear me, Heaven,
Hear, all ye powers, that watch o'er innocence!
Angels of light! And thou, dear honour'd shade
Of my departed lord! attend, while here
I ratify with vows my last resolve:
If e'er I wed this tyrant murderer,
If I pollute me with this horrid union,
May ye, the ministers of Heaven, depart,
Nor shed your influence on the guilty scene!
May horror blacken all our days and nights!
May discord light the nuptial torch! and, rising
From hell, may swarming fiends in triumph howl
Around th' accursed bed!

Bar. Begone, remorse!
Guards, do your office: drag her to the altar—
Heed not her tears or cries. What! dare ye doubt?

[Guards go to seize ZAPHIRA.]

Zaph. O spare me! Heaven protect me! O
my son,
Wert thou but here, to save thy helpless mother:
What shall I do? Undone, undone, Zaphira!

Enter SELIM.

Selim. Who call'd on Achmet?—Did not Barbarossa
Require me here?

Bar. Officious slave, retire!
I call'd thee not.

Zaph. O kind and gen'rous stranger, lend thy aid!

O rescue me from these impending horrors!
Heaven will reward thy pity!

Selim. Pity her woes, O mighty Barbarossa!

Bar. Rouse not my vengeance, slave!

Selim. O hear me, hear me! [Kneels.]

Bar. Curse on thy forward zeal!

Selim. Yet, yet, have mercy.

[Lays hold of BARBAROSSA'S garment.]
Bar. Presuming slave, begone!

[Strikes SELIM.]

Selim. Nay then,——die, tyrant!

[Rises and aims to stab BARBAROSSA who wrests his dagger from him.]

Bar. Ah, traitor! have I caught thee?
Perfidious wretch, who art thou?—Bring the rack
Let that extort the secrets of his heart.

Selim. Thy impious threats are lost! I know, that death

And torments are my doom. Yet, ere I die,
I'll strike thy soul with horror. Off, vile habit!
If thou dar'st,

Now view me!—Hear me, tyrant!—while, with voice

More terrible than thunder, I proclaim,
That he, who aim'd the dagger at thy heart,
Is, Selim!

Zaph. O Heaven! my son! my son!

Selim. Unhappy mother!

[Runs to embrace her.]

Bar. Tear them asunder.

[Guards separate them.]

Zaph. Barb'rous, barb'rous ruffians!

[They offer to seize him.]

Selim. Off, ye vile slaves! I am your king!—
Retire,

And tremble at my frowns! That is the traitor—
That is the murd'rer—tyrant ravisher! Seize him,
And do your country right!

Bar. Ah, coward dogs!
Start ye at words?—or seize him, or, by he'll,

This dagger sends you all— [They seize him.]

Selim. Dost thou revive, unhappy queen!

Now arm my soul with patience!

Zaph. My dear son!

Do I then live, once more to see my Selim!

But Oh—to see thee thus!—

Selim. Canst thou behold
Her speechless agonies, and not relent?

Zaph. O mercy, mercy!

Selim. Lo, Barbarossa! thou at length hast conquer'd!

Behold a hapless prince, o'erwhelm'd with woes,
[Kneels.]

Prostrate before thy feet!—not for myself!

I plead.—Yes, plunge the dagger in my breast!

Tear, tear me piecemeal! But, O, spare Zaphira!

Yet—yet relent! force not her matron honour!

Reproach not Heaven.

Bar. Have I then bent thy pride?

Why, this is conquest even beyond my hope!—
Lie there, thou slave! lie, till Zaphira's cries
Arouse thee from thy posture!

Selim. Dost thou insult my griefs?—unmanly wretch!

Curse on the fear, that could betray my limbs,
[Rising.]

My coward limbs, to this dishonest posture;
Long have I scorn'd, I now defy, thy power!

Bar. I'll put thy boasted virtue to the trial.—
Slaves, bear him to the rack.

Zaph. O spare my son!
Sure filial virtue never was a crime!
Save but my son!—I yield me to thy wish!
What do I say?—The marriage vow—O horror!
This hour shall make me thine!—

Selim. What! doom thyself
The guilty partner of a murderer's bed,
Whose hands yet reek with thy dear husband's
blood!

To be the mother of destructive tyrants—
The curses of mankind! By Heaven, I swear,
The guilty hour, that gives thee to the arms
Of that detested murderer, shall end
This hated life!

Bar. Or yield thee, or he dies.

Zaph. The conflict's past. I will resume my greatness;

We'll bravely die, as we have liv'd,—with honour!
[Embracing.]

Selim. Now, tyrant, pour thy fiercest fury on us:

Now see, despairing guilt! that virtue still
Shall conquer, though in ruin.

Bar. Drag them hence:
Her to the altar:—Selim to his fate.

Zaph. O Selim! O my son!—Thy doom is death!
'Would it were mine!

Selim. 'Would I could give it thee!
Is there no means to save her? Lend, ye guards,
Ye ministers of death, in pity lend
Your swords, or some kind weapon of destruction!
Sure the most mournful boon, that ever son

Ask'd for the best of mothers!

One last embrace!
Farewell! Farewell, for ever!

Zaph. One moment yet! Pity a mother's pangs!

O Selim!
Selim. O my mother!

[Exeunt SELIM, ZAPHIRA, and Guards.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—The Palace.

Enter BARBAROSSA, ALADIN, and Guards.

Bar. Is the watch doubled? Are the gates secur'd
Against surprise?

Aladin. They are, and mock th' attempt
Of force or treachery.

Bar. This whisper'd rumour
Of dark conspiracy,
Seems but a false alarm. Our spies, sent out,
Affirm, that sleep
Has wrapp'd the city.

Aladin. But while Selim lives,
Destruction lurks within the palace walls.

Bar. Right, Aladin. His hour of fate approaches.

How goes the night?

Aladin. The second watch is near.

Bar. 'Tis well. Whene'er it rings, the traitor
dies.

Yet first the rack shall rend
Each secret from his heart.
Haste, seek out Othman:
Go, tell him, that destruction and the sword
Hang o'er young Selim's head, if swift compliance
Plead not his pardon. [Exit ALADIN.]

Enter IRENE.

Irene. O night of horror!—Hear me, honour'd
father!

If e'er Irene's peace was dear to thee,
Now hear me!

Bar. Impious! dar'st thou disobey?
Did not my sacred will ordain thee hence?

Get thee to rest; for death is stirring here.

Irene. O fatal words! By every sacred tie,
Recall the dire decree.

Bar. What wouldst thou say?
Whom plead for?

Irene. For a brave unhappy prince,
Sentenc'd to die.

Bar. And justly! But this hour
The traitor half fulfill'd thy dream, and aim'd
His dagger at my heart.

Irene. Might pity plead!

Bar. What! plead for treachery?

Irene. Yet pity might bestow a milder name.
Wouldst thou not love the child, whose fortitude
Should hazard life for thee?

Bar. Damn'd was his purpose; and accurs'd art thou,

Whose perfidy would save the dark assassin,
Who sought thy father's life! Hence, from my sight.

Irene. Oh, never, till thy mercy spare my Selim!

Bar. Thy Selim? Thine?

Irene. Thou know'st—by gratitude
He's mine. Had not his gen'rous hand redeem'd
me,

What then had been Irene's? Oh!

Who sav'd me from dishonour?

Bar. By the powers

Of great revenge, thy fond entreaties seal
His instant death.—In him, I'll punish thee.
Away!

Irene. Yet hear me! Ere my tortur'd soul
Rush on some deed of horror!

Bar. Convey the frantic idiot from my presence:
See that she do no violence on herself.

Irene. O Selim!—generous youth!—how have my fears

Betray'd thee to destruction!

Inhuman father! Generous, injur'd prince!

Methinks, I see thee stretch'd upon the rack,

Hear thy expiring groans. O horror! horror!

What shall I do to save him? Vain, alas!

Vain are my tears and prayers. At least, I'll die.

Death shall unite us yet! [Exit.]

Bar. O torment! torment!

Even in the midst of power! the vilest slave
More happy far than I! The very child,
Whom my love cherish'd from her infant years,
Conspires to blast my peace!

Enter ALADIN.

Now, Aladin,
Hast thou seen Othman?

He will not, sure, conspire against my peace?

Aladin. He's fled, my lord. I dread some lurking ruin.

The sentinel on watch says, that he pass'd
The gate, since midnight, with an unknown friend:
And, as they pass'd, Othman in whisper said,
Now farewell, bloody tyrant!

Bar. Slave, thou liest.

He did not dare to say it; or, if he did,
Why dost thou wound my ear
By the foul repetition?

What 's to be done? Some mischief lurks unseen.

Aladin. Prevent it then—

Bar. By Selim's instant death—

Aladin. Ay, doubtless.

Bar. Is the rack prepar'd?

Aladin. 'Tis ready.

Along the ground he lies, o'erwhelm'd with chains.
The ministers of death stand round; and wait
Thy last command.

Bar. Once more I'll try to bend
His stubborn soul. Conduct me forthwith to him;
And if he now refuse my proffer'd kindness,
Destruction swallows him! [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Prison in the Palace.

SELIM in chains, Executioners, &c. and the rack.

Selim. I pray you, friends,
When I am dead, let not indignity
Insult these poor remains; see them interr'd
Close to my father's tomb! I ask no more.

Off. They shall.

Enter BARBAROSSA.

Bar. So—raise him from the ground.
[They raise him.]

Perfidious boy! behold the just rewards
Of guilt and treachery! Didst thou not give Thy forfeit life, whene'er I should behold
Selim's detested face?

Selim. Then take it, tyrant.

Bar. Didst thou not aim a dagger at my heart?

Selim. I did.

Bar. Yet heaven defeated thy intent;
And sav'd me from the dagger.

Selim. 'Tis not ours

To question Heaven. Th' intent and not the deed
Is in our power; and therefore who dares greatly,

Does greatly.

Bar. Yet bethink thee stubborn boy,
What horrors now surround thee—

Selim. Think'st thou, tyrant,
I came so ill prepar'd? Thy rage is weak,
Thy torments powerless o'er the steady mind:
He, who can bravely dare, can bravely suffer.

Bar. Yet lo, I come, by pity led, to spare thee.
Relent, and save Zaphira!—For the bell
Even now expects the sentinel, to toll
The signal of thy death.

Selim. Let guilt like thine

Tremble at death: I scorn its darkest frown.
Hence, tyrant, nor profane my dying hour!

Bar. Then take thy wish. [Bell tolls.]
There goes the fatal knell.

Thy fate is seal'd. Not all thy mother's tears,
Nor prayers, nor eloquence of grief, shall save thee
From instant death. [Exit.]

Selim. Come on, then. [They bind him.]
Begin the work of death—what! bound with cords,
Like a vile criminal!—O valiant friends,
When will ye give me vengeance!

Enter IRENE.

Irene. Stop, O, stop!
Hold your accus'd hands!—On me, on me,

Pour all your torments.—How shall I approach
thee!

Selim. These are thy father's gifts!—Yet thou art guiltless:

Then let me take thee to my heart, thou best,
Most amiable of women!

Irene. Rather curse me,
As the betrayer of thy virtue!

Selim. Ah!

Irene. 'Twas I,—my fears, my frantic fears betray'd thee!

Thus, falling at thy feet, may I but hope
For pardon ere I die!

Selim. Hence to thy father!

Irene. Never, O never!—crawling in the dust,
I'll clasp thy feet, and bathe them with my tears!
Tread me to earth! I never will complain;
But my last breath shall bless thee!

Selim. Lov'd Irene!

What hath my fury done?

Irene. Canst thou, then,

Forgive and pity me?

Selim. I do, I do.

[They embrace.]

Off. No more.—Prepare the rack.

Irene. Here will I cling. No power on earth shall part us,
Till I have sav'd my Selim!

[Shout; clashing of swords.]

Aladin. [Without.] Arm, arm!—Treach'ry and murder!

Selim. Off, slaves!—Or I will turn my chains
And dash you piece-meal!

Enter ALADIN.

Aladin. Where is the king?

The foe pours in. The palace gates are burst:
The sentinels are murder'd! Save the king;
They seek him through the palace!

Off. Death and ruin!

Follow me, slaves, and save him.

[Exeunt ALADIN, OFFICER, and Guards.]

Selim. Now, bloody tyrant! Now, thy hour is come!

Vengeance at length hath pierc'd these guilty walls,
And walks her deadly round!

Irene. Whom dost thou mean? my father!

[Clash of swords.]

Hark! 'twas the clash of swords! Heaven save my father!

O cruel, cruel Selim!

[Exit.]

Selim. Curse on this servile chain, that binds me fast

In powerless ignominy; while my sword
Should hunt its prey, and cleave the tyrant down!
Oth. [Without.] Where is the prince?

Selim. Here, Othman bound to earth!

Set me but free!—O cursed, cursed chain!

Enter OTHMAN and Party, who free SELIM.

Oth. O my brave prince!—Heaven favours our design. [Embraces him.]

Take that: I need not bid thee use it nobly.

[Giving him a sword.]

Selim. Now, Barbarossa, let my arm meet thine,
'Tis all I ask of Heaven!

[Exit.]

Oth. Guard ye the prince— [Part go out.]
Pursue his steps. Now this way let us turn,
And seek the tyrant. [Exeunt]

SCENE III.—A Court in the Palace.

Enter BARBAROSSA.

Bar. Empire is lost, and life: yet brave revenge
Shall close my life in glory.

Enter OTHMAN.

Have I found thee,
Dissembling traitor? Die!—

[They fight; BARBAROSSA falls.]

Enter SELIM and SADI.

Selim. The foe gives way: sure this way went the storm.

Where is the tiger fled? What do I see?

Sadi. Algiers is free!

Oth. This sabre did the deed!

Selim. I envy thee the blow! Yet valour scorns

To wound the fallen. But if life remain,

I will speak daggers to his guilty soul—

Ho! Barbarossa! Tyrant, murderer!

'Tis Selim, Selim calls thee.

Bar. Off, ye fiends!

Torment me not! O Selim, art thou there!

Swallow me, earth!

Oh, that I ne'er had wrong'd thee!

Selim. Dost thou then

Repent thee of thy crimes! He does, he does!

He grasps my hand—see, the repentant tear

Starts from his eye! Dost thou indeed repent?

Why then I do forgive thee: from my soul

I freely do forgive thee!—

Bar. Generous Selim!

Too good—I have a daughter—Oh! protect her!

Let not my crimes—

[Dies.]

Oth. There fled the guilty soul!

Selim. Haste to the city—stop the rage of slaughter.

Tell my brave people, that Algiers is free;

And tyranny no more.

[Exeunt Guards.]

Enter ZAPHIRA.

Zaph. What mean these horrors? wheresoe'er
I turn

My trembling steps, I find some dying wretch,
Weltering in gore! And dost thou live, my Selim?

Selim. Lo, there the tyrant lies!

Zaph. O righteous Heaven!

Selim. Behold thy valiant friends, [power Whose faith and courage have o'erwhelm'd the
Of Barbarossa.

Zaph. Just are thy ways, O Heaven! Vain terrors, hence!

Once more Zaphira's bless'd!—

Selim. O happy hour! happy, beyond

Even hope! Look down, bless'd shade,

From the bright realms of bliss! Behold thy queen

Unspotted, uneduc'd, unmov'd in virtue.

Behold the tyrant prostrate at thy feet!

And to the memory of thy bleeding wrongs,

Accept this sacrifice.

Zaph. My generous Selim!

Selim. Where is Irene?

Oth. Zamor, our trusty friend, at my command,

Convey'd the weeping fair one to her chamber

Selim. Thanks to thy generous care.

Zaph. Her virtues might atone

For all her father's guilt! Thy throne be hers

She merits all thy love. [ther's crimes,

Selim. Then haste, and find her. O'er her fa-pity shall draw her veil; nay, half absolve them,

When she beholds the virtues of his child.

Now let us thank th' eternal Power: convinc'd,

That Heaven but tries our virtue by affliction;

That oft the cloud, which wraps the present hour,

Serves but to brighten all our future days!

[Exeunt.]

THE RECRUITING SERGEANT:

A MUSICAL ENTERTAINMENT,

IN ONE ACT.

BY ISAAC BICKERSTAFF.

REMARKS.

The musical merits of this Burletta have always been acknowledged: it is now seldom performed, but it is well entitled to preference. In 1789, it was produced at the Royalty Theatre, under the management of Mr. John Palmer, and met with great success.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

As originally acted.

COVENT GARDEN, 1816

SERGEANT.....	Mr. Bannister	Mr. Incedon .
COUNTRYMAN.....	Mr. Dibdin	Mr. Solomons .
WIFE.....	Mrs. Wrighten	Mrs. Hiff .
MOTHER.....	Mrs. Dorman	Mrs. T. Dibdin .

SCENE.—A Country Place.

SCENE.—View of a Village, with a Bridge.

On one side, near the front, a Cottage; on the other, at the foot of the Bridge, an Alehouse.

The Curtain rises and discovers two Light Horsemen, supposed to be on their march, sitting at an Alehouse door; with their arms against the wall, their horses at some distance. The SERGEANT then passes with his party over the bridge, drums, and fifes playing; and afterwards the COUNTRYMAN, his WIFE, and his MOTHER, come out from the Cottage.

QUARTET.—SERGEANT, COUNTRYMAN, MOTHER, and WIFE.

Serg. All gallant lads, who know no fears,
To the drugg-head repair,
To serve the king for volunteers;
Speak you, my boys, that dare.
Come, who'll be a grenadier?
The listing money down
Is three guineas and a crown,
To be spent in punch or beer.

Coun. Adds flesh, I'll go with him.

Moth. Oh, no,

Wife. Dear Joe!

Coun. Adds flesh, I'll go with him.

Moth. Oh, no!

Coun. Adds flesh, but I will;
So hold your tongues still:
Nor mother, nor wife,
Tho' they strive for their life,
Shall bauk't, an' my fancy be so.

Serg. Come, beat away a royal march,
Rub, rub, rub a dub;
Rub, rub, rub a dub;
Of no poltroons I come in search,
Who cowardly sneak
When the tongues of war speak,
But of noble souls, who death dare stand,
Against the foes of old England.

Coun. I'll be a soldier, so that's fiat.

Moth. You wont, you wont.

Coun. I'll be dead, an' I don't.
What would the teasing toads be at?

Moth. You graceless rogue,
Is your heart a stone?

Wife. I'm flesh of your flesh,
And bone of your bone.

Coun. Zounds, let me alone.

Serg. Drums, strike up a flourish, and follow me now
All honest hearts and clever :
Free quarters and beer at the sign of the Plough :

Huzza! king George for ever.
[Some of the party go into the Alehouse with the Light Horsemen.

Coun. Hip, Measter Sergeant.

Wife. Go, yourself destroy.

Serg. What says my cock ?

Coun. Mayhop, I wants employ.

A lad about my soize, though, would na' do.

Serg. Ay, for a colonel.

Coun. And a captain too!

Serg. For both, or either.

Coun. But I doubts, d'ye see,

Such places are na' for the loikes o' me.

Serg. List for a soldier first, ne'er fear the rest:
This guinea—

Moth. Joe, this cursed gould detest.
Art not asham'd, an honest man to 'tice?
The king should know it.

Coun. Who wants your advice ?

AIR.—MOTHER.

Out upon thee, wicked locust,
Worse in country nor a plague;
Men by thee are houest pocust
Into danger and fatigue.
And the justices outbear thee
In thy tricks, but I don't fear thee,
No, nor those that with thee league.
My son has enough at home,
He needs not for bread to roam;
Already his pay
Is twelvepence a day,
His honest labour's fruits;
Then get thee a trudging quick,
For 'gad, if I take a stick,
I'll make thee repent,
When here thee wert sent,
A drumming for recruits.

[Exit into the Cottage.

Re-enter MOTHER, with three little Children.

Coun. Then won't you go, and let a body be ?

Serg. Zounds, is the woman mad ?

Moth. Dawn't swear at me.

Wife. Dear Joseph, what's come o'er thee?
tell me, do:

Three babes we have, I work for them and you;
You work for us, and both together earn
What keeps them tight, and puts them out to learn.

But, if a soldiering you're bent to roam,
We all shall shortly to the parish come;
And the churchwardens, no one to befriend us,
Will, for the next thing, to the workhouse send
us. [serv'd;

Thee know'st at workhouse how poor folks are
Bill, Tom, and Susan, will be quickly starv'd.

AIR.—Taking a Boy in one hand and a Girl in the other.

Oh, could you bear to view
Your little Tom and Sue
Ta'en up by cross o'erseers :
And think that helpless I,
To give them, when they cry,
Have nothing but my tears ?
You cannot have the heart,
With them and me to part,

For folks you know not who!
With richer friends than we,
And prouder you may be,
But none will prove so true.

[Exit with the Children.

Serg. Comrade, your hand: I love a lad of
soul;

Your name, to enter on my muster-roll:

To Justice Swear'em then, to take our oath.

Coun. Hold, sergeant, hold, there's time enough for both.

If I've a moind to list, I'll list, d'yoe see;
But some discourse first, betwixt yow and me.

A soldier's life—

Serg. The finest life that goes;

Free quarters every where—

Coun. Ay, that we knows.

Serg. Then, wenches!

Coun. You've free quarters too with they;

Girls love the red coats—

Moth. 'Gad, and well they may. [sort,

Coun. But when to fareign wars your men re-

Fighting—a battle—

Serg. 'Tis the rarest sport.

Coun. Tell us a little about that.

Serg. I will.

Wife. Don't listen to him, Joe!

Coun. Do you be still.

AIR.—SERGEANT.

What a charming thing 's a battle!
Trumpets sounding, drums a beating
Crack, crick, crack, the cannons rattle
Every heart with joy elating.
With what pleasure are we spying,
From the front and from the rear,
Round us in the smoky air,
Heads, and limbs, and bullets flying!
Then the groans of soldiers dying:
Just like sparrows, as it were,
At each pop,
Hundreds drop;
While the muskets prittle prattle
Kill'd and wounded
Lie confounded.

What a charming thing 's a battle!
But the pleasant joke of all,
Is when to close attack we fall:
Like mad bulls each other butting,
Shooting, stabbing, maiming, cutting,
Horse and foot,
All go to't,
Kill 's the word, both men and cattle;
Then to plunder,
Blood and thunder,

What a charming thing 's a battle!
Moth. Call you this charming? 'Tis the work of hell.

Wife. How dost thou like it, Joe?

Coun. Why, pretty well.

Serg. But pretty well?

Coun. Why need there more be said?

But mayn't I happen too to lose my head?

Serg. Your head?

Coun. Ay.

Serg. Let me see: your head, my buck—

Coun. A leg or arm too!

Serg. Not if you've good luck.

Coun. Good luck!

Serg. The chance of war is doubtful still.

Soldiers must run the risk.

Coun. They may, that will.

Serg. Why, how now, Joseph? Sure you mean to jest!

Coun. I have thought twice, and second thoughts are best.

Show folks with beastes to our village came,
And hung at door a picture of their game;
Bears, lions, tigers, there were four or five;
And all so like, you'd swear they were alive.
A gaping at the cloth, the mon spied me;
"For twopence, friend, you may walk in," says he;
But 'gad, I was more wise, and walk'd my way;
I saw so much for nought, I would not pay.
To see a battle thus, my moind was bent;
But you've so well describ'd it, I'm content.

Serg. Come, brother soldiers, let us then begone:
Thou art a base poltroon.

Coun. That's all as one.

AIR.

Ay, ay, master sergeant, I wish you good day:
You've no need at present, I thank you, to stay;
My stomach for battle's gone from me, I trow;
When it comes back again, I'll take care you shall know.

With cudgel or fist, as long as you list;
But as for this fighting,
Which some take delight in; [gun;
This slashing and smashing, with sword and with
On consideration,
I've no inclination

To be the partaker of any such fun.
I'll e'en stay at home in my village,
And carry no arms but for tillage;
My wounds shall be made
With the scythe or the spade,
If ever my blood should be shed.

A finger or so
Should one wound, or a toe
For such a disaster
There may be a plaster;
But no plaster sticks on a head. [Exit SERGEANT.

Wife. Then wilt thou stay, Joe?

Moth. Wilt thou, boy of mine?

Coun. Wife, give's thy hand, and mother, give us thine.

Last night you dodg'd me to the alehouse, Jane;
I swore to be reveng'd—

Wife. I see it plain. [short,

Coun. I swore to be reveng'd, and vow'd, in
To list ma, to be even with thee for't;
But kiss me, now my plaguy anger's o'er.

Wife. And I'll ne'er dodge thee to the alehouse more.

DUET.—COUNTRYMAN and WIFE.

Coun. From henceforth, wedded to my farm,
My thoughts shall never rove on harm,
I to the field perchance may go,
But it shall be to reap or sow.

Wife. Now blessings on thy honest heart,
Thy wife shall bear an equal part;
Work thee without doors, she within
Will keep the house, and card and spin.

Coun. How foolish they, in love with strife,
Who quit the peaceful country life;

Wife. Where wholesome labour is the best,
And surest guide to balmy rest!

Both. That lot true happiness secures,
And, bless'd, be prais'd, is mine and yours.

Content beneath the numble shed,
We'll toil to earn our babies bread;

With mutual kindness bear love's yoke,
And pity greater, finer folk.

[Here is introduced a dance of Light-horse men, Recruits, and Country girls; after which the SERGEANT comes out, with a drinking glass in his hand, followed by his party, to the COUNTRYMAN, the WIFE, and the MOTHER, who have been looking on the dance.

Serg. Well, countryman, art off the listing pin,
Yet wilt thou beat a march?

Wife. Dear Joe! come in.

Moth. Hang-dog, be gone, and tempt my boy no more.

Wife. Do, sergeant, pray now.

Coun. Mother, wife give o'er.

I see the gentleman no harm intends. [friends.

Serg. !! Heaven forbid; but let us part like
We've got a bottle here of humming ale.

'Tis the king's health.

Coun. And that I never fail.

Lord love and bless him, he's an honest man.

Serg. Lads, where your music?

Coun. Nay, fill up the can.

We'll drink the royal family.

Serg. So do;

King, queen, and all.

Coun. And Jane shall drink them too.

AIR.

Here's a health to king George, peace and glory attend him!

He's merciful, pious; he's prudent and just;
Long life, and a race like himself, Heaven send him,
And humble the foes to his crown in the dust.

Chorus. Beat drums, beat amain,
Let the ear-piercing fife
To our measures give life;
While each British heart
In the health bears a part,
And joins the loyal strain.

Wife. Here's a health to the queen; gracious, mild, and engaging,
Accomplish'd in all that a woman
should own;
The cares of her consort with softness
assuaging,
Whose manners add splendour and grace to a throne.

Chorus. Beat drums, &c.

Moth. Here's a health to those beautiful babes, whom the nation
Regards as a pledge from the sire it
reveres;
Heaven shield the sweet plants from each rude visitation,
And rear them to fulness of virtue and years.

Chorus. Beat drums, &c.

Serg. Here's success to his majesty's arms, ever glorious,
And great may they be on the land and the main;
As just is their cause, may they still prove victorious,
And punish the rashness of France and of Spain.

Chorus. Beat drums, &c.

HERO AND LEANDER:

A COMIC BURLETTA,

IN TWO ACTS.

BY ISAAC JACKMAN.

REMARKS.

This burletta, remarkable principally for the occasion which produced it, was written by Isaac Jackman for Mr. John Palmer, who had then recently built and opened the Royalty Theatre, in Well Street, Goodman's-fields, for the regular drama. Continued opposition from the patentees of the royal theatres, obliged that gentleman to renounce his first intention; and this elegant theatre (though better calculated, in every respect, for the legitimate drama than the winter theatres) has been, since that period, opened under an annual license for burletta, pantomime, &c. according to the act 25th Geo. II.

In his dedication, the author observes, that "The worthy manager requested me to write something for him within the statute, and I thought poor Hero and Leander might be introduced to the public, without being considered 'wagrants or wagabones!' I did intend to souse Leander in the waves, as a part of the old romance, and to have a requiem sung over his manes; but a wicked wit told me, that such a denouement would be tragedy direct, and against the law."

At the first representation of this afterpiece, the talents of Mr. Bannister, Mr. W. Palmer, Mr. Arrowsmith, Mrs. Fox, Master Braham, &c. ensured it the highest success.

During the controversy elicited by Mr. Palmer's endeavours to obtain a patent for his theatre, it was aptly observed, that "It is of no consequence to government, or to the million residing within the walls of London, whether the winter managers and Mr. Colman play to empty benches or overflowing audiences. If they are able, diligent, and liberal, they cannot fail of accumulating very considerable fortunes, and may bid defiance to every exertion of Mr. Palmer in the east: let this be as it may, the public good ought first to be consulted."

An unjust and impolitic monopoly, however, preserved the ascendancy; and the public good, as on many other more important occasions, was sacrificed to private interest.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

ABUDAH, Mr. W. Palmer.
DELAH, Mr. Chambers.
LEANDER, Mr. Arrowsmith.
HYMEN, Master Braham.
SOLANO, Mr. Bannister.

HERO, Mrs. Fox
SAFRINA, Mrs. Burnet.
MINERVA, Miss Burnet.

Soldiers, Labouring People, Men and Women.

SCENE.—The Banks of the Hellespont. Time.—Sun-rise.

Music by Mr. Reeve.—Scenery by Mr. Dixon.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Harvest Scene, at sun-rise, on the Banks of the Hellespont.

Turkish husbandmen at work, their wives employed at the same time.—A perspective view of the Castle of Abydos, in Natolia, or the Lesser Asia—the Hellespont appearing to divide the two countries.

213

Enter SOLANO, SAFRINA, HERO, labouring Men and Women.

Chorus. All hail the cheerful god of day,
Parent of every human bliss;
Who (ere he wings his heavenly way)

Salutes his Thetis with a kiss.

Saf. See how creation smiles around;
What melody enchants the grove!

Hero. 'Tis there the voice of nature's found
Responsive to the note of love.

Chorus. All hail, &c.

Sol. Well done, my lads, the morning seems to lower;

In yonder cloud, methinks, I view a shower:
Bind up the corn, harness all the cattle,
And let the women quit their idle prattle;
Those lazy sluts are constantly a gadding;
'Tis such as you, that set the fellows madding.

Hero. Behold Aurora, with a blushing ray
And rosy fingers, spreads the infant day!

SONG.

Ere yet Aurora chase the dews,
The lark his matin song renews;
And seems to chide the swains' delay,
To lose so sweet a part of day.

See from the ground his mate arise,
And seems to mock our wond'ring eyes;
Still as she soars her notes decay,
Till the faint warblings die away.

Sol. Well, Safrina, what's the matter now?

Saf. There sits, alas! on gentle Hero's brow
A settled grief.

Sol. Pshaw! I know the reason:
Hero's nineteen, and that, you know, 's the season
When females would be married, if they could.

Saf. Well, what of that? are we not flesh and blood?

SONG.

When I was young, I danc'd and sung,
My heart was lighter than a fly;
No care my youthful bosom stung,
At every rout, pray who but I?

At length the urchin bent his bow,
The vagrant arrow hit the mark;
But Hymen 'sol'd his skill to show,
Cur'd poor Safrina in the dark.

Sol. Well done, Safrina; 'foregad, we all can tell,
There was a time, you bore away the bell.

[A peal of thunder; sky appears overcast;
exeunt SAFRINA and HERO.]

Sol. Away my lads—the storm is drawing near—

And save the produce of a fruitful year.

[A peal of thunder, accompanied with lightning.]

Sol. Well done, my boys! The clouds are all on fire;

A thunder-bolt hath struck the village spire.

[A peal of thunder, lightning, rain, &c.]

Sol. The hills are wrapt in stormy clouds on high,

And feel the dread convulsion of the sky;

Tempests arise, on fortune's ocean lower,

And rolling billows lash th' affrighted shore.

[Tempest rages; a Man, standing on a rock, cries out—

Man. A ship, a ship! 'twixt sea and wind she strives.

Sol. Fly all, fly all, and save the people & lives.

SONG.

Alas, how chang'd the face of things;

[Thunder and lightning.]

Hark, hark, the howling tempest sings:

Ah, now the rebel winds she feels,
Toss'd on the billows, how she reels!

She's now a wreck, behold on high [Thunders.]

Exploded thunders rend the sky;

A dread convulsion moves the shore,
And rocks the deep, unmov'd before.

[The crew now appear landing—thunder and lightning—music descriptive of the elemental warfare—storm gradually decreases—LEANDER disguised.]

Sol. Welcome on shore, Sir, whether friend or foe,

All are our brothers in this scene of woe.

Lean. Thanks to you, gentle friends; and, Sir, to you

Our constant prayers are ever, ever due;

May all the powers divine your labours bless,
And send you friends, if ever in distress!

Sol. What means that sigh? ah, tell me, gentle youth;

You seem the child of honour and of truth:

Banish your cares, for see, the God of light
Dispels the gloom, that wrapp'd the world in night.

Lean. Stern Boreas, frowning now forsakes the plain,

And smiling Nature visits us again;

Each tree its wonted foliage re-assumes,

And new-born zephyrs breathe around perfumes.

Where'er we turn to view our ravish'd eyes,
Luxuriant scenes of endless beauty rise.

SONG.

Transparent now, and all serene,

The gentle current flows;

While fancy draws the flatt'ring scene,
How fair the landscape shows!

But soon its transient charms decay,

When ruffling tempests blow;

The soft delusions fleet away,

And pleasure ends in woe.

Sol. Tell me, gentle Sir, from whence you came;

Declare your sovereign, country, and your name,

Are ye from Natolia's rebel coast?

If that be so, 'twere better you were lost.

[Trumpet without.]

The chief is rous'd: behold him, great in arms;

Let Hero now subdue him with her charms:

From yonder mountain's brow he saw your sails

Dreadful he is—a bashaw of three tails.

[Music plays, 'See the conquering hero comes]

Enter ABUDAH on an elephant, attended with a numerous body of guards, armed with spears.

Abu. What's this I see?—a set of rascal millions,

Hanging together like a set of onions.

I'll hang ye all, ay, scoundrels, before night,

If on the instant you don't quit my sight.

Sol. Dread Sir, we have got some prisoners here,

That seem half dead already with their fear ;
Shipwreck'd upon our coast, we sav'd their lives,
And here they are—

Abu. Say, have they any wives ?
'The women all are mine—yes, if twenty,
Although indeed I've petticoats in plenty.

Sol. We found no female, Sir, among the crew ;
Shall we discharge the men—pray, what say you ?
Abu. Let them all breakfast,
Each a loaf of bread,
And then let every prisoner—
Lose his head.

[PRISONERS bow.]

CHORUS.—PRISONERS.

Have pity, great chief,
And send us relief ;
We're all in a wretched condition :
O, spare our poor lives,
And we'll send you our wives ;
Accept this our humble petition.

[During this chorus ABUDAH alights.]

Abu. Silence, rascals!—I find you then can prate,
But, scoundrels, you shall know my word is fate.
My sword shall treat the vultures with a feast ;
Shall lay whole realms, nay, human nature,
waste.

Sol. I told them, Sir, how great you were in power,

That with a single puff you'd rock a tower ;
That you were ten feet high—was not that right ?

Abu. Ten feet at least—five cubits—No—no—
quite :

Yet every inch is made of proper stuff,
Though idle nature cast me in the rough.

SONG.

Stand all aloof, ye paltry jades,
And you, ye filthy knaves of spades ;
How dare you look beyond those pales,
On me, who wear three thumping tails ?
Don't you all know, that at a blow,
I'd send you to the shades below ?
Begone, or else I swear, odsbobs,
I'll send you home without your knobs.

Enter HERO.

But, Hero now her form displays,
And strives to charm a thousand ways ;
From head to foot new modes of dress,
Her various arts to please express :
I find I'm caught within the snare,
So I'll enjoy the am'rous fair ;
As I'm a soldier great and stout,
This girl has turn'd me inside out.

HERO AND LEANDER look steadfastly at each other.

Lean. It is, it is, my love ! Ye gods, be kind !
[Aside.]

Hero. 'Tis he—I give my sorrows to the wind.
[Aside.]

Abu. What does the fellow stare at ? Speak, you dog.

The rascal seems as stupid as a log.

Lean. Spare your reproaches, Sir ; I'm ill at ease,

My life is yours, do with me as you please.

See tear succeeds to tear—a passage seeks,
And, bursting forth, bedews her lovely cheeks !

Abu. No grumbling, sirrah. Charmer, let's retire, [Takes HERO by the hand.]

The god of love shall fan the keen desire ;
My body, blood, and soul, are all on fire. [Going.]

Lean. Monster, avant !—Release the heavenly fair,

Or, by all the avenging powers, I swear—
[Seizes ABUDAH.]

Abu. Seize, seize the villain ; drag him to the block,

Or toss him headlong from the steepest rock.
No, off with his head. As I'm a sinner,
I'll have his knob, before I eat my dinner.

Hero. Mercy, O mercy, Sir, as you are great !
O save the youth, at least suspend his fate !

Abu. Who is the vagabond ?
Lean. Why, caitiff, hear,

So shall thy savage nature shake with fear ;
Know then, ingrate, from Abydos I came ;
Still more ; know thou, Leander is my name.

[Throws off his disguise]
Now slip thy bloodhounds—'dudge the savage
I stand unmov'd. [rout ;]

Abu. O now the murder's out.
Thanks to thee, prophet, thanks to thee again.

—Speak not in his behalf, you sue in vain ;
This is the squire, that braves the Hellespont,
And steals at night to madam hot-upon't.

Zounds ! I'll souse him in a tub of pickle ;
And, as for Miss, her toby I will tickle.
Drag him away.

Hero. Great chief, be not cruel, but good as you're brave, [save.]

Remember, the hero but conquers to
Sol. Give life to the wretched, whose fate's in your hand : [land.]

'Tis humanity graces and blesses the Lean. I sue not for mercy, I stand here unmov'd,

Protected by virtue, by beauty, and love.
Together. Look down, O ye gods, and let mortals now prove,

The blessings that wait upon virtue and
love.

Hero. Hear me, great Sir—O spare Leander's
life,

Grant this request, and Hero is your wife.
Sol. Say, will your actions with your words accord ?

Hero. They will, indeed.
Sol. Then take her at her word.

Lean. I read my Hero's meaning in her eyes.
[Aside.]

Abu. It is all flummery.—By Heaven, he dies.
Hero. Pardon me, Sir, my love for you prevails,

What girl can stand, a bashaw with three tails ?
[Coaxes him.]

SONG.

O, Sir, be consenting, be kind, and relenting,
[away ;]

Release these poor creatures, and send them
Do but this, and you'll find

How good natur'd and kind
I'll prove to my spousee, by night and by day.

O, come now, sweet lover, a passion discover,
A sly little Cupid now lurks in that smile :

Every maid must surrender
To such a commander, [guile.]

You've found out a way my poor heart to be-

Behold, like Apollo, his ringlets of yellow!
Behold how, like Mars, at this moment he
His breath too discloses [stands!
The perfume of roses!
How plump his round cheeks, and how taper his hands!

O, come now, sweet lover, &c.

Abu. A pretty soul it is!—Say, will you, Miss,
Give your bashaw the earnest of a kiss.

[Kisses him.

'Tis done! 'tis done!—you're pardon'd, rascals
I give you life, my love will have it so. [—go,
But if that poaching dog comes here again,
And braves my anger, as he braves the main,
I'll whip the rebel rascal, till he's blind.—
He scarce then, scoundrels, now you know my mind.

CHORUS.

Prisoners. Happy, happy, happy day;
Every heart its homage pay.

CHORUS—By the Turks.

Wake to harmony the voice,
Rejoice, 'tis mercy calls, rejoice.

[During this chorus, ABUDAH mounts the elephant; he first places his foot on the shoulder of a slave, who kneels and raises him gently, until ABUDAH vaults into the saddle.

CHORUS.

All. Happy, happy, happy day,
Every heart its homage pay.
Wake to harmony the voice,
Rejoice, 'tis mercy calls, rejoice

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Grove.

Enter ABUDAH, SOLANO, SAFRINA, and HERO.

Abu. Come, come, Solano, methinks we tarry,
I shall be all a-gog, until I marry.

The loves in council sit, and from above
Venus now calls me to the Paphian grove.

Sol. What says my gentle Hero, will you go?

Saf. Her heart seems bursting with his grief.

Hero. Heigh ho!

Saf. Divide your sorrows, Hero, give me part.
Suppress that sigh—or else you'll break my heart.

SONG.

Alas! I press'd, with growing love,
This darling to my breast;
Not the most favour'd, even above,
Was more completely bless'd.

Dear innocent! her lovely smiles
Delight me but to view;
And every pang my Hero feels,
Her mother feels it too.

Abu. I see she's coy, yet love is in her eye,
She'll know her bashaw better by and by;
Come, Hero, I hope there's no repenting,
The gods, my pretty chicken, are consenting.

SONG.

Gentle Hero! take my hand,
Love and life's at thy command:
Joys surrounding,
Sorrows drowning,
Bliss shall gladden all the land.

But if you refuse me,
And think but to noose me
In love's silken fetters,
And sneer at your betters,
By the gods now I swear,
From your bosom I'll tear—
No, stop—I'll do more,
I'll deluge the shore
With blood—
Till Nature looks wild,
And before I retire,
I'll kindle a fire,
That shall toast you,
And roast you,
Man, woman, and child.

Saf. O mercy on us! whither shall we fly?

Sol. He'll ravish you, perhaps.

Saf. No, first I'll die.

[Exit SAFRINA, and HERO; huzza without.

Enter DELAH and Soldiers.

Abu. What's the matter, Delah?

Del. Dread Sir, attend—

We've seen a sail—I'm sure she's not a friend—
Hovering on our coast; she's full of people.

I saw her first, great Sir, from yonder steeple.

Abu. Rally my forces—instant line the strand;
They're rebel rascals, from Natolia's land.

[Exit DELAH; Soldiers remain. Huzza without.

Like Mars, I'll dart the javelin from my car,
I scorn to wait, I'll meet the coming war.

[Going; trumpet sounds without.

Sol. Fir'd by the sound, my genius bids me go,
To share the conflict, and repel the foe.

SONG.

Hark! the trumpet sounds afar,
The clam'rous harbinger of war;
Rouse, soldiers, rouse, to arms to arms,
The call my beating bosom warms;
The foe insults our native shore,
And proudly mocks his conqueror.

AIR.

O, genius of this happy land,
Descend! and bless thy chosen band;
Give us to meet the daring foe,
'Tis liberty shall nerve the blow.

So, when the toils of war are o'er,
And meek-eyed peace unlocks her store,
Each youthful hero then shall prove,
A sweet reward in faithful love.

Enter DELAH.

Del. Dread Sir, a prisoner we have taken.

Abu. Off with his head—I'll make the fellow bacon.

Del. If you unhead him, Sir, he cannot speak.

Abu. What horrid fears sits trembling on thy cheek?

Del. I find Leander, Sir, comes here to-night,
To visit Hero, and secure her flight.

Abu. Death and the devil!—this is news indeed—

O for Bellona's whip, to make him bleed!
He should be more than twenty months in dying,
'Twould make me smile, to see the rascal frying.

Sol. Suppose we seize him as he comes tonight,

Waylay the villain—nah him?

Abu. That is right.
You counsel well, Solano—Come away,
My soul 's in arms, and eager for its prey
[Exeunt omnes.]

SCENE II.

Night.—The Hellespont in perspective. LEANDER is seen rowing himself over. A candle appears in HERO'S window, as a direction to her lover.

Enter ABUDAH, SOLANO, and Soldiers.

Sol. Behold him, Sir!—his fate, alas! draws nigh,
And forces e'en the tribute of a sigh.
Like the dread genius of the deep, he steers,
Nor shuns the labour, nor the danger fears.

SONG.

O, see how he comes, how he moves through the gloom,
Conducted by fate, and by love, to his doom!
O, see the fond youth, to the shore now he bends,
And quits his companions, his country, and
friends;
Regardless of danger, he darts through the
wave,
'Tis nature commands him, and nature must save.

Abu. The fellow's got on shore, he'll soon be here;

The light conducts him to my faithless fair.
O here he comes—be silent all as death,
Let not a creature speak above his breath.

Enter LEANDER.

Lean. Well so far safe—I now must wait to see
The bright perfection of a deity.
O do not, cruel love, my cares prolong!
I'll wake my gentle Hero with a song.

SONG.

Awake, my sweet Hero, my heart's dearest treasure,
Leander now calls you to love and delight;
'Tis Hymen shall sanctify love's softest pleasure,
Give our days all to joy, and to rapture the
night.
Awake then, my charmer, and share the sweet blessing,
The moments now fly me, alas! how distressing,
O, think of our joys, when caress'd and caressing,
Arise, my sweet Hero, love calls you away.

[HERO opens the window.]

Hero. O my soul's joy! thy cheering voice I hear
Like notes from seraphs, rushing on my ear.

Lean. O come, my Hero, bless again my arms,
My heart, still constant, beats with love's alarms!
Danger could work no change, nor time remove
The honest warmth of undissembled love.
Haste then, sweet fair, thy lover's transport meet,
Fly to his arms, and make his bliss complete.

[HERO shuts the window.]

That Heaven from which no secret is conceal'd,
But every wish and thought must stand reveal'd,

Views not a love more pure, or truer mind,
Amongst the various race of human kind;
Where neither interest nor design have part,
But all the warmth is native from the heart.

Enter HERO; LEANDER embraces her.

O bless'd event!—let's fly to yonder shore:
We've met, my Hero, now, to part no more.
Hail, happy groves, retreats of peace and joy,
Where no black cares the mind's repose destroy!
Hero. Discharg'd from care, on unfrequented plains,
We'll sing of rural joys in rural strains;
No false corrupt delights our thoughts shall move,
But joys of friendship, tenderness, and love.

DUET.

Lean. Come now, my sweet love, to the grove,
The graces are waiting for you;
Thro' roses and woodbines we'll rove,
And kiss, as all true lovers do.

Hero. O, take both my hand and my heart,
My lover I know he is true;
Till death shall direct us to part,
We'll kiss, as all true lovers do.

Both. Adieu then to doubt and despair,
Fair virtue our loves will pursue;
We'll not know a moment of care,
But kiss, as all true lovers do.

[They appear retiring to LEANDER'S vessee, but are stopped by ABUDAH, SOLANO, DELAH, and Soldiers; the Soldiers present their spears at LEANDER.]

Abu. Bind the villain.—O Sir, you're caught again!

Knock off his head, and let me have his brain;
Now that my anger's rous'd, my rage is full,
I'll make a punch-bowl of the rascal's skull.

[In this part of the Scene, MINERVA, in a cloud, attended by HYMEN, descends in the back Scene, supposed to be the Banks of the Hellespont.]

Lean. O now farewell to hope!—My love,
I die content, because I die for you. [adieu!]

Hero. O make his cause, ye powers above, your care,

Let guilt shrink back, and innocence appear!
Support his soul, now death demands his prey,
And smooth his passage to the realms of day!

Lean. May Heaven still guard her, with peculiar care.

And make her happy, as it made her fair!
May calmest peace her future days attend,
And late may she to endless joys ascend!

Abu. Bring me a cauldron, hot as Alecto's kettle;

First Medusa's snaky whip shall try his mettle!
'Sdeath! his blood I'll bottle, and in the dark pond
found

I'll sprinkle libations, to the furies round.

[MINERVA and HYMEN come forward, ABUDAH starts; all stand amazed.]

Min. Cease, hell-hound—infernal monster, cease—

I come, the blessed harbinger of peace,
To join in Hymen's bands this constant pair,
The youth deserving, and the virtuous fair;
Their constancy and truth deserve my care.

Stand forth, my children—Hymen, join their hands,

[A flourish of trumpets; they kneel, and Hymen joins their hands.]

Tis Wisdom consecrates the sacred bands.

SONG—HYMEN.

Sweetest pleasures never ceasing,
Blessings, which the gods present,
Joys, with length of years increasing,
Rosy health, and sweet content,
Await the fair, and deck the youth,
United in the bands of truth.

And when old Time, with solemn pace,
Shall call to tell them, both must die;
Touch'd, as he views their fond embrace,
He'll bless them first, then pass them by.
Sweetest pleasures, &c.

Abu. What then, is all my greatness come to this?

Am I then baffled by a paltry Miss?—
Your power, Madam, certainly prevails;
Wisdom, I find, pays no respect to tails.

Lean. O thanks, eternal thanks, to you be given,

Thou best and brightest ornament of Heaven!

Min. Now strike the sprightly lyre; all care away;

To mirth and joy we dedicate the day;

I'll raise an altar to love's holy flame,

Inscrib'd with Hero's and Leander's name.

FINALE.

Lean. Joy and pleasure now go round,
Beauty's triumph is to-day;
Every voice in chorus sound,
This is Hymen's holiday.
Dress a garland for the fair,
Care and sorrow hither go;
Daffodillies,
Virgin lilies—
Hymen says he'll have it so.

Hero. Take my hand, you have my heart,
Indeed, you've had it long ago;
And now we'll never, never part—
Hymen says he'll have it so.

Chorus. Joy and pleasure, &c.

Saf. Cupid is a foolish boy,
Once he tried on me his bow;
But I never felt a joy,
Till Hymen said he'd have it so.

Chorus. Joy and pleasure, &c.

Abu. Must I then give up the fair,
And see them laughing at my wo;
Live and lead a life of care?
The devil sure would have it so.

Chorus. Joy and pleasure, &c.

Sol. Observe, ye fair, the moral here—
Let virtue in your bosoms glow,
You then may bid adieu to fear—
Hymen says he'll have it so.

Chorus. Joy and pleasure, &c.

ISABELLA:

OR,

THE FATAL MARRIAGE:

A TRAGEDY,

IN FIVE ACTS.

BY THOMAS SOUTHERN.

REMARKS.

This tragedy was restored to the stage, after a long period of neglect, by Garrick, who made many judicious alterations, and omitted some comic scenes, which it must be confessed were not well adapted to the moral taste of the age. In 1774, that inimitable actor appeared in the part of Biron, and contributed to the success of this excellent drama, which it was reserved for our own day to render irresistible and memorable, by the introduction of Mrs. Siddons to a London audience. That unrivalled mistress of the heart gave a pathos and importance to Isabella, which it had not before received; and Miss O'Neil's impassioned and native excellence, in her late personation of the character, will entitle her to a situation in Thespian annals, not far removed from her great predecessor.

Of the ten plays written by Southern, Isabella and Oroonoko keep their place on the modern stage.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—The Street.

Enter VILLEROY and CARLOS.

Car. This constancy of yours will establish an immortal reputation among the women.

Vil. If it would establish me with Isabella—

Car. Follow her, follow her: Troy-town was won at last.

Vil. I have followed her these seven years, and now but live in hopes.

Car. But live in hopes! Why, hope is the ready road, the lover's baiting place; and for aught you know, but one stage short of the possession of your mistress.

Vil. But my hopes, I fear, are more of my own making than hers; and proceed rather from my wishes, than any encouragement she has given me.

Car. That I can't tell: the sex is very various: there are no certain measures to be prescribed or followed, in making our approaches to the women. All that we have to do, I think, is to attempt them.

in the weakest part. Press them but hard, and they will all fall under the necessity of a surrender at last. That favour comes at once; and sometimes when we least expect it.

Vil. I'm going to visit her.

Car. What interest a brother-in-law can have with her, depend upon.

Vil. I know your interest, and I thank you.

Car. You are prevented; see, the mourner comes:

She weeps, as seven years were seven hours;
So fresh, unfading, is the memory
Of my poor brother Byron's death:
I leave you to your opportunity.

[Exit VILLEROY.]

Though I have taken care to root her from our house,

I would transplant her into Villeroy's—
There is an evil fate that waits upon her,
To which I wish him wedded—only him;
His upstart family, with haughty brow,
(Though Villeroy and myself are seeming friends,)
Look down upon our house; his sister too,
Whose hand I ask'd, and was with scorn refus'd,
Lives in my breast, and fires me to revenge.—
They bend this way.—
Perhaps, at last, she seeks my father's doors;
They shall be shut, and he prepar'd to give
The beggar and her brat a cold reception.
That boy's an adder in my path—they come,
I'll stand apart, and watch their motions.

[Exit.]

Enter VILLEROY and ISABELLA, with her Child.

Isa. Why do you follow me? you know I am
A bankrupt every way; too far engag'd
Ever to make return: I own you have been
More than a brother to me, my friend:
And at a time when friends are found no more,
A friend to my misfortunes.

Vil. I must be
Always your friend.

Isa. I have known and found you
Truly my friend: and would I could be yours;
But the unfortunate cannot be friends:
Pray begone,

Take warning, and be happy.

Vil. Happiness!

There's none for me without you.—
What serve the goods of fortune for? To raise My hopes, that you at last will share them with
me.

Isa. I must not hear you.

Vil. Thus, at this awful distance, I have serv'd
A seven years' bondage—Do I call it bondage,
When I can never wish to be redeem'd?
No, let me rather linger out a life
Of expectation, that you may be mine,
Than be restor'd to the indifference
Of seeing you, without this pleasing pain:
I've lost myself, and never would be found,
But in these arms.

Isa. Oh, I have heard all this!

—But none more—the charmer is now
My buried husband rises in the face [more:
Of my dear boy, and chides me for my stay:
Canst thou forgive me, child?

Vil. What can I say?

The arguments that make against my hopes
Prevail upon my heart, and fix me more;
Those pious tears, you hourly throw away
Upon the grave, have all their quick'ning charms,

And more engage my love, to make you mine:
When yet a virgin, free, and undispos'd,
I lov'd, but saw you only with mine eyes;
I could not reach the beauties of your soul:
I have since liv'd in contemplation,
And long experience, of your growing goodness:
What then was passion, is my judgment now,
Through all the several changes of your life,
Confirm'd and settled in adorning you.

Isa. Nay, then I must be gone. If you are my friend,

If you regard my little interest,
No more of this.

I'm going to my father: he needs not an excuse
To use me ill: pray leave me to the trial.

Vil. I'm only born to be what you would have
me,

The creature of your power, and must obey,
In every thing obey you. I am going:
But all good fortune go along with you. [Exit.]

Isa. I shall need all your wishes— [Knocks.]

Lock'd! and fast!

Where is the charity that us'd to stand

In our forefathers' hospitable days

At great men's doors,

Like the good angel of the family,

With open arms taking the needy in,

To feed and clothe, to comfort and relieve, them?

Now, even their gates are shut against the poor.

Enter SAMPSON.

Samp. Well, what's to do now, I trow? You knock as loud as if you were invited; and that's more than I heard of; but I can tell you, you may look twice about you for a welcome in a great man's family, before you find it, unless you bring it along with you.

Isa. I hope I do, Sir.

Is your lord at home?

Samp. My lord at home!

Isa. Count Baldwin lives here still?

Samp. Ay, ay, Count Baldwin does live here; and I am his porter; but what's that to the purpose, good woman, of my lord's being at home?

Isa. Why, don't you know me, friend?

Samp. Not I, not I, Mistress; I may have seen you before, or so; but men of employment must forget their acquaintance; especially such as we are never to be the better for.

[Going to shut the door.]

Enter NURSE.

Nurse. Handsomer words should become you, and mend your manners, Sampson; do you know who you prate to?

Isa. I am glad you know me, Nurse.

Nurse. Marry, Heaven forbid, Madam, that I should ever forget you, or my little jewel: pray go in. [ISABELLA goes in with her Child.] Now my blessing go along with you, wherever you go, or whatever you are about. Fie, Sampson, how couldst thou be such a Saracen? A Turk would have been a better Christian, than to have done so barbarously by so good a lady.

Samp. Why, look you, Nurse, I know you of old; by your good will, you would have a finger in every body's pye; but mark the end on't. If I am called to account about it, I know what I have to say.

Nurse. Marry come up here; say your pleasure, and spare not. Refuse his eldest son's widow and poor child the comfort of seeing him? She does not trouble him so often.

Samp. Not that I am against it, Nurse, but we are but servants, you know; we must have no likings, but our lord's, and must do as we are ordered. But what is the business, Nurse? You have been in the family before I came into the world: what's the reason, pray, that this daughter-in-law, who has so good a report in every body's mouth, is so little set by, by my lord?

Nurse. Why, I tell you, Sampson, more or less: I'll tell the truth, that's my way, you know, without adding or diminishing.

Samp. Ay, marry, Nurse.

Nurse. My lord's eldest son, Biron by name, the son of his bosom, and the son that he would have loved best, if he had as many as king Pyramus of Troy;—this Biron, as I was saying, was a lovely sweet gentleman, and, indeed, nobody could blame his father for loving him: he was a son for the king of Spain; Heaven bless him! for I was his nurse. But now I come to the point, Sampson; this Biron, without asking the advice of his friends, hand over head, as young men will have their vagaries, not having the fear of his father before his eyes, as I may say, wilfully marries this Isabella.

Samp. How, wilfully! he should have had her consent, methinks.

Nurse. No, wilfully marries her; and which was worse, after she had settled all her fortune upon a nunnery, which she broke out of to run away with him. They say they had the church's forgiveness, but I had rather it had been his father's.

Samp. Why, in good truth, and I think our young master was not in the wrong but in marrying without a portion.

Nurse. That was the quarrel, I believe, Sampson: upon this my old lord would never see him: disinherited him: took his younger brother, Carlos, into favour, whom he never cared for before: and, at last, forced Biron to go to the siege of Candy, where he was killed.

Samp. Alack a-day, poor gentleman!

Nurse. For which my old lord hates her, as if she had been the cause of his going thither.

Samp. Alas, poor lady! she has suffered for it; she has lived a great while a widow!

Nurse. A great while indeed, for a young woman, Sampson.

Samp. Gad so! here they come; I won't venture to be seen. [They retire.]

Enter COUNT BALDWIN, ISABELLA, and her Child.

C. Bald. Whoever of your friends directed you, Misguided and abus'd you.—There's your What could you expect from me? [way:]

Isa. Oh, I have nothing to expect on earth! But misery is very apt to talk: I thought I might be heard.

C. Bald. What can you say?

Is there in eloquence, can there be in words, A reparation of the injuries, The great calamities, that you have brought On me and mine? You have destroy'd those hopes

I fondly rais'd, through my declining life, To rest my age upon; and most undone me.

Isa. I have undone myself too.

C. Bald. Speak it again; Say still you are undone; and I will hear you, With pleasure hear you.

Isa. Would my ruin please you?

C. Bald. Beyond all other pleasures.

Isa. Then you are pleas'd—for I am most undone.

C. Bald. I pray'd but for revenge, and Heaven has heard,

And sent it to my wishes: these gray hairs Would have gone down in sorrow to the grave Which you have dug for me, without the thought, The thought of leaving you more wretched here.

Isa. Indeed I am most wretched—I lost with Biron all the joys of life:

But now its last supporting means are gone.

All the kind helps that Heaven in pity rais'd, In charitable pity to our wants,

At last have left us: now bereft of all,

But this last trial of a cruel father,

To save us both from sinking. Oh, my child,

Kneel with me, knock at nature in his heart:

Let the resemblance of a once lov'd son

Speak in this little one, who never wrong'd you,

And plead the fatherless and widow's cause.

Oh, if you ever hope to be forgiven,

Forget our faults, that Heaven may pardon yours!

C. Bald. How dare you mention Heaven!

Call to mind

Your perjur'd vows; your plighted, broken faith

To Heaven, and all things holy; were you not

Devoted, wedded to a life recluse,

The sacred habit on, profess'd and sworn,

A votary for ever? Can you think

The sacrilegious wretch, that robs the shrine,

Is thunder proof?

Isa. There, there, began my woes.

Oh! had I never seen my Biron's face,

Had he not tempted me, I had not fallen,

But still continued innocent and free

Of a bad world, which only he had power

To reconcile, and make me try again.

C. Bald. Your own inconstancy

Reconcil'd you to the world:

He had no hand to bring you back again,

But what you gave him. 'Circè! you prevail'd

Upon his honest mind, transforming him

From virtue, and himself, into what shapes

You had occasion for; and what he did

Was first inspir'd by you.

Isa. Not for myself—for I am past the hopes

Of being heard—but for this innocent—

And then I never will disturb you more.

C. Bald. I almost pity the unhappy child:

But, being yours—

Isa. Look on him as your son's;

And let this part in him answer for mine.

Oh! save, defend him, save him from the wrongs

That fall upon the poor!

C. Bald. It touches me—

And I will save him—But to keep him safe,

Never come near him more.

Isa. What! take him from me!

No, we must never part.

I live but in my child.

No, let me pray in vain, and beg my bread

From door to door, to feed his daily wants,

Rather than always lose him.

C. Bald. Then have your child, and feed him with your prayer.

Isa. Then Heaven have mercy on me!

[Exit, with Child.]

C. Bald. You rascal, slave, what do I keep you for?

How came this woman in?

Samp. Why, indeed, my lord, I did as good as tell her before, my thoughts upon the matter—

C. Bald. Did you so, Sir! Now then tell her mine;

Tell her I sent you to her.

Begone, go all together—I shall be glad to hear of you; but never, never, see me more—

[Drives them off.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The Street.

Enter VILLEROY and CARLOS, meeting.

Vil. My friend, I fear to ask—but Isabella—The lovely widow's tears, her orphan's cries, Thy father must feel for them—No, I read, I read their cold reception in thine eyes—Thou pitiest them—though Baldwin—but I spare him

For Carlos' sake; thou art no son of his. There needs not this to endear thee more to me.

Car. My Villeroi, the fatherless, the widow, Are terms not understood within these gates—You must forgive him; Sir, he thinks this woman is Biron's fate, that hurried him to death—I must not think on't, lest my friendship stagger. My friend's, my sister's, mutual advantage, Have reconcil'd my bosom to its task.

Vil. Advantage! think not I intend to raise An interest from Isabella's wrongs. Your father may have interested ends In her undoing, but my heart has none; Her happiness must be my interest, And that I would restore.

Car. Why, so I mean. These hardships, that my father lays upon her, I'm sorry for, and wish I could prevent; But he will have his way. Since there's no hope

From her prosperity, her change of fortune May alter the condition of her thoughts, And make for you.

Vil. She is above her fortune.

Car. Try her again. Women commonly love According to the circumstances they are in.

Vil. Common women may—

No: Though I live but in the hopes of her, And languish for th' enjoyment of those hopes, I'd rather pine in a consuming want Of what I wish, than have the blessing mine, From any reason but consenting love. Oh! let me never have it to remember, I could betray her coldly to comply: When a clear generous choice bestows her on me,

I know to value the unequal'd gift:

I would not have it but to value it.

Car. Take your own way; remember what I offer'd.

Vil. I understand it so.

I'll serve her for herself, without the thought Of a reward. [Exit.]

Car. Agree that point between you.

If you marry her any way, you do my business.

I know him.—What his generous soul intends

Ripsen my plots—I'll first to Isabella:—

I must keep up appearances with her too.

[Exit.]

SCENE II.—House.

ISABELLA and NURSE discovered. ISABELLA'S SON at play.

Isa. Sooner or later, all things pass away, And are no more. The beggar and the king, With equal steps, tread forward to their end: The reconciling grave Swallows distinction first, that made us foes; Then all alike lie down in peace together.

[Weeping]

Nurse. Good Madam, be comforted.

Isa. Do I deserve to be this outcast wretch; Abandon'd thus, and lost? But 'tis my lot, The will of Heaven, and I must not complain: I will not for myself: let me bear all The violence of your wrath; but spare my child Let not my sins be visited on him: They are; they must: a general ruin falls On every thing about me! thou art lost, Poor Nurse, by being near me.

Nurse. I can work, or beg, to do you service.

Isa. Could I forget

What I have been, I might the better bear What I am destin'd to. Wild hurrying thoughts Start every way from my distracted soul, To find out hope, and only meet despair. What answer have I?

Enter SAMPSON.

Samp. Why, truly, very little to the purpose like a Jew as he is, he says you have had more already than the jewels are worth: he wishes you would rather think of redeeming 'em, than expect any more money upon 'em. [Exit.]

Isa. So:—Poverty at home, and debts abroad! My present fortune bad; my hopes yet worse! What will become of me?

This ring is all I have left of value now; 'Twas given me by my husband; his first gift Upon our marriage: I've always kept it With my best care, the treasure next my life: And now but part with it to support life, Which only can be dearer. Take it, Nurse, Take care of it:

Manage it as the last remaining friend That would relieve us. [Exit NURSE.] Heaven can only tell

Where we shall find another—My dear boy! The labour of his birth was lighter to me Than of my fondness now; my fears for him Are more than, in that hour of hovering death, They could be for myself.—He minds me not, His little sports have taken up his thoughts: Oh, may they never feel the pangs of mine! Thinking will make me mad: why must I think, When no thought brings me comfort?

Enter NURSE.

Nurse. Oh, Madam! you are utterly ruined and undone; your creditors of all kinds are come in upon you; they have mustered up a regiment of rogues, that are come to plunder your house, and seize upon all you have in the world: they are below. What will you do, Madam?

Isa. Do! nothing! no, for I am born to suffer

Enter CARLOS.

Car. Oh, sister! can I call you by that name. And be the son of this inhuman man, Inveterate to your ruin? Can you think Of any way that I can serve you in?

But what enrages most my sense of grief,
My sorrow for your wrongs, is, that my father,
Foreknowing well the storm that was to fall,
Has order'd me not to appear for you.

Isa. I thank your pity; my poor husband fell
For disobeying him; do not you stay
To venture his displeasure too for me.

Car. You must resolve on something—

Isa. Hark, they are coming: let the torrent roar:

It can but overwhelm me in its fall;
And life and death are both alike to me.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—*Anti-Chamber in ISABELLA'S
House.*

CARLOS and VILLEROY, with OFFICERS.

Vil. No farther violence—
The debt in all is but four thousand crowns:
Were it ten times the sum, I think you know
My fortune very well can answer it.

You have my word for this: I'll see you paid.

Off. That's as much as we can desire: so we have the money, no matter whence it comes.

Vil. To-morrow you shall have it.

Car. Thus far all's well—

Enter ISABELLA and NURSE, with the Child.

And now my sister comes to crown the work.

[Aside.]

Isa. Where are these ravening blood hounds, that pursue

In a full cry, gaping to swallow me?
I meet your rage, and come to be devour'd;
Say, which way are you to dispose of me;
To dungeons, darkness, death?

Car. Have patience.

Isa. Patience!

Off. You'll excuse us, we are but in our office.
Debts must be paid.

Isa. My death will pay you all.

[Distractedly.]

Off. While there is law to be had, people will nave their own.

Vil. 'Tis very fit they should; but pray be gone,

To-morrow certainly— [Exeunt OFFICERS.]

Isa. What of to-morrow?

Must I be reserv'd for fresh afflictions?

Vil. For long happiness of life, I hope.

Isa. There is no hope for me.

The load grows light, when we resolve to bear:
I'm ready for my trial.

Car. Pray, be calm.

And know your friends.

Isa. My friends? have I a friend?

Car. A faithful friend; in your extremest need,
Villeroiy came in to save you—

Isa. Save me! How?

Car. By satisfying all your creditors.

Isa. Which way? for what?

Vil. Let me be understood,

And then condemn me: you have given me leave
To be your friend; and in that only name

I now appear before you. I could wish

There had been no occasion of a friend,

Because I know you hate to be oblig'd;

And still more loath to be oblig'd by me.

Isa. 'Twas that I would avoid— [Aside.]

Vil. I'm most unhappy that my services

Can be suspected to design upon you;

I have no farther ends than to redeem you

From fortune's wrongs; to show myself at last,

What I have long profess'd to be, your friend:

Allow me that; and to convince you more,

That I intend only your interest,

Forgive what I have done, and in amends

(If that can make you any, that can please you)

I'll tear myself for ever from my hopes,

Stifle this flaming passion in my soul,

And mention my unlucky love no more.

Isa. This generosity will ruin me. [Aside.]

Vil. Nay, if the blessing of my looking on you

Disturbs your peace, I will do all I can

To keep away, and never see you more. [Going]

Car. You must not go.

Vil. Could Isabella speak

Those few short words, I should be rooted here,

And never move but upon her commands.

Car. Speak to him, sister; do not throw away

A fortune that invites you to be happy.

In your extremity he begs your love;

And has deserv'd it nobly. Think upon

Your lost condition, helpless and alone.

Though now you have a friend, the time must come

That you will want one; him you may secure

To be a friend, a father, a husband, to you.

Isa. A husband!

Car. You have discharg'd your duty to the dead,

And to the living! 'tis a wilfulness

Not to give way to your necessities,

That force you to this marriage.

Nurse. What must become of this poor innocence?

Car. He wants a father to protect his youth,

And rear him up to virtue: you must bear

The future blame, and answer to the world,

When you refuse the easy, honest means

Of taking care of him.

Isa. Do not think I need

Your reasons to confirm my gratitude;

I have a soul that's truly sensible

Of your great worth, and busy to contrive,

If possible, to make you a return. [To VILLEROY.]

Vil. Oh, easily possible!

Isa. It cannot be your way: my pleasures are Buried, and cold in my dead husband's grave;

And should I wrong the truth, myself, and you,

To say that I can ever love again?

I owe this declaration to myself:

But, as a proof that I owe all to you,

If, after what I have said, you can resolve

To think me worth your love—Where am I going?

You cannot think it; 'tis impossible.

Vil. Impossible!

Isa. You should not ask me now, nor should I grant;

I am so much oblig'd, that to consent,

Would want a name to recommend the gift:

'Twould show me poor, indebted, and compell'd.

Designing, mercenary: and I know

You would not wish to think I could be bought

Vil. Be bought! where is the price that can pretend

To bargain for you? Not in Fortune's power.

The joys of Heaven, and love, must be bestow'd,

They are not to be sold, and cannot be deserv'd.

Isa. Some other time I'll hear you on this subject.

Vil. Nay, then, there is no time so fit for me. Since you consent to hear me, hear me now; That you may grant: you are above

The little forms which circumscribe your sex; We differ but in time, let that be mine.

Isa. You think fit To get the better of me, and you shall; Since you will have it so—I will be yours.

Vil. I take you at your word.

Isa. I give you all, My hand; and would I had a heart to give: But, if it ever can return again, 'Tis wholly yours.

Vil. Oh, ecstasy of joy! Leave that to me. If all my services, If all that man can fondly say or do, Can beget love, love shall be born again. Oh, Carlos! now my friend and brother too: And, Nurse, I have eternal thanks for thee.

[Exit NURSE.

This night you must be mine. Let me command in this, and all my life Shall be devoted to you.

Isa. On your word, Never to press me to put off these weeds, Which best become these melancholy thoughts, You shall command me.

Vil. Witness, Heaven and earth! Against my soul, when I do any thing 'To give you a disquiet.

Car. I long to wish you joy.

Vil. You'll be a witness of my happiness?

Car. For once I'll be my sister's father, And give her to you.

Vil. Next my Isabella, Be near my heart: I am for ever yours.

[Exeunt.

ACT III.

SCENE I.—COUNT BALDWIN'S HOUSE.

Enter COUNT BALDWIN and CARLOS.

C. Bald. Married to Villeroy, say'st thou?

Car. Yes, my lord, Last night the priest perform'd his holy office, And made them one.

C. Bald. Misfortune join them! And may her violated vows pull down A lasting curse, a constancy of sorrow On both their heads.

Car. Soon he'll hate her: Though warm and violent in his raptures now, When all enjoyment palls his sicken'd sense, And reason with satiety returns, Her cold constrain'd acceptance of his hand Will gall his pride, which (though of late o'erpower'd

By stronger passions) will, as they grow weak, Rise in full force, and pour its vengeance on her.

C. Bald. Now, Carlos, take example to thy Let Biron's disobedience, and the curse [aid]; He took into his bosom, prove a warning, A monitor to thee, to keep thy duty Firm and unshaken.

Car. May those rankling wounds, Which Biron's disobedience gave my father, Be heal'd by me.

C. Bald. With tears, I thank thee, Carlos— And may'st thou ever feel those inward joys,

Thy duty gives thy father;—but, my son, We must not let resentment choke our justice; 'Tis fit that Villeroy know he has no claim From me, in right of Isabella.—Biron, (Whose name brings tears) when wedded to this woman,

By me abandon'd, sunk the little fortune His uncle left, in vanity and fondness: I am possess'd of those your brother's papers, Which now are Villeroy's, and, should aught remain,

In justice it is his; from me to him You shall convey them—follow me, and take them. [Exit C. BALDWIN.

Car. Yes, I will take them; but ere I part with them

I will be sure my interest will not suffer By these his high, refin'd fantastic notions Of equity and right.—What a paradox Is man! My father here, who boasts his honour, And even but now was warm in praise of justice, Can steel his heart against the widow's tears, And infant's wants: the widow and the infant Of Biron; of his son, his fav'rite son.

'Tis ever thus: weak ninds, who court opinion, And dead to virtuous feeling, hide their wants In pompous affectation.—Now to Villeroy— Ere this his friends, for he is much belov'd, Crowd to his house, and with their nuptial songs Awake the wedded pair: I'll join the throng, And in my face, at least, bear joy and friendship. [Exit.

SCENE II.—A Ball Room in VILLEROY'S House.

A band of music, with FRIENDS of VILLEROY.

Enter a SERVANT.

Friend. Where's your master, my good friend?

Ser. Within, Sir, Preparing for the welcome of his friends.

Friend. Acquaint him we are here; yet stay, The voice of music gently shall surprise him, And breathe our salutations to his ear. Strike up the strain to Villeroy's happiness, To Isabella's—But he's here already.

Enter VILLEROY.

Vil. My friends, let me embrace you:

Welcome all— What means this preparation?

[Seeing the music.

Friend. A slight token Of our best wishes for your growing happiness.— You must permit our friendship—

Vil. You oblige me—

Friend. But your lovely bride, That wonder of her sex, she must appear, And add new brightness to this happy morning.

Vil. She is not yet prepar'd; and let her will, My worthiest friend, determine her behaviour; To win, and not to force her disposition, Has been my seven years' task. She will, anon Speak welcome to you all. The music stays.

[VILLEROY and his friends seat themselves

EPITHALAMIUM.

Woman. Let all, let all be gay,
Begin the rapt'rous lay;
Let mirth, let mirth and joy,
Each happy hour employ,
Of this fair bridal day.

Man. *Ye love-wing'd hours, your flight,
Your downy flight, prepare;
Bring every soft delight
To sooth the brave and fair.*

*Hail, happy pair, thus in each other bless'd;
Be ever free from care, of every joy possess'd!*

Vil. I thank you for the proof of your affection:

I am so much transported with the thoughts
Of what I am, I know not what to do.
My Isabella!—but possessing her,
Who would not lose himself?—You'll pardon me—

Oh! there was nothing wanting to my soul
But the kind wishes of my loving friends—
Where's Carlos now?

Methinks I am but half myself without him.

Friend. This is wonderful! married, and yet in raptures.

Vil. Oh! when you all get wives, and such as mine,
(If such another woman can be found)
You will rave too, dote on the dear content,
And prattle in their praise out of all bounds.

Enter ISABELLA and Child.

My Isabella! Oh, the joy of my heart,
That I have leave at last to call you mine!
But let me look upon you, view you well.
This is a welcome gallantry, indeed!
I durst not ask, but it was kind to grant,
Just at this time; dispensing with your dress
Upon this second day, to greet our friends.

Isa. Black might be ominous;
I would not bring ill luck along with me.

Vil. Oh, if your melancholy thoughts could change [cures
With shifting of your dress—Time has done
Incredible this way, and may again.

Isa. I could have wish'd, if you had thought it fit,

Our marriage had not been so public.

Vil. Do not you grudge me my excess of love;
That was the cause it could not be conceal'd:
Besides, 'twould injure the opinion
I have of my good fortune, having you;
And lessen it in other people's thoughts.

Isa. I have no more to say.

Enter CARLOS.

Vil. My Carlos too, who came in to the support

Of our bad fortune, has an honest right,
In better times, to share the good with us.

Car. I come to claim that right, to share your joy;

To wish you joy; and find it in myself;
For a friend's happiness reflects a warmth,
A kindly comfort, into every heart
That is not envious.

Vil. He must be a friend indeed,
Who is not envious of a happiness
So absolute as mine; but if you are
(As I have reason to believe you are)
Concern'd for my well-being, there's the cause;
Thank her for what I am, and what must be.

[Music.

I see you mean a second entertainment.

My dearest Isabella, you must hear
The raptures of my friends; from thee they spring;

VOL. I. . . . 2 F

Thy virtues have diffus'd themselves around,
And made them all as happy as myself.

Isa. I feel their favours with a grateful heart,
And willingly comply.

DUET.

*Take the gifts the gods intend ye;
Grateful meet the proffer'd joy;
Truth and honour shall attend ye;
Charms, that ne'er can change or cloy.*

*Oh, the raptures of possessing,
Taking beauty to thy arms!
Oh, the joy, the lasting blessing,
When with virtue beauty charms!
Purer flames shall gently warm ye;
Love and honour both shall charm thee.*

Car. You'll take my advice another time, sister.

Vil. What have you done? A rising smile
Stole from her thoughts, just redd'ning on her
And you have dash'd it. [cheek,

Car. I'm sorry for't.

Vil. My friends, you will forgive me, when I own,
I must prefer her peace to all the world!

Come, Isabella, let us lead the way:

Within we'll speak our welcome to our friends,
And crown the happy festival with joy.

[Exeunt.

SCENE III.—A Room.

Enter SAMPSON and NURSE.

Samp. Ay, marry, Nurse, here's a master, indeed: He'll double our wages for us! If he comes on as fast with my lady as he does with his servants, we are all in the way to be well pleased.

Nurse. He's in a rare humour; if she be in as good a one—

Samp. If she be, marry, we may even say, they have begot it upon one another.

Nurse. Well; why don't you go back again to your old count? You thought your throat cut, I warrant you, to be turned out of a nobleman's service.

Samp. For the future, I will never serve in a house, where the master or mistress of it lie single: they are out of humour with every body when they are not pleased themselves. Now, this matrimony makes every thing go well.
There's mirth and money stirring about, when those matters go as they should do.

Nurse. Indeed, this matrimony, Sampson—

Samp. Ah, Nurse! this matrimony is a very good thing—but what, now my lady is married, I hope we shall have company come to the house: there's something always coming from one gentleman or other upon those occasions, if my lady loves company. This feasting looks well, Nurse. Odso, my master: we must not be seen.
[Exeunt.

Enter VILLEROY, with a letter, and ISABELLA.

Vil. I must away this moment—see his letter.
Sign'd by himself: alas! he could no more;
My brother's desperate, and cannot die
In peace, but in my arms.

Isa. So suddenly!

Vil. Suddenly taken, on the road to Brussels,
To do us honour, love; unfortunate!
Thus to be torn from thee, and all those charms,
Though cold to me and dead.

Isa. I'm sorry for the cause.

Vil. Oh! could I think,
Could I persuade myself, that your concern
For me, or for my absence, were the spring,
The fountain, of these melancholy thoughts,
My heart would dance, spite of the sad occasion,
And be a gay companion in my journey.

Enter CARLOS.

My good Carlos, why have you left my friends?

Car. They are departed home.

They saw some sudden melancholy news
Had stolen the lively colour from your cheek—
You had withdrawn, the bride, alarm'd, had follow'd:

More ceremony had been constraint; and this Good-natur'd rudeness—

Vil. Was the more obliging.

There, Carlos, is the cause. [Gives the letter.

Car. Unlucky accident! [ther—

Th' archbishop of Malines, your worthy bro-
With him to-night! Sister, will you permit it?

Vil. It must be so.

Isa. You hear it must be so.

Vil. Oh, that it must!

Car. To leave your bride so soon!

Vil. But, having the possession of my love,

I am the better able to support

My absence, in the hopes of my return.

Car. Your stay will be but short?

Vil. It will seem long!

The longer that my Isabella sighs:

I shall be jealous of this rival grief,

It takes so full possession of thy heart,

There is not room enough for mighty love.

[Enter Servant, boys, and exit.

My horses wait: farewell, my love! You, Carlos,

Will act a brother's part, till I return,

And be the guardian here. All, all I have,

That's dear to me, I give up to your care.

Car. And I receive her as a friend and brother.

Vil. Nay, stir not, love! for the night air is cold,

And the dews fall—Here be our end of parting;
Carlos will see me to my horse.

[Exit with CARLOS.

Isa. Oh, may thy brother better all thy hopes!
Adieu.

A sudden melancholy bakes my blood!

Forgive me, Villeroy—I do not find

That cheerful gratitude thy service asks:

Yet, if I know my heart, and sure I do,

'Tis not averse from honest obligation.

I'll to my chamber, and to bed: my mind,

My harass'd mind is weary. [Exit.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—The Street.

Enter BIRON and BELFORD.

Bir. The longest day will have an end; we are got home at last

Bel. We have got our legs at liberty; and liberty is home, where'er we go; though mine lies most in England.

Bir. Pray let me call this yours: for what I can command in Brussels, you shall find your own.
I have a father here who, perhaps, after seven years' absence, and costing him nothing in my travels, may be glad to see me. You know my story—How does my disguise become me?

Bel. Just as you would have it; 'tis natural, and will conceal you.

Bir. To-morrow you shall be sure to find me here, as early as you please. This is the house, you have observed the street.

Bel. I warrant you: your directions will carry me to my lodgings. [Exit.

Bir. Good night, my friend.

The long expected moment is arriv'd!

And if all here is well, my past sorrows

Will only heighten my excess of joy;

And nothing will remain to wish or hope for!

[Knocks.

Enter SAMPSON.

Samp. Who's there? What would you have?

Bir. Is your lady at home, friend?

Samp. Why, truly, friend, 'tis my employment to answer impertinent questions: but, for my lady's being at home, or no, that's just as my lady pleases.

Bir. But how shall I know whether it pleases her or no?

Samp. Why, if you'll take my word for it, you may carry your errand back again; she never pleases to see any body at this time of night, that she does not know; and by your dress and appearance, I am sure, you must be a stranger to her.

Bir. But I have business; and you don't know how that may please her.

Samp. Nay, if you have business, she is the best judge whether your business will please her or no: therefore I will proceed in my office, and know of my lady whether or no she is pleased to be at home or no— [Going.

Enter NURSE.

Nurse. Who's that you are so busy withal?
Methinks you might have found an answer in fewer words; but, Sampson, you love to hear yourself prate sometimes, as well as your betters, that I must say for you. Let me come to him.
Who would you speak with, stranger?

Bir. With you, mistress, if you could help me to speak to your lady.

Nurse. Yes, Sir, I can help you in a civil way;
but can nobody do your business but my lady?

Bir. Not so well; but, if you carry her this ring, she'll know my business better.

Nurse. There's no love-letter in it, I hope.
You look like a civil gentleman. In an honest way, I may bring you an answer. [Exit.

Bir. My old nurse, only a little older! They say the tongue grows always: mercy on me! then hers is seven years longer, since I left her. Yet there is something in these servants' folly pleases me: the cautious conduct of the family appears, and speaks in their impertinence. Well, mistress—

NURSE returns.

Nurse. I have delivered your ring, Sir; pray
Heaven, you bring no bad news along with you!

Bir. Quite contrary, I hope.

Nurse. Nay, I hope so too; but my lady was very much surprised when I gave it her. Sir, I am but a servant, as a body may say; but if you'll walk in, that I may shut the doors, for we keep very orderly hours, I can show you into the parlour, and help you to an answer, perhaps, as soon as those that are wiser. [Exit.

Bir. I'll follow you—
Now all my spirits hurry to my heart,
And every sense has taken the alarm
At this approaching interview;
Heavens! how I tremble!

SCENE II.—A Chamber.

Enter ISABELLA.

Isa. I've heard of witches, magic spells, and charms,
That have made nature start from her old course:
The sun has been eclips'd, the moon brought down
From her career, still paler, and subdu'd
To the abuses of this under world;
Now I believe all possible. This ring,
This little ring, with necromantic force,
Has rais'd the ghost of pleasure to my fears,
Conjur'd the sense of honour and of love
Into such shapes, they fright me from myself;
I dare not think of them—

Enter NURSE.

Nurse. Madam, the gentleman's below.
Isa. I had forgot, pray let me speak with him.

[Exit NURSE.]

This ring was the first present of my love
To Biron, my first husband: I must blush
To think I have a second. Biron died (Still to my loss) at Candy; there's my hope.
Oh, do I live to hope, that he died there?
It must be so; he's dead, and this ring left,
By his last breath, to some known faithful friend,
To bring me back again;
That's all I have to trust to—

Enter BIRON. [ISABELLA looking at him.]

My fears were woman's—I have view'd him
And let me, let me say it to myself, [all;
I live again, and rise but from his tomb.

Bir. Have you forgot me quite?Isa. Forgot you!Bir. Then farewell my disguise, and my misfortunes.

My Isabella!

[He goes to her; she shrieks, and faints.]Isa. Ha!Bir. Oh! come again!

Thy Biron summons thee to life and love;
Thy once lov'd, ever loving husband calls—
Thy Biron speaks to thee.

Isa. My husband! Biron!

Bir. Excess of love and joy, for my return,
Has overpower'd her—I was to blame
To take thy sex's softness unprepared:
But sinking thus, thus dying in my arms,
This ecstasy has made my welcome more
Than words could say.

Isa. Where have I been? Why do you keep him from me?

I know his voice: my life, upon the wing,
Hears the soft lute that brings me back again;
'Tis he himself, my Biron!

If I must fall, death's welcome in these arms.

Bir. Live ever in these arms.

Isa. But pardon me,
Excuse the wild disorder of my soul;
The joy, the strange surprising joy, of seeing you,
Of seeing you again, distracted me—
What hand of Providence has brought you back
To your own home again?

O, tell me all,

For every thought confounds me.

Bir. My best life! at leisure, all.Isa. We thought you dead; kill'd at the siege of Candy.

Bir. There I fell among the dead;
But hopes of life reviving, from my wounds,
I was preserv'd, but to be made a slave;
I often writ to my hard father, but never had
An answer; I writ to thee too—

Isa. What a world of wo

Had been prevented but in hearing from you!

Bir. Alas! thou couldst not help me.Isa. You do not know how much I could have done;

At least, I'm sure I could have suffer'd all;

I would have sold myself to slavery,

Without redemption; given up my child;

The dearest part of me to basest wants—

Bir. My little boy!Isa. My life! but to have heard

You were alive—

Bir. No more, my love; complaining of the past,

We lose the present joy. 'Tis over price

Of all my pains, that thus we meet again;

I have a thousand things to say to thee—

Isa. Would I were past the hearing! [Aside.]Bir. How does my child, my boy, my father too?

I hear he's living still.

Isa. Well, both; both well;

And may he prove a father to your hopes,

Though we have found him none.

Bir. Come, no more tears.Isa. Seven long years of sorrow for your loss
Have mourn'd with me—Bir. And all my days behind

Shall be employ'd in a kind recompense

For thy afflictions—Can't I see my boy?

Isa. He's gone to-bed; I'll have him brought to-morrow.Bir. To-morrow I shall see him; I want rest Myself, after this weary pilgrimage.Isa. Alas! what shall I get for you?Bir. Nothing but rest, my love! To-night I would not

Be known, if possible, to your family:

I see my nurse is with you; her welcome

Would be tedious at this time;

To-morrow will do better.

Isa. I'll dispose of her, and order every thing
As you would have it. [Exit.]Bir. Grant me but life, good Heaven! and give the meansTo make this wondrous goodness some amends;
And let me then forget her, if I can!

O! she deserves of me much more than I

Can lose for her, though I again could venture

A father, and his fortune, for her love!

You wretched fathers, blind as fortune all!

Not to perceive, that such a woman's worth

Weighs down the portions you provide your sons.

What is your trash, what all your heaps of gold,

Compar'd to this, my heart-felt happiness?—

What has she, in my absence, undergone?

I must not think of that; it drives me back

Upon myself, the fatal cause of all.

Enter ISABELLA.

Isa. I have obey'd your pleasure;
Every thing is ready for you.

Bir. I can want nothing here : possessing thee,
All my desires are carried to their aim
Of happiness : there 's no room for a wish,
But to continue still this blessing to me :
I know the way, my love. I shall sleep sound.

Isa. Shall I attend you ?

Bir. By no means :

I've been so long a slave to others' pride,
To learn, at least, to wait upon myself ;
You'll make haste after—

Isa. I'll but say my prayers, and follow you—

[Exit BIRON.]

My prayers ! no, I must never pray again.
Prayers have their blessings, to reward our hopes ;
But I have nothing left to hope for more.
Oh, Biron, hadst thou come but one day sooner !

[Weeping.]

—What 's to be done—for something must be done.

Two husbands ! yet not one ! married to both,
And yet a wife to neither ! Hold, my brain—
Ha ! a lucky thought

Works the right way to rid me of them all ;
All the reproaches, infamies, and scorns,
That every tongue and finger will find for me.
Let the just horror of my apprehensions
But keep me warn—no matter what can come.
'Tis but a blow—yet will I see him first—
Have a last look, to heighten my despair,
And then to rest for ever.—

BIRON meets her.

Bir. Despair and rest for ever ! Isabella !
These words are far from thy condition ;
And be they ever so. I heard thy voice,
And could not bear thy absence ; come, my love !
You have stay'd long, there 's nothing, nothing
sure,

Now to despair of in succeeding fate.

Isa. I am contented to be miserable,
But not this way : I've been too long abus'd,
And can believe no more.

Let me sleep on, to be deceiv'd no more.

Bir. Look up, my love, I never did deceive
thee,

Nor ever can ; believe thyself, thy eyes
That first inflam'd and lit me to my love,
Those stars, that still must guide me to my joys.

Isa. And me to thy undoing : I look round,
And find no path but leading to the grave.

Bir. I cannot understand thee.

Isa. If marriages

Are made in Heaven, they should be happier :
Why was I made this wretch ?

Bir. Has marriage made thee wretched ?

Isa. Miserable, beyond the reach of comfort.

Bir. Do I live to hear thee say so ?

Isa. Why, what did I say ?

Bir. That I have made thee miserable.

Isa. No ; you are my only earthly happiness :
And my false tongue belied my honest heart,
If it said otherwise.

Bir. And yet you said,
Your marriage made you miserable.

Isa. I know not what I said :

I've said too much, unless I could speak all.

Bir. Thy words are wild ; my eyes, my ears,
my heart,

Were all so full of thee, so much employ'd
In wonder of thy charms, I could not find it ;
Now I perceive it plain—

Isa. You'll tell no body—

Bir. Thou art not well.

Isa. Indeed I am not ; I knew that before ;
But where 's the remedy ?

Bir. Rest will relieve thy cares : come, come
no more ;

I'll banish sorrow from thee.

Isa. Banish first the cause.

Bir. Heaven knows how willingly.

Isa. You are the only cause.

Bir. Am I the cause ? the cause of thy misfortunes ?

Isa. The fatal innocent cause of all my woes.

Bir. Is this my welcome home ! This the reward

Of all my miseries, long labours, pains,
And pining wants of wretched slavery,
Which I've outliv'd, only in hopes of thee ?
Am I thus paid at last for deathless love,
And call'd the cause of thy misfortune now ?

Isa. Inquire no more ; 'twill be explain'd too soon. [Going off.]

Bir. What ! canst thou leave me too ?

Isa. Pray let me go :

For both our sakes, permit me—

Bir. Rack me not with imaginations
Of things impossible—Thou canst not mean What thou hast said—Yet something she must mean.

—'Twas madness all—Compose thyself, my love ;
The fit is past ; all may be well again :
Let us to bed.

Isa. To bed ! You've rais'd the storm

Will sever us for ever.

The rugged hand of fate has got between
Our meeting hearts, and thrusts them from their joys.

Bir. Nothing shall ever part us.

Isa. Oh ! there 's a fatal story to be told ;
Be deaf to that, as Heaven has been to me !
When thou shalt hear how much thou hast been wrong'd,

How wilt thou curse thy fond believing heart,
Tear me from the warm bosom of thy love,
And throw me like a poisonous weed away !
When I am dead, forgive and pity me. [Exit.]

Bir. What can she mean ? These doubtings will distract me :

Some hidden mischief soon will burst to light ;

I cannot bear it—I must be satisfied—

'Tis she, my wife, must clear this darkness to me.

She shall—if the sad tale at last must come !

She is my fate, and best can speak my doom.

[Exit.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Chamber.

Enter BIRON and NURSE.

Bir. I know enough : th' important question
Of life or death, fearful to be resolv'd,
Is clear'd to me : I see where it must end :
And need inquire no more—Pray let me have Pen, ink, and paper ; I must write a while,
And then I'll try to rest—to rest for ever !

[Exit NURSE.]

Poor Isabella ! now I know the cause,
The cause of thy distress, and cannot wonder
That it has turn'd thy brain. If I look back Upon thy loss, it will distract me too.
Oh, any curse but this might be remov'd !
But 'twas the rancorous malignity
Of all ill stars combin'd, of Heaven and fate—

Hold, hold my impious tongue—Alas! I rave:
 Why do I tax the stars, or Heaven, or fate?
 My father and my brother are my fates,
 That drive me to my ruin. They knew well
 I was alive. Too well they knew how dear
 My Isabella—Oh! my wife no more!
 How dear her love was to me—Yet they stood,
 With a malicious silent joy, stood by,
 And saw her give up all my happiness,
 The treasure of her beauty, to another;
 Stood by, and saw her married to another:
 Oh, cruel father, and unnatural brother!
 I have but to accuse you of my wrongs,
 And then to fall forgotten—Sleep or death
 Sits heavy on me, and benumbs my pains:
 Either is welcome; but the hand of death
 Works always sure, and best can close my eyes.

[Exit BIRON.]

Enter NURSE and SAMPSON.

Nurse. Here's strange things towards Sampson: what will be the end of 'em, do you think?

Samp. Nay, marry, Nurse, I can't see so far; but the law, I believe, is on Biron, the first husband's side.

Nurse. Yes; no question, he has the law on his side.

Samp. For I have heard, the law says, a woman must be a widow, all out seven years, before she can marry again, according to law.

Nurse. Ay, so it does; and our lady has not been a widow altogether seven years.

Samp. Why, then, Nurse, mark my words, and say I told you so: the man must have his wife again, and all will do well.

Nurse. But if our master, Villeroy, comes back again—

Samp. Why, if he does, he is not the first man that has had his wife taken from him.

Nurse. For fear of the worst, will you go to the old Count, desire him to come as soon as he can; there may be mischief, and he is able to prevent it.

Samp. Now you say something; now I take you, Nurse; that will do well, indeed; mischief should be prevented; a little thing will make a quarrel, when there's a woman in the way. I'll about it instantly.—

[Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Chamber.

BIRON asleep on a Couch.

Enter ISABELLA.

Isa. Asleep so soon! Oh, happy, happy thou,
 Who thus can sleep! I never shall sleep more—
 If then to sleep be to be happy, he,
 Who sleeps the longest, is the happiest;
 Death is the longest sleep—Oh, have a care!
 Mischiefs will thrive apace. Never wake more.

[To BIRON.]

If ever thou didst love thy Isabel,
 To-morrow must be the doomsday to thy peace.
 —The sight of him disarms even death itself,
 And pleasure grows again
 With looking on him—Let me look my last—
 But is a look enough for parting love?
 Sure I may take a kiss—Where am I going?
 Help, help me, Villeroy!—Mountains and seas
 Divide your love, never to meet my shame.
 Hark!

What noise was that! A knocking at the gate!
 It may be Villeroy—no matter who.

20

Bir. Come, Isabella, come.—

Isa. Hark! I'm call'd!

Bir. You stay too long from me.

Isa. A man's voice! in my bed! How came he there?

Nothing but villainy in this bad world.
 Here's physic for your fever.

[Going a dagger, and goes backward to the couch.]

If husbands go to heaven,
 Where do they go that send them?—This to thy—

[Going to stab him, he rises, she shrieks.]

What do I see!

Bir. Isabella, arm'd!

Isa. Against my husband's life!

Bir. Thou didst not think it?

Isa. I cannot bear his sight; distraction, come,
 Possess me all.

Shake off my chains, and hasten to my aid—

Thou art my only cure— [Running out.]

Bir. Poor Isabella, she's not in a condition

To give me any comfort, if she could;

Lost to herself—as quickly I shall be

To all the world—Horrors come fast around me;

My mind is overcast—the gath'ring clouds

Darken the prospect—I approach the brink,

And soon must leap the precipice! Oh! Heaven!

[Kneels.]

While yet my senses are my own, thus, kneeling,
 Let me implore thy mercies on my wife:

Release her from her pangs; and if my reason,

O'erwhelm'd with miseries, sink before the tempest

Pardon those crimes despair may bring upon me.

[Rises]

Enter NURSE.

Nurse. Sir, there's somebody at the door must needs speak with you; he won't tell his name.

Bir. I come to him. [Exit Nurse]

'Tis Belford, I suppose; he little knows

Of what has happen'd here; I wanted him,

Must employ his friendship, and then— [Exit.]

SCENE III.—The Street.

Enter CARLOS, PEDRO, and three Ruffians.

Car. A younger brother! I was one too long

Not to prevent my being so again.

We must be sudden. Younger brothers are

But lawful bastards of another name,

Thrust out of their nobility of birth

And family, tainted into trades.

Shall I be one of them?—Bow, and retire,

To make more room for the unwieldy heir

To play the fool in? No—

But how shall I prevent it?—Biron comes

To take possession of my father's love—

'Would that were all! there is a birth-right too

That he will seize. Besides, if Biron lives,

He will unfold some practices, which I Cannot well answer—therefore he shall die;

This night must be disposed of: I have means

That will not fail my purpose.—Here he comes.

Enter BIRON.

Bir. Ha! am I beset? I live but to revenge me.

[They surround him, fighting: VILLEROY enters with two Servants; they rescue him; CARLOS and his party fly.]

Vil. How are you, Sir? Mortally hurt, I fear
 Take care and lead him in.

Bir. I thank you for this goodness, Sir; though 'tis Bestow'd upon a very wretch; and death, Though from a villain's hand, had been to me An act of kindness, and the height of mercy— But I thank you, Sir. [He is led in.]

SCENE IV.—A Chamber.

Enter ISABELLA.

Isa. Murder my husband! Oh! I must not dare
To think of living on; my desperate hand,
In a mad rage, may offer it again;
Stab me any where but there. Here's room
In my own breast, to act the fury in, [enough
The proper scene of mischief.

[Going to stab herself; VILLEROY runs in and prevents her, by taking the dagger from her.]

Vil. Angels defend and save thee!
Attempt thy precious life!
Lay violent hands upon thy innocent self!
Isa. Swear I am innocent, and I'll believe you.
What would you have with me? Pray, let me go.
—Are you there, Sir? You are the very man
Have done all this.—You would have made
Me believe you married me; but the fool
Was wiser.

Vil. Dost thou not know me, love?
'Tis Villeroy, thy husband.
Isa. I have none; no husband— [Weeping.]
Never had but one, and he died at Candy.
Speak, did he not die there?

Vil. He did, my life.
Isa. But swear it, quickly swear,

Enter BIRON, bloody, leaning upon his sword.

Before that screaming evidence appears,
In bloody proof against me—
[She, seeing BIRON, swoons; VILLEROY helps her.]

Vil. Help there! Nurse, where are you?
Ha! I am distracted too! [Sees BIRON.]
Biron alive?

Bir. The only wretch on earth that must not live.

Vil. Biron or Villeroy must not, that's decreed.
Bir. You've sav'd me from the hands of murderers: [plague—]

'Would you had not, for life's my greatest
And then, of all the world, you are the man
I would not be oblig'd to—Isabella!
I came to fall before thee: I had died
Happy, not to have found your Villeroy here:
A long farewell, and a last parting kiss.

[Kisses her.]
Vil. A kiss! confusion! it must be your last.

Bir. I know it must—Here I give up that death

You but delay'd: since what is past has been
The work of fate, thus we must finish it.
Thrust home, be sure. [Falls.]

Vil. Alas! he faints! some help there.

Bir. 'Tis all in vain, my sorrows soon will end—

Oh, Villeroy! let a dying wretch intreat you
To take this letter to my father. My Isabella!
Couldst thou but hear me, my last words should bless thee.

I cannot, though in death, bequeath her to thee.
[To VILLEROY.]

But could I hope my boy, my little one,
Might find a father in thee—Oh, I faint—
I can no more—Hear me, Heaven! Oh! support
My wife, my Isabella—Bless my child!
And take a poor unhappy— [Dies.]

Vil. He's gone—Let what will be the consequence,
I'll give it him. I have involv'd myself,
And would be clear'd; that must be thought on now.

My care of her is lost in wild amaze. [Exit.]
Isa. [Recovering.] Where have I been?—
Methinks, I stand upon

The brink of life,
But, still detain'd, I cannot pass the strait;
Denied to live, and yet I must not die:
Doom'd to come back, like a complaining ghost,
To my unburied body.—Here it lies—

[Throws herself by BIRON's body.]
My body, soul, and life! A little dust!
To cover our cold limbs in the dark grave—
There, there, we shall sleep safe and sound together.

Enter VILLEROY, with Servants.

Vil. Poor wretch! upon the ground! She's not herself!
Remove her from the body.

[Servants going to raise her.]

Isa. Never, never—
You have divorc'd us once, but shall no more—
Help, help me, Biron!—Ha!—bloody and dead!
Oh, murder! murder! you have done this deed—
Vengeance and murder!—bury us together—
Do any thing but part us.

Vil. Gently, gently raise her.
She must be forc'd away. [They carry her off.]

Isa. Oh! they tear me! Cut off my hands—
Let me leave something with him—
They'll clasp him fast—

Oh, cruel, cruel men! [Nurse follows her.]
Vil. Send for all helps: all, all that I am worth,
Shall cheaply buy her peace of mind again.

[To a Servant.]
The storm grows loud— [Knocking at the door]
I am prepar'd for it. Now let them in.

Enter COUNT BALDWIN, CARLOS, BELFORD, EGMONT, with Servants.

C. Bald. O, do I live to this unhappy day!
Where is my wretched son?

Car. Where is my brother?

[They see him, and gather about the body.]

Vil. I hope, in heaven.
Car. Canst thou pity him!
Wish him in heaven, when thou hast done a deed
That must for ever cut thee from the hopes
Of ever coming there?

Vil. I do not blame you—
You have a brother's right to be concern'd
For his untimely death.

Car. Untimely death, indeed!

Vil. But yet you must not say I was the cause

Car. Not you the cause! Why, who should murder him?

We do not ask you to accuse yourself;
But I must say, that you have murder'd him;
And will say nothing else, till justice draws
Upon our side, at the loud call of blood,
To execute so foul a murderer.

Bel. Poor Biron! is this thy welcome home?

Egm. Rise, Sir; there is a comfort in revenge,
Which is left you. [To C. BALDWIN]

Car. Take the body hence. [BIRON is carried off.]

C. Bald. What could provoke you?

Vil. Nothing could provoke me
To a base murder, which, I find, you think
Me guilty of. I know my innocence;
My servants too can witness that I drew
My sword in his defence, to rescue him.

Bel. Let the servants be called.

Egm. Let's hear what they can say.

Car. What they can say! why, what should servants say!

They are his accomplices, his instruments,
And will not charge themselves.

No, no, he came

Unseasonably, (that was all his crime)

Unluckily, to interrupt your sport:

You were new married—married to his wife;

And therefore you, and she, and all of you,

(For all of you I must believe concern'd)

Combin'd to murder him out of the way.

Bel. If it be so—

Car. It can be only so.

Egm. Indeed it has a face—

Car. As black as hell.

C. Bald. The law will do me justice: send for the magistrate.

Car. I'll go myself for him— [Exit.]

Vil. These strong presumptions I must own,

Are violent against me; but I have [indeed,

A witness, and on this side heaven too.

—Open that door.

[Door opens, and PEDRO is brought forward by VILLEROY'S Servants.]

Here's one can tell you all.

Ped. All, all; save me but from the rack, I'll confess all.

Vil. You and your accomplices design'd
To murder Biron?—Speak.

Ped. We did.

Vil. Did you engage upon your private wrongs,
Or were employ'd?

Ped. He never did us wrong.

Vil. You were set on then?

Ped. We were set on.

Vil. What do you know of me?

Ped. Nothing, nothing:

You sav'd his life, and have discover'd me.

Vil. He has acquitted me.

If you would be resolv'd of any thing,

He stands upon his answer.

Bel. Who set you on to act this horrid deed?

C. Bald. I'll know the villain; give me quick his name,

Or I will tear it from thy bleeding heart.

Ped. I will confess.

C. Bald. Do then.

Ped. It was my master, Carlos, your own son.

C. Bald. Oh, monstrous! monstrous! most unnatural!

Bel. Did he employ you to murder his own brother?

Ped. He did; and he was with us when 'twas done.

C. Bald. If this be true, this horrid, horrid tale,
It is but just upon me; Biron's wrongs
Must be reveng'd; and I the cause of all!

Egm. What will you do with him?

C. Bald. Take him apart—

I know too much. [Exit PEDRO, guarded.]

Vil. I had forgot—your wretched, dying son,
Gave me this letter for you.

[Gives it to C. BALDWIN.]

I dare deliver it. It speaks of me,
I pray to have it read.

C. Bald. You know the hand?

Bel. I know 'tis Biron's hand.

C. Bald. Pray read it.

[BELFORD reads the Letter]

Sir,

I find I am come only to lay my death at your door. I am now going out of the world, but cannot forgive you, nor my brother Carlos, for not hindering my poor wife Isabella from marrying with Villeroy, when you both knew, from so many letters, that I was alive. BIRON.

Vil. How! Did you know it then?

C. Bald. Amazement all!

Enter CARLOS, with Officers.

Oh, Carlos! are you come? Your brother here,

Here, in a wretched letter, lays his death

To you and me.—Have you done any thing

To hasten his sad end?

Car. Bless me, Sir, I do any thing! who, I;

C. Bald. He talks of letters that were sent to us.

I never heard of any—Did you know

He was alive?

Car. Alive! Heaven knows, not I.

C. Bald. Had you news of him, from a report,

Or letter, never?

Car. Never, never, I.

Bel. That's strange, indeed: I know he often writ [To C. BALDWIN.]

To lay before you the condition

Of his hard slavery: and more I know,

That he had several answers to his letters.

He said, they came from you, you are his brother?

Car. Never from me.

Bel. That will appear.

The letters, I believe, are still about him;

For some of them I saw but yesterday.

C. Bald. What did those answers say?

Bel. I cannot speak to the particulars;

But I remember well, the sum of them

Was much the same, and all agreed,

That there was nothing to be hop'd from you:

That 'twas your barbarous resolution

To let him perish there.—

C. Bald. Oh, Carlos! Carlos! hadst thou been a brother—

Car. This is a plot upon me. I never knew

He was in slavery, or was alive,

Or heard of him, before this fatal hour.

Bel. There, Sir, I must confront you.

He sent you a letter, to my knowledge, last night;

And you sent him word you would come to him—

I fear you came too soon.

C. Bald. 'Tis all too plain.—

Bring out that wretch before him.

[PEDRO produced.]

Car. Ha! Pedro there!—Then I am caught,
indeed.

Bel. You start at sight of him;

He has confess'd the bloody deed.

Car. Well then, he has confess'd,

And I must answer it.

Bel. Is there no more?

Car. Why!—what would you have more? I know the worst,

And I expect it.

C. Bald. Why hast thou done all this?

Car. Why, that which damns most men has ruin'd me;

The making of my fortune. Biron stood
Between me and your favour; while he liv'd,
I had not that; hardly was thought a son,
And not at all akin to your estate.
I could not bear a younger brother's lot,
To live depending upon courtesy—
Had you provided for me like a father,
I had been still a brother.

C. Bald. 'Tis too true;
I never lov'd thee as I should have done;
It was my sin, and I am punish'd for't.
Oh! never may distinction rise again
In families: let parents be the same
To all their children; common in their care,
And in their love of them.—I am unhappy,
For loving one too well.

Vil. You knew your brother liv'd; why did you take Such pains to marry me to Isabella?

Car. I had my reasons for't—

Vil. More than I thought you had.

Car. But one was this—

I knew my brother lov'd his wife so well,
That, if he ever should come home again,
He could not long outlive the loss of her.

Bel. If you relied on that, why did you kill him?

Car. To make all sure. Now you are answer'd all.

Where must I go? I'm tired of your questions.

C. Bald. I leave the judge to tell thee what thou art;

A father cannot find a name for thee.

Take him away— [CARLOS is led off.]

Grant me, sweet Heaven! the patience to go through

The torment of my cure—Here, here begins

The operation.—Alas! she's mad.

Enter ISABELLA, distracted; and her Child running from her; Women following her.

Vil. My Isabella, poor unhappy wretch!

What can I say to her?

Isa. Nothing, nothing; 'tis a babbling world—
I'll hear no more on't. When does the court sit?
I have a cause to try.

Will you not hear it? Then I must appeal
To the bright throne—Call down the heavens
To witness how you use me. [powers]

C. Bald. Pray, give her way.

Isa. What have you done with him? He was here but now;

I saw him here. Oh, Biron, Biron! where,
Where have they hid thee from me? He is gone—

But here's a little flaming cherubim—

Child. Oh, save me, save me!

[Running to C. BALDWIN.]

I fear she'll kill me.

C. Bald. She will not hurt thee.

Isa. Will nothing do? I did not hope to find Justice on earth; 'tis not in heaven neither.

Biron has watch'd his opportunity—

Softly! he steals it from the sleeping gods,

And sends it thus— [Slabs herself.]

Now, now, I laugh at you, I defy you all,

You tyrant murderers!

Vil. Call, call for help—Oh, Heaven! this is too much.

C. Bald. Oh, thou most injur'd innocence! yet live,

Live but to witness for me to the world,

How much I do repent me of the wrongs,

Th'unnatural wrongs, which I have heap'd on thee.

And have pull'd down this judgment on us all.

Vil. Oh, speak, speak but a word of comfort to me!

C. Bald. If the most tender father's care and love

Of thee, and thy poor child, can make amends—

Oh, yet look up and live.

Isa. Where is that little wretch?

[They raise her.]

I die in peace, to leave him to your care.

I have a wretched mother's legacy,

A dying kiss—pray, let me give it him,

My blessing; that, that's all I have to leave thee.

Oh, may thy father's virtues live in thee,

And all his wrongs be buried in my grave!

[Exit]

Vil. She's gone, and all my joys of life with her.

[Exit.]

THE QUAKER:

A COMIC OPERA,

IN TWO ACTS.

BY CHARLES DIBDIN.

REMARKS.

THE characters and songs of this agreeable melange are natural, the fable is consistent, and the incidents well arranged. The music has been always admired.

Mr. Charles Dibdin was both author and composer of this, and a multitude of successful productions. Perhaps, no similar instance can be produced, wherein individual powers have so eminently contributed to the welfare and amusement of the British public; the army, the navy, the community in general, were highly indebted to this gentleman for those multifarious and excellent vocal compositions, calculated to promote love of our country and zeal to protect it. From the early age of seventeen, when our author composed his first opera, he was before the public in every branch of his profession: and for twenty years, he was the sole writer, composer, and performer of an entertainment, at his Sans Souci, which never failed in its influence over a delighted audience.

ACT I.

SCENE I.

An irregular Hill, carried quite to the back of the Stage, so situated, that LUBIN, who comes from it during the symphony of the Air, is sometimes seen and sometimes concealed by the Trees: a Cottage on one side near the front.

AIR.—LUBIN.

'Midst thrushes, blackbirds, nightingales,
Whose songs are echo'd from the vales,
Trudging along through thick and thin,
Thank fate, at last I've reach'd the door.
How pleas'd they'll be to let me in!
I've walk'd amain,

VOL. I. . . . 2 G 20*

And yet, ne'er leaving her before.

Hast'ning to see my love again,
I thought each furlong half a score.
They're long, methinks—

DUET.—CICELY and LUBIN.

Cic. [At the window.] Who's there, I trow?
Lub. Look out, good mother, don't you know?
'Tis Lubin. How does Gillian do?
And Hodge, and Margery, and Sue?
Cic. Not a whit better, Sir, for you.
Lub. Why, what's the matter? Why d'ye frown?
Cic. You shall know all, when I come down.
Lub. What is the meaning of all this?
Oh, here she comes.

233

Enter CICELY.

- Cic.* — Well, what 's amiss?
Who are you, making all this stir?
If to come in you mean,
You may as well be jogging, Sir,
While yet your boots are green.
- Lub.* I'm perfectly like one astound,
I know not, I declare,
Whether I'm walking on the ground,
Or flying in the air.
This usage is enough to quite Bereave one of one's wits.
- Cic.* Good-lack-a-day! and do you bite,
Pray, ever, in these fits?
- Lub.* But you are a jesting.
- Cic.* Think so still.
- Lub.* Where's Gillian?
- Cic.* She's not here:
She's gone abroad, Sir, she is ill;
She's dead, you cannot see her.
She knows you not, did never see
Your face in all her life:
In short, to-morrow she's to be Another person's wife.
- Lub.* Another person's wife?
- Cic.* Another person's wife.

I tell you we know nothing at all about you.

Lub. You don't! Why then may happen my name 'ent Lubin Blackthorn, and 'tis likely I did not set out six months ago to see my father down in the west, and ask his consent to my marriage with your daughter Gillian; and I warrant you I did not stay till my father died, to take possession of his farm and every thing that belonged to him; nay, you'll want to make me believe presently that I 'ent come now to settle affairs, and take her back into the country with me.

Cic. Don't make a fool of yourself, young man: get back to your farm, and graze your oxen. You won't get a lamb out of our fold, I promise you.

Lub. Well, but in sober sadness, you 'ent serious, are you?

Cic. Serious! Why don't I tell you, Gillian 's to be married to another to-morrow?

Lub. Where is she? I'll hear it from her own mouth.

Cic. I believe about this time she is trying on her wedding suit.

Lub. And who is this she is going to be married to? I'll see him, and know what he has done to deserve her more than I have.

Cic. Done to deserve her!

Lub. Yes, done to deserve her. You forget, I suppose, when I've carried her milk-pail for her, or taken her share of work in the hay-field, how you used to say, that I was a true lover indeed; but I don't desire to have any thing to say to you—you'll repent first.

Cic. Poor young man!

Lub. Nay, but don't you think you have used me very ill, now?

Cic. I thought you said you would not speak a word to me?

Lub. Nay, but dame Cicely—

Cic. Your servant. If you have a mind to be a bride-man, we shall be glad to see you. [Exit.]

Lub. A very pretty spot of work this! And so I have come a hundred-miles to make a fool of myself, and to be laughed at by the whole village.

I lock'd up all my treasure,
I journey'd many a mile,
And by my grief did measure
The passing time the while.

My business done and over,
I hasten'd back amain,
Like an expecting lover,
To view it once again.

But this delight was stifled,
As it began to dawn,
I found the casket rifled,
And all my treasure gone.

Enter EASY.

Lub. Here comes her father. I don't suppose he had much hand in it; for so he had his afternoon's nap in quiet, he was always for letting things go as they would. [Aside.] So, Master Easy, you have consented, I find, to marry your daughter to another, after promising me over and over that nobody should have her but me.

Easy. My wife desired me.

Lub. Your mind is strangely altered, farmer Easy. But do me one piece of justice, however—tell me who is it you intend for your son-in-law?

Easy. 'Tis a rich one, I assure you.

Lub. And so you have broke your word, and all for the lucre of gain. And, pray now, don't you expect to be hooted out of the village?

Easy. I can't say I do.

Lub. Then they're a vile pack of wretches, and I'll get away from them as soon as I can. Go on, go on—let me know all.

Easy. You are in a passion, child, so I don't regard what you say; but I think I should have been out of my wits to have refused Mr. Steady, the rich quaker.

Lub. What, is it he then?

Easy. It is.

Lub. What, he that you are steward to; he that does so much good all about; and he that gives a portion every May-day to a damsel, as a reward for her sweetheart's ingenuity?

Easy. The same—you have seen the nature of it—that villager who can boast of having done the most ingenious thing, claims a right to demand a farm, containing sixty acres, rent-free for seven years, and a hundred pounds to stock it, together with whatever maiden he chooses, provided he gains her consent: and it is a good custom; for the young men, who formerly used to vie with one another in the feats of strength, now, as I may say, vie with one another in feats of understanding.

Lub. And so he is to marry your daughter?

Easy. Things are as I tell you. And for that purpose he has taken Gillian into his own house, had her taught music, and, to say the truth, she is a different thing to what she was when you saw her last.

Lub. She is, indeed! for, when I saw her last, she told me that all the riches in the world should never make her forget me.

Easy. But since she has changed her mind; and it so falls out that to-morrow is May-day: you would do well to study some ingenious thing, and get this portion for a more deserving damsel.

Lub. No, farmer Easy; her using me ill is no reason why I should do any thing to make me angry with myself; I swore to love her for ever, and I'll keep my word, though I see she has broke hers.

Easy. Do what you please; I must be gone.

Lub. Nay, but tell me one thing—did Gillian herself consent to this?

Easy. You'll know all in good time. [Exit.]

Women are Wills-o'-the-wisp, 'tis plain,
The closer they seem still the more they retire;
They tease you, and jade you,
And round about lead you,
Without hopes of shelter,
Ding-dong, helter-skelter,
Through water and fire:

And when you believe every danger and pain
From your heart you may banish,
And you're near the possession of what you desire,
That instant they vanish, [sire,
And the devil a bit can you catch them again.

By some they're not badly compar'd to the sea,
Which is calm and tempestuous within the same hour;

Some say they are sirens, but take it from me,
They're a sweet race of angels, o'er man that have power,

His person, his heart, nay his reason to seize,
And lead the poor creature wherever they please.
[Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Room in STEADY'S House, with glass doors in the back.

Enter FLORETTA and GILLIAN.

Flor. Pooh, pooh, you must forget Lubin.

Gil. How can you talk so, Floretta? I won't though, and none of them shall make me: they all frightened me, by saying it was a bad thing not to obey my parents, and so I consented to marry this quaker-man; but there's a wide difference between marrying him and forgetting Lubin.

Flor. And so you would be silly enough to prefer being the homely wife of a clown, to rolling about in your own coach, having your own servants to wait on you, and in short leading the life of a fine lady?

Gil. Oh, Lord! I am sick with the thoughts of being a fine lady! But what's the reason, Flo-retta, that my friends want to make me so unhappy? I am sure I'd do any thing rather than vev them.

Flor. Why, you know that Mr. Steady's will is a law to us all; and as he had desired your friends to consent to this marriage, how could they refuse?

Gil. Well, but you know he is a very good-natured man; and I dare say if I was to tell him how disagreeable he is, and that I can't bear the sight of him, he'd let me marry Lubin.

Flor. Suppose you try.

Gil. So I will.

Flor. But how are you sure this Lubin you are so fond of, is as fond of you?

Gil. I've tried a thousand ways.

A kernel from an apple core,
One day on either cheek I wore;
Lubin was plac'd on my right cheek,
That on my left did Hodge bespeak:
Hodge in an instant dropp'd to ground,
Sure token that his love's unsound;
But Lubin nothing could remove,
Sure token his is constant love.

Last May I sought to find a snail,
That might my lover's name reveal;
Which finding, home I quickly sped,
And on the earth the embers spread:
When, if my letters I can tell,
I saw it mark a curious L.
Oh, may this omen lucky prove,
For L's for Lubin, and for love.

Enter STEADY.

Steady. Verily, thou rejoicest me to find thee singing, and in such spirits.

Gil. I was singing to be sure; but I cannot say much about being in spirits.

Steady. No! Why do not thy approaching nuptials lift up, and, as it were, exhilarate thee?

Flor. Lord, Sir! there's no persuading her;
nothing will get this Lubin out of her head.

Steady. And why, young maiden, wilt thou not listen unto me? Have I not, for thy pleasure, given in to all the vanities in which youth delights? I tell thee, that although my complexion be saturnine, my manners are not austere;
why, therefore, likest thou not me?

Gil. I should like you very well if you were my father, but I don't like you at all for a husband.

Steady. And wherefore, I pray thee?

Gil. Oh, there are reasons enough.

Steady. Which be they?

Gil. Why, in the first place, I should want you to change your clothes, and to have you as spruce
as I am.

Steady. Rather do thou change those thou wearest unto the likeness of mine. The dove regardeth not the gay plumage of the gaudy mackaw; and the painted rainbow delighteth our sight, but it vanishes away, yea, even as a vapour.
What more?

Gil. Why, in the next place, I should want you to change your age, and have you as young as I am.

Steady. She speaketh her mind, and I esteem her. [Aside.] Therefore, why then, since it is necessary unto my peace, that thou shouldst become bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh, and thou canst not fashion thy disposition unto the likeness of mine, I will make it my study to double thy pleasure, until that which is now gratitude, shall at last become love.

Gil. Ah! you'll never see that day, so you had better take no trouble about it.

Steady. Thou art mistaken; and when thou beholdest the gambols to-morrow on the green—

Gil. I shall long most monstrously to make one amongst them.

Steady. And so thou shalt. Goodness forbid that I should withhold from thee those pleasures that are innocent.

While the lads of the village shall merrily, ah!

Sound the tabors, I'll hand thee along,

And say unto thee, that verily, ah!

Thou and I will be first in the throng.

While the lads, &c.

Just then, when the swain who last year won the dower,

With his mates shall the sports have begun,

When the gay voice of gladness resounds from each bower,

And thou long'st in thy heart to make one.

While the lads, &c.

Those joys which are harmless, what mortal can blame?

'Tis my maxim that youth should be free;
And to prove that my words and my deeds are the same,
Believe me, thou'lt presently see.
While the lads, &c. [Exit.

Gil. What an unfortunate girl am I, Floretta!

Flor. What makes you think so?

Gil. Why, what would make you think so too, if you was in my place?

Flor. Well then, I own I do think so; and if you promise not to betray me, I'll stand your friend in this affair.

Gil. Will you? Oh, la! And what must be done, Floretta?

Flor. Why—but see yonder's a lover of mine: I'll make him of use to us.

Gil. Lord! what's Solomon your lover? I hate him with his proverbs and his formality. What the deuce do you intend to do with him?

Flor. What women generally do with their lovers, my dear, make a fool of him.—Mr. Solomon.

Enter SOLOMON.

Sol. I listened, when lo! thou caldest me; and as the voice of the shepherd is delightful unto the sheep in his fold, so even is thy voice delightful unto me.

Flor. There's a lover for you! Why, the spirit moves you, Mr. Solomon, to say abundance of fine things.

Sol. According unto the proverb, love maketh a wit of the fool.

Flor. Yes, and a fool of the wit. But do you love me?

Sol. When thou seest one of our speakers dancing a jig at a country wake; when thou beholdest the brethren take off their beavers, and bow their bodies, or hearest them swear, then believe I love thee not.

Flor. A very pompous speech, upon my word.

Sol. An ill phrase may come from a good heart: but all men cannot do all things; one getteth an estate by what another getteth a halter; a foolish man—

Flor. Talks just as you do now. But will you do a little favour I have to beg of you?

Sol. Slaves obey the will of them who command them.

Flor. There is a young man who has been used ill—

Sol. 'Tis very like; kind words are easier met with than good actions; charity seldom goeth out of the house, while ill nature is always rambling abroad.

Flor. His name is Lubin; and I want you to inquire him out, and appoint him to meet me to-morrow morning, very early, in the row of elms at the bottom of the garden.

Sol. But shall I not in this offend my master?

Gil. Never mind him; suppose if he should find us out, and scold us a little—

Sol. True—high words break no bones. But, wilt thou give me a smile if I do this for thee?

Gil. Ay, that she shall, Mr. Solomon, and I'll give you another.

Sol. But, wilt thou appoint the spousal day?

Flor. You are so hasty, Mr. Solomon—

Sol. And with reason; a man may catch cold while his coat is making. Shall it be to-morrow?

Flor. Must I promise?

Sol. Yea, and perform too; 'tis not plums only that maketh the pudding.

Flor. Well, well, we'll talk about it another time.

Sol. No time like the time present.

Flor. Nay now, but go, Solomon.

Sol. An egg to-day is better than a chicken to-morrow; many things happen between the cup and the lip.

Flor. Pray now, go.

Sol. Yea, I will. A bird in the hand is better than two in the bush. [Exit.

Gil. What a fright of a creature it is! How good you are, Floretta.

Flor. I could not bear to see you used in such a manner; and when I reflected on it, it went to my heart.

I said to myself, now, Floretta, says I,

Supposing the case was your own:

Would you not be the first every method to try,

To get rid of this canting old drone.

You well know you would, and you're worse than a Turk,

If one minute you hesitate whether

In justice you should not your wits set to work,

To bring Lubin and Gillian together.

To be certain, old Formal will frown and look blue,

Call you baggage, deceitful, bold face, [to,

With all manner of names he can lay his tongue

And perhaps turn you out of your place.

What of that? let him frown, let him spit all his spite,

Your heart still as light as a feather,

With truth shall assure you 'tis but doing right,

To bring Gillian and Lubin together. [Exit.

Gil. I wonder what they plague us poor girls so for? Fathers and mothers, in this case, are comical folks; they are for ever telling one what they'll do to please one; and yet, when they take it into their heads, they make nothing of desiring us to be miserable as long as one lives. I wish I could be dutiful and happy too. Maybe, Floretta will bring matters about for me to marry Lubin with their consent: if she does, Lord, how I shall love her!

The captive linnet, newly taken,

Vainly strives and vents its rage;

With struggling pants, by hopes forsaken,

And flutters in its golden cage:

But, once releas'd, to freedom soaring

Quickly on some neighbouring tree,

It sings, as if its thanks 'twere pouring,

To bless the hand that set it free. [Exit

SCENE III. A Wall at the back of STEADY'S Garden.

Enter LUBIN.

Lub. 'Tis all true, 'tis all true; there's not a soul in the whole village that has not had something to say to me about it. Some pity me, others laugh at me, and all blame me for making myself uneasy. I know, if I did as I ought to do, I should get me back, and think no more concerning of them: but, instead of that, here am I come creeping to the garden-gate, to see if I can get a sight of her. Who comes yonder? Oh, 'tis her father and the old quaker. I'll listen, and hear what they are talking about.

Enter STEADY and EASY.

Steady. Friend Easy, hie thee home to thy wife, tell her to hold herself ready for to-morrow; and say unto her, that when the youth who gains the customary dower, shall receive from me the hand of his bride, I will from thee receive the hand of thy daughter.

Lub. Why, I must be turned fool to hear all this, and not say a word.

Steady. Get thee gone, friend. [Exit EASY.]

Enter SOLOMON.

Where art thou going?

Sol. The truth is not to be spoken at all times. Into the village, about a little business for Mistress Floretta.

Steady. Verily, I do suspect thee to be in a plot against me. I will not have thee therefore to do this business: stay here by me.

FLORETTA and GILLIAN look over the Garden Wall.

Flor. I wonder whether Solomon is gone?

Gil. Oh, dear Floretta, as sure as you're alive, yonder's Lubin!

Flor. So there is. And see on the other side the old fellow talking to Solomon.

FINALE.

Steady. Regard the instructions, I say,
Which I am now giving thee.

Sol. Yea.

Steady. Speed by times to friend Easy, and bid him take care,
The minstrels, the feasting, and sports to prepare.

He must keep away Lubin too.

Lub. Can I bear this? [sently?]

Gil. Won't you call out to Solomon presently?

Flor. Yes.

Steady. And do thou attend with thy dobbins of beer,
And see that our neighbours and friends have good cheer;
Make the whole village welcome, and—

Flor. Solomon!

Steady. Stay.

Flor. You blockhead, come here.

Steady. Dost thou notice me?

Sol. Yea.

[Here as often as SOLOMON tries to speak to FLORETTA and GILLIAN, he is prevented by STEADY.]

Steady. Stand still then.

Flor. Friend Solomon!

Lub. Is it not she?

Flor. Mind the oaf.

Gil. Ha, ha, ha!

Lub. They're laughing at me.

Steady. See that garlands are ready.

Gil. & Flor. Ha, ha, ha!

Lub. Again.

Oh, Gillian! thou falsest of women, since when

Have I merited this?

Steady. So that when on the lawn—

Lub. But I'll speak to her.

Gil. Look, look, he sees us!

Steady. Be gone.

But, hark thee—

Lub. Oh, Gillian! how wicked thou art!
Thou hast fool'd me, betray'd me,
and broke my poor heart. [reigr,
But henceforth with safety in infamy
For I never, no, never, will see you again. [Exit]

Gil. He's gone! Now, Lord, Lord! I'm so mad I could cry!

Flor. Here, Solomon!

Steady. Go where I told thee.

Sol. I fly. [the way.]

Steady. Well, do then, and tarry no where by Flor. Quickly run after Lubin.

Gil. Do, Solomon.

Sol. Yea.

Steady. What, Gillian, art there?

Gil. Yes, I am!

Steady. Why dost sigh? [eth so nigh.]

When the hour of thy happiness wax-

Gil. Why, you know well enough.

Steady. Come, come, do not sorrow.

Gil. Go along! get away!

Steady. By yea and by nay,
Thy mind shall be easy, believe me,
to-morrow. [Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Garden.

Enter LUBIN.

Lub. What a plague have they brought me here for? I am in a rare humour—they'd better not provoke me—they would not have set eyes on me again, if it had not been that I want to see how she can look me in the face after all this.

Enter FLORETTA.

Flor. There he is.

Lub. She shall find that I am not to be persuaded into any thing.

Flor. We shall try.

Lub. And if her father and all of them were at this minute begging and praying me to marry her, they should see—

Flor. That you would consent to it with all your heart.

Lub. I'll just abuse her heartily; tell the quaker what an old fool he is; call her father and mother all to pieces for persuading her to marry him: then get me down to my farm, and be as careful to keep myself out of love, as I would to keep my wheat free from tares, a fox from my poultry, or the murrain from my cattle.

Flor. If I should make you alter your tone now!

Lub. I remember the time when 'twas who should love most: but what a fool am I to think of that now—No, no; she shall find I can forget her as easily as she can forget me.

Flor. That I firmly believe.

[Taps his shoulder.] How! Lubin sad! this is not What do ye sigh for? [common;]

Lub. A woman.

Flor. How fair is she who on your brow
Prints care?

Lub. Just such a toy as thou.

Flor. What has she done?

Lub. For ever lost my love. [move?]

Flor. That's sad, indeed! And can no prayers

Lub. None: 'tis too late, that folly is o'er;
My love's turn'd to hate, and I'll see her no more.

The time has been when all our boast
Was who should love the other most;
How did I count without my host!

I thought her mine for ever.
But now I know her all deceit;
Will tell her so whene'er we meet:
And was she sighing at my feet—

Flor. You wou'd forgive her:

Lub. Never.

Flor. Then I may e'en go back, I find:
To serve you, Sir, I was inclin'd;
But to your own advantage blind,
'T would be a vain endeavour.
'Tis certain she does all she can,
And we had form'd a charming plan
To take her from the quaker-man.

Lub. Nay, pr'ythee, tell it.

Flor. Never.

Enter GILLIAN.

Here she is; now let her speak for herself.

Gil. Oh, Lubin! why would you not hear me speak to you yesterday? I did not sleep a wink all night for thinking on't.

Lub. Why, had I not reason, Gillian, to be angry, when every one I met told me what a fool you had made of me?

Gil. Why, what could I do? Floretta here knows that I have done nothing but abuse old
Steady from morning till night about it.

Flor. Come, come, don't let us dispute about what's past, but make use of the present opportunity;
we have not a moment to lose. Get you to my master, make up a plausible story how ill you have been used by an old fellow, who has run away with your sweetheart; and tell him, that you come to complain to him, as you know 'tis a custom for every body to do when they are used ill.

Gil. What a rare girl you are, Floretta. But are you sure he won't know him?

Flor. No; I heard your father say he never saw him in all his life.

Lub. That's lucky; leave me alone for a plausible story. [Exit.]

Enter SOLOMON.

Flor. Here comes my formal messenger. Well,
Solomon, where's your master?

Sol. In the great hall, waiting your approach.

Gil. I am very much obliged to you, Mr. Solomon.

Sol. Words cost us nothing. If I have done thee service, thank me by deeds.

Gil. Oh, what you want me to coax Floretta to marry you?

Sol. I do.

Flor. Solomon has it very much in his power to make me love him.

Sol. How, I pray thee?

Flor. Why, I have said a hundred times, that I never would marry a man who had always a proverb in his mouth.

Gil. So you have, Floretta; I have heard
you.

Sol. And thou wouldst have me leave off mine
—a word to the wise—thou shalt hear them no
more.

Flor. Why that sounded something like one.

Sol. It must be done by degrees. Word by word great books are written.

Flor. Again!

Sol. I pray thee to pardon me; I shall soon ouer them: but Rome was not built in a day.

Flor. Oh! this making game of one.

Sol. I protest I meant no ill. I shall forget them,
I say. 'Tis a long lane that hath no turning.

Gil. Poor Solomon! He can't help it.

Flor. Have you any desire to marry me?

Sol. Ask the vintner if the wine be good.

Flor. Because I will have my way in this; and I think it very hard you won't strive to oblige me.

Sol. I protest, I strive all I can; but custom is second nature; and what is bred in the bone—
Verily, I had like to have displeas'd thee again.

Flor. Oh! what you found yourself out, did you? Then there's some hopes of amendment.

Sol. It shall be amended. A thing resolv'd upon is half done; and 'tis an old saying—but what have I to do with old sayings.

Flor. Very true.

Sol. But I must attend on the green.

Flor. Well, go; and by the time I see you next, take care that you get rid of all your musty old sayings. I wonder how so sensible a man as you could give in to such nonsense.

Sol. Evil communications corrupt good manners; and a dog—Pies on the dog! Well, thou shalt be obeyed, believe me—Pies on the dog!

[Exit.]

Gil. For goodness' sake, what excuse do you intend to make to him when he has left off his proverbs?

Flor. Why desire him to leave off something else; and at the rate of one in a month, he won't have parted with all his particularities in seven years.

Gil. Well, how we do use men in love with us, when we take it into our heads!

Flor. And yet they are fools to be used so by us. But I am sure you will never use Lubin ill—he will make you the happiest girl in the world.

AIR.*

The face which frequently displays
An index of the mind,
Dame Nature has her various ways
To stamp on human-kind.

Purs'd brows denote the purse-proud man,
Intent on some new scheme;
Clos'd eyes the politician,
For ever in a dream.

But features of ingenuous kind,
Which semblance bear of truth,
Display, methinks, in face and mind,
The portrait of this youth. [Exeunt]

SCENE II.—A Hall.

Enter STEADY and LUBIN.

Lub. Your servant, Sir.

Steady. Thine, friend.

Lub. I hope, Sir, you'll excuse my rudeness?

Steady. I don't perceive thee guilty of any.

Lub. May be not; but I made bold to ask, if I might not trouble your worship about a little affair concerning my being sadly used.

Steady. Speak freely.

Lub. Why, there's a covetous old hunk, an

* This air is omitted in representation.

like your worship, that, because he is rich, would fain take away a young woman that I was to be married to, without her consent or mine.

Steady. Has the old hunks, thou speakest of, the consent of her friends?

Lub. They have no consent to give, an please you.

Steady. And why, I pray thee?

Lub. Because, as I take it, if any body gives a thing, 'tis not theirs any longer: and they gave me their consent long ago.

Steady. Thou speakest the truth. But what wouldst thou have me do in this business?

Lub. Why please you, Sir, I have often heard it said of your worship, that there were three things you'd never suffer in our village if you could help it.—The maidens to go without sweet-hearts—the industrious without reward—and the injured without redress—and to be sure it made me think, that if you were once acquainted with the rights of this affair, you would not suffer it to go on; "For," says I, "set in case it was his worship's own concern, how would he like to have the young woman taken away from him, that he is going to marry?"

Steady. There thou saidst it.

Lub. Why yes, I thought that was bringing the case home.

Steady. Well, attend on the lawn; make thy claim known, and if the parties concerned are present, deliver to them what I now write thee for that purpose. [Goes to the Table.]

Lub. This is better and better still.—How they'll all be laughed at.—He little thinks he is signing his consent to part with Gillian.

Steady. Do thou direct it; thou knowest to whom it is to be given.

Lub. Yes, I am sure the person will be upon the lawn.

Steady. And fear not to tell him thy mind.

Lub. I sha'n't be sparing of that, I warrant you.

Steady. Urge thy ill usage.

Lub. Never fear me.

Steady. And tell him, that by endeavouring to prevent thy happiness, he hath done thee an injury he can never repair; for that riches are given us to comfort and not to distress those beneath us.

Lub. With respect, Sir, to you be it spoken,
So well do I like your advice,
He shall have it, and by the same token,
I don't much intend to be nice.

There's something so comical in it,
I ne'er was so tickled by half;
And was I to die the next minute,
I verily believe I should laugh.

Affairs happen better and better,
Your worship; but mind the old put,
When first he looks over the letter,
I say, what a figure he'll cut. [Exit.]

Enter GILLIAN and FLORETTA.

Flor. Yonder he goes—I wonder how he succeeded.

Steady. Come, Gillian, I was anxious to see thee—the time draweth near, and the sports will shortly begin upon the lawn.

Gil. I long to be there as much as you do.

Steady. I doubt it not.—And when thou seest thyself the queen of such a set of happy mortals, I know thou wilt consent that this shall be thy bridal-day.

Flor. Yes, Sir, if you'll consent to her having Lubin.

Gil. And I can tell you he's to be there.

Steady. Lubin, I'm sure, will not oppose what I decree.

Gil. I'm sure he won't part with me quietly.

Steady. Thou shalt see that he will not dare to murmur at my will and pleasure. But come, we are expected. Verily, I find myself exalted even to transport, in that I am going this day to make thee a bride.

In verity, damsel, thou surely will find,
That my manners are simple and plain;
That my words and my actions, my lips and
my mind,

By my own good-will never are twain.

I love thee—umph!

Would move thee—umph!

Of love to be partaker.

Relent then—umph!

Consent then—umph!

And take thy upright quaker.

Though vain I am not, nor of fopp'ry possess'd,
Wouldst thou yield to be wedded to me,
Thou shouldst find, gentle damsel, a heart in my breast

As joyful as joyful can be.

I love thee, &c. [Exit]

Gil. Why, I don't see but that I am as bad off as ever, Floretta.

Flor. I don't know what to make of it myself but however, if the worst comes to the worst, you must downright give them the slip, and run away.

Gil. 'Tis good, and so I will! Lubin has got enough for us both.

Re-enter LUBIN.

Lub. Gillian, I had just watched the old quaker out, and slipped back to tell you that every thing goes well. I have got his consent, under his hand, to marry the young woman.

Gil. And does he know 'tis me?

Lub. Not a bit; but you know he never forfeits his word, so that we have him safe enough. But don't let us be seen together. I am going to the lawn—we shall have fine sport, I warrant you. [Exit.]

Gil. Again I feel my bosom bound,
My heart sits lightly on its seat;
My cares are all in rapture drown'd,
In every pulse new pleasures beat.

Upon my troubled mind at last,
Kind fate has pour'd a friendly balm;
So, after dreadful perils past,
At length succeeds a smiling calm.

SCENE III.—A Lawn with a May-pole.

Enter STEADY, EASY, LUBIN, SOLOMON, GILLIAN, FLORETTA, CICELY, Country Lads and Lasses.

Steady. Friends and neighbours, it hath been my study, since I first came among you, to do whatever might procure me your love and esteem. I have instituted a custom, the salutary effects of which I view with great gladness; and each is well entitled to the reward he has received. I will now propose to you a question, to see which of you can make the most ready reply. What of all things in the world is the longest and the shortest, the swiftest and the slowest, the most precious, the most neglected, and without which nothing can be done?

1 Coun. The earth.

Steady. No.

2 Coun. Ah, I knew you would not guess it, Light, an please your worship.

Steady. Thou art as much mistaken as he, friend.

Lub. 'Tis my belief, 'tis time. Nothing can be longer, because it will last for ever—nothing can be shorter, because 'tis gone in a moment—nothing can go slower than it does, when one's away from her one loves, and nothing swifter when one's with her. 'Tis an old saying—

Sol. Friend, I hate old sayings.

Lub. 'Tis an old saying, that 'tis as precious as gold; and yet we are always throwing it away. And, your worship, as a proof that nothing can be done without it, if the old gentleman we were a talking about to-day, had not had the opportunity of my absence, he could not have run away with a certain young damsel.

Steady. Thou hast solved my question aright, and art indeed an ingenious youth. If thou goest on as thou hast begun, I foresee that thou wilt win the dower. Give me now your several claims, sealed up as usual, and go on with the sports while I peruse them.

[A dance.]

Steady. Hast thou nothing to give, young man?

[To LUBIN.]

Lub. Why, yes, please your worship, I have.

Steady. This is addressed unto me! Let me view the contents—How! my own hand! Thou expectest, I find, to receive this damsel for thy wife; and thy plot, which thou didst so artfully carry on, was contrived to make my neighbours laugh at me.

Lub. No, with respect to your worship, 'twas to keep them from laughing at you.

Steady. How is this?

Lub. Why, you know, you advised me to tell the old gentleman a piece of my mind.

Steady. Thou shalt see the revenge I will take upon thee for this. I will comply with the contents of this paper to the utmost. Here, read this aloud.

[To a COUNTRYMAN.]

Coun. [Reads.] "If the youth, Lubin,"—

Steady. Thou seest I knew thee then.

Lub. I am afraid I have been too cunning for myself.

Steady. You see, neighbours, how I am treated; and I request of you to be witness how much it behoveth us to resent such injuries. Go on.

Coun. [Reads.] "If the youth, Lubin, will faithfully love and cherish the maiden, called Gilian, and make her a good help-mate, I do freely give my consent to her becoming his wife, and request her friends to do the same."

Lub. How is this?

Steady. This is my revenge. By thy ingenuity thou hast won the dower; and by thy truth and integrity, my friendship.

Lub. Was ever the like?

Gil. I never could abide you before, but now I shall love you as long as I live.

Steady. Verily, my heart warmeth unto you both; your innocence and love are equally respectable. And would the voluptuous man taste a more exquisite sensation than the gratifying his passions, let him prevail upon himself to do a benevolent action.

Let nimble dancers beat the ground;

Let tabor, flagelet, and fife,

Be heard from every bower;

Let the can go round.

What 's the health?—Long life

To the donor of the dower. [Exeunt.]

ROSINA:

AN OPERA,

IN TWO ACTS.

BY MRS. BROOKE.

REMARKS.

This pleasing and well-arranged petite piece has been a constant favourite since its original performance at Covent Garden in 1783.—The dialogue is natural and easy, and the morality unexceptionable; the airs, compiled by Shield, are happily adapted; and a more agreeable or effective afterpiece can scarcely be named in the varied productions of our modern writers.

Mrs. Brooke, the amiable authoress, has thus explained her intentions, in her preface to the first edition:—

“The fable of this piece taken from the Book of Ruth, (a fable equally simple, moral, and interesting,) has already furnished a subject for the beautiful episode of Palemon and Lavinia, in Thomson’s Seasons, and a pleasing opera of Mons. Favart: of both I have availed myself as far as the difference of my plan would allow; but as we are not, however extraordinary it may appear, so easily satisfied with mere sentiments as our more sprightly neighbours, the French, I found it necessary to diversify the story, by adding the comic characters of William and Phebe, which I hoped might at once relieve and heighten the sentimental cast of the other personages of the drama.”

SCENE.—A Village in the North.

The scene opens and discovers a rural prospect: on the left side a little hill with trees at the top; a spring of water rushes from the side, and falls into a natural basin below: on the right side a cottage, at the door of which is a bench of stone. At a distance a chain of mountains. The manor-house in view. A field of corn fills up the scene. In the first act the sky clears by degrees, the morning vapour disperses, the sun rises, and at the end of the act is above the horizon: at the beginning of the second he is past the height, and declines till the end of the day. This progressive motion should be made imperceptibly, but its effect should be visible through the two acts.

ACT I.

SCENE I.

After the trio, the sun is seen to rise: the door of the cottage is open, a lamp burning just within;
Vol. 1. . . . 2H 21

DORCAS, seated on a bench, is spinning; ROSINA and PHEBE, just within the door, are measuring corn; WILLIAM comes from the top of the stage; they sing the following trio.

When the rosy morn, appearing,
Paints with gold the verdant lawn,
Bees, on banks of thyme disporting,
Sip the sweets, and hail the dawn.

Warbling birds the day proclaiming,
Carol sweet the lively strain;
They forsake their leafy dwelling,
To secure the golden grain.

See, content, the humble gleaner,
Take the scatter'd ears that 'all'
Nature, all her children viewing,
Kindly bounteous, cares for all.

[WILLIAM retires.

Ros. See! my dear Dorcas, what we gleaned yesterday in Mr. Belville's field!

[Coming forward, and showing the corn at the door.]

Dor. Lord love thee! but take care of thyself: thou art but tender.

Ros. Indeed it does not hurt me. Shall I put out the lamp?

Dor. Do, dear; the poor must be sparing.

[ROSINA going to put out the lamp, DORCAS looks after her, and sighs; she returns hastily.]

Ros. Why do you sigh, Dorcas?

Dor. I canno' bear it: it's nothing to Phebe and me, but thou wast not born to labour.

[Rising, and pushing away the wheel.]

Ros. Why should I repine? Heaven, which deprived me of my parents, and my fortune, left me health, content, and innocence. Nor is it certain that riches lead to happiness. Do you think the nightingale sings the sweeter for being in a gilded cage?

Dor. Sweeter, I'll maintain it, than the poor little linnet that tho' pick'dst up half-starved under the hedge yesterday, after its mother had been shot, and brought'st to life in thy bosom. Let me speak to his honour, he's main kind to the poor.

Ros. Not for the world, Dorcas; I want nothing; you have been a mother to me.

Dor. Would I could! would I could! I ha' worked hard and earn'd money in my time: but now I am old and feeble, and am pushed about by every body.—More's the pity, I say: it was not so in my young time; but the world grows wicked every day.

Ros. Your age, my good Dorcas, requires rest; go into the cottage, whilst Phebe and I join the gleaners, who are assembling from every part of the village.

Dor. Many a time have I carried thy dear mother, an infant, in these arms; little did I think a child of hers would live to share my poor pittance.—But I wo' not grieve thee.

[DORCAS enters the Cottage, looking back affectionately at ROSINA.]

Phe. What makes you so melancholy, Rosina? Mayhap it's because you have not a sweetheart? But you are so proud, you won't let our young men come a near you. You may live to repent being so scornful.

When William at eve meets me down at the stile,
How sweet is the nightingale's song;
Of the day I forget all the labour and toil,

Whilst the moon plays yon branches among.

By her beams, without blushing, I hear him complain,

And believe every word of his song;

You know not how sweet 'tis to love the dear swain,

Whilst the moon plays yon branches among.

[During the last stanza, WILLIAM appears at the end of the scene, and makes signs to PHEBE; who, when it is finished, steals softly to him, and they disappear.]

Ros. How small a part of my evils is poverty! And how little does Phebe know the heart she thinks insensible! the heart which nourishes a hopeless passion. I blessed, like others, Belville's gentle virtues, and knew not that 'twas love. Unhappy, lost Rosina!

The morn returns in saffron dress'd,

But not to sad Rosina rest.

The blushing morn awakes the strain,

Awakes the tuneful choir;

But sad Rosina ne'er again

Shall strike the sprightly lyre.

Rust. [Without.] To work, my hearts of oak, to work; here the sun is half an hour high, and not a stroke struck yet.

Enter RUSTIC, singing, followed by Reapers.

Rust. See, ye swains, yon streaks of red,
Call you from your slothful bed;
Late you till'd the fruitful soil;
See! where harvest crowns your toil.

Cho. Late you till'd the fruitful soil;
See! where harvest crowns your toil.

Rust. As we reap the golden corn,
Laughing Plenty fills her horn.
What would gilded pomp avail
Should the peasant's labour fail?

Cho. What would gilded pomp avail
Should the peasant's labour fail?

Rust. Ripen'd fields your cares repay,
Sons of labour, haste away;
Bending, see the waving grain
Crown the year, and cheer the swain.

Cho. Bending, see the waving grain
Crown the year, and cheer the swain.

Rust. Hist! there's his honour. Where are all the lazy Irishmen I hired yesterday at market?

Enter BELVILLE, followed by two IRISHMEN and Servants.

1 Irish. Is it us he's talking of, Paddy? Then the devil may thank him for his good commendations.

Bel. You are too severe, Rustic; the poor fellows came three miles this morning; therefore I made them stop at the manor-house to take a little refreshment.

1 Irish. Bless your sweet face, my jewel, and all those who take your part. Bad luck to myself, if I would not, with all the veins of my heart, split the dew before your feet in a morning.

[To BELVILLE.]

Rust. If I do speak a little cross, it is for your honour's good.

[The Reapers cut the corn, and make it into sheaves. ROSINA follows, and gleans.]

Rust. [Seeing ROSINA.] What a dickens does this girl do here? Keep back; wait till the reapers are off the field; do like the other gleaners.

Ros. [Timidly.] If I have done wrong, Sir, I will put what I have gleaned down again.

[She lets fall the ears she had gleaned.]

Bel. How can you be so unfeeling, Rustic? She is lovely, virtuous, and in want. Let fall some ears, that she may glean the more.

Rust. Your honour is too good by half.

Bel. No more: gather up the corn she has let fall. Do as I command you.

Rust. There, take the whole field, since his honour chooses it.

[Putting the corn into her apron.]

Ros. I will not abuse his goodness.

[Retires, gleaning.]

2 Irish. Upon my soul now, his honour's no churl of the wheat, whate'er he may be of the barley.

Bel. [Looking after ROSINA.] What bewitching softness! There is a blushing, bashful gentleness, an almost infantine innocence, in that lovely countenance, which it is impossible to behold without emotion! She turns this way: what bloom on that cheek! 'Tis the blushing down of the peach.

Her mouth, which a smile,
Devoid of all guile,

Half opens to view,
Is the bud of the rose,
In the morning that blows,
Impearl'd with the dew.

More fragrant her breath
Than the flower-scented heath
At the dawning of day;
The hawthorn in bloom,
The lily's perfume,
Or the blossoms of May.

Enter CAPTAIN BELVILLE in a riding dress.

Capt. B. Good morrow, brother; you are early abroad.

Bel. My dear Charles, I am happy to see you. True, I find, to the first of September.

Capt. B. I meant to have been here last night, but one of my wheels broke, and I was obliged to sleep at a village six miles distant, where I left my chaise, and took a boat down the river at day-break. But your corn is not off the ground.

Bel. You know our harvest is late in the north; but you will find all the lands cleared on the other side the mountain.

Capt. B. And pray, brother, how are the partridges this season?

Bel. There are twenty covies within sight of my house, and the dogs are in fine order.

Capt. B. The gamekeeper is this moment leading them round. I am fired at the sight.

By dawn to the downs we repair,
With bosoms right jocund and gay,
And gam more than pheasants or hare—
Gain health by the sports of the day.

Mark! mark! to the right hand, prepare—
See Diana!—she points!—see, they rise—
See, they float on the bosom of air!
Fire away! whilst loud echo replies
Fire away!

Hark! the volley resounds to the skies!
Whilst echo in thunder replies!
In thunder replies,
And resounds to the skies,
Fire away! Fire away! Fire away!

But where is my little rustic charmer? O! there she is: I am transported. [Aside.] Pray, brother, is not that the little girl, whose dawning beauty we admired so much last year?

Bel. It is, and more lovely than ever. I shall dine in the field with my reapers to-day, brother: will you share our rural repast, or have a dinner prepared at the manor-house?

Capt. B. By no means: pray let me be of your party: your plan is an admirable one, especially if your girls are handsome. I'll walk round the field, and meet you at dinner time.

[Exit BELVILLE and RUSTIC. CAPTAIN BELVILLE goes up to ROSINA, gleans a few ears, and presents them to her; she refuses them, and runs out; he follows her.

Enter WILLIAM, speaking at the Side-scene.

Will. Lead the dogs back, James; the captain won't shoot to-day. [Seeing RUSTIC and PHEBE behind.] Indeed, so close! I don't half like it.

Enter RUSTIC and PHEBE.

Rust. That's a good girl! do as I bid you, and you sha'n't want encouragement.

[He goes up to the Reapers, and WILLIAM comes forward.

Will. O no, I dare say she won't. So, Mrs. Phebe!

Phe. And so, Mr. William, if you go to that? Will. A new sweetheart, I'll be sworn; and a pretty comely lad he is; but he's rich, and that's enough to win a woman.

Phe. I don't deserve this of you, William; but I'm rightly sarved for being such an easy fool. You think, mayhap, I'm at my last prayers; but you may find yourself mistaken.

Will. You do right to cry out first; you think belike that I did not see you take that posy from Harry.

Phe. And you, belike, that I did not catch you tying up one, of corn-flowers and wild roses, for the miller's maid; but I'll be fooled no longer; I have done with you, Mr. William.

Will. I sha'n't break my heart, Mrs. Phebe. The miller's maid loves the ground I walk on.

Will. I've kiss'd and I've prattled to fifty fair maids,
And chang'd them as oft, d'ye see;
But of all the fair maidens that dance on the green,
The maid of the mill for me.

Phe. There's fifty young men have told me fine tales,
And called me the fairest she;
But of all the gay wrestlers that sport on the green,
Young Harry's the lad for me.

Will. Her eyes are as black as the sbe in the hedge,
Her face like the blossoms in May.
Her teeth are as white as the new-shorn flock.
Her breath like the new-made hay.

Phe. He's tall and he's straight as the poplar tree,
His cheeks are as fresh as the rose;
He looks like a squire of high degree
When dress'd in his Sunday clothes.

Will. I've kiss'd and I've prattled, &c.

Phe. There's fifty young men, &c.
[Exit on different sides of the stage.

ROSINA runs across the Stage; CAPTAIN BELVILLE following her.

Capt. B. Stay and hear me, Rosina. Why will you fatigue yourself thus? Only homely girls are born to work.—Your obstinacy is vain, you shall hear me.

Ros. Why do you stop me, Sir? My time is precious. When the gleaning season is over, will you make up my loss?

Capt. B. Yes.

Ros. Will it be any advantage to you to make me lose my day's work?

Capt. B. Yes.

Ros. Would it give you pleasure to see me pass all my days in idleness?

Capt. B. Yes.

Ros. We differ greatly then, Sir. I only wish for so much leisure as makes me return to my work with fresh spirit. We labour all the week, 'tis true; but then how sweet is our rest on Sunday.

Whilst with village maids I stray,
Sweetly wears the joyous day;
Cheerful glows my artless breast,
Mild content the constant guest.

Capt. B. Mere prejudice, child; you will know better. I pity you, and will make your fortune.

Ros. Let me call my mother, Sir; I am young, and can support myself by my labour; but she is old and helpless, and your charity will be well bestowed.—Please to transfer to her the bounty you intended for me.

Capt. B. Why—as to that—

Ros. I understand you, Sir; your compassion does not extend to old women.

Capt. B. Really—I believe not.

Enter DORCAS.

Ros. You are just come in time, mother. I have met with a generous gentleman, whose charity, inclined him to succour youth.

Dor. 'Tis very kind.—And old age—

Ros. He'll tell you that himself.

[Goes into the Cottage.]

Dor. I thought so.—Sure, sure, 'tis no sin to be old.

Capt. B. You must not judge of me by others, honest Dorcas.—I am sorry for your misfortunes, and wish to serve you.

Dor. And to what, your honour, may I owe this kindness?

Capt. B. You have a charming daughter—

Dor. I thought as much. A vile, wicked man!

[Aside.]

Capt. B. Beauty like hers might find a thousand resources in London; the moment she appears there, she will turn every head.

Dor. And is your honour sure her own won't turn at the same time?

Capt. B. She shall live in affluence, and take care of you too, Dorcas.

Dor. I guess your honour's meaning; but you are mistaken, Sir. If I must be a trouble to the dear child, I had rather owe my bread to her labour than to her shame.

[Goes into the Cottage, and shuts the door.]

Capt. B. These women astonish me; but I won't give it up so.

Enter RUSTIC, crossing the stage.

A word with you, Rustic.

Rust. I am in a great hurry, your honour; I am going to hasten dinner.

Capt. B. I sha'n't keep you a minute. Take these five guineas.

Rust. For whom, Sir?

Capt. B. For yourself. And this purse.

Rust. For whom, Sir?

Capt. B. For Rosina; they say she is in distress, and wants assistance.

Rust. What pleasure it gives me to see you so charitable! You are just like your brother.

Capt. B. Prodigiously.

Rust. But why give me money, Sir.

Capt. B. Only to—tell Rosina there is a person who is very much interested in her happiness.

Rust. How much you will please his honour by this. He takes mightily to Rosina, and prefers her to all the young women in the parish.

Capt. B. Prefers her! Ah! you sly rogue!

[Laying his hand on RUSTIC'S shoulder.]

Rust. Your honour's a wag; but I'm sure I meant no harm.

Capt. B. Give her the money, and tell her she shall never want a friend; but not a word to my brother.

Rust. All's safe, your honour. [Exit CAPTAIN BELVILLE.] I don't vastly like this business. At the captain's age, this violent charity is a little dubious. I am his honour's servant, and it's my duty to hide nothing from him. I'll go seek his honour; O, here he comes.

Enter BELVILLE.

Bel. Well, Rustic, have you any intelligence to communicate?

Rust. A vast deal, Sir. Your brother begins to make good use of his money; he has given me these five guineas for myself, and this purse for Rosina.

Bel. For Rosina! 'Tis plain he loves her. [Aside.] Obey him exactly; but, as distress renders the mind haughty, and Rosina's situation requires the utmost delicacy, contrive to execute your commission in such a manner that she may not even suspect from whence the money comes.

Rust. I understand your honour.

Bel. Have you gained any intelligence in respect to Rosina?

Rust. I endeavoured to get all I could from the old woman's grand-daughter; but all she knew was, that she was no kin to Dorcas, and that she had had a good bringing-up; but here are the labourers.

Enter DORCAS, ROSINA, and PHEBE.

Bel. But I don't see Rosina. Dorcas, you must come too, and Phebe.

Dor. We can't deny your honour.

Ros. I am asham'd; but you command, Sir.

Enter CAPTAIN BELVILLE, followed by the Reapers.

Bel. By this fountain's flowery side,
Dress'd in nature's blooming pride,
Where the poplar trembles high,
And the bees in clusters fly;
Whilst the herdsman on the hill
Listens to the falling rill:
Pride and cruel scorn, away:
Let us share the festive day.

Ros. & Bel. Taste our pleasures ye who may,
This is Nature's holiday.
Simple Nature ye who prize,
Life's fantastic forms despise.

Cho. Taste our pleasures ye who may,
This is Nature's holiday.

Capt. B. Blushing Bell, with downcast eyes,
Sighs, and knows not why she sighs—
Tom is near her—we shall know—
How he eyes her—Is't not so?

Cho. Taste our pleasures ye who may,
This is Nature's holiday.

Will. He is fond, and she is shy;
He would kiss her,—fie!—oh, fie!
Mind thy sickle, let her be;
By and by she'll follow thee.

Cho. Busy censors, hence away;
This is Nature's holiday.

Rust. & Dor. Now we'll quaff the nut-brown ale,
Then we'll tell the sportive tale;
All is jest, and all is glee,
All is youthful jollity.

Cho. Taste our pleasures ye who may,
This is Nature's holiday.

Phe. { Lads and lasses all advance,
Irish Girl. { Carol blithe, and form the dance;
1 Irish. { Trip it lightly while you may,
This is Nature's holiday.

Cho. Trip it lightly while you may,
This is Nature's holiday.

[All rise; the Dancers come down the stage through the sheaves of corn, which are removed; the Dance begins and finishes the Act.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The Same.

Enter RUSTIC.

Rust. This purse is the plague of my life; I hate money when it is not my own. I'll e'en put in the five guineas he gave me for myself: I don't want it, and they do. They certainly must find it there. But I hear the cottage door open.

[Retires a little.]

Enter DORCAS and ROSINA from the Cottage.
DORCAS with a great basket on her arm, filled with skeins of thread.

Dor. I am just going, Rosina, to carry this thread to the weaver's.

Ros. This basket is too heavy for you: pray let me carry it.

[Takes the basket from DORCAS, and sets it down on the bench.]

Dor. No, no.

[Peevishly.]

Ros. If you love me, only take half; this evening, or to-morrow morning, I will carry the rest.
—[Takes part of the skeins out of the basket and lays them on the bench, looking affectionately on DORCAS.] There, be angry with me, if you please.

Dor. No, my sweet lamb, I am not angry; but beware of men.

Ros. Have you any doubts of my conduct, Dorcas.

Dor. Indeed I have not, love, and yet I am uneasy.

Enter CAPTAIN BELVILLE, unperceived.

Go back to the reapers, whilst I carry this thread.

Ros. I'll go this moment.

Dor. But as I walk but slow, and 'tis a good way, you may chance to be at home before me; so take the key.

Ros. I will.

Capt. B. [Aside, while DORCAS feels in her pockets for the key.] Rosina to be at home before Dorcas! How lucky! I'll slip into the house, and wait her coming, if 'tis till midnight.

[He goes unperceived by them into the Cottage.]

Dor. Let nobody go into the house.

Ros. I'll take care; but first I'll double-lock the door.

[While she is locking the door, DORCAS, going to take up the basket, sees the purse.]

Dor. Good lack! What is here! a purse, as I live!

Ros. How!

Dor. Come, and see; 'tis a purse indeed.

Ros. Heavens! 'tis full of gold.

Dor. We must put up a bill at the church-gate, and restore it to the owner. The best way is to carry the money to his honour, and get him to keep it till the owner is found. You shall go with it,
love.

Ros. Pray excuse me, I always blush so.

Dor. 'Tis nothing but childishness; but his honour will like your bashfulness better than too much courage.

[Exit.]

Ros. I cannot support his presence—my embarrassment—my confusion—a stronger sensation than that of gratitude agitates my heart.—Yet hope in my situation were madness.

Sweet transports, gentle wishes, go!

In vain his charms have gain'd my heart;

Since fortune, still to love a foe,

And cruel, duty bid us part.

Ah! why does duty claim the mind,

And part those souls which love has join'd?

Enter WILLIAM.

Pray, William, do you know of any body that has lost a purse?

Will. I knows nothing about it.

Ros. Dorcas, however, has found one.

Will. So much the better for she.

Ros. You will oblige me very much if you will carry it to Mr. Belville, and beg him to keep it till the owner is found.

Will. Since you desire it, I'll go; it sha'n't be the lighter for my carrying.

Ros. That I am sure of, William.

[Exit.]

Enter PHEBE.

Phe. There's William; but I'll pretend not to see him.

Henry cull'd the floweret's bloom,
Marian lov'd the soft perfume;
Had playful kiss'd, but prudence near Whisper'd timely in her ear,
Simple Marian, ah! beware;
Touch them not, for love is there.

[Throws away her nosegay. While she is singing, WILLIAM turns, looks at her, whis-ples, and plays with his stick.]

Will. That's Harry's posy; the slut likes me still.

Phe. That's a copy of his countenance, I'm sartin'; he can no more help following me nor he can be hang'd.

[Aside; WILLIAM crosses again, singing.]

Of all the fair maidens that dance on the green,
The maid of the mill for me.

Phe. I'm ready to choke wif' madness; but I'll not speak first, an I die for't.

[WILLIAM sings, throwing up his stick and catching it.]

Will. Her eyes are as black as the sloe in the hedge,

Her face like the blossoms in May.

Phe. I can't bear it no longer—you vile, ungrateful, perfidious—But it's no matter—I can't think what I could see in you—Harry loves me,
and is a thousand times more handsomer.

[Sings, sobbing at every word]

Of all the gay wrestlers that sport on the green,
Young Harry's the lad for me.

Will. He's yonder a reaping, shall I call him?

Phe. My grandmother leads me the life of a dog; and it's all along of you. [Offers to go.]

Will. Well, then she'll be better tempered now.

Phe. I did not value her scolding a brass farthing, when I thought as how you were true to me.

Will. Wasn't I true to you? Look in my face, and say that.

When bidden to the wake or fair,
The joy of each free-hearted swain,
Till Phebe promis'd to be there,
I loiter'd, last of all the train.

If chance some fairing caught her eye,
The riband gay, or silken glove,
With eager haste I ran to buy;
For what is gold compar'd to love?

My posy on her bosom plac'd,
Could Harry's sweeter scents exhale?
Her auburn locks my riband grac'd,
And flutter'd in the wanton gale.

With scorn she hears me now complain,
Nor can my rustic presents move:
Her heart prefers a richer swain,
And gold, alas! has banish'd love.

[Coming back.] Let's part friendly, howsoever.
Bye, Phebe: I shall always wish you well.

Phe. Bye, William.

[Cries, wiping her eyes with her apron.]

Will. My heart begins to melt a little. [Aside.]
I lov'd you very well once, Phebe; but you are grown so cross, and have such vagaries—

Phe. I'm sure I never had no vagaries with you, William. But go; mayhap Kate may be angry.

Will. And who cares for she? I never minded her anger, nor her coaxing neither, till you were cross to me.

Phe. [Holding up her hands.] O the father! I cross to you, William?

Will. Did not you tell me this very morning, as how you had done wi' me?

Phe. One word's as good as a thousand. Do you love me, William?

Will. Do I love thee? Do I love dancing on the green better than thrashing in the barn? Do I love a wake, or a harvest-home?

Phe. Then I'll never speak to Harry again the longest day I have to live.

Will. I'll turn my back o' the miller's maid the first time I meet her.

Phe. Will you indeed, and indeed?

Will. Marry will I: and more nor that, I'll go speak to the parson this moment—I'm happier—zooks, I'm happier nor a lord or a squire of five hundred a year.

Phe. In gaudy courts, with aching hearts,
The great at fortune rail:
The hills may higher honours claim,
But peace is in the vale.

Will. See high-born dames, in rooms of state,
With midnight revels pale;
No youth admires their fading charms,
For beauty's in the vale.

Both. Amid the shades the virgin's sighs
Add fragrance to the gale:
So they that will may take the hill,
Since love is in the vale.

[Exeunt, arm in arm.]

Enter BELVILLE.

Bel. I tremble at the impression this lovely girl has made on my heart. My cheerfulness has left me, and I am grown insensible even to the delicious pleasure of making those happy who depend on my protection.

Ere bright Rosina met my eyes,
How peaceful pass'd the joyous day!
In rural sports I gain'd the prize,
Each virgin listen'd to my lay.

But now no more I touch the lyre,
No more the rustic sports can please;
I live the slave of fond desire,
Lost to myself, to mirth, and ease.

The tree that, in a happier hour,
Its boughs extended o'er the plain,
When blasted by the lightning's power,
Nor charms the eye, nor shades the swain.

Since the sun rose, I have been in continual exercise; I feel exhausted, and will try to rest a quarter of an hour on this bank.

[Lies down on a bank by the fountain.]

[Gleaners pass the Stage, with sheaves of Corn on their heads; last ROSINA, who comes forward singing.]

Ros. Light as thistle-down moving, which floats on the air,

Sweet gratitude's debt to this cottage I bear;
Of autumn's rich store I bring home my part,
The weight on my head, but gay joy in my heart.

What do I see? Mr. Belville asleep? I'll steal softly—at this moment I may gaze on him without blushing. [Lays down the corn, and walks softly up to him.] The sun points full on this spot; let me fasten these branches together with this riband, and shade him from its beams—yes—that will do—But if he should wake—[Takes the Riband from her bosom, and ties the branches together.] How my heart beats!—One look more—Ah! I have waked him.

[She flies, and endeavours to hide herself against the door of the Cottage; turning her head every instant.]

Bel. What noise was that?

[Half raising himself.]

Ros. He is angry—How unhappy I am!—How I tremble. [Aside.]

Bel. This riband I have seen before, and on the lovely Rosina's bosom—

[He rises, and goes toward the Cottage. Ros. I will hide myself in the house. [ROSINA, opening the door, sees CAPTAIN BELVILLE, and starts back.]—Heavens! a man in the house!]

Capt. B. Now, love, assist me!

[Comes out, and seizes ROSINA; she breaks from him, and runs affrighted across the Stage; BELVILLE follows; CAPTAIN BELVILLE, who comes out to pursue her, sees his brother, and steals off at the other Scene; BELVILLE leads ROSINA back.]

Bel. Why do you fly thus, Rosina? What can you fear? You are out of breath.

Ros. O, Sir!—my strength fails—[Leans on BELVILLE, who supports her in his arms.] Where is he?—A gentleman pursued me—

[Looking round.]

Bel. Don't be alarmed, 'twas my brother—he could not mean to offend you.

Ros. Your brother! Why then does he not imitate your virtues? Why was he here?

Bel. Forget this: you are safe. But tell me, Rosina, for the question is to me of importance; have I not seen you wear this riband?

Ros. Forgive me, Sir; I did not mean to disturb you. I only meant to shade you from the too great heat of the sun.

Bel. To what motive do I owe this tender attention?

Ros. Ah, Sir! do not the whole village love you?

Bel. You tremble; why are you alarmed?

[Taking her hand.] For you, my sweet maid, may be not afraid, [ROSINA withdraws it. I feel an affection which yet wants a name.

Ros. When first—but in vain—I seek to explain, What heart but must love you? I blush, fear, and shame—

Bel. Why thus timid, Rosina? still safe by my side,

Let me be your guardian, protector, and guide,

Ros. My timid heart pants—still safe by your side, [guide.

Be you my protector, my guardian, my

Bel. Why thus timid, &c.

Ros. My timid heart pants, &c.

Bel. Unveil your mind to me, Rosina. The graces of your form, the native dignity of your mind, which breaks through the lovely simplicity of your deportment, a thousand circumstances concur to convince me you were not born a villager.

Ros. To you, Sir, I can have no reserve. A pride, I hope an honest one, made me wish to sigh in secret over my misfortunes.

Bel. [Eagerly.] They are at an end.

Ros. Dorcas approaches, Sir; she can best relate my melancholy story.

Enter DORCAS.

Dor. His honour here? Good lack! How sorry I am I happened to be from home. Troth, I'm sadly tired.

Bel. Will you let me speak with you a moment alone, Dorcas?

Dor. Rosina, take this basket.

[Exit ROSINA with the basket.

Bel. Rosina has referred me to you, Dorcas, for an account of her birth, which I have long suspected to be above her present situation.

Dor. To be sure, your honour, since the dear child gives me leave to speak, she's of as good a family as any in England. Her mother, sweet lady, was my bountiful old master's daughter, 'Squire Welford, of Lincolnshire. His estate was seized for a mortgage of not half its value, just after young madam was married, and she ne'er got a penny of her portion.

Bel. And her father?

Dor. Was a brave gentleman too, a colonel. His honour went to the Eastern Indies, to better his fortune, and madam would go with him. The ship was lost, and they, with all the little means they had, went to the bottom. Young Madam Rosina was their only child; they left her at school; but when this sad news came, the mistress did not care for keeping her, so the dear child has shared my poor morsel.

Bel. But her father's name?

Dor. Martin; Colonel Martin.

Bel. I am too happy; he was the friend of my father's heart: a thousand times have I heard him lament his fate. Rosina's virtues shall not go unrewarded.

Dor. Yes I know'd it would be so. Heaven never forsakes the good man's children.

Bel. I have another question to ask you, Dorcas, and answer me sincerely; is her heart free?

Dor. To be sure, she never would let any of our young men come a near her; and yet—

Bel. Speak: I am on the rack.

Dor. I'm afraid—she mopes and she pines.—But your honour would be angry—I'm afraid the captain—

Bel. Then my foreboding heart was right.

[Aside.

Enter RUSTIC.

Rust. Help, for Heaven's sake, Sir! Rosina's lost—she's carried away—

Bel. Rosina!

Enter CAPTAIN BELVILLE.

Capt. B. [Confusedly.] Don't be alarmed—let me go—I'll fly to save her.

Bel. With me, Sir—I will not lose sight of you. Rustic, hasten instantly with our reapers. Dorcas, you will be our guide. [Exit.

Rust. Don't be frightened, Sir; the Irishmen have rescued her; she is just here. [Exit.

Enter the two IRISHMEN.

I Irish. [To DORCAS.] Dry your tears my jewel; we have done for them.

Dor. Have you saved her? I owe you more than life.

I Irish. Faith, good woman, you owe me nothing at all. I'll tell your honour how it was. My comrades and I were crossing the meadow, going home, when we saw them first; and hearing a woman cry, I looked up, and saw them putting her into a skiff against her will. Says I, "Paddy, is not that the clever little crater that was glancing in the field with us this morning?"—" 'Tis so, sure enough," says he.—"By St. Patrick," says I, "there's enough of us to rescue her." With that we ran for the bare life, waded up to the knees, laid about us bravely with our shillelays, knocked them out of the skiff, and brought her back safe: and here she comes, my jewel.

Re-enter RUSTIC, leading ROSINA, who throws herself into DORCAS' arms.

Dor. I cannot speak—Art thou safe?

Bel. I dread to find the criminal.

Rust. Your honour need not go far a field, I believe; it must have been some friend of the captain's, for his French valet commanded the party.

Capt. B. I confess my crime; my passion for Rosina hurried me out of myself.

Bel. You have dishonoured me, dishonoured the glorious profession you have embraced.—But begone, I renounce you as my brother, and renounce my ill-placed friendship.

Capt. B. Your indignation is just; I have offended almost past forgiveness. Will the offer of my hand repair the injury?

Bel. If Rosina accepts it, I am satisfied.

Ros. [To BELVILLE.] Will you, Sir, suffer?—This hope is a second insult. Whoever offends the object of his love is unworthy of obtaining her.

Bel. This noble refusal paints your character. I know another, Rosina, who loves you with as strong, though purer ardour:—but if allowed to hope—

Ros. Do not, Sir, envy me the calm delight of passing my independent days with Dorcas, in whom I have found a mother's tenderness.

Dor. Bless thee, my child; thy kindness melts my heart.

Bel. Do you refuse me too then, Rosina?

[ROSINA raises her eyes tenderly on BELVILLE, lowers them again, and leans on DORCAS.]

Dor. You, Sir? You?

Ros. My confusion—My blushes—

Bel. Then I am happy! My life! my Rosina!

Phe. Do you speak to his honour, William.

Will. No; do you speak, Phebe.

Phe. I am ashamed—William and I, your honour—William prayed me to let him keep me company—so he gained my good-will to have him, if so be my grandmother consents.

[Courtesying, and playing with her apron.]

Will. If your honour would be so good to speak to Dorcas.

Bel. Dorcas, you must not refuse me any thing to-day. I'll give William a farm.

Dor. Your honour is too kind—take her William, and make her a good husband.

Will. That I will, dame.

Will. & Phe. [To BELVILLE.] Thank your honour.

[BELVILLE joins their hands, they bow and courtesy.]

Will. What must I do with the purse, your honour? Dorcas would not take it.

Bel. I believe my brother has the best right.

Capt. B. 'Tis yours, William; dispose of it as you please.

Will. Then I'll give it to our honest Irishmen, who fought so bravely for our Rosina.

Bel. You have made good use of it, William; nor shall my gratitude stop here.

Capt. B. Allow me to retire, brother. When I am worthy of your esteem, I will return, and demand my rights in your affection.

Bel. You must not leave us, brother. Resume the race of honour; be indeed a soldier, and be more than my brother—be my friend.

FINALE.

Bel. & Capt. B. To bless, and to be blessed be ours,

"Whate'er our rank, whate'er our powers;

On some her gifts kind fortune showers,

Who reap, like us, in this rich scene.

Capt. B. Yet those who taste her bounty less
The sigh malevolent repress,

And loud the feeling bosom bless,
Which something leaves for want to glean.

Ros. How bless'd am I, supremely bless'd
Since Belville all his soul express'd,
And fondly clasp'd me to his breast:
I now may reap—how chang'd the scene!

But ne'er can I forget the day,
When, all to want and wo a prey,
Soft pity taught his soul to say,
"Unfeeling Rustic, let her glean!"

Rust. { The hearts you glad your own display,
Dor. { The heavens such goodness must repay;
Will. { And bless'd through many a summer's
Phe. { day,
Full crops you'll reap in this rich scene:

And O! when summer joys are o'er,
And autumn yields its fruits no more,
New blessings be there yet in store,
For winter's sober hours to glean.

Chorus. And O! when summer's joys, &c.

The following AIRS are omitted in the representation.

Capt. Bel. From flower to flower gay roving.
The wanton butterfly

Does nature's charms descry.

From flower to flower gay roving,

The wanton butterfly.

On wavy wings high mounting,

If chance some child pursues,

Forsakes the balmy dews;

On wavy wings high mounting,

If chance some child pursues.

Thus wild, and ever changing,

A sportive butterfly,

I mock the whining sigh;

Still wild, and ever changing,

A sportive butterfly.

Bel. How bless'd, my fair, who on thy face
Unchec'd by fear, may fondly gaze?
Who, when he breathes the tender sigh,
Beholds no anger in thine eye?

Ah, then, what joys await the swain,

Who ardent pleads, nor pleads in vain;

Whose voice, with rapture all divine,

Secure may say, "This heart is mine!"

VENICE PRESERVED

A TRAGEDY,

IN FIVE ACTS.

BY THOMAS OTWAY.

REMARKS.

This interesting tragedy owes its plot and plan to the Abbe de St. Real's "Histoire de la Conjuracion de Marquis de Bedamar," or Account of the Spanish Conspiracy at Venice, of which the Marquis de Bedamar, the ambassador from Spain, was a promoter. Nature and the passions are finely touched in this play; and it continues a favourite, deprived, as it now is in representation, of that mixture of vile comedy which originally diversified the tragic action. It has been remarked, that Belvidera is the only truly valuable character; and indeed the principal fault of this drama seems a want of sufficient and probable motive.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Street in Venice.

Enter PRIULI and JAFFIER.

Pri. No more! I'll hear no more! Be gone and leave me.

Jaf. Not hear me! By my suffering, but you shall!

My lord, my lord! I'm not that abject wretch
You think me. Patience! where's the distance throws

VOL. I. . . . 2 I

Me back so far, but I may boldly speak
In right, though proud oppression will not hear
me?

Pri. Have you not wrong'd me?

Jaf. Could my nature e'er
Have brook'd injustice, or the doing wrongs,
I need not now thus low have bent myself
To gain a hearing from a cruel father.
Wrong'd you?

Pri. Yes, wrong'd me! In the nicest point,
The honour of my house, you've done me wrong.
You may remember (for I now will speak,

And urge its baseness) when you first came home
From travel, with such hopes as made you look'd on,

By all men's eyes, a youth of expectation,
Pleas'd with your growing virtue, I receiv'd you;
Court'd, and sought to raise you to your merits:
My house, my table, nay, my fortune too,
My very self, was yours; you might have us'd me
To your best service; like an open friend
I treated, trusted you, and thought you mine:
When, in requital of my best endeavours,
You treacherously practis'd to undo me;
Seduc'd the weakness of my age's darling,
My only child, and stole her from my bosom,
Oh, Belvidera!

Jaf. 'Tis to me you owe her:
Childless you had been else, and in the grave
Your name extinct: no more Priuli heard of.
You may remember, scarce five years are past,
Since in your brigantine you sail'd to see
The Adriatic wedded by our duke;
And I was with you: your unskilful pilot
Dash'd us upon a rock; when to your boat
You made for safety: enter'd first yourself;
Th' affrighted Belvidera following next,
As she stood trembling on the vessel's side,
Was, by a wave, wash'd off into the deep;
When instantly I plung'd into the sea,
And, buffeting the billows to her rescue,
Redeem'd her life with half the loss of mine.
Like a rich conquest, in one hand I bore her,
And with the other dash'd the saucy waves,
That throng'd and press'd to rob me of my prize.
I brought her, gave her to your despairing arms:
Indeed you thank'd me; but a nobler gratitude
Rose in her soul: for from that hour she lov'd me,
Till for her life she paid me with herself.

Pri. You stole her from me; like a thief you stole her,

At dead of night! that cursed hour you chose
To rife me of all my heart held dear.
May all your joys in her prove false, like mine;
A sterile fortune, and a barren bed,
Attend you both; continual discord make
Your days and nights bitter and grievous; still
May the hard hand of a vexatious need
Oppress and grind you; till at last you find
The curse of disobedience all your portion.

Jaf. Half of your curse you have bestowed in vain:

Heaven has already crown'd our faithful loves
With a young boy, sweet as his mother's beauty:
May he live to prove more gentle than his grand-
sire,

And happier than his father.

Pri. Rather live
To bait thee for his bread, and din your ears
With hungry cries: whilst his unhappy mother
Sits down and weeps in bitterness of want.

Jaf. You talk as if 'twould please you.

Pri. 'T would, by heaven!

Jaf. Would I were in my grave!

Pri. And she too with thee.

For, living here, you're but my curs'd remem-
I once was happy. [brancers]

Jaf. You use me thus, because you know my soul

Is fond of Belvidera. You perceive
My life feeds on her, therefore thus you treat me.
Oh! could my soul ever have known satiety;
Were I that thief, the doer of such wrongs
As you upbraid me with, what hinders me

But I might send her back to you with contumely,
And court my fortune where she would be kinder?

Pri. You dare not do't.

Jaf. Indeed, my lord, I dare not.

My heart; that awes me, is too much my master
Three years are past, since first our vows were plighted,

During which time, the world must bear me
witness,

I've treated Belvidera like your daughter,
The daughter of a senator of Venice:
Distinction, place, attendance, and observance,
Due to her birth, she always has commanded.
Out of my little fortune I've done this;
Because (though hopeless e'er to win your nature)
The world might see I lov'd her for herself;
Not as the heiress of the great Priuli.

Pri. No more.

Jaf. Yes, all, and then adieu for ever. [charity,
There's not a wretch, that lives on common
But's happier than me: for I have known
The luscious sweets of plenty; every night
Have slept with soft content about my head,
And never wak'd but to a joyful morning;
Yet now must fall, like a full ear of corn,
Whose blossom scap'd, yet's withered in the ripening.

Pri. Home, and be humble; study to retrench;
Discharge the lazy vermin of thy hall,
Those pageants of thy folly:
Reduce the glitt'ring trappings of thy wife
To humble weeds, fit for thy little state:
Then, to some suburb cottage both retire;
Drudge to feed loathsome life; get brats and starve—

Home, home, I say.

[Exit.]

Jaf. Yes, if my heart would let me—
This proud, this swelling heart: home I would go,
But that my doors are baleful to my eyes,
Fill'd and damn'd up with gaping creditors,
Watchful as fowlers when their game will spring.
I've now not fifty ducats in the world,
Yet still I am in love, and pleas'd with ruin.
Oh! Belvidera! Oh! she is my wife—
And we will bear our wayward fate together,
But ne'er know comfort more.

Enter PIERRE.

Pier. My friend, good morrow;
How fares the honest partner of my heart?
What, melancholy! not a word to spare me?

Jaf. I'm thinking, Pierre, how that damn'd starving quality,

Call'd honesty, got footing in the world.
Pier. Why, powerful villany first set it up,
For its own ease and safety. Honest men
Are the soft easy cushions on which knaves
Repose and fatten. Were all mankind villains, They'd starve each other; lawyers would want practice,

Cut-throats rewards: each man would kill his brother [der.]

Himself; none would be paid or hang'd for mur-
Honesty! 'twas a cheat invented first
To bind the hands of bold deserving rogues,
That fools and cowards might sit safe in power,
And lord it uncontroll'd above their betters.

Jaf. Then honesty is but a notion?

Pier. Nothing else;

Like wit, much talk'd of, not to be defin'd;
He that pretends to most, too, has least share in't.
'Tis a ragged virtue: Honesty! no more on't.

Jaf. Sure thou art honest!

Pier. So, indeed, men think me:

But they're mistaken, Jaffier: I'm a rogue

As well as they;

A fine, gay, bold-fac'd villain as thou seest me.

'Tis true, I pay my debts, when they're contracted;

I steal from no man; would not cut a throat

To gain admission to a great man's purse,

Or a whore's bed; I'd not betray my friend

To get his place or fortune; I scorn to flatter

A blown-up fool above me, or crush the wretch

beneath me;

Yet, Jaffier, for all this I'm a villain.

Jaf. A villain!

Pier. Yes, a most notorious villain;

To see the sufferings of my fellow-creatures,

And own myself a man: to see our senators

Cheat the deluded people with a show

Of liberty, which yet they ne'er must taste of.

They say, by them our hands are free from fetters;

Yet whom they please they lay in basest bonds;

Bring whom they please to infamy and sorrow;

Drive us, like wrecks, down the rough tide of

power,

Whilst no hold's left to save us from destruction.

All that bear this are villains, and I one,

Not to rouse up at the great call of nature,

And check the growth of these domestic spoilers,

That make us slaves, and tell us, 'tis our charter.

Jaf. I think no safety can be here for virtue,

And grieve, my friend, as much as thou, to live

In such a wretched state as this of Venice,

Where all agree to spoil the public good;

And villains fatten with the brave man's labours.

Pier. We've neither safety, unity, nor peace,

For the foundation's lost of common good;

Justice is lame, as well as blind, amongst us;

The laws (corrupted to their ends that make 'em)

Serve but for instruments of some new tyranny,

That every day starts up, t'enslave us deeper.

Now, could this glorious cause but find out friends

To do it right, oh Jaffier! then might'st thou

Not wear these seals of woe upon thy face;

The proud Priuli should be taught humanity,

And learn to value such a son as thou art.

I dare not speak, but my heart bleeds this moment.

Jaf. Curs'd be the cause, though I thy friend be part on't:

Let me partake the troubles of thy bosom,

For I am us'd to misery, and perhaps

May find a way to sweeten't to thy spirit.

Pier. Too soon 'twill reach thy knowledge—

Jaf. Then from thee

Let it proceed. There's virtue in thy friendship,

Would make the saddest tale of sorrow pleasing,

Strengthen my constancy, and welcome ruin.

Pier. Then thou art ruin'd!

Jaf. That I long since knew;

I and ill fortune have been long acquainted.

Pier. I pass'd this very moment by thy doors,

And found them guarded by a troop of villains;

The sons of public rapine were destroying.

They told me, by the sentence of the law,

They had commission to seize all thy fortune:

Nay more, Priuli's cruel hand had sign'd it.

Here stood a ruffian with a horrid face,

Lording it o'er a pile of massy plate,

Tumbled into a heap for public sale;

There was another, making villanous jests

At thy undoing: he had ta'en possession

Of all thy ancient, most domestic, ornaments,

Rich hangings intermix'd and wrought with gold

The very bed, which on thy wedding-night

Receiv'd thee to the arms of Belvidera,

The scene of all thy joys, was violated

By the coarse hands of filthy dungeon villains,

And thrown amongst the common lumber.

Jaf. Now, thank Heaven—

Pier. Thank Heaven! for what?

Jaf. That I am not worth a ducat.

Pier. Curse thy dull stars, and the worse fate of Venice;

Where brothers, friends, and fathers, all are false;

Where there's no truth, no trust; where innocence

Stoops under vile oppression, and vice lords it.

Hadst thou but seen, as I did, how at last

Thy beautiful Belvidera, like a wretch

That's doom'd to banishment, came weeping forth, [showers,

Shining through tears, like April suns in

That labour to o'ercome the cloud that loads 'em;

Whilst two young virgins, on whose arms she lean'd,

Kindly look'd up, and at her grief grew sad,

As if they catch'd the sorrows that fell from her.

Even the lewd rabble, that were gather'd round

To see the sight, stood mute when they beheld her: [pity,

Govern'd their roaring throats, and grumbled

I could have hugg'd the greasy rogues: they pleas'd me.

Jaf. I thank thee for this story; from my soul:

Since now I know the worst that can befall me,

Ah, Pierre! I have a heart that could have borne

The roughest wrong my fortune could have done

me;

But when I think what Belvidera feels,

The bitterness her tender spirit tastes of,

I own myself a coward! bear my weakness;

If, throwing thus my arms about thy neck,

I play the boy, and blubber in thy bosom.

Oh! I shall drown thee with my sorrows.

Pier. Burn,

First burn and level Venice to thy ruin.

What! starve, like beggars' brats, in frosty weather,

Under a hedge, and whine ourselves to death!

Thou or thy cause shall never want assistance,

Whilst I have blood or fortune fit to serve thee;

Command my heart, thou'rt every way its master.

Jaf. No, there's a secret pride in bravely dying.

Pier. Rats die in holes and corners, dogs run mad;

Man knows a braver remedy for sorrow:

Revenge, the attribute of gods; they stamp'd it,

With their great image, on our natures. Die!

Consider well the cause, that calls upon thee;

And, if thou'rt base enough, die then. Remember,

Thy Belvidera suffers; Belvidera!

Die—damn first—What! be decently interr'd

in a church-yard, and mingle thy brave dust

With stinking rogues, that rot in winding-sheets,

Surfeit slain fools, the common dung o'th' soil!

Jaf. Oh!

Pier. Well said, out with't, swear a little—

Jaf. Swear! By sea and air; by earth, by heaven, and hell,

I will revenge my Belvidera's tears,

Hark thee, my friend—Priuli—is—a senator.

Pier. A dea.

Jaf. Agreed.

Pier. Shoot him.

Jaf. With all my heart.

No more; where shall we meet at night?

Pier. I'll tell thee;

On the Rialto, every night at twelve,
I take my evening's walk of meditation;
There we two will meet, and talk of precious Mischief—

Jaf. Farewell.

Pier. At twelve.

Jaf. At any hour; my plagues
Will keep me waking. [Exit PIERRE.]

Tell me why, good Heaven,
Thou mad'st me what I am, with all the spirit,
Aspiring thoughts, and elegant desires,
That fill the happiest man? Ah, rather, why
Didst thou not form me sordid as my fate,
Base-minded, dull, and fit to carry burdens!
Why have I sense to know the curse that's on
me?

Is this just dealing, nature?—Belvidera!

Enter BELVIDERA.

Poor Belvidera!

Bel. Lead me, lead me, my virgins,
To that kind voice. My lord, my love, my refuge!

Happy my eyes, when they behold thy face!
My heavy heart will leave its doleful beating
At sight of thee, and bound with sprightly joys.
Oh smile! as when our loves were in their spring,
And cheer my fainting soul.

Jaf. As when our loves
Were in their spring! Has then our fortune chang'd?

Art thou not Belvidera, still the same,
Kind, good, and tender, as my arms first found
thee?

If thou art alter'd, where shall I have harbour?
Where ease my loaded heart? Oh! where complain?

Bel. Does this appear like change, or love decaying,

When thus I throw myself into thy bosom,
With all the resolution of strong truth?
Beats not my heart, as 'twould alarm thine
To a new charge of bliss?—I joy more in thee,
Than did thy mother, when she hugg'd thee first,
And bless'd the gods for all her travail past.

Jaf. Can there in woman be such glorious faith?

Sure all ill stories of thy sex are false!
Oh woman! lovely woman! nature made thee
To temper man: we had been brutes without you!
Angels are painted fair, to look like you:
There's in you all that we believe of heaven;
Amazing brightness, purity, and truth,
Eternal joy, and everlasting love.

Bel. If love be treasure, we'll be wondrous rich;

I have so much, my heart will surely break with't:
Vows not express it. When I would declare How great's my joy, I'm dumb with the big thought;

I swell, and sigh, and labour with my longing.
O! lead me to some desert wide and wild,
Barrer as our misfortunes, where my soul
May have its vent, where I may tell aloud
To the high heavens, and every list'ning planet,
With what a boundless stock my bosom's fraught;
Where I may throw my eager arms about thee,

Give loose to love, with kisses kindling joy,
And let off all the fire that's in my heart.

Jaf. Oh, Belvidera! doubly I'm a beggar:
Undone by fortune, and in debt to thee.
Want, worldly want, that hungry, meagre fiend,
Is at my heels, and chases me in view:
Canst thou bear cold and hunger? Can these limbs,

Fram'd for the tender offices of love,
Endure the bitter gripes of smarting poverty?
When banish'd by our miseries abroad
(As suddenly we shall be) to seek out
In some far climate, where our names are strangers,
For charitable succour; wilt thou then,
When in a bed of straw we shrink together,
And the bleak winds shall whistle round our heads;

Wilt thou then talk thus to me? Wilt thou then
Hush my cares thus, and shelter me with love?

Bel. Oh! I will love thee, even in madness love
thee,

Though my distracted senses should forsake me,
I'd find some intervals, when my poor heart
Should swage itself, and be let loose to thine.
Though the bare earth be our resting-place,
Its roots our food, some cleft our habitation,
I'll make this arm a pillow for thine head;
And, as thou sighing liest, and swell'd with sorrow,

Creep to thy bosom, pour the balm of love
Into thy soul, and kiss thee to thy rest;
Then praise our God, and watch thee till the morning.

Jaf. Hear this, ye heavens! and wonder how you made her:

Reign, reign, ye monarchs that divide the world,
Busy rebellion ne'er will let you know
Tranquillity and happiness like mine!
Like gaudy ships th' obsequious billows fall,
And rise again to lift you in your pride;
They wait but for a storm, and then devour you—
I, in my private bark already wreck'd,
Like a poor merchant driven to unknown land,
That had by chance pack'd up his choicest treasure
In one dear casket, and sav'd only that;
Since I must wander farther on the shore,
Thus hug my little, but my precious store,
Resolv'd to scorn and trust my fate no more.

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The Rialto.

Enter JAFFIER.

Jaf. I'm here; and thus, the shades of night around me,

I look as if all hell were in my heart,
And I in hell. Nay, surely 'tis so with me!—
For every step I tread, methinks some fiend
Knocks at my breast, and bids me not be quiet.
I've heard how desperate wretches, like myself,
Have wander'd out at this dead time of night,
To meet the foe of mankind in his walk.
Sure I'm so curs'd that, though of heaven forsaken,

No minister of darkness cares to tempt me.
Hell, hell! why sleep'st thou?

Enter PIERRE.

Pier. Sure I've staid too long:
The clock has struck, and I may lose my pro-
Speak, who goes there? [selyte.]

Jaf. A dog, that comes to howl [tion ?
At yonder moon. What's he that asks the ques-

Pier. A friend to dogs, for they are honest creatures,

And ne'er betray their master : never fawn
On any that they love not. Well met, friend :
Jaffier !

Jaf. The same.

Pier. Where's Belvidera ?—

Jaf. For a day or two

I've lodg'd her privately, till I see further
What fortune will do for me. Pry'thee, friend,
If thou wouldst have me fit to hear good counsel,
Speak not of Belvidera—

Pier. Not of her !

Jaf. Oh, no !

Pier. Not name her ! May be I wish her well.

Jaf. Whom well !

Pier. Thy wife ; thy lovely Belvidera,
I hope a man may wish his friend's wife well,
And no harm done ?

Jaf. Y' are merry, Pierre.

Pier. I am so :

Thou shalt smile too, and Belvidera smile :
We'll all rejoice. Here's something to buy pins ;
Marriage is chargeable. [Gives him a purse.

Jaf. I but half wish'd

To see the devil, and he's here already. Well !
What must this buy ? Rebellion, murder, treason ?

Tell me which way I must be damn'd for this.

Pier. When last we parted, we'd no qualms like these,

But entertain'd each other's thoughts like men
Whose souls were well acquainted. Is the world Reform'd since our last meeting ? What new miracles

Have happen'd ? Has Priuli's heart relented ?
Can he be honest ?

Jaf. Kind Heaven, let heavy curses
Gall his old age : cramps, aches, rack his bones,
And bitterest disquiet wring his heart.
Oh ! let him live, till life become his burden :
Let him groan under't long, linger an age
In the worst agonies and pangs of death,
And find its ease but late.

Pier. Nay, couldst thou not

As well, my friend, have stretch'd the curse to all
The senate round, as to one single villain ?

Jaf. But curses stick not : could I kill with cursing,

By Heaven I know not thirty heads in Venice
Should not be blasted. Senators should rot
Like dogs on dunghills. Oh ! for a curse
To kill with !

Pier. Daggers ! daggers are much better.

Jaf. Ha !

Pier. Daggers.

Jaf. But where are they ?

Pier. Oh ! a thousand

May be dispos'd of, in honest hands, in Venice.

Jaf. Thou talk'st in clouds.

Pier. But yet a heart, half wrong'd

As thine has been, would find the meaning,

Jaffier.

Jaf. A thousand daggers, all in honest hands !
And have not I a friend will stick one here !

Pier. Yes, if I thought thou wert not cherish'd
T' a nobler purpose, I would be thy friend ;
But thou hast better friends ; friends whom thy wrongs

Have made thy friends ; friends worthy to be call'd so.

I'll trust thee with a secret. There are spirits
This hour at work.—But as thou art a man,
Whom I have pick'd and chosen from the world,
Swear that thou wilt be true to what I utter ;
And when I've told thee that which only gods,
And men like gods, are privy to, then swear
No chance or change shall wrest it from thy bosom.

Jaf. When thou wouldst bind me, is their need of oaths ?

For thou'rt so near my heart, that thou may'st
Its bottom, sound its strength and firmness to
thee.

Is coward, fool, or villain, in my face ?

If I seem none of these, I dare believe

Thou would'st not use me in a little cause,
For I am fit for honour's toughest task,
Nor ever yet found fooling was my province ;
An' for a villanous, inglorious enterprise,
I know thy heart so well, I dare lay mine
Before thee, set it to what point thou wilt.

Pier. Nay, 'tis a cause thou wilt be fond o'
Jaffier ;

For it is founded on the noblest basis,
Our liberties, our natural inheritance.
There's no religion, no hypocrisy in't ;
We'll do the business, and ne'er fast and pray for't ;
Openly act a deed the world shall gaze
With wonder at, and envy when 'tis done.

Jaf. For liberty !

Pier. For liberty, my friend,

Thou shalt be freed from base Priuli's tyranny,

And thy sequester'd fortunes heal'd again :

I shall be freed from those opprobrious wrongs
That press me now, and bend my spirit downward ;

All Venice free, and every growing merit
Succeed to its just right ; fools shall be pull'd
From wisdom's seat : those baleful, unclean birds,
Those lazy owls, who, perch'd near fortune's top,
Sit only watchful with their heavy wings
To cuff down new-fledg'd virtues, that would rise
To nobler heights, and make the grove harmonious.

Jaf. What can I do ?

Pier. Canst thou not kill a senator ?

Jaf. Were there one wise or honest, I could kill him,

For herding with that nest of fools and knaves.
By all my wrongs, thou talk'st as if revenge
Were to be had ; and the brave story warms me.

Pier. Swear then !

Jaf. I do, by all those glittering stars,
And yon great ruling planet of the night ;
By all good powers above, and ill below ;
By love and friendship, dearer than my life,
No power or death shall make me false to thee.

Pier. Here we embrace, and I'll unlock my heart.

A council's held hard by, where the destruction
Of this great empire's hatching : there I'll lead
thee.

But be a man ! for thou'rt to mix with men
Fit to disturb the peace of all the world,
And rule it when it's wildest—

Jaf. I give thee thanks

For this kind warning. Yes, I'll be a man,
And charge thee, Pierre, whene'er thou see'st my fears

Betray me less, to rip this heart of mine

Out of my breast, and show it for a coward's.
Come, let's be gone, for from this hour I chase
All little thoughts, all tender human follies.
Out of my bosom. Vengeance shall have room:
Revenge!

Pier. And liberty!

Jaf. Revenge—revenge— [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—AQUILINA'S HOUSE.

Enter RENAULT.

Ren. Why was my choice ambition? the wretch can build on! It's indeed, at distance

A goodly prospect, tempting to the view;
The height delights us, and the mountain top
Looks beautiful, because it's nigh to heaven.
But we ne'er think how sandy's the foundation,
What storm will batter, and what tempest shake.
Who's there? [us.]

Enter SPINOSA.

Spin. Renault, good-morrow, for by this time
I think the scale of night has turn'd the balance,
And weighs up morning! Has the clock struck twelve?

Ren. Yes! clocks will go as they are set; but
man,

Irregular man's ne'er constant, never certain:
I've spent at least three precious hours of darkness
In waiting dull attendance: 'tis the curse
Of diligent virtue to be mix'd, like mine,
With giddy tempers, souls but half resolv'd.

Spin. Hell seize that soul amongst us it can frighten.

Ren. What's then the cause that I am here.
Why are we not together? [alone?]

Enter ELLIOTT.

O, Sir, welcome! [ing.]
You are an Englishman: when treason's hatch-
One might have thought you'd not have been behindhand.

In what whore's lap have you been lolling?
Give but an Englishman his whore and ease,
Beef, and a sea-coal fire, he's yours for ever.

Ell. Frenchman, you are saucy.

Ren. How!

Enter BEDAMAR, the Ambassador; THEODORE,
BRAMVEIL, DURAND, BRABE, REVILLIDO,
MEZZANA, TERNON, and RETROSI, Conspirators.

Bed. At difference; fie!
Is this a time for quarrels? Thieves and rogues Fall out and brawl: should men of your high calling,

Men separated by the choice of Providence
From the gross heap of mankind, and set here
In this assembly as in one great jewel,
T' adorn the bravest purpose it e'er smil'd on;
Should you, like boys, wrangle for trifles?

Ren. Boys!

Bed. Renault, thy hand.

Ren. I thought I'd given my heart
Long since to every man that mingles here;
But grieve to find it trusted with such tempers,
That can't forgive my froward age its weakness.

Bed. Elliott, thou once hadst virtue. I have seen

Thy stubborn temper bend with godlike goodness,
Not half thus courted. 'Tis thy nation's glory
T' hug the foe that offers brave alliance.

Once more embrace, my friends—we'll all embrace.

United thus, we are the mighty engine
Must twist this rooted empire from its basis.
Totters not it already?

Ell. Would 'twere tumbling.

Bed. Nay, it shall down; this night we seal its ruin.

Enter PIERRE.

Oh, Pierre, thou art welcome.
Come to my breast, for by its hopes thou look'st
Lovely dreadful, and the fate of Venice
Seems on thy sword already. Oh, my Mars!
The poets that first feign'd a god of war,
Sure prophesied of thee.

Pier. Friend, was not Brutus
(I mean that Brutus, who, in open senate Stab'd the first Cæsar that usurp'd the world,)
A gallant man?

Ren. Yes, and Catiiline too;
Though story wrong his fame; for he conspir'd
To prop the reeling glory of his country:
His cause was good.

Bed. And ours as much above it,
As, Renault, thou'rt superior to Cethegus,
Or Pierre to Cassius.

Pier. Then to what we aim at.
When do we start? or must we talk for ever?
Bed. No, Pierre, the deed's near birth; fate seems to have set

The business up, and given it to our care;
I hope there's not a heart or hand amongst us,
But is firm and ready.

All. All.

We'll die with Bedamar.

Bed. O men

Matchless! as will your glory be hereafter:
The game is for a matchless prize, if won;
If lost, disgraceful ruin.

Pier. Ten thousand men are armed at your nod,
Commanded all by leaders fit to guide
A battle for the freedom of the world:
This wretched state has starv'd them in its service; [solved]

And, by your bounty quicken'd, they're re-
To serve your glory, and revenge their own:
They've all their different quarters in this city,
Watch for th' alarm, and grumble 'tis so tardy.

Bed. I doubt not, friend, but thy unwearied diligence

Has still kept waking, and it shall have ease;
After this night it is resolv'd we meet
No more, till Venice owns us for her lords.

Pier. How lovely the Adriatic whore, Dress'd in her flames, will shine! Devouring flames

Such as shall burn her to the watery bottom,
And hiss in her foundation.

Bed. Now if any

Amongst us, that owns this glorious cause,
Have friends or interest he'd wish to save,
Let it be told! the general doom is seal'd;
But I'd forego the hopes of a world's empire,
Rather than wound the bowels of my friend.

Pier. I must confess, you there have touch'd my weakness.

I have a friend; hear it! such a friend,
My heart was ne'er shut to him. Nay, I'll tell
you;

He knows the very business of this hour;
But he rejoices in the cause, and loves it;

We've chang'd a vow to live and die together,
And he's at hand to ratify it here.

Ren. How! all betray'd!

Pier. No—I've nobly dealt with you;
I've brought my all into the public stock:
I've but one friend, and him I'll share among
you:

Receive and cherish him; or if, when seen
And search'd, you find him worthless,—as my tongue

Has lodg'd this secret in his faithful breast,—
To ease your fears, I wear a dagger here
Shall rip it out again, and give you rest.
Come forth, thou only good I'er could boast of.

Enter JAFFIER, with a dagger.

Bed. His presence bears the show of manly virtue.

Jaf. I know you'll wonder all, that, thus, un-call'd,

I dare approach this place of fatal councils;
But I'm amongst you, and by Heaven it glads me
To see so many virtues thus united
To restore justice, and dethrone oppression.
Command this sword, if you would have it quiet,
Into this breast; but, if you think it worthy
To cut the throats of reverend rogues in robes,
Send me into the curs'd assembled senate:
It shrinks not, though I meet a father there.
Would you behold this city flaming? here 's
A hand shall bear a lighted torch at noon
To th' arsenal, and set its gates on fire.

Ren. You talk this well, Sir.

Jaf. Nay—by Heaven, I'll do this.

Come, come, I read distrust in all your faces;
You fear me, villain, and, indeed, it's odd
To hear a stranger talk thus, at first meeting,
Of matters that have been so well debated;
But I come ripe with wrongs, as you with councils.

I hate this senate, am a foe to Venice;
A friend to none, but men resolv'd like me
To push on mischief. Oh! did you but know me,
I need not talk thus!

Bed. Pierre, I must embrace him.

My heart beats to this man, as if it knew him.

Ren. I never lov'd these huggers.

Jaf. Still I see

The cause delights ye not. Your friends survey
me

As I were dangerous—But I come arm'd
Against all doubts, and to your trust will give A pledge worth more than all the world can pay for.

My Belvidera. Ho; my Belvidera!

Bed. What wonder's next?

Jaf. Let me entreat you,

As I have henceforth hopes to call you friends,
That all but the ambassador, and this Grave guide of councils, with my friend that owns
me,

Withdraw awhile, to spare a woman's blushes.

[Exeunt all but BEDAMAR, RENAULT, JAFFIER, and PIERRE.

Enter BELVIDERA.

Bed. Pierre, whither will this ceremony lead
us?

Jaf. My Belvidera! Belvidera!

Bel. Who,

Who calls so loud at this late peaceful hour?
That voice was wont to come in gentle whispers,

And fill my ears with the soft breath of love.
Thou hourly image of my thoughts, where art thou?

Jaf. Indeed 'tis late.

Bel. Alas! where am I? whither is't you lead
me?

Methinks I read distraction in your face,
Something less gentle than the fate you tell me.
You shake and tremble too! your blood runs
cold!

Heavens guard my love, and bless his heart with patience.

Jaf. That I have patience, let our fate bear
witness,

Who has ordain'd it so, that thou and I (Thou, the divinest good man e'er possess'd,
And I the wretched'st of the race of man)
This very hour, without one tear, must part.

Bel. Part! must we part? Oh, am I then forsaken?

Why drag you from me? whither are you going?
My dear! my life! my love!

Jaf. Oh, friends!

Bel. Speak to me.

Jaf. Take her from my heart,
She'll gain such hold else, I shall ne'er get loose
I charge thee take her, but with tender'st care
Relieve her troubles, and assuage her sorrows.

Ren. Rise, Madam, and command amongst your servants.

Jaf. To you, Sirs, and your honours, I bequeath her;

And with her this when I prove unworthy—

[Gives a dagger.

You know the rest—then strike it to her heart;
And tell her, he who three whole happy years
Lay in her arms, and each kind night repeated
The passionate vows of still increasing love,
Sent that reward for all her truth and sufferings.

Bel. Nay, take my life, since he has sold it cheaply.

O! thou unkind one;
Never meet more! I have deserved this from you;
Look on me, tell me, speak, thou fair deceiver.
Why am I separated from thy love?
If I am false, accuse me; but, if true,
Don't, pry'thee don't, in poverty forsake me,
But pity the sad heart that's torn with parting.
Yet hear me, yet recall me—

[Exit REN. BED. and BEL.

Jaf. Oh! my eyes,

Look not that way, but turn yourselves awhile
Into my heart, and be wean'd altogether.
My friend, where art thou?

Pier. Here, my honour's brother.

Jaf. Is Belvidera gone?

Pier. Renault has led her

Back to her own apartment; but, by Heaven,
Thou must not see her more, till our work's over.

Jaf. No!

Pier. Not for your life.

Jaf. Oh, Pierre, wert thou but she,
How I would pull thee down into my heart.
Gaze on thee, till my eye-strings crack'd with
love;

Then, swelling, sighing, raging to be bless'd,
Come like a panting turtle to my breast;
On thy soft bosom hovering, bill, and play
Confess'd the cause why last I fled away.
Own 'twas a fault, but swear to give it o'er,
And never follow false ambition more.

[Exeunt.

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Chamber.

Enter BELVIDERA.

Bel. I'm sacrific'd! I'm sold! betray'd to shame!
Inevitable ruin has enclos'd me!
He that should guard my virtue has betray'd it!
Left me! undone me! Oh, that I could hate him!
Where shall I go? Oh, whither, whither wander?

Enter JAFFIER.

Jaf. Can Belvidera want a resting-place,
When these poor arms are ready to receive her?
There was a time——

Bel. Yes, yes, there was a time,
When Belvidera's tears, her cries, and sorrows,
Were not despis'd; when, if she chanc'd to sigh,
Or look'd but sad—there was indeed a time,
When Jaffier would have ta'en her in his arms,
Eas'd her declining head upon his breast,
And never left her till he found the cause.

Jaf. Oh, Portia, Portia! what a soul was thine!

Bel. That Portia was a woman; and when Brutus, [safety!]
Big with the fate of Rome, (Heaven guard thy Conceal'd from her the labours of his mind;
She let him see her blood was great as his,
Flow'd from a spring as noble, and a heart
Fit to partake his troubles as his love.

Fetch, fetch that dagger back, the dreadful dower,
Thou gav'st last night in parting with me;
strike it

Here to my heart; and, as the blood flows from it,
Judge if it run not pure, as Cato's daughter's.

Jaf. Oh! Belvidera?

Bel. Why was I last night deliver'd to a villain?

Jaf. Ha! a villain!

Bel. Yes, to a villain! why at such an hour
Meets that assembly, all made up of wretches?
Why, I in this hand, and in that a dagger,
Was I deliver'd with such dreadful ceremonies?
To you, Sirs, and to your honours, I bequeath
her,

And with her this: when'er I prove unworthy—
You know the rest—then strike it to her heart.

Oh! why's that rest conceal'd from me? must I
Be made the hostage of a hellish trust?

For such I know I am; that's all my value.

But, by the love and loyalty I owe thee,

I'll free thee from the bondage of the slaves;

Straight to the senate, tell 'em all I know,

All that I think, all that my fears inform me.

Jaf. Is this the Roman virtue; this the blood

That boasts its purity with Cato's daughter?

Would she have e'er betray'd her Brutus?

Bel. No:

For Brutus trusted her. Wert thou so kind,

What would not Belvidera suffer for thee?

Jaf. I shall undo myself, and tell thee all.

Yet think a little, ere thou tempt me further;

Think I've a tale to tell will shake thy nature,

Melt all this boasted constancy thou talk'st of,

Into vile tears and despicable sorrows:

Then if thou shouldst betray me!—

Bel. Shall I swear?

Jaf. No, do not swear: I would not violate

Thy tender nature, with so rude a bond:

But as thou hop'st to see me live my days,

And love thee long, lock this within thy breast:

I've bound myself, by all the strictest sacraments
Divine and human——

Bel. Speak!

Jaf. To kill thy father——

Bel. My father!

Jaf. Nay, the throats of the whole senate
Shall bleed, my Belvidera. He amongst us,
That spares his father, brother, or his friend,
Is damn'd.

Bel. Oh!

Jaf. Have a care, and shrink not even in
For if thou dost—— [thought.]

Bel. I know it; thou wilt kill me.

Do, strike thy sword into this bosom: lay me
Dead on the earth, and then thou wilt be safe.

Murder my father! though his cruel nature

Has persecuted me to my undoing;

Driven me to basest wants; can I behold him,

With smiles of vengeance, butcher'd in his age?

The sacred fountain of my life destroy'd?

And canst thou shed the blood that gave me being?

Nay, be a traitor too, and sell thy country?

Can thy great heart descend so vilely low,

Mix with hir'd slaves, bravoes, and common stab-
bers,

Nose-slitters, alley-lurking villains! join

With such a crew, and take a ruffian's wages,

To cut the throats of wretches as they sleep!

Jaf. Thou wrong'st me, Belvidera! I've en-gag'd

With men of souls; fit to reform the ills

Of all mankind: there's not a heart among them

But's stout as death, yet honest as the nature

Of man first made, ere fraud and vice were fashion.

Bel. What's he, to whose curs'd hands last night thou gav'st me?

Was that well done? Oh! I could tell a story,

Would rouse thy lion heart out of its den,

And make it rage with terrifying fury.

Jaf. Speak on, I charge thee.

Bel. O my love! If e'er

Thy Belvidera's peace deserv'd thy care,

Remove me from this place. Last night, last night!

Jaf. Distract me not, but give me all the truth.

Bel. No sooner wert thou gone, and I alone,

Left in the power of that old son of mischief;

No sooner was I lain on my sad bed,

But that vile wretch approach'd me, loose, un-button'd,

Ready for violation. Then my heart

Throbb'd with its fears: Oh, how I wept and sigh'd, [him]

And shrank and trembled! wish'd in vain for

That should protect me! Thou, alas! wert gone.

Jaf. Patience, sweet heaven, till I make vengeance sure:

Bel. He drew the hideous dagger forth, thou gav'st him,

And with upbraiding smiles, he said, Behold it:

This is the pledge of a false husband's love:

And in my arms then press'd, and would have clasp'd me;

But with my cries I scar'd his coward heart,

'Till he withdrew, and mutter'd vows to hell.

These are thy friends! with these thy life, thy honour,

Thy love, all stak'd, and all will go to ruin.

Jaf. No more: I charge thee keep this secret
close.

Clear up thy sorrows; look as if thy wrongs

Were all forgot, and treat him like a friend,

As no complaint were made. No more; retire,

Retire, my life, and doubt not of my honour;
I'll heal its failings, and deserve thy love.

Bel. Oh! should I part with thee, I fear thou wilt

In anger leave me, and return no more.

Jaf. Return no more! I would not live without thee

Another night, to purchase the creation.

Bel. When shall we meet again?

Jaf. Anon, at twelve

I'll steal myself to thy expecting arms:
Come like a travell'd dove, and bring thee peace.

Bel. Indeed!

Jaf. By all our loves.

Bel. 'Tis hard to part:

But sure no falsehood ever look'd so fairly.

Farewell; remember twelve. [Exit.]

Jaf. Let heaven forget me,
When I remember not thy truth, thy love.

Enter PIERRE.

Pier. Jaffier!

Jaf. Who calls?

Pier. A friend, that could have wish'd
T' have found thee otherwise employ'd. What hunt

A wife, on the dull soil! Sure a staunch husband
Of all hounds is the dullest. Wilt thou never,
Never be wean'd from caudles and confections?
What feminine tales hast thou been list'ning to,
Of unfair'd sheets, catarrhs, and tooth-ach, got
By thin-sol'd shoes? Damnation! that a fellow,
Chosen to be a sharer in the destruction
Of a whole people, should sneak thus into corners
To ease his fulsome lusts, and fool his mind.

Jaf. May not a man then trifle out an hour
With a kind woman, and not wrong his calling?

Pier. Not in a cause like ours.

Jaf. Then, friend, our cause

Is in a damn'd condition: for I'll tell thee,
That cankerworm, call'd lechery, has touch'd it;
'Tis tainted vitely. Wouldst thou think it?

Renault

(That mortified, old, wither'd, winter rogue.)
He visited her last night, like a kind guardian:
Faith! she has some temptation, that 's the truth
on't.

Pier. He durst not wrong his trust.

Jaf. 'Twas something late, though,
To take the freedom of a lady's chamber.

Pier. Was she in bed?

Jaf. Yes, faith, in virgin sheets,
White as her bosom, Pierre, dish'd neatly up,
Might tempt a weaker appetite to taste.
Oh! how the old fox stunk, I warrant thee,
When the rank fit was on him!

Pier. Patience guide me!
He us'd no violence?

Jaf. No, no; out on't, violence!
Play'd with her neck; brush'd her with his gray beard;

But not a jot of violence.

Pier. Damn him.

Jaf. Ay, so say I: but hush, no more on't.
All hitherto is well, and I believe
Myself no monster yet. Sure it is near the hour
We all should meet for our concluding orders:
Will the ambassador be here in person?

Pier. No, he has sent commission to that villain, Renault,

To give the executing charge:
I'd have thee be a man, if possible,

Vol. I. . . . 2 K

22*

And keep thy temper; for a brave revenge
Ne'er comes too late.

Jaf. Fear not, I am cool as patience.

Pier. He's yonder, coming this way through the hall;
His thoughts seem full.

Jaf. Prythee retire, and leave me

With him alone: I'll put him on some trial;
See how his rotten part will bear the touching.

Pier. Be careful, then. [Exit.]

Jaf. Nay, never doubt, but trust me.

What! be a devil, take a damning oath
For shedding native blood! Can there be a sin
In merciful repentance? Oh, this villain!

Enter RENAULT.

Ren. Perverse and peevish! what a slave is
To let his rebel passions master him! [man,
Despatch the tool her husband—that were well.

Who's there?

Jaf. A man.

Ren. My friend, my near ally,
The hostage of your faith, my beauteous charge,
is very well.

Jaf. Sir, are you sure of that?
Stands she in perfect health? Beats her pulse Neither too hot nor cold? [even;]

Ren. What means that question?

Jaf. Oh! women have fantastic constitutions,
Inconstant in their wishes, always wavering,
And never fix'd. Was it not boldly done,
Even at first sight, to trust the thing I lov'd
(A tempting treasure too) with youth so fierce
And vigorous as thine? but thou art honest.

Ren. Who dares accuse me?

Jaf. Curs'd be he that doubts

Thy virtue! I have tried it, and declare,
Were I to choose a guardian of my honour,
I'd put it in thy keeping: for I know thee.

Ren. Know me!

Jaf. Ay, know thee. There 's no falsehood in
thee.

Thou look'st just as thou art. Let us embrace.
Now wouldst thou cut my throat, or I cut thine.

Ren. You dare not do't.

Jaf. You lie, Sir.

Ren. How!

Jaf. No more,

'Tis a base world, and must reform, that 's all.

Enter SPINOSA, THEODORE, ELLIOTT, REVIL-
LIDO, DURAND, BROMVEIL, and the rest of the Conspirators.

Ren. Spinosa! Theodore!

Spin. The same.

Ren. You are welcome.

Spin. You are trembling, Sir.

Ren. 'Tis a cold night, indeed, and I am aged;
Full of decay and natural infirmities:

Re-enter PIERRE.

We shall be warm, my friends, I hope, to-morrow.

Pier. 'Twas not well done; thou shouldst have strok'd him,
And not have gall'd him.

Jaf. Damn him, let him chew on't.
Heaven! where am I? beset with cursed fiends,
That wait to damn me! What a devil's man,
When he forgets his nature—hush, my heart.

Ren. My friends, 'tis late; are we assembled
all?

To-morrow's rising sun must see you all

Deck'd in your honours. Are the soldiers ready?

Pier. All, all.

Ren. You, Durand, with your thousand, must possess

St. Mark's; you, captain, know your charge al-
'Tis to secure the ducal palace.

Be all this done with the least tumult possible,
'Till in each place you post sufficient guards;
Then sheathe your swords in every breast you meet.

Jaf. Oh! reverend cruelty! damn'd bloody villain!

Ren. During this execution, Durand, you must in the midst keep your battalia fast; And, Theodore, be sure to plant the cannon That they may command the streets; This done, we'll give the general alarm, Apply petards, and force the ar'snal gates; Then fire the city round in several places, Or with our cannon (if it dare resist) Batter to ruin. But above all, I charge you, Shed blood enough; spare neither sex nor age, Name nor condition; if there live a senator After to-morrow, though the dullest rogue That e'er said nothing, we have lost our ends. If possible, let's kill the very name Of senator, and bury it in blood.

Jaf. Merciless, horrid slave! Ay, blood enough! Shed blood enough, old Renault! how thou charm'st me!

Ren. But one thing more, and then farewell, till fate

Join us again, or sep'rate us for ever.

First let's embrace. Heaven knows who next shall thus Wing ye together; but let's all remember, We wear no common cause upon our swords: Let each man think that on his single virtue Depends the good and fame of all the rest; Eternal honour, or perpetual infamy. You droop, Sir.

Jaf. No; with most profound attention I've heard it all, and wonder at thy virtue. Oh, Belvidera! take me to thy arms.

And show me where's my peace, for I have lost it. [Exit.]

Ren. Without the least remorse then, let's resolve

With fire and sword t' exterminate these tyrants, Under whose weight this wretched country labours;

The means are only in our hands to crown them.

Pier. And may those powers above that are propitious

To gallant minds, record this cause and bless it.

Ren. Thus happy, thus secure of all we wish. Should there, my friends, be found among us one False to this glorious enterprise, what fate, What vengeance, were enough for such a villain?

Elli. Death here without repentance, hell hereafter.

Ren. Let that be my lot, if as here I stand, Listed by fate among her darling sons, Though I had one only brother, dear by all The strictest ties of nature; could I have such a friend

Join'd in this cause, and had but ground to fear He meant foul play; may this right hand drop from me,

If I'd not hazard all my future peace, And stab him to the heart before you: who,

Who would do less? Wouldst thou not, Pierre the same?

Pier. You've singled me, Sir, out for this hard question,

As if it were started only for my sake!

Am I the thing you fear? Here, here's my bosom, Search it with all your swords. Am I a traitor?

Ren. No; but I fear your late commended friend

Is little less. Come, Sirs, 'tis now no time To trifle with our safety. Where's this Jaffier?

Spin. He left the room just now, in strange disorder.

Ren. Nay, there is danger in him. I observ'd him;

During the time I took for explanation, He was transported from most deep attention To a confusion which he could not smother; His looks grew full of sadness and surprise, All which betray'd a wavering spirit in him, That labour'd with reluctancy and sorrow.

What's requisite for safety, must be done With speedy execution; he remains

Yet in our power: I, for my own part, wear A dagger—

Pier. Well.

Ren. And I could wish it—

Pier. Where?

Ren. Buried in his heart.

Pier. Away, we're yet all friends,

No more of this, 'twill breed ill blood among us.

Spin. Let us all draw our swords, and search the house, [ing]

Pull him from the dark hole where he sits brood-
O'er his cold fears, and each man kill his share of him.

Pier. Who talks of killing? Who's he'll shed the blood

That's dear to me? is't you, or you, or you, Sir?

What, not one speak! how you stand gaping all On your grave oracle, your wooden god there!

Yet not a word! Then, Sir, I'll tell you a secret, Suspicion's but at best a coward's virtue.

[To RENAULT.]

Ren. A coward!

Pier. Put up thy sword, old man;

Thy hand shakes at it. Come, let's heal this breach,

I am too hot, we yet may all live friends.

Spin. Till we are safe, our friendship cannot be so.

Pier. Again! Who's that?

Spin. 'T was I.

Theo. And I.

Ren. And I.

Omnes. And all.

Ren. Who are on my side?

Spin. Every honest sword.

Let's die like men, and not be sold like slaves.

Pier. One such word more, by heaven I'll to the senate,

And hang ye all, like dogs, in clusters.

Why weep your coward swords half out their shells?

Why do you not all brandish them like mine?

You fear to die, and yet dare talk of killing.

Ren. Go to the senate, and betray us! haste!

Secure thy wretched life; we fear to die

Less than thou dar'st be honest.

Pier. That's rank falsehood.

Fear'st not thou death! Fie, there's a knavish itch

In that salt blood, an utter foe to smarting.
Had Jaffier's wife prov'd kind, he'd still been true.
Fough, how that stinks! thou die, thou kill my friend!

Or thou! or thou! with that lean wither'd face.
Away, disperse all to your several charges,
And meet to-morrow where your honour calls you.
I'll bring that man, whose blood you so much thirst for,
And you shall see him venture for you fairly—
Hence! hence, I say.

[Exit RENAULT, angrily.
Spin. I fear we've been to blame,
And done too much.

Theo. 'Twas too far urg'd against the man you lov'd.

Rev. Here, take our swords, and crush them with your feet.

Spin. Forgive us, gallant friend.

Pier. Nay, now you've found

The way to melt, and cast me as you will.
Whence rose all this discord?

Oh, what a dangerous precipice have we 'scap'd!
How near a fall was all we'd long been building!
What an eternal blot had stain'd our glories,
If one, the bravest and the best of men,
Had fallen a sacrifice to rash suspicion, Butcher'd by those whose cause he came to cherish!

Come but to-morrow, all your doubts shall end,
And to your loves, me better recommend,
That I've preserv'd your fame, and sav'd my friend. Exeunt.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—The Rialto.

Enter JAFFIER and BELVIDERA.

Jaf. Where dost thou lead me? Every step I move,

Methinks I tread upon some mangled limb
Of a rack'd friend. O, my charming ruin!
Where are we wandering?

Bel. To eternal honour.

To do a deed shall chronicle thy name
Among the glorious legends of those few

That have sav'd sinking nations. Thy renown
Shall be the future song of all the virgins,

Who by thy piety have been preserv'd
From horrid violation. Every street

Shall be adorn'd with statues to thy honour;
And at thy feet this great inscription written,

Remember him that propp'd the fall of Venice.

Jaf. Rather, remember him, who, after all
The sacred bonds of oaths, and holier friendship,

In fond compassion to a woman's tears,
Forgot his manhood, virtue, truth, and honour,

To sacrifice the bosom that reliev'd him.
Why wilt thou damn me?

Bel. Oh, inconstant man!
How will you promise; how will you deceive!

Do, return back, replace me in my bondage,
Tell all my friends how dangerously thou lov'st
me,

And let thy dagger do its bloody office.
Or, if thou think'st it nobler, let me live,

Till I'm a victim to the hateful lust
Of that infernal devil.

Last night, my love!
Jaf. Name it not again;

It shows a beastly image to my fancy,

Will wake me into madness.
Destruction, swift destruction, fall on my coward
head.

Bel. Delay no longer then, but to the senate,
And tell the dismal'st story ever utter'd:
Tell 'em what bloodshed, rapines, desolations,
Have been prepar'd: how near's the fatal hour.
Save thy poor country, save the reverend blood
Of all its nobles, which to-morrow's dawn
Must else see shed.

Jaf. Oh! think what then may prove my lot;
By all heaven's powers, prophetic truth dwells in
thee;

For every word thou speak'st, strikes through my heart.

Just what thou'st made me, take me, Belvidera,
And lead me to the place where I'm to say
This bitter lesson; where I must betray
My truth, my virtue, constancy, and friends.
Must I betray my friend? Ah! take me quickly;
Secure me well before that thought's renew'd;
If I relapse once more, all's lost for ever.

Bel. Hast thou a friend more dear than Belvidera?

Jaf. No; thou'rt my soul itself; wealth, friendship, honour,

All present joys, and earnest of all future,
Are summ'd in thee.

Come, lead me forward, now, like
To sacrifice. Thus, in his fatal garlands

Deck'd fine and pleas'd, the wanton skips and plays,

Trots by th' enticing, flatt'ring, priestess' side,
And, much transported with its little pride,

Forgets his dear companions of the plain;
Till, by her bound, he's on the altar lain,

Yet then, too, hardly bleats, such pleasure's in the pain.

Enter OFFICER and six Guards.

Off. Stand! who goes there?
Bel. Friends.

Off. But what friends are you?
Bel. Friends to the senate, and the state of Venice.

Off. My orders are to seize on all I find
At this late hour, and bring 'em to the council,
Who are now sitting.

Jaf. Sir, you shall be obey'd.
Now the lot's cast, and fate, do what thou wilt.

[Exeunt, guarded.]

SCENE II.—The Senate-House.

DUKE OF VENICE, PRIULI, and other Senators.

Duke. Antony, Priuli, senators of Venice,
Speak, why are we assembled here to-night?

What have you to inform us of, concerns
The state of Venice' honour, or its safety?

Pri. Could words express the story I've to tell
you,

Fathers, these tears were useless, these sad tears
That fall from my old eyes; but there is cause

We all should weep, tear off these purple robes,
And wrap ourselves in sackcloth, sitting down

On the sad earth, and cry aloud to heaven.
Heaven knows, if yet there be an hour to come

Ere Venice be no more.

All Sen. How!
Pri. Nay, we stand

Upon the very brink of gaping ruin.
Within this city's form'd a dark conspiracy,

To massacre us all, our wives and children,
Kindred and friends, our palaces and temples
To lay in ashes; nay, the hour too fix'd;
The swords, for aught I know, drawn e'en this moment,

And the wild waste begun. From unknown hands
I had this warning; but, if we are men,
Let's not be tamely butcher'd, but do something
That may inform the world, in after ages,
Our virtue was not ruin'd, though we were.

[Noise.]

Room, room, make room for some prisoners—

Enter OFFICER and Guards.

Duke. Speak, there. What disturbance?

Offi. Two prisoners have the guards seiz'd in the street,

Who say they come t'inform this reverend senate
About the present danger.

Enter JAFFIER and OFFICER.

All Sen. Give 'em entrance.—Well, who are you?

Jaf. A villain!

Would every man, that hears me,
Would deal so honestly, and own his title.

Duke. 'Tis rumour'd, that a plot has been contriv'd

Against this state; and you've a share in't too:
If you are a villain, to redeem your honour,
Unfold the truth, and be restor'd with mercy.

Jaf. Think not, that I to save my life came hither;

I know its value better; but in pity
To all those wretches whose unhappy dooms
Are fix'd and seal'd. You see me here before you,
The sworn and covenant'd foe of Venice:

But use me as my dealings may deserve,
And I may prove a friend.

Duke. The slave capitulates;
Give him the tortures.

Jaf. That you dare not do;
Your fear won't let you, nor the longing itch
To hear the story which you dread the truth of:
Truth, which the fear of smart shall ne'er get from me. [whipp'd]

Cowards are scar'd with threatenings; boys are
Into confessions; but a steady mind
Acts of itself, ne'er asks the body counsel.

Give him the tortures! Name but such a thing
Again, by Heaven I'll shut these lips for ever.
Not all your racks, your engines, or your wheels,
Shall force a groan away, that you may guess at.

Duke. Name your conditions.

Jaf. For myself full pardon,
Besides the lives of two-and-twenty friends,
Whose names are here enroll'd. Nay, let their crimes

Be ne'er so monstrous, I must have the oaths
And sacred promise of this reverend council,
That, in a full assembly of the senate,
The thing I ask be ratified. Swear this,
And I'll unfold the secret of your danger.

Duke. Propose the oath.

Jaf. By all the hopes
Ye have of peace and happiness hereafter,
Swear.—Ye swear?

All Sen. We swear.

Jaf. And, as ye keep the oath,
May you and your posterity be bless'd,
Or curs'd for ever.

All Sen. Else be curs'd for ever.

Jaf. Then here's the list, and with't the full disclose

Of all that threatens you. [Delivers a paper
Now, fate, thou hast caught me.

Duke. Give order that all diligent search be made

To seize these men, their characters are public;
The paper intimates their rendezvous
To be at the house of a fam'd Grecian courtizan,
Call'd Aquilina: see that place secur'd.

You, Jaffier, must with patience bear till morning
To be our prisoner.

Jaf. Would the chains of death
Had bound me safe, ere I had known this minute.

Duke. Captain, withdraw your prisoner.

Jaf. Sir, if possible,
Lead me where my own thoughts themselves may lose me;

Where I may doze out what I've left of life,
Forget myself, and this day's guilt and falsehood.
Cruel remembrance, how shall I appease thee?

[Exit.]

Offi. [Without.] More traitors; room, room, room, make room there.

Duke. How's this? guards!
Where are our guards? Shut up the gates, the treason's

Already at our doors.

Enter OFFICER.

Offi. My lords, more traitors,
Seiz'd in the very act of consultation;
Furnish'd with arms and instruments of mischief.
Bring in the prisoners.

Enter PIERRE, RENAULT, THEODORE, ELLIOTT, REVILLIDO, and other Conspirators, in fetters.

Pier. You, my lords, and fathers
(As you are pleas'd to call yourselves) of Venice,
If you sit here to guide the course of justice,
Why these disgraceful chains upon the limbs
That have so often labour'd in your service?
Are these the wreaths of triumph ye bestow
On those, that bring you conquest home and honours?

Duke. Go on; you shall be heard, Sir.

Ant. And be hang'd too, I hope.

Pier. Are these the trophies I've deserv'd for fighting

Your battles with confederated powers?
When winds and seas conspir'd to overthrow you,
And brought the fleets of Spain to your own harbours;

When you, great duke, shrunk trembling in your palace,

And saw your wife, the Adriatic plough'd,
Like a lewd whore, by bolder prows than yours,
Stepp'd not I forth, and taught your loose Venetians

The task of honour, and the way to greatness?
Rais'd you from your capitulating fears
To stipulate the terms of sued-for peace?
And this my recompense! if I'm a traitor, Produce my charge; or show the wretch that's base

And brave enough to tell me I'm a traitor.

Duke. Know you one Jaffier?

[Conspirators murmur.
Pier. Yes, and know his virtue. [ings

His justice, truth, his general worth, and suffer-
From a hard father, taught me first to love him.

Duke. See him brought forth.

Enter JAFFIER, guarded.

Pier. My friend too bound! nay then
Our fate has conquer'd us, and we must fall.
Why droops the man whose welfare's so much
mine,
They're but one thing? These reverend tyrants,
Jaffier,

Call us traitors. Art thou one, my brother?

Jaf. To thee, I am the falsest, veriest slave,
That e'er betray'd a generous, trusting friend,
And gave up honour to be sure of ruin.
All our fair hopes, which morning was t' have
crown'd,
Has this curs'd tongue o'erthrown.

Pier. So, then all's over:
Venice has lost her freedom, I my life.
No more! Farewell!

Duke. Say, will you make confession
Of your vile deeds, and trust the senate's mercy?

Pier. Curs'd be your senate: curs'd your constitution:

The curse of growing factions and divisions
Still vex your councils, shake your public safety,
And make the robes of government you wear
Hateful to you, as these base chains to me.

Duke. Pardon, or death?

Pier. Death! honourable death!

Ren. Death's the best thing we ask, or you can give;
No shameful bonds, but honourable death.

Duke. Break up the council. Captain, guard
your prisoners,
Jaffier, you're free, but these must wait for judgment. [Exeunt all the Senators.]

Pier. Come, where's my dungeon? Lead me to my straw:

It will not be the first time I've lodg'd hard
To do the senate service.

Jaf. Hold, one moment.

Pier. Who's he disputes the judgment of the senate?

Presumptuous rebel!— [Strikes JAFFIER.]

Jaf. By Heaven, you stir not!

I must be heard; I must have leave to speak.

Thou hast disgrac'd me, Pierre, by a vile blow:

Had not a dagger done thee nobler justice?

But use me as thou wilt, thou canst not wrong
me,

For I am fallen beneath the basest injuries:

Yet look upon me with an eye of mercy,

With pity and with charity behold me:

But, as there dwells a godlike nature in thee,

Listen with mildness to my supplications.

Pier. What whining monk art thou? what holy cheat,

That wouldst encroach upon my credulous ears,
And cant'st thus vilely? Hence! I know thee not;
Leave, hypocrite!

Jaf. Not know me, Pierre?

Pier. No, I know thee not! What art thou?

Jaf. Jaffier, thy friend, thy once lov'd, valu'd friend!

Though now deservedly scorn'd, and used most hardly.

Pier. Thou, Jaffier! thou, my once lov'd, valu'd friend! [friend,]

By heavens, thou liest; the man so call'd, my
Was generous, honest, faithful, just, and valiant;
Noble in mind, and in his person lovely;
Dear to my eyes, and tender to my heart:

But thou, a wretched, base, false, worthless coward,

Poor, even in soul, and loathsome in thy aspect;
All eyes must shun thee, and all hearts detest
thee.

Pr'ythee avoid; nor longer cling thus round me,
Like something baneful, that my nature's chill'd at.

Jaf. I have not wrong'd thee, by these tears I have not.

Pier. Hast thou not wrong'd me? Dar'st thou call thyself

That once lov'd, valued friend of mine.

And swear thou hast not wrong'd me? Whence these chains?

Whence the vile death which I may meet this moment?

Whence this dishonour, but from thee, thou false
one?

Jaf. All's true; Yet grant one thing, and I've done asking.

Pier. What's that?

Jaf. To take thy life on such conditions

The council have propos'd: thou, and thy friends,
May yet live long, and to be better treated.

Pier. Life! ask my life! confess! record myself

A villain, for the privilege to breathe!

And carry up and down this cursed city,

A discontented and repining spirit,

Burdensome to itself, a few years longer;

To lose it, may be at last, in a lewd quarrel

For some new friend, treacherous and false as thou art!

No, this vile world and I have long been jangling,

And cannot part on better terms than now,

When only men, like thee, are fit to live in't.

Jaf. By all that's just—

Pier. Swear by some other power,

For thou hast broke that sacred oath too lately.

Jaf. Then, by that hell I merit, I'll not leave
thee,

Till, to thyself, at least, thou'rt reconcil'd,

However thy resentment deal with me.

Pier. Not leave me?

Jaf. No; thou shalt not force me from thee.

Use me reproachfully, and like a slave;

Tread on me, buffet me, heap wrongs on wrongs

On my poor head; I'll bear it all; with patience

Shall weary out thy most unfriendly cruelty:

Lie at thy feet, and kiss 'em, though they spurn
me;

Till, wounded by my sufferings, thou relent,

And raise me to thy arms, with dear forgiveness:

Pier. Art thou not—

Jaf. What?

Pier. A traitor?

Jaf. Yes.

Pier. A villain?

Jaf. Granted.

Pier. A coward, a most scandalous coward;

Spiritless, void of honour; one who has sold

Thy everlasting fame, for shameless life?

Jaf. All, all, and more, and more; my faults are numberless.

Pier. And wouldst thou have me live on terms like thine?

Base, as thou art false—

Jaf. No; 'tis to me that 's granted;

The safety of thy life was all I aim'd at,

In recompense for faith and trust so broken.

Pier. I scorn it more, because preserv'd by
thee;

And as, when first my foolish heart took pity
On thy misfortunes, sought thee in thy miseries,

Reliev'd thy wants, and rais'd thee from the state
Of wretchedness, in which thy fate had plung'd
thee,

To rank thee in my list of noble friends,
All I receiv'd, in surety for thy truth,
Were unregarded oaths, and this, thy dagger,
Given with a worthless pledge, thou since hast stolen,—

So I restore it back to thee again;
Swearing, by all those powers which thou hast violated,

Never, from this curs'd hour, to hold communion,
Friendship, or interest with thee, though our years
Were to exceed those limited the world.

Take it—farewell—for now I owe thee nothing.

Jaf. Say thou wilt live there.

Pier. For my life, dispose it

Just as thou wilt, because 'tis what I'm tir'd with.

Jaf. Oh, Pierre!

Pier. No more.

Jaf. My eyes wont lose the sight of thee,

But languish after thee, and ache with gazing.

Pier. Leave me—Nay, then thus, thus I throw thee from me:

And curses, great as is thy fa'ehood, catch thee.

[Exit.

Jaf. Amen.

He's gone, my father, friend, preserver;

And here 's the portion he has left me:

[Shows the dagger.

This dagger. Well remember'd! with this dagger,

I gave a solemn vow of dire importance;

Parted with this, and Belvidera together.

Have a care, mem'ry, drive that thought no further:

No, I'll esteem it as a friend's last legacy;

Treasure it up within this wretched bosom,

Where it may grow acquainted with my heart,

That, when they meet, they start not from each other. [lain,

So now for thinking—A blow, call'd a traitor, vil-
Coward, dishonourable coward; fough!

Oh! for a long sound sleep, and so forget it.

Down, busy devil!

Enter BELVIDERA.

Bel. Whither shall I fly?

Where hide me and my miseries together?

Where's now the Roman constancy I boasted?

Sunk into trembling fears and desperation,

Not daring to look up to that dear face

Which used to smile, even on my faults; but,
down,

Bending these miserable eyes on earth,

Must move in penance, and implore much mercy.

Jaf. Mercy! kind Heaven has surely endless stores,

Hoarded for thee, of blessings yet untasted:

Oh, Belvidera! I'm the wretched'st creature

E'er crawl'd on earth.

My friend, too, Belvidera, that dear friend,

Who, next to thee, was all my health rejoic'd in,

Has us'd me like a slave, shamefully us'd me;

'T would break thy pitying heart to hear the story.

Bel. What has he done?

Jaf. Before we parted,

Ere yet his guards had led him to his prison,

Full of severest sorrows for his sufferings,

With eyes o'erflowing, and a bleeding head,

As at his feet I kneel'd, and sued for mercy,

With a reproachful hand he dash'd a blow:

He struck me, Belvidera! by Heaven, he struck
me!

Buffed, call'd me traitor, villain, coward.

Am I coward? Am I a villain? Tell me:

Thou'rt the best judge, and mad'st me, if I am so!

Damnation! Coward!

Bel. Oh! forgive him, Jaffier;

And, if his sufferings wound thy heart already,

What will they do to-morrow?

Jaf. Ah!

Bel. To-morrow, [agonies

When thou shalt see him stretch'd in all the

Of a tormenting and a shameful death;

His bleeding bowels, and his broken limbs,

Insulted o'er, by a vile butchering villain;

What will thy heart do then? Oh! sure 'twill

Like my eyes now. [stream

Jaf. What means thy dreadful story?

Death, and to-morrow! Broken limbs and bowels!

Bel. The faithless senators, 'tis they've decreed it:

They say, according to our friends' request,

They shall have death, and not ignoble bondage:

Declare their promis'd mercy all as forfeited:

False to their oaths, and deaf to intercession,

Warrants are pass'd for public death to-morrow.

Jaf. Death! doom'd to die! condemn'd unheard! unpleaded!

Bel. Nay, cruel'st racks and torments are preparing

To force confession from their dying pangs.

Oh! do not look so terribly upon me!

How your lips shake, and all your face disorder'd!

What means my love?

Jaf. Leave me, I charge thee, leave me.—
Strong temptations

Wake in my heart.

Bel. For what?

Jaf. No more, but leave me.

Bel. Why?

Jaf. Oh! by Heaven, I love thee with that fondness,

I would not have thee stay a moment longer

Near these curs'd hands. Are they not cold upon
thee?

[Pulls the dagger half out of his bosom and puts it back again.

Bel. No, everlasting comfort's in thy arms.

To lean thus on thy breast, is softer ease

Than downy pillows, deck'd with leaves of roses

Jaf. Alas! thou think'st not of the thorns 'tis fill'd with: [pent,

Fly, ere they gale thee. There's a lurking ser-

Ready to leap and sting thee to the heart:

Art thou not terrified?

Bel. No.

Jaf. Call to mind

What thou hast done, and whither thou hast brought me.

Bel. Hah!

Jaf. Where's my friend? my friend, thou smiling mischief!

Nay, shrink not, now 'tis too late; thou shouldst have fled

When thy guilt first had cause; for dire revenge
Is up, and raging for my friend. He groans!

Hark, how he groans! his screams are in my ears

Already: see, they've fix'd him on the wheel,
And now they tear him.—Murder! Perjur'd
senate!

Murder.—Oh!—Hark thee, traitress, thou hast done this!

Thanks to thy tears, and false persuading love.
How her eyes speak! Oh, thou bewitching creature!
[Fumbling for his dagger.

Madness can't hurt thee. Come, thou little trembler,

Creep even into my heart, and there lie safe:
'Tis thy own citadel.—Hah—yet stand off.
Heaven must have justice, and my broken vows
Will sink me else beneath its reaching mercy.
I'll wink, and then 'tis done—

Bel. What means the lord
Of me, my life, and love? What's in thy bosom, Thou grasp'st at so? Nay, why am I thus treated?

[Draws the dagger and offers to stab her.

Jaf. Know, Belvidera, when we parted last,
I gave this dagger with thee, as in trust,
To be thy portion if I'er prov'd false,
On such condition was my truth believ'd:
But now 'tis forfeited, and must be paid for.

[Offers to stab her again.

Bel. Oh! Mercy! [Kneeling.

Jaf. Nay, no struggling.

Bel. Now then, kill me.

[Leaps on his neck, kisses him.

Jaf. I am, I am a coward; witness, Heaven,
Witness it, earth, and every being, witness:
'Tis but one blow! yet, by immortal love,
I cannot longer bear a thought to harm thee.

[He throws away the dagger and embraces her.
The seal of Providence is sure upon thee:

And thou wert born for yet unheard-of wonders.
Oh! thou wert either born to save or damn me.
By all the power that's given me o'er thy soul,
By thy resistless tears and conquering smiles,
By the victorious love that still waits on thee,
Fly to thy cruel father, save my friend,
Or all our future quiet's lost for ever.

Fall at his feet, cling round his reverend knees,
Speak to him with thy eyes, and with thy tears,
Melt his hard heart, and wake dead nature in him, [ness;

Crush him in thy arms, torture him with thy soft-
Nor, till thy prayers are granted, set him free,
But conquer him, as thou hast conquer'd me.

[Exeunt.

ACT V.

SCENE I.—An Apartment in PRIULI'S House.

Enter PRIULI.

Pri. Why, cruel Heaven, have my unhappy days

Been lengthen'd to this sad one? Oh! dishonour
And deathless infamy is fallen upon me.
Was it my fault? Am I a traitor? No.
But then, my only child, my daughter wedded;
There my best blood runs foul, and a disease
Incurable has seiz'd upon my memory.

Enter BELVIDERA, in a long mourning veil.

Bel. He's there, my father, my inhuman father,
That for three years has left an only child
Expos'd to all the outrages of fate,
And cruel ruin,—oh!—

Pri. What child of sorrow
Art thou, that comes wrapt in weeds of sadness,
And mov'st as if thy steps were towards a grave?

Bel. A wretch who from the very top of happiness
Am fallen into the lowest depths of misery,

And want your pitying hand to raise me up again

Pri. What wouldst thou beg for?

Bel. Pity and forgiveness.

[Throws up her veil

By the kind, tender names of child and father,
Hear my complaints, and take me to your love.

Pri. My daughter!

Bel. Yes, your daughter.

Pri. Don't talk thus.

Bel. Yes, I must; and you must hear too.
I have a husband.

Pri. Damn him.

Bel. Oh! do not curse him;

He would not speak so hard a word towards you
On any terms, how'er he deals with me.

Pri. Ha! what means my child?

Bel. Oh! my husband, my dear husband,
Carries a dagger in his once kind bosom,
To pierce the heart of your poor Belvidera.

Pri. Kill thee!

Bel. Yes, kill me. When he pass'd his faith
And covenant against your state and senate,
He gave me up a hostage for his truth:

With me a dagger and a dire commission.

When'er he fail'd, to plunge it through this bosom.

I learnt the danger, chose the hour of love
T' attempt his heart, and bring it back to honour.
Great love prevail'd, and bless'd me with success!
He came, confess'd, betray'd his dearest friends
For promis'd mercy. Now they're doom'd to suffer.

Gall'd with remembrance of what then was sworn,
If they are lost, he vows t' appease the gods
With this poor life, and make my blood th' atonement.

Pri. Heavens!

Bel. If I was ever then your care, now hear
me;

Fly to the senate, save the promis'd lives
Of his dear friends, ere mine be made the sacrifice.

Pri. Oh, my heart's comfort!

Bel. Will you not, my father?

Weep not, but answer me.

Pri. By Heaven I will.

Not one of them but what shall be immortal.

Canst thou forgive me all my follies past?

I'll henceforth be indeed a father; never,
Never more thus expose, but cherish thee,
Dear as the vital warmth that feeds my life,
Dear as these eyes that weep in fondness o'er thee.
Peace to thy heart. Farewell.

Bel. Go, and remember

'Tis Belvidera's life her father pleads for.

[Exeunt.

SCENE II.—A Garden.

Enter JAFFIER.

Jaf. Final destruction seize on all the world!
Bend down, ye Heavens, and shutting round this
earth,

Crush the vile globe into its first confusion!

Enter BELVIDERA.

Bel. My life— [Meeting him.

Jaf. My plague— [Turning from her.

Bel. Nay, then I see my ruin.

If I must die!

Jaf. Nor let the thoughts of death perplex thy fancy;

But answer me to what I shall demand,
With a firm temper and unshaken spirit

Bel. I will, when I've done weeping—

Jaf. Fie, no more on't—

How long is't since that miserable day

We wedded first?

Bel. Oh!—oh!—

Jaf. Nay, keep in thy tears,
Lest they unman me too.

Bel. Heaven knows I cannot

The words you utter sound so very sadly,

The streams will follow—

Jaf. Come, I'll kiss 'em dry then.

Bel. But was't a miserable day?

Jaf. A curs'd one.

Bel. I thought it otherwise; and you've often sworn,

In the transporting hours of warmest love,

When sure you spoke the truth, you've sworn you bless'd it.

Jaf. 'Twas a rash oath.

Bel. Then why am I not curs'd too?

Jaf. No, Belvidera; by th' eternal truth,

I dote with too much fondness.

Bel. Still so kind?

Still then do you love me?

Jaf. Man ne'er was bless'd

Since the first pair met, as I have been.

Bel. Then sure you will not curse me?

Jaf. No, I'll bless thee.

I came on purpose, Belvidera, to bless thee—

'Tis now, I think, three years, we've liv'd together.

Bel. And may no fatal minute ever part us,

Till, reverend grown for age and love, we go

Down to one grave, as our last bed, together;

There sleep in peace, till an eternal morning.

Jaf. Did I not say, I came to bless thee?

Bel. You did.

Jaf. Then hear me, bounteous Heaven:

Pour down your blessings on this beauteous head,

Where everlasting sweets are always springing

With a continual giving hand: let peace,

Honour, and safety, always hover round her;

Feed her with plenty; let her eyes ne'er see

A sight of sorrow, nor her heart know mourning:

Crown all her days with joy, her nights with rest,

Harmless as her own thoughts; and prop her
virtue,

To bear the loss of one that too much lov'd;

And comfort her with patience in our parting.

Bel. How! Parting, parting!

Jaf. Yes, for ever parting;

I have sworn, Belvidera, by yon Heaven,

That best can tell how much I lose to leave thee,

We part this hour for ever.

Bel. O! call back

Your cruel blessing; stay with me and curse me.

Jaf. Now hold, heart, or never.

Bel. By all the tender days we've liv'd together,

Pity my sad condition; speak, but speak.

Jaf. Oh!—oh!—

Bel. By these arms, that now cling round thy neck,

By these poor streaming eyes—

Jaf. Murder! unhold me:

By th' immortal destiny that doom'd me

[Draws the dagger.]

'To this curs'd minute, I'll not live one longer;

Resolve to let me go, or see me fall—

Hark, the dismal bell

[Passing-bell tolls.]

Tolls out for death! I must attend its call too;

For my poor friend, my dying Pierre, expects me:

He sent a message to require I'd see him

Before he died, and take his last forgiveness,

Farewell, for ever.

Bel. Leave thy dagger with me,

Bequeath me something—Not one kiss at parting?

Oh! my poor heart, when wilt thou break?

[Going out, looks back at him.]

Jaf. Yet stay:

We have a child, as yet a tender infant.

Be a kind mother to him when I'm gone:

Breed him in virtue, and the paths of honour,

But never let him know his father's story;

I charge thee, guard him from the wrongs my fate

May do his future fortune, or his name.

Now—nearer yet— [Approaching each other.]

Oh! that my arms were rivetted

Thus round thee ever! But my friend! my oath!

This and no more. [Kisses her.]

Bel. Another, sure another,

For that poor little one you've ta'en such care of.

I'll give't him truly.

Jaf. So now, farewell.

Bel. For ever?

Jaf. Heaven knows, for ever; all good angels guard thee. [Exit.]

Bel. All ill ones sure had charge of me this moment.

Curs'd be my days, and doubly curs'd my nights.

Oh! give me daggers, fire, or water:

How I could bleed, how burn, how drown, the waves

Huzzing and booming round my sinking head,

Till I descended to the peaceful bottom!

Oh! there's all quiet, here all rage and fury:

The air's too thin, and pierces my weak brain;

I long for thick, substantial sleep; hell! hell!

Burst from the centre, rage and roar aloud,

If thou art half so hot, so mad, as I am. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—A Scaffold, and a Wheel prepared for the execution of PIERRE.

Enter OFFICER, PIERRE, Guards, Executioner, &c.

Pier. My friend not come yet?

Enter JAFFIER.

Jaf. Oh, Pierre!

Pier. Yet nearer.

Dear to my arms, though thou'st undone my fame,

I can't forget to love thee. Pr'ythee, Jaffier,

Forgive that filthy blow my passion dealt thee;

I'm now preparing for the land of peace,

And fain would have the charitable wishes

Of all good men, like thee, to bless my journey.

Jaf. Good! I am the vilest creature, worse than e'er

Suffer'd the shameful fate thou'rt going to taste of.

Off. The time grows short, your friends are dead already.

Jaf. Dead!

Pier. Yes, dead, Jaffier; they've all died like men too,

Worthy their character.

Jaf. And what must I do?

Pier. Oh, Jaffier!

Jaf. Speak aloud thy burden'd soul,

And tell thy troubles to thy tortur'd friend.

Pier. Friend! Couldst thou yet be a friend, & generous friend,

I might hope comfort from thy noble sorrows.

Heaven knows I want a friend.

Jaf. And I a kind one,
That would not thus scorn my repenting virtue,
Or think, when he's to die, my thoughts are idle.

Pier. No! live, I charge thee, Jaffier.

Jaf. Yes, I will live:

But it shall be to see thy fall reveng'd
At such a rate, as Venice long shall groan for.

Pier. Wilt thou?

Jaf. I will, by Heaven.

Pier. Then still thou'rt noble,
And I forgive thee. Oh!—yet—shall I trust thee?

Jaf. No; I've been false already.

Pier. Dost thou love me?

Jaf. Rip up my heart, and satisfy my doubt-
ings.

Pier. Curse on this weakness! [Weeps.

Jaf. Tears! Amazement! Tears!
I never saw thee melted thus before;
And know there's something labouring in thy
bosom,
That must have vent: though I'm a villain, tell
me.

Pier. See'st thou that engine?

[Points to the Wheel.

Jaf. Why?

Pier. Is't fit a soldier, who has liv'd with honour,
Fought nations' quarrels, and been crown'd with conquest,

Be expos'd a common carcass on a wheel?

Jaf. Ha!

Pier. Speak! is't fitting?

Jaf. Fitting!

Pier. Yes; is't fitting?

Jaf. What's to be done?

Pier. I'd have thee undertake
Something that's noble to preserve my memory
From the disgrace that's ready to attain it.

Off. The day grows late, Sir.

Pier. I'll make haste. Oh, Jaffier!

Though thou'st betray'd me, do me some way justice.

Jaf. No more of that: thy wishes shall be satisfied;

I have a wife, and she shall bleed; my child too, yield up his little throat and all
T' appease thee—

[Going away, PIERRE holds him.

Pier. No—this—no more.

[Whispers JAFFIER.

Jaf. Ha! is't then so?

Pier. Most certainly.

Jaf. I'll do it.

Pier. Remember!

Off. Sir.

Pier. Come, now I'm ready.

[He & JAF. ascend the scaffold.

Captain, you should be a gentleman of honour;
Keep off the rabble, that I may have room
To entertain my fate, and die with decency.
Come. [Takes off his gown, Executioner prepares.

You'll think on't. [To JAFFIER.

Jaf. 'Twon't grow stale before to-morrow.

Pier. Now, Jaffier! now I'm going. Now—

[Executioner having bound him.

Jaf. Have at thee,
Thou honest heart, then—here— [Stabs him.

VOL. I. . . 2 L 23

And this is well. [Stabs himself

Pier. Now thou hast indeed been faithful.

This was done nobly—We've deceiv'd the senate.

Jaf. Bravely.

Pier. Ha, ha, ha—oh! oh! [Dies.

Jaf. Now, ye curs'd rulers,

Thus of the blood y' have shed, I make libation
And sprinkle it, mingling. May it rest upon you,
And all your race! Be henceforth peace a stranger

Within your walls; let plagues and famine waste

Your generation—Oh, poor Belvidera!

Sir, I have a wife, bear this in safety to her;

A token that with my dying breath I bless'd her,

And the dear little infant left behind me.

I'm sick—I'm quiet.

[Dies; scene shuts upon them.

SCENE IV.—An Apartment at PRIULI'S.

Soft music; enter BELVIDERA, distracted, led by two of her women; PRIULI and Servants.

Pri. Strengthen her heart with patience, pitying Heaven.

Bel. Come, come, come, come, nay come to bed. [whistle;

Pri. Prythee, my love. The winds! hark how they
And the rain beats: Oh! how the weather shrinks
me!

You are angry now, who cares? pish, no indeed,
Choose then; I say you shall not go, you shall not;

Whip your ill nature; get you gone then. Oh!
Are you return'd; see, father, here he's come
again:

Am I to blame to love him? O, thou dear one,

Why do you fly me? are you angry still then?

Jaffier, where art thou? father, why do you do thus? [somewhere.

Stand off, don't hide him from me. He's here
Stand off, I say: what, gone! remember't, tyrant:
I may revenge myself of this trick, one day.
I'll do't—I'll do't.

Enter OFFICER.

Pri. News, what news? [OFFICER whispers PRIULI.

Off. Most sad, Sir;
Jaffier, upon the scaffold, to prevent
A shameful death, stabb'd Pierre, and next him—
Both fell together. [self.

Pri. Daughter!

Bel. Ha! look there!
My husband bloody, and his friend too! murder!
Who has done this? speak to me, thou sad vision!
On these poor trembling knees I beg it. Van-ish'd—

Here they went down—Oh, I'll dig, dig the den up!

You sha'n't delude me thus. Ho, Jaffier, Jaffier!
Peep up, and give me but a look. I have him!
I've got him, father: Oh!

My love! my dear! my blessing! help me! help
me!

They have hold on me, and drag me to the bottom.

Nay—now they pull so hard—farewell—

[Dies; the curtain falls slowly to music

THE WONDER:

A COMEDY,

IN FIVE ACTS.

BY MRS. CENTLIVRE.

REMARKS.

This ingenious comedy was first acted at Drury Lane in 1714, and is still a favourite. A more lively delineation of jealousy is scarcely to be found on the stage than in the well-drawn character of Don Felix, whose love-quarrel with Violante is well sustained. In 1757, Mr. Garrick added to his reputation by the revival of this play, in which he was eminently successful as Don Felix; and in this character closed his career of histrionic glory, on the 10th June, 1776, on which interesting occasion he delivered a farewell, in language with which we shall embellish the present page.

“Ladies and Gentlemen,

“It has been customary with persons, under my circumstances, to address you in a farewell Epilogue. I had the same intention, and turned my thoughts that way; but I found myself then as incapable of writing such an Epilogue, as I should be now of speaking it.

“The jingle of rhyme, and the language of fiction, would but ill suit my present feelings.

“This is to me a very awful moment: it is no less than parting for ever with those, from whom I have received the greatest kindness, and upon the spot where that kindness and your favours were enjoyed.

“Whatever may be the changes of my future life, the deepest impression of your kindness will always remain here—here in my heart, fixed and unalterable.

“I will very readily agree to my successors having more skill and ability for their station than I have had: but I defy them all to take more uninterrupted pains for your favour, or to be more truly sensible of it, than is your grateful humble servant.”

Mrs. Yates, Mrs. Crawford, Mrs. Abington, Mrs. Pope, and Mrs. Jordan, “though last, not least,” have successively added to their celebrity, in the heroine.

The original hint of the Wonder was probably derived from some one of the old Spanish Romantic Novels, so much admired by the ladies at that period.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Street

Enter DON LOPEZ, meeting FREDERIC.

Fred. My lord, Don Lopez.

Lop. How d'ye, Frederic?

Fred. At your lordship's service. I am glad to see you look so well, my lord; I hope Antonio is out of danger?

Lop. Quite the contrary; his fever increases, they tell me; and the surgeons are of opinion his wound is mortal.

Fred. Your son, Don Felix, is safe, I hope?

Lop. I hope so too; but they offer large rewards to apprehend him.

Fred. When heard your lordship from him?

Lop. Not since he went. I forbade him writing till the public news gave him an account of Antonio's health. Letters might be intercepted, and the place of his abode discovered; however, if Antonio dies, Felix shall for England. You have been there; what sort of people are the English?

Fred. My lord, the English are by nature, what the ancient Romans were by discipline, courageous, bold, hardy, and in love with liberty. Liberty is the idol of the English, under whose banner all the nation enlists; give but the word for liberty, and straight more armed legions would appear, than France and Philip keep in constant pay.

Lop. I like their principles. Who does not wish for freedom in all degrees of life? though common prudence sometimes makes us act against it, as I am now obliged to do; for I intend to marry my daughter to Don Guzman, whom I expect from Holland every day, whither he went to take possession of a large estate left him by his uncle.

Fred. You will not, surely, sacrifice the lovely Isabella, to age, avarice, and a fool? pardon the expression, my lord; but my concern for your beautiful daughter transports me beyond that good manners which I ought to pay your lordship's presence.

Lop. I can't deny the justness of the character, Frederic; but you are not insensible what I have suffered by these wars; and he has two things which render him very agreeable to me for a son-in-law; he is rich, and well-born! as for his being a fool, I don't conceive how that can be any blot in a husband who is already possessed of a good estate.—A poor fool, indeed, is a very scandalous thing; and so are your poor wits in my opinion, who have nothing to be vain of but the inside of their skulls. Now, for Don Guzman, I know I can rule him as I think fit: this is acting the politic part, Frederic, without which it is impossible to keep up the port of this life.

Fred. But have you no consideration for your daughter's welfare, my lord?

Lop. Is a husband of twenty thousand crowns a year no consideration? Now I think it a very good consideration.

Fred. One way, my lord. But what will the world say of such a match?

Lop. Sir, I value not the world a button.

Fred. I cannot think your daughter can have any inclination for such a husband.

Lop. There I believe you are pretty much in the right, though it is a secret which I never had the curiosity to inquire into, nor I believe ever shall.—Inclination; quotha! Parents would have a fine time on't if they consulted their children's inclinations! No, no, Sir, it is not a father's business to follow his children's inclinations, till he makes himself a beggar.

Fred. But this is of another nature, my lord.

Lop. Lookye, Sir, I resolve she shall marry Don Guzman the moment he arrives; though I could not govern my son, I will my daughter, I assure you.

Fred. This match, my lord, is more preposterous than that which you proposed to your son, from whence arose this fatal quarrel.—Don Antonio's sister, Elvira, wanted beauty only, but Guzman every thing, but—

Lop. Money—and that will purchase every thing; and so adieu. [Exit.

Fred. Monstrous! These are the resolutions which destroy the comforts of matrimony—he is rich and well-born, powerful arguments indeed! Could I but add them to the friendship of Don Felix, what might I not hope? But a merchant and a grandee of Portugal are inconsistent names—

Enter LISSARDO, in a riding-habit.

Lissardo! From whence came you?

Lis. That letter will inform you, Sir.

Fred. I hope your master's safe?

Lis. I left him so; I have another to deliver which requires haste.—Your most humble servant, Sir. [Bowling.

Fred. To Violante, I suppose?

Lis. The same. [Exit.

Fred. [Reads.] Dear Frederic—The two chief blessings of this life are, a friend and a mistress; to be debarred the sight of those is not to live. I hear nothing of Antonio's death, and therefore resolve to venture to thy house this evening, impatient to see Violante, and embrace my friend.

Yours,

FELIX.
Pray Heaven he comes undiscovered.—Ha! colonel Briton.

Enter COLONEL BRITON, in a riding-habit.

Col. B. Frederic, I rejoice to see thee.

Fred. What brought you to Lisbon, colonel?

Col. B. La fortune de la guerre, as the French say: I have commanded these last three years in Spain, but my country has thought fit to strike up a peace, and give us good Protestants leave to hope for Christian burial; so I resolved to take Lisbon in my way home.

Fred. If you are not provided of a lodging, colonel, pray command my house, while you stay.

Col. B. If I were sure I should not be troublesome, I would accept your offer, Frederic.

Fred. So far from trouble, colonel, I shall take it as a particular favour. What have we here?

Col. B. My footman. This is our country dress, you must know; which, for the honour of Scotland, I make all my servants wear.

Enter GIBBY, in a Highland dress.

Gibby. What moun I de wi' the horses, and like yer honour? They will tack cauld gin they stand in the causey.

Fred. Oh, I'll take care of them. What, ho! Vasquez!

Enter VASQUEZ.

Put those horses, which that honest fellow will show you, into my stable, do you hear, and feed them well.

Vas. Yes, Sir.—Sir, by my master's orders, I am, Sir, your most obsequious, humble servant. Be pleased to lead the way.

Gibby. 'Shleed, gang yer gate, Sir, and I shall follow ye: Ise ower hungry to feed on compliments.

[Exit with VASQUEZ.

Fred. Ha, ha! a comical fellow.—Well, how do you like our country, colonel?

Col. B. Why, faith, Frederic, a man might pass his time agreeably enough withinside of a nunnery; but to behold such troops of soft, plump, tender, melting, wishing, nay, willing girls too, through a damned grate, gives us Britons strong temptations to plunder. Ah, Frederic, your priests are wicked rogues; they immure beauty for their own proper use, and show it only to the laity to create desires, and inflame accounts, that they may purchase pardons at a dear rate.

Fred. I own venching is something more difficult here than in England, where women's liberties are subservient to their inclinations, and husbands seem of no effect, but to take care of the children which their wives provide.

Col. B. And does restraint get the better of inclination with your women here? No, I'll be sworn not, even in fourscore. Don't I know the constitution of the Spanish ladies?

Fred. And of all the ladies where you come, colonel; you were ever a man of gallantry.

Col. B. Ah, Frederic, the kirk half starves us Scotsmen. We are kept so sharp at home, that we feed like cannibals abroad. Harkye, hast thou never a pretty acquaintance now, that thou wouldst consign over to a friend for half an hour, ha?

Fred. Faith, colonel, I am the worst pimp in Christendom; you had better trust to your own luck; the women will soon find you out I warrant you.

Col. B. Ay, but its dangerous foraging in an enemy's country; and since I have some hopes of seeing my own again, I had rather purchase my pleasure, than run the hazard of a stiletto in my guts. Will thou recommend me to a wife then; one that is willing to exchange her maidores for English liberty? ha, friend?

Fred. She must be very handsome, I suppose?

Col. B. The handsomer the better—but be sure she has a nose.

Fred. Ay, ay, and some gold.

Col. B. Oh, very much gold; I shall never be able to swallow the matrimonial pill, if it be not well gilded.

Fred. Pho, beauty will make it slide down nimbly.

Col. B. At first, perhaps, it may; but the second or third dose will choke me.—I confess, Frederic, women are the prettiest play-things in nature; but gold, substantial gold, gives 'em the air, the nien, the shape, the grace, and beauty of a goddess.

Fred. And has not gold the same divinity in their eyes, colonel?

Col. B. Too often—

None marry now for love; no, that's a jest: The self same bargain serves for wife and beast.

Fred. You are always gay, colonel. Come, shall we take a refreshing glass at my house, and consider what has been said?

Col. B. I have two or three compliments to discharge for some friends, and then I will wait on you with pleasure. Where do you live?

Fred. At your corner house with the green rails.

Col. B. In the close of the evening I will endeavour to kiss your hand. Adieu.

Fred. I shall expect you with impatience.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Room in DON LOPEZ'S House.

Enter ISABELLA, and INIS, her maid.

Inis. For goodness' sake, Madam, where are you going in this pet?

Isa. Any where to avoid matrimony; the thought of a husband is terrible to me.

Inis. Ay, of an old husband; but if you may choose for yourself, I fancy matrimony would be no such frightful thing to you.

Isa. You are pretty much in the right, Inis—but to be forced into the arms of an idiot, who has neither person to please the eye, sense to charm the ear, nor generosity to supply those defects!—Ah, Inis, what plesant lives women lead in England, where duty wears no fetter but inclination. The custom of our country enslaves from our very cradles, first to our parents, next to our husbands; and, when Heaven is so kind to rid us of both these, our brothers still usurp authority, and expect a blind obedience from us: so that, maids, wives, or widows, we are little better than slaves to the tyrant, man; therefore to avoid their power, I resolve to cast myself into a monastery.

Inis. That is, you'll cut your own throat, to avoid another's doing it for you. Ah, Madam, those eyes tell me you have no nun's flesh about you! A monastery, quotha! where you'll wish yourself into the green sickness in a month.

Isa. What care I? there will be no man to plague me.

Inis. No, nor what's much worse, to please you neither—Odslife, Madam, you are the first woman that e'er despaired in a Christian country: were I in your place—

Isa. Why, what would your wisdom do, if you were?

Inis. I'd embark with the first fair wind with all my jewels, and seek my fortune on t'other side the water; no shore can treat you worse than your own; there's never a father in Christendom should make me marry any man against my will.

Isa. I am too great a coward to follow your advice: I must contrive some way to avoid Don Guzman, and yet stay in my own country.

Enter DON LOPEZ.

Lop. Must you so, mistress; but I shall take care to prevent you. [Aside.] Isabella, whither are you going, my child?

Isa. To church, Sir.

Inis. The old rogue has certainly overheard her. [Aside.]

Lop. Your devotion must needs be very strong, or your memory very weak, my dear; why, vespers are over for this night. Come, come, you shall have a better errand to church than to say your prayers there. Don Guzman is arrived in the river, and I expect him ashore to-morrow.

Isa. Ha! to-morrow!

Lop. He writes me word, that his estate in Holland is worth twelve thousand crowns a year; which, together with what he had before, will make thee the happiest wife in Lisbon.

Isa. And the most unhappy woman in the world. Oh, Sir! if I have any power in your heart, if the tenderness of a father be not quite extinct, hear me with patience.

Lop. No objection against the marriage, and I will hear whatsoever thou hast to say.

Isa. That's torturing me on the rack, and forbidding me to groan; upon my knees, I claim the privilege of flesh and blood. [Kneels.]

Lop. I grant it, thou shalt have an arm full of flesh and blood to-morrow. Flesh and blood, quotha! Heaven forbid I should deny thee flesh and blood, my girl.

Inis. Here's an old dog for you! [Aside.]

Isa. Do not mistake, Sir; the fatal stroke which separates soul and body, is not more terrible to the thoughts of sinners, than the name of Guzman to my ear.

Lop. Puh, puh; you lie, you lie.

Isa. My frightened heart beats hard against my breast, as if it sought a passage to your feet, to beg you'd change your purpose.

Lop. A very pretty speech this; if it were turned into blank verse, it would serve for a tragedy. Why, thou hast more wit than I thought thou hadst, child.—I fancy this was all extempore; I don't believe thou didst ever think one word on't before.

Inis. Yes, but she has, my lord; for I have heard her say the same things a thousand times.

Lop. How, how? What, do you top your second-hand jests upon your father, hussy, who knows better what's good for you than you do yourself? Remember, 'tis your duty to obey.

Isa. [Rises.] I never disobeyed before, and wish I had not reason now; but nature has got the better of my duty, and makes me loathe the harsh commands you lay.

Lop. Ha, ha! very fine! Ha, ha!

Isa. Death itself would be welcome.

Lop. Are you sure of that?

Isa. I am your daughter, my lord, and can boast as strong a resolution as yourself; I'll die before I'll marry Guzman.

Lop. Say you so? I'll try that presently. [Draws.] Here, let me see with what dexterity you can breathe a vein now. [Offers her his sword.] The point is pretty sharp: 'twill do your business, I warrant you.

Inis. Bless me, Sir, what do you mean, to put a sword into the hands of a desperate woman?

Lop. Desperate! ha, ha, ha! you see how desperate she is. What, art thou frightened, little Bell? ha!

Isa. I confess I am startled at your morals, Sir.

Lop. Ay, ay, child, thou hadst better take the man, he'll hurt thee the least of the two.

Isa. I shall take neither, Sir; death has many doors, and when I can live no longer with pleasure, I shall find one to let him in at without your aid.

Lop. Say'st thou so, my dear Bell? Ods, I'm afraid thou art a little lunatic, Bell. I must take care of thee, child. [Takes hold of her, and pulls a key out of his pocket.] I shall make bold to secure thee, my dear. I'll see if locks and bars can keep thee till Guzman comes. Go, get into your chamber. [Looks her in.]

There I'll your boasted resolution try,
And see who'll get the better, you or I.

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Room in DON PEDRO'S House.

Enter VIOLANTE, reading a letter, and FLORA following.

Flora. What, must that letter be read again?

Vio. Yes, and again, and again, and again, a thousand times again; a letter from a faithful lover can never be read too often, it speaks such kind, such soft, such tender things— [Kisses it.]

Flora. But always the same language.

Vio. It does not charm the less for that.

Flora. In my opinion, nothing charms that does not change; and any composition of the four-and-twenty letters, after the first essay, from the same hand, must be dull, except a bank-note or a bill of exchange.

Vio. Thy taste is my aversion— [Reads.]

*My all that's charming, since life's not life exil'd from thee, this night shall bring me to thy arms. Frederic and thee are all I trust. These six weeks' absence, have been, in love's account, six hundred hours. When it is dark, expect the wonted signal at thy window; till when, adieu.
Thine more than his own,* FELIX.

Flora. Who would not have said as much to a lady of her beauty, and twenty thousand pounds? [Aside.]—Were I a man, methinks, I could have said a hundred finer things.

Vio. What would you have said?

Flora. I would have compared your eyes to the stars, your teeth to ivory, your lips to coral, your neck to alabaster, your shape to—

Vio. No more of your bombast; truth is the best eloquence in a lover.—What proof remains ungiven of his love? When his father threatened to disinherit him for refusing Don Antonio's sister, from whence sprung this unhappy quarrel, did it shake his love for me? And now, though strict inquiry runs through every place, with large rewards to apprehend him, does he not venture all for me?

Flora. But you know, Madam, your father, Don Pedro, designs you for a nun—to be sure, you look very like a nun!—and says your grandfather left you your fortune upon that condition.

Vio. Not without my approbation, girl, when I come to one-and-twenty, as I am informed. But, however, I shall run the risk of that. Go, call in Lissardo.

Flora. Yes, Madam. Now for a thousand verbal questions. [Aside, and exit.]

Re-enter FLORA, with LISSARDO.

Vio. Well, and how do you do, Lissardo?

Lis. Ah, very weary, Madam.—Faith, thou look'st wondrous pretty, Flora. [Apart to FLORA.]

Vio. How came you?

Lis. En chevalier, Madam, upon a hackney jade, which they told me formerly belonged to an English colonel. But I should have rather thought she had been bred a good Roman Catholic all her life-time; for she downed on her knees to every stock and stone we came along by.—My chops water for a kiss, they do, Flora. [Apart to FLORA.]

Flora. You'd make one believe you are wondrous fond now. [Apart to LISSARDO.]

Vio. Where did you leave your master?

Lis. Odd, if I had you alone, housewife, I'd show you how fond I could be— [Apart to FLORA.]

Vio. Where did you leave your master?

Lis. At a little farm-house, Madam, about five miles off. He'll be at Don Frederic's in the evening.—Odd, I will so revenge myself of those lips of thine. [Apart to FLORA.]

Vio. Is he in health?

Flora. Oh, you counterfeit wondrous well.

[Apart to LISSARDO.]

Lis. No, every body knows I counterfeit very ill. [Apart to FLORA.]

Vio. How say you? Is Felix ill? What's his distemper? Ha!

Lis. A pies on't, I hate to be interrupted, [Aside.]—Love, Madam, love.—In short, Madam, I believe he has thought of nothing but your ladyship ever since he left Lisbon. I am sure he could not, if I may judge of his heart by my own.

[Looks lovingly upon FLORA.]

Vio. How came you so well acquainted with your master's thoughts, Lissardo?

Lis. By infallible rule, Madam; words are the pictures of the mind, you know; now to prove he thinks of nothing but you, he talks of nothing but you—for example, Madam: coming from shooting t'other day with a brace of partridges, "Lissardo," said he, "go bid the cook roast me these Violantes."—I flew into the kitchen, full of thoughts of thee, and cried, "Here roast me these Florellas."

Flora. Ha, ha! excellent.—You mimic your master then, it seems.

Lis. I can do every thing as well as my master, you little rogue. [To FLORA.]—Another time, Madam, the priest came to make him a visit, he called out hastily, "Lissardo," said he, "bring a Violante for my father to sit on."—Then he often mistook my name, Madam, and called me Violante; in short, I heard it so often, that it became as familiar to me as my prayers.

Vio. You live very merrily, then, it seems.

Lis. Oh, exceedingly merry, Madam.

[Kisses FLORA'S hand.]

Vio. Ha! exceeding merry. Had you treats and balls?

Lis. Oh! yes, yes, Madam, several.

Flora. You are mad, Lissardo; you don't mind what my lady says to you. [Apart to LISSARDO.]

Vio. Ha! balls.—Is he so merry in my absence? [Aside.] And did your master dance, Lissardo?

Lis. Dance, Madam! where, Madam?

Vio. Why, at those balls you speak of.

Lis. Balls! what balls, Madam?

Vio. Why, sure you are in love, Lissardo; did not you say, but now, you had balls where you have been?

Lis. Balls, Madam! wash-balls, Ma'am. Ods-life, I ask your pardon, Madam! I, I, I had mislaid some wash-balls of my master's t'other day; and because I could not think where I had laid them, just when he asked for them, he very fairly broke my head, Madam, and now it seems I can think of nothing else. Alas! he dance, Madam! No, no, poor gentleman, he is as melancholy as an unbraced drum.

Vio. Poor Felix! There, wear that ring for your master's sake, and let him know I shall be ready to receive him.

[Exit.]

Lis. I shall, Madam.—[Puts on the ring.] Methinks a diamond ring is a vast addition to the little finger of a gentleman. [Admires his hand.]

Flora. That ring must be mine. [Aside.]—Well, Lissardo! what haste you make to pay off arrears now. Look how the fellow stands!

Lis. 'Egad, methinks I have a very pretty hand—and very white—and the shape!—Faith, I never minded it so much before!—In my opinion it is a very fine-shaped hand—and becomes a diamond ring as well as the first grandee's in Portugal.

Flora. The man's transported! Is this your love? This your impatience?

Lis. [Takes snuff.] Now in my mind—I take snuff with a very jantee air.—Well, I am persuaded I want nothing but a coach and a title to make me a very fine gentleman. [Struts about.]

Flora. Sweet Mr. Lissardo, [Courtesies.] if I may presume to speak to you, without affronting your little finger—

Lis. Odsso, Madam, I ask your pardon.—Is it to me or to the ring—you direct your discourse, Madam?

Flora. Madam, good lack! How much a diamond ring improves one!

Lis. Why, though I say it—I can carry myself as well as any body.—But what wert thou going to say, child?

Flora. Why I was going to say, that I fancy you had best let me keep that ring; it will be a very pretty wedding ring, Lissardo; would it not?

Lis. Humph! Ah! But—but—but—but—I believe I shan't marry yet awhile.

Flora. You shan't, you say?—Very well! I suppose you design that ring for Inis?

Lis. No, no; I never bribe an old acquaintance.—Perhaps I might let it sparkle in the eyes of a stranger a little, till we come to a right understanding—but, then, like all other mortal things, it would return from whence it came.

Flora. Insolent—Is that your manner of dealing?

Lis. With all but thee.—Kiss me, you little rogue you. [Hugs her.]

Flora. Little rogue! Prythee, fellow, don't be so familiar; [Pushes him away.] If I mayn't keep your ring, I can keep my kisses.

Lis. You can, you say? Spoke with the air of a chambermaid.

Flora. Replied with the spirit of a serving man.

Lis. Prythee, Flora, don't let you and I fall out; I am in a merry humour, and shall certainly fall in somewhere.

Flora. What care I where you fall in.

Re-enter VIOLANTE.

Vio. Why do you keep Lissardo so long, Flora, when you don't know how soon my father may awake? His afternoon naps are never long.

Flora. Had Don Felix been with her, she would not have thought the time long. These ladies consider nobody's wants but their own.

[Aside.]

Vio. Go, go, let him out.

Flora. Yes, Madam.

Lis. I fly, Madam.

[Exeunt LISSARDO and FLORA.]

Vio. The day draws in, and night, the lover's friend, advances.—Night, more welcome than the sun to me, because it brings my love.

Flora. [Within.] Ah, thieves, thieves! murder, murder!

Vio. [Shrieks.] Ah, defend me, Heaven! what do I hear? Felix is certainly pursued, and will be taken.

Re-enter FLORA, running.

How now! Why dost stare so? Answer me quickly; what's the matter?

Flora. Oh, Madam! as I was letting out Lissardo, a gentleman rushed between him and I, struck down my candle, and is bringing a dead person in his arms into our house.

Vio. Ha! a dead person! Heaven grant it does not prove my Felix.

Flora. Here they are, Madam.

Vio. I'll retire, till you discover the meaning of this accident. [Exit.]

Enter COLONEL BRITON, with ISABELLA in his arms, whom he sets down in a chair, and addresses himself to FLORA.

Col. B. Madam, the necessity this lady was under of being conveyed into some house with speed and secrecy, will, I hope, excuse any indecency I might be guilty of, in pressing so rudely into this—I am an entire stranger to her name and circumstances;—would I were so to her beauty too. [Aside.] I commit her, Madam, to your care, and fly to make her retreat secure; if the street be clear, permit me to return, and learn from her own mouth if I can be further serviceable. Pray, Madam, what is the lady of this house called?

Flora. Violante, Seigneur.

Col. B. Are you she, Madam?

Flora. Only her woman, Seigneur.

Col. B. Your humble servant, Mistress. Pray be careful of the lady.

[Gives her two moidores, and exit.]

Flora. Two moidores! Well, he is a generous fellow. This is the only way to make one careful.

Re-enter VIOLANTE.

Vio. Was you distracted, Flora, to tell my name to a man you never saw? Unthinking wench! Who knows what this may turn to?—What, is the lady dead?—Ah! defend me, Heaven! 'tis Isabella, sister to my Felix. What has befallen her! Pray Heaven he's safe.—Run and fetch some cold water.—Stay, stay, Flora—Isabella, friend, speak to me—oh, speak to me, or I shall die with apprehension.

Isa. Oh! hold, my dearest father, do not force me; indeed I cannot love him.

Vio. How wild she talks!

Isa. Ha! where am I?

Vio. With one as sensible of thy pain as thou thyself canst be.

Isa. Violante!—what kind star preserved and lodged me here?

Flora. It was a terrestrial star, called a man, Madam; pray Jupiter, he proves a lucky one.

Isa. Oh! I remember now. Forgive me, dear Violante; my thoughts ran so much upon the danger I escaped, I forgot.

Vio. May I not know your story?

Isa. Thou art no stranger to one part of it. I have often told thee that my father designed to sacrifice me to Don Guzman, who it seems is just returned from Holland, and expected ashore to-morrow, the day that he has set to celebrate our nuptials. Upon my refusing to obey him, he locked me into my chamber, vowing to keep me there till he arrived, and force me to consent. I know my father to be positive, never to be won from his design; and, having no hope left me to escape the marriage, I leaped from the window into the street.

Vio. You have not hurt yourself, I hope!

Isa. No; a gentleman passing by, by accident, caught me in his arms: at first, my fright made me apprehend it was my father, till he assured me to the contrary.

Flora. He is a very fine gentleman, I promise you, Madam; and a well bred man, I warrant him. I think I never saw a grandee put his hand into his pocket with a better air in my whole lifetime: then he opened his purse with such a grace, that nothing but his manner of presenting me with the gold could equal.

Vio. There is but one common road to the heart of a servant, and 'tis impossible for a generous person to mistake it.—Go leave us, Flora. [Exit FLORA.] But how came you hither, Isabella?

Isa. I know not; I desired the stranger to convey me to the next monastery; but ere I reached the door, I saw, or fancied that I saw, Lissardo, my brother's man; and the thought that his master might not be far off, flung me into a swoon, which is all that I can remember.—Ha! what's here? [Takes up a letter.] For Colonel Briton; to be left at the post-house, in Lisbon.—This must be dropped by the stranger who brought me hither.

Vio. Thou art fallen into the hands of a soldier; take care he does not lay thee under contribution, girl.

Isa. I find he is a gentleman; and if he is but unmarried, I could be content to follow him all the world over.—But I shall never see him more, I fear. [Sighs.]

Vio. What makes you sigh, Isabella?

Isa. The fear of getting into my father's clutches again.

Vio. Can I be serviceable to you?

Isa. Yes, if you conceal me two or three days.

Vio. You command my house, and secrecy.

Isa. I thank you, Violante. I wish you would oblige me with Mrs. Flora awhile.

Vio. I'll send her to you.—I must watch if dad be still asleep, or here will be no room for Felix.

Isa. Well, I don't know what ails me; methinks, I wish I could find this stranger out. [Exit.]

Re-enter FLORA.

Flora. Does your ladyship want me, Madam?

Isa. Ay, Mrs. Flora, I resolve to make you my confidante.

Flora. I shall endeavour to discharge my duty, Madam.

Isa. I doubt it not; and desire you to accept this as a token of my gratitude.

Flora. O dear signora, I should have been your humble servant without a fee.

Isa. I believe it. But to the purpose—do you think, if you saw the gentleman which brought me hither, you should know him again?

Flora. From a thousand, Madam: I have an excellent memory where a handsome man is concerned.—When he went away, he said he would return again immediately. I admire he comes not.

Isa. Here did you say? you rejoice me—though I'll not see him, if he comes. Could not you contrive to give him a letter?

Flora. With the air of a duenna.

Isa. Not in this house—you must veil and follow him.—He must not know it comes from me.

Flora. What, do you take me for a novice in love affairs? Though I have not practised the art since I have been in Donna Violante's service, yet I have not lost the theory of a chambermaid.—Do you write the letter, and leave the rest to me—here, here, here's pen, ink, and paper.

Isa. I'll do it in a minute. [Sits down to write.]

Flo. So! this is a business after my own heart: love always takes care to reward his labourers, and Great Britain seems to be his favourite country.—Oh, I long to see the other two moidores with a British air. Methinks there's a grace peculiar to that nation, in making a present

Isa. So, I have done—now, if he does but find this house again.

Flora. If he should not, I warrant I'll find him if he's in Lisbon; for I have a strong possession that he has two more moidores as good as ever were told. [Puts the letter into her bosom.]

Re-enter VIOLANTE.

Vio. Flora, watch my papa; he's fast asleep in his study; if you find him stir, give me notice. [FELIX taps at the window.] Hark, I hear Felix at the window; admit him instantly, and then to your post. [Exit FLORA.]

Isa. What say you, Violante? Is my brother come?

Vio. It is his signal at the window.

Isa. [Kneels.] Oh, Violante! I conjure thee by all the love thou hearest to Felix, by thy own generous nature, nay more, by that unspotted virtue thou art mistress of, do not discover to my brother I am here!

Vio. Contrary to your desire, be assured I never shall. But where's the danger?

Isa. Art thou born in Lisbon, and ask that question? He'll think his honour blemished by my disobedience; and would restore me to my father, or kill me; therefore, dear, dear girl—

Vio. Depend upon my friendship; nothing shall draw the secret from these lips; not even Felix, though at the hazard of his love. I hear him coming; retire into that closet.

Isa. Remember, Violante, upon thy promise my very life depends. [Exit.]

Vio. When I betray thee, may I share thy fate.

Enter FELIX.

My Felix! my everlasting love!

[Runs into his arms.]

Fel. My life! my soul! my Violante!

Vio. What hazards dost thou run for me? Oh, how shall I requite thee?

Fel. If, during this tedious, painful exile, thy thoughts have never wandered from thy Felix, thou hast made me more than satisfaction.

Vio. Can there be room within this heart for any but thyself? No, if the god of love were lost to all the rest of human-kind, thy image would secure him in my breast: I am all truth, all love, all faith, and know no jealous fears.

Fel. My heart's the proper sphere where love resides: could he quit that, he would be nowhere found; and yet, Violante, I'm in doubt.

Vio. Did I ever give thee cause to doubt, my Felix?

Fel. True love has many fears, and fear as many eyes as fame; yet sure I think they see no fault in thee. [COL. B. taps at the window.] What's that? [A tap.]

Vio. What? I hear nothing. [A tap again.]

Fel. Ha! What means this signal at your window?

Vio. Some one, perhaps, in passing by, might accidentally hit it; it can be nothing else.

Col. B. [Within.] Hist, hist! Donna Violante, Donna Violante!

Fel. They use your name by accident too, do they, Madam?

Re-enter FLORA.

Flora. There is a gentleman at the window, Madam, which I fancy to be the same who brought Isabella hither. Shall I admit him?

[Aside to VIOLANTE.]

Vio. Admit distraction rather! Thou art the cause of this, unthinking wretch! [Apart.]

Fel. What, has Mrs. Scout brought you fresh intelligence? Death, I'll know the bottom of this immediately. [Offers to go.]

Flora. Scout! I scorn your words, Seignior.

Vio. Nay, nay, nay, you must not leave me.

Fel. Oh, 'tis not fair not to answer the gentleman, Madam. It is none of his fault that his visit proves unseasonable. Pray let me go; my presence is but a restraint upon you.

[Struggles to get from her.]
Flora. It must be the colonel—now to deliver my letter to him.

[Aside, and exit: the Colonel taps louder.]

Fel. Hark! he grows impatient at your delay. Why do you hold the man whose absence would oblige you? Pray, let me go, Madam. Consider, the gentleman wants you at the window.—Confusion! [Struggles.]

Vio. It is not me he wants.

Fel. Death! not you! Is there another of your name in the house?—But come on, convince me of the truth of what you say; open the window. If his business does not lie with you, your conversation may be heard. This, and only this, can take off my suspicion.—What, do you pause? Oh, guilt! guilt! Have I caught you? Nay, then I'll leap the balcony. If I remember, this way leads to it.

[Goes to the door where ISABELLA is.]

Vio. Hold, hold, hold, hold! not for the world you enter there! Which way shall I preserve his sister from his knowledge. [Aside.]

Fel. What have I touched you? Do you fear your lover's life?

Vio. I fear for none but you—For goodness' sake, do not speak so loud, my Felix. If my father hears you, I am lost for ever—Felix! Felix! your curiosity shall be satisfied. [Goes to the window, and throws up the sash.] Who'er you are, that with such insolence dare use my name, and give the neighbourhood pretence to reflect upon my conduct, I charge you instantly to be gone, or expect the treatment you deserve.

Col. B. I ask pardon, Madam, and will obey; but when I left this house to-night—

Fel. Good.

Vio. You are mistaken in the house, I suppose, Sir.

Fel. No, no, he's not mistaken—Pray, Madam, let the gentleman go on.

Vio. Pray be gone, Sir, I know of no business you have here.

Col. B. I wish I did not know it neither—But this house contains my soul; then can you blame my body for hovering about it?

Fel. Excellent.

Vio. I tell you again, you are mistaken; however, for your own satisfaction, call to-morrow.

Fel. Matchless impudence! an assignation before my face—No, he shall not live to meet your wishes. [Takes out a pistol, and goes towards the window.]

Vio. Ah! [Shrieks.] hold, I conjure you.

Col. B. To-morrow's an age, Madam! may I not be admitted to-night?

Vio. If you be a gentleman, I command your absence.—Unfortunate! what will my stars do with me? [Aside.]

Col. B. I have done—Only this—Be careful of my life, for it is in your keeping.

[Exit from the window.]

Fel. Pray observe the gentleman's request, Madam.

Vio. I am all confusion.

Fel. You are all truth, all love, all faith; oh, thou all woman!—How have I been deceived.

Sdeath, could you not have imposed upon me for this one night? Could neither my faithful love, nor the hazard I have run to see you, make me worthy to be cheated on? Oh, thou—

Vio. Can I hear this from you? [Weeps.

Fel. [Repeats.] "When I left this house to-night."—To-night, the devil! return so soon!

Vio. Oh, Isabella! what hast thou involved me in? [Aside.

Fel. [Repeats.] "This house contains my soul." Oh, sweet soul!

Vio. Yet I resolve to keep the secret. [Aside.

Fel. [Repeats.] "Be careful of my life, for 'tis in your keeping."—Damnation!—How ugly she appears!

Vio. Do not look so sternly on me, but believe me, Felix, I have not injured you, nor am I false.

Fel. Not false, not injured me? Oh, Violante, lost and abandoned to thy vice! Not false! Oh, monstrous!

Vio. Indeed I am not.—There is a cause which I must not reveal.—Oh, think how far honour can oblige your sex—then allow a woman may be bound by the same rule to keep a secret.

Fel. Honour! What hast thou to do with honour, thou that canst admit plurality of lovers? A secret! ha, ha, ha! his affairs are wondrous safe, who trusts his secret to a woman's keeping; but you need give yourself no trouble about clearing this point, Madam, for you are become so indifferent to me, that your truth and falsehood are the same.

Re-enter FLORA.

Flora. Madam, your father bade me see what noise that was.—For goodness' sake, Sir, why do you speak so loud?

Fel. I understand my cue, mistress; my absence is necessary, I'll oblige you.

[Going, she holds him.

Vio. Oh, let me undeceive you first.

Fel. Impossible!

Vio. 'Tis very possible, if I durst.

Fel. Durst! ha, ha, ha! durst, quotha!

Vio. But another time I'll tell thee all.

Fel. Nay, now or never.

Vio. Now it cannot be.

Fel. Then it shall never be.—Thou most ungrateful of thy sex, farewell.

[Breaks from her, and exit.

Vio. Oh, exquisite trial of my friendship! Yet not even this shall draw the secret from me.

That I'll preserve, let fortune frown or smile;
And trust to love, my love to reconcile.

[Exeunt.

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Street.

Enter DON LOPEZ.

Lop. Was ever man thus plagued! Odsheart! I could swallow my dagger for madness; I know not what to think; sure Frederic had no hand in her escape.—She must get out of the window; and she could not do that without a ladder: and who could bring it her but him? Ay, it must be so. This graceless baggage—but I'll to Frederic immediately; I'll take the alguazil with me, and search his house; and if I find her, I'll use her—by St. Anthony, I don't know how I'll use her.

VOL. I. . . 2 M

[Exit.

Enter COLONEL BRITON, with ISABELLA's letter in his hand; GIBBY following.

Col. B. Well, though I could not see my fair incognita, fortune, to make me amends, has flung another intrigue in my way. Oh! how I love these pretty, kind, coming females, that won't give a man the trouble of racking his invention to deceive them.—This letter I received from a lady in a veil.—Some duenna; some necessary implement of Cupid. I suppose the style is frank and easy, I hope like her that writ it.—[Reads.] "Sir, I have seen your person, and like it"—very concise—"and if you'll meet me at four o'clock in the morning, upon the Terriero de Passa, half an hour's conversation will let me into your mind."—Ha, ha, ha! a philosophical wench; this is the first time I ever knew a woman had any business with the mind of a man.—"If your intellects answer your outward appearance, the adventure may not displease you. I expect you'll not attempt to see my face, nor offer any thing unbecoming the gentleman I take you for."—Humph, the gentleman she takes me for! I hope she takes me to be flesh and blood, and then I'm sure I shall do nothing unbecoming a gentleman. Well, if I must not see her face, it shall go hard if I don't know where she lives.—Gibby.

Gibby. Here, and like yer honour.

Col. B. Follow me at a good distance, do you hear, Gibby?

Gibby. In troth dee I, weel enough, Sir.

Col. B. I am to meet a lady on the Terriero de Passa.

Gibby. The de'il an mine e'en gin I ken her, Sir.

Col. B. But you will when you come there, sirrah.

Gibby. Like enough, Sir; I have as sharp an e'e till a bonny lass as ere a lad in aw Scotland: and what maun I dee wi' her, Sir?

Col. B. Why, if she and I part, you must watch her home, and bring me word where she lives.

Gibby. In troth sal I, Sir, gin the de'il tak' her not.

Col. B. Come along then, 'tis pretty near the time.—I like a woman that rises early to pursue her inclination.

Thus we improve the pleasures of the day,
While tasteless mortals sleep their time away.

[Exeunt.

SCENE II.—FREDERIC'S House.

Enter INIS and LISSARDO.

Lis. Your lady run away, and you know not whither, say you?

Inis. She never greatly cared for me after finding you and I together: but you are very grave, methinks, Lissardo.

Lis. [Looking on the ring.] Not at all—I have some thoughts indeed of altering my course of living; there is a critical minute in every man's life, which, if he can but lay hold of, he may make his fortune.

Inis. Ha! what do I see? a diamond ring! where the deuce had he that ring? [Aside.] You have got a very pretty ring there, Lissardo.

Lis. Ay, the trifle is pretty enough; but the lady who gave it to me is a bona roba, in beauty, I assure you. [Cocks his hat, and struts.

Inis. I can't bear this.—The lady! [Aside.] What lady, pray?

Lis. O fie! There's a question to ask a gentleman.

Inis. A gentleman! Why the fellow's spoiled! Is this your love for me? Ungrateful man, you'll break my heart, so you will.

Lis. Poor tender-hearted fool—
[Bursts into tears.]

Inis. If I knew who gave you that ring, I'd tear her eyes out, so I would.

Lis. So, now the jade wants a little coaxing.
[Aside.] Why, what dost weep for now, my dear, ha?

Inis. I suppose Flora gave you that ring; but I'll—

Lis. No, the devil take me if she did; you make me swear now.—So, they are all for the ring, but I shall bob 'em. [Aside.] I did but joke, the ring is none of mine, it is my master's; I am to give it to be new set, that's all; therefore, pry'thee, dry thy eyes, and kiss me, come.

Enter FLORA, unobserved.

Inis. And do you really speak truth, now?

Lis. Why do you doubt it?

Flora. So, so, very well! I thought there was an intrigue between him and Inis, for all he has forsown it so often.

Inis. Nor han't you seen Flora, since you came to town?

Flora. Ha! how dares she mention my name?

Lis. No, by this kiss, I han't.
[Kisses her.]

Flora. Here's a dissembling varlet.

Inis. Nor don't you love her at all?

Lis. Love the devil! why did I not always tell thee she was my aversion?

Flora. Did you so, villain?
[Gives him a box on the ear.]

Lis. Zounds, she's here! I have made a fine piece of work on't.

Inis. What's that for, ha?
[Goes up to her.]

Flora. I shall tell you by and by, Mrs. Frippery, if you don't get about your business.

Inis. Who do you call Frippery, Mrs. Trollop? Pray get about your business, if you go to that; I hope you pretend to no right and title here.

Lis. What the devil, do they take me for an acre of land, that they quarrel about right and title to me?

Flora. Pray what right have you, mistress, to ask that question?

Inis. No matter for that, I can show a better title to him than you, I believe.

Flora. What, has he given thee nine months' earnest for a living title? ha, ha!

Inis. Don't fling your flaunting jests at me, Mrs. Boldface, for I won't take 'em, I assure you.

Lis. So! now I am as great as the famed Alexander. But my dear Statura and Roxana, don't exert yourselves so much about me; now I fancy, if you would agree lovingly together, I might, in a modest way, satisfy both your demands upon me.

Flora. You satisfy! No, sirrah, I am not to be satisfied so soon as you think, perhaps.

Inis. No, nor I neither.—What, do you make no difference between us?

Flora. You pitiful fellow you! What you fancy I warrant, that I gave myself the trouble of dogging you out of love to your filthy person; but you are mistaken, sirrah.—It was to detect your treachery.—How often have you sworn to me that you hated Inis, and only carried fair for the good cheer she gave you; but that you could never like a woman with crooked legs, you said.

Inis. How, how sirrah, crooked legs! Odds, I could find in my heart—

[Snatches up her petticoat a little.]

Lis. Here's a lying young jade, now! Fry'thee, my dear, moderate thy passion.

[Coxingly.]

Inis. I'd have you to know, sirrah, my legs were never—your master, I hope, understands legs better than you do, sirrah.

[Passionately.]

Lis. My master, so, so.
[Shakes his head and winks.]

Flora. I am glad I have done some mischief, however.

[Aside.]

Lis. Art thou really so foolish to mind what an enraged woman says? Don't you see she does it on purpose to part you and I? [To INIS: runs to FLORA.] Could not you find the joke without putting yourself in a passion? you silly girl you. Why I saw you follow us plain enough, and said all this, that you might not go back with only your labour for your pains.—But you are a revengeful young slut though, I tell you that; but come, kiss and be friends.

Flora. Don't think to coax me; hang your kisses.

Fel. [Without.] Lissardo.

Lis. Odsheart, here's my master: the devil take both these jades for me, what shall I do with them?

[Aside.]

Inis. Ha! 'tis Don Felix's voice; I would not have him find me here with his footman for the world.

[Aside.]

Fel. [Without.] Why, Lissardo, Lissardo!

Lis. Coming, Sir. What a pox will you do?

Flora. Bless me, which way shall I get out?

Lis. Nay, nay, you must e'en set your quarrel aside, and be content to be mew'd up in this clothes-press together, or stay where you are, and face it out—there is no help for it.

Flora. Put me any where, rather than that; come, come, let me in.

[He opens the press, and she goes in.]

Inis. I'll see her hanged before I'll go into the place where she is.—I'll trust fortune with my deliverance. Here used to be a pair of back stairs; I'll try to find them out.

[Exit.]

Enter DON FELIX and FREDERIC.

Fel. Was you asleep, sirrah, that you did not hear me call?

Lis. I did hear you, and answered you I was coming, Sir.

Fel. Go, get the horses ready; I'll leave Lisbon to-night, never to see it more.

Lis. Hey-day! what's the matter now? [Exit.]

Fred. Pray tell me, Don Felix, what has ruffled your temper thus?

Fel. A woman—Oh, friend, who can name woman, and forget inconstancy?

Fred. This from a person of mean education were excusable, such low suspicions have their source from vulgar conversation; men of your polite taste never rashly censure.—Come, this is some groundless jealousy.—Love raises many fears.

Fel. No, no; my ears conveyed the truth into my heart, and reason justifies my anger. Oh, my friend! Violante's false, and I have nothing left but thee, in Lisbon, which can make me wish ever to see it more, except revenge upon my rival.

of whom I am ignorant. Oh, that some miracle would reveal him to me, that I might through his heart punish her infidelity.

Re-enter LISSARDO.

Lis. Oh, Sir! here's your father, Don Lopez, coming up.

Fel. Does he know that I am here?

Lis. I can't tell, Sir; he asked for Don Frederic.

Fred. Did he see you?

Lis. I believe not, Sir; for as soon as I saw him, I ran back to give my master notice.

Fel. Keep out of his sight then, [Exit LISSARDO.—And, dear Frederic, permit me to retire into the next room, for I know the old gentleman will be very much displeas'd at my return without his leave. [Exit.

Fred. Quick, quick, be gone, he is here.

Enter DON LOPEZ, speaking as he enters.

Lop. Mr. alguazil, wait you without till I call for you. Frederic, an affair brings me here—which—requires privacy—so that if you have any body within ear-shot, pray order them to retire.

Fred. We are private, my lord, speak freely.

Lop. Why then, Sir, I must tell you that you had better have pitched upon any man in Portugal to have injured, than myself.

Fred. I understand you not, my lord.

Lop. Though I am old, I have a son.—Alas, why name I him? he knows not the dishonour of my house.

Fred. Explain yourself, my lord; I am not conscious of any dishonourable action to any man, much less to your lordship.

Lop. 'Tis false! you have debauched my daughter.

Fred. My lord, I scorn so foul a charge.

Lop. You have debauched her duty at least, therefore instantly restore her to me, or by St. Anthony I'll make you.

Fred. Restore her, my lord! where shall I find her?

Lop. I have those that will swear she is here in your house.

Fred. You are misinformed, my lord; upon my reputation, I have not seen Donna Isabella since the absence of Don Felix.

Lop. Then pray, Sir—if I am not too inquisitive, what motive had you for those objections you made against her marriage with Don Guzman yesterday?

Fred. The disagreeableness of such a match, I feared, would give your daughter cause to curse her duty, if she complied with your demands; that was all, my lord.

Lop. And so you helped her through the window, to make her disobey.

Fred. This is insulting me, my lord, when I assure you, I have neither seen nor known any thing of your daughter.—If she is gone, the contrivance was her own, and you may thank your rigour for it.

Lop. Very well, Sir; however, my rigour shall make bold to search your house. Here, call in the alguazil—

Flora. [Peeps.] The alguazil! What in the name of wonder, will become of me?

Fred. The alguazil! My lord, you'll repent this.

Enter ALGUAZIL and Attendants.

Lop. No, Sir, 'tis you that will repent it. I charge you, in the king's name, to assist me in finding my daughter.—Be sure you leave no part of the house unsearched. Come, follow me.

[Gets towards the door where FELIX is: FREDERIC draws, and plants himself before it.

Fred. Sir, I must first know by what authority you pretend to search my house, before you enter here.

Alg. How, Sir, dare you presume to draw your sword upon the representative of majesty? I am, Sir, I am his majesty's alguazil, and the very quintessence of authority—therefore put up your sword, or I shall order you to be knocked down—For know, Sir, the breath of an alguazil is as dangerous as the breath of a demi-culverin.

Lop. She is certainly in that room, by his guarding the door—if he disputes your authority, knock him down, I say.

Fred. I shall show you some sport first! The woman you look for is not here; but there is something in this room which I'll preserve from your sight at the hazard of my life.

Lop. Enter, I say; nothing but my daughter can be there—Force his sword from him.

[FELIX comes out and joins FREDERIC.
Fel. Villains, stand off! assassinate a man in his own house!

Lop. Oh, oh, oh, misericordia! what do I see, my son?

Alg. Ha, his son! Here's five hundred pounds good, my brethren, if Antonio dies; and that's in the surgeon's power, and he's in love with my daughter, you know; so seize him—

Lop. Hold, hold! Oh, that ever I was born!

Fred. Did I not tell you, you would repent, my lord? What, ho! within there.

Enter VASQUEZ.

Arm yourselves, and let not a man in or out but Felix. [Exit VASQUEZ.

Fel. Generous Frederic!

Fred. Look ye, alguazil; when you would betray my friend for filthy lucre, I shall no more regard you as an officer of justice; but as a thief and a robber thus resist you.

Fel. Come on, Sir; we'll show you play for the five hundred pounds.

Re-enter VASQUEZ and Servants.

Lop. Hold, hold, alguazil; I'll give you the five hundred pounds; that is, my bond to pay u_o Antonio's death, and twenty pistoles, however things go, for you and these honest fellows to drink my health.

Alg. Say you so, my lord? Why, look ye, my lord, I bear the young gentleman no ill will, my lord; if I but get the five hundred pounds, my lord—why, look ye, my lord—'tis the same thing to me whether your son be hanged or not, my lord.

Fel. Scoundrels! [Exit Servants.

Lop. Ay, well, thou art a good-natured fellow, that is the truth on't—Come then, we'll to the tavern, and sign and seal this minute. Oh, Felix! why wouldst thou serve me thus?—But I cannot upbraid thee now, nor have I time to talk. Be careful of thyself, or thou wilt break my heart

[Exit DON LOPEZ, ALGUAZIL, Attendants, &c.

Fel. Now, Frederic, though I ought to thank you for your care of me, yet till I am satisfied as to my father's accusation, for I overheard it all, I can't return the acknowledgments I owe you. Know you aught relating to my sister.

Fred. I hope my faith and truth are known to you—and here by both I swear, I am ignorant of every thing relating to your father's charge.

Fel. Enough; I do believe thee. Oh, fortune! where will thy malice end?

Re-enter VASQUEZ.

Vas. Sir, I bring you joyful news.

Fel. What's the matter?

Vas. I am told that Don Antonio is out of danger, and now in the palace.

Fel. I wish it be true; then I'm at liberty to watch my rival, and pursue my sister. Pr'ythee, Frederic, inform thyself of the truth of this report.

Fred. I will this minute—Do you hear, let nobody in to Don Felix till my return.

[To VASQUEZ, and exit.]

Vas. I'll observe, Sir.

Flora. [Peeps.] They have almost frightened me out of my wits—I'm sure—Now Felix is alone, I have a good mind to pretend I came with a message from my lady; but how then shall I say I came in the cupboard?

Re-enter VASQUEZ opposing the entrance of somebody.

Vas. I tell you, Madam, Don Felix is not here.

Vio. [Within.] I tell you, Sir, he is here, and I will see him.

Fel. What noise is that?

Enter VIOLANTE.

Vio. You are as difficult of access, Sir, as a first minister of state.

Flora. My stars! my lady here!

[Shuts the press close.]

Fel. If your visit was designed to Frederic, Madam, he is abroad.

Vio. No, Sir, the visit is to you.

Fel. You are very punctual in your ceremonies, Madam.

Vio. Though I did not come to return your visit, but to take that which your civility ought to have brought me.

Fel. If my eyes, my ears, and my understanding lied, then I am in your debt; else not, Madam.

Vio. I will not charge them with a term so gross, to say they lied, but call it a mistake; nay, call it anything to excuse, my Felix—could I, think ye, could I put off my pride so far, poorly to dissemble a passion which I did not feel, or seek a reconciliation with what I did not love?—No law, whilst single, binds us to obey, but your sex are obliged to pay a deference to all womankind.

Fel. These are fruitless arguments. 'Tis most certain thou wert dearer to these eyes than all that Heaven e'er gave to charm the sense of man; but I would rather tear them out, than suffer them to delude my reason, and enslave my peace.

Vio. Can you love without esteem? and where is the esteem for her you still suspect? Oh, Felix, there is a delicacy in love, which equals even a religious faith! True love never doubts the object it adores, and sceptics there will disbelieve their sight.

Fel. Your notions are too refined for mine, Madam.

Re-enter VASQUEZ.

How now, sirrah, what do you want?

Vas. Only my master's cloak out of this press, Sir; that's all.

Fel. Make haste then.

[VASQUEZ opens the press, sees FLORA.]

Vas. Oh! the devil! the devil! [Exit.]

Flora. Discovered! Nay, then, legs befriend me.

Vio. Ha! a woman concealed! very well, Felix.

Fel. A woman in the press!

Re-enter LISSARDO.

How the devil came a woman there, sirrah?

Lis. What shall I say now? [Aside.]

Vio. Now, Lissardo, show your wit to bring your master off.

Lis. Off, Madam? Nay, nay, nay, there, there needs no great wit to, to, to bring him off, Madam; for she did, and she did not come as, as, as a, a, a man may say directly to, to, to, to speak to my master, Madam.

Vio. I see by your stammering, Lissardo, that your invention is at a very low ebb.

Fel. 'Sdeath, rascal, speak without hesitation, and the truth too, or I shall stick my spado in your guts!

Vio. No, no, your master mistakes; he would not have you speak the truth.

Fel. Madam, my sincerity wants no excuse.

Lis. I am so confounded between one and the other, that I can't think of a lie. [Aside.]

Fel. Sirrah, fetch me this woman back instantly; I'll know what business she had here!

Vio. Not a step; your master shall not be put to the blush—Come, a truce, Felix! Do you ask me no more questions about the window, and I'll forgive this.

Fel. I scorn forgiveness, where I own no crime; but your soul, conscious of its guilt, would fain lay hold of this occasion to blend your treason with my innocence.

Vio. Insolent! Nay, if, instead of owning your fault, you endeavour to insult my patience, I must tell you, Sir, you don't behave yourself like that man of honour you would be taken for; you ground your quarrel with me upon your own inconstancy; 'tis plain you are false yourself, and would make me the aggressor.—It was not for nothing the fellow opposed my entrance.—This last usage has given me back my liberty; and now my father's will shall be obeyed without the least reluctance: and so your servant. [Exit.]

Fel. Oh, stubborn, stubborn heart, what wilt thou do? her father's will shall be obeyed; ha! that carries her to a cloister, and cuts off all my hopes at once—By Heaven she shall not, must not leave me! No, she is not false, at least my love now represents her true, because I fear to lose her. Ha! villain, art thou here? [Turns upon LISSARDO.] Tell me this moment who this woman was, and for what intent she was here concealed—or—

Lis. Ay, good Sir, forgive me, and I'll tell you the whole truth. [Falls on his knees.]

Fel. Out with it then.

Lis. It, it, it was Mrs. Flora, Sir, Donna Violante's woman. You must know, Sir, we had a sneaking kindness for one another a great while. She was not willing you should know it; so, when she heard your voice, she ran into the clothes-press.

I would have told you this at first, but I was afraid of her lady's knowing it; this is the truth, as I hope for a whole skin, Sir.

Fel. If it be not, I'll not leave you a whole bone in it, sirrah: fly, and observe if Violante goes directly home.

Lis. Yes, Sir, yes.

Fel. Fly, you dog, fly. [Exit LISSARDO.] I must convince her of my faith. Oh! how irresolute is a lover's heart!—How absolute a woman's power!

*In vain we strive their tyranny to quit;
In vain we struggle, for we must submit.*

[Exit.]

SCENE III.—The Terriero de Passa.

Enter COLONEL BRITON, and ISABELLA veiled;
GIBBY at a distance.

Col. B. Then you say it is impossible for me to wait upon you home, Madam?

Isa. I say, it is inconsistent with my circumstances, colonel, and that way impossible for me to admit of it.

Col. B. Consent to go with me then.—I lodge at one Don Frederic's, a merchant, just by here: he is a very honest fellow, and I dare confide in his secrecy.

Isa. Ha! does he lodge there? Pray Heaven, I am not discovered!

Col. B. What say you, my charmer? shall we breakfast together? I have some of the best tea in the universe.

Isa. Pooh! tea! Is that the best treat you can give a lady at your lodgings, colonel?

Col. B. Well hinted. [Aside.] No, no, no, I have other things at your service, child.

Isa. What are these things, pray?

Col. B. My heart, soul, and body into the bargain.

Isa. Has the last no incumbrance upon it? Can you make a clear title, colonel?

Col. B. All freehold, child; and I'll afford thee a very good bargain.

Gibby. O' my saul, they mak' muckle words about it. Ise sair weary wi' standing; Ise e'en tak' a sleep.

Isa. If I take a lease, it must be for life, colonel.

Col. B. Thou shalt have me as long or as little time as thou wilt, my dear. Come, let's to my lodging, and we'll sign and seal this minute.

Isa. Oh, not so fast, colonel; there are many things to be adjusted before the lawyer and the parson come.

Col. B. The lawyer and parson! No, no, you little rogue, we can finish our affairs without the help of the law—or the gospel.

Isa. Indeed but we can't, colonel.

Col. B. Indeed! Why, hast thou, then, trepanned me out of my warm bed this morning for nothing? Why, this is showing a man, half famished, a well furnished larder, then clapping a padlock on the door, till you starve him quite.

Isa. If you can find in your heart to say grace, colonel, you shall keep the key.

Col. B. I love to see my meat before I give thanks, Madam; therefore uncover thy face, child, and I'll tell thee more of my mind. If I like you—

Isa. I dare not risk my reputation upon your wits, colonel, and so adieu.

Col. B. Nay, nay, nay, we must not part.

Isa. As you ever hope to see me more, suspend your curiosity now; one step farther loses me forever.—Show yourself a man of honour, and you will find me a woman of honour.

Col. B. Well, for once, I'll trust to a blind bargain, Madam. [Kisses her hand; exit ISABELLA.] But I shall be too cunning for your ladyship, if Gibby observes my orders.—Methinks, these intrigues, which relate to the mind, are very insipid—the conversation of bodies is much more diverting. Ha! what do I see? my rascal asleep? Sirrah, did not I charge you to watch the lady? And is it thus you observe my orders, you dog?

[Kicks GIBBY, who shrugs, rubs his eyes, and yawns.]

Gibby. That's true, an like yer honour; but I thought that when yence you had her in yer ain hands, ye might a ordered her yersel' weel enough, without me, e'en ye ken, an like yer honour.

Col. B. Sirrah, hold your impertinent tongue, and make haste after her. If you don't bring me some account of her, never dare to see my face again.

Gibby. Ay, this is bonny wark indeed! to rin three hunder mile tae this wicked town, and before I can weel fill my wame, to be sent a whore-hunting after this black she-devil!—What gate sal I gang to speer for this wutch now? Ah! for a ruling elder, or the kirk's treasurer, or his man, I'd gar my master mak' twa o' this. But I am sure there's nae sic honest folk here, or there wad na be sae muckle sculdudderie.

Enter a SOLDIER, passing along.

Gudeman, did ye see a woman, a lady, ony gate here awa' e'en now?

Sol. Yes, a great many. What kind of a woman is it you inquire after?

Gibby. Gude troth, she's no kenspeckle; she's a' in a cloud.

Sol. What, 'tis some Highland monster, which you brought over with you, I suppose: I see no such, not I. Kenspeckle, quotha!

Gibby. Hooly, hooly, man; the de'il pike out yer e'en, and then ye'll see the better, ye Portigee tike.

Sol. What says the fellow? [Turns to GIBBY.]

Gibby. Say? Say I am a better fallow than e'er stude upon yer shanks—and gin I hear mair o' yer din, de'il o' my saul, Sir, but Ise crack yer croon.

Sol. Get you gone, you Scotch rascal, and thank your heathen dialect, which I don't understand, that you han't your bones broke.

Gibby. Ay, an ye dinna understand a Scotsman's tongue, Ise see gin ye can understand a Scotsman's gripe. Wha's the better man, now, Sir?

[Trips up his heels and gets astride over him.]

Enter VIOLANTE, who crosses the stage; GIBBY jumps from the SOLDIER, and brushes up to her.

I vow, Madam, but I am glad that ye and I are forgathered.

[Exit SOLDIER.]

Vio. What would the fellow have?

Gibby. Nothing ava, Madam, wo worth yer heart; what a muckle deal o' mischief had you like to bring upon puir Gibby!

Vio. The man's drunk.

Gibby. In troth am I not. And gin I had nae found ye, Madam, the Laird kens when I should;

for my maister bade me ne'er gang hame without tidings o' ye, Madam.

Vio. Sirrah, get about your business, or I'll have your bones drubbed.

Gibby. Gude faith, my maister has e'en done that t'yer hands, Madam.

Vio. Who is your master, Sir?

Gibby. Mony a ane speers the gate they ken right weel. It is not sae lang sin' ye parted wi' him. I wish he ken ye hauf as weel as ye ken him.

Vio. Poh, the creature's mad, or mistakes me for somebody else; and I should be as mad as he, to talk to him any longer.

[Enters DON PEDRO's house.

Enter LISSARDO at the upper end of the stage.

Lis. So, she's gone home, I see. What did that Scotch fellow want with her? I'll try to find it out; perhaps I may discover something that may make my master friends with me again.

Gibby. Are ye gane, Madam? a de'il scope in yer company; for I'm as wise as I was. But I'll bide and see wha's house it is, gin I can meet wi' ony civil body to speer at. [Turns and sees LISSARDO.] My lad, wot ye wha lives here?

Lis. Don Pedro de Mendosa.

Gibby. And did you see a lady gang in but now?

Lis. Yes, I did.

Gibby. And d'ye ken her tae?

Lis. It was Donna Violante, his daughter.—What the devil makes him so inquisitive? Here is something in it, that's certain. [Aside.]—'Tis a cold morning, brother; what think you of a dram?

Gibby. In troth, very weel, Sir.

Lis. You seem an honest fellow; pr'ythee, let's drink to our better acquaintance.

Gibby. Wi' aw my heart, Sir, gang your gate to the next house, and Ise follow ye.

Lis. Come along then.

[Exit.

Gibby. Don Pedro de Mendosa—Donna Violante, his daughter. That's as right as my leg, now. Ise need nae mair; I'll tak' a drink, and then to my maister.

Is bring him news will mak' his heart full blec; Gin he rewards it not, de'il pimp for me. [Exit.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—VIOLANTE's Lodgings.

Enter ISABELLA, in a gay temper, and VIOLANTE out of humour.

Isa. My dear, I have been seeking you this half hour, to tell you the most lucky adventure.

Vio. And you have pitched upon the most unlucky hour for it, that you could possibly have found in the whole four and twenty.

Isa. Hang unlucky hours, I wont think of them; I hope all my misfortunes are past.

Vio. And mine all to come.

Isa. I have seen the man I like.

Vio. And I have seen the man that I could wish to hate.

Isa. And you must assist me in discovering whether he can like me or not.

Vio. You have assisted me in such a discovery already, I thank ye.

Isa. What say you, my dear?

Vio. I say I am very unlucky at discoveries, Isabella; I have too lately made one pernicious to my case; your brother is false.

Isa. Impossible!

Vio. Most true.

Isa. Some villain has traduced him to you.

Vio. No, Isabella, I love too well to trust the eyes of others; I never credit the ill-judging world, or form suspicions upon vulgar censures; no, I had ocular proof of his ingratitude.

Isa. Then I am most unhappy. My brother was the only pledge of faith betwixt us; if he has forfeited your favour, I have no title to your friendship.

Vio. You wrong my friendship, Isabella; you own merit entitles you to every thing within my power.

Isa. Generous maid!—But may I not know what grounds you have to think my brother false?

Vio. Another time—But tell me, Isabella, how can I serve you?

Isa. Thus, then—The gentleman that brought me hither, I have seen and talked with upon the Terriero de Passa this morning, and I find him a man of sense, generosity, and good humour; in short, he is every thing that I could like for a husband, and I have dispatched Mrs. Flora to bring him hither; I hope you'll excuse the liberty I have taken.

Vio. Hither! to what purpose?

Isa. To the great universal purpose, matrimony.

Vio. Matrimony! why, do you design to ask him?

Isa. No, Violante, you must do that for me.

Vio. I thank you for the favour you design me, but desire to be excused: I manage my own affairs too ill, to be trusted with those of other people; I can't for my life admire your conduct, to encourage a person altogether unknown to you.—'Twas very imprudent to meet him this morning, but much more so to send for him hither, knowing what inconveniency you have already drawn upon me.

Isa. I am not sensible how far my misfortunes have embarrassed you; and, if you please, will sacrifice my quiet to your own.

Vio. Unkindly urged!—Have I not preferred your happiness to every thing that's dear to me?

Isa. I know thou hast—Then do not deny me this last request, when a few hours perhaps may render my condition able to clear thy fame, and bring my brother to thy feet for pardon.

Vio. I wish you don't repent of this intrigue. I suppose he knows you are the same woman that he brought in here last night?

Isa. Not a syllable of that; I met him veiled, and to prevent his knowing the house, I ordered Mrs. Flora to bring him by the back-door into the garden.

Vio. The very way which Felix comes; if they should meet, there would be fine work—Indeed, my dear, I can't approve of your design.

Enter FLORA.

Flora. Madam, the colonel waits your pleasure.

Vio. How durst you go upon such a message, mistress, without acquainting me?

Flora. So, I am to be huffed for every thing.

Isa. 'Tis too late to dispute that now, dear Violante; I acknowledge the rashness of the action—But consider the necessity of my deliverance.

Vio. That indeed is a weighty consideration: well, what am I to do?

Isa. In the next room I'll give you instructions—In the meantime, Mrs. Flora, show the colonel into this. [Exit FLORA one way, ISABELLA and VIOLANTE another.

Re-enter FLORA, with COLONEL BRITON.

Flora. The lady will wait on you presently, Sir. [Exit.]

Col. B. Very well—This is a very fruitful soil. I have not been here quite four and twenty hours, and I have three intrigues upon my hands already; but I hate the chase without partaking of the game.

Re-enter VIOLANTE, veiled.

Ha! a fine-sized woman—Pray Heaven, she proves handsome. [Aside.—I am come to obey your ladyship's commands.

Vio. Are you sure of that, colonel?

Col. B. If you be not very unreasonable, indeed, Madam. A man is but a man.

[Kisses her hand.
Vio. Nay, we have no time for compliments, colonel.

Col. B. I understand you, Madam—Montrez moi votre chambre. [Takes her in his arms.

Vio. Nay, nay, hold, colonel, my bed-chamber is not to be entered without a certain purchase.

Col. B. Purchase! Humph, this is some kept mistress, I suppose, who industriously lets out her leisure hours. [Aside.—Look you, Madam, you must consider we soldiers are not overstocked with money—But we make ample satisfaction in love: we have a world of courage upon our hands now, you know. Then prythee, use a conscience, and I'll try if my pocket can come up to your price.

Vio. Nay, don't give yourself the trouble of drawing your purse, colonel; my design is levelled at your person, if that be at your own disposal.

Col. B. Ay, that it is, faith, Madam, and I'll settle it as firmly upon thee—

Vio. As law can do it.

Col. B. Hang law in love affairs; thou shalt have right and title to it out of pure inclination.—A matrimonial hint again. [Aside.

Vio. Then you have an aversion to matrimony, colonel. Did you never see a woman, in all your travels, that you could like for a wife?

Col. B. A very odd question. [Aside.—Do you really expect that I should speak the truth, now?

Vio. I do, if you expect to be dealt with, colonel.

Col. B. Why, then—Yes.

Vio. Is she in your country, or this?

Col. B. This is a very pretty kind of a catechism. [Aside.—In this town, I believe, Madam.

Vio. Her name is—

Col. B. Ay, how is she called, Madam?

Vio. Nay, I ask you that, Sir.

Col. B. Oh, oh, why she is called—Pray, Madam, how is it you spell your name?

Vio. Oh, colonel, I am not the happy woman, nor do I wish it.

Col. B. No; I am not sorry for that.—What the devil does she mean by all these questions?

[Aside.

Vio. Come, colonel, for once be sincere. Perhaps you may not repent it.

Col. B. This is like to be but a silly adventure, here's so much sincerity required. [Aside.—Faith, Madam, I have an inclination to sincerity, but I'm afraid you'll call my manners in question.

Vio. Not at all; I prefer truth before compliment in this affair.

Col. B. Why then, to be plain with you, Madam, a lady last night wounded my heart by a fall from a window, whose person I could be content to take, as my father took my mother, till death do us part. But whom she is, or how distinguished, whether maid, wife, or widow, I can't inform you. Perhaps you are she.

Vio. Not to keep you in suspense, I am not she, but I can give you an account of her. The lady is a maid of condition, has ten thousand pounds, and if you are a single man, her person and fortune are at your service.

Col. B. I accept the offer with the highest transports; but say, my charming angel, art thou not she?

Vio. Once again, colonel, I tell you, I am not she—But at six this evening you shall find her on the Terriero de Passa, with a white handkerchief in her hand. Get a priest ready, and you know the rest.

Col. B. I shall infallibly observe your directions, Madam.

Re-enter FLORA hastily, and whispers VIOLANTE, who starts and seems surprised.

Vio. Ha! Felix crossing the garden, say you? What shall I do now?

Col. B. You seem surprised, Madam.

Vio. Oh, colonel, my father is coming hither, and if he finds you here I am ruined.

Col. B. Odsif, Madam, thrust me anywhere. Can't I go out this way?

Vio. No, no, no, he comes that way. How shall I prevent their meeting? Here, here, step into my bed-chamber.

Col. B. Oh, the best place in the world, Madam.

Vio. And be still as you value her you love. Don't stir till you've notice, as ever you hope to have her in your arms.

Col. B. On that condition, I'll not breathe.

[Exit.

Enter FELIX.

Fel. I wonder where this dog of a servant is all this while. But she is at home, I find. How coldly she regards me. [Aside.—You look, Violante, as if the sight of me were troublesome to you.

Vio. Can I do otherwise, when you have the assurance to approach me, after what I saw to-day?

Fel. Assurance! rather call it good nature, after what I heard last night. But such regard to honour have I in my love to you, I cannot bear to be suspected, nor suffer you to entertain false notions of my truth, without endeavouring to convince you of my innocence; so much good nature have I more than you, Violante.—Pray give me leave to ask your woman one question; my man assures me she was the person you saw at my lodgings.

Flora. I confess it, Madam, and ask your pardon.

Vio. Impudent baggage, not to undeceive me sooner; what business could you have there?

Fel. Lissardo and she, it seems, imitate you and I.

Flora. I love to follow the example of my betters, Madam.

Fel. I hope I am justified—

Vio. Since we are to part, Felix, there needs no justification.

Fel. Methinks you talk of parting as a thing indifferent to you. Can you forget how I have loved?

Vio. I wish I could forget my own passion, I should with less concern remember yours—But, for Mrs. Flora—

Fel. You must forgive her—Must, did I say? I fear I have no power to impose, though the injury was done to me.

Vio. 'Tis harder to pardon an injury done to what we love, than to ourselves; but at your request, Felix, I do forgive her. Go watch my father, Flora, lest he should awake and surprise us.

Flo. Yes, Madam.

Fel. Dost thou then love me, Violante?

Vio. What need of repetition from my tongue, when every look confesses what you ask?

Fel. Oh, let no man judge of love but those who feel it; what wondrous magic lies in one kind look—One tender word destroys a lover's rage, and melts his fiercest passion into soft complaint. Oh, the window, Violante; wouldst thou but clear that one suspicion!

Vio. Pr'ythee, no more of that, my Felix, a little time shall bring thee perfect satisfaction.

Fel. Well, Violante, on condition, you think no more of a monastery, I'll wait with patience for this mighty secret.

Vio. Ah, Felix, love generally gets the better of religion in us women. Resolutions made in the heat of passion ever dissolve upon reconciliation.

Re-enter FLORA, hastily.

Flora. Oh, Madam, Madam, Madam, my lord your father has been in the house, and locked the back door, and comes muttering to himself this way.

Vio. Then we are caught. Now, Felix, we are undone.

Fel. Heavens forbid! This is most unlucky! Let me step into your bed-chamber, he wont look under the bed; there I may conceal myself.

[Runs to the door.]

Vio. No, no, Felix, that's no safe place; my father often goes thither; and should you cough, or sneeze, we are lost.

Fel. Either my eye deceived me, or I saw a man within. I'll watch him close.

Flora. Oh, invention, invention! I have it, Madam. Here, here, Sir: off with your sword, and I'll fetch you a disguise.

Fel. She shall deal with the devil, if she conveys him out without my knowledge.

Vio. Bless me, how I tremble!

Re-enter FLORA with a riding-hood.

Flora. Here, Sir, put on this. Be sure you don't speak a word.

Fel. Not for the Indies.

Ped. [Within.] Why, how came the garden door open?

Enter DON PEDRO.

Ha! how now! Who have we here?

Flora. 'Tis my mother, and please you, Sir.

Ped. Your mother! by St. Andrew she's a strapper; why, you are a dwarf to her. How many children have you, good woman?

Vio. If he speaks we are lost.

Flora. Oh! dear Seignior, she cannot hear you; she has been deaf these twenty years.

Ped. Alas, poor woman!—Why you muffle her up as if she was blind too; turn up her hood.

Vio. Undone for ever! St. Anthony forbid [Aside.] Oh, Sir, she has the dreadfulest unlucky eyes—Pray don't look upon them: I made her hood shut on purpose—Oh, oh, on, oh!

Ped. Eyes! Why, what 's the matter with her eyes?

Flora. My poor mother, Sir, is much afflicted with the colic; and about two months ago she had it grievously in her stomach, and was over-persuaded to take a dram of filthy English Geneva—which immediately flew up into her head, and caused such a defuxion in her eyes, that she could never since bear the day-light.

Ped. Say you so? Poor woman!—Well, make her sit down, Violante, and give her a glass of wine.

Vio. Let her daughter give her a glass below, Sir; for my part, she has frightened me so, I sha'n't be myself these two hours. I am sure her eyes are evil eyes.

Ped. Well, well, do so—Evil eyes! there are no evil eyes, child.

Flora. Come along, mother.

Ped. Good bye, good woman.

[Ereunt FELIX and FLORA.]

Vio. I'm glad he's gone.

Ped. Hast thou heard the news, Violante?

Vio. What news, Sir?

Ped. Why, Vasquez tells me, that Don Lopez's daughter, Isabella, is run away from her father; that lord has very ill fortune with his children. Well, I'm glad my daughter has no inclination to mankind, that my house is plagued with no suitors.

Vio. This is the first word ever I heard of it: I pity her frailty.

Ped. Well said, Violante. Next week I intend thy happiness shall begin.

Re-enter FLORA.

Vio. I don't intend to stay so long, thank you, papa.

Ped. My lady abbess writes word she longs to see thee, and has provided every thing in order for thy reception. Thou wilt lead a happy life, my girl—fifty times before that of matrimony, where an extravagant coxcomb might make a beggar of thee, or an ill-natured surly dog break thy heart.

Flora. Break her heart! She had as good have her bones broke as to be a nun; I am sure I had rather of the two. [Aside.] You are wondrous kind, Sir; but if I had such a father, I know what I would do.

Ped. Why, what would you do, minx, ha?

Flora. I would tell him I had as good a right and title as he had.

Ped. You would, mistress! who the devil doubts it? A good assurance is a chambermaid's coat of arms; and lying and contriving the supporters. Your inclinations are on tip-toe, it seems. If I were your father, housewife, I'd have a penance enjoined you, so strict, that you should not be able to turn in your bed for a month. You are enough to spoil your lady, housewife, if she had not abundance of devotion.

Vio. Flora, are you not ashamed to talk thus to my father? You said yesterday, you would be glad to go with me into the monastery.

Flora. Did I? I told a great lie, then.

Ped. She go with thee! No, no, she's enough to debauch the whole convent. Well, child, remember what I said to thee: next week—

Vio. Ay, and what I am to do this, too. [Aside.]—I am all obedience, Sir; I care not how soon I change my condition.

Ped. Well said, Violante.—Well, child, I am going into the country for two or three days, to settle some affairs with thy uncle; and when I return, we'll provide for thy happiness, child—Good bye, Violante; take care of thyself.

[Exeunt DON PEDRO and VIOLANTE.]

Flora. So, now for the colonel. Hist, hist, colonel.

Re-enter COLONEL BRITON.

Col. B. Is the coast clear?

Flora. Yes, if you can climb; for you must get over the wash-house, and jump from the garden-wall into the street.

Col. Nay, nay, I don't value my neck, if my incognita answers but thy lady's promise.

[Exeunt COLONEL BRITON and FLORA.]

Re-enter FELIX.

Fel. I have lain perdue under the stairs, till I watched the old man out. [VIOLANTE opens the door.] 'Sdeath, I am prevented. [Exit.]

Re-enter VIOLANTE.

Vio. Now to set my prisoner at liberty. [Goes to the door where the COLONEL is hid.] Sir, sir, you may appear.

Re-enter FELIX, following her.

Fel. May he so, Madam? I had cause for my suspicions, I find. Treacherous woman!

Vio. Ha, Felix here! Nay, then all's discovered. [Aside.]

Fel. [Draws.] Villain, whoever thou art, come out, I charge thee, and take the reward of thy adulterous errand.

Vio. What shall I say? Nothing but the secret which I have sworn to keep can reconcile this quarrel. [Aside.]

Fel. A coward! Nay, then I'll fetch you out. Think not to hide thyself; no, by St. Anthony, an altar should not protect thee. [Exit.]

Vio. Defend me, Heaven! What shall I do? I must discover Isabella, or here will be murder.

Re-enter FLORA.

Flora. I have helped the colonel off clear, Madam.

Vio. Sayest thou so, my girl? Then I am armed.

Re-enter FELIX.

Fel. Where has the devil, in compliance to your sex, conveyed him from my resentment?

Vio. Him! whom do you mean, my dear, inquisitive spark? Ha, ha, ha, ha! you will never leave these jealous whims.

Fel. Will you never cease to impose upon me?

Vio. You impose upon yourself, my dear. Do you think I did not see you? Yes, I did, and resolved to put this trick upon you.

Fel. Trick!

Vio. Yes, trick; I knew you'd take the hint, and soon relapse into your wonted error. How easily your jealousy is fired! I shall have a blessed life with you.

Fel. Was there nothing in it then, but only to try me?

VOL. I. . . . 2 N

24*

Vio. Wont you believe you ears?

Fel. My eyes! no, nor my ears, nor any of my senses, for they have all deceived me. Well, I am convinced that faith is as necessary in love as in religion; for the moment a man lets a woman know her conquest, he resigns his senses, and sees nothing but what she'd have him.

Vio. And as soon as that man finds his love returned, she becomes as errant a slave as if she had already said after the priest.

Fel. The priest, Violante, would dissipate those fears which cause these quarrels; when wilt thou make me happy?

Vio. To-morrow I will tell thee; my father is gone for two or three days to my uncle's, we have time enough to finish our affairs.—But, pry'thee, leave me now, lest some accident should bring my father.

Fel. To-morrow then—
Fly swift ye hours, and bring to-morrow me—
But must I leave you now, my Violante?

Vio. You must, my Felix. We soon shall meet, to part no more.

Fel. Oh, rapt'rous sounds! Charming woman! Thy words and looks have fill'd my heart
With joy, and left no room for jealousy.

Do thou, like me, each doubt and fear remove,
And all to come be confidence and love.

[Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—FREDERIC'S House.

Enter FELIX and FREDERIC.

Fel. This hour has been propitious; I am reconciled to Violante, and you assure me Antonio is out of danger.

Fred. Your satisfaction is doubly mine.

Enter LISSARDO.

Fel. What haste you made, sirrah, to bring me word if Violante went home.

Lis. I can give you very good reasons for my stay, Sir.—Yes, Sir, she went home.

Fred. Oh! your master knows that, for he has been there himself, Lissardo.

Lis. Sir, may I beg the favour of your ear?

Fel. What have you to say?

[Whispers; FELIX uneasy]
Fred. Ha! Felix changes colour at Lissardo's news. What can it be?

Fel. A Scotch footman, that belongs to colonel Briton, an acquaintance of Frederic's, say you? The devil!—If she be false, by Heaven I'll trace her.—[Aside.] Pry'thee Frederic, do you know one colonel Briton, a Scotsman?

Fred. Yes. Why do you ask me?

Fel. Nay, no great matter: but my man tells me that he has had some little differences with a servant of his, that's all.

Fred. He is a good, harmless, innocent fellow; I am sorry for it. The colonel lodges in my house; I knew him formerly in England, and met him here by accident last night, and gave him an invitation home. He is a gentleman of good estate, besides his commission; of excellent principles, and strict honour, I assure you.

Fel. Is he a man of intrigue?

Fred. Like other men, I suppose. Here he comes.

Enter COLONEL BRITON.

Colonel, I began to think I had lost you.

Col. B. And not without some reason, if you knew all.

Fel. There 's no danger of a fine gentleman's being lost in this town, Sir.

Col. B. That compliment don't belong to me, Sir—but I assure you I have been very near being run away with.

Fred. Who attempted it?

Col. B. Faith, I know not—only that she is a charming woman; I mean as much as I saw of her.

Fel. My heart swells with apprehension: [Aside.] some accidental recounter?

Fred. A tavern, I suppose, adjusted the matter.

Col. B. A tavern? No, no, Sir, she is above that rank, I assure you; this nymph sleeps in a velvet bed, and lodgings every way agreeable.

Fel. Ha! a velvet bed! [Aside.] I thought you said but now, Sir, you knew her not.

Col. B. No more I don't, Sir.

Fel. How came you then so well acquainted with her bed?

Fred. Ay, ay, come, come, unfold.

Col. B. Why then you must know, gentlemen, that I was conveyed to her lodgings, by one of Cupid's emissaries, called a chambermaid, in a chair, through fifty blind allies, who by the help of a key let me into a garden.

Fel. 'Sdeath, a garden! This must be Violante's garden. [Aside.]

Col. B. From thence conducted me into a spacious room, told me her lady would wait on me presently; so, without unveiling, modestly withdrew.

Fel. Damn her modesty! this was Flora.

[Aside.]

Fred. Well, how then, colonel?

Col. B. Then, Sir, immediately from another door issued forth a lady, armed at both eyes, from whence such showers of darts fell around me, that had I not been covered with the shield of another beauty, I had infallibly fallen a martyr to her charms: for you must know I just saw her eyes—eyes, did I say? No, no, hold, I saw but one eye, though I suppose it had a fellow equally as killing.

Fel. But how came you to see her bed, Sir?—'Sdeath, this expectation gives a thousand racks. [Aside.]

Col. B. Why, upon her maid's giving notice her father was coming, she thrust me into the bed-chamber.

Fel. Upon her father's coming?

Col. B. Ay, so she said; but putting my ear to the key-hole of the door, I found it was another lover.

Fel. Confound the jilt! 'Twas she, without dispute. [Aside.]

Fred. Ah, poor colonel! ha, ha, ha!

Col. B. I discovered they had had a quarrel, but whether they were reconciled or not, I can't tell; for the second alarm brought the father in good earnest, and had like to have made the gentleman and I acquainted; but she found some other stratagem to convey him out.

Fel. Contagion seize her, and make her body ugly as her soul! There is nothing left to doubt of now.—'Tis plain 'twas she.—Sure he knows me, and takes this method to insult me. 'Sdeath, cannot bear it! [Aside.]

Fred. So when she had dispatched her old lover, she paid you a visit in her bed-chamber, ha, colonel?

Col. B. No, plague take the impertinent puppy, he spoiled my diversion, I saw her no more.

Fel. Very fine! Give me patience, Heaven, or I shall burst with rage. [Aside.]

Fred. That was hard.

Col. B. Nay, what was worse—But, Sir, dear Sir, do hearken to this. [To FELIX.] The nymph that introduced me, conveyed me out again over the top of a high wall, where I ran the danger of having my neck broke, for the father, it seems, had locked the door by which I entered.

Fel. That way I missed him. Damn her invention. [Aside.] Pray, colonel—ha, ha, ha! it's very pleasant, ha, ha!—was this the same lady you met upon the Terriero de Passa this morning?

Col. B. Faith, I can't tell, Sir; I had a design to know who that lady was, but my dog of a footman, whom I had ordered to watch her home, fell fast asleep. I gave him a good beating for his neglect, and I have never seen the rascal since.

Fred. Here he comes.

Enter GIBBY.

Col. B. Where have you been, sirrah?

Gibby. Troth, Ise been seeking ye, an lik' yer honour, these two hours and mair. I bring thee glad teedings, Sir.

Col. B. What, have you found the lady?

Gibby. Gude faith, ha' I, Sir; and she's call'd Donna Violante, and her parent Don Pedro de Mendosa; and, gin ye will gang wi' me, and lik' yer honour, Ise make ye ken the hoose right weel.

Fel. Oh, torture, torture! [Aside.]

Col. B. Ha! Violante! That's the lady's name of the house where my incognita is: sure it could not be her; at least it was not the same house, I'm confident. [Aside.]

Fred. Violante! 'Tis false; I would not have you credit him, colonel.

Gibby. The de'il burst my blether, Sir, gin I lee.

Fel. Sirrah, I say you do lie, and I'll make you eat it, you dog; [Kicks him.] and if your master will justify you—

Col. B. Not I, faith, Sir. I answer for nobody's lies but my own. If you please, kick him again.

Gibby. But gin he does, Ise na tak' it, Sir, gin he was a thousand Spaniards.

[Walks about in a passion.]

Col. B. I owed you a beating, sirrah, and I am obliged to this gentleman for taking the trouble off my hands; therefore say no more, d'ye hear, Sir?

[Apart to GIBBY.]

Gibby. Troth do I, Sir, and feel tae.

Fred. This must be a mistake, colonel; for I know Violante perfectly well, and I am certain she would not meet you upon the Terriero de Passa.

Col. B. Don't be too positive, Frederic. Now I have some reasons to believe it was that very lady.

Fel. You'll very much oblige me, Sir, if you'd let me know these reasons.

Col. B. Sir!

Fel. Sir, I say I have a right to inquire into these reasons you speak of.

Col. B. Ha, ha! really, Sir, I cannot conceive how you, or any man, can have a right to inquire into my thoughts.

Fel. Sir, I have a right to every thing that relates to Violante.—And he that traduces her fame, and refuses to give his reasons for't, is a villain.

[Draws.]

Col. B. What the devil have I been doing? Now, blisters on my tongue by dozens. [Aside.]

Fred. Pr'ythee, Felix, don't quarrel till you know for what: this is all a mistake, I'm positive!

Col. B. Look you, Sir, that I dare draw my sword, I think will admit of no dispute.—But though fighting's my trade, I'm not in love with it, and think it more honourable to decline this business than pursue it.—This may be a mistake: however, I'll give you my honour never to have any affair, directly or indirectly, with Violante, provided she is your Violante; but, if there should happen to be another of that name, I hope you will not engross all the Violantes in the kingdom.

Fel. Your vanity has given me sufficient reason to believe I'm not mistaken. I'll not be imposed upon, Sir.

Col. B. Nor I be bullied, Sir.

Fel. Bullied! 'Sdeath, such another word, and I'll nail thee to the wall.

Col. B. Are you sure of that, Spaniard?

Gibby. [Draws.] Say nae mair, man. O'my saul, here's twa to twa. Dinna fear, Sir, Gibby stands by ye for the honour o' Scotland.

Fred. [Vapours about.] By St. Anthony, you sha'n't fight on here suspicion: be certain of the injury, and then—

Fel. That I will, this moment; and then, Sir—I hope you are to be found—

Col. B. Whenever you please, Sir.

Gibby. 'Sbleed, Sir, there ne'er was a Scotsman yet that shamed to show his face.

Fred. So, quarrels spring up like mushrooms, in a minute. Violante and he were but just reconciled, and you have furnished him with fresh matter for falling out again; and I am certain, colonel, Gibby is in the wrong.

Gibby. Gin I be, Sir, the man that tauld me leed; and gin he did, the de'il be my landlord, hell my winter-quarters, and a rape my winding-sheet, gin I dinna lick him as lang as I can haud a stick in my haund, now see ye.

Col. B. I am sorry for what I have said, for the lady's sake: but who could divine that she was his mistress? Pr'ythee, who is this warm spark?

Fred. He is the son of one of our grandees, named Don Lopez de Pimentell, a very honest gentleman; but something passionate in what relates to his love. He is an only son, which may perhaps be one reason for indulging his passion.

Col. B. When parents have but one child, they either make a madman or a fool of him.

Fred. He is not the only child; he has a sister; but I think, through the severity of his father, who would have married her against her inclination, she has made her escape; and notwithstanding he has offered five hundred pounds, he can get no tidings of her.

Col. B. Ha! how long has she been missing?

Fred. Nay, but since last night, it seems.

Col. B. Last night! The very time! [Aside.]

Fred. Nobody can tell: they conjecture through the window.

Col. B. I'm transported! This must be the lady I caught! [Aside.] What sort of a woman is she?

Fred. Middle-sized, a lovely brown, a fine pout-ing lip, eyes that roll and languish, and seem to speak the exquisite pleasure her arms could give.

Col. B. Oh! I am fired with the description!—'Tis the very she. [Aside.] What's her name?

Fred. Isabella—You are transported, colonel.

Col. B. I have a natural tendency in me to the flesh, thou knowest; and who can hear of charms so exquisite, and yet remain unmoved!—Oh, how I long for the appointed hour! I'll to the Terriero de Passa, and wait my happiness; if she fails to meet me, I'll once more attempt to find her at Violante's, in spite of her brother's jealousy. [Aside.] Dear Frederic, I beg your pardon, but I had forgot I was to meet a gentleman upon business at five: I'll endeavour to dispatch him, and wait on you again as soon as possible.

Fred. Your humble servant, colonel.

Col. B. Gibby, I have no business with you at present.

Gibby. That's weel. Now will I gang and seek this loon, and gar him gang wi' me to Don Pedro's hoose.—Gin he'll no gang o' himself, I se gar him gang by the lug, Sir. Godswarbit, Gibby hates a leer.

SCENE II.—VIOLANTE'S Lodgings.

Enter VIOLANTE and ISABELLA.

Isa. The hour draws on, Violante, and now my heart begins to fail me; but I resolve to venture, for all that.

Vio. What, does your courage sink, Isabella?

Isa. Only the force of resolution a little retreated; but I'll rally it again, for all that.

Enter FLORA.

Flora. Don Felix is coming up, Madam.

Isa. My brother! Which way shall I get out?—Dispatch him as soon as you can, dear Violante.

Vio. I will.

Enter FELIX, in a surly humour.

Felix, what brings you back so soon? did I not say to-morrow?

Fel. My passion chokes me; I cannot speak—Oh! I shall burst!

[Aside; throws himself into a chair.]

Vio. Bless me, are you not well, my Felix?

Fel. Yes—no—I don't know what I am.

Vio. Hey-day! What's the matter now? Another jealous whim!

Fel. With what an air she carries it!—I sweat at her impudence.

Vio. If I were in your place, Felix, I'd choose to stay at home when these fits of spleen are upon me, and not trouble such persons as are not obliged to bear with them.

[Here he affects to be careless of her.]

Fel. I am very sensible, Madam, of what you mean: I disturb you, no doubt; but were I in better humour, I should not incommode you less I am but too well convinced you could easily dispense with my visit.

Vio. When you behave yourself as you ought to do, no company so welcome; but when you reserve me for your ill nature, I waive your merit, and consider what's due to myself.—And I must be so free to tell you, Felix, that these humours of yours will abate, if not absolutely destroy the very principles of love.

Fel. [Rises.] And I must be so free to tell you

Madam, that since you have made such ill returns to the respect that I have paid you, all you do shall be indifferent to me for the future; and you shall find me abandon your empire with so little difficulty, that I'll convince the world your chains are not so hard to break as your vanity would tempt you to believe.—I cannot brook the provocation you give.

Vio. This is not to be borne—Insolent! You abandon! You! Whom I've so often forbade ever to see me more! Have you not fallen at my feet? Implored my favour and forgiveness? Did not you trembling wait and wish, and sigh, and swear yourself into my heart? Ungrateful man! if my chains are so easily broke as you pretend, then you are the silliest coxcomb living, you did not break 'em long ago; and I must think him capable of brooking any thing, on whom such usage could make no impression.

Fel. I always believed, Madam, my weakness was the greatest addition to your power; you would be less imperious, had my inclination been less forward to oblige you.—You have, indeed, forbade me your sight, but your vanity even then assured you I would return, and I was fool enough to feed that vanity—Your eyes, with all their boasted charms, have acquired the greatest glory in conquering me. And the brightest passage of your life is, wounding this heart with such arms as pierce but few persons of my rank.

[Walks about in a great passion.]

Vio. Matchless arrogance! True, Sir, I should have kept measures better with you, if the conquest had been worth preserving; but we easily hazard what gives us no pains to lose.—As for my eyes, you are mistaken if you think they have vanquished none but you; there are men above your boasted rank, who have confessed their power, when their misfortune in pleasing you made them obtain such a disgraceful victory.

Fel. Yes, Madam, I am no stranger to your victories.

Vio. And what you call the brightest passage of my life, is not the least glorious part of yours.

Fel. Ha, ha, don't put yourself in a passion, Madam, for I assure you, after this day, I shall give you no trouble.—You may meet your sparks on the Terriero de Passa, at four in the morning, without the least regard to me; for when I quit your chamber the world sha'n't bring me back.

Vio. I am so well pleased with your resolution, I don't care how soon you take your leave.—But what you mean by the Terriero de Passa, at four in the morning, I can't guess.

Fel. No, no, no, not you—You were not upon the Terriero de Passa, at four this morning?

Vio. No I was not; but if I was, I hope I may walk where I please, and at what hour I please, without asking your leave.

Fel. Oh, doubtless, Madam! and you might meet colonel Briton there, and afterwards send your emissary to fetch him to your house—and upon your father's coming in, thrust him into your bed-chamber—without asking my leave. 'Tis no business of mine, if you are exposed among all the footmen in town—nay, if they ballad you, and cry you about at a halfpenny a piece—they may, without my leave.

Vio. Audacious! don't provoke me—don't; my reputation is not to be sported with [Going up to him.] at this rate.—No, Sir, it is not. [Bursts into tears.] Inhuman Felix!—Oh, Isabella, what a train of ills thou hast brought on me; [Aside. Fel. Ha! I cannot bear to see her weep—a woman's tears are far more fatal than our swords, [Aside.].—Oh, Violante—'Sdeath! what a dog am I? now have I no power to stir.—Dost thou not know such a person as colonel Briton? pry—thee tell me, didst thou not meet him at four this morning upon the Terriero de Passa?

Vio. Were it not to clear my fame, I would not answer thee, thou black ingrate!—But I cannot bear to be reproached with what I even blush to think of, much less to act. By Heaven, I have not seen the Terriero de Passa this day.

Fel. Did not a Scotch footman attack you in the street neither, Violante?

Vio. Yes; but he mistook me for another, or he was drunk, I know not which.

Fel. And do you not know this Scotch colonel?

Vio. Pray ask me no more questions; this night shall clear my reputation, and leave you without excuse for your base suspicions. More than this I shall not satisfy you; therefore, pray leave me.

Fel. Didst thou ever love me, Violante?

Vio. I'll answer nothing.—You were in haste to be gone just now; I should be very well pleased to be alone, Sir.

[She sits down, and turns aside.]

Fel. I shall not long interrupt your contemplation.—Stubborn to the last. [Aside.]

Vio. Did ever woman involve herself as I have done? [Aside.]

Fel. Now would I give one of my eyes to be friends with her; for something whispers to my soul she is not guilty. [Aside; he pauses, then pulls a chair, and sits by her at a little distance, looking at her some time without speaking, then draws a little nearer to her.] Give me your hand at parting, however, Violante, wont you? [He lays his hand upon her knee several times.] wont you—wont you—wont you?

Vio. [Half regarding him.] Wont I do what?

Fel. You know what I would have, Violante. Oh! my heart!

Vio. [Smiles.] I thought my chains were easily broke. [Lays her hand in his.]

Fel. [Draws his chair close to hers, and kisses her hand in a rapture.] Too well thou knowest thy strength—Oh, my charming angel, my heart is all thy own! forgive my hasty passion, 'tis the transport of a love sincere! Oh, Violante, Violante!

Ped. [Within.] Bid Sancho get a new wheel to my chariot presently.

Vio. Bless me, my father returned! what shall we do now, Felix? we are ruined, past redemption.

Fel. No, no, no, my love; I can leap from the closet window. [Runs to the door where ISABELLA is, who closes and bolts herself in.] Confusion! somebody bolts the door withinside. I'll see who you have concealed here, if I die for't. Oh, Violante, hast thou again sacrificed me to my rival? [Draws.]

Vio. By Heaven! thou hast no rival in my heart! let that suffice—Nay, sure you will not let my father find you here—distraction!

Fel. Indeed but I shall, except you command this door to be opened, and that way conceal me from his sight.

[He struggles with her to come at the door.]

Vio. Hear me, Felix—Though I were sure the refusing what you ask would separate us for ever, by all that's powerful, you shall not enter here. Either you do love me, or you do not. Convince me by your obedience.

Fel. That's not the matter of debate—I will know who is in this closet, let the consequence be what it will. Nay, nay, nay, you strive in vain; I will go in.

Vio. You shall not go in.

Enter DON PEDRO.

Ped. Hey-day! what's here to do? "I will go in," and, "you sha'n't go in"—and "I will go in!"—Why, who are you, Sir?

Fel. 'Sdeath! what shall I say now? [Aside.

Ped. Don Felix! pray, what's your business in my house? ha, Sir.

Vio. Oh, Sir, what miracle returned you home so soon? some angel 'twas that brought my father back to succour the distressed. This ruffian, he,—I cannot call him gentleman, has committed such an uncommon rudeness, as the most profligate wretch would be ashamed to own. As I was at my devotions in my closet—

Fel. Devotions!

Vio. I heard a loud knocking at my door, mixed with a woman's voice, which seemed to imply she was in danger. I flew to the door with the utmost speed, where a lady veiled rushed in upon me, who, falling on her knees, begged my protection from a gentleman, who she said pursued her. I took compassion on her tears, and locked her in this closet; but in the surprise, having left open the door, this very person whom you see, with his sword drawn, ran in, protesting, if I refused to give her up to his revenge, he'd force the door.

Fel. What in the name of goodness, does she mean to do? hang me!

Vio. I strove with him till I was out of breath, and had you not come as you did, he must have entered—but he's in drink, I suppose, or he could not have been guilty of such an indecorum.

[Leaving at FELIX.

Ped. I'm amazed!

Fel. The devil never failed a woman at a pinch:—what a tale has she formed in a minute!—In drink, quotha: a good hint; I'll lay hold on't to bring myself off.

Ped. Pie, Don Felix! no sooner rid of one broil but you are commencing another. To assault a lady with a naked sword derogates much from the character of a gentleman, I assure you.

Fel. [Counterfeits drunkenness.] Who? I assault a lady! upon honour, the lady assaulted me, Sir, and would have seized this body politic upon the king's highway—Let her come out, and deny it, if she can.—Pray, sir, command the door to be opened, and let her prove me a liar, if she knows how.

Ped. Ay, ay, who doubts it, Sir?—open the door, Violante, and let the lady come out. Come, I warrant thee he sha'n't hurt her.

Fel. No, no, I wont hurt the dear creature.—Now which way will she come off?

Vio. [Unlocks the door.] Come forth, Madam; none shall dare to touch your veil—I'll convey you out with safety, or lose my life.—I hope she understands me.

Re-enter ISABELLA, veiled, who crosses the Stage.

Isa. Excellent girl!

Fel. The devil! a woman! I'll see if she be really so.

Vio. Get clear of my father, and follow me to the Terriero de Passa, when all mistakes shall be rectified. [Apart to FELIX, and exit; FELIX offers to follow her.

Ped. [Draws his sword.] Not a step, Sir, till the lady be past your recovery; I never suffer the laws of hospitality to be violated in my house, Sir—Come, Sir, you and I will take a pipe and bottle together.

Fel. Damn your pipe, and damn your bottle! I hate drinking and smoking—and how will you help yourself, old Whiskers?

Ped. As to smoking or drinking, you have your liberty; but you shall stay, Sir.

Fel. But I wont stay; for I don't like your company: besides, I have the best reason in the world for my not staying.

Ped. Ay! What's that?

Fel. Why, I am going to be married; and so good bye.

Ped. To be married! it can't be! Why, you are drunk, Felix!

Fel. Drunk! Ay to be sure. You don't think I'd go to be married if I was sober.—But drunk or sober I am going to be married for all that; and if you won't believe me, to convince you, I'll show you the contract, old gentleman.

Ped. Ay do; come, let's see this contract then.

Fel. Yes, yes, I'll show you the contract—I'll show you the contract.—Here, Sir—here's the contract.

[Draws a pistol.
Ped. [Starts.] Well, well, I'm convinced; go, go—pray go and be married, Sir.

Fel. Yes, yes, I'll go—I'll go and be married; but sha'n't we take a bottle first?

Ped. No, no—pray, dear Sir, go and be married.

Fel. Very well, very well; [Going.] but I insist upon your taking one glass, though.

Ped. No, not now—some other time.—Consider, the lady waits.

Fel. What a cross old fool! First he will, and then he wont; and then he will, and then he wont.

[Aside, and exit.

Enter a SERVANT.

Serv. Here's Don Lopez de Pimentell, to wait on you, Seignior.

Ped. What the devil does he want? He is not going to be married too—bring him up; [Exit SERVANT.] he's in pursuit of his son, I suppose.

Enter DON LOPEZ.

Lop. I am glad to find you at home, Don Pedro; I was told that you was seen upon the road to—this afternoon.

Ped. That might be, my lord; but I had the misfortune to break the wheel of my chariot, which obliged me to return.—What is your pleasure with me, my lord?

Lop. I am informed my daughter is in your house.

Ped. That's more than I know, my lord; but here was your son just now, as drunk as an emperor.

Lop. My son drunk! I never saw him in drink in my life. Where is he, pray, Sir?

Ped. Gone to be married.

Lop. Married! To whom? I dont know that he courted any body.

Ped. Nay, I know nothing of that—but, I'm sure he showed me the contract.—Within there!

Enter a SERVANT.

Bid my daughter come hither; she'll tell you another story, my lord.

Serv. She's gone out in a chair, Sir!

Ped. Out in a chair! what do you mean, Sir?

Serv. As I say, Sir: and Donna Isabella went in another just before her.

Lop. Isabella!

Serv. And Don Felix followed in another; I overheard them all bid the chairs go to the Terriero de Passa.

Ped. Ha! what business has my daughter there? I am confounded, and know not what to think.—Within there!

Lop. My heart misgives me plaguily.—Call me an alguazil; I'll pursue them strait. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—The Street before DON PEDRO'S House.

Enter LISSARDO.

Lis. I wish I could see Flora.—Methinks I have a hankering kindness after the slut.—We must be reconciled.

Enter GIBBY.

Gibby. A' my saul, Sir, but Ise blithe to find ye here now.

Lis. Ha! brother! give me thy hand, boy.

Gibby. No sae fast, see ye me.—Brither me, nae brithers; I scorn a leer as muckle as a thief, see ye now; and ye must gang intil this hoose wi' me, and justify to Donna Violante's face, that she was the lady that gaed in here this morn, see ye me, or the de'il hae my saul, Sir, but ye and I shall be twa folk.

Lis. Justify it to Donna Violante's face, quotha; for what? sure you don't know what you say.

Gibby. Troth de I, Sir, as well as ye de; therefore come along, and mak' nae mair words about it.

Lis. Why, what the devil do you mean? Don't you consider you are in Portugal? Is the fellow mad?

Gibby. Fellow! Ise nane of yer fellow, Sir: and gin the place were hell, I'd gar ye de me justice. [LISSARDO going.]

Na, the de'il a fit ye gang. [Lays hold of him and knocks.]
Lis. Ha! Don Pedro himself; I wish I were fairly off. [Aside.]

Enter DON PEDRO.

Ped. How now? what makes you knock so loud?

Gibby. Gin this be Don Pedro's house, Sir, I wa'd speak wi' Donna Violante, his daughter.

Ped. Ha! what is it you want with my daughter, pray?

Gibby. An' she be your daughter, an' lik' your honour, command her to come out, and answer for hersel' now, and either justify or disprove what this cheeld told me this morn.

Lis. So, here will be a fine piece of work.

[Aside.]

Ped. Why, what did he tell you, ha?

Gibby. By my saul, Sir, Ise tell you a' the truth; my maister got a pratty lady upon the how-de-call't—passa—here, at five this morn, and he gar'd me watch her hame.—And in troth I lodged her here; and meeting this ill-favoured thief, see ye me, I speered wha she was—and he tauld me her name was Donna Violante, Don Pedro de Mendosa's daughter.

Ped. Ha! my daughter with a man, abroad at five in the morning. Death, hell, and furies! By St. Anthony, I'm undone.

Gibby. Wounds, Sir, ye put yer saint intul bonny company.

Ped. Who is your master, you dog, you?

Gibby. You dog, you! 'Sbleed, Sir, don't ca' names—I wont tell you wha my maister is, see ye me now.

Ped. And who are you, rascal, that know my daughter so well, ha?

[To LISSARDO, holding up his cane.]

Lis. What shall I say to make him give this Scotch dog a good beating? [Aside.] I know your daughter, seignior? Not I; I never saw your daughter in all my life.

Gibby. [Knocks him down with his fist.] De'il hae my saul, sar, gin ye get no your carich for that lee now.

Ped. What, ho! Where are all my servants?

Enter COLONEL BRITON, FELIX, ISABELLA, and VIOLANTE.

Raise the house in pursuit of my daughter.

Col. B. Hey-day! What's here to do?

Gibby. This is the loon-like tike, an' like yer honour, that sent me hame wi' a lee this morn.

Fel. This is a day of jubilee, Lissardo: no quarrelling with him this day.

Lis. A plague take his fists.—Egad, these Britons are but a word and a blow.

Enter DON LOPEZ.

Lop. So, have I found you, daughter? Then you have not hanged yourself yet, I see.

Col. B. But she is married, my lord.

Lop. Married! Zounds, to whom?

Col. B. Even to your humble servant, my lord.

If you please to give us your blessing. [Kneels.]

Lop. Why, hark ye, mistress! are you really married?

Isa. Really so, my lord.

Lop. And who are you, Sir?

[To COLONEL BRITON.]

Col. B. An honest North Briton by birth, and a colonel by commission, my lord.

Lop. A heretic, the devil!

[Holds up his hands.]

Ped. She has played you a slippery trick indeed, my lord!—Well, my girl, thou hast been to see thy friend married.—Next week thou shalt have a better husband, my dear. [To VIOLANTE.]

Fel. Next week is a little too soon, Sir; I hope to live longer than that.

Ped. What do you mean, Sir? You have not made a rib of my daughter too, have you?

Vio. Indeed but he has, Sir, I know not how; but he took me in an unguarded minute—when my thoughts were not over strong for a nunnery, father.

Lop. Your daughter has played you a slippery trick too, seignior.

Ped. But your son shall never be the better for't my lord; her twenty thousand pounds was left on certain conditions, and I'll not part with a shilling.

Lop. But we have a certain thing called law shall make you do justice Sir.

Pod. Well, we'll try that,—my lord, much good may it do you with your daughter-in-law.

Lop. I wish you much joy of your rib.

[Exeunt PEDRO and LOPEZ.]

Enter FREDERIC.

Fel. Frederic, welcome!—I sent for thee to be partaker of my happiness; and pray give me leave to introduce you to the cause of it.

Fred. Your messenger has told me all, and I sincerely share in all your happiness.

Col. B. To the right about, Frederic; wish thy friend joy.

Fred. I do, with all my soul;—and, Madam, I congratulate your deliverance. [To ISABELLA.]—Your suspicions are cleared now, I hope, Felix?

Fel. They are; and I heartily ask the colonel pardon, and wish him happy with my sister: for love has taught me to know, that every man's happiness consists in choosing for himself.

Lis. After that rule, I fix here. [To FLORA]

Flora. That's your mistake; I prefer my lady's service, and turn you over to her that pleaded right and title to you to-day.

Lis. Choose, proud fool; I sha'n't ask you twice.

Gibby. What say ye now, lass; will ye gie your haund to puir Gibby? [To INIS.]

Inis. That I may not leave my lady—I take you at your word.—And though our wooing has been short, I'll, by her example, love you dearly.

Fel. Now, my Violante, I shall proclaim thy virtues to the world.

*Let us no more thy sex's conduct blame,
Since thou'rt a proof, to their eternal fame,
That man has no advantage but the name.*

[Exeunt.]

THREE WEEKS AFTER MARRIAGE:

A FARCE,

IN TWO ACTS.

BY ARTHUR MURPHY.

REMARKS.

THE caprice of public opinion condemned this farce on its first representation, in 1764, under the title of What must we all come to; but in 1776, Mr. Lewis ventured to produce it for his benefit, with its present name, and it was then established in favour.

This smart little piece is well conceived, occasionally verging on caricature: the flippant foolery of Sir Charles Rackett, the ridiculous airs of his lady, the pertness of Dimity, &c. produce a piquant and laughable tout ensemble.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

COVENT GARDEN.		COVENT GARDEN.
SIR CHARLES RACKETT,	Mr. Lewis.	LADY RACKETT,	Mrs. Maddocks.
DRUGGET,	Mr. Munden.	MRS. DRUGGET,	Mrs. Davenport.
LOVELACE,	Mr. Farley.	NANCY,	Miss Sims.
WOODLEY,	Mr. Young.	DIMITY,	Mrs. Green.

ACT I.

SCENE I.

Enter WOODLEY and DIMITY.

Dim. Po! po! no such thing—I tell you, Mr. Woodley, you are a mere novice in these affairs.

Wood. Nay, but listen to reason, Mrs. Dimity; has not your master, Mr. Drugget, invited me down to his country-seat? has not he promised to give me his daughter Nancy in marriage? and with what pretence can he now break off?

Dim. What pretence!—you put a body out of all patience. Go on your own way, Sir; my advice is lost upon you.

Wood. You do me injustice, Mrs. Dimity. Your advice has governed my whole conduct. Have not I fixed an interest in the young lady's heart?

Dim. An interest in a fiddlestick!—You ought to have made sure of the father and mother. What, do you think the way to get a wife, at this time of day, is by speaking fine things to the lady you have a fancy for? that was the practice, indeed, but things are altered now. You must address the old people, Sir; and never trouble your head about your Mistress.

Wood. But you know, my dear Dimity, the old couple have received every mark of attention from me.

Dim. Attention! to be sure you did not fall asleep in their company; but what then? you should have entered into their characters, played with their humours, and sacrificed to their absurdities.

Wood. But, if my temper is too frank—

Dim. Frank, indeed! yes, you have been frank enough to ruin yourself. Have not you to do with a rich old shopkeeper, retired from business with a hundred thousand pounds in his pocket, to enjoy the dust of the London-road, which he calls living in the country? and yet you must find fault with his situation! What, if he has made a ridiculous gimcrack of his house and gardens? you know his heart is set upon it: and could not you have commended his taste? But you must be too frank! "Those walks and alleys are too regular;—those evergreens should not be cut into such fantastic shapes."—And thus you advise a poor old mechanic, who delights in every thing that's monstrous, to follow nature. Oh, you are likely to be a successful lover!

Wood. But why should I not save a father-in-law from being a laughing-stock?

Dim. Make him your father-in-law first. And then the mother; how have you played your cards in that quarter? She wants a tinsel man of fashion for her second daughter. "Don't you see (says she) how happy my eldest girl is made by her match with Sir Charles Rackett? She has been married three entire weeks, and not so much as one angry word has passed between them! Nancy shall have a man of quality too."

Wood. And yet I know Sir Charles Rackett perfectly well.

Dim. Yes, so do I; and I know he'll make his lady wretched at last. But what then? you should have humoured the old folks: you should have been a talking, empty fop to the good old lady; and to the old gentleman, an admirer of his taste in gardening. But you have lost him: he is grown fond of this beau, Lovelace, who is here in the house with him; the coxcomb ingratiates himself by flattery, and you're undone by frankness.

Wood. And yet, Dimity, I wot despair.

Dim. And yet you have reason to despair; a million of reasons: to-morrow is fixed for the wedding-day; Sir Charles and his lady are to be here this very night; they are engaged, indeed, at a great rout in town, but they take a bed here, notwithstanding. The family is sitting up for them; Mr. Drugget will keep you all in the next room there, till they arrive; to-morrow the business is over; and yet you don't despair!—Hush! hold your tongue; here comes Lovelace: step in, and I'll devise something, I warrant you. [Exit WOODLEY.] The old folks shall not have their own way. It is enough to vex a body, to see an old father and mother marrying their daughter as they please, in spite of my judgment, and all I can do.

Enter LOVELACE.

Dim. Do lend us your assistance, Mr. Lovelace. You are a sweet gentleman, and love a good-natured action.

Love. Why, how now! what's the matter?

Dim. My master is going to cut the two yew-trees into the shape of two devils, I believe; and my poor mistress is breaking her heart for it. Do, run and advise him against it. She is your friend, you know she is, Sir.

Love. Oh, if that's all, I'll make that matter easy directly.

Dim. My mistress will be for ever obliged to you; and you will marry her daughter in the morning.

Love. Oh, my rhetoric shall dissuade him.

Dim. And, Sir, put him against dealing with that nursery-man; Mrs. Drugget hates him.

Love. Does she?

Dim. Mortally.

Love. Say no more; the business is done. [Exit.]

Dim. If he says one word against the giants at Guildhall, he is undone. Old Drugget will never forgive him. My brain was at its last shift; but, if this plot takes—so, here comes our Nancy.

Enter NANCY.

Nan. Well, Dimity, what's to become of me?

Dim. My stars! what makes you up, Miss? I thought you were gone to bed.

Nan. What should I go to bed for? only to tumble, and toss, and fret, and be uneasy. They are going to marry me, and I am frighten'd out of my wits.

Dim. Why then you are the only young lady within fifty miles round, that would be frightened at such a thing.

Nan. Ah! if they would let me choose for myself.

Dim. Don't you like Mr. Lovelace?

Nan. My mamma does, but I don't; I don't mind his being a man of fashion, not I.

Dim. And, pray, can you do better than to follow the fashion?

Nan. Ah! I know there's a fashion for new bonnets, and a fashion for dressing the hair; but I never heard of a fashion for the heart.

Dim. Why then, my dear, the heart mostly follows the fashion now.

Nan. Does it? Pray, who sets the fashion of the heart?

Dim. All the fine ladies in London, o' my conscience.

Nan. And what's the last new fashion, pray?

Dim. Why to marry any fop that has a few deceitful agreeable appearances about him; something of a pert phrase, a good operator for the teeth, and a tolerable tailor.

Nan. And do they marry without loving?

Dim. Oh! marrying for love has been a great while out of fashion.

Nan. Why then I'll wait till that fashion comes up again.

Dim. And then, Mr. Lovelace, I reckon—

Nan. Pshaw! I don't like him: he talks to me as if he was the most miserable man in the world, and the confident thing looks so pleased with himself all the while. I want to marry for love, and not for card-playing. I should not be able to bear the life my sister leads with Sir Charles Rackett. Shall I tell you a secret? I will forfeit my new cap, if they don't quarrel soon.

Dim. Oh, fie! no! they wot quarrel yet awhile. A quarrel in three weeks after marriage, would be somewhat of the quickest. By and by we shall hear of their whims and their humours. Well, but if you don't like Mr. Lovelace, what say you to Mr. Woodley?

Nan. Ah!—I don't know what to say—but I can sing something that will explain my mind.

When first the dear youth, passing by,

Disclos'd his fair form to my sight,

I gaz'd, but I could not tell why,

My heart it went thro' with delight.

As nearer he drew, those sweet eyes

Were with their dear meaning so bright,

I trembled, and, lost in surprise,

My heart it went thro' with delight.

When his lips their dear accents did try

The return of my love to excite,

I feign'd, yet began to guess why

My heart it went thro' with delight.

We chang'd the stol'n glance, the fond smile,

Which lovers alone read aright;

We look'd and we sigh'd, yet the while

Our hearts they went thro' with delight.

Consent I soon blush'd, with a sigh

My promise I ventur'd to plight;

Come, Hymen, we then shall know why

Our hearts they go thro' with delight.

Enter WOODLEY.

Wood. My sweetest angel! I have heard it all, and my heart overflows with love and gratitude

Nan. Ah! but I did not know you were listening. You should not have betrayed me so, Dimity; I shall be angry with you.

Dim. Well, I'll take my chance for that. Run both into my room, and say all your pretty things to one another there, for here comes the old gentleman—make haste, away.

[Exeunt WOODLEY and NANCY.]

Enter DRUGGET.

Drug. A forward, presuming coxcomb! Dimity, do you step to Mrs. Drugget, and send her hither.

Dim. Yes, Sir;—it works upon him, I see.

[Exit.]

Drug. The yew-trees ought not to be cut, because, they'll help to keep off the dust, and I am too near the road already. A sorry, ignorant fop! When I am in so fine a situation, and can see every cart, wagon, and stage-coach, that goes by. And then to abuse the nursery-man's rarities! A finer sucking pig in lavender, with sage growing in his belly, was never seen! And yet he wants me not to have it: but have it I will.—There 's a fine tree of knowledge, with Adam and Eve in juniper; Eve's nose not quite grown, but it's thought in the spring will be very forward: I'll have that too, with the serpent in ground ivy. Two poets in wormwood! I'll have them both. Ay; and there's a Lord Mayor's feast in honeysuckle; and the whole court of aldermen in horn-beam: they all shall be in my garden, with the Dragon of Wantley in box, all, all; I'll have them all, let my wife and Mr. Lovelace say what they will.

Enter MRS. DRUGGET.

Mrs. D. Did you send for me, lovey?

Drug. The yew-trees shall be cut into the gians at Guildhall, whether you will or not.

Mrs. D. Sure my own dear will do as he pleases.

Drug. And the pond, though you praise the green banks, shall be walled round; and I'll have a little fat boy in marble, spouting up water in the middle.

Mrs. D. My sweet, who hinders you?

Drug. Yes, and I'll buy the nursery-man's whole catalogue. Do you think, after retiring to live all the way here, almost four miles from London, that I won't do as I please in my own garden?

Mrs. D. My dear, but why are you in such a passion?

Drug. I'll have the lavender pig, and the Adam and Eve, and the Dragon of Wantley, and all of 'em; and there sha'n't be a more romantic spot on the London road than mine.

Mrs. D. I'm sure it is as pretty as hands can make it.

Drug. I did it all myself, and I'll do more. And Mr. Lovelace sha'n't have my daughter.

Mrs. D. No! what's the matter now, Mr. Drugget?

Drug. He shall learn better manners than to abuse my house and gardens. You put him into the head of it, but I'll disappoint ye both. And so you may go and tell Mr. Lovelace that the match is quite off.

Mrs. D. I can't comprehend all this, not I. But I'll tell him so, if you please, my dear. I am willing to give myself pain, if it will give you pleasure: must I give myself pain? Don't ask me pray don't; I can't support all this uneasiness

Drug. I am resolved, and it shall be so.

Mrs. D. Let it be so then. [Cries.] Oh! oh! cruel man! I shall break my heart if the match is broke off. If it is not concluded to-morrow send for an undertaker, and bury me the next day.

Drug. How! I don't want that neither.

Mrs. D. Oh! oh!

Drug. I am your lord and master, my dear, but not your executioner. Before George, it must never be said that my wife died of too much compliance. Cheer up, my love; and this affair shall be settled as soon as Sir Charles and Lady Rackett arrive.

Mrs. D. You bring me to life again. You know, my sweet, what a happy couple Sir Charles and his lady are. Why should not we make our Nancy as happy?

Enter DIMITY.

Dim. Sir Charles and his lady, Ma'am.

Mrs. D. Oh! charming! I'm transported with joy! where are they? I long to see 'em. [Exit.]

Dim. Well, Sir; the happy couple are arrived.

Drug. Yes, they do live happy indeed.

Dim. But how long will it last?

Drug. How long! Don't forbode any ill, you jade; don't, I say. It will last during their lives, I hope.

Dim. Well, mark the end of it. Sir Charles, I know, is gay and good-humoured; but he can't bear the least contradiction, no, not in the merest trifle.

Drug. Hold your tongue; hold your tongue.

Dim. Yes, Sir, I have done; and yet there is in the composition of Sir Charles a certain humour, which, like the flying gout, gives no disturbance to the family, till it settles in the head: when once it fixes there, mercy on every body about him! But here he comes. [Exit.]

Enter SIR CHARLES.

Sir C. My dear Sir, I kiss your hand. But why stand on ceremony? To find you up at this late hour mortifies me beyond expression.

Drug. 'Tis but once in a way, Sir Charles.

Sir C. My obligations to you are inexpressible; you have given me the most amiable of girls; our tempers accord like unisons in music.

Drug. Ah! that's what makes me happy in my old days; my children and my garden are all my care.

Sir C. And my friend Lovelace—he is to have our sister Nancy, I find.

Drug. Why, my wife is so minded.

Sir C. O, by all means, let her be made happy. A very pretty fellow Lovelace; as to that Mr.—Woodley, I think you call him—he is but a plain, underbred, ill-fashioned, sort of a—Nobody knows him; he is not one of us. Oh, by all means marry her to one of us.

Drug. I believe it must be so. Would you take any refreshment?

Sir C. Nothing in nature—it is time to retire to rest.

Drug. Well, well, good night, Sir Charles. Ha! here comes my daughter. Good night, Sir Charles.

Sir C. Bon repos.

Enter LADY RACKETT.

Lady R. Dear Sir! I did not expect to see you up so late.

Drug. My Lady Rackett, I am glad to hear how happy you are: I wont detain you now. There's your good man waiting for you; good night, my girl. [Exit.

Sir C. I must humour this old pot, in order to be remembered in his will.

Lady R. O, la! I am quite fatigued. I can hardly move. Why don't you help me, you barbarous man?

Sir C. There, take my arm.—

Lady R. But I wont be laughed at. [Looking tenderly at him.] I don't love you.

Sir C. Don't you?

Lady R. No. Dear me! this glove! why don't you help me off with my glove? Pshaw! you awkward thing, let it alone; you an't fit to be about my person. I might as well not be married, for any use you are of. Reach me a chair. You have no compassion for me. I am so glad to sit down. Why do you drag me to routs? You know I hate them.

Sir C. Oh! there is no existing, no breathing, unless one does as other people of fashion do.

Lady R. But I am out of humour: I lost all my money.

Sir C. How much?

Lady R. Three hundred.

Sir C. Never fret for that. I don't value three hundred pounds to contribute to your happiness.

Lady R. Don't you?—not value three hundred pounds to please me?

Sir C. You know, I don't.

Lady R. Ah! you fond fool!—But I hate gaming: it almost metamorphoses a woman into a fury. Do you know that I was frighted at myself several times to-night? I had a huge oath at the very tip of my tongue.

Sir C. Had ye?

Lady R. I caught myself at it; but I bit my lips, and so I did not disgrace myself. And then I was crammed up in a corner of the room, with such a strange party at a whist-table, looking at black and red spots: did you mind them?

Sir C. You know I was busy elsewhere.

Lady R. There was that strange, unaccountable woman, Mrs. Nightshade: she behaved so fretfully to her husband, a poor, inoffensive, good-natured, good sort of a good-for-nothing kind of man; but she so teased him—"How could you play that card? Ah, you've a head, and so has a pin—You're a numskull, you know you are—Ma'am, he has the poorest head in the world, he does not know what he is about; you know you don't—Oh, fy!—I'm ashamed of you!"

Sir C. She has served to divert you, I see.

Lady R. And to crown all, there was my lady Clackit, who runs on with an eternal harum about nothing, out of all season, time, and place—In the very midst of the game she begins, "Lard, Ma'am, I was apprehensive I should not be able to wait on your la'ship; my poor little dog, Pompey—the sweetest thing in the world,—a spade led! there's the knave—I was fetching a walk, Me'm, the other morning in the Park; a fine frosty morning it was; I love frosty weather of all things. Let me look at the last trick—and so, Me'm, little Pompey—Oh! if your la'ship was to see the fear creature pinched with the frost, and mincing his steps along the Mall, with his pretty innocent face—I vow I don't know what to play—And so, Me'm, while I was talking to Captain Flimsey—Your la'ship knows Captain Flimsey—Nothing but rubbish in my hand—I can't help it—And so, Me'm, five odious frights of dogs beset my poor little Pompey—the dear creature has the heart of a lion, but who can resist five at once? And so Pompey barked for assistance. The hurt he received was upon his chest; the doctor would not advise him to venture out till the wound is healed, for fear of an inflammation—Pray, what's trumps?"

Sir C. My dear, you'd make a most excellent actress.

Lady R. Why don't you hand me up stairs? Oh! I am so tired; let us go to rest.

Sir C. [Assisting her.] You complain, and yet raking is the delight of your little heart.

Lady R. [Leaning on him as he walks away.] It is you that make a rake of me. Oh, Sir Charles, how shockingly you played that last rubber, when I stood looking over you!

Sir C. My love, I played the truth of the game.

Lady R. No, indeed, my dear, you played it wrong. Ah! Sir Charles, you have a head.

Sir C. Po! nonsense! you don't understand it.

Lady R. I beg your pardon: I am allowed to play better than you.

Sir C. All conceit, my dear: I was perfectly right.

Lady R. No such thing, Sir Charles. How can you dispute it? The diamond was the play.

Sir C. Po! ridiculous! the club was the card against the world.

Lady R. Oh, no, no, no; I say it was the diamond.

Sir C. Zounds! Madam, I say it was the club.

Lady R. What do you fly into such a passion for?

Sir C. Death and fury! do you think I don't know what I am about? I tell you once more, the club was the judgment of it.

Lady R. May be so. Have it your own way, Sir. [Walks about and sings.

Sir C. Vexation! you're the strangest woman that ever lived; there's no conversing with you. Lookye here, my Lady Rackett; it is the clearest case in the world; I'll make it plain to you in a moment.

Lady R. Very well, Sir. To be sure you must be right. [With a sneering laugh.

Sir C. Listen to me, Lady Rackett; I had four cards. Trumps were out. The lead was mine. They were six—no, no, no, they were seven, and we nine; then, you know, the beauty of the play was to—

Lady R. Well, now it's amazing to me, that you can't perceive: give me leave, Sir Charles. Your left hand adversary had led his last trump, and he had before finessed the club, and roughed the diamond: now if you had led your diamond—

Sir C. Zoons! Madam, but we played for the odd trick.

Lady R. And sure the play for the odd trick—

Sir C. Death and fury! can't you hear me?

Lady R. And must not I be heard, Sir?

Sir C. Zoons! hear me, I say. Will you hear me?

Lady R. I never heard the like in my life.

[Hums a tune, and walks about fretfully]

Sir C. Why then you are enough to provoke the patience of a Stoic.—[Looks at her; he walks about and laughs.]—Very well, Madam; you know no more of the game than your father's leaden Hercules on the top of the house. You know no more of whist than he does of gardening.

Lady R. Go on your own way, Sir.

[Takes out a glass, and settles her hair.]

Sir C. Why then, by all that's odious, you are the most perverse, obstinate, ignorant—

Lady R. Polite language, Sir!

Sir C. You are, Madam, the most perverse, the most obstinate—you are a vile woman!

Lady R. I am obliged to you, Sir.

Sir C. You are a vile woman, I tell you so, and I will never sleep another night under one roof with you.

Lady R. As you please.

Sir C. Madam, it shall be as I please. I'll order my chariot this moment. [Going.] I know how the cards should be played as well as any man in England, that let me tell you. [Going.]—And when your family were standing behind counters, measuring out tape, and bartering for Whitechapel needles, my ancestors, my ancestors, Madam, were squandering away whole estates at cards; whole estates, my Lady Rackett. [She hums a tune, and he looks at her.] Why then, by all that's dear to me, I'll never exchange another word with you, good, bad, or indifferent. [Goes and turns back.] Will you command your temper, and listen to me?

Lady R. Go on, Sir.

Sir C. Can't you be cool as I am?—Lookye, my Lady Rackett; thus it stood. The trumps being all out, it was then my business—

Lady R. To play the diamond, to be sure.

Sir C. Damnation! I have done with you for ever; for ever, Madam, and so you may tell your father. [Going.]

Lady R. What a passion the gentleman is in!

Sir C. Will you let me speak?

Lady R. Who hinders you, Sir?

Sir C. Once more, then out of pure good nature—

Lady R. Oh! Sir, I am convinced of your good nature—

Sir C. That, and that only, prevails with me to tell you, the club was the play.

Lady R. I am prodigiously obliged to you for the information. I am perfectly satisfied, Sir.

Sir C. It is the clearest point in the world. Only mind now. We were nine, and—

Lady R. And for that reason, the diamond was the play. Your adversary's club was the best in the house.

Sir C. Why then, such another fiend never existed. There is no reasoning with you. It is in vain to say a word. Good sense is thrown away upon you. I now see the malice of your heart. You are a base woman, and I part from you for ever. You may live here with your father, and admire his fantastical evergreens, till you become as fantastical yourself. I'll set out for London this moment. Your servant, Madam. [Turns and looks at her.] The club was not the best in the house.

Lady R. How calm you are!—Well, I'll go to bed. Will you come? You had better. Not come when I ask you?—Oh! Sir Charles.

[Going.]

Sir C. That ease is so provoking. I desire you will stay and hear me. Don't think to carry it in this manner. Madam, I must and will be heard.

Lady R. Oh! lud; with that terrible countenance!—you frighten me away.

[Runs in and shuts the door.]

Sir C. [Following her.] You shall not fly me thus. Confusion! open the door—will you open it? this contempt is beyond enduring. [Walks away.] I intended to have made it clear to her, but now let her continue in her absurdity. She is not worth my notice. My resolution is taken. She has touched my pride, and I now renounce her for ever; yes, for ever; not to return, though she were to request, beseech, and implore, on her very knees. [Exit.]

Lady R. [Peeping in.] Is he gone? [Comes forward.] Bless me! what have I done?—I have carried this too far, I believe. I had better call him back. For the sake of peace I'll give up the point. What does it signify, which was the best of the play?—It is not worth quarrelling about.—How!—here he comes again.—I'll give up nothing to him. He shall never get the better of me: I am ruined for life if he does. I will conquer him, and I am resolved he shall see it.

[Runs in and shuts the door.]

Sir C. [Looking in.] No; she wont open it. Headstrong and positive!—If she could but command her temper, the thing would be as clear as day-light. She has sense enough, if she would but make use of it. It were pity she should be lost. [Advances towards the door.] All owing to that perverse spirit of contradiction.—I may reclaim her still—[Peeping through the key-hole.] Not so much as a glimpse of her. [Taps at the door.] Lady Rackett—Lady Rackett—

Lady R. [Within.] What do you want?

Sir C. [Laughing affectedly.] Come, you have been very pleasant. Open the door: I cannot help laughing at all this.—Come, no more foolery: have done now, and open the door.

Lady R. [Within.] Don't be such a torment.

Sir C. Will you open it?

Lady R. [Laughing.] No—no—ho, ho!

Sir C. Hell and confusion! what a puppy I make of myself! I'll bear this usage no longer. To be trifled with in this sort by a false, treacherous, —[Runs to the door and speaks through the key-hole.] The diamond was not the play. [Walks away as fast as he can.] I know what I am about, [Looks back in a violent rage.] and the club was not the best in the house. [Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.

Enter DIMITY, laughing violently.

Dim. Oh, I shall die; I shall expire in a fit of laughing. This is the modish couple that were so happy! such a quarrel as they have had; the whole house is in an uproar. Ho, ho, ho! a rare proof of the happiness they enjoy in high life. I shall never hear people of fashion mentioned again, but I shall be ready to crack my sides. They were both—Ho, ho, ho! This is three weeks after marriage, I think.

Enter DRUGGET.

Drug. Hey! how! what's the matter, Dimity?—What am I called down stairs for?

Dim. Why, there's two people of fashion—

[Stifles a laugh.]

Drug. Why, you malapert hussey! explain this moment.

Dim. The fond couple have been together by the ears this half hour. Are you satisfied now?

Drug. Ay! what, have they quarrelled? what was it about?

Dim. Something too nice and fine for my comprehension, and yours too, I believe. People in high life understand their own forms best. And here comes one that can unriddle the whole affair.

[Exit.]

Enter SIR CHARLES.

Sir C. [To the people within.] I say, let the horses be put to this moment. So, Mr. Drugget!

Drug. Sir Charles, here's a terrible bustle. I did not expect this. What can be the matter?

Sir C. I have been used by your daughter in so base, so contemptuous, so vile a manner, that I am determined not to stay in this house to-night.

Drug. This is a thunderbolt to me! after seeing how elegantly and fashionably you lived together, to find now all sunshine vanished! Do, Sir Charles, let me heal this breach, if possible.

Sir C. Sir, it is impossible. I'll not live with her an hour longer.

Drug. Nay, nay, don't be too hasty. Let me intreat you, go to bed and sleep upon it. In the morning, when you are cool—

Sir C. Oh, Sir, I am very cool, I assure you. Ha! ha!—it is not in her power, Sir, to—a—a—to disturb the serenity of my temper. Don't imagine that I'm in a passion. I am not so easily ruffled as you imagine. But, quietly and deliberately, I can repay the injury done me by a false, ungrateful, deceitful woman.

Drug. The injuries done you by a false, ungrateful! My daughter, I hope, Sir—

Sir C. Her character is now fully known to me. I understand her perfectly. She is a vile woman! that's all I have to say, Sir!

Drug. Hey! how!—a vile woman! what has she done? I hope she is not capable—

Sir C. I shall enter into no detail, Mr. Drugget. See if the horses are put to.

Drug. Mercy on me! in my old days to hear this.

Enter MRS. DRUGGET.

Mrs. D. Deliver me! I am all over in such a tremble. Sir Charles, I shall break my heart if there is any thing amiss.

Sir C. Madam, I am very sorry, for your sake; but to live with her is impossible.

Mrs. D. My poor dear girl! what can she have done?

Sir C. What all her sex can do: it needs no explanation: the very spirit of them all.

Drug. Ay! I see how it is.—She is bringing foul disgrace upon us. This comes of her marrying a man of fashion.

Sir C. Fashion, Sir, that should have instructed her better. She might have been sensible of her happiness. Whatever you may think of the fortune you gave her, my rank in life claims respect; claims obedience, attention, and truth.

Drug. And let me tell you, however you may estimate your quality, my daughter is dear to me.

Sir C. And, Sir, my character is dear to me. It shall never be in her power to expose me.

Drug. Yet you must give me leave to tell you—

Sir C. I won't hear a word.

Drug. Not in behalf of my own daughter?

Mrs. D. Don't be so hasty, my love; have some respect for Sir Charles' rank; don't be violent with a man of his fashion.

Drug. Hold your tongue, woman, I say; hold your tongue. You are not a person of fashion, at least. My daughter was ever a good girl.

Sir C. I have found her out.

Drug. Oh! then it's all over, and it does not signify arguing about it.

Mrs. D. That ever I should live to see this hour! How the unfortunate girl could take such wickedness in her head, I can't imagine. I'll go and speak to the unhappy creature this moment.

[Exit.]

Sir C. She stands detected now: detected in her truest colours.

Drug. Well, grievous as it may be, let me hear the circumstances of this unhappy business.

Sir C. Mr. Drugget, I have not leisure now. Her behaviour has been so exasperating, that I shall make the best of my way to town. My mind is fixed. She sees me no more, and so, your servant, Sir.

[Exit.]

Drug. What a calamity has here befallen us! A good girl, and so well disposed! But the evil communication of high life, and fashionable vices, turned her heart to folly.

Enter LADY RACKETT, MRS. DRUGGET, and DIMITY.

Lady R. A cruel, barbarous man, to quarrel in this unaccountable manner; to alarm the whole house, and to expose me and myself too.

Mrs. D. Oh, child! I never thought it would have come to this. Your shame will not end here; it will be all over St. James' parish by to-morrow morning.

Lady R. Well, if it must be so, there is one comfort still; the story will tell more to his disgrace than mine.

Dim. As I'm a sinner, and so it will, Madam. He deserves what he has met with.

Mrs. D. Dimity, don't you encourage her. You shock me to hear you speak so. I did not think you had been so hardened.

Lady R. Hardened do you call it? I have lived in the world to very little purpose if such trifles as these are to disturb my rest.

Mrs. D. You wicked girl! do you call it a trifle to be guilty of falsehood to your husband's bed?

Lady R. How!—[Turns short, and stares at her.] Well, I protest and vow I don't comprehend all this. Has Sir Charles accused me of any impropriety in my conduct?

Mrs. D. Oh! too true he has: he has found you out, and you have behaved basely, he says.

Lady R. Madam!

Mrs. D. You have fallen into frailty, like many of your sex, he says; and he is resolved to come to a separation directly.

Lady R. Why then, if he is so base a wretch as to dishonour me in that manner, his heart shall ache before I live with him again.

Dim. Hold to that, Ma'am, and let his head ache into the bargain.

Mrs. D. Your poor father heard it as well as I.

Lady R. Then let your doors be open for him this very moment; let him return to London. If he does not, I'll lock myself up, and the false one sha'n't approach me, though he were to whine on his knees at my very door. A base, injurious man!

Mrs. D. Dimity, do let us follow, and hear what she has to say for herself.

Dim. She has excuse enough, I warrant her. What a noise is here indeed. I have lived in polite families, where there was no such bustle made about nothing.

Enter SIR CHARLES and DRUGGET.

Sir C. It is all in vain, Sir, my resolution is taken.

Drug. Well, but consider, I am her father. Indulge me only till we hear what the girl has to say in her defence.

Sir C. She can have nothing to say; no excuse can palliate such behaviour.

Drug. Don't be too positive: there may be some mistake.

Sir C. No, Sir, no; there can be no mistake. Did not I see her, hear her myself?

Drug. Lack-a-day! then I am an unfortunate man.

Sir C. She will be unfortunate too: with all my heart. She may thank herself. She might have been happy, had she been so disposed.

Drug. Why truly, I think she might.

Enter MRS. DRUGGET.

Mrs. D. I wish you would moderate your anger a little, and let us talk over this affair with temper. My daughter denies every tittle of your charge.

Sir C. Denies it! denies it!

Mrs. D. She does, indeed.

Sir C. And that aggravates her fault.

Mrs. D. She vows that you never found her out in any thing that was wrong.

Sir C. She does not allow it to be wrong then?—Madam, I tell you again, I know her thoroughly. I have found her out: I am now acquainted with her character. I am to be deceived no more.

Mrs. D. Then you are in opposite stories. She swears, my dear Mr. Drugget, the poor girl swears, she never was guilty of the smallest infidelity in her born days.

Sir C. And what then? What if she does say so?

Mrs. D. And if she says truly, it is hard her character should be blown upon without just cause.

Sir C. And is she therefore to behave ill in other respects? I never charged her with infidelity to me, Madam; there I allow her innocent.

Drug. And did not you charge her then?

Sir C. No, Sir, I never dreamt of such a thing.

Drug. Why then, if she is innocent, let me tell you, you are a scandalous person.

Mrs. D. Pr'ythee, my dear—

Drug. Be quiet: though he is a man of quality, I will tell him of it. Did not I fine for sheriff?—Yes, you are a scandalous person to defame an honest man's daughter.

Sir C. What have you taken into your head now?

Drug. You charged her with falsehood to your bed.

Sir C. No, never, never.

Drug. I say, you did.

Sir C. And I say, no, no.

Drug. But I say, you did; you called yourself cuckold. Did not he, wife?

Mrs. D. Yes, lovey, I am witness.

Sir C. Absurd! I said no such thing.

Drug. But I aver you did.

Sir C. But I tell you no, positively no.

Drug. & Mrs. D. And I say, yes, positively yes.

Sir C. 'Sdeath, this is all madness.

Drug. You said that she followed the ways of most of her sex.

Sir C. I said so, and what then?

Drug. There, he owns it: owns that he called himself a cuckold, and without rhyme or reason into the bargain.

Sir C. I never owned any such thing.

Drug. You owned it even now, now, now, now.

Mrs. D. This very moment.

Sir C. No, no; I tell you, no.

Drug. This instant. Prove it; make your words good; show me your horns, and if you cannot, it is worse than suicide to call yourself a cuckold without proof.

Enter DIMITY, in a fit of laughter.

Dim. What do you think it was all about? Ha! ha! the whole secret is come out, ha, ha! It was all about a game of cards. Ho, ho, ho!

Drug. A game of cards!

Dim. [Laughing.] It was all about a club and a diamond. [Exit, laughing.]

Drug. And was that all, Sir Charles?

Sir C. And enough too, Sir.

Drug. And was that what you found her out in?

Sir C. I can't bear to be contradicted, when I am clear that I am in the right.

Drug. I never heard of such a heap of nonsense in all my life. Woodley shall marry Nancy.

Mrs. D. Don't be in a hurry, my love, this will all be made up.

Drug. Why does he not go and beg her pardon then?

Sir C. I beg her pardon! I wont debase myself to any of you. I sha'n't forgive her, you may rest assured. [Exit.]

Drug. Now, there, there's a pretty fellow for you!

Mrs. D. I'll step and prevail on my Lady Rackett to speak to him: all this will be set right. [Exit.]

Drug. A ridiculous fop! I am glad it is no worse, however.—He must go and talk scandal of himself, as if the town did not abound with people ready enough to take that trouble off his hands.

Enter NANCY.

Drug. So, Nancy,—you seem in confusion, my girl!

Nan. How can one help it, with all this noise in the house? And you are going to marry me as ill as my sister. I hate Mr. Lovelace!

Drug. Why so, child?

Nan. I know these people of quality despise us all out of pride, and would be glad to marry us out of avarice.

Drug. The girl's right.

Nan. They marry one woman, live with another, and love only themselves.

Drug. And then quarrel about a card.

Nan. I don't want to be a gay lady. I want to be happy.

Drug. And so you shall: don't frighten yourself, child. Step to your sister, bid her make herself easy; go, and comfort her, go.

Nan. Yes, Sir. [Exit.]

Drug. I'll step and settle the matter with Mr. Woodley, this moment. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—Another Apartment.

SIR CHARLES, with a pack of cards, at a table.

Sir C. Never was any thing like her behaviour. I can pick out the very cards I had in my hand, and then 'tis as plain as the sun.—There—there—now—there—no—damn it—there it was—now let me see; they had four by honours, and we played for the odd trick,—damnation! honours were divided—ay!—honours were divided, and then a trump was led, and the other side had the—confusion!—this preposterous woman has put it all out of my head. [Puts the cards into his pocket.] Mighty well, Madam; I have done with you

Enter MRS. DRUGGET.

Mrs. D. Sir Charles, let me prevail. Come with me and speak to her.

Sir C. I don't desire to see her face.

Mrs. D. If you were to see her all bathed in tears, I am sure it would melt your very heart.

Sir C. Madam, it shall be my fault if ever I am treated so again. I'll have nothing to say to her.—[Going, stops.] Does she give up the point?

Mrs. D. She does, she agrees to any thing.

Sir C. Does she allow that the club was the play?

Mrs. D. Just as you please; she is all submission.

Sir C. Does she own that the club was not the best in the house?

Mrs. D. She does; she is willing to own it.

Sir C. Then I'll step and speak to her. I never was clearer in any thing in my life. [Exit.]

Mrs. D. Lord love 'em, they'll make it up now, and then they'll be as happy as ever. [Exit.]

Enter NANCY.

Nan. Well! they may talk what they will of taste, and genteel life; I don't think it is natural. Give me Mr. Woodley.—La! that odious thing is coming this way.

Enter LOVELACE.

Love. My charming little innocent, I have not seen you these three hours.

Nan. I have been very happy these three hours.

Love. My sweet angel, you seem disconcerted, and you neglect your pretty figure. No matter, for the present; in a little time I shall make you appear as graceful and as genteel as your sister.

Nan. That is not what employs my thoughts, Sir.

Love. Ay! but my pretty little dear, that should engage your attention. To set off and adorn the charms that nature has given you, should be the business of your life.

Nan. But as I have something else to do, you'll excuse my leaving you. [Exit.]

Love. I must have her, notwithstanding this; for though I am not in love, I am most confoundedly in debt.

Enter DRUGGET.

Drug. So, Mr. Lovelace! any news from above stairs? Is this absurd quarrel at an end? Have they made it up?

Love. Oh! a mere bagatelle, Sir; these little fracas never last long, as you see; for here they come, in perfect good humour.

Enter SIR CHARLES RACKETT and LADY RACKETT.

Sir C. Mr. Drugget, I embrace you; you see me in the most perfect harmony of spirits.

Drug. What, all reconciled again?

Lady R. All made up, Sir. I knew how to bring the gentleman to a sense of his duty. This is the first difference, I think, we ever had, Sir Charles.

Sir C. And I'll be sworn it shall be the last.

Drug. I am happy, now, as happy as a fond father can wish. Sir Charles, I can spare you an image to put on the top of your house in London.

Sir C. Infinitely obliged to you.

Drug. Well, well, it's time to retire: I am glad to see you reconciled; and now I wish you a good night, Sir Charles. Mr. Lovelace, this is your way. Fare ye well both. I am glad your quarrels are at an end: this way, Mr. Lovelace.

[Exeunt DRUG. and LOVE.]

Lady R. Ah! you are a sad man, Sir Charles, to behave to me as you have done.

Sir C. My dear, I grant it: and such an absurd quarrel too—ha, ha!

Lady R. Yes, ha, ha!—about such a trifle.

Sir C. It is pleasant how we could both fall into such an error. Ha, ha!

Lady R. Ridiculous beyond expression; ha, ha!

Sir C. And then the mistake your father and mother fell into.

Lady R. That too is a diverting part of the story. Ha, ha!—But, Sir Charles, must I stay and live with my father till I grow as fantastical as his evergreens?

Sir C. Nay, prithee don't remind me of my folly.

Lady R. Ah! my relations were all standing behind counters, selling Whitechapel needles, while your family were spending great estates.

Sir C. Spare my blushes; you see I am covered with confusion.

Lady R. How could you say so indelicate a thing? I don't love you.

Sir C. It was indelicate, I grant it.

Lady R. Am I a vile woman?

Sir C. How can you, my angel?

Lady R. I sha'n't forgive you. I'll have you on your knees for this. [Sings and plays with him.] "Go, naughty man."—Ah, Sir Charles!

Sir C. The rest of my life shall aim at convincing you how sincerely I love you.

Lady R. [Sings.] "Go, naughty man, I can't abide you." Well, come, let us go to rest. [Going.] Ah, Sir Charles, now it's all over, the diamond was the play.

Sir C. Oh, no, no, no; now that one may speak, it was the club indeed.

Lady R. Indeed, my love, you are mistaken.

Sir C. You make me laugh; but I was not mistaken; rely upon my judgment.

Lady R. You may rely upon mine; you was wrong.

Sir C. [Laughing.] Po! no, no, no such thing.

Lady R. [Laughing.] But I say, yes, yes, yes.

Sir C. Oh! no, no; it is too ridiculous; don't say any more about it, my love.

Lady R. [Toying with him.] Don't you say any more about it; you had better give it up, you had indeed.

Enter FOOTMAN.

Foot. Your honour's cap and slippers.

Sir C. Lay down my cap, and here take these shoes off. [He takes them off, and leaves them at a distance.] Indeed, my Lady Rackett, you make me ready to expire with laughing. Ha, ha!

Lady R. You may laugh, but I am right notwithstanding.

Sir C. How can you say so?

Lady R. How can you say otherwise?

Sir C. Well, now mind me, Lady Rackett, we can now talk of this in good humour; we can discuss it coolly.

Lady R. So we can, and it is for that reason I venture to speak to you. Are these the ruffles I bought for you?

Sir C. They are, my dear.

Lady R. They are very pretty. But, indeed, you played the card wrong.

Sir C. No, no, listen to me; the affair was thus: Mr. Jenkins having never a club left—

Lady R. Mr. Jenkins finessed the club.

Sir C. [Peevishly.] How can you?

Lady R. And trumps being all out—

Sir C. And we playing for the odd trick—

Lady R. If you had minded your game—

Sir C. And the club being the best—

Lady R. If you had led your diamond—

Sir C. Mr. Jenkins would, of course, put on a spade.

Lady R. And so the odd trick was sure.

Sir C. Damnation! will you let me speak?

Lady R. Very well, Sir, fly out again.

Sir C. Look here now; here is a pack of cards.—Now you shall be convinced.

Lady R. You may talk till to-morrow, I know I am right. [Walks about.]

Sir C. Why then, by all that's perverse, you are the most headstrong—Can't you look here? here are the very cards.

Lady R. Go on; you'll find it out at last.

Sir C. Will you hold your tongue, or not? will you let me show you?—Po! it is all nonsense. [Puts up the cards.] Come, let us go to bed. [Going.] Only stay one moment. [Takes out the cards.] Now command yourself, and you shall have demonstration.

Lady R. It does not signify, Sir. Your head will be clearer in the morning. I choose to go to bed.

Sir C. Stay and hear me, can't you?

Lady R. No; my head aches. I am tired of the subject.

Sir C. Why then damn the cards. There, and there, and there. [Throwing them about the room.] You may go to bed by yourself. Confusion seize me if I stay here to be tormented a moment longer. [Putting on his shoes.]

Lady R. Take your own way, Sir.

Sir C. Now then, I tell you once more, you are a vile woman.

Lady R. Don't make me laugh again, Sir Charles. [Walks and sings.]

Sir C. Hell and the devil! Will you sit down quietly and let me convince you?

Lady R. I don't choose to hear any more about it.

Sir C. Why then may I perish if ever—a blockhead, an idiot, I was to marry. [Walks about.] Such provoking impertinence! [She sits down.] Damnation! I am so clear in the thing. She is not worth my notice. [Sits down, turns his back, and looks uneasy.] I'll take no more pains about it. [Pauses for some time, then looks at her.] Is it not strange, that you wont hear me?

Lady R. Sir, I am very ready to hear you.

Sir C. Very well then, very well; you remember how the game stood.

[Draws his chair near her.]

Lady R. I wish you would untie my necklace, it hurts me.

Sir C. Why can't you listen?

Lady R. I tell you it hurts me terribly.

Sir C. Death and confusion! [Moves his chair away.]—There is no bearing this. [Looks at her angrily.] It wont take a moment, if you will but listen. [Moves towards her.] Can't you see, that, by forcing the adversary's hand, Mr. Jenkins would be obliged to—

Lady R. [Moving her chair away from him.] Mr. Jenkins had the best club, and never a diamond left.

Sir C. [Rising.] Distraction! Bedlam is not so mad. Be as wrong as you please, Madam. May I never hold four by honours, may I lose every thing I play for, may fortune eternally forsake me, if I endeavour to set you right again.

[Exit.]

Enter Mr. and Mrs. DRUGGET, WOODLEY, and NANCY.

Mrs. D. Gracious! what's the matter now?

Lady R. Such another man does not exist. I did not say a word to the gentleman, and yet he has been raving about the room, and storming like a whirlwind.

Drug. And about a club again! I heard it all.—Come hither, Nancy; Mr. Woodley, she is yours for life.

Mrs. D. My dear, how can you be so passionate?

Drug. It shall be so. Take her for life, Mr. Woodley.

Wood. My whole life shall be devoted to her happiness.

Drug. Mr. Woodley, I recommend my girl to your care. I shall have nothing now to think of, but my greens, and my images, and my shrubbery.—Though, mercy on all married folks, say I; for these wranglings are, I am afraid, what they must all come to. [Exit.]

C A T O:

A TRAGEDY,

IN FIVE ACTS.

BY JOSEPH ADDISON.

REMARKS.

*Envy itself is dumb, in wonder lost,
And factious strive who shall applaud hi' most.*

Pope, writing to Sir W. Trumbull, has well applied these words of our author, (on some other occasion,) to this tragedy, in allusion to the endeavours of both whigs and Tories of that period, to make it a party-play. So many presents were made by both parties to Mr. Booth, (who played Cato,) that Dr. Garth is recorded to have said, " 'Tis probable that Cato may have something to live on after he dies."—It is certain, however, that this excellent dramatic poem derived, from impassioned politics, much of the enthusiastic admiration which graced its earlier performance.—The deficiency of dramatic business is scarcely balanced by the poetical beauties of the diction and the noble sentiments of liberty that adorn it throughout. The characters, though strongly depicted, fail to excite either solicitude or affection; "But, (as the great moralist observes,) they are made the vehicles of such sentiments and such expression, that there is scarcely a scene in the play which the reader does not wish to impress on his memory."—Johnson.

In our own day, the virtuous and dignified Roman has been so transcendantly portrayed by Mr. Kemble, that Cato and his little senate have never failed to interest the public and reward the managers.

PROLOGUE.

WRITTEN BY MR. POPE.

To wake the soul by tender strokes of art,
To raise the genius, and to mend the heart;
To make mankind, in conscious virtue bold,
Live o'er each scene, and be what they behold:

VOL. I. . . . 2 P

For this, the tragic muse first trod the stage,
Commanding tears to stream through every age;
Tyrants no more their savage nature kept,
And foes to virtue wonder'd how they wept.
Our author shuns by vulgar springs to move
The hero's glory or the virgin's love;
In pitying love we but our weakness show,
And wild ambition well deserves its wo.

297

Here tears shall flow from a more gen'rous cause,
Such tears as patriots shed for dying laws:
He bids your breasts with ancient ardour rise,
And calls forth Rom'ns drops from British eyes.
Virtue confess'd, in human shape he draws,
What Plato thought and godlike Cato was:
No common object to your sight displays,
But what with pleasure Heaven itself surveys;
A brave man struggling in the storms of fate,
And greatly falling in a falling state!
While Cato gives his little Senate laws,
What bosom beats not in his country's cause?
Who sees him act, but envies every deed?
Who hears him groan, and does not wish to bleed?
E'en when proud Cæsar, 'midst triumphal cars,
The spoils of nations, and the pomp of wars,
Ignobly vain, and impotently great,
Show'd Rome her Cato's figure drawn in state.
As her dead father's rev'rend image past,
The pomp was darken'd and the day o'ercast,
The triumph ceas'd—tears gush'd from every eye,
The world's great victor pass'd unheeded by:
Her last good man dejected Rome ador'd,
And honour'd Cæsar's, less than Cato's sword.
Britons, attend; be worth like this approv'd,
And show you have the virtue to be mov'd.
With honest scorn the first fam'd Cato view'd
Rome learning arts from Greece, whom she subdu'd.
Our scenes precariously subsist too long
On French translation and Italian song:
Dare to have sense yourselves; assert the stage;
Be justly warm'd with your own native rage:
Such plays alone should please a British ear,
As Cato's self had not disdain'd to hear.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Hall.

Enter PORTIUS and MARCUS.

Por. The dawn is overcast, the morning lowers,
And heavily in clouds brings on the day,
The great, th' important day, big with the fate
Of Cato and of Rome;—our father's death
Would fill up all the guilt of civil war,
And close the scene of blood. Already Cæsar
Has ravag'd more than half the globe, and sees
Mankind grown thin by his destructive sword:
Should he go farther, numbers would be wanting
To form new battles, and support his crimes.
Ye gods, what havoc does ambition make
Among your works!

Marc. Thy steady temper, Portius,
Can look on guilt, rebellion, fraud, and Cæsar,
In the calm lights of mild philosophy;
I'm tortur'd e'en to madness, when I think
On the proud victor: every time he's nam'd
Pharsalia rises to my view—I see
Th' insulting tyrant, prancing o'er the field Strew'd with Rome's citizens, and drench'd in slaughter;
His horses' hoofs wet with patrician blood!
Oh, Portius! is not there some chosen curse,
Some hidden thunder, in the stores of Heaven,
Red with uncommon wrath, to blast the man
Who owes his greatness to his country's ruin?

Por. Believe me, Marcus, 'tis an impious great-
ness,
And mix'd with too much horror to be envied.
How does the lustre of our father's actions,
Through the dark clouds of ills that cover him,

Break out, and burn with more triumphant brightness! [him;]

His sufferings shine, and spread a glory round
Greatly unfortunate, he fights the cause
Of honour, virtue, liberty, and Rome.

Marc. Who knows not this? But what can Cato do

Against a world, a base, degen'rate world,
That courts the yoke and bows the neck to Cæsar?
Pent up in Utica, he vainly forms
A poor epitome of Roman greatness,
And, cover'd with Numidian guards, directs
A feeble army and an empty senate;
Remnants of mighty battles fought in vain.
By Heaven, such virtues, join'd with such success,
Distract my very soul! our father's fortune
Would almost tempt us to renounce his precepts.

Por. Remember what our father oft has told us:
The ways of Heaven are dark and intricate;
Puzzled in mazes, and perplex'd with errors,
Our understanding traces them in vain,
Lost and bewilder'd in the fruitless search;
Nor sees with how much art the windings run,
Nor where the regular confusion ends.

Marc. These are suggestions of a mind at ease.—
Oh, Portius, didst thou taste but half the griefs
That wring my soul, thou couldst not talk thus Passion unpitied, and successful love, [coldly.
Plant daggers in my heart, and aggravate
My other griefs.—Were but my Lucia kind—

Por. Thou seest not that thy brother is thy rival;

But I must hide it, for I know thy temper. [Aside.
Now, Marcus, now thy virtue's on the proof,
Put forth thy utmost strength, work every nerve,
And call up all thy father in thy soul:—
To quell the tyrant Love, and guard thy heart
On this weak side, where most our nature fails,
Would be a conquest worthy Cato's son.

Marc. Alas, the counsel which I cannot take,
Instead of healing, but upbraids my weakness.
Love is not to be reason'd down, or lost
In high ambition and a thirst of greatness;
'Tis second life, that grows into the soul,
Warms every vein, and beats in every pulse:
I feel it here: my resolution melts—

Por. Behold young Juba, the Numidian prince,
With how much care he forms himself to glory,
And breaks the fierceness of his native temper,
To copy out our father's bright example.

He loves our sister Marcia, greatly loves her;
His eyes, his looks, his actions, all betray it;
But still the smother'd fondness burns within
him;

When most it swells, and labours for a vent,
The sense of honour, and desire of fame,
Drive the big passion back into his heart.
What, shall an African, shall Juba's heir,
Reproach great Cato's son, and show the world
A virtue wanting in a Roman soul?

Marc. Portius, no more! your words leave stings behind them.

Whene'er did Juba, or did Portius show
A virtue that had cast me at a distance,
And thrown me out in the pursuits of honour?

Por. Oh, Marcus! did I know the way to ease
Thy troubled heart, and mitigate thy pains,
Marcus, believe me, I could die to do it.

Marc. Thou best of brothers, and thou best of friends!

Pardon a weak, distemper'd, soul, that swells
With sudden gusts, and sinks as soon in calms

The sport of passions. But Sempronius comes:
He must not find this softness hanging on me.

[Exit.]

Enter SEMPRONIUS.

Sem. Conspiracies no sooner should be form'd
Than executed. What means Portius here?
I like not that cold youth. I must dissemble,
And speak a language foreign to my heart. [Aside.
Good morrow, Portius; let us once embrace,
Once more embrace, while yet we both are free.
To-morrow, should we thus express our friendship,

Each might receive a slave into his arms.
This sun, perhaps, this morning sun's the last,
That e'er shall rise on Roman liberty.

Por. My father has this morning call'd together
To this poor hall, his little Roman senate,
(The leavings of Pharsalia,) to consult
If he can yet oppose the mighty torrent
That bears down Rome and all her gods before it,
Or must at length give up the world to Cæsar.

Sem. Not all the pomp and majesty of Rome
Can raise her senate more than Cato's presence.
His virtues render our assembly awful,
They strike with something like religious fear,
And make even Cæsar tremble, at the head
Of armies flush'd with conquest. Oh, my Portius!
Could I but call that wondrous man my father,
Would but thy sister Marcia be propitious
To thy friend's vows, I might be bless'd indeed!

Por. Alas, Sempronius! wouldst thou talk of
love

To Marcia, whilst her father's life 's in danger?
Thou might'st as well court the pale, trembling
vestal,

When she beholds the holy flame expiring.

Sem. The more I see the wonders of thy race,
The more I'm charm'd. Thou must take heed,
my Portius;

The world has all its eyes on Cato's son;
Thy father's merit sets thee up to view,
And shows thee in the fairest point of light,
To make thy virtues or thy faults conspicuous.

Por. Well dost thou seem to check my ling'ring
here

On this important hour.—I'll straight away,
And while the fathers of the senate meet
In close debate, to weigh th' events of war,
I'll animate the soldiers' drooping courage
With love of freedom, and contempt of life;
I'll thunder in their ears their country's cause,
And try to rouse up all that's Roman in them.
'Tis not in mortals to command success,
But we'll do more, Sempronius; we'll deserve it.

[Exit.]

Sem. Curse on the stripling! how he apes his sire!

Ambitiously sententious.—But I wonder
Old Syphax comes not; his Numidian genius
Is well dispos'd to mischief, were he prompt
And eager on it; but he must be spur'd,
And every moment quicken'd to the course.
Cato has us'd me ill; he has refus'd
His daughter Marcia to my ardent vows.
Besides, his baffled arms and ruin'd cause
Are bars to my ambition. Cæsar's favour,
That shows down greatness on his friends, will raise me

To Rome's first honours. If I give up Cato,
I claim, in my reward, his captive daughter.
But Syphax comes—

Enter SYPHAX.

Syph. Sempronius, all is ready;
I've sounded my Numidians, man by man,
And find them ripe for a revolt: they all
Complain aloud of Cato's discipline,
And wait but the command to change their master

Sem. Believe me, Syphax, there's no time to waste:

Even while we speak, our conqueror comes on,
And gathers ground upon us every moment.
Alas! thou know'st not Cæsar's active soul,
With what a dreadful course he rushes on
From war to war. In vain has nature form'd
Mountains and oceans to oppose his passage;
He bounds o'er all;

One day more
Will set the victor thund'ring at our gates.
But, tell me, hast thou yet drawn o'er young Juba?
That still would recommend thee more to Cæsar,
And challenge better terms.

Syph. Alas! he's lost!
He's lost, Sempronius; all his thoughts are full
Of Cato's virtues—But I'll try once more
(For every instant I expect him here),
If yet I can subdue those stubborn principles
Of faith and honour, and I know not what,
That have corrupted his Numidian temper,
And struck th' infection into all his soul.

Sem. Be sure to press upon him every motive.
Juba's surrender, since his father's death,
Would give up Afric into Cæsar's hands,
And make him lord of half the burning zone.

Syph. But is it true, Sempronius, that your senate

Is call'd together? Gods! thou must be cautious;
Cato has piercing eyes, and will discern
Our frauds, unless they're cover'd thick with art.

Sem. Let me alone, good Syphax, I'll conceal
My thoughts in passion ('tis the surest way);
I'll bellow out for Rome, and for my country,
And mouth at Cæsar, till I shake the senate.
Your cold hypocrisy's a stale device, [earnest,
A worn-out trick: wouldst thou be thought in Clothe thy feign'd zeal in rage, in fire, in fury!

Syph. In troth, thou'rt able to instruct gray hairs,
And teach the wily African deceit.

Sem. Once more, be sure to try thy skill on Juba
Meanwhile I'll hasten to my Roman soldiers,
Inflame the mutiny, and, underhand,
Blow up their discontents, till they break out
Unlook'd for, and discharge themselves on Cato.
Remember, Syphax, we must work in haste;
Oh, think what anxious moments pass between
The birth of plots, and their last fatal periods!
Oh, 'tis a dreadful interval of time,

Fill'd up with horror all, and big with death!
Destruction hangs on every word we speak,
On every thought, till the concluding stroke
Determines all, and closes our design. [Exit.]

Syph. I'll try if yet I can reduce to reason
This headstrong youth, and make him spurn at Cato.

The time is short; Cæsar comes rushing on us—
But hold! young Juba sees me, and approaches!

Enter JUBA.

Juba. Syphax, I joy to meet thee thus alone,
I have observ'd of late thy looks are fallen,
O'ercast with gloomy cares and discontent;
Then tell me, Syphax, I conjure thee, tell me,
What are the thoughts that knit thy brow in frowns,

And turn thine eye thus coldly on thy prince?

Syph. 'Tis not my talent to conceal my thoughts,
Or carry smiles and sunshine in my face,
When discontent sits heavy at my heart;
I have not yet so much the Roman in me.

Juba. Why dost thou cast out such ungenerous terms

Against the lords and sov'reigns of the world?
Dost thou not see mankind fall down before them,
And own the force of their superior virtue?

Syph. Gods! Where's the worth that sets these people up

Above your own Numidia's tawny sons?
Do they with tougher sinews bend the bow?
Or flies the jav'lin swifter to its mark,
Launch'd from the vigour of a Roman arm?
Who like our active African instructs
The fiery steed, and trains him to his hand?
Or guides in troops th' embattled elephant,
Laden with war? These, these, are arts, my prince,

In which your Zama does not stoop to Rome.

Juba. These all are virtues of a meaner rank;
Perfections that are plac'd in bones and nerves.

A Roman soul is bent on higher views,
To make man mild, and sociable to man;
To cultivate the wild, licentious, savage,
And break our fierce barbarians into men.
Turn up thy eyes to Cato;

There may'st thou see to what a godlike height
The Roman virtues lift up mortal man.
While good, and just, and anxious for his friends,
He's still severely bent against himself:

And when his fortune sets before him all
The pomps and pleasures that his soul can wish,
His rigid virtue will accept of none. [can

Syph. Believe me, prince, there's not an Afri-
That traverses our vast Numidian deserts
In quest of prey, and lives upon his bow,
But better practises those boasted virtues.

Coarse are his meals, the fortune of the chase;
Amidst the running streams he slakes his thirst;
Toils all the day, and at th' approach of night,
On the first friendly bank he throws him down,
Or rests his head upon a rock till morn;
Then rises fresh, pursues his wonted game;
And if the following day he chance to find
A new repast, or an untasted spring,
Blesses his stars, and thinks it luxury.

Juba. Thy prejudices, Syphax, wont discern
What virtues grow from ignorance and choice,
Nor how the hero differs from the brute.
Where shall we find the man that bears affliction,
Great and majestic in his griefs, like Cato?
How does he rise against a load of woes,
And thank the gods that threw the weight upon
him!

Syph. 'Tis pride, rauk pride, and haughtiness of soul;

I think the Romans call it stoicism.
Had not your royal father thought so highly
Of Roman virtue, and of Cato's cause,
He had not fall'n by a slave's hand inglorious;
Nor would his slaughter'd armies now have lain
On Afric's sands, disfigur'd with their wounds,
To gorge the wolves and vultures of Numidia.

Juba. Why dost thou call my sorrows up afresh?

My father's name brings tears into my eyes.

Syph. Oh, that you'd profit by your father's ills!

Juba. What wouldst thou have me do?

Syph. Abandon Cato.

Juba. Syphax, I should be more than twice an orphan,

By such a loss.

Syph. Ay, there's the tie that binds you!
You long to call him father. Marcia's charms
Work in your heart unseen, and plead for Cato.
No wonder you are deaf to all I say.

Juba. Syphax, your zeal becomes importunate;
I've hitherto permitted it to rave,
And talk at large; but learn to keep it in.

Least it should take more freedom than I'll give it.

Syph. Sir, your great father never us'd me thus.
Alas, he's dead! but can you e'er forget

The tender sorrows,
And repeated blessings,
Which you drew from him in your last farewell?
The good old king, at parting, wrung my hand;
(His eyes brim full of fears,) then, sighing, cried,
Pr'ythee, be careful of my son!—His grief
Swell'd up so high, he could not utter more.

Juba. Alas! thy story melts away my soul!

That best of fathers! how shall I discharge

The gratitude and duty that I owe him?

Syph. By laying up his counsels in your heart.

Juba. His counsels bade me yield to thy direction. [safety.

Syph. Alas! my prince, I'd guide you to your Juba. I do believe thou wouldst: but tell me how. [foes.

Syph. Fly from the fate that follows Cæsar's

Juba. My father scorn'd to do it.

Syph. And therefore died.

Juba. Better to die ten thousand thousand
Than wound my honour. [deaths,

Syph. Rather say, your love. [temper.

Juba. Syphax, I've promis'd to preserve my

Why wilt thou urge me to confess a flame

I long have stifled, and would fain conceal?

Syph. Believe me, prince, though hard to conquer love,

'Tis easy to divert and break its force.

Absence might cure it, or a second mistress

Light up another flame, and put out this.

The glowing dames of Zama's royal court

Have faces flush'd with more exalted charms;

Were you with these, my prince, you'd soon forget

The pale, unripen'd beauties of the north.

Juba. 'Tis not a set of features, or complexion

The tincture of a skin, that I admire:

Beauty soon grows familiar to the lover,

Fades in his eye, and palls upon his sense.

The virtuous Marcia towers above her sex:

True, she is fair, (oh, how divinely fair!)

But still the lovely maid improves her charms

With inward greatness, unaffected wisdom,

And sanctity of manners; Cato's soul

Shines out in every thing she acts or speaks,

While winning mildness and attractive smiles

Dwell in her looks, and, with becoming grace,

Soften the rigour of her father's virtue.

Syph. How does your tongue grow wanton in her praise!

But, on my knees, I beg you would consider—

Juba. Ha! Syphax, is't not she?—She moves this way,

And with her Lucia, Lucius' fair daughter.

My heart beats thick—I pr'ythee, Syphax, leave me. [both.]

Syph. Ten thousand curses fasten on them

Now will the woman, with a single glance,

Undo what I've been lab'ring all this while.

[Exit.

Enter MARCIA and LUCIA.

Juba. Hail, charming maid! how does thy beauty smooth

The face of war, and make even horror smile!
At sight of thee my heart shakes off its sorrows;
I feel a dawn of joy break in upon me,
And for awhile forget th' approach of Cæsar.

Marcia. I should be griev'd, young prince, to think my presence

Unbent your thoughts, and slacken'd them to arms,
While, warm with slaughter, our victorious foe
Threatens aloud, and calls you to the field.

Juba. Oh, Marcia, let me hope thy kind concerns

And gentle wishes follow me to battle!
The thought will give new vigour to my arm,
And strength and weight to my descending sword,
And drive it in a tempest on the foe.

Marcia. My prayers and wishes always shall attend

The friends of Rome, the glorious cause of virtue,
And men approv'd of by the gods and Cato.

Juba. That Juba may deserve thy pious cares,
I'll gaze for ever on thy godlike father,
Transplanting, one by one, into my life,
His bright perfections, till I shine like him.

Marcia. My father never, at a time like this,
Would lay out his great soul in words, and waste
Such precious moments.

Juba. Thy reproofs are just,
Thou virtuous maid: I'll hasten to my troops,
And fire their languid souls with Cato's virtue,
If e'er I lead them to the field, when all
The war shall stand rang'd in its just array
And dreadful pomp, then will I think on thee.
Oh, lovely maid! then will I think on thee;
And in the shock of charging hosts, remember What glorious deeds should grace the man, who hopes

For Marcia's love. [Exit.

Lucia. Marcia, you're too severe:
How could you chide the young, good-natur'd prince,

And drive him from you with so stern an air;
A prince that loves and dotes on you to death?

Marcia. How, Lucia! wouldst thou have me sink away

In pleasing dreams, and lose myself in love,
When every moment Cato's life's at stake?

Lucia. Why, have not I this constancy of mind,
Who have so many griefs to try its force?
Sure, nature form'd me of her softest mould;
Enfeebled all my soul with tender passions,
And sunk me e'en below my own weak sex:
Pity and love, by turns, oppress my heart.

Marcia. Lucia, disburden all thy cares on me,
And let me share thy most retir'd distress.
Tell me, who raises up this conflict in thee?

Lucia. I need not blush to name them, when I tell thee

They're Marcia's brothers, and the sons of Cato.
Marcia. But tell me whose address thou favour'st most?

I long to know, and yet I dread to hear it.

Lucia. Suppose 'twere Portius, could you blame my choice?—

Oh, Portius, thou hast stolen away my soul!
Marcus is over warm; his fond complaints
Have so much earnestness and passion in them,
I hear him with a secret kind of horror,
And tremble at his vehemence of temper.

Marcia. Alas, poor youth!
How will thy coldness raise
Tempests and storms in his afflicted bosom?
I dread the consequence.

Lucia. You seem to plead
Against your brother Portius.

Marcia. Lucia, no:
Had Portius been the unsuccessful lover,
The same compassion would have fallen on him.

Lucia. Portius himself oft falls in tears before
As if he mourn'd his rival's ill success; [me,
Then bids me hide the motions of my heart,
Nor show which way it turns: so much he fears
The sad effect that it will have on Marcus.
Was ever virgin love distress'd like mine.

Marcia. Let us not, Lucia, aggravate our sorrows,
But to the gods submit th' event of things.
Our lives, discolour'd with our present woes,
May still grow bright, and smile with happier hours. [stains

So the pure, limpid stream, when foul with
Of rushing torrents and descending rains,
Works itself clear, and, as it runs, refines,
Till, by degrees, the floating mirror shines,
Reflects each flower that on the border grows,
And a new heaven in its fair bosom shows.

[Exeunt.

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The Senate-House.

Flourish; SEMPRONIUS, LUCIUS, and Senators discovered.

Sem. Rome still survives in this assembled senate.

Let us remember we are Cato's friends,
And act like men who claim that glorious title.

Luc. Hark! he comes. [Trumpets.

Trumpets. Enter CATO, PORTIUS, and MARCUS.

Cato. Fathers, we once again are met in council;
Cæsar's approach has summon'd us together,
And Rome attends her fate from our resolves.
How shall we treat this bold, aspiring man?
Success still follows him, and backs his crimes;
Pharsalia gave him Rome, Egypt has since
Receiv'd his yoke, and the whole Nile is Cæsar's.
Why should I mention Juba's overthrow,
And Scipio's death? Numidia's burning sands Still smoke with blood. 'Tis time we should decree

What course to take. Our foe, advances on us,
And envies us even Libya's sultry deserts.
Fathers, pronounce your thoughts: are they still
To hold it out, and fight it to the last? [fix'd
Or are your hearts subdu'd at length, and wrought,
By time and ill success, to a submission?
Sempronius, speak.

Sem. My voice is still for war.
Gods! can a Roman senate long debate
Which of the two to choose, slav'ry or death?
No; let us rise at once, gird on our swords,
And, at the head of our remaining troops,
Attack the foe, break through the thick array
Of his throng'd legions, and charge home upon
him.

Perhaps some arm, more lucky than the rest,
May reach his heart, and free the world from bondage.

Rise, fathers, rise! 'tis Rome demands your help;
Rise, and revenge her slaughter'd citizens,
Or share their fate;—
To battle!

Great Pompey's shade complains that we are slow,
And Scipio's ghost walks unreveng'd amongst us.

Cato. Let not a torrent of impetuous zeal
Transport thee thus beyond the bounds of reason;
True fortitude is seen in great exploits,
That justice warrants, and that wisdom guides;
All else is towering frenzy and distraction.
Lucius, we next would know what's your opinion.

Luc. My thoughts, I must confess, are turn'd on peace.

Already have we shown our love to Rome,
Now let us show submission to the gods.
We took up arms, not to revenge ourselves,
But free the commonwealth; when this end fails,
Arms have no further use. Our country's cause,
That drew our swords, now wrests them from
our hands,

And bids us not delight in Roman blood,
Unprofitably shed. What men could do,
Is done already: Heaven and earth will witness,
If Rome must fall, that we are innocent.

Cato. Let us appear nor rash nor diffident;
Immoderate valour swells into a fault;
And fear, admitted into public councils,
Betrays like treason. Let us shun them both.
Fathers, I cannot see that our affairs
Are grown thus desperate: we have bulwarks round us;

Within our walls are troops inur'd to toil
In Afric's heat, and season'd to the sun;
Numidia's spacious kingdom lies behind us,
Ready to rise at its young prince's call.
While there is hope, do not disturb the gods;
But wait at least till Cæsar's near approach
Force us to yield. 'Twill never be too late
To sue for chains, and own a conqueror.

Why should Rome fall a moment ere her time?
No, let us draw her term of freedom out
In its full length, and spin it to the last,
So shall we gain still one day's liberty:
And let me perish, but, in Cato's judgment,
A day, an hour, of virtuous liberty,
Is worth a whole eternity in bondage.

Enter JUNIUS.

Mar. Fathers, e'en now a herald is arriv'd
From Cæsar's camp, and with him comes old Decius,

The Roman knight: he carries in his looks
Impatience, and demands to speak with Cato.

Cato. By your permission, fathers—bid him enter. [Exit JUNIUS.

Decius was once my friend, but other prospects
Have loos'd those ties, and bound him fast to Cæsar.

His message may determine our resolves.

Enter DECIOUS.

Dec. Cæsar sends health to Cato—

Cato. Could he send it

To Cato's slaughter'd friends, it would be welcome.
Are not your orders to address the senate?

Dec. My business is with Cato; Cæsar sees
The straits to which you're driven: and, as he knows

Cato's high worth, is anxious for your life.

Cato. My life is grafted on the fate of Rome.
Would he save Cato, bid him spare his country.

Tell your dictator this; and tell him, Cato
Disdains a life which he has power to offer.

Dec. Rome and her senators submit to Cæsar,
Her gen'ral's and her consuls are no more,
Who check'd his conquests, and denied his triumphs.

Why will not Cato be this Cæsar's friend? [It.

Cato. These very reasons thou hast urg'd forbid

Dec. Cæsar is well acquainted with your virtues,
And therefore sets this value on your life.

Let him but know the price of Cato's friendship,
And name your terms.

Cato. Bid him disband his legions,
Restore the commonwealth to liberty,
Submit his actions to the public censure,
And stand the judgment of a Roman senate.

Bid him do this, and Cato is his friend.

Dec. Cato, the world talks loudly of your wisdom—

Cato. Nay, more; though Cato's voice was ne'er employ'd

To clear the guilty, and to varnish crimes,
Myself will mount the rostrum in his favour,
And strive to gain his pardon from the people.

Dec. A style like this becomes a conqueror.

Cato. Decius, a style like this becomes a Roman.

Dec. What is a Roman, that is Cæsar's foe?

Cato. Greater than Cæsar: he's a friend to virtue.

Dec. Consider, Cato, you're in Utica,
And at the head of your own little senate:

You don't now thunder in the capitol,
With all the mouths of Rome to second you.

Cato. Let him consider that, who drives us hither.

'Tis Cæsar's sword has made Rome's senate little,
And thinn'd its ranks. Alas! thy dazzled eye
Beholds this man in a false, glaring light, [him;
Which conquest and success have thrown upon Didst thou but view him right, thou'd'st see him black

With murder, treason, sacrilege, and crimes
That strike my soul with horror but to name them.
I know thou lookest on me as a wretch
Beset with ills, and cover'd with misfortunes;
But, by the gods I swear, millions of worlds
Should never buy me to be like that Cæsar.

Dec. Does Cato send this answer back to Cæsar,
For all his gen'rous cares and proffer'd friendship?

Cato. His cares for me are insolent and vain:
Presumptuous man! the gods take care of Cato.
Would Cæsar show the greatness of his soul,
Bid him employ his care for these my friends,
And make good use of his ill-gotten power,
By shelt'ring men much better than himself.

Dec. Your high, unconquer'd heart makes you forget

You are a man. You rush on your destruction.
But I have done. When I relate hereafter
The tale of this unhappy embassy,
All Rome will be in tears. [Exit, attended.

Sem. Cato, we thank thee.

The mighty genius of immortal Rome
Speaks in thy voice; thy soul breathes liberty,
Cæsar will shrink to hear the words thou utter'st,
And shudder in the midst of all his conquests.

Luc. The senate owns its gratitude to Cato,
Who with so great a soul consults its safety,
And guards our lives, while he neglects his own.

Sem. Sempronius gives no thanks on this account.

Lucius seems fond of life; but what is life?
 'Tis not to stalk about, and draw fresh air
 From time to time, or gaze upon the sun;—
 'Tis to be free. When liberty is gone,
 Life grows insipid, and has lost its relish.
 Oh, could my dying hand but lodge a sword
 In Cæsar's bosom, and revenge my country,
 By Heaven I could enjoy the pangs of death,
 And smile in agony!

Luc. Others perhaps
 May serve their country with as warm a zeal,
 Though 'tis not kindled into so much rage.

Sem. This sober conduct is a mighty virtue
 In luke-warm patriots.

Cato. Come, no more, Scmpronius;
 All here are friends to Rome, and to each other.
 Let us not weaken still the weaker side
 By our divisions.

Sem. Cato, my resentments
 Are sacrific'd to Rome—I stand reprov'd.

Cato. Fathers, 'tis time you come to a resolve.
Luc. Cato, we all go into your opinion:

Cæsar's behaviour has convinc'd the senate,
 We ought to hold it out till terms arrive.

Sem. We ought to hold it out till death; but,
 Cato,
 My private voice is drown'd amidst the senate's.

Cato. Then let us rise, my friends, and strive to fill

This little interval, this pause of life
 (While yet our liberty and fates are doubtful.)

With resolution, friendship, Roman bravery,
 And all the virtues we can crowd into it;
 That Heaven may say, it ought to be prolong'd.
 Fathers, farewell.—The young Numidian prince
 Comes forward, and expects to know our counsels.
 [Exeunt Senators.]

Enter JUBA.

Juba, the Roman senate has resolv'd
 Till time give better prospects, still to keep
 The sword unsheath'd, and turn its edge on Cæsar.

Juba. The resolution fits a Roman senate.
 But, Cato, lend me for a while thy patience,
 And condescend to hear a young man speak.
 My father, when, some days before his death,
 He order'd me to march for Utica,
 (Alas! I thought not then his death so near!)
 Wept o'er me, press'd me in his aged arms;
 And, as his griefs gave way, "My son," said
 he,

"Whatever fortune shall befall thy father,
 Be Cato's friend; he'll train thee up to great
 And virtuous deeds; do but observe him well, Thou'lt shun misfortunes, or thou'lt learn to bear them."

Cato. Juba, thy father was a worthy prince,
 And merited, alas! a better fate;
 But Heaven thought otherwise.

Juba. My father's fate,
 In spite of all the fortitude that shines
 Before my face in Cato's great example,
 Subdues my soul, and fills my eyes with tears.

Cato. It is an honest sorrow, and becomes
 thee.

Juba. His virtues drew respect from foreign climes:

The kings of Afric sought him for their friend;
 Kings far remote, that rule, as fame reports,
 Behind the hidden sources of the Nile,

In distant worlds, on t'other side the sun;
 Oft have their black ambassadors appear'd,
 Loaden with gifts, and fill'd the courts of Zama.

Cato. I am no stranger to thy father's greatness.

Juba. I do not mean to boast his power and greatness,

But point out new alliances to Cato.
 Had we not better leave this Utica,
 To arm Numidia in our cause, and court
 Th' assistance of my father's powerful friends?
 Did they know Cato, our remotest kings
 Would pour embattled multitudes about him;
 Their swarthy hosts would darken all our plains
 Doubling the native horror of the war,
 And making death more grim.

Cato. And canst thou think

Cato will fly before the sword of Cæsar!
 Reduc'd, like Hannibal, to seek relief
 From court to court, and wander up and down
 A vagabond in Afric?

Juba. Cato, perhaps

I'm too officious; but my forward cares
 Would fain preserve a life of so much value.
 My heart is wounded, when I see such virtue
 Afflicted by the weight of such misfortunes.
Cato. Thy nobleness of soul obliges me.

But know, young prince, that valour soars above
 What the world calls misfortune and affliction.
 These are not ills; else would they never fall
 On Heaven's first favorites, and the best of men.
 The gods, in bounty, work up storms about us,
 That give mankind occasion to exert
 Their hidden strength, and throw out into practice

Virtues which shun the day, and lie conceal'd
 In the smooth seasons and the calm of life.

Juba. I'm charm'd when'er thou talk'st; I pant for virtue;

And all my soul endeavours at perfection.

Cato. Dost thou love watchings, abstinence, and toil;

Laborious virtues all? Learn them from Cato:
 Success and fortune must thou learn from Cæsar.

Juba. The best good fortune that can fall on Juba,

The whole success at which my heart aspires,
 Depends on Cato.

Cato. What does Juba say?

Thy words confound me.

Juba. I would fain retract them.

Give them me back again: they aim'd at nothing.

Cato. Tell me thy wish, young prince; make not my ear

A stranger to thy thoughts.

Juba. Oh! they're extravagant;

Still let me hide them.

Cato. What can Juba ask,

That Cato will refuse?

Juba. I fear to name it.

Marcia—inherits all her father's virtues.

Cato. What wouldst thou say?

Juba. Cato, thou hast a daughter.

Cato. Adieu, young prince; I would not near a word

Should lessen thee in my esteem. Remember

The hand of fate is over us, and Heaven

Exacts severity from all our thoughts.

It is not now a time to talk of aught

But chains, or conquest; liberty, or death.

[Exit.]

Enter SYPHAX.

Syph. How 's this, my prince? What, cover'd with confusion?
You look as if you stern philosopher
Had just now chid you.
Juba. Syphax, I'm undone!
Syph. I know it well.
Juba. Cato thinks meanly of me.
Syph. And so will all mankind.
Juba. I've open'd to him
The weakness of my soul, my love for Marcia.
Syph. Cato's a proper person to intrust
A love tale with!
Juba. Oh, I could pierce my heart,
My foolish heart!
Syph. Alas, my prince, how are you chang'd of late!
I've known young Juba rise before the sun,
To beat the thicket where the tiger slept,
Or seek the lion in his dreadful haunts.
I've seen you,
Even in the Libyan dog-days hunt him down,
Then charge him close,
And, stooping from your horse,
Rivet the panting savage to the ground.
Juba. Pr'ythee, no more.
Syph. How would the old king smile,
To see you weigh the paws, when tipp'd with gold,
And throw the shaggy spoils about your shoulders!
Juba. Syphax, this old man's talk, though honey flow'd
In every word, would now lose all its sweetness.
Cato's displeas'd, and Marcia lost for ever.
Syph. Young prince, I yet could give you good advice;
Marcia might still be yours.
Juba. As how, dear Syphax?
Syph. Juba commands Numidia's hardy troops,
Mounted on steeds unus'd to the restraint
Of curbs or bits, and fleetier than the winds:
Give but the word, we snatch this damsel up,
And bear her off.
Juba. Can such dishonest thoughts
Rise up in man! Wouldst thou seduce my youth
To do an act that would destroy mine honour?
Syph. Gods, I could tear my hair, to hear you talk!
Honour's a fine imaginary notion,
That draws in raw and inexperienc'd men
To real mischiefs, while they hunt a shadow.
Juba. Wouldst thou degrade thy prince into a ruffian?
Syph. The boasted ancestors of these great
Whose virtues you admire, were all such ruffians.
This dread of nations, this almighty Rome,
That comprehends in her wide empire's bounds
All under Heav'n, was founded on a rape;
Your Scipios, Cæsars, Pompeys, and your Catos,
(The gods on earth,) are all the spurious blood
Of violated maids, of ravish'd Sabines.
Juba. Syphax, I fear that hoary head of thine
Abounds too much in our Numidian wiles.
Syph. Indeed, my prince, you want to know the world.
Juba. If knowledge of the world makes men
perfidious,
May Juba ever live in ignorance!
Syph. Go, go, you're young.
Juba. Gods, must I tamely bear
This arrogance unanswer'd! thou'rt a traitor,
A false old traitor!

Syph. I have gone too far. [Aside.]
Juba. Cato shall know the baseness of thy soul.
Syph. I must appease this storm, or perish in it.
[Aside.]
Young prince, behold these locks, that are grown white
Beneath a helmet in your father's battles.
Juba. Those locks shall ne'er protect thy insolence.
Syph. Must one rash word, the infirmity of age,
Throw down the merit of my better years?
This is the reward of a whole life of service!—
Curse on the boy! how steadily he hears me!
[Aside.]
Juba. Is it because the throne of my forefathers
Still stands unfill'd, and that Numidia's crown
Hangs doubtful yet whose head it shall enclose, Thou thus presum'st to treat thy prince with scorn?
Syph. Why will you rive my heart with such expressions?
Does not old Syphax follow you to war?
What are his aims? to shed the slow remains,
His last poor ebb of blood, in your defence?
Juba. Syphax, no more! I would not hear you talk.
Syph. Not hear me talk! what, when my faith to Juba,
My royal master's son, is call'd in question?
My prince may strike me dead, and I'll be dumb;
But whilst I live I must not hold my tongue,
And languish out old age in his displeasure.
Juba. Thou know'st the way too well into my heart.
I do believe thee loyal to thy prince.
Syph. What greater instance can I give? I've offer'd
To do an action which my soul abhors,
And gain you whom you love, at any price.
Juba. Was this thy motive? I have been too hasty.
Syph. And 'tis for this my prince has call'd me traitor. [See.]
Juba. Sure thou mistak'st; I did not call thee Syph. You did indeed, my prince, you call'd me traitor.
Nay, further, threaten'd you'd complain to Cato.
Of what, my prince, would you complain to Cato?
That Syphax loves you, and would sacrifice
His life, nay more, his honour, in your service?
Juba. Syphax, I know thou lov'st me; but indeed
Thy zeal for Juba carried thee too far.
Honour's a sacred tie, the law of kings,
The noble mind's distinguishing perfection,
That aids and strengthens virtue where it meets
her,
And imitates her actions where she is not:
It ought not to be sported with.
Syph. Believe me, prince, you make old Syphax
weep
To hear you talk—but 'tis with tears of joy.
If e'er your father's crown adorn your brows,
Numidia will be bless'd by Cato's lectures.
Juba. Syphax, thy hand; we'll mutually forget
The warmth of youth, and forwardness of age.
Thy prince esteems thy worth, and loves thy person.
If e'er the sceptre come into my hand,
Syphax shall stand the second in my kingdom.

Syph. Why will you o'erwhelm my age with kindness ?

My joy grows burdensome, I sha'n't support it.

Juba. Syphax, farewell, I'll hence, and try to find

Some bless'd occasion, that may set me right in Cato's thoughts. I'd rather have that man approve my deeds, than worlds for my admirers.

[Exit.]

Syph. Young men soon give, and soon forget affronts ;

Old age is slow in both—A false old traitor !— These words, rash boy, may chance to cost thee dear.

My heart had still some foolish fondness for thee, But hence, 'tis gone ; I'll give it to the winds : Cæsar, I'm wholly thine.

Enter SEMPRONIUS.

All hail, Sempronius !

Well, Cato's senate is resolv'd to wait The fury of a siege, before it yields.

Sem. Syphax, we both were on the verge of fate ;

Lucius declar'd for peace, and terms were offer'd To Cato, by a messenger from Cæsar.

Syph. But, how stands Cato ?

Sem. Thou hast seen mount Atlas ; Whilst storms and tempests thunder on its brows, And oceans break their billows at its feet, It stands unmov'd, and glories in its height : Such is that haughty man ; his towering soul, 'Midst all the shocks and injuries of fortune, Rises superior, and looks down on Cæsar.

Syph. But what's this messenger ?

Sem. I've practis'd with him, And found a means to let the victor know, That Syphax and Sempronius are his friends. But let me now examine in my turn ; Is Juba fix'd ?

Syph. Yes—but it is to Cato.

I've tried the force of every reason on him, Sooth'd and caress'd ; been angry, sooth'd again ; Laid safety, life, and interest, in his sight ; But all are vain, he scorns them all for Cato.

Sem. Well, 'tis no matter ; we shall do without him.

Syphax, I now may hope, thou hast forsook Thy Juba's cause, and wishest Marcia mine.

Syph. May she be thine as fast as thou wouldst have her.

But, are thy troops prepar'd for a revolt ? Does the sedition catch from man to man, And run among the ranks ?

Sem. All, all is ready ;

The factious leaders are our friends, that spread Murmurs and discontents among the soldiers ; They count their toilsome marches, long fatigues, Unusual fastings, and will bear no more This medley of philosophy and war.

Within an hour they'll storm the senate-house.

Syph. Meanwhile I'll draw up my Numidian troops

Within the square, to exercise their arms, And, as I see occasion, favour thee. I laugh to see how the unshaken Cato Will look aghast, while unforeseen destruction Pours in upon him thus from every side.

So, where our wide Numidian wastes extend, Sudden th' impetuous hurricanes descend ; Wheel through the air, in circling eddies play, Tear up the sands, and sweep whole plains away.

The helpless traveller, with wild surprise, Sees the dry desert all around him rise, And, smother'd in the dusty whirlwind, dies.

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The Palace.

Enter MARCUS and PORTIUS.

Marc. Thanks to my stars, I have not rang'd about

The wilds of life, ere I could find a friend ; Nature first pointed out my Portius to me, And early taught me, by her secret force, To love thy person, ere I knew thy merit ; Till what was instinct, grew up into friendship.

Por. Marcus, the friendships of the world are oft Confederacies in vice, or leagues of pleasure ; Ours, has severest virtue for its basis, And such a friendship ends not but with life.

Marc. Portius, thou know'st my soul in all its weakness ;

Then, pry'thee, spare me on its tender side ; Indulge me but in love, my other passions Shall rise and fall by virtue's nicest rules.

Por. When love's well tim'd, 'tis not a fault to love :

The strong, the brave, the virtuous, and the wise, Sink in the soft captivity together.

Marc. Alas, thou talk'st like one that never felt Th' impatient throbs and longings of a soul, That pants and reaches after distant good ! A lover does not live by vulgar time :

Believe me, Portius, in my Lucia's absence, Life hangs upon me, and becomes a burden ; And yet, when I behold the charming maid, I'm ten times more undone ; while hope, and fear, And grief, and rage, and love, rise up at once, And, with variety of pain, distract me.

Por. What can thy Portius do to give thee help ?

Marc. Portius, thou oft enjoy'st the fair one's presence ;

Then undertake my cause, and plead it to her With all the strength and heat of eloquence Fraternal love and friendship can inspire. Tell her thy brother languishes to death, And fades away, and withers in his bloom ; That he forgets his sleep, and loathes his food ; That youth, and health, and war, are joyless to him ;

Describe his anxious days, and restless nights, And all the torments that thou see'st me suffer.

Por. Marcus, I beg thee give me not an office That suits with me so ill. Thou know'st my temper.

Marc. Wilt thou behold me sinking in my woes, And wilt thou not reach out a friendly arm To raise me from amidst this plunge of sorrows ?

Por. Marcus, thou canst not ask what I'd refuse ;

But here, believe me, I've a thousand reasons.—

Marc. I know thou'll say my passion's out of season,

That Cato's great example and misfortunes Should both conspire to drive it from my thoughts.

But what's all this to one that loves like me ? O, Portius, Portius, from my soul I wish Thou didst but know thyself what 'tis to love ! Then wouldst thou pity and assist thy brother

Por. What shall I do? If I disclose my passion,
Our friendship's at an end; if I conceal it,
The world will call me false to friend and brother.

[Aside.]

Marc. But see, where Lucia, at her wonted hour,
Amid the cool of yon high marble arch,
Enjoys the noon-day breeze! I observe her, Portius;
That face, that shape, those eyes, that heaven of beauty!

Observe her well, and blame me if thou canst.

Por. She sees us, and advances.

Marc. I'll withdraw,

And leave you for awhile. Remember, Portius,
Thy brother's life depends upon thy tongue.

[Exit.]

Enter LUCIA.

Lucia. Did not I see your brother Marcus here?
Why did he fly the place, and shun my presence?

Por. Oh, Lucia, language is too faint to show
His rage of love; it preys upon his life;
He pines, he sickens, he despairs, he dies!

Lucia. How wilt thou guard thy honour, in the shock

Of love and friendship? Think betimes, my Por.
Think how the nuptial tie, that might ensure

Our mutual bliss, would raise to such a height
Thy brother's griefs, as might perhaps destroy him.

Por. Alas, poor youth! What dost thou think, my Lucia?

His generous, open, undesigning heart,
Has begg'd his rival to solicit for him!
Then do not strike him dead with a denial.

Lucia. No, Portius, no; I see thy sister's tears,
Thy father's anguish, and thy brother's death,
In the pursuit of our ill-fated loves;
And, Portius, here I swear, to Heaven I swear,
To Heaven, and all the powers that judge mankind,
Never to mix my plighted hands with thine,
While such a cloud of mischief hangs upon us;
But to forget our loves, and drive thee out
From all my thoughts—as far as I am able.

Por. What hast thou said!—I'm thunderstruck—

Recall those hasty words, or I am lost for ever.

Lucia. Has not the vow already pass'd my lips?
The gods have heard it, and 'tis seal'd in Heaven.
May all the vengeance that was ever pour'd
On perjurd heads, o'erwhelm me if I break it!

Por. Fix'd in astonishment, I gaze upon thee,
Like one just blasted by a stroke from Heaven,
Who pants for breath, and stiffens, yet alive,
In dreadful looks; a monument of wrath!

Lucia. Think, Portius, think thou see'st thy dying brother

Stabb'd at his heart, and all besmear'd with blood,
Storming at Heaven and thee! Thy awful sire
Sternly demands the cause, th' accursed cause,
That robs him of his son:—farewell, my Portius!
Farewell, though death is in the word—for ever!

Por. Thou must not go; my soul still hovers o'er thee,

And can't get loose.

Lucia. If the firm Portius shake,
To hear of parting, think what Lucia suffers!

Por. 'Tis true, unruffled and serene, I've met
The common accidents of life; but here
Such an unlook'd-for storm of ills falls on me,
It beats down all my strength, I cannot bear it.
We must not part.

Lucia. What dost thou say? Not part!
Hast thou forgot the vow that I have made?

Are not there heavens, and gods, that thunder o'er us?

But see, thy brother Marcus bends his way;
I sicken at the sight. Once more, farewell,
Farewell, and know thou wrong'st me, if thou think'st,

Ever was love, or ever grief, like mine. [Exit.]

Enter MARCUS.

Marc. Portius, what hopes? How stands she?
am I doom'd

To life or death?

Por. What wouldst thou have me say?

Marc. Thy downcast looks, and thy disorder'd
thoughts,

Tell me my fate. I ask not the success:
My cause has found.

Por. I'm griev'd I undertook it.

Marc. What, does the barbarous maid insult
my heart,

My aching heart, and triumph in my pains?

Por. Away, you're too suspicious in your griefs;
Lucia, though sworn never to think of love,
Compassionates your pains and pities you.

Marc. Compassionates my pains, and pities me!
What is compassion when 'tis void of love?

Fool that I was to choose so cold a friend
To urge my cause!—Compassionates my pains!

Pr'ythee, what art, what rhet'ric, didst thou use
To gain this mighty boon?—She pities me!

To one that asks the warm returns of love,
Compassion's cruelty, 'tis scorn, 'tis death.—

Por. Marcus, no more; have I deserv'd this treatment?

Marc. What have I said? Oh, Portius, oh forgive me!

A soul, exasperate in ills, falls out
With every thing—its friend, itself—but, ha!

[Shouts and trumpets.]

What means that shout, big with the sounds of war?

What new alarm?

[Shouts and trumpets repeated.]

Por. A second, louder yet,

Swells in the wind, and comes more full upon us.
Marc. Oh, for some glorious cause to fall in battle!

Lucia, thou hast undone me: thy disdain
Has broke my heart: 'tis death must give me ease.

Por. Quick let us hence. Who knows if Cato's life

Stands sure? Oh, Marcus, I am warm'd; my heart
Leaps at the trumpet's voice, and burns for glory.

[Exeunt; trumpets and shouting.]

SCENE II.—Before the Senate-House.

Enter SEMPRONIUS, with the LEADERS of the Mutiny.

Sem. At length the winds are rais'd, the storm blows high!

Be it your care, my friends, to keep it up

In all its fury, and direct it right,

Till it has spent itself on Cato's head.

Meanwhile, I'll herd among his friends, and seem
One of the number, that, whate'er arrive,
My friends and fellow-soldiers may be safe. [Exit.]

Lead. We are all safe; Sempronius is our friend.

[Trumpets.]

But, hark, Cato enters. Bear up boldly to him;
Be sure you beat him down, and bind him fast;

This day will end our toils.
Fear nothing, for Sempronius is our friend.

Trumpets. Re-enter SEMPRONIUS, with CATO, LUCIUS, PORTIUS, MARCUS, and Guards.

Cato. Where are those, bold intrepid sons of war,

That greatly turn their backs upon the foe,
And, to their general, send a brave defiance?

Sem. Curse on their dastard souls, they stand astonish'd!

Cato. Perfidious men! And will you thus dishonour

Your past exploits, and sully all your wars?
Why could not Cato fall

Without your guilt? Behold, ungrateful men,
Behold my bosom naked to your swords,

And let the man that's injur'd strike the blow.
Which of you all suspects that he is wrong'd,

Or thinks he suffers greater ills than Cato?
Am I distinguish'd from you but by toils,

Superior toils, and heavier weight of cares?
Painful pre-eminence!

Sem. Confusion to the villains! all is lost!
[Aside.]

Cato. Hence, worthless men! hence! and complain to Cæsar,

You could not undergo the toil of war,
Nor bear the hardships that your leader bore.

Luc. See, Cato, see the unhappy men! they weep!

Fear and remorse, and sorrow for their crime,
Appear in every look, and plead for mercy.

Cato. Learn to be honest men, give up your leaders,

And pardon shall descend on all the rest.

Sem. Cato, commit these wretches to my care:
First let them each be broken on the rack,

Then with what life remains, impal'd, and left
To writhe at leisure, round the bloody stake;

There let them hang, and taint the southern wind.
The partners of their crime will learn obedience.

Cato. Forbear, Sempronius!—see they suffer
death,

But, in their deaths, remember they are men;
Lucius, the base degen'rate age requires

Severity.
When, by just vengeance, guilty mortals perish,
The gods behold the punishment with pleasure,
And lay th' uplifted thunderbolt aside.

Sem. Cato, I execute thy will with pleasure.
Cato. Meanwhile we'll sacrifice to liberty.

Remember, O, my friends! the laws the rights,
The generous plan of power, deliver'd down

From age to age by your renown'd forefathers,
(So dearly bought, the price of so much blood.)

Oh, let it never perish in your hands!
But piously transmit it to your children.

Do thou, great liberty! inspire our souls,
And make our lives in thy possession kappy,
Or our deaths glorious in thy just defence.

[Exeunt CATO, &c.]

1 Lead. Sempronius, you have acted like yourself:

One would have thought you had been half in Sem. Villain, stand off; base, grov'ling, worthless wretches,

Mongrels in faction, poor faint-hearted traitors!

2 Lead. Nay, now you carry it too far, Sem-pronius!

Throw off the mask, there are none here but friends.

Sem. Know, villains, when such paltry slaves presume

To mix in treason, if the plot succeeds,
They're thrown neglected by; but, if it fails,

They're sure to die like dogs, as you shall do.
Here, take these factious monsters, drag them

To sudden death. [forth]

1 Lead. Nay, since it comes to this—
Sem. Dispatch them quick, but first pluck out their tongues,

Lest with their dying breath they sow sedition.
[Exeunt Guards, with the Leaders of the Mutiny.]

Enter SYPHAX.

Syph. Our first design, my friend, has prov'd abortive;

Still there remains an after-game to play.
My troops are mounted;

Let but Sempronius head us in our flight,
We'll force the gate where Marcus keeps his guard,

And hew down all that would oppose our passage.
A day will bring us into Cæsar's camp. [pose:]

Sem. Confusion! I have fail'd of half my pur-
Marcia, the charming Marcia's left behind!

Syph. How! will Sempronius turn a woman's slave?

Sem. Think not thy friend can ever feel the soft
Unmanly warmth and tenderness of love.

Syphax, I long to clasp that haughty maid,
And bend her stubborn virtue to my passion:

When I have gone thus far, I'd cast her off.
Syph. What hinders, then, but that thou find her out,

And hurry her away by manly force?

Sem. But how to gain admission? For access is given to none but Juba and her brothers.

Syph. Thou shalt have Juba's dress and Juba's guards;

The doors will open, when Numidia's prince
Seems to appear before the slaves that watch them.

Sem. Heavens, what a thought is there! Mar-cia's my own!

How will my bosom swell with anxious joy,
When I behold her struggling in my arms,

With glowing beauty, and disorder'd charms,
While fear and anger, with alternate grace,

Pant in her breast, and vary in her face!
So Pluto seiz'd off Proserpine, convey'd

To hell's tremendous gloom th' affrighted maid;
There grimly smil'd, pleas'd with the beauteous prize,

Nor envied Jove his sunshine and his skies.
[Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Garden.

Enter LUCIA and MARCIA.

Lucia. Now tell me, Marcia, tell me from thy
If thou believ'st 'tis possible for woman [soul]

To suffer greater ills than Lucia suffers?
Marcia. Oh, Lucia, Lucia, might my big swollen
heart

Vent all its griefs, and give a loose to sorrow,
Marcia could answer thee in sighs, keep pace

With all thy woes, and count out tear for tear.

Lucia. I know thou'rt doom'd alike to be belov'd
By Juba, and thy father's friend, Sempronius:
But which of these has power to charm, like Portius?

Marcia. Still I must beg thee not to name Sempronius.

Lucia, I like not that loud, boisterous man. Juba, to all the bravery of a hero, Adds softest love and sweetness: he, I own, Might make indeed the proudest woman happy.

Lucia. But should this father give you to Sempronius?

Marcia. I dare not think he will: but if he should—

Why wilt thou add, to all the griefs I suffer, Imaginary ills and fancied tortures? I hear the sound of feet! They march this way, Let us retire, and try if we can drown Each softer thought in sense of present danger: When love once pleads admission to our hearts, In spite of all the virtues we can boast, The woman that deliberates is lost. [Exeunt.]

Enter SEMPRONIUS, dressed like JUBA, with Numidian Guards.

Sem. The deer is lodg'd, I've track'd her to her covert.

Be sure you mind the word, and, when I give it, Rush in at once, and seize upon your prey. How will the young Numidian rave, to see His mistress lost! If aught could glad my soul, Beyond th' enjoyment of so bright a prize, 'T would be to torture that young, gay barbarian. —But hark! what noise! Death to my hopes!

'tis he, 'Tis Juba's self! there is but one way left— He must be murder'd, and a passage cut Through those his guards.

Enter JUBA, with Guards.

Juba. What do I see? Who's this that dares usurp

The guards and habits of Numidia's prince?

Sem. One that was born to scourge thy arrogance, Presumptuous youth!

Juba. What can this mean? Sempronius!

Sem. My sword shall answer thee. Have at thy heart.

Juba. Nay, then, beware thy own, proud, barbarous man.

[They fight; SEMPRONIUS falls.]

Sem. Curse on my stars! Am I then doom'd to fall

By a boy's hand disfigur'd in a vile Numidian dress, and for a worthless woman? Gods, I'm distracted! this my close of life! Oh, for a peal of thunder, that would make Earth, sea, and air, and heaven, and Cato tremble! [Dies.]

Juba. With what a spring his furious soul broke loose.

And left the limbs still quivering on the ground! Hence, let us carry off those slaves to Cato, That we may there at length unravel all This dark design, this mystery of fate.

[Exit JUBA; his Guards taking those of SEMPRONIUS as prisoners.]

Enter LUCIA and MARCIA.

Lucia. Sure 'twas the clash of swords; my troubled heart

Is so cast down, and sunk amidst its sorrows, It throbs with fear, and aches at every sound. Oh, Marcia, should thy brothers, for my sake— I die away with horror at the thought!

Marcia. See, Lucia, see! here's blood! here's blood and murder!

Ha! a Numidian! Heaven preserve the prince! The face lies muffled up within the garment, But, ah! death to my sight! a diadem, And royal robes! O gods! 'tis he, 'tis he! Juba lies dead before us!

[ance] Lucia. Now, Marcia, now call up to thy assist— Thy wonted strength and constancy of mind; Thou canst not put it to a greater trial.

Marcia. Lucia, look there, and wonder at my patience; Have I not cause to rave, and beat my breast, To rend my heart with grief, and run distracted?

Lucia. What can I think, or say, to give thee comfort?

Marcia. Talk not of comfort; 'tis for lighter ills: Behold a sight that strikes all comfort dead.

Enter JUBA unperceived.

I will indulge my sorrows, and give way To all the pangs and fury of despair; That man, that best of men, deserv'd it from me.

Juba. What do I hear? and was the false Sempronius

That best of men? Oh, had I fallen like him, And could have been thus mourn'd, I had been happy. [Aside.]

Marcia. 'Tis not in fate to ease my tortured breast.

Oh, he was all made up of love and charms!

Whatever maid could wish, or man admire

Delight of every eye; when he appear'd,

A secret pleasure gladden'd all that saw him.

Oh, Juba, Juba!

Juba. What means that voice? Did she not call on Juba? [Aside.]

Marcia. He's dead, and never knew how much I lov'd him!

Lucia, who knows but his poor, bleeding heart, Amidst its agonies, remember'd Marcia, And the last words he utter'd call'd me cruel!

Alas! he knew not, hapless youth he knew not, Marcia's whole soul was full of love and Juba!

Juba. Where am I? Do I live? or am indeed What Marcia thinks? All is Elysium round me!

[Aside.] Marcia. Ye dear remains of the most lov'd of men,

Nor modesty nor virtue here forbid

A last embrace, while thus—

Juba. See, Marcia, see,

[Throwing himself before her.]

The happy Juba lives! he lives to catch That dear embrace, and to return it, too,

With mutual warmth and eagerness of love.

Marcia. With pleasure and amaze I stand transported!

If thou art Juba, who lies there?

Juba. A wretch

Disguis'd like Juba on a curs'd design.

I could not bear

To leave thee in the neighbourhood of death,

But flew, in all the haste of love, to find thee;

I found thee weeping, and confess this once

Am rapt with joy, to see my Marcia's tears.

Marcia. I've been surpris'd in an unguarded hour,

But must not now go back; the love, that lay Half-smother'd in my breast, has broke through all Its weak restraints, and burns in its full lustre I cannot, if I would, conceal it from thee.

Juba. My joy, my best below'd, my only wish!
How shall I speak the transport of my soul?

Marcia. Lucia, thy arm. Lead to my apartment.

Oh, prince! I blush to think what I have said,
But fate has wrested the confession from me;
Go on, and prosper in the paths of honour.
Thy virtue will excuse my passion for thee,
And make the gods propitious to our love.

[Exeunt MARCIA and LUCIA.]

Juba. I am so bless'd, I fear 'tis all a dream.
Fortune, thou now hast made amends for all
Thy past unkindness: I absolve my stars.
What though Numidia add her conquer'd towns
And provinces to swell the victor's triumph,
Juba will never at his fate repine:
Let Cæsar have the world, if Marcia's mine.

[Exit.]

SCENE II.—Before the Palace.—A March at a distance.

Enter CATO and LUCIUS.

Luc. I stand astonish'd! What, the bold Sempronius,
That still broke foremost through the crowd of pa-
As with a hurricane of zeal transported,
And virtuous e'en to madness—

Cato. Trust me, Lucius,
Our civil discords have produc'd such crimes,
Such monstrous crimes, I am surpris'd at nothing.
—Oh, Lucius, I am sick of this bad world!
The daylight and the sun grow painful to me.

Enter PORTIUS.

Rut see where Portius comes: what means this haste?

Why are thy looks thus chang'd?

Por. My heart is griev'd:
I bring such news as will afflict my father.

Cato. Has Cæsar shed more Roman blood?

Por. Not so.

The traitor Syphax, as within the square
He exercis'd his troops, the signal given,
Flew off at once with his Numidian horse
To the south gate, where Marcus holds the watch;
I saw, and call'd to stop him, but in vain:
He toss'd his arm aloft, and proudly told me,
He would not stay and perish like Sempronius.

Cato. Perfidious man! But haste, my son, and see

Thy brother Marcus acts a Roman's part.

[Exit PORTIUS.]

—Lucius, the torrent bears too hard upon me:
Justice gives way to force: the conquer'd world
Is Cæsar's! Cato has no business in it.

Luc. While pride, oppression, and injustice reign,

The world will still demand her Cato's presence,
In pity to mankind submit to Cæsar,
And reconcile thy mighty soul to life.

Cato. Would Lucius have me live to swell the number

Of Cæsar's slaves, or by a base submission
Give up the name of Rome, and own a tyrant?

Luc. The victor never will impose on Cato Ungenerous terms. His enemies confess
The virtues of humanity are Cæsar's.

Cato. Curse on his virtues! they've undone his country.

Such popular humanity is treason—

But see young Juba; the good youth appears,
Full of the guilt of his perfidious subjects!

Luc. Alas, poor prince! his fate deserves compassion.

Enter JUBA.

Juba. I blush, and am confounded to appear Before thy presence, Cato.

Cato. What 's thy crime?

Juba. I'm a Numidian.

Cato. And a brave one too. Thou hast a Roman soul. [men?]

Juba. Hast thou not heard of my false country-
Cato. Alas, young prince!

Falsehood and fraud shoot up in every soil,
The product of all climes—Rome has its Cæsars.

Juba. 'Tis generous thus to comfort the distress'd.

Cato. 'Tis just to give applause where 'tis deserv'd.

Thy virtue, prince, has stood the test of fortune,
Like purest gold, that, tortur'd in the furnace,
Comes out more bright, and brings forth all its weight.

Enter PORTIUS.

Por. Misfortune on misfortune! grief on grief!
My brother Marcus—

Cato. Ha! what has he done?

Has he forsook his post? Has he given way?

Did he look tamely on, and let them pass?

Por. Scarce had I left my father, but I met him

Borne on the shields of his surviving soldiers,

Breathless and pale, and cover'd o'er with wounds.

Long, at the head of his few faithful friends,

He stood the shock of a whole host of foes,

Till, obstinately brave, and bent on death,

Oppress'd with multitudes, he greatly fell.

Cato. I'm satisfied.

Por. Nor did he fall, before

His sword had pierc'd through the false heart of Syphax.

Yonder he lies, I saw the hoary traitor

Grin in the pangs of death, and bite the ground.

Cato. Thanks to the gods, my boy has done his duty.

—Portius, when I'm dead, be sure you place

His urn near mine.

Por. Long may they keep asunder!

Luc. Oh, Cato, arm thy soul with all its patience!

See where the corpse of thy dead son approaches!

The citizens and senators, alarm'd,

Have gather'd round it, and attend it, weeping.

Dead march. CATO meets the corpse. LUCIUS,
Senators, Guards, &c. attending.

Cato. Welcome, my son! Here lay him down,
my friends,

Full in my sight, that I may view at leisure

The bloody corse, and count those glorious wounds.

—How beautiful is death, when earn'd by virtue!

Who would not be that youth? What pity is it

That we can die but once to serve our country!—

Why sits this sadness on your brows, my friends?

I should have blush'd if Cato's house had stood

Secure, and flourish'd in a civil war.

Portius, behold thy brother, and remember

Thy life is not thy own, when Rome demands it.

When Rome demands!—But Rome is now no

more.

Oh, liberty! oh, virtue! oh, my country! [eyes

Juba. Behold that upright man! Rome fills his

With tears, that flow'd not o'er his own dead son

[Aside]

Cato. Whate'er the Roman virtue has subdu'd,
The sun's whole course, the day and year, are Cæsar's:

For him the self-devoted Decii died,
The Fabii fell, and the great Scipio's conquer'd:
Even Pompey fought for Cæsar. Oh, my friends!
How is the toil of fate, the work of ages,
The Roman empire, fallen! Oh, curs'd ambition!
Fallen into Cæsar's hands! Our great forefathers
Had left him nought to conquer but his country.

Juba. While Cato lives, Cæsar will blush to see Mankind enslav'd, and be asham'd of empire.

Cato. Cæsar asham'd! Has he not seen Pharsalia?

Luc. 'Tis time thou save thyself and us.

Cato. Lose not a thought on me; I'm out of danger:

Heaven will not leave me in the victor's hand.
Cæsar shall never say, he conquer'd Cato.
But oh, my friends! your safety fills my heart
With anxious thoughts; a thousand secret terrors
Rise in my soul. How shall I save my friends?
'Tis now, O Cæsar, I begin to fear thee!

Luc. Cæsar has mercy, if we ask it of him.

Cato. Then ask it, I conjure you! let him know

Whate'er was done against him, Cato did it.
Add, if you please, that I request it of him—
That I myself, with tears, request it of him—
The virtue of my friends may pass unpunish'd.
Juba, my heart is troubled for thy sake.
Should I advise thee to regain Numidia,
Or seek the conqueror?—

Juba. If I forsake thee

Whilst I have life, may Heaven abandon Juba!

Cato. Thy virtues, prince, if I foresee aright,
Will one day make thee great; at Rome, hereafter,
'T will be no crime to have been Cato's friend.
Portius, draw near:—my son, thou oft has seen
Thy sire engag'd in a corrupted state,
Wrestling with vice and faction: now thou seest me
Spent, overpower'd, despairing of success;
Let me advise thee to retreat betimes
To thy paternal state, the Sabine field;
Where the great Censor toil'd with his own hands,
And all our frugal ancestors were bless'd
In humble virtues, and a rural life;
There live retir'd, pray for the peace of Rome;
Content thyself to be obscurely good.

When vice prevails, and impious men bear sway,
The post of honour is a private station.

Por. I hope my father does not recommend
A life to Portius; that he scorns himself.

Cato. Farewell, my friends! If there be any of you

Who dare not trust the victor's clemency,
Know there are ships prepar'd, by my command,
That shall convey you to the wish'd-for port.
Is there aught else, my friends, I can do for you?
The conqueror draws near. Once more, farewell!
If e'er we meet hereafter, we shall meet
In happier climes, and on a safer shore,
Where Cæsar never shall approach us more.

[Pointing to his dead son.

There the brave youth, with love of virtue fir'd,
Who greatly in his country's cause expir'd,
Shall know he conquer'd. The firm patriot
there,

Who made the welfare of mankind his care,
Though still by faction, vice, and fortune cross'd,
Shall find the generous labour was not lost.

[Dead march; exeunt in funeral procession.

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Chamber.

CATO, solus, sitting in a thoughtful posture; in his hand, Plato's Book on the Immortality of the Soul; a drawn Sword on the table, by him.

Cato. It must be so—Plato, thou reason'st well—
Else whence this pleasing hope, this fond desire,
This longing after immortality?

Or whence this secret dread, this inward horror,
Of falling into nought! Why shrinks the soul
Back on herself, and startles at destruction?

'Tis the divinity that stirs within us;
'Tis Heaven itself that points out an hereafter,
And intimates eternity to man.

Eternity! thou pleasing, dreadful thought!
Through what variety of untried being, [pass?

Through what new scenes and changes, must we
The wide, the unbounded prospect lies before me:
But shadows, clouds, and darkness rest upon it.
Here will I hold. If there's a power above us
(And that there is, all Nature cries aloud

Through all her works,) he must delight in virtue;
And that which he delights in must be happy,
But when, or where?—This world was made for Cæsar.

I'm weary of conjectures;—this must end them.

[Laying his hand on his sword.

Thus am I doubly arm'd: my death and life,

My bane and antidote, are both before me.

This in a moment brings me to an end;

But this informs me I shall never die.

The soul, secur'd in her existence, smiles

At the drawn dagger, and defies its point.

The stars shall fade away, the sun himself

Grow dim with age, and Nature sink in years,

But thou shalt flourish in immortal youth,

Unhurt amidst the war of elements,

The wreck of matter, and the crush of worlds.

What means this heaviness that hangs upon me?

This lethargy that creeps through all my senses?

Nature, oppress'd and harrass'd out with care,

Sinks down to rest. This once I'll favour her,

That my awaken'd soul may take her flight,

Renew'd in all her strength, and fresh with life,

An offering fit for Heaven. Let guilt or fear

Disturb man's rest, Cato knows neither of them,
Indifferent in his choice, to sleep or die.

Enter PORTIUS.

But, ha! who's this? my son! Why this intrusion?

Were not my orders that I would be private?

Why am I disobey'd?

Por. Alas, my father!

What means this sword, this instrument of death?
Let me convey it hence.

Cato. Rash youth, forbear.

Por. Oh, let the prayers, th' entreaties of your friends, [you.

Their tears, their common danger, wrest it from Cato. Wouldst thou betray me? Wouldst thou give me up

A slave, a captive, into Cæsar's hands?

Retire and learn obedience to a father,

Or know, young man—

Por. Look not thus sternly on me;

You know, I'd rather die than disobey you.

Cato. 'Tis well! again I'm master of myself.

Now, Cæsar, let thy troops beset our gates,

And bar each avenue; thy gathering fleets

O'erspread the sea, and stop up every port;

Cato snail open to himself a passage,
And mock thy hopes.—

Por. [Kneeling.] Oh, Sir, forgive your son,
Whose grief hangs heavy on him. Oh, my father!
How am I sure it is not the last time
I e'er shall call you so? Be not displeas'd,
Oh, be not angry with me whilst I weep,
And, in the anguish of my heart, beseech you
To quit the dreadful purpose of your soul!

Cato. Thou hast been ever good and dutiful.

[Embracing him.]

Weep not, my son, all will be well again;
The righteous gods, whom I have sought to please,
Will succour Cato, and preserve his children.

Por. Your words give comfort to my drooping heart. [i.e. duct:]

Cato. Portius, thou may'st rely upon my con-
Thy father will not act what misbecomes him.
But go, my son, and see if aught be wanting
Among thy father's friends; see them embark'd,
And tell me if the winds and seas befriend them.
My soul is quite weigh'd down with care, and asks
The soft refreshment of a moment's sleep.

Por. My thoughts are more at ease, my heart
revives— [Exit CATO.]

Enter MARCIA.

Oh, Marcia! Oh, my sister! still there's hope
Our father will not cast away a life
So needful to us all, and to his country.
He is retir'd to rest, and seems to cherish [hence
Thoughts full of peace.—He has despatch'd me
With orders that bespeak a mind compos'd,
And studious for the safety of his friends:
Marcia, take care that none disturb his slumbers.

[Erit.]

Marcia. Oh, ye immortal powers, that guard the just,

Watch round his couch, and soften his repose,
Banish his sorrows, and becalm his soul
With easy dreams; remember all his virtues,
And show mankind that goodness is your care!

Enter LUCIA.

Lucia. Where is your father, Marcia, where is Cato?

Marcia. Lucia, speak low, he is retired to rest.
Lucia, I feel a gentle dawning hope
Rise in my soul—we shall be happy still.

Lucia. Alas, I tremble when I think on Cato!
In every view, in every thought, I tremble!
Cato is stern and awful as a god;
He knows not how to wink at human frailty,
Or pardon weakness, that he never felt.

Marcia. Though stern and awful to the foes of Rome,

He is all goodness, Lucia, always mild;
Compassionate and gentle to his friends;
Fill'd with domestic tenderness, the best,
The kindest father; I have ever found him
Easy and good, and bounteous to my wishes.

Lucia. 'Tis his consent alone can make us bless'd.

But who knows Cato's thoughts?
Who knows how yet he may dispose of Portius,
Or how he has determined of thyself? [Heaven.]

Marcia. Let him but live, commit the rest to Enter LUCIUS.

Luc. Sweet are the slumbers of the virtuous man!
Oh, Marcia, I have seen thy godlike father;
Some power invisible supports his soul,

And bears it up in all its wonted greatness.
A kind, refreshing sleep is fallen upon him:
I saw him stretch'd at ease; his fancy lost
In pleasing dreams; as I drew near his couch,
He smil'd, and cried, Cæsar, thou canst not hurt
me.

Marcia. His mind still labours with some dreadful thought.

Enter JUBA.

Juba. Lucius, the horsemen are return'd from viewing

The number, strength, and posture of our foes,
Who now encamp within a short hour's march;
On the high point of yon bright western tower
We ken them from afar; the setting sun
Plays on their shining arms and burnish'd helmets,
And covers all the field with gleams of fire.

Luc. Marcia, 'tis time we should awake thy father.

Cæsar is still dispos'd to give us terms,
And waits at distance till he hears from Cato.

Enter PORTIUS

Portius, thy looks speak somewhat of importance.
What tidings dost thou bring? Methinks I see
Unusual gladness sparkle in thy eyes.

Por. As I was hastening to the port, where now
My father's friends, impatient for a passage,
Accuse the lingering wind, a sail arriv'd
From Pompey's son, who, through the realms of Spain,

Calls out for vengeance on his father's death,
And rouses the whole nation up to arms.
Were Cato at their head, once more might Rome
Assert her rights, and claim her liberty.

[A groan is heard.]

But, hark! what means that groan?—Oh, give me way,

And let me fly into my father's presence! [Erit.]

Luc. Cato, amidst his slumbers, thinks on Rome,
And, in the wild disorder of his soul,
Mourns o'er his country.—Ha! a second groan—
Heaven guard us all!

Marcia. Alas, 'tis not the voice
Of one who sleeps; 'tis agonizing pain—
'Tis death is in that sound—

Re-enter PORTIUS.

Por. Oh, sight of wo!
Oh, Marcia, what we fear'd is come to pass!
Cato has fallen upon his sword—

Luc. Oh, Portius,
Hide all the horrors of thy mournful tale,
And let us guess the rest.

Por. I've raised him up,
And plac'd him in his chair; where, pale and faint,
He gasps for breath, and, as his life flows from
him,

Demands to see his friends. His servants, weep-
Obsequious to his order, bear him hither!—

Marcia. Oh, Heaven! assist me in this dreadful hour,

To pay the last sad duties to my father!

CATO brought on in a chair.

Juba. These are thy triumphs, thy exploits, O
Cæsar!

Luc. Now is Rome fall'n indeed!

Cato. Here set me down—

Portius, come near me.—Are my friends embark'd?
Can any thing be thought of for their service?

Whilst I yet live, let me not live in vain—
 Oh, Lucius, art thou here?—Thou art too good—
 Let this our friendship live between our children—
 Make Portius happy in thy daughter Lucia.
 Marcia, my daughter—
 Oh, bend me forward!—Juba loves thee, Marcia.
 A senator of Rome, while Rome surviv'd,
 Would not have match'd his daughter with a king— [tion—
 But Cæsar's arms have thrown down all distinc-
 I'm sick to death—Oh, when shall I get loose
 From this vain world, th' abode of guilt and sorrow!
 And yet, methinks, a beam of light breaks in
 On my departing soul. Alas, I fear
 I've been too hasty!—Oh, ye powers, that search
 The heart of man, and weigh his inmost thoughts,
 If I have done amiss, impute it not—
 The best may err, but you are good, and—Oh!

[Dies.
Luc. There fled the greatest soul that ever warm'd

A Roman breast.—Oh, Cato! oh, my friend!
 Thy will shall be religiously observ'd.
 But let us bear this awful corpse to Cæsar,
 And lay it in his sight, that it may stand
 A fence betwixt us and the victor's wrath:
 Cato, though dead, shall still protect his friends.

From hence, let fierce contending nations know,
 What dire effects from civil discord flow:
 'Tis this that shakes our country with alarms,
 And gives up Rome a prey to Roman arms;
 Produces fraud, and cruelty, and strife,
 And robs the guilty world of Cato's life. [Exeunt.

EPILOGUE.

WRITTEN BY DR. GARTH.

WHAT odd fantastic things we women do!
 Who would not listen when young lovers woo?
 But die a maid, yet have the choice of two!

Ladies are often cruel to their cost:
 To give you pain, themselves they punish most.
 Vows of virginity should well be weigh'd;
 Too oft they're cancell'd, though in convents
 made.
 Would you revenge such rash resolves—you may
 Be spiteful—and believe the thing we say,
 We hate you when you're easily said nay.
 How needless, if you knew us, were your fears!
 Let love have eyes, and beauty will have ears.
 Our hearts are form'd as you yourselves would choose,
 Too proud to ask, too humble to refuse:
 We give to merit, and to wealth we sell:
 He sighs with most success that settles well.
 The woes of wedlock with the joys we mix:
 'Tis best repenting in a coach and six.
 Blame not our conduct, since we but pursue
 Those lively lessons we have learn'd from you.
 Your breasts no more the fire of beauty warms,
 But wicked wealth usurps the power of charms.
 What pains to get the gaudy things you hate,
 To swell in show, and be a wretch in state.
 At plays you ogle, at the ring you bow;
 E'en churches are no sanctuaries now:
 There, golden idols all your vows receive,
 She is no goddess that has nought to give.
 Oh, may once more the happy age appear,
 When words were artless, and the thoughts sincere:
 When gold and grandeur were unenvied things,
 And courts less coveted than groves and springs:
 Love then shall only mourn when truth complains,
 And constancy feel transport in its chains:
 Sighs with success their own soft anguish tell,
 And eyes shall utter what the lips conceal:
 Virtue again to its bright station climb,
 And beauty fear no enemy but time;
 The fair shall listen to desert alone,
 And every Lucia find a Cato's son.

FORTUNE'S FROLIC:

A FARCE,

IN TWO ACTS.

BY JOHN TILL ALLINGHAM, Esq.

REMARKS.

THIS excellent farce turns on the circumstance of an honest peasant succeeding to the title and estate of a lord, and on the use that he makes of his unexpectedly-acquired wealth; being thus enabled to evince feelings that would confer honour on the noblest hereditary rank. "Proud wealth!" exclaims Frank, "look here for an example!"—The proudest, indeed, need not be ashamed to follow it.

This after-piece continues, as it well deserves to be, a favourite with the theatrical part of the public.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Hall in the Castle.

Enter MR. FRANK.

Frank. To what humiliation has my bad fortune reduced me, when it brings me here an humble suppliant to my base oppressor!

Enter SNACKS, speaking.

Snacks. A letter for me by express! What can it be about? Something of great consequence from my lord, I suppose.—Frank here! What the devil can he want?—Come a begging though, I dare say.

Frank. Good morning to you, Mr. Snacks.

Snacks. Good morning. [Coldly.]

Frank. I'm come, Sir, to— I say, Sir, I'm come to—

Snacks. Well, Sir, I see you are come; and what then? What are you come for, Sir?

Frank. The termination of the lawsuit which you have so long carried on against me, owing to my entire inability to prosecute it any further, has thrown me into difficulties which I cannot surmount without your kind assistance.

Snacks. Very pretty, indeed! You are a very modest man, Mr. Frank: you've spent your last shilling in quarrelling with me, and now you want me to help you.

Frank. The farm called Hundred Acres is at present untenanted—I wish to rent it.

Snacks. You wish to rent it, do you? And pray, Sir, where's your money? And what do you know about farming?

Frank. I have studied agriculture; and, with care, have no doubt of being able to pay my rent regularly.

Snacks. But I have a great doubt about it.—No, no, Sir; do you think I'm so unmindful of his lordship's interest as to let his land to a poor novice like you? It wont do, Mr. Frank; I can't think of it—Good day, friend; good day.

[Showing him the door.]

Frank. My necessities, Sir—

Snacks. I have nothing to do with your necessities, Sir; I have other business—Good day—There's the door.

Frank. Unfeeling wretch!

Snacks. What!

Frank. But what could I expect? Think not thou sordid man, 'tis for myself I sue—my wife, my children—'tis for them I ask your aid, or else my pride had never stooped so low! my honest poverty is no disgrace: your ill-gotten gold gives you no advantage over me; for I had rather feel my heart beat freely, as it does now, than know that I possessed your wealth, and load it with the crimes entailed upon it. [Exit.]

Snacks. A mighty fine speech, truly! I think I'll try if I can't lower your tone a little, my fine, blustering fellow: I'll have you laid by the heels before night for this. Proud as you are, you'll have time to reflect in a jail, and bring down your spirit a little. But come, let me see what my letter says. What a deal of time I've lost with that beggar!

[Reads.]
Sir,—This is to inform you that my Lord Lackwit died—an heir to his estate—his lordship never acknowledged her as his wife—son called Robin Roughhead—Robin is the legal heir to the estate—to put him in immediate possession, according to his lordship's last will and testament. Yours to command, KIT CODICIL, Attorney at law.

Here's a catastrophe! Robin Roughhead a lord! My stewardship has done pretty well for me already, but I think I shall make it do better now. I know this Robin very well; he's devilish cunning, I'm afraid; but I'll tickle him. He shall marry my daughter—then I can do as I please. To be sure I have given my promise to Rattle; but what of that? he hasn't got it under my hand. I think I had better tell Robin this news at once; it will make him mad—and then I shall do as I please with him. Ay, ay, I'll go. How unfortunate that I did not make friends with him before! He has no great reason to like me; I never gave him any thing but hard words.—[RATTLE sings without.] Confound it, here's that fellow Rattle coming.

Enter RATTLE.

Rat. Ah, my old daddy! how are you?—What! have you got the mumps—can't you speak?
Snacks. I wish you had the mumps, and could not speak. What do you old daddy me for?

Rat. Why, father-in-law: curse me but you are most conceitedly crusty to-day; what's the matter with you? why you are as melancholy as a lame duck.

Snacks. The matter is—that I am sick.

Rat. What's your disorder?

Snacks. A surfeit: I've had too much of you.

Rat. Oh! you'll soon get the better of that; for when I've married your daughter, curse me if I shall trouble you much with my company!

Snacks. But you haven't married her yet.

Rat. Oh, but I shall soon; I have got your promise, you know.

Snacks. Can't remember any such thing.

Rat. No! your memory's very short then.

Snacks. A short memory's very convenient, sometimes.

Rat. And so is a short stick; and I've a great mind to try the utility of it now. I tell you what, Snacks,—I always thought you was a damned old rascal, but now I'm sure of it: it's no matter, though: I'll marry your daughter notwithstanding.

Snacks. You will—will you?

Rat. Yes, Snacks, I will; for I love her. I wonder how the devil such a pretty girl ever came to have such a queer, little, shrivelled, old mopstick as you for a father. Snacks, your wife most certainly made a cuckold of you; it could not be else.

Snacks. Impudent rascal!

Rat. But it signifies not who her father is; Miss Nancy is lovely, and I'll marry her. Let me see—five thousand pounds you promised; yes, you shall give her that on the wedding-day. You have been a steward a long time; that sum must be a mere flea-bite to you.

Snacks. I rather think I shall never give her a farthing if she marries such a paltry fellow as you.

Rat. Why lookye; I'm a lively spark, with a good deal of fire in me, and it is not a little matter that will put me out: where others sink, I rise; and this opposition of yours will only serve to blow me into a blaze that will burn you up to cinder. I'm up to your gossip; I'm not to be had.

Snacks. No, nor my daughter's not to be had, Mr. Banker's Clerk; so I sha'n't waste any more time with you: go, and take in the flats in Lombard-street; it wont do here. [Exit.]

Rat. Oh! what he has mizzled, has he? I fancy you'll find me the most troublesome blade you ever settled an account with, old Raise-rent. I'll astonish you some how or other. I wonder what has changed him so!

Enter MISS NANCY.

Ah, my sweet, little, rural angel! How fares it with you? You smile like a May morning.

Nan. The pleasure of seeing you always makes me—

Rat. Indeed! give me a kiss then. I love you well enough to marry you without a farthing; but I think I may as well have the five thousand pounds, if it's only to tease old Long-purse.

Nan. Oh, you know you have his promise for that.

Rat. Yes, but he says he has forgot all about that, though it was no longer ago than yesterday; and he says I sha'n't have you.

Nan. Does he, indeed?

Rat. Yes; but never mind that.

Nan. I thought you said you loved me?

Rat. And so I do, better than all the gold in Lombard-street.

Nan. Then why are you not sorry that my father wont give his consent?

Rat. His consent! I have got yours and my own, and I'll soon manage him. Don't you remember how I frightened him one night, when I came to visit you by stealth, dressed like a ghost, which he thinks haunts the castle? Oh! I'll turn that to account. I know he's very superstitious, and easily frightened into any thing. Come, let's take a walk, and plot how I, your knight-errant, shall deliver you from this haunted castle.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Corn-field.

ROBIN ROUGHHEAD discovered, binding up a sheaf.

Rob. Ah! work, work, work, all day long, and no such thing as stopping a moment to rest! for there's old Snacks the steward, always upon the look out; and if he sees one, slap he has it down in his book, and then there's sixpence gone plump. [Coming forward.] I do hate that old chap, and that's the truth on't. Now, if I was lord of this place, I'd make one rule—there should be no such thing as work; it should be one long holiday all the year round. Your great folks have strange whims in their heads, that's for sartin. I don't know what to make of 'un, not I. Now there's all yon great park there, kept for his lordship to look at, and his lordship has not seen it these twelve years—Ah! if it was mine, I'd let all the villagers turn their cows in there, and it should not cost 'em a farthing; then, as the parson said last Sunday, I should be as rich as any in the land, for I should have the blessings of the poor. Dang it! here comes Snacks.' Now I shall get a fine jobation, I suppose.

Enter SNACKS, bowing very obsequiously; ROBIN takes his hat off, and stands staring at him.

Rob. I be main tired, Master Snacks; so I stopt to rest myself a little; I hope you'll excuse it.—I wonder what the dickens he's grinning at.

[Aside.]

Snacks. Excuse it! I hope your lordship's infinite goodness and condescension will excuse your lordship's most obsequious, devoted, and very humble servant, Timothy Snacks, who is come into the presence of your lordship, for the purpose of informing your lordship—

Rob. Lordship! he, he, he! Ecod! I never knew as I nad a hump before. Why, Master Snacks, you grow funny in your old age.

Snacks. No, my lord, I know my duty better; I should never think of being funny with a lord.

Rob. What lord? Oh, you mean the Lord Harry, I suppose. No, no, must not be too funny with him, or he'll be after playing the very devil with you.

Snacks. I say, I should never think of jesting with a person of your lordship's dignified character.

Rob. Did—dig—What! Why now I look at you, I see how it is: you are mad. I wonder what quarter the moon's in. Lord! how your eyes roll! I never saw you so before.—How come they to let you out alone?

Snacks. Your lordship is most graciously pleased to be facetious.

Rob. Why, what gammon are you at?—Don't come near me, for you have been bit by a mad dog; I'm sure you have.

Snacks. If your lordship, will be so kind as to read this letter, it would convince your lordship—Will your lordship condescend?

Rob. Why, I would condescend, but for a few reasons, and one of 'em is, that I can't read.

Snacks. I think your lordship is perfectly right; for these pursuits are too low for one of your lordship's nobility.

Rob. Lordship, and lordship again! I'll tell you what, Master Snacks—let's have no more of your fun, for I won't stand it any longer, for all you be steward here: my nome's Robin Roughead, and if you don't choose to call me by that name, I sha'n't answer you, that's flat.—[Aside.] I don't like him well enough to stand his jokes.

Snacks. Why then, Master Robin, be so kind as to attend whilst I read this letter. [Reads.]

Sir,—This is to inform you, that my Lord Lackwit died this morning, after a very short illness; during which he declared that he had been married, and had an heir to his estate: the woman he married was commonly called or known by the name of Roughead: she was poor and illiterate, and, through motives of shame, his lordship never acknowledged her as his wife; she has been dead some time since, and left behind her a son called Robin Roughead: now this said Robin is the legal heir to the estate. I have therefore sent you the necessary writings to put him into immediate possession, according to his lordship's last will and testament. Yours to command,

KIR CODICIL, Attorney at Law.

Rob. What!—What all mine? the houses, the trees, the fields, the hedges, the ditches, the gates, the horses, the dogs, the cats, the cocks and the hens, and the cows and the bulls, and the pigs and the—What! are they all mine? and I, Robin Roughead, am the rightful lord of all this estate!—Don't keep me a minute now, but tell me it is so—Make haste, tell me—quick, quick!

Snacks. I repeat it, the whole estate is yours.

Rob. Huzza! Huzza! [Catches off SNACKS' hat and wig.] Set the bells a ringing; set the ale a running; make every body drunk—if there's a sober man to be found any where to-day he shall be put in the stocks. Go get my hat full of guineas to make a scramble with; call all the tenants together. I'll lower the rents—I'll—

Snacks. I hope your lordship will do me the favour to—

Rob. Why, that may be as it happens; I can't tell. [Carelessly.]

Snacks. Will your lordship dine at the castle to-day?

Rob. Yes.

Snacks. What would your lordship choose for dinner?

Rob. Beef-steaks and onions, and plenty of 'em.

Snacks. Beef-steaks and onions! What a dish for a lord!—He'll be a savoury bit for my daughter, though. [Aside.]

Rob. What are you at there, Snacks? Go, get me the guineas—make haste; I'll have the scramble, and then I'll go to Dolly, and tell her the news.

Snacks. Dolly! Pray, my lord, who's Dolly?

Rob. Why Dolly, is to be my lady, and your mistress, if I find you honest enough to keep you in my employ.

Snacks. He rather smokes me.—I have a beautiful daughter, who is allowed to be the very pink of perfection.

Rob. Damn your daughter! I have got some thing else to think of: don't talk to me of your daughter; stir your stumps, and get the money.

Snacks. I am your lordship's most obsequious—Lounds! what a peer of the realm.

[Aside; exit.]

Rob. Ha, ha, ha! What work I will make in the village!—Work! no, there shall be no such a thing as work: it shall be all play.—Where shall I go? I'll go to—No, I won't go there; I'll go to Farmer Hedgestake's, and tell him—No, I'll not go there;—I'll go to—Damn it, I'll go no where; yes, I will; I'll go every where; I'll be neither here, nor there, nor any where else. How pleased Dolly will be when she hears—

Enter VILLAGERS, shouting.

Dick, Tom, Jack, how are you, my lads?—Here's news for you! Come stand round, make a ring, and I'll make a bit of a speech to you, [They all get round him.] First of all, I suppose Snacks has told you that I'm your landlord?

Vil. We are all glad of it.

Rob. So am I; and I'll make you all happy: I'll lower all your rents.

All. Huzza! Long live Lord Robin!

Rob. You sha'n't pay no rent at all.

All. Huzza! huzza! long live Lord Robin!

Rob. I'll have no poor people in the parish, for I'll make 'em all rich; I'll have no widows, for I'll marry 'em all. [Women shout.] I'll have no orphan children, for I'll father 'em all myself; and if that's not doing as a lord should do, then I say I know nothing about the matter—that's all.

All. Huzza! Huzza!

Enter SNACKS.

Snacks. I have brought your lordship the money.—He means to make 'em fly, so I have taken care the guineas shall be all light. [Aside.]

Rob. Now then, young and old, great and small, little and tall, merry men all, here's among you—[Throws the money; they scramble.] Now you've got your pockets filled, come to the castle, and I'll fill all your bellies for you.

[Villagers carry him off, shouting; SNACKS follows.]

SCENE III.—Inside of a neat Cottage; table spread for Dinner.

MARGERY and DOLLY discovered.

Dol. There now, dinner's all ready, and I wish Robin would come. Do you think I may take up the dumplings, mother?

Mar. Ay, ay, take 'em up; I warrant him he'll soon be here—he's always in pudding-time.

Dol. And well he may, for I'm sure you keep him sharp set enough.

Mar. Hold your tongue, you baggage! He pays me but five shillings a week for board, lodging, and washing—I suppose he's not to be kept like a lord for that, is he? I wonder how you'll keep him when you get married, as you talk of!

Dol. Oh, we shall contrive to make both ends meet! and we shall do very well, I dare say: for Robin loves me, and I loves Robin dearly.

Mar. Yes; but all your love wont keep the pot boiling, and Robin's as poor as Job.

Dol. La, now, mother, don't be so cross!—Oh dear, the dinner will get cold, and the dumplings will be quite spoiled; I wish Robin would come. [Robin sings without.] Oh, here he comes, in one of his merry humours.

Enter ROBIN; he cools himself with his hat, then sings and dances.

Why, Robin, what's the matter with you?

Rob. What! you haven't heard then? Oh, I'm glad of that! for I shall have the fun of telling you.

Dol. Well, sit down then, and eat your dinner; I have made you some nice hard dumplings.

Rob. Dumplings! Damn dumplings.

Dol. Damn dumplings—La, mother, he damns dumplings.—Oh, what a shame! Do you know what you are saying, Robin?

Rob. Never talk to me of dumplings.

Mar. But I'll talk of dumplings though, indeed, I shouldn't have thought of such behaviour: dumplings are very wholesome food, quite good enough for you, I'm sure. [Very angry.]

Rob. Are they, mother Margery? [Upsets the table, and dances on the plates, &c. and sings.] Tol de rol lol.

Mar. Oh dear! the boy's mad; there's all my crockery gone! [Picking up the pieces.]

Dol. [Crying.] I did not think you could have used us so; I am quite ashamed of you, Robin!

Rob. Now doantye cry now, Dolly; doantye cry.

Dol. I will cry, for you behave very ill.

Rob. No, doantye, Dolly, doantye, now.—

[Shows a purse.]

Dol. How did you come by that, Robin?

Mar. What, a purse of gold? let me see. - [Snatches it, and sits down to count the money.]

Dol. What have you been about Robin?

Rob. No, I have not been about robbing; I have been about being made a lord of, that's all.

Dol. What are you talking about? Your head's turn'd, I'm sure.

Rob. Well, I know it's turn'd; it's turned from a clown's head to a lord's. I say, Dolly, how should you like to live in that nice place at the top of the hill yonder?

Dol. Oh, I should like it very much, Robin; it is a nice cottage.

Rob. Doant talk to me of cottages, I mean the castle!

Dol. Why, what is your head running upon?

Mar. Every one golden guineas, as I'm a virtuous woman. Where did you get 'em, Robin?

Rob. Why, where there's more to be had.

Mar. Ay, I always said Robin was a clever lad.—I'll go and put these by. [Exit.]

Dol. Now, do tell me what you've been about. Where did you find all that money?

Rob. Dolly, Dolly, gee'us a buss, and I'll tell thee all about it.

Dol. Twenty, an' you pleasen, Robin.

Rob. First then, you must know that I am the cleverest fellow in all these parts.

Dol. Well, I know'd that afore.

Rob. But I'll tell you how it is—it's because I am the richest fellow in all these parts; and if I haven't it here, I have it here—[Pointing to his head and his pocket.] That castle's mine, and all these fields, up to the very sky.

Dol. No, no; come, Robin, that wont do.

Rob. Wont it?—I think it will do very well.

Dol. No, no; you are running your rigs—I know you are, Robin.

Rob. It's all true, Dolly, as sure as the devil's in Lunnun.

Dol. What! are you in right down arnest?

Rob. Yes, I am—his lordship's dead, and he has left word as how that my mother was his wife, and I his son.

Dol. What!

Rob. Yes, Dolly, and you shall be my lady.

Dol. No! Shall I?

Rob. Yes, you shall.

Dol. Ecod, that will be fine fun—my lady—

Rob. Now, what do you think on't?

Dol. My lady—Lady Roughead—

Rob. Why, Dolly!

Dol. Lady Roughead! How it sounds!—Ha, ha, ha! [Laughs immoderately.]

Rob. 'Gad I believe she's going into a high strike—Dolly! Dolly! [Slapping her hands.]

Dol. Ha, ha, ha!

Rob. Doantye laugh so; I don't half like it. [Shakes her.] Dolly!

Dol. Oh, my dear Robin, I can't help laughing to think of Lady Roughead.

Rob. The wench will go beside herself to a sartainty.

Dol. But now is it true in arnest?

Rob. Ay, as sure as you are there. But come, what shall we do? where shall we go? Oh! we'll go and see old mother Dickens; you know she took my part, and was very kind to me when poor mother died; and now she's very ill, and I'll go and give her something to comfort her old soul. Lord! Lord! I have heard people say as riches wont make a body happy; but while it gives me the power of doing so much good, I'm sure I shall be the happiest dog alive.

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The Road to the Castle.

Enter MR. FRANK.

Frank. Well, then, to the house of wo I must return agsin. And can I take no comfort with me? nothing to cheer my loving wife and helpless children? What misery to see them want!

Enter ROBIN, unobserved by FRANK.

Rob. Want! No, there shall be no such thing as want where I am—Who talks of want?

Frank. My own distress I could bear well, very well; but to see my helpless innocents enduring all the woes poverty brings with it, is more than I can bear.

Rob. And more than I can bear too.

[Throws his hat upon the ground, and takes money out of his pocket, which he throws into it.]

Frank. To-day I almost fear they have not tasted food.

Rob. And I ha' been stuffing my damned guts enough to make 'em burst.

[Drops more money into his hat.]

Frank. How happy once my state! Where'er I turned my eyes, good fortune smiled upon me; then, did the poor e'er tell a tale of wo without relief? Were not my doors open to the unfortunate?

Rob. How glad I be as I be—a lord. Hey, what! Yes it is; Mr. Frank. Lord, Sir, I'm very glad as I met with you.

Frank. Why so, my friend?

Rob. Because you be mortal poor, and I be mortal rich; and I'll share my last farthing with you.

Frank. Thank you my kind lad. But what reason have you?

Rob. What reason have I? Why, you gave me when I wanted it.

Frank. I can't remember.

Rob. Mayhap not; but that's no reason as I should forget it; it's a long time ago, too; but it made such a mark here, that time wont rub it out. It's now fourteen years sin' poor mother died; she was very ill one day when you happened to some by our cottage, and saw me stand blubbering at the door; I was then about this high. You took me by the hand; and I shall never forget the look you gave me, when you axed me what was the matter with me; and when I told you, you called me a good lad, and went in and talked to mother. From that time you came to see her every day, and gave her all the help as you could; and when she died, poor soul! you buried her: and if ever I forget such kindness, I hope good luck will for ever forget me!

Frank. Tell me your name; it will remind me.

Rob. Robin Roughhead, your honour; to-day I be come to be lord of all this estate; and the first good I find of it is, that I am able to make you happy—[Stuffing the money into his pockets.] Come up to the castle, and I'll give you as much money as you can carry away in a sack.

Frank. Proud wealth, look here for an example! My generous heart, how shall I thank you?

Rob. Lord! Lord! doant think of thanking a man for paying his debts. Besides, if you only knowed how I feel all o'er me—it's a kind of a—I could cry for joy.

Frank. What sympathy is in that honest bosom! But how has this good fortune come to you?

Rob. Why, that poor woman as you buried was wife to his lordship: he has owned it on his death-bed, and left word as I'm his son.

Frank. How strange are the vicissitudes of life!

Rob. Now, Sir, I am but a simple lad, as a body may say; and if you will but be so good as to help we with your advice, I shall take it very kind of you, Sir.

Frank. I thank you for the good opinion you have of me; and as far as my poor abilities go, they shall be at your service.

Rob. Thank ye, Sir, thank ye! But pray what bad luck made you so devilish poor?

Frank. It would take a long time to tell you the story of my misfortunes; but I owe them to the oppression of Mr. Snacks, the steward.

Rob. Snacks! Oh, damn un! I'll do for him soon: he's rotten here, Master Frank: I do think as how he's a damned old rogue.

Frank. Judge not too harshly.

Rob. Come, Sir, will you go up to the castle?

Frank. Excuse me; the relief which you have so generously given me, enables me to return to my family.

Rob. Well, but you'll come back?

Frank. To-morrow.

Rob. No—to-night—Doo'e favour me; I want to speak to you.

Frank. I have a long way to walk, and it will be very late before I can return; but I will refuse you nothing.

Rob. Thank ye, Sir; you're very kind; I shall stay till you come, if it's all night. [Exeunt.]

Enter RATTLE.

Rat. Well, every thing's prepared for my attack on the castle to-night; and I dont much fear but I shall find means to terrify the enemy, and make him surrender at discretion—Yes, yes, Master Snacks, I shall soon be with you. [Shouting, music, and ringing of bells without.] What a damned racket here is in the village to-day!—I wonder what it's all about?

Enter ROBIN.

Holloa, there! Stop, my fine fellow. Pray can you tell me what all this uproar is about in the village?

Rob. Why, you be Master Rattle from Lunnun.

Rat. Well, I don't want to be told that.

Rob. Gee us your hand, Rattle, thou bee'st a damned honest fellow, and I like thee; I do indeed.

Rat. Very familiar, upon my word.

Rob. I liked you ever sin' you let old Toppin have the three pounds to pay his rent with; and now whilst I think on't, here 'tis again—take it, for I wont let any body give away money here but myself.

Rat. Why, what in the name of wonder is all this? What are you at? I think I'll open a shop here for the sale of bad debts.

Rob. Here, take the money.

Rat. Put it up, my fine fellow! you'll want it, perhaps.

Rob. Me want money! Shall I lend you an odd thousand, and set you up in a shop!

Rat. Why, who the devil are you ?

Rob. Why doan't you know ? I be Robin.

Rat. Robin, are you ? 'Egad, I think you sing like a goldfinch.

Rob. Very well, Rattle, that's a good joke.

Rat. Why, curse me, if I am up to you, Master Robin ; you are queering me, I believe.

Rob. Well, I shall be glad to see thee at the castle, Rattle. You see, I'm not ashamed of my old acquaintance, as some folks are.

Rat. Not ashamed of his old acquaintance ! Why, what do you mean ?

Rob. I can't stop to talk to you any longer—Good by, Rattle ; thou bee'st an honest fellow ; and I shall be glad to see thee at the castle. [Exit.]

Rat. I declare I'm quite dumb-founded.—And have I lived all my days in Lombard-street for this—to be hummed by a clown ? [Laughing, music, ringing of bells, &c. without.] I believe the people are all mad to-day ; I can't think what they are at.

Enter CLOWN, in a hurry.

Here, here, Hob ! I want to speak with you.

Clown. You mun meak heast then, for I be going to dine wi' my lord, and I shall be too late.

Rat. Weugh ! What, are you drunk ?

Clown. Noa, noa, but I soon shall be, I take it, for there's plenty o'yeale to be gotten.

Rat. Plenty o'yeale to be gotten, is there ?

Clown. Ees, I shall have a rare swig at it.

Rat. Pray, my fine fellow, can you tell me what the bells are ringing for ?

Clown. Ees, to be sure I con.

Rat. Well, what is it ?

Clown. Why, it's bekeas they do pull the ropes, I tell thee.—[Gets round.] Dinner will all get yeaton up whilst I stond here talking wi' you.

[Runs off ; RATTLE runs after him, and brings him back.]

Rat. You are a very communicative young fellow, indeed—I have learned one thing from you, however—that there's plenty 'of eating and drinking going on ; so I'll try if I can't be in at the death. Now, start fair, and the devil take the hindmost. [They run off.]

SCENE II.—A Hall in the Castle. A door leading to an inner apartment.

Enter SNACKS, speaking.

Snacks. Tell her to come this way. A young woman wanting Robin !—This must be his sweetheart Dolly, that he talks so much about ; they must not come together ; if they do, it will knock up all my plan.—What shall I do with her ? if I could but get her into room, she'd be safe enough—here she is.

Enter DOLLY and MARGERY.

Are you the young woman that wanted to speak with his lordship ?

Dol. Yes, Sir.

Snacks. And pray what might you want with him ?

Mar. She wants to settle some matters of her own with him.

Dol. Yes, that's all, Sir.

Snacks. I dare say ! But I must know what these matters are.

[MARGERY feels herself of great importance, and is particularly noisy through the whole of this scene. SNACKS is alarmed lest ROBIN should hear her.

Mar. Such matters as concern nobody but themselves, and you must not meddle with them.

Snacks. Curse that old devil, what a tongue she has ! I shall never be able to manage her. [Aside.] You can't see his lordship, he's engaged.

[To DOLLY.]

Dol. Yes, I know his lordship's engaged, for he promised me a long while ago.

Snacks. Oh, then you are the poor unfortunate young woman that—

Mar. [Very angry.] No, Sir : she is the lucky young woman that is to be my lady ; and I'd have you to know that I'm her mother.

Snacks. Ah, poor soul ! I pity her, I do indeed, from the bottom of my heart.

Mar. But she is not to be pitied ; I shouldn't have thought of that !—pity, indeed !

Snacks. Poor dear creature ! it's a sad job, but it can't be helped : his lordship is going to be married to-morrow to another woman.

Dol. What !

Snacks. It's true, indeed ; I am very sorry.

Mar. And she is not to be my lady, after all !

Snacks. No, poor girl !

Dol. And Robin has quite forgot me ! [Crying.] Oh dear, oh dear !—I was afraid how it would be when he came to be a lord—and has he quite forgot me ?

Snacks. Yes, he told me to tell you that he has done with you.

Mar. [Very noisy.] But I have not done with him though—pretty work indeed ; but I'll ring a peal in his ears, that shall bring him to his senses, I warrant ; I'll teach him to use my daughter ill—he's a rogue, a rascal, a scapegallows, a vagabond ; I'll find him out—I'll—

Snacks. [Trying to appease her.] Hush ! hush !

Mar. I'll raise the dead, I will.

Snacks. Be cool, be cool !—Robin will certainly hear this old bell-weather, and I shall be blown.

Mar. I'll make him down on his knees, I will ; I'd have him to know, that though he is a lord, he shall remember his promise ; I'll play the very devil with him, if I can find him. I'm in such a passion, I could tear his eyes out : oh, if I can but see him ! [Going ; SNACKS stops her.]

Snacks. Here, here ; stop, stop—I'll go and bring him to you.—Curse her old throat ! [Aside.] Only just walk in here a moment, I'll talk to him myself ; I will indeed ; perhaps I shall bring him round, my dear.

Dol. Thank ye, Sir ; tell him I'll kill myself if he doesn't marry me. [Goes in.]

Mar. And tell him I'll kill him if he doesn't marry her. [Goes in. SNACKS locks the door.]

Snacks. Well, they are safe for the present—I wish they were out of the house though. If I can but bring this marriage to bear, I'm a made man. I have been very careful of the old lord's money, and I should like to take care of a little of the young lord's money : if I can but marry the girl and him, I'll soon double the twenty-six thousand pounds I have in the five per cents. sacked from my old master.

Rat. [Without, in a hollow voice.] Villanous robber !

Snacks. O Lord ! what's that ?—[Pauses.] It has put me in such a fright ;—that ghost's abroad again—What else could it be ? I am afraid to open my eyes for fear he should stare me in the face: I confess I've been a rogue, but it's never too late to mend. Say no more, and I'll make amends, indeed I will. [Gets near the door.]—Upon my soul, I will—upon the word of an honest man, I will. [Snicks off.]

Enter RATTLE.

Rat. Ha, ha, ha! I think I gave his conscience a kick there; twenty-six thousand pounds in the five per cents.—let me remember that—I'm up to your tricks, Mr. Snacks; but you sha'n't carry on your scheme much longer, if I have any skill.—If I don't quicken your memory a little, I'll give over conjuring, and set up a chandler's shop. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—A handsome Apartment in the Castle. A table with wines, &c.

ROBIN and SNACKS discovered.

Rob. [Rather tipsy.] Well, Snacks, this is very good stuff. I don't know as ever I drank any before; what do you call this, Snacks?

Snacks. Port wine, an't please your lordship.

Rob. Yes, Port wine pleases his lordship—I wonder where this comes from!—Oh! from the Red Sea, I suppose.

Snacks. No, my lord: there's plenty of spirits there, but not wine, I believe.

Rob. Well, one more thing full; only one, because you know, now I am a lord, I must not make a beast of myself—that's not like a nobleman, you know.

Snacks. Your lordship must do as your lordship pleases.

Rob. Must I? then give us t'other sup.

Snacks. I think his lordship is getting rather forward—I'll bring my daughter upon the carpet presently. [Aside.]

Enter SERVANT.

Serv. Please you, Master Snacks, here's John the carter says he's so lame he can't walk, and he hopes you'll let him have a pony, to-morrow, to ride by the waggon.

Snacks. Can't walk, can't he?—lame, is he?

Serv. Yes, Sir.

Snacks. And what does he mean by being lame at this busy time?—tell him he must walk; it's my will.

Rob. You, Sir, bring me John's whip, will you? [Exit SERVANT.] That's right, Snacks; damn the fellow, what business has he to be lame!

Snacks. Oh, please your lordship, it's as much as I can do to keep these fellows in order.

Rob. Oh, they are sad dogs—not walk, indeed! I never heard of such impudence.

Snacks. Oh, shameful, shameful! if I was behind him, I'd make him walk.

Enter a Servant, with a whip, which he gives to ROBIN.

Rob. Come, Snacks, dance me a hornpipe.

Snacks. What?

Rob. A hornpipe.

Snacks. A hornpipe!—I can't dance my lord.

Rob. Come none of your nonsense; I know you can dance; why, you was made for dancing—there's a leg and foot—Come, begin!

Snacks. Here's no music.

Rob. Isn't there? then I'll soon make some—Lookye, here's my fiddlestick; how d'ye like it?

—Come, Snacks, you must dance; it's my will. Snacks. Indeed I'm not able.

Rob. Not able! Oh, shameful, shameful! Come, come, you must dance; it's my will.

[Whips him.]

Snacks. Must I?—Then here goes—

[Hops about.]

Rob. What, d'ye call that dancing fit for a lord? Come, quicker, quicker—[Whips Snacks round the stage, who roars out.]—There, that will do; now go and order John the carter the pony—will you?

Snacks. What a cunning dog it is!—he's up to me now, but I think I shall be down upon him by and by—

[Aside; exit.]

Rob. Ha, ha, ha! how he hopped about and halloo'd—but I'll work him a little more yet.

Re-enter SNACKS.

Well, Snacks, what d'ye think of your dancing-master?

Snacks. I hope your lordship wont give me any more lessons at present; for, to say the truth, I don't much like the accompaniment.

Rob. You must have a lesson every day, or you'll forget the step.

Snacks. No;—your lordship has taken care that I sha'n't forget it for some time.

Rob. I can't think where Dolly is; I told her to come to me.

Snacks. Oh, don't think of her.

Rob. Not think of her!—why, pray?

Snacks. Oh, she's a—

Rob. A what?—Take care, or I shall make you dance another hornpipe.

Snacks. I only mean to say, that she's too low for your lordship.

Rob. Too low! why, what was I just now?—if I thought riches would make me such a rascal as to use the poor girl ill—a fig for 'em all; I'd give 'em up, and be plain Robin, honest Robin, again. No;—I've given Dolly my promise, and I'll never break it.

Snacks. My daughter's very beautiful.

Rob. Dang it, you talk a great deal:—come, we'll go and have a look at her. [Exeunt]

SCENE IV.—A Chamber, with a picture hanging over a closet-door.

Enter RATTLE and MISS NANCY.

Rat. Well, you see I've gained admission, notwithstanding your father's order to the contrary.

Nan. Yes; but how do you mean to get his consent to—

Rat. Why, as to his consent, I don't value it a button: but then five thousand pounds is a sum not to be sneezed at. I have given the old boy a bit of a hint to-night that he didn't much relish.

Nan. I expect my father here every minute, with his new-made lordship.

Rat. Indeed! then only hide me in this room, and the business is done.

Nan. That I will, where nobody can find you, I'm sure;—I have a closet behind this picture of the old lord, made, I believe, to hide the family plate and jewels in; but it's quite forgotten now.

[Opens it.]

Rat. Oh, it was made on purpose for me: I'll put a jewel into it presently—Here [Gives a paper.]—let this lie carelessly on the table; it's worth five thousand pounds.

Snacks. [Without.] This way, this way, my lord.

Rat. O, damn it! here they come; tell him you've been frightened by a ghost; and if he signs the paper, give a loud cough.

[Puts the paper on the table, and exit into the closet.]

Enter SNACKS and ROBIN.

Snacks. There, there she is— isn't she a beauty? What do you say now?

Rob. Why, I say she is not fit to hold a candle to my Dolly.

Nan. Pretty courtship, indeed.

Snacks. Ah, you'll alter your mind soon; I know you will. Come, let's sit down and talk of it.

[They sit.]

Nan. [To SNACKS.] Oh, my dear Sir, I've been so frightened—Do you know I think I've seen the very ghost that alarmed you so once.

Snacks. A what? a ghost?—O Lord, I hope not. I hate the very sight of 'em:—It's very odd; but—[Starting.] didn't I hear a noise?

Nan. Oh, Sir, that's a very common thing in this part of the castle; I have been most terribly frightened lately.

Rob. Why, what frightened you?—We are all good people here; they wont hurt us—will they, Snacks?

Snacks. No, no—they—that is— [Alarmed.]

Rat. [From behind.] Hear!

Rob. What?

Rat. Hear!

Snacks. Lord ha' mercy upon me! [Kneels.]

Rat. Offspring of mine, listen not to the advice of that wretch.

Rob. I doan't intend it.

Rat. He'll betray you; your intended bride he has imprisoned in the yellow chamber: go, set her at liberty.

Rob. What! my Dolly?—has he imprisoned her in the yellow chamber?—Oh, dang your old head! [Knocks SNACKS down, and exit.]

Rat. Wretch restore your ill-gotten wealth—twenty-six thousand pounds in the five per cents.

Snacks. I'll do any thing that you command.

Rat. Sign the paper before you.

[SNACKS signs the paper. NANCY coughs, RATTLE jumps out of the closet, and takes the paper.]

Rat. How do you do? how are you?

Snacks. Give me the paper.

Rat. Not a word—twenty-six thousand pounds in the five per cents.—Now, dear Nancy, you are mine, and five thousand pounds.

Snacks. You to rebel against me too, you baggage.

Mar. [Without.] Only let me catch hold of him, I'll give it him—an old, abominable—

Enter MARGERY.

Oh, you are there, are you?—You wicked wretch—let me get at him—[Runs after SNACKS, and beats him.—A pretty pack of lies you have told; you old ragamuffin, you.

Enter ROBIN and DOLLY.

Rob. What! are you there, Rattle?

Rat. Yes, I'm the ghost—Hear!

Rob. Why you frightened old Honesty a little.

Enter SERVANT.

Serv. Please you, Master Snacks, the bailiff ha' gotten Mr. Frank, and are bringing him here.

Rob. What! the bailiffs got him?—Oh, you old rascal! [To SNACKS.—Let him come here in a moment! [Exit SERVANT.—Oh, Snacks, I'm sorry for you; for I'm sure you can't be happy—a man as does so much harm, and so little good, never can be happy, I'm sure:—

Enter MR. FRANK.

I am very sorry as they used you so, Mr. Frank, but I couldn't—

Frank. I know your heart too well to think you could.

Rob. I have a great favour to ask you, Mr. Frank: you see we've rather found Snacks out!—now, will you—dang it, will you take care of me, and come and live in the castle with me, and give me your advice?—you know how I mean;—teach me a bit, you know.

Frank. You are too generous: but I accept your proffered kindness; and, by my care and attention to your welfare, will repay a small part of the debt I owe you.

Rob. Now, then, I am happy, with such a friend as Mr. Frank—Dolly, we shall know how to take care of ourselves and our neighbours—and I'll take care that poor folks shall bless the day as made me a lord. [Exeunt.]

THE PADLOCK:

A COMIC OPERA,

IN TWO ACTS.

BY ISAAC BICKERSTAFF.

REMARKS.

This pleasing entertainment was set to music by the late Mr. Charles Dibdin, who also played the part of Mungo, in so capital and original a style, as to contribute greatly to the very uncommon success of this piece which was acted fifty-three nights during its first season. The plot is principally taken from a Spanish novel, by Cervantes, called, "The Jealous Husband."

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

DON DIEGO,.....	Mr. Bellamy.
LEANDER,.....	Mr. Taylor.
MUNGO,.....	Mr. Blanchard.
LEONORA,.....	Miss Bolton.
URSULA,.....	Mrs. Davenport.

Scholars, &c.

SCENE.—Salamanca.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Garden belonging to DON DIEGO'S House.

Enter DON DIEGO, musing.

ATR.—DIEGO.

Thoughts to council—let me see—

Hum—to be or not to be—

A husband, is the question.

A cuckold! must that follow?

Say what men will,

Wedlock's a pill,

Bitter to swallow,

And hard of digestion.

But fear makes the danger seem double:

Say, Hymen, what mischief can trouble

My peace, should I venture to try you?

My doors shall be lock'd,

My windows be block'd;

No male in my house,

Not so much as a mouse;

Then horns, horns I defy you.

Diego. Ursula!

Enter URSULA.

Urs. Here, an't please your worship.

Vol. I. . . . 2 S

Diego. Where is Leonora?

Urs. In her chamber, Sir.

Diego. There is the key of it; there the key of the best hall; there the key of the door upon the first flight of stairs; there the key of the door upon the second; this double locks the hatch below; and this the door that opens into the entry.

Urs. I am acquainted with every ward of them.

Diego. You know, Ursula, when I took Leonora from her father and mother, she was to live in the house with me three months; at the expiration of which time, I entered into a bond of four thousand pistoles, either to return her to them spotless, with half that sum for a dowry, or make her my true and lawful wife.

Urs. And, I warrant you, they came secretly to inquire of me whether they might venture to trust your worship. "Lord!" said I, "I have lived with the gentleman nine years and three quarters, come Lammas, and never saw any thing uncivil by him in my life;" nor no more I ever did; and, to let your worship know, if I had, you would have mistaken your person; for I bless Heaven, though I'm poor, I'm honest, and would not live with any man alive that should want to handle me unlawfully.

Diego. Ursula, I do believe it; and you are particularly happy, that both your age and your person exempt you from any such temptation. But be this as it will, Leonora's parents, after some little difficulty, consented to comply with my proposal; and, being fully satisfied with their daughter's temper and conduct, which I wanted to be acquainted with, this day being the expiration of the term, I am resolved to fulfil my bond, by marrying her to-morrow.

Urs. Heaven bless you together.

Diego. During the time she has lived with me, she has never been a moment out of my sight: and now, tell me, Ursula, what have you observed in her?

Urs. All meekness and gentleness, your worship: and yet I warrant you, shrewd and sensible, 'egad, when she pleases, she can be as sharp as a needle.

Diego. You have not been able to discover any particular attachments?

Urs. Why, Sir, of late I have observed—

Diego. Eh! how! what?

Urs. That she has taken greatly to the young kitten.

Diego. O! is that all?

Urs. Ay, by my faith, I don't think she's fond of any thing else.

Diego. Of me, Ursula?

Urs. Ay, ay, of the kitten, and your worship, and her birds, and going to mass. I have taken notice of late, that she is mighty fond of going to mass, as your worship lets her early of a morning.

Diego. Well! I am now going to her parents, to let them know my resolution; I will not take her with me, because, having been used to confinement, and it being the life I am determined she shall lead, it will be only giving her a bad habit. I shall return with the good folks to-morrow morning; in the meantime, Ursula, I confide in your attention; and take care, as you would merit my favour.

Urs. I will, indeed, your worship; nay, if there is a widow gentlewoman in all Salamanca fitter to look after a young maiden—Diego. Go, and send Leonora to me.

AIR.—URSULA.

I know the world, Sir, though I say't:

I'm cautious and wise,
And they who suppose
My prudence nodding
Must sit up late.

Never fear, Sir,
Your safety's here, Sir;
Yes, yes,
I'll answer for Miss.

Let me alone,
I warrant my care
Shall weigh to a hair,
As much as your own.

[Exit.]

Diego. I dreamed last night that I was going to church with Leonora, to be married, and that we were met on the road by a drove of oxen—oxen—I don't like oxen! I wish it had been a drove of sheep.

[Retires.]

Enter LEONORA, with a Bird on her finger, which she holds in the other hand by a string.

AIR.—LEONORA.

Say, little, foolish, fluttering thing,
Whither, ah! whither would you wing
Your airy flight?
Stay here, and sing,
Your mistress to delight.

No, no, no,
Sweet Robin, you shall not go:
Where, you wanton, could you be,
Half so happy as with me?

Diego. [Coming forward.] Leonora.

Leon. [Putting the Bird into the cage.] Here I am.

Diego. Look me in the face, and listen to me attentively.

Leon. There.

Diego. I am going this evening to your father and mother, and I suppose you are not ignorant of the cause of my journey. Are you willing to be my wife?

Leon. I am willing to do whatever you and my father and mother please.

Diego. But that's not the thing; do you like me?

Leon. Y—es.

Diego. What do you sigh for?

Leon. I don't know.

Diego. When you came hither, you were taken from a mean little house, ill situated, and worse furnished; you had no servants, and were obliged, with your mother, to do the work yourself.

Leon. Yes; but when we had done, I could look out at the window, or go a walking into the fields.

Diego. Perhaps, you dislike confinement?

Leon. No, I don't, I am sure.

Diego. I say, then, I took you from that mean habitation and hard labour, to a noble building, and this fine garden; where, so far from being a slave, you are absolute mistress; and, instead of wearing a mean stuff gown, look at yourself, I beseech you; the dress you have on is fit for a princess.

Leon. It's very fine, indeed.

Diego. Well, Leonora, you know in what manner you have been treated since you have been my companion; ask yourself again now, whether you can be content to lead a life with me according to the specimen you have had!

Leon. Specimen!

Diego. Ay, according to the manner I have treated you—according—

Leon. I'll do whatever you please.

Diego. Then, my dear, give me a kiss.

Leon. Good bye to you.

Diego. Here, Ursula.

AIR.

By some I am told
That I'm wrinkled and old,
But I will not believe what they say;
I feel my blood mounting,
Like streams in a fountain,
That merrily sparkle and play.

For love I have will
And ability still;

Odsbobs, I can scarcely refrain!

My diamond, my pearl—

Well, be a good girl,

Until I come to you again. [Exit.]

Leon. Heigho! He's very good to me, to be sure, and it's my duty to love him, because we ought not to be ungrateful; but I wish I was not to marry him for all that, though I'm afraid to tell him so. Fine feathers, they say, make fine birds; but I'm sure they don't make happy ones; a sparrow is happier in the fields, than a goldfinch in a cage. There is something makes me mighty uneasy. While he was talking to me, I thought I never saw any thing so ugly in my life—O dear now, why did I forget to ask leave to go to mass to-morrow? I suppose, because he's abroad, Ursula wont take me—I wish I had asked leave to go to mass.

AIR.

Was I a shepherd maid, to keep
On yonder plains a flock of sheep,
Well-pleas'd, I'd watch the live-long day,
My ewes at feed, my lambs at play.

Or would some bird that pity brings,
But for a moment lend its wings,
My parents then might rave and scold,
My guardian strive my will to hold;
Their words are harsh, his walls are high,
But spite of all away I'd fly. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Street in Salamanca.

Enter LEANDER and two SCHOLARS, in their University gowns.

Leand. His name is Don Diego, there's his house, like another monastery, or rather prison; his servants are an ancient duenna, and a negro slave—

1 Schol. And after having lived fifty years a bachelor, this old fellow has picked up a young thing of sixteen, whom he by chance saw in a balcony!

2 Schol. And are you in love with the girl?

Leand. To desperation; and I believe I am not indifferent to her; for, finding that her jealous guardian took her to the chapel of a neighbouring convent every morning before it was light, I went there in the habit of a pilgrim, planting myself as near her as I could; I then varied my appearance, continuing to do so from time to time, till I was convinced she had sufficiently remarked, and understood my meaning.

1 Schol. Well, Leander, I'll say that for you, there is not a more industrious lad in the university of Salamanca, when a wench is to be ferreted.

2 Schol. But prythee, tell us now how did you get information?

Leand. First from report, which raised my curiosity; and afterwards from the negro I just now mentioned; I observed that, when the family was gone to bed, he often came to air himself at yonder grate; you know I am no bad chanter, nor a very scurvy minstrel; so, taking a guitar, clapping a black patch on my eye, and a swathe upon one of my legs, I soon scraped acquaintance with my friend Mungo. He adores my songs and sarabands; and, taking me for a poor cripple, often repays me with a share of his allowance; which I accept, to avoid suspicion.

1 Schol. And so—

Leand. And so, Sir, he hath told me all the secrets of his family; and one worth knowing; for he informed me last night, that his master will this evening take a short journey into the country, from whence he proposes not to return till to-morrow, leaving his young wife, that is to be, behind him.

2 Schol. Zounds! let's scale the wall.

Leand. Fair and softly; I will this instant go and put on my disguise, watch for the Don's going out, attack my negro afresh, and try, if by his means, I cannot come into the house, or at least get a sight of my charming angel.

1 Schol. Angel! is she then so handsome?

Leand. It is time for us to withdraw: come to my chambers, and there you shall know all you can desire.

SCENE III.—The outside of DON DIEGO'S House; which appears with windows barred up, and an iron grate before an entry.

Enter DON DIEGO from the house, having first unlocked the door, and removed two or three bars which assisted in fastening it.

Diego. With the precautions I have taken, I think I run no risk in quitting my house for a short time; Leonora has never shown the least inclination to deceive me; besides, my old woman is prudent and faithful; she has all the keys, and will not part with them from herself; but suppose—suppose—by the rood of St. Francis, I will not leave it in her power to do mischief; a woman's not having it in her power to deceive you, is the best security for her fidelity, and the only one a wise man will confer in; fast bind, safe bind, is an excellent proverb. I'll e'en lock her up with the rest; there is a hasp to the door, and I have a padlock within, which shall be my guarantee; I will wait till the negro returns with the provisions he is gone to purchase; and clapping them all up together, make my mind easy by having the key they are under in my pocket. [Retires.]

Enter MUNGO, with a hamper.

Mun. Go, get you down, you damn hamper, you carry me now. Curse my old massa, sending me always here and dere for one something to make me tire like a mule—curse him impurance—and him damn insurance.

Diego. How now?

Mun. Ah, massa! bless your heart.

Diego. What 's that you are muttering, sirrah?

Mun. Nothing, massa, only me say you very good massa.

Diego. What do you leave your load down there for?

Mun. Massa, me lily tire.

Diego. Take it up, rascal.

Mun. Yes, bless your heart, massa.

Diego. No, lay it down: now I think on't, come hither.

Mun. What you say, massa?

Diego. Can you be honest?

Mun. Me no savee, massa, you never ax me before.

Diego. Can you tell truth?

Mun. What you give me, massa?

Diego. There's a pistreen for you; now tell me, do you know of any ill going on in my house?

Mun. Ah, massa, a damn deal.

Diego. How! that I'm a stranger to?

Mun. No, massa, you lick me every day with your rattan; I'm sure, massa, that's mischief enough for poor neger man.

Diego. So, so.

Mun. La, massa, how could you have a heart to lick poor neger man, as you lick me last Thursday?

Diego. If you have not a mind I should chastise you now, hold your tongue.

Mun. Yes, massa, if you no lick me again.

Diego. Listen to me, I say.

Mun. You know, massa, me very good servant—

Diego. Then you will go on?

Mun. And ought to be use kine—

Diego. If you utter another syllable—

Mun. And I'm sure, massa, you can't deny but I worky worky—I dress a victuals, and run a errands, and wash a house, and make a beds, and scrub a shoes, and wait a table.

Diego. Take that. [Strikes him.] Now will you listen to me?

Mun. La, massa, if ever I saw—

Diego. I am going abroad, and shall not return till to-morrow morning. During this night I charge you not to sleep a wink, but be watchful as a lynx, and keep walking up and down the entry, that if you hear the least noise you may alarm the family. Stay here, perverse animal, take care that nobody approaches the door; I am going in, and shall be out again in a moment. [Exit.]

Mun. So, I must be stay in a cold all night, and have no sleep, and get no tanks neither; then him call me tief, and rogue, and rascal, to tempt me.

AIR.

Dear heart, what a terrible life am I led!
A dog has a better, that's shelter'd and fed:
Night and day 'tis de same,
My pain is dere game:
Me wish to de Lord me was dead.

Whate'er's to be done,
Poor blacky must run;
Mungo here, Mungo dere,
Mungo every where;
Above and below,
Sirrah, come; sirrah, go;
Do so, and do so,
Oh! oh!

Me wish to de Lord me was dead. [Exit.]

Re-enter DON DIEGO, with URSULA, who, after the Negro goes in, appears to bolt the door on the inside: then DON DIEGO, unseen by them, puts on a large Padlock and goes off. After which, LEANDER enters disguised.

Leand. So—my old Argus is departed, and the evening is as favourable for my design as I could wish. Now to attract my friend Mungo; if he is within hearing of my guitar, I am sure he will quickly make his appearance.

Mun. [Appears at the window.] Who goes dere?—Hip! hollo!

Leand. Heaven bless you, my worthy master, will your worship's honour have a little music this evening?

Mun. Stay you little—I come down.

[Comes down to the grate.]

Leand. I have got a bottle of delicious cordial here, given me by a charitable monk of a convent hard by, if your grace will please to taste it.

Mun. Give me a sup tro a grate; come close, man, don't be fear, old massa gone out, as I say last night, and he no come back before to-morrow; come, trike moosic, and give us song.

Leand. I'll give your worship a song I learned in Barbary, when I was a slave among the Moors.

Mun. Ay, do.

Leand. There was a cruel and malicious Turk, who was called Heli Abdallah Mahomet Sciah, who had fifty wives and three hundred concubines.

Mun. Poor man! what did he do wid 'em all?

Leand. Now this wicked Turk had a fair Christian slave named Jezebel, who not consenting to his beastly desires, he draws out his sabre, and is going to cut off her head; here 's what he says to her. [Sings and plays.] Now you shall hear the slave's answer. [Sings and plays.] Now you shall hear how the wicked Turk, being greatly enraged, is again going to cut off the fair slave's head. [Sings and plays again.] Now you shall hear—

Mun. What signify me hear?—Me no understand.

Leand. Oh, you want something you understand? If your honour had said that—

Urs. [Appears at the window above.] Mungo! Mungo!

Mun. Some one call dere—

Urs. Mungo, I say.

Mun. What devil you want?

Urs. What lewd noise is that?

Mun. Lewd yourself, no lewd here; play away, never mind her.

Urs. I shall come down, if you go on.

Mun. Ay, come along, more merrier: nothing here but poor man; he sing for bit of bread.

Urs. I'll have no poor man near our door; harkye, fellow, can you play the Forsaken Maid's Delight, or Black Bess of Castile? Ah, Mungo, if you had heard me sing when I was young.

Mun. 'Gad, I am sure I hear your voice often enough now you old.

Urs. I could quaver like any blackbird.

Mun. And now you halloo like a screech-owl.—Come, throw a poor soul a penny, he play a tune for you.

Urs. How did you lose the use of your leg?

Leand. In the wars, my good dame: I was taken by a Barbary corsair, and carried into Saltee, where I lived eleven years and three-quarters upon cold water and the roots of the earth, without having a coat on my back, or laying my head on a pillow: an infidel bought me for a slave: he gave me the strappado on my shoulders, and the bastinado on the soles of my feet: now, as I said before, this infidel Turk had fifty-three wives, and one hundred and twelve concubines.

Urs. Then he was an unreasonable villain.

Leon. [Appears at another window.] Ursula!

Urs. Odds my life, what's here to do! Go back, go back; fine work we shall have indeed! good man, good bye.

Leon. I could not stay any longer by myself; pray let me take a little air at the grate.

Leand. Do, worthy Madam; let the young gentlewoman stay: I'll play her a love song for nothing.

Urs. No, no, none of your love-songs here; if you could play a saraband indeed, and there was room for one's motion—

Leand. I am but a poor man, but if your ladyship will let me in as far as the hall or the kitchen, you may all dance, and I sha'n't ask any thing.

Urs. Why, if it was not on my master's account, I should think no harm in a little innocent recreation.

Mun. Do, and let us dance.

Leand. Has Madam the keys then?

Urs. Yes, yes, I have the keys.

Leand. Have you the key of this padlock too, Madam? Here 's a padlock upon the door, Heaven help us, large enough for a state prison.

Urs. Eh—how—what, a padlock!

Mun. Here it is, I feel it? adod, it's a tump.

Urs. He was afraid to trust me then.

Mun. And if de house was a fire, we none of us get out to save ourselves.

Leand. Well, Madam, not to disappoint you and the young lady, I know the back of your garden wall, and I'll undertake to get up at the outside of it, if you can let me down on the other.

Urs. Do you think you could with your lame leg?

Leand. O yes, Madam, I am very sure.

Urs. Then by my faith you shall, for now I'm set on't—A padlock! Mungo, come with me into the garden.

[MUNGO and URSULA going off, LEANDER and LEONORA are left together. The first part of the quartetto is sung by them in duet; then MUNGO and URSULA return one after another to the stations they had quitted.]

Leon. Pray, let me go with you.

Leand. Stay, charming creature: why will you fly the youth that adores you?

Leon. Oh, Lord, I'm frightened out of my wits!

Leand. Have you not taken notice, beauteous Leonora, of the pilgrim who has so often met you at church? I am that pilgrim; one who would change shapes as often as Proteus, to be blessed with a sight of you.

QUARTETT.—LEANDER, LEONORA, URSULA, and MUNGO.

Leand. O thou, whose charms enslave my heart!

In pity hear a youth complain:

Leon. I must not hear—dear youth, depart—

I'm certain I have no desert

A gentleman like you to gain.

Leand. Then do I seek your love in vain?

Leon. It is another's right;

Leand. And he,

Distracting thought! must happy be,

While I am doom'd to pain.

Urs. Come round, young man, I've been to try.

Mun. And so have I.

I'm sure the wall is not too high.

If you please,

You'll mount with ease.

Leand. Can you to aid my bliss deny?

Shall it be so?

If you say no,

I will not go.

Leon. I must consent, however loth;

28

But whenever we desire,
Make him promise to retire.

Urs. Nay, marry, he shall take his oath.

Leand. By your eyes of heavenly blue,
By your lips' ambrosial dew;
Your cheeks, where rose and lily blend:
Your voice, the music of the spheres—

Mun. Lord o' mercy, how he swears!

He makes my hairs

All stand an end!

Urs. Come, that's enough, ascend, ascend,

Let's be happy while we may:

Now the old one 's far away,

Laugh, and sing, and dance, and play;

Harmless pleasure, why delay?

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Hall in DON DIEGO'S House, with folding-doors, which open in the back scene.

On one side a staircase, leading to an apartment, by which the characters pass up and down; on the other, a door leading to a cellar, which is so contrived, that a bottle and glass, two candles, a guitar, and LEANDER'S disguise, may be placed upon it.

Enter URSULA, followed by LEANDER in a rich habit.

Urs. Oh, shame! out upon't, Sir, talk to me no more; I that have been famed throughout all Spain, as I may say, for virtue and discretion; the very flower and quintessence of duennas! you have cast a blot upon me, a blot upon my reputation, that was as fair as a piece of white paper; and now I shall be reviled, pointed at; nay, men will call me filthy names upon your account.

Leand. What filthy names will they call you?

Urs. They'll say I'm an old procuress.

Leand. Fie, fie, men know better things—besides, though I have got admittance into your house, be assured I shall commit no outrage here; and if I have been guilty of any indiscretion, let love be my excuse.

Urs. Well, as I live, he's a pretty young fellow.

Leand. You, my sweet Ursula, have known what it is to be in love, and I warrant have had admirers often at your feet; your eyes still retain fire enough to tell me that.

Urs. They tell you no lie; for, to be sure, when I was a young woman, I was greatly sought after; nay, it was reported that a youth died for love of me; one Joseph Perez, a tailor by trade, of the grayhound make, lank; and, if my memory fail me not, his right shoulder about the breadth of my hand higher than his left: but he was upright as an arrow, and, by all accounts, one of the finest workmen at a button-hole.

Leand. But where is Leonora?

Urs. Where is she? by my troth, I have shut her up in her chamber, under three bolts and a double lock.

Leand. And will you not bring us together?

Urs. Who, I?—How can you ask me such a question? Really, Sir, I take it extremely unkind.

Leand. Well, but you misapprehend—

Urs. I told you just now, that if you mentioned that to me again, it would make me sick; and so it has, turned me upside down as it were.

Leand. Indeed, my best friend—

Urs. Oh, oh, hold me, or I shall fall.

Leand. I will hold you.

Urs. And do you feel any compassion for me?

Leand. I do.

Urs. Why truly you have a great deal to answer for, to bring tears into my eyes at this time o' day; I am sure they are the first I have shed since my poor husband's death.

Leand. Nay, don't think of that now.

Urs. For you must understand, Sir, to play a trick upon a grave, discreet matron—And yet, after all, by my faith, I don't wonder you should love the young thing under my care; for it is one of the sweetest conditioned souls that ever I was acquainted with; and between ourselves, our donnee is too old for such a babe.

Leand. Ursula, take this gold.

Urs. For what, Sir?

Leand. Only for the love of me.

Urs. Nay, if that be all, I wont refuse it; for I love you, I assure you; you put me so much in mind of my dear husband; he was a handsome man; I remember he had a mole between his eyebrows, about the bigness of a hazel nut; but I must say you have the advantage in the lower part of the countenance.

Leand. The old beldam grows amorous—

[Aside.]

Urs. Lord love you, you're a well-looking young man.

Leand. But Leonora—

Urs. Ha, ha, ha! but to pretend you were lame—I never saw a finer leg in my life.

Leand. Leonora!

Urs. Well, Sir, I'm going.

Leand. I shall never get rid of her. [Aside.]

Urs. Sir—

Leand. How now?

Urs. Would you be so kind, Sir, as to indulge me with the favour of a salute?

Leand. Ugh! [Salutes her.]

Urs. Gad-a-mercy, your cheek—Well, well, I have seen the day; but no matter, my wine's upon the lees now; however, Sir, you might have had the politeness when a gentlewoman made the offer.

[Exit.]

Enter MUNGO

Mun. Ah! massa—You brave massa, now; what you do here wid de old woman?

Leand. Where is your young mistress, Mungo?

Mun. By Gog, she lock her up. But why you no tell me before time you a gentleman?

Leand. Sure I have not given the purse for nothing.

Mun. Purse! what, you given her money den?—curse her imperance, why you no give it me?—you give me something as well as she. You know, massa, you see me first.

Leand. There, there; are you content?

Mun. Me get supper ready, and now me go to de cellar—But I say, massa, ax de old man now, what good him watching do, him bolts and him bars, him walls and him padlock?

Leand. Hlist! Leonora comes.

Mun. But, massa, you say you teach me play.

Air.

Let me, when my heart a sinking,
Hear de sweet guitar a clinking;

When a string speak,
Such moosic he make,
Me soon am cur'd of tinkin'.

Wid de toot, toot, toot,
Of a merry flute,

And cymbalo,

And tymbalo

To boot,

We dance and we sing,

Till we make a house ring,

And, tied in his garters, old massa may swing. [Exit.]

Re-enter LEONORA, with URSULA.

Leand. Oh, charming Leonora, how shall I express the rapture of my heart upon this occasion? I almost doubt the kindness of that chance which has brought me thus happily to see you, to speak to you without restraint.

Urs. Well, but it must not be without restraint, it can't be without restraint, it can't, by my faith—now you are going to make me sick again.

Leon. La, Ursula, I durst to say the gentleman doesn't want to do me any harm—do you, Sir? I'm sure I would not hurt a hair of his head, nor nobody's else, for the lucre of the whole world.

Urs. Come, Sir, where is your lute? You shall see me dance a saraband; or if you'd rather have a song—or the child and I will have a minuet, if you choose grace before agility.

Leand. This fulsome harridan—I wish she was at the devil. [Aside.]

Leon. Ursula, what's the matter with you?

Urs. What's the matter with me! Marry come up, what's the matter with you? Signor Diego can't show such a shape as that; well, there is nothing I like better than to see a young fellow with a well made leg.

Leand. Pr'ythee, let us go away from her

Leon. I don't know how to do it, Sir.

Leand. Nothing more easy; I will go with my guitar into the garden; 'tis moonlight; take an opportunity to follow me there; I swear to you, beautiful and innocent creature, you have nothing to apprehend.

Leon. No, Sir, I am certain of that, with a gentleman such as you are; and that have taken so much pains to come after me; and I should hold myself very ungrateful, if I did not do any thing to oblige you, in a civil way.

Leand. Then you'll come?

Leon. I'll do my best endeavours, Sir.

Leand. And may I hope that you love me?

Urs. Come, come, what colloquing's here? I must see how things are going forward; besides, Sir, you ought to know that it is not manners to be getting into corners, and whispering before company.

Leand. Pshaw!

Urs. Ay, you may say your pleasure, Sir, but I'm sure what I say is the right thing; I should hardly choose to venture in a corner with you myself; nay, I would not do it, I protest and vow.

Leand. Beautiful Leonora, I find my being depends upon the blessing of your good opinion; do you desire to put an end to my days?

Leon. No, indeed, indeed, I don't.

Leand. But then—

Air.

In vain you bid your captive live,
While you the means of life deny;

Give me your smiles, your wishes give
To him who must without you die.

Shut from the sun's enlivening beam,
Bid flowers retain their scent and hue:
Its source dried up, bid flow the stream,
And me exist, depriv'd of you. [Exit.

Urs. Let me sit down a little: come hither, child, I am going to give you good advice, therefore listen to me, for I have more years over my head than you.

Leon. Well, and what then?

Urs. What then!—Marry, then you must mind what I say to you—as I said before—but I say—what was I saying?

Leon. I'm sure, I don't know.

Urs. You see the young man that is gone out there; he has been telling me that he's dying for love of you; can you find in your heart to let him expire?

Leon. I'm sure I won't do any thing bad.

Urs. Why, that's right; you learned that from me; have I not said to you a thousand times, never do any thing bad? have I not said it? answer me that.

Leon. Well, and what then?

Urs. Very well, listen to me; your guardian is old, and ugly, and jealous, and yet he may live longer than a better man.

Leon. He has been very kind to me for all that, Ursula, and I ought to strive to please him.

Urs. There again; have I not said to you a thousand times that he was very kind to you, and you ought to strive to please him? It would be a hard thing to be preaching from morning till night without any profit.

Leon. Well, Ursula, after all, I wish this gentleman had never got into the house; Heaven send no ill comes of it.

Urs. Ay, I say so too; Heaven send it; but I'm cruelly afraid; for how shall we get rid of him? he'll never be able to crawl up the inside of the wall, whatever he did the out.

Leon. O Lord! won't he?

Urs. No, by my conscience, wont he; and when your guardian comes in, if we had fifty necks a piece, he'd twist them every one, if he finds him here; for my part, the best I expect, is to end my old days in a prison.

Leon. You don't say so?

Urs. I do, indeed; and it kills me to think of it; but every one has their evil day, and this has been mine.

Leon. I have promised to go with him into the garden.

Urs. Nay, you may do any thing now, for we are undone; though I think if you could persuade him to get up the chimney, and stay on the roof of the house until to-morrow night, we might then steal the keys from your guardian; but I'm afraid you wont be able to persuade him.

Leon. I'll go down upon my knees.

Urs. Find him out, while I step up stairs.

Leon. Pray for us, dear Ursula.

Urs. I will, if I possibly can.

AIR.—LEONORA.

Oh me, oh me, what shall we do?
The fault was all along of you:
You brought him in, why did you so?
'Twas not by my desire you know.

We have but too much cause to fear
My guardian, when he comes to hear
We've had a man with us, will kill
Me, you, and all; indeed, he will.
No penitence will pardon procure,
He'll kill us every soul, I'm sure. [Exit.

The Stage becomes dark; enter DON DIEGO, groping his way, with the Padlock in his hand.

Diego. All dark, all quiet; gone to bed and fast asleep, I warrant them; however, I am not sorry that I altered my first intention of staying out the whole night; and meeting Leonora's father on the road was at any rate a lucky incident. I will not disturb them; but, since I have let myself in with my master-key, go softly to bed; I shall be able to strike a light, and then I think I may say my cares are over. Good Heavens! what a wonderful deal of uneasiness may mortals avoid by a little prudence! I doubt not now, there are some men who would have gone out in my situation, and, trusting to the goodness of fortune, left their house and their honour in the care of an inexperienced girl, or the discretion of a mercenary servant. While he is abroad, he is tormented with fears and jealousies; and when he returns home, he probably finds disorder, and perhaps shame. But what do I do? I put a padlock on my door, then all is safe.

Enter MUNGO, from the Cellar, with a flask in one hand, and a candle in the other.

Mun. Tol, lol, lol, lol.

Diego. Hold; didn't I hear a noise?

Mun. Hola!

Diego. Heaven and earth! what do I see?

Mun. Where are you, young massy and mis-sy? Here wine for supper.

Diego. I'm thunderstruck!

Mun. My old massa little tink we be so merry—hic—hic—What's the matter with me? the room turn round.

Diego. Wretch, do you know me?

Mun. Know you?—damn you.

Diego. Horrid creature! what makes you here at this time of night? Is it with a design to surprise the innocents in their beds, and murder them sleeping?

Mun. Hush, hush—make no noise—hic—hic.

Diego. The slave is intoxicated.

Mun. Make no noise, I say; dere's young gentleman wid young lady; he play on guitar, and she like him, better dan she like you. Fal, lal, lal.

Diego. Monster, I'll make an example of you.

Mun. What you call me names for, you old dog?

Diego. Does the villain dare to lift his hand against me?

Mun. Will you fight?

Diego. He's mad.

Mun. Dere's one in de house, you little tink. 'Gad, he do you business.

Diego. Go, lie down in your sty, and sleep.

Mun. Sleep! sleep you self; you drunk—ha, ha, ha! Look, a padlock: you put a padlock on a door again, will you?—Ha, ha, ha!

Diego. Didn't I hear music?

Mun. Hic—hic—

Diego. Was it not the sound of a guitar?

Mun. Yes, he play on the guitar rarely.—Give me hand; you're old rascal,—an't you?

Diego. What dreadful shock affects me? a mist comes over my eyes, and my knees knock together as if I had got a fit of the shaking palsy.

Mun. I tell you a word in your ear.

Diego. Has any stranger broke into my house?

Mun. Yes, by—hic—a fine young gentleman, he now in a next room with missy.

Diego. Holy St. Francis! is it possible?

Mun. Go you round softly—you catch them together.

Diego. Confusion! Distraction! I shall run mad. [Exit.]

Re-enter URSULA.

Urs. O shame, monstrous! you drunken swab, you have been in the cellar, with a plague to you.

Mun. Let me put my hands about your neck—

Urs. Oh, I shall be ruin'd! Help, help! ruin, ruin!

Re-enter LEANDER and LEONORA.

Leon. Goodness me, what's the matter?

Urs. Oh, dear child, this black villain has frightened me out of my wits; he has wanted—

Mun. Me! curse a heart, I want nothing wid her—what she say I want for—

Leon. Ursula, the gentleman says he has some friends waiting for him at the other side of the garden wall, that will throw him over a ladder made of ropes, which he got up by.

DUET.—LEANDER and LEONORA.

Leand. Then must I go?

Leon. Yes, good Sir, yes.

Leand. A parting kiss!

Leon. No, good Sir, no.

Leand. It must be so.

By this, and this,
Here I could for ever grow.
'Tis more than mortal bliss.

Leon. Well, now good night;

Pray, ease our fright:
You're very bold, Sir,
Let loose your hold, Sir;
I think you want to scare me quite.

Leand. Oh fortune's spite!

Leon. Good night, good night.

Hark! the neighb'ring convent's bell
Tolls, the vesper hour to tell;
The clock now chimes;
A thousand times,
A thousand times, farewell!

Re-enter DON DIEGO.

Diego. Stay, Sir, let nobody go out of the room.

Urs. [Falling down.] Ah! ah! a ghost! a ghost!

Diego. Woman, stand up.

Urs. I wont, I wont; murder! don't touch me.

Diego. Leonora, what am I to think of this?

Leon. Oh, dear Sir, don't kill me.

Diego. Young man, who are you, who have thus clandestinely, at an unseasonable hour, broke into my house? Am I to consider you as a robber, or how?

Leand. As one whom love has made indiscreet; of one whom love taught industry and art to compass his designs. I love the beautiful Leonora, and she me; but, further than what you hear and see, neither one nor the other have been culpable.

Mun. Hear him, hear him.

Leand. Don Diego, you know my father well,

Don Alphonso de Luna: I am a scholar of this university, and am willing to submit to whatever punishment he, through your means, shall inflict; but wreak not your vengeance here.

Diego. Thus then my hopes and cares are at once frustrated: possessed of what I thought a jewel, I was desirous to keep it for myself; I raised up the walls of this house to a great height; I barred up my windows toward the street; I put double bolts on my doors; I banished all that had the shadow of man or male kind; and I stood continually sentinel over it myself, to guard my suspicion from surprise: thus secured, I left my watch for one little moment, and in that moment—

Leon. Pray, pray, guardian, let me tell you the story, and you'll find I am not to blame.

Diego. No, child, I only am to blame, who should have considered that sixteen and sixty agree ill together. But, though I was too old to be wise, I am not too old to learn; and so, I say, send for a smith directly, beat all the grates from my windows, take the locks from my doors, and let egress and regress be given freely.

Leon. And will you be my husband, Sir?

Diego. No, child, I will give you to one that will make you a better husband: here, young man, take her: if your parents consent, to-morrow shall see you joined in the face of the church; and the dowry which I promised her, in case of failure on my side of the contract, shall now go with her, as a marriage portion.

Leand. Signior, this is so generous—

Diego. No thanks; perhaps I owe acknowledgments to you; but you, Ursula, have no excuse, no passion to plead, and your age should have taught you better. I'll give you five hundred crowns, but never let me see you more.

Mun. And what you give me, massa?

Diego. Bastinadoes, for your drunkenness and infidelity. Call in my neighbours and friends. Oh, man! man! how short is your foresight; how ineffectual your prudence; while the very means you use are destructive of your ends!

FINALE.

Diego. Go, forge me fetters, that shall bind
The rage of the tempestuous wind;
Sound with a needle-full of thread
The depth of ocean's steepy bed;
Snap like a twig the oak's tough tree;
Quench Etna with a cup of tea;—
In these manœuvres show your skill,
Then hold a woman if you will.

Chor. In these manœuvres, &c.

Urs. Permit me to put in a word:
My master here is quite absurd:
That men should rule our sex is meet,
But art, not force, must do the feat;
Remember what the fable says,—
Where the sun's warm and melting rays
Soon bring about what wind and rain,
With all their fuss, attempt in vain.

Chor. Soon bring about, &c.

Mun. And, massa, he not angry pray,
If neger man a word should say;
Me have a fable pat as she,
Which wid dis matter will agree:
An owl once took it in his head,
Wid some young pretty bird to wed;

But when his worship came to woo,
He could get none but de cuckoo.

Chor. But when his worship, &c.

Leon. Ye youth select, who wish to taste
The joys of wedlock pure and chaste,
Ne'er let the mistress and the friend
In abject slave, and tyrant, end.
While each with tender passion burns,
Ascend the throne of rule by turns;
And place (to love, to virtue, just)
Security in mutual trust.

Chor. And place, &c.

Leand. To sum up all you now have heard,
Young men and old peruse the bard
A female trusted to your care,
His rule is pithy, short, and clear;
Be to her faults a little blind;
Be to her virtues very kind;
Let all her ways be unconfin'd;
And clap your padlock on her mind.

Chor. Be to her faults, &c. [Exeunt.

The following AIRS are usually omitted in the representation.

AIR.—LEANDER.

Hither, Venus, with your doves,
Hither, all ye little loves;
Round me light your wings display,
And bear a lover on his way.
Oh, could I but, like Jove of old,
Transform myself to showery gold;
Or in a swan my passion shroud,
Or wrap it in an orient cloud;

What locks, what bars, should then impede,
Or keep me from my charming maid!

AIR.—URSULA.

When a woman's front is wrinkled,
And her hairs are sprinkled
With gray,
Lack-a-day!
How her lovers fall away!
Like fashions past
Aside she's cast,
No one respect will pay:
Remember,
Lasses, remember
And while the sun shines make hay
You must not expect, in December,
The flowers you gather'd in May.

AIR.—DIEGO.

Oh, wherefore this terrible flurry?
My spirits are all in a hurry!
And above and below,
From my top to my toe,
Are running about, hurry scurry.

My heart in my bosom a bumping,
Goes thumping,
And jumping,
And thumping;
Is't a spectre I see?
Hence, vanish.—Ah me!
My senses deceive me;
Soon reason will leave me;
What a wretch am I destin'd to be!

THE REVENGE:

A TRAGEDY,

IN FIVE ACTS.

BY DR. YOUNG.

REMARKS.

This tragedy is the dramatic master-piece of its valuable author, but at first was not so successful as Busiris and his other plays. Though similar, in some degree, to the story of Shakspeare's Othello, the motives for resentment in Zanga are of a more noble and consistent nature, and the credulous object of his deadly hatred more excusable and more pitied in yielding to its subtlety.

There is great scope for talent in the character of Zanga; but the whining nonsense of Alonzo and Carlos would tire in any hands.

We have inserted at the foot of the page,* a narrative of an event said to have really happened in Spain a few years before this piece was written; it is so nearly followed by Dr. Young, in his admirable Revenge, as to leave no doubt of having formed its ground-work.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—Battlements, with a sea prospect.

Enter ZANGA.

Zan. Whether first nature, or long want of peace,

Has wrought my mind to this, I cannot tell;
But horrors now are not displeasing to me: [Thunder.
I like this rocking of the battlements.
Rage on, ye winds; burst, clouds, and, waters,
roar!

* Mr. Hughes, in his criticism on Othello, introduces the following narrative, to which allusion is made in our remarks.—“The short story I am going to tell is a just warning to those of jealous honour to look about them, and begin to possess their souls as they ought: for no man of spirit knows how terrible a creature he is, till he comes to be provoked.

“Don Alonzo, a Spanish nobleman, had a beautiful and virtuous wife, with whom he had lived some years in great tranquillity. The gentleman, however, was not free from the faults usually imputed to his nation; he was proud, suspicious, and impetuous. He kept a Moor in his house, whom, on a complaint from his lady, he had punished for a small offence with the utmost severity. The slave vowed revenge, and communicated his resolution to one of the lady's women with whom he had lived in a criminal way. This creature also hated her mistress, for she feared she was observed by her; she therefore undertook to make Don Alonzo jealous, by insinuating that the gardener was often admitted to his lady in private, and promising to make him an eye witness of it. At a proper time, agreed on between her and the Morisco, she sent a message to the gardener, that his lady, having some hasty orders to give him, would have him come that moment to her in her chamber. In the mean time she had placed Alonzo privately in an outer room, that he might observe who passed that way. It was not long before he saw the gardener appear. Alonzo had not patience, but following him into the apartment, struck him at one blow with a dagger to the heart; then dragging his lady by the hair, without inquiring further, he instantly killed her.

“Here he paused, looking on the dead bodies with all the agitations of a demon of revenge; when the wench who had occasioned these terrors, distracted with remorse, threw herself at his feet, and in a voice of lamentation, without sense of the consequence, repeated all her guilt. Alonzo was overwhelmed with the violent passions at one instant, and uttered the broken voices and motions of each of them for a moment; till at last he recollected himself enough to end his agony of love, anger, disdain, revenge, and remorse, by murdering the maid, the Moor and himself.”

You bear a just resemblance of my fortune,
And suit the gloomy habit of my soul.

Enter ISABELLA.

Who's there? My love!

Isa. Why have you left my bed?

Your absence more affrights me than the storm.

Zan. The dead alone in such a night can rest,
And I indulge my meditation here.

Woman, away. I choose to be alone.

Isa. I know you do, and therefore will not leave
you;

Excuse me, Zanga, therefore dare not leave you.

Is this is a night for walks of contemplation?

Something unusual hangs upon your heart,

And I will know it: by our loves, I will.

Ask I too much to share in your distress?

Zan. In tears? thou fool! then hear me, and be plung'd

In hell's abyss, if ever it escape thee.

To strike thee with astonishment at once—

I hate Alonzo. First recover that,

And then thou shalt hear further.

Isa. Hate Alonzo!

I own, I thought Alonzo most your friend,

And that he lost the master in that name.

Zan. Hear then. 'Tis twice three years since that great man

(Great let me call him, for he conquer'd me)

Made me the captive of his arm in fight.

He slew my father, and threw chains o'er me,

While I with pious rage pursued revenge.

I then was young; he plac'd me near his person,

And thought me not dishonour'd by his service.

One day (may that returning day be night,

The stain, the curse, of each succeeding year!)

For something, or for nothing, in his pride

He struck me. (While I tell it, do I live?)

He smote me on the cheek—I did not stab him,

For that were poor revenge—E'er since, his folly

Has strove to bury it beneath a heap

Of kindnesses, and thinks it is forgot.

Insolent thought! and like a second blow!

Affronts are innocent, where men are worthless;

And such-alone can wisely drop revenge.

Isa. But with more temper, Zanga, tell your story;

To see your strong emotions startles me.

Zan. Yes, woman, with the temper that befits it.

Has the dark adder venom? So have I

When trod upon. Proud Spaniard, thou shalt feel me!

For from that day, the day of my dishonour,

From that day have I curs'd the rising sun,

Which never fail'd to tell me of my shame.

From that day have I bless'd the coming night,

Which promis'd to conceal it; but in vain;

The blow return'd for ever in my dream.

Yet on I toil'd, and groan'd for an occasion

Of ample vengeance; none has yet arrived.

Howe'er, at present, I conceive warm hopes

Of what may wound him sore in his ambition,

Life of his life, and dearer than his soul.

By nightly march he purpos'd to surprise

The Moorish camp; but I have taken care

They shall be ready to receive his favour.

Failing in this, a cast of utmost moment,

Would darken all the conquests he has won.

Isa. Just as I enter'd, an express arriv'd.

Zan. To whom?

Isa. His friend, Don Carlos.

Zan. Be propitious,

O, Mahomet! on this important hour,
And give at length my famish'd soul revenge!
What is revenge, but courage to call in
Our honour's debts, and wisdom to convert
Others' self-love into our own protection?
But see, the morning dawn breaks in upon us;
I'll seek Don Carlos, and inquire my fate.

[Exeunt

SCENE II.—The Palace.

Enter DON MANUEL and DON CARLOS.

Man. My lord Don Carlos, what brings your express?

Car. Alonzo's glory, and the Moor's defeat.

The field is strew'd with twice ten thousand slain,

Though he suspects his measures were betray'd.

He'll soon arrive. Oh, how I long t' embrace

The first of heroes, and the best of friends!

I lov'd fair Leonora long before

The chance of battle gave me to the Moors,

From whom so late Alonzo set me free;

And while I groan'd in bondage, I deputed

This great Alonzo, whom her father honours,

To be my gentle advocate in love,

To stir her heart, and fan its fires for me.

Man. And what success?

Car. Alas, the cruel maid—

Indeed her father, who, though high in court,

And powerful with the king, has wealth at heart

To heal his devastations from the Moors.

Knowing I'm richly freighted from the east,

My fleet now sailing in the sight of Spain,

(Heaven guard it safe through such a dreadful storm!)

Caresses me, and urges her to wed.

Man. Her aged father, see,

Leads her this way.

Car. She looks like radiant truth,

Brought forward by the hand of hoary time—

You to the port with speed; 'tis possible

Some vessel is arriv'd. Heaven grant it bring Tidings which Carlos may receive with joy!

[Exit DON MANUEL.

Enter DON ALVAREZ and LEONORA.

Alv. Don Carlos, I am labouring in your favour

With all a parent's soft authority,

And earnest counsel.

Car. Angels second you!

For all my bliss or mis'ry hangs on it.

Alv. Daughter, the happiness of life depends

On our discretion, and a prudent choice.

Look into those they call unfortunate,

And, closer view'd, you'll find they are unwise:

Some flaw in their own conduct lies beneath.

Don Carlos is of ancient, noble blood,

And then his wealth might mend a prince's fortune.

For him the sun is lab'ring in the mines,

A faithful slave, and turning earth to gold:

His keels are freighted with that sacred power,

By which e'en kings and emperors are made.

Sir, you have my good wishes, and I hope

My daughter is not indispos'd to hear you.

[Exit.

Car. Oh, Leonora! why art thou in tears?

Because I am less wretched than I was?

Before your father gave me leave to woo you,

Hush'd was your bosom, and your eye serene.

Leon. Think you my father too indulgent to me,

That he claims no dominion o'er my tears?

A daughter sure may be right dutiful,

Whose tears alone are free from a restraint.

Car. Had I known this before, it had been well: I had not then solicited your father To add to my distress; Have I not languish'd prostrate at thy feet? Have I not liv'd whole days upon thy sight? Have I not seen thee where thou hast not been? And, mad with the idea, clasp'd the wind, And doted upon nothing?

Leon. Court me not, Good Carlos, by recounting of my faults, And telling how ungrateful I have been. Alas, my lord, if talking would prevail, I could suggest much better arguments Than those regards you throw away on me; Your valour, honour, wisdom, prais'd by all. But bid physicians talk our veins to temper, And with an argument new-set a pulse; Then think, my lord, of reasoning into love.

Car. Must I despair then? do not shake me thus:

My temper-beaten heart is cold to death. Ah, turn, and let me warm me in thy beauties. Heavens! what a proof I gave, but two nights past, Of matchless love! To fling me at thy feet, I slighted friendship, and I flew from fame; Nor heard the summons of the next day's battle: But darting headlong to thy arms, I left The promis'd fight, I left Alonzo too, To stand the war, and quell a world alone.

[Trumpets.
Leon. The victor comes. My lord, I must withdraw. [Exit.]

Enter DON ALONZO.

Car. Alonzo!

Alon. Carlos!—I am whole again; Clasp'd in thy arms, it makes my heart entire.

Car. Whom dare I thus embrace? The conquer of Afric.

Alon. Yes, much more—Don Carlos' friend. The conquest of the world would cost me dear, Should it beget one thought of distance in thee. I rise in virtues to come nearer to thee. I conquer with Don Carlos in mine eye, And thus I claim my victory's reward.

[Embraces him.]

Car. A victory indeed! your godlike arm Has made one spot the grave of Africa; Such numbers fell; and the survivors fled As frighted passengers from off the strand, When the tempestuous sea comes roaring on them.

Alon. 'Twas Carlos conquer'd, 'twas his cruel chains

Inflam'd me to a rage unknown before, And threw my former actions far behind.

Car. I love fair Leonora. How I love her! Yet still I find (I know not how it is) Another heart, another soul, for thee.

Enter ZANGA.

Zan. Manuel, my lord, returning from the port, On business both of moment and of haste, Humbly begs leave to speak in private with you.

Car. In private!—Ha!—Alonzo, I'll return; No business can detain me long from thee.

[Exit.]

Zan. My lord Alonzo, I obeyed your orders.

Alon. Will the fair Leonora pass this way?

Zan. She will, my lord, and soon.

Alon. Come near me, Zanga;

For I dare open all my heart to thee.

Never was such a day of triumph known!—

There's not a wounded captive in my train,

That slowly follow'd my proud chariot wheels,

With half a life, and beggary, and chains,

But is a god to me: I am most wretched.—

In his captivity, thou know'st, Don Carlos,

My friend (and never was a friend more dear)

Deputed me his advocate in love,

To talk to Leonora's heart, and make

A tender party in her thoughts for him.

What did I do?—I lov'd myself. Indeed,

One thing there is might lessen my offence

(If such offence admits of being lessen'd);

I thought him dead; for (by what fate I know not)

His letters never reach'd me.

Zan. Thanks to Zanga,

Who thence contriv'd that evil which has hap-

pen'd. [Aside.]

Alon. Yes, curs'd of Heaven! I lov'd myself,

and now,

In a late action, rescu'd from the Moors,

I have brought home my rival in my friend.

Zan. We hear, my lord, that in that action too,

Your interposing arm preserv'd his life.

Alon. It did—with more than the expense of mind:

For, oh, this day is mention'd for their nuptials.

But see, she comes; I'll take my leave and die.

[Retires.]

Zan. Hadst thou a thousand lives, thy death would please me.

Unhappy fate! my country overcome!

My six years' hope of vengeance quite expir'd—

Would nature were—I will not fall alone:

But others' groans shall tell the world my death

[Exit.]

Enter LEONORA.

Alon. When nature ends with anguish like to this,

Sinners shall take their last leave of the sun,

And bid his light adieu.

Leon. The mighty conqueror

Dismay'd! I thought you gave the foe your sorrows. Alon. Oh, cruel insult! are those tears your sport,

Which nothing but a love for you could draw?

Afric I quell'd, in hope by that to purchase

Your leave to sigh unscorn'd; but I complain not;

'Twas but a world—and you are—Leonora.

Leon. That passion which you boast of is your guilt,

A treason to your friend. You think mean of me, To plead your crimes as motives of my love.

Alon. You, Madam, ought to thank those crimes you blame!

'Tis they permit you to be thus inhuman,

Without the censure both of earth and Heaven—

I fondly thought a last look might be kind.

Farewell for ever.—This severe behaviour

Has, to my comfort, made it sweet to die.

Leon. Farewell for ever! Sweet to die! Oh, Heaven!

Alonzo, stay; you must not thus escape me;

But hear your guilt at large.

Alon. Oh, Leonora!

What could I do?—In duty to my friend,

I saw you; and to see is to admire.

For Carlos did I plead, and most sincerely.

Witness the thousand agonies it cost me.

You know I did; I sought but your esteem;
If that is guilt, an angel had been guilty.

Leon. If from your guilt none suffer'd but yourself,

It might be so—Farewell. [Going.

Alon. Who suffers with me?

Leon. Enjoy your ignorance, and let me go.

Alon. What mean these tears?

Leon. I weep by chance; nor have my tears a meaning.

But, oh, when first I saw Alonzo's tears,
I knew their meaning well!

[ALONZO falls on his knees, and takes her hand.

Alon. Heavens! what is this? that excellence for which

Desire was planted in the heart of man;
Virtue's supreme reward on this side heaven;
The cordial of my soul—and this destroys me—
Indeed, I flatter'd me that thou didst hate.

Leon. Alonzo, pardon me the injury

Of loving you. I struggled with my passion,
And struggled long: let that be some excuse.

Alon. Unkind! you know I think your love a blessing

Beyond all human blessings! 'tis the price
Of sighs and groans, and a whole year of dying.
But, oh, the curse of curses!—Oh, my friend!—

Leon. Alas!

Alon. What says my love? speak, Leonora?

Leon. Was it for you, my lord, to be so quick
In finding out objections to our love?

Think you so strong, my love, or weak my virtue,
It was unsafe to leave that part to me?

Alon. Is not the day then fix'd for your espousals?
[way;

Leon. Indeed, my father once had thought that but marking how the marriage pain'd my heart,
Long he stood doubtful; but at last resolv'd
Your counsel, which determines him in all,
Should finish the debate.

Alon. Oh, agony!

Must I not only lose her, but be made
Myself the instrument? not only die,
But plunge the dagger in my heart myself?
This is refining on calamity.

Leon. What, do you tremble lest you should be mine?

For what else can you tremble? not for that
My father places in your power to alter.

Alon. What's in my power? oh, yes, to stab
my friend!

Leon. To stab your friend were barbarous indeed!

Spare him—and murder me.

Alon. First perish all!

No, Leonora, I am thine for ever.

[Embraces her.

Leon. Hold, Alonzo,
And hear a maid whom doubly thou hast conquered.

I love thy virtues as I love thy person,
And I adore thee for the pains it gave me;
But as I felt the pains, I'll reap the fruit;
I'll shine out in my turn, and show the world
Thy great example was not lost upon me.
Nay, never shrink; take back the bright example
You lately lent; oh, take it while you may,
While I can give it you, and be immortal!

[Exit.

Alon. She's gone, and I shall see that face no
more;

But pine in absence, and till death adore.

When with cold dew my fainting brow is hung,
And my eyes darken, from my falt'ring tongue
Her name will tremble in a feeble moan,
And love with fate divide my dying groan.

[Exit

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The same.

Enter DON MANUEL and ZANGA.

Zan. If this be true, I cannot blame your pain
For wretched Carlos; 'tis but humane in you.

But when arriv'd your dreadful news?

Man. This hour.

Zan. What, not a vessel sav'd?

Man. All, all, the storm

Devour'd; and now o'er his late envied fortune
The dolphins bound, and wat'ry mountains roar,
Triumphant in his ruin.

Zan. Is Alvarez

Determin'd to deny his daughter to him?
That treasure was on shore; must that too join
The common wreck?

Man. Alvarez pleads, indeed,
That Leonora's heart is disinclin'd,
And pleads that only; so it was this morning,
When he concurr'd: the tempest broke the match
And sunk his favour, when it sunk the gold.
The love of gold is double in his heart;
The vice of age, and of Alvarez too.

Zan. How does Don Carlos bear it?

Man. Like a man

Whose heart feels most a human heart can feel,
And reasons best a human head can reason.

Zan. But is he then in absolute despair?

Man. Never to see his Leonora more.

And, quite to quench all future hope, Alvarez
Urges Alonzo to espouse his daughter
This very day; for he has learn'd their loves.

Zan. Ha! was not that receiv'd with ecstasy
By Don Alonzo?

Man. Yes, at first; but soon

A damp came o'er him, it would kill his friend.

Zan. Not if his friend consented; and since now

He can't himself espouse her—

Man. Yet, to ask it

Has something shocking to a generous mind;

At least, Alonzo's spirit startles at it.

Wide is the distance between our despair,
And giving up a mistress to another.

But I must leave you. Carlos wants support

In his severe affliction.

[Exit.

Zan. Ha, it dawns!—

It rises to me, like a new-found world
To mariners long time distress'd at sea,
Sore from a storm, and all their viands spent;
Or like the sun just rising out of chaos,
Some dregs of ancient night not quite purg'd off
But shall I finish it?—Hoa, Isabella!

Enter ISABELLA.

I thought of dying; better things come forward;
Vengeance is still alive! from her dark covert,
With all her snakes erect upon her crest,
She stalks in view, and fires me with her charms.
When, Isabella, arriv'd Don Carlos here?

Isa. Two nights ago.

Zan. That was the very night
Before the battle—Mem'ry, set down that
It has the essence of a crocodile,

Though yet but in the shell—I'll give it birth—
What time did he return?

Isa. At midnight.

Zan. So—

Say, did he see that night his Leonora?

Isa. No, my good lord.

Zan. No matter—tell me, woman,
Is not Alonzo rather brave than cautious,
Honest than subtle, above fraud himself,
Slow, therefore, to suspect it in another?

Isa. You best can judge; but so the world thinks of him.

Zan. Why, that was well—go, fetch my tablets hither. [Exit ISABELLA.]

Two nights ago my father's sacred shade
Thrice stalk'd around my bed, and smil'd upon
me;

He smil'd, a joy then little understood—
It must be so—and if so, it is vengeance
Worth waking of the dead for.

Re-enter ISABELLA, with the tablets; ZANGA writes then reads as to himself.

Thus it stands—

The father's fix'd—Don Carlos cannot wed—
Alonzo may—but that will hurt his friend—
Nor can he ask his leave—or, if he did,
He might not gain it—It is hard to give
Our own consent to ills, though we must bear
them.

Were it not then a master-piece worth all
The wisdom I can boast, first to persuade
Alonzo to request it of his friend,
His friend to grant—then from that very grant,
The strongest proof of friendship man can give
(And other motives,) to work out a cause
Of jealousy, to rack Alonzo's peace?
I have turn'd o'er the catalogue of human woes,
Which sting the heart of man, and find none equal.

It is the hydra of calamities,
The sevenfold death; the jealous are the damn'd.
Oh, jealousy, each other passion's calm
To thee, thou conflagration of the soul!
Thou king of torments, thou grand counterpoise
For all the transports beauty can inspire!

Isa. Alonzo comes this way.

Zan. Most opportunely.—

Withdraw. [Exit ISABELLA.]

Enter DON ALONZO.

My lord, I give you joy.

Alon. Of what, good Zanga?

Zan. Is not the lovely Leonora yours?

Alon. What will become of Carlos?

Zan. He's your friend;

And since he can't espouse the fair himself,
Will take some comfort from Alonzo's fortune.

Alon. Alas, thou little know'st the force of love!
Love reigns a sultan with unrival'd sway;
Puts all relations, friendship's self to death,
If once he's jealous of it. I love Carlos;
Yet well I know what pangs I felt this morning
At his intended nuptials. For myself
I then felt pains, which now for him I feel.

Zan. You will not wed her then?

Alon. Not instantly.

Insult his broken heart the very moment!

Zan. I understand you: but you'll wed hereafter,

When your friend's gone, and his first pain assuag'd.

Alon. Am I to blame in that?

Zan. My lord, I love

Your very errors; they are born from virtue.
Your friendship (and what nobler passion claims
The heart?) does lead you blindfold to your ruin.
Consider, wherefore did Alvarez break
Don Carlos' match, and wherefore urge Alonzo's?
'Twas the same cause, the love of wealth. Tomorrow

May see Alonzo in Don Carlos' fortune;
A higher bidder is a better friend,
And there are princes sigh for Leonora.
When your friend's gone, you'll wed; why, then,
the cause

Which gives you Leonora now, will cease.
Carlos has lost her; should you lose her too,
Why, then you heap new torments on your friend,
By that respect which labour'd to relieve him—
'Tis well, he is disturb'd; it makes him pause.

[Aside.]
Alon. Think'st thou, my Zanga, should I ask
Don Carlos,

His goodness would consent that I should wed
her?

Zan. I know it would.

Alon. But then the cruelty
To ask it, and for me to ask it of him!

Zan. Methinks, you are severe upon your
friend,

Who was it gave him liberty and life?
Alon. That is the very reason which forbids it.
Were I a stranger I could freely speak:
In me it so resembles a demand,
Exacting of a debt, it shocks my nature.

Zan. My lord, you know the sad alternative.
Is Leonora worth one pang or not?
It hurts not me, my lord, but as I love you:
Warmly as you I wish Don Carlos well;
But I am likewise Don Alonzo's friend:
There all the difference lies between us two
In me, my lord, you hear another self;
And, give me leave to add, a better too,
Clear'd from those errors, which, though caus'd by virtue,

Are such as may hereafter give you pain—
Don Lopez of Castile would not demur thus.

Alon. Perish the name! What, sacrifice
fair

To age and ugliness, because set in gold?
I'll to Don Carlos, if my heart will let me.
I have not seen him since his sore affliction;
But shunn'd it, as too terrible to bear.
How shall I bear it now? I'm struck already.

[Exe.]
Zan. Half of my work is done. I must secure
Don Carlos, ere Alonzo speak with him.

[He gives a message to a Servant, then returns.]
Proud, hated Spain, oft drench'd in Moorish
blood!

Dost thou not feel a deadly foe within thee?
Shake not the towers where'er I pass along,
Conscious of ruin, and their great destroyer?
Shake to the centre, if Alonzo's dear
Look down, oh, holy prophet! see me torture
This Christian dog, this infidel, who dares
To smite thy votaries, and spurn thy law;
And yet hopes pleasure from two radiant eyes,
Which look as they were lighted up for thee!
Shall he enjoy thy paradise below?
Blast the bold thought, and curse him with her charms!

But see, the melancholy lover comes.

Enter DON CARLOS.

Car. Hope, thou hast told me lies from day to day,
For more than twenty years; vile promiser!
None here are happy, but the very fool,
Or very wise; I am not fool enough
To smile in vanities, and hug a shadow;
Nor have I wisdom to elaborate
An artificial happiness from pains:
Even joys are pains, because they cannot last.

[Sighs.

How many lift the head, look gay and smile,
Against their consciences? And this we know,
Yet, knowing, disbelieve, and try again
What we have tried, and struggle with conviction.
Each new experience gives the former credit;
And reverend gray threescore is but a voucher,
That thirty told us true.

Zan. My noble lord,

I mourn your fate: but are no hopes surviving?

Car. No hopes. Alvarez has a heart of steel.
'Tis fix'd—'tis past—'tis absolute despair!

Zan. You wanted not to have your heart made tender,

By your own pains, to feel a friend's distress.

Car. I understand you well. Alonzo loves;
I pity him.

Zan. I dare be sworn you do.

Yet he has other thoughts.

Car. What canst thou mean?

Zan. Indeed he has; and fears to ask a favour
A stranger from a stranger might request;
What costs you nothing, yet is all to him:
Nay, what indeed will to your glory add,
For nothing more than wishing your friend well.

Car. I pray be plain; his happiness is mine.

Zan. He loves to death; but so reveres his friend,

He can't persuade his heart to wed the maid
Without your leave, and that he fears to ask.

In perfect tenderness I urg'd him to it,
Knowing the deadly sickness of his heart,
Your overflowing goodness to your friend,
Your wisdom, and despair yourself to wed her,
I wrung a promise from him he would try:

And now I come, a mutual friend to both,
Without his privacy, to let you know it,
And to prepare you kindly to receive him.

Car. Ha! if he weds, I am undone indeed;
Not Don Alvarez' self can then relieve me.

Zan. Alas, my lord, you know his heart is steel:
" 'Tis fix'd, 'tis past, 'tis absolute despair."

Car. Oh, cruel Heaven! and is it not enough
That I must never, never see her more?
Say, is it not enough that I must die;

But I must be tormented in the grave?—

Ask my consent!—Must I then give her to him?

Lead to his nuptial sheets the blushing maid?

Oh!—Leonora! never, never, never!
Zan. A storm of plagues upon him! he refuses.

[Aside.

Car. What, wed her—and to-day?

Zan. To-day, or never.

To-morrow may some wealthier lover bring,
And then Alonzo is thrown out like you:
Then whom shall he condemn for his misfortune?
Carlos is an Alvarez to his love.

Car. Oh, torment! whither shall I turn?

Zan. To peace.

Car. Which is the way?

Zan. His happiness is yours—
I dare not disbelieve you.

Car. Kill my friend!

Or worse—Alas! and can there be a worse?
A worse there is: nor can my nature bear it.

Zan. You have convinc'd me 'tis a dreadful task.

I find Alonzo's quitting her this morning
For Carlos' sake, in tenderness to you,
Betray'd me to believe it less severe
Than I perceive it is.

Car. Thou dost upbraid me.

Zan. No, my good lord; but since you can't comply,

'Tis my misfortune that I mention'd it;
For had I not, Alonzo would indeed
Have died, as now, but not by your decree.

Car. By my decree! Do I decree his death?

I do—Shall I then lead her to his arms?

Oh, which side shall I take? Be stabb'd, or—stab?

'Tis equal death! a choice of agonies!—

Ah, no!—all other agonies are ease

To one—O, Leonora!—never, never!

Go, Zanga, go, defer the dreadful trial,
Though but a day; something, perchance, may happen

To soften all to friendship and to love.

Go, stop my friend, let me not see him now;

But save us from an interview of death.

Zan. My lord, I'm bound in duty to obey
you—

If I not bring him, may Alonzo prosper!

[Aside, exit.

Car. What is this world?—Thy school, oh, misery!

Our only lesson is to learn to suffer;

And he who knows not that was born for nothing.

But put it most severely—should I live—

Live long—alas, there is no length in time!

Nor in thy time, oh, man!—What's fourscore
years—

Nay, what, indeed, the age of time itself,

Since cut from out eternity's wide round?

Yet Leonora—she can make time long,

Its nature alter, as she alter'd mine.

While in the lustre of her charms I lay,

Whole summer suns roll'd unperceiv'd away;

I years for days, and days for moments told,

And was surpris'd to hear that I grew old.

Now fate does rigidly its dues regain,

And every moment is an age of pain.

*Enter ZANGA and DON ALONZO; ZANGA stops
DON CARLOS.*

Zan. Is this Don Carlos? this the boasted
friend?

How can you turn your back upon his sadness?
Look on him, and then leave him if you can.

Car. I cannot yield; nor can I bear his griefs.

Alonzo; [Goes to him, and takes his hand.

Alon. Oh, Carlos!

Car. Pray, forbear.

Alon. Art thou undone, and shall Alonzo smile?

Alonzo, who, perhaps, in some degree

Contributed to cause thy dreadful fate?

I was deputed guardian of thy love;

But, oh! I lov'd myself! Pour down afflictions!

On this devoted head; make me your mark;

And be the world by my example taught,

How sacred it should hold the name of friend.

Car. You charge yourself unjustly: well I know

The only cause of my severe affliction.

Alvarez, curs'd Alvarez!—So much anguish

Felt for so small a failure, is one merit

Which faultless virtue wants. The crime was mine,
Who plac'd thee there, where only thou couldst fail;

Though well I knew that dreadful post of honour
I gave thee to maintain. Ah! who could bear
Those eyes unhurt? The wounds myself have felt

(Which wounds alone should cause me to condemn thee,)

They plead in thy excuse; for I too strove
To shun those fires, and found 'twas not in man.

Alon. You cast in shades the failure of a friend,
And soften all; but think not you deceive me;
I know my guilt, and I implore your pardon,
As the sole glimpse I can obtain of peace.

Car. Pardon for him, who but this morning threw

Fair Leonora from his heart, all bath'd
In ceaseless tears, and blushing for her love!
Who, like a rose-leaf wet with morning dew,
Would have stuck close, and clung for ever there!
But 'twas in thee, through fondness for thy friend,
To shut thy bosom against ecstasies:

For which, while this pulse beats, it beats to thee;
While this blood flows, it flows for my Alonzo,
And every wish is levell'd at thy joy.

Zan. [To ALONZO.] My lord, my lord, this is your time to speak.

Alon. [To ZANGA.] Because he's kind? It therefore is the worst;

Do I not see him quite possess'd with anguish,
And shall I pour in new? No, fond desire;
No, love: one pang at parting, and farewell.
I have no other love but Carlos now.

Car. Alas! my friend, why with such eager grasp
Dost press my hand, and weep upon my cheek?

Alon. If, after death, our forms (as some believe)
Shall be transparent, naked every thought,
And friends meet friends, and read each other's hearts,

Thou'lt know one day that thou wast held most dear.

Farewell.

Car. Alonzo, stop he cannot speak

[Holds him.]

Lest it should grieve me—Shall I be outdone?

And lose in glory; as I lose in love? [Aside.]

I take it much unkindly, my Alonzo,
You think so meanly of me not to speak,
When well I know your heart is near to bursting.
Have you forgot how you have bound me to you?
Your smallest friendship's liberty and life.

Alon. There, there it is, my friend; it cuts me
there.

How dreadful is it to a generous mind
To ask, when sure it cannot be denied!

Car. How greatly thought! In all he towers above me. [Aside.]

Then you confess you would ask something of me?

Alon. No, on my soul.

Zan. [To ALONZO.] Then lose her.

Car. Glorious spirit!

Why, what a pang has he run through for this!
By Heaven, I envy him his agonies. [Aside.]

My Alonzo!
Since thy great soul disdains to make request,
Receive with favour that I make to thee.

Alon. What means my Carlos?

Car. Pray, observe me well.

Fate and Alvarez tore her from my heart,

And, plucking up my love, they had well nigh
Pluck'd up life too, for they were twin'd together.
Of that no more—What now does reason bid
I cannot wed—Farewell, my happiness!

But, O, my soul, with care provide for hers!
In life, how weak, how helpless is a woman!
Take then my heart in dowry with the fair,
Be thou her guardian, and thou must be mine;
Shut out the thousand pressing ills of life
With thy surrounding arms—Do this, and then Set down the liberty and life thou gav'st me,
As little things, as essays of thy goodness,
And rudiments of friendship so divine.

Alon. There is a grandeur in thy goodness to
me,

Which with thy foes would render thee ador'd
Car. I do not part with her, I give her thee.

Alon. O, Carlos!

But think not words were ever made
For such occasions. Silence, tears, embraces,
Are languid eloquence; I'll seek relief
In absence from the pain of so much goodness,
There, thank the bless'd above, thy sole superiors,
Adore, and raise my thoughts of them by thee.

[Exit.]
Zan. Thus far success has crown'd my boldest hope.

My next care is to hasten these new nuptials,
And then my master-works begin to play.

Why that was greatly done, without one sigh
[Aside.]

To carry such a glory to its period.
[To CARLOS.]

Car. Too soon thou praisest me. He's gone,
and now

I must unsluice my over-burden'd heart,
And let it flow. I would not grieve my friend
With tears; nor interrupt my great design;
Great, sure, as ever human breast durst think of.
But now my sorrows, long with pain suppress'd,
Burst their confinement with impetuous sway,
O'er-swell all bounds, and bear e'en life away:
So till the day was won, the Greek renown'd
With anguish wore the arrow in his wound,
Then drew the shaft from out his tortur'd side,
Let gush the torrent of his blood, and died.

[Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I

Enter ZANGA.

Zan. O, joy, thou welcome stranger! twice three years

I have not felt thy vital beam; but now
It warms my veins, and plays around my heart:
A fiery instinct lifts me from the ground,
And I could mount!—the spirits numberless
Of my dear countrymen, which yesterday
Left their poor bleeding bodies on the field,
Are all assembled here, and o'er-inform me.—
O, bridegroom! great indeed thy present bliss;
Yet even by me unenvied! for be sure
It is thy last, thy last smile, that which now
Sits on thy cheek; enjoy it while thou may'st;
Anguish, and groans, and death, bespeak tomorrow.

Enter ISABELLA.

My Isabella!

Isa. What commands my Moor?

Zan. My fair ally! my lovely minister!
'Twas well, Alvarez, by my arts impell'd

(To plunge Don Carlos in the last despair,
And so prevent all future molestation,)
Finish'd the nuptials soon as he resolv'd them;
This conduct ripen'd all for me and ruin.
Scarce had the priest the holy rites perform'd,
When I, by sacred inspiration, forg'd
That letter which I trusted to thy hand;
That letter, which in glowing terms conveys,
From happy Carlos to fair Leonora,
The most profound acknowledgment of heart,
For wond'rous transports which he never knew.
This is a good subservient artifice,
To aid the nobler workings of my brain.

Isa. I quickly dropp'd it in the bride's apartment,
As you commanded.

Zan. With a lucky hand;
For soon Alonzo found it; I observed him
From out my secret stand. He took it up;
But scarce was it unfolded to his sight,
When he, as if an arrow pierc'd his eye,
Started, and trembling dropp'd it on the ground.
Pale and aghast awhile my victim stood,
Disguis'd a sigh or two, and puff'd them from him.
Then rubb'd his brow and took it up again.
At first he look'd as if he meant to read it;
But check'd by rising fears he crush'd it thus,
And thrust it, like an adder, in his bosom.

Isa. But if he read it not, it cannot sting him,
At least not mortally.

Zan. At first I thought so;
But further thought informs me otherwise,
And turns this disappointment to account.
This, Isabella, is Don Carlos' picture;
Take it, and so dispose of it, that found,
It may raise up a witness of her love;
Under her pillow, in her cabinet,
Or elsewhere, as shall best promote our end.

Isa. I'll weigh it as its consequence requires,
Then do my utmost to deserve your smile.

Zan. Is that Alonzo prostrate on the ground?—
Now he starts up like flame from sleeping embers,
And wild distraction glares from either eye.
If thus a slight surmise can work his soul,
How will the fulness of the tempest tear him?

Enter DON ALONZO.

Alon. And yet it cannot be—I am deceiv'd—
I injure her; she wears the face of Heaven.

Zan. He doubts. [Aside.]

Alon. I dare not look on this again.
If the first glance, which gave suspicion only,
Had such effect, so smote my heart and brain,
The certainty would dash me all in pieces.
It cannot—Ha! it must, it must be true.

Zan. Hold there, and we succeed. [Starts.] He has descried me.

And (for he thinks I love him) will unfold
His aching heart, and rest it on my counsel.
I'll seem to go, to make my stay more sure.

[Aside.]

Alon. Hold, Zanga, turn.

Zan. My lord.

Alon. Shut close the doors,
That not a spirit find an entrance here.

Zan. My lord's obey'd.

Alon. I see that thou art frightened.
If thou dost love me, I shall fill thy heart
With scorpions' stings.

Zan. If I do love, my lord?

VOL. I. . . . 2 U 29

Alon. Come near me, let me rest upon thy
bosom;

(What pillow like the bosom of a friend?)
For I am sick at heart.

Zan. Speak, Sir, O, speak,
And take me from the rack.

Alon. I am most happy, mine is victory,
Mine the king's favour, mine the nation's shout,
And great men make their fortunes of my smiles
O curse of curses! in the lap of blessing
To be most curs'd!—My Leonora's false!

Zan. Save me, my lord!

Alon. My Leonora's false!

[Gives him the letter.]
Zan. Then Heaven has lost its image here on earth.

[While ZANGA reads the letter, he trembles, and shows the utmost concern.]

Alon. Good-natur'd man! he makes my pains his own.

I durst not read it; but I read it now
In thy concern.

Zan. Did you not read it, then?

Alon. Mine eye just touch'd it, and could bear
no more.

Zan. Thus perish all that gives Alonzo pain!
[Tears the letter.]

Alon. Why didst thou tear it?

Zan. Think of it no more.

'Twas your mistake, and groundless are your fears.

Alon. And didst thou tremble then for my mistake?

Or give the whole contents, or by the pangs
That feed upon my heart, thy life's in danger.

Zan. Is this Alonzo's language to his Zanga?
Draw forth your sword, and find the secret here.

For whose sake is it, think you, I conceal'd?
Wherefore this rage? Because I seek your peace?

I have no interest in suppressing it,
But what good natur'd tenderness for you

Obliges me to have. Not mine the heart
That will be rent in two. Not mine the fame
That will be damn'd, though all the world should know it.

Alon. Then my worst fears are true, and life is past.

Zan. What has the rashness of my passion utter'd?

I know not what; but rage is our destruction,
And all its words are wind—Yet sure, I think,
I nothing own'd—but grant I did confess,
What is a letter? letters may be forg'd.
For Heaven's sweet sake, my lord, lift up your heart.

Some foe to your repose—

Alon. So Heaven look on me,
As I can't find the man I have offended.

Zan. Indeed! [Aside.]—Our innocence is not our shield.

They take offence, who have not been offended,
They seek our ruin too, who speak us fair,
And death is often ambush'd in their smiles.
'Tis certain

A letter may be forg'd, and in a point
Of such a dreadful consequence as this,
One would rely on nought that might be false—
Think, have you any other cause to doubt her?
Away, you can find none. Resume your spirit:
All's well again.

Alon. Oh that it were!

Zan. It is;

For who could credit that, which, credited,
Makes hell superfluous by superior pains,
Without such proofs as cannot be withstood?
Has she not ever been to virtue train'd?
Is not her fame as spotless as the sun,
Her sex's envy, and the boast of Spain?

Alon. O, Zanga! it is that confounds me most,
That, full in opposition to appearance—

Zan. No more, my lord, for you condemn yourself.

What is absurdity, but to believe
Against appearance!—You can't yet, I find,
Subdue your passion to your better sense;—
And, truth to tell, it does not much displease me.
'Tis fit our indiscretions should be check'd
With some degree of pain.

Alon. What indiscretion?

Zan. Come, you must bear to hear your faults
from me.

Had you not sent Don Carlos to the court
The night before the battle, that foul slave,
Who forg'd the senseless scroll which gives you
pain,

Had wanted footing for his villany.

Alon. I sent him not.

Zan. Not send him!—Ha!—That strikes me.
I thought he came on message to the king.
Is there another cause could justify
His shunning danger, and the promis'd fight?
But I perhaps may think too rigidly;
So long an absence, and impatient love—

Alon. In my confusion, that had quite escap'd
me.

By Heaven, my wounded soul does bleed afresh;
'Tis clear as day—for Carlos is so brave,
He lives not but on fame, he hunts for danger,
And is enamour'd of the face of death.

How then could he decline the next day's battle,
But for the transports?—Oh, it must be so—
Inhuman! by the loss of his own honour,
To buy the ruin of his friend!

Zan. You wrong him;
He knew not of your love.

Alon. Ha!—

Zan. That stings home.

Alon. Indeed, he knew not of my treacherous
love—

Proofs rise on proofs, and still the last the strongest.
Love is my torture, love was first my crime;
For she was his, my friend's, and he (O horror!)
Confided all in me. O sacred faith!
How dearly I abide thy violation!

Zan. Were then their loves far gone?

Alon. The father's will

There bore a total sway; and he, as soon
As news arriv'd that Carlos' fleet was seen
From off our coast, fir'd with the love of gold,
Determin'd that the very sun which saw
Carlos' return, should see his daughter wed.

Zan. Indeed, my lord; then you must pardon me,
If I presume to mitigate the crime.
Consider, strong allurements soften guilt;
Long was his absence, ardent was his love,
At midnight his return, the next day destin'd
For his espousals—'twas a strong temptation.

Alon. Temptation!

Zan. 'Twas but gaining of one night.

Alon. One night!

Zan. That crime could ne'er return again.

Alon. Again! By Heaven, thou dost insult thy lord. [death!]

Temptation! One night gain'd! O stings and

And am I then undone? Alas, my Zanga!
And dost thou own it too? Deny it still,
And rescue me one moment from distraction.

Zan. My lord, I hope the best.

Alon. False, foolish hope, thou know'st it false;
It is as glaring as the noon-tide sun.
Devil!—'This morning, after three years' coldness,
'To rush at once into a passion for me!

'Twas time to feign, 'twas time to get another,
When her first fool was sated with her beauties.

Zan. What says my lord? Did Leonora then
Never before disclose her passion for you?

Alon. Never.

Zan. Throughout the whole three years?

Alon. O, never! never!

Why, Zanga, shouldst thou strive? 'Tis all in vain:

Though thy soul labours, it can find no reed
For hope to catch at. Ah! I'm plunging down
Ten thousand thousand fathoms in despair.

Zan. Hold, Sir, I'll break your fall—wave every fear

And be a man again—Had he enjoy'd her,
Be most assur'd, he had resign'd her to you
With less reluctance.

Alon. Ha! Resign'd her to me!

Resign her! Who resign'd her?—Double death!
How could I doubt so long? My heart is broke.
First love her to distraction! then resign her!

Zan. But was it not with utmost agony?

Alon. Grant that, he still resign'd her, that's enough.

Would he pluck out his eye to give it me?
Tear out his heart?—She was his heart no more—
Nor was it with reluctance he resign'd her;
By Heaven, he ask'd, he courted me to we-d.

I thought it strange; 'tis now no longer so.

Zan. Was't his request? Are you right sure of that?

I fear the letter was not all a tale.

Alon. A tale! There's proof equivalent to sight.

Zan. I should distrust my sight on this occasion.

Alon. And so should I; by Heaven, I think I should.

What, Leonora! the divine, by whom
We guess'd at angels! Oh! I'm all confusion.

Zan. You now are too much ruffled to think clearly.

Since bliss and horror, life and death, hang on it,
Go to your chamber, there maturely weigh
Each circumstance; consider, above all,
That it is jealousy's peculiar nature
To swell small things to great; nay, out of nought
To conjure much, and then to lose its reason
Amid the hideous phantoms it has form'd.

Alon. Had I ten thousand lives, I'd give them all
To be deceiv'd.

And yet she seem'd so pure, that I thought
Heaven

Borrow'd her form for virtue's self to wear,

To gain her lovers with the sons of men.

O, Leonora! Leonora!

[Exit.]

Re-enter ISABELLA.

Zan. Thus far it works auspiciously. My patient

Thrives, underneath my hand, in misery.

He's gone to think; that is, to be distracted

Isa. I overheard your conference, and saw you,

To my amazement, tear the letter.

Zan. There,

There, Isabella, I out-did myself.

For, tearing it, I not secure it only
In its first force, but superadd a new.
For who can now the character examine
To cause a doubt, much less detect the fraud?
And after tearing it, as loth to show
The foul contents, if I should swear it now—
A forgery, my lord would disbelieve me,
Nay, more, would disbelieve the more I swore.
But is the picture happily disposed of?

Isa. It is.

Zan. 'That's well— Ah! what is well? O pang to think!

O dire necessity! is this my province?
Whither, my soul! ah! whither art thou sunk?
Does this become a soldier? this become
Whom armies follow'd, and a people lov'd?
My martial glory withers at the thought.
But great my end; and since there are no other,
These means are just, they shine with borrow'd
light,

Illustrious from the purpose they pursue.
And greater sure my merit, who, to gain
A point sublime, can such a task sustain;
To wade through ways obscene, my honour bend,
And shock my nature, to attain my end.
Late time shall wonder; that my joys will raise:
For wonder is involuntary praise. [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.

Enter DON ALONZO and ZANGA.

Alon. Oh, what a pain to think! when every thought,

Perplexing thought, in intricacies runs,
And reason knits th' inextricable toil,
In which herself is taken!
No more I'll bear this battle of the mind,
This inward anarchy; but find my wife,
And, to her trembling heart presenting death,
Force all the secret from her.

Zan. O, forbear!

You totter on the very brink of ruin.

Alon. What dost thou mean?

Zan. That will discover all,

And kill my hopes. What can I think or do? [Aside.]

Alon. What, dost thou murmur?

Zan. Force the secret from her?

What's perjury to such a crime as this?
Will she confess it then? O, groundless hope!
But rest assur'd, she'll make this accusation,
Or false or true, your ruin with the king;
Such is her father's power.

Alon. No more, I care not;

Rather than groan beneath this load, I'll die.

Zan. But for what better will you change this load?

Grant you should know it, would not that be worse?

Alon. No; it would cure me of my mortal pangs
By hatred and contempt: I should despise her,
And all my love-bred agonies would vanish.

Zan. Ah! were I sure of that, my lord—

Alon. What then?

Zan. You should not hazard life to gain the secret.

Alon. What dost thou mean? thou know'st I'm on the rack.

I'll not be play'd with; speak, if thou hast aught,
Or I this instant fly to Leonora

Zan. That is, to death. My lord, I am not yet
Quite so far gone in guilt to suffer it;
Though gone too far, Heaven knows—'Tis I am guilty;

I have took pains, as you, I know, observ'd,
To hinder you from diving in the secret,
And turn'd aside your thoughts from the detection.

Alon. Thou dost confound me.

Zan. I confound myself;

And frankly own, though to my shame I own it,
Nought but your life in danger could have torn
The secret out, and made me own my crime.

Alon. Speak quickly, Zanga, speak.

Zan. Not yet, dread Sir:

First, I must be assur'd, that if you find
The fair one guilty, scorn, as you assur'd me,
Shall conquer love and rage, and heal your soul.

Alon. Oh! 'twill, by Heaven,

Zan. Alas! I fear it much,

And scarce can hope so far; but I of this Exact your solemn oath, that you'll abstain
From all self-violence, and save my lord.

Alon. I trebly swear.

Zan. You'll bear it like a man?

Alon. A god.

Zan. Such have you been to me, these tears confess it;

And pour'd forth miracles of kindness on me:

And what amends is now within my power,
But to confess, expose myself to justice,
And as a blessing, claim my punishment?

Know then, Don Carlos—

Alon. Oh!

Zan. You cannot bear it.

Alon. Go on, I'll have it, though it blast mankind;

I'll have it all, and instantly. Go on.

Zan. Don Carlos did return at dead of night—
That night, by chance (ill chance for me) did I
Command the watch that guards the palace gate.
He told me he had letters for the king,
Despatch'd from you.

Alon. The villain lied!

Zan. My lord,

I pray, forbear—Transported at his sight,
After so long a bondage, and your friend,
(Who could suspect him of an artifice?)
No further I inquir'd, but let him pass,
False to my trust, at least imprudent in it.
Our watch reliev'd, I went into the garden,
As is my custom, when the night's serene,
And took a moonlight walk: when soon I heard
A rustling in an arbour that was near me.
I saw two lovers in each others' arms,
Embracing and embrac'd. Anon the man
Arose; and, falling back some paces from her,
Gaz'd ardently awhile, then rush'd at once,
And, throwing all himself into her bosom,
There softly sigh'd, "Oh, night of ecstasy!
When shall we meet again?"—Don Carlos then Led Leonora forth.

Alon. Oh, oh, my heart!

[He sinks into a chair.]

Zan. Groan on, and with the sound refresh
my soul!

'Tis through his heart; his knees smite one another:

'Tis through his brain, his eye-balls roll in an guish. [Aside]

My lord, my lord, why will you rack my soul?

Alon. Oh, she was all!

My fame, my friendship, and my love of arms,
All stoop'd to her; my blood was her possession.
Deep in the secret foldings of my heart
She liv'd with life, and far the dearer she:
To think on't is the torment of the damn'd,
And not to think on't is impossible.

Zan. You said you'd bear it like a man.

Alon. I do.

Am I not most distracted?

Zan. Pray, be calm.

Alon. As hurricanes:—be thou assur'd of that.

Zan. Is this the wise Alonzo?

Alon. Villain, no:

He died in the arbour—he was murder'd there!—

Zan. Alas! he weeps.

Alon. Go, dig her grave!

Zan. My lord!

Alon. But that her blood's too hot, I would ca-rouse it

Around my bridal board!

Zan. And I would pledge thee. [Aside.]

Alon. But I may talk too fast. Pray let me think,

And reason mildly.—Wedded and undone
Before one night descends.—Oh, hasty evil!
What friend to comfort me in my extreme!
Where's Carlos? why is Carlos absent from me?
Does he know what has happen'd?

Zan. My lord!

Alon. Oh, villain, villain, most accurs'd!

If thou didst know it, why didst let me wed?

Zan. Hear me, my lord; your anger will abate?

I knew it not:—I saw them in the garden;

But saw no more than you might well expect

To see in lovers destin'd for each other.

By Heaven, I thought their meeting innocent.

Who could suspect fair Leonora's virtue,

'Till after-proofs conspir'd to blacken it?

Sad proofs, which came too late, which broke not out,

(Eternal curses on Alvarez' haste!)

'Till holy rites had made the wanton yours;

And then, I own, I labour'd to conceal it,

In duty and compassion to your peace.

Alon. Live now, be damn'd hereafter—for I want thee.

Let me think—

The jess'mine bower—'tis secret and remote:

Go, wait thee there, and take thy dagger with thee. [Exit ZANGA.]

How sweet the sound still sings within my ear!

When shall we meet again?—T'o-night, in hell.

[Going.]

Enter LEONORA.

Ha! I'm surprised! I stagger at her charms!

Oh, angel-devil!—Shall I stab her now?

No—it shall be as I at first determin'd.

To kill her now were half my vengeance lost.

'Then I must now dissemble—if I can.

Leon. My lord, excuse me; see, a second time
I come in embassy from all your friends,
Whose joys are languid, uninspir'd by you.

Alon. This moment, Leonora, I was coming

To thee, and all—but sure, or I mistake,

Or thou canst well inspire my friends with joy.

Leon. What says my lord?

Alon. Thou art exceeding fair.

Leon. Beauty alone is but of little worth;

But, when the soul and body of a piece

Both shine alike,—then they obtain a price,

And are a fit reward for gallant actions,

Heaven's pay on earth for such great souls as
yours;—

If fair and innocent, I am your due.

Alon. Innocent!

Leon. How, my lord! I interrupt you.

Alon. No, my best life! I must not part with
thee—

This hand is mine—Oh, what a hand is here!

So soft, souls sink into it, and are lost!

Leon. In tears, my lord?

Alon. What less can speak my joy?

Why, I could gaze upon thy looks for ever,

And drink in all my being from thine eyes;

And I could snatch a flaming thunderbolt,

And hurl destruction!—

Leon. My lord, you fright me.

Is this the fondness of your nuptial hour?

Why, when I woo your hand, is it denied me?

Your very eyes, why are they taught to shun
me?—

Nay, my good lord, I have a title here.

[Takes his hand.]

And I will have it. Am I not your wife?

Have I not just authority to know

That heart which I have purchas'd with my own?

Tell me the secret; I conjure you, tell me.

Speak then, I charge you speak, or I expire,

And load you with my death. My lord, my lord;

Alon. Ha, ha, ha!

[He breaks from her, and she sinks upon the floor.]

Leon. Are these the joys which fondly I conceived?

And is it thus a wedded life begins?

What did I part with, when I gave my heart?

I knew not that all happiness went with it.

Why did I leave my tender father's wing,

And venture into love? The maid that loves,

Goes out to sea upon a shatter'd plank,

And puts her trust in miracles for safety.

Where shall I sigh?—where pour out my complaint?

He that should hear, should succour, should redress,

He is the source of all.

Alon. Go to thy chamber;

I soon will follow; that which now disturbs thee

Shall be clear'd up, and thou shalt not condemn me. [Exit LEONORA.]

Oh, how like innocence she looks!—What, stab
her!

And rush into her blood?

How then? why thus—no more; it is determin'd.

Re-enter ZANGA.

Zan. I fear, his heart has fail'd him. She must die.

Can I not rouse the snake that's in his bosom,

To sting out human nature, and effect it?

Alon. This vast and solid earth, that blazing
sun,

Those skies, through which it rolls, must all have end.

What then is man? the smallest part of nothing.

Day buries day; month, month; and year the year.

Our life is but a chain of many deaths;

Can then death's self be fear'd? our life much rather.

Life is the desert, life the solitude.

Death join us to the great majority:

'Tis to be borne to Platos and to Cæsars;

'Tis to be great for ever;

'Tis pleasure, 'tis ambition, then, to die.

Zan. I think, my lord, you talk'd of death?

Alon. I did.

Zan. I give you joy; then Leonora's dead?

Alon. No, Zanga; to shed a woman's blood
Would stain my sword, and make my wars inglorious;

He who, superior to the checks of nature,
Dares make his life the victim of his reason,
Does in some sort that reason deify,
And take a flight at heaven.

Zan. Alas, my lord,

'Tis not your reason, but her beauty, finds
Those arguments, and throws you on your sword.
You cannot close an eye that is so bright,
You cannot strike a breast that is so soft,
That has ten thousand ecstasies in store—
For Carlos?—No, my lord, I mean for you.

Alon. Oh, through my heart and marrow!
pr'ythee, spare me,

Nor more upbraid the weakness of thy lord:

I own, I tried, I quarrell'd with my heart,

And push'd it on, and bid it give her death;

But, oh, her eyes struck first and murder'd me.

Zan. I know not what to answer to my lord.

Men are but men; we did not make ourselves,

Farewell then, my best lord, since you must die.

Oh, that I were to share your monument,

And in eternal darkness close these eyes

Against those scenes which I am doomed to suffer!

Alon. What dost thou mean?

Zan. And is it then unknown?

Oh, grief of heart, to think that you should ask it!

Sure you distrust that ardent love I bear you,

Else could you doubt when you are laid in dust—

But it will cut my poor heart through and through,

To see those revel on your sacred tomb,

Who brought you thither by their lawless loves.

For there they'll revel, and exult to find

Him sleep so fast, who else might mar their joys.

Alon. Distraction! But Don Carlos well thou

know'st.

Is sheath'd in steel, and bent on other thoughts.

Zan. I'll work him to the murder of his friend.

[Aside.

Yes, till the fever of his blood returns,

While her last kiss still glows upon his cheek.

But when he finds Alonzo is no more,

How will he rush, like lightning, to her arms!

There sigh, there languish, there pour out his soul;

But not in grief—sad obsequies to thee!—

But thou wilt be at peace, nor see, nor hear

The burning kiss, the sigh of ecstasy,

Their throbbing hearts that jostle one another:

Thank Heaven, these torments will be all my own.

Alon. I'll ease thee of that pain. Let Carlos

die;

O'ertake him on the road, and see it done.

'Tis my command. [Gives his signet.

Zan. I dare not disobey.

Alon. My Zanga, now I have thy leave to die.

Zan. Ah, Sir! think, think again. Are all men buried

in Carlos' grave? you know not womankind:

When once the throbbing of the heart has broke

The modest zone, with which it first was tied,

Each man she meets will be a Carlos to her.

Alon. That thought has more of hell than had the former.

Another, and another, and another!

And each shall cast a smile upon my tomb.

I am convinc'd; I must not, will not die.

Zan. You cannot die; nor can you murder her

What then remains? In nature no third way,

But to forget, and so to love again.

Alon. Oh!

Zan. If you forgive, the world will call you good;

If you forget, the world will call you wise;

If you receive her to your grace again,

The world will call you—very, very kind.

Alon. Zanga, I understand thee well. She dies;

Though my arm tremble at the stroke, she dies.

Zan. That's truly great. What think you
'twas set up

The Greek and Roman name is such a lustre,

But doing right in stern despite to nature;

Shutting their ears to all her little cries,

When great, august, and godlike justice call'd?

At Aulis, one pour'd out a daughter's life,

And gain'd more glory than by all his wars;

Another slew a sister in just rage;

A third, the theme of all succeeding times,

Gave to the cruel axe a darling son:

Nay more, for justice some devote themselves,

As he at Carthage, an immortal name!

Yet there is one step left above them all,

Above their history, above their fable:

A wife, bride, mistress, unenjoy'd—do that,

And tread upon the Greek and Roman glory

Alon. 'Tis done!—Again new transports fire

my brain:

I had forgot it, 'tis my bridal night.

Friend, give me joy, we must be gay together,

See that the festival be duly honour'd.

And when with garlands the full bowl is crown'd,

And music gives her elevating sound,

And golden carpets spread the sacred floor,

And a new day the blazing tapers pour,

Thou, Zanga, then my solemn friends invite,

From the dark realms of everlasting night;

Call Vengeance, call the Furies, call Despair,

And Death, our chief-invited guest, be there;

He, with pale hand, shall lead the bride, and spread

Eternal curtains round our nuptial bed.

[Exeunt.

ACT V.

SCENE I.

Enter ALONZO, meeting ZANGA.

Alon. Is Carlos murdered?

Zan. I obey'd your order.

Six ruffians overtook him on the road;

He fought as he was wont, and four he slew.

Then sunk beneath a hundred wounds to death.

His last breath bless'd Alonzo, and desired

His bones might rest near yours.

Alon. Oh, Zanga! Zanga!

But I'll not think; for I must act, and thinking

Would ruin me for action.

Where's Leonora then? Quick, answer me

I'm deep in horrors, I'll be deeper still.

I find the artifice did take effect,

And she forgives my late department to her.

Zan. I told her, from your childhood you wa-went,

On any great surprise, but chiefly then

When cause of sorrow bore it company,

To have your passion shake the seat of reason;

A momentary ill, which soon blew o'er:

Then did I tell her of Don Carlos' death,

(Wisely suppressing by what means he fell,)
 And laid the blame on that. At first she doubted;
 But such the honest artifice I us'd,
 And such her ardent wish it should be true,
 That she, at length, was fully satisfied.
 But what design you, Sir, and how?
Alon. I'll tell thee.

Thus I've ordain'd it. In the jess'mine bower,
 The place which she dishonour'd with her guilt,
 There will I meet her; the appointment's made;
 And calmly spread (for I can do it now)
 The blackness of her crime before her sight;
 And then, with all the cool solemnity
 Of public justice, give her to the grave. [Exit.]

Zan. Why, get thee gone! horror and night go with thee.
 Sisters of Acheron, go hand in hand,
 Go dance around the bower, and close them;
 And tell them, that I sent you to salute them;
 Profane the ground; and for th' ambrosial rose,
 And breath of jess'mine, let hemlock blacken,
 And deadly nightshade poison all the air.
 For the sweet nightingale, may ravens croak,
 Toads pant, and adders rustle through the leaves;
 May serpents winding up the trees let fall
 Their hissing necks upon them from above,
 And mingle kisses—such as I would give them.
 [Exit.]

SCENE II.—The Bower.

Enter ALONZO.—LEONORA sleeping.

Alon. Ye amaranths! ye roses, like the morn!
 Sweet myrtles, and ye golden orange groves!
 Why do you smile? Why do you look so fair?
 Are ye not blighted as I enter in?
 Did ever midnight ghosts assemble here?
 Have these sweet echoes ever learn'd to groan?
 Joy-giving, love-inspiring, holy bower!
 Know, in thy fragrant bosom thou receiv'st
 A—murderer! Oh, I shall stain thy lilies,
 And horror will usurp the seat of bliss.
 [Advances.]

Ha! she sleeps—
 The day's uncommon heat has overcome her.
 Then take, my longing eyes, your last, full gaze.
 Oh, what a sight is here! how dreadful fair!
 Who would not think that being innocent?
 Where shall I strike? who strikes her, strikes himself.

My own life-blood will issue at her wound.
 But see, she smiles! I never shall smile more;
 It strongly tempts me to a parting kiss.

[Going, he starts back.
 Ha! smile again. She dreams of him she loves.
 Curse on her charms! I'll stab her through them all.
 [As he is going to strike, she wakes.]

Leon. My lord, your stay was long; and yonder lull
 Of falling waters tempted me to rest,
 Dispirited with noon's excessive heat.

Alon. Ye powers! with what an eye she mends
 the day!

While they were clos'd, I should have given the blow. [Aside.]

Leon. What says my lord?

Alon. Why, this Alonzo says:
 If love were endless, men were gods; 'tis that Does counterbalance travel, danger, pain—
 'Tis Heaven's expedient to make mortals bear
 The light, and cheat them of the peaceful grave.

Leon. Alas, my lord! why talk you of the grave?

Your friend is dead: in friendship you sustain
 A mighty loss: repair it with my love.

Alon. Thy love, thou piece of witchcraft! I would say,
 Thou brightest angel! I could gaze for ever.
 But oh, those eyes! those murderers! Oh, whence,
 Whence didst thou steal their burning orbs? from Heaven?

Thou didst; and 'tis religion to adore them.

Leon. My best Alonzo, moderate your thoughts.
 Extremes still fright me, though of love itself.

Alon. Extremes indeed! it hurry'd me away;
 But I come home again—and now for justice—
 And now for death—It is impossible— [Aside.]
 I leave her to just Heaven.

[Drops the dagger, goes off.
Leon. Ha, a dagger!
 What dost thou say, thou minister of death?
 What dreadful tale dost tell me?—Let me think—

Enter ZANGA.

Zan. Death to my towering hope! Oh! fall from high!
 My close, long-labour'd scheme at once is blasted,
 That dagger, found, will cause her to inquire;
 Inquiry will discover all; my hopes
 Of vengeance perish; I myself am lost—
 Curse on the coward's heart; wither his hand,
 Which held the steel in vain!—what can be done?
 Where can I fix?—that's something still—'twill breed

Fell rage and bitterness betwixt their souls,
 Which may, perchance, grow up to greater evil:
 If not, 'tis all I can—it shall be so— [Aside.]

Leon. Oh, Zanga, I am sinking in my fears!
 Alonzo dropp'd this dagger as he left me,
 And left me in a strange disorder too.

What can this mean? Angels preserve his life!

Zan. Yours, Madam, yours.

Leon. What, Zanga, dost thou say?

Zan. Carry you goodness then to such extremes,

So blinded to the faults of him you love,
 That you perceive not he is jealous?

Leon. Heavens!

And yet a thousand things recur that swear it.
 What villain could inspire him with that thought?
 It is not of the growth of his own nature.

Zan. Some villain; who, hell knows; but he is jealous;

And 'tis most fit a heart so pure as yours
 Do itself justice, and assert its honour,
 And make him conscious of his stab to virtue.

Leon. Jealous! it sickens at my heart. Unkind,
 Ungen'rous, groundless, weak, and insolent!

Why, wherefore? on what shadow of occasion?

Oh, how the great man lessens to my thought!

How could so mean a vice as jealousy

Live in a throng of such exalted virtues!

I scorn and hate, yet love him, and adore.

I cannot, will not, dare not, think it true,

'Till from himself I know it. [Exit.]

Zan. This succeeds
 Just to my wish. Now she, with violence,
 Upbraids him; he, not doubting she is guilty,
 Rages no less; and if on either side
 The waves run high, there still lives hope of ruin

Re-enter ALONZO.

My lord—

Alon. Oh, Zanga, hold thy peace! I am no coward;

But Heaven itself did hold my hand; I felt it,
By the well-being of my soul, I did.
I'll think of vengeance at another season.

Zan. My lord, her guilt—

Alon. Perdition on thee, Moor.

For that one word! Ah, do not rouse that thought!
I have o'erwhelm'd it much as possible:
I tell thee, Moor, I love her to distraction.
If 'tis my shame, why, be it so—I love her;
I could not hurt her to be lord of earth;
It shocks my nature like a stroke from Heaven.
But see, my Leonora comes—Be gone.

[Exit ZANGA]

Re-enter LEONORA.

Oh, seen for ever, yet for ever new!
The conquer'd thou dost conquer o'er again,
Inflicting wound on wound.

Leon. Alas, my lord!

What need of this to me?

Alon. Ha! dost thou weep?

Leon. Have I no cause?

Alon. If love is thy concern,

Thou hast no cause: none ever lov'd like me.

Oh, that this one embrace would last for ever!

Leon. Could this man ever mean to wrong my virtue?

Could this man e'er design upon my life?
Impossible! I throw away the thought. [Aside.
These tears declare how much I taste the joy
Of being folded in your arms and heart;
My universe does lie within that space.
This dagger bore false witness.

Alon. Ha, my dagger!

It rouses horrid images. Away,
Away with it, and let us talk of love.

Leon. Of death!

Alon. As thou lov'st happiness—

Leon. Of murder!

Alon. Rash,

Rash woman! yet forbear.

Alas, thou quite mistak'st my cause of pain!

Yet, yet dismiss me; I am all in flames.

Leon. Who has most cause, you or myself?
what act

Of my whole life encourag'd you to this?
Or of your own, what guilt has drawn it on you?
You find me kind, and think me kind to all;
The weak, ungenerous error of your sex.
What could inspire the thought? We oft'nest
judge

From our own hearts; and is yours then so frail,
It prompts you to conceive thus ill of me?
He that can stoop to harbour such a thought,
Deserves to find it true. [Holding him.

Alon. [Turning on her.] Ill-fated woman!

Why hast thou forc'd me back into the gulf
Of agonies I had block'd up from thought?
For, since thou hast replung'd me in my torture,
I will be satisfied.

Leon. Be satisfied!

Alon. Yes, thy own mouth shall witness it against thee;

I will be satisfied.

Leon. Of what?

Alon. Of what?

How dar'st thou ask that question? Woman woman,

Weak and assur'd at once! thus 'tis for ever.

Who told thee that thy virtue was suspected?

Who told thee I design'd upon thy life?

You found the dagger; but that could not speak;

Nor did I tell thee; who did tell thee then?
Guilt, conscious guilt!

Leon. 'Tis to my face! Oh Heaven!

Alon. 'Tis to thy very soul.

Leon. Thou'rt not in earnest?

Alon. Serious as death.

Leon. Then Heaven have mercy on thee!

Till now, I struggled not to think it true;
I sought conviction, and would not believe it.
And dost thou force me? this shall not be borne.
Thou shalt repent this insult. [Going]

Alon. Madam, stay.

Your passion 's wise; 'tis a disguise for guilt:
You and your thousand arts shall not escape me

Leon. Arts?

Alon. Arts! Confess; for death is in my hand

Leon. 'Tis in your words.

Alon. Confess, confess, confess!

Nor tear my veins with passion to compel thee.

Leon. I scorn to answer thee, presumptuous
man!

Alon. Deny then, and incur a fouler shame.

Where did I find this picture?

Leon. Ha, Don Carlos!

By my best hopes, more welcome than thy own

Alon. I know it; but is vice so very rank,

That thou should'st dare to dash it in my face?

Nature is sick of thee, abandon'd woman!

Leon. Repent.

Alon. Is that for me?

Leon. Fall, ask my pardon.

Alon. Astonishment!

Leon. Dar'st thou persist to think I am dishonest?

Alon. I know thee so.

Leon. This blow then to thy heart—

[She stabs herself; he endeavours to prevent her]

Alon. Ho, Zanga! Isabella! ho! she bleeds!

Descend, ye blessed angels, to assist her!

Leon. This is the only way I would wound thee
Though most unjust. Now think me guilty still

Enter ISABELLA.

Alon. Bear her to instant help. The world to save her.

Leon. Unhappy man! well may'st thou gaze and tremble.

But fix thy terror and amazement right;
Not on my blood, but on thy own distraction.
What hast thou done? whom censur'd—Leonora.
When thou hadst censur'd, thou wouldst save her life:

Oh, inconsistent! should I live in shame,
Or stoop to any other means but this,
To assert my virtue? no: she who disputes,
Admits it possible she might be guilty.

While aught but truth could be my inducement to it.

While it might look like an excuse to thee,
I scorn'd to vindicate my innocence:

But now, I let thy rashness know, the wound

Which least I feel, is that my dagger made

[Exit ISABELLA, leading out LEONORA.]

Alon. Ha! was this woman guilty?—And if not—

How my thoughts darken that way! grant, kind
Heaven,

That she prove guilty; or my being end.

Is that my hope, then?—Sure, the sacred dust

Of her that bore me trembles in its urn,

As it in man the sore distress to bear,

When hope itself is blacken'd to despair?

When all the bliss I pant for, is to gain
In hell, a refuge from severer pain? [Exit.]

Re-enter ZANGA.

Zan. How stands the great account 'twixt me and vengeance?
Though much is paid, yet still it owes me much,
And I will not abate a single groan—
Ha! that were well—but that were fatal too—
Why, be it so—Revenge so truly great,
Would come too cheap, if bought with less than life.

Re-enter ISABELLA.

Isa. Ah, Zanga, see me tremble! Has not yet
Thy cruel heart its fill? Poor Leonora—

Zan. Welters in blood, and gasps for her last breath.

What then? We all must die.

Isa. Alonzo raves,
And, in the tempest of his grief, has thrice
Attempted on his life. At length, disarm'd,
He calls his friends, that save him, his worst foes,
And importunes the skies for swift perdition.

Thus in his storm of sorrow: after pause,
He started up, and call'd aloud for Zanga;
For Zanga raved; and see, he seeks you here,
To learn that truth, which most he dreads to know.

Zan. Begone. Now, now, my soul, consummate
all. [Exit ISABELLA.]

Re-enter ALONZO.

Alon. Oh, Zanga!
Zan. Do not tremble so; but speak.

Alon. I dare not. [Falls on him.]

Zan. You will drown me with your tears.

Alon. Have I not cause?

Zan. As yet, you have no cause.

Alon. Dost thou too rave?

Zan. Your anguish is to come:

You much have been abus'd.

Alon. Abus'd! by whom?

Zan. To know, were little comfort.

Alon. Oh, 'twere much!

Zan. Indeed!

Alon. By Heaven! Oh, give him to my fury!

Zan. Born for your use, I live but to oblige you.

Know, then, 'twas—I.

Alon. Am I awake?

Zan. For ever.

Thy wife is guiltless—that 's one transport to me;

And I, I let thee know it—that 's another.

I urg'd Don Carlos to resign his mistress,

I forg'd the letter, I dispos'd the picture;

I hated, I despis'd, and I destroy!

Alon. Oh! [Swoons.]

Zan. Why, this is well—why, this is blow for blow!

Where are you? Crown me, shadow me with laurels,

Ye spirits which delight in just revenge!

Let Europe and her pallid sons go weep;

Let Africa and her hundred thrones rejoice:

Oh, my dear countrymen, look down and see

How I bestride your prostrate conqueror!

I tread on haughty Spain, and all her kings.

But this is mercy, this is my indulgence;

'Tis peace, 'tis refuge from my indignation.

I must awake him into horrors. Ho!

Alonzo, ho! the Moor is at the gate!

Awake, invincible, omnipotent!

'Thou who dost all subdue!

Alon. Inhuman slave!

Zan. Fallen Christian, thou mistak'st my character.

Look on me. Who am I?—I know, thou say'st
The Moor, a slave, an abject, beaten slave:

(Eternal woes to him that made me so!)

But look again. Has six years' cruel bondage

Extinguish'd majesty so far, that nought

Shines here to give an awe of one above thee?

When the great Moorish king, Abdallah, fell,

Fell by thy hand accurs'd, I fought fast by him,

His son, though, through his fondness, in disguise

Less to expose me to th' ambitious foe.—

Ha! does it wake thee?—O'er my father's corse

I stood astride till I had clove thy crest;

And then was made the captive of a squadron,

And sunk into thy servant—But, oh! what,

What were my wages? Hear not Heaven, nor

earth!

My wages were a blow! by Heaven, a blow!

And from a mortal hand!

Alon. Oh, villain, villain!

Zan. All strife is vain! [Showing a dagger.]

Alon. Is thus my love return'd?

Is this my recompense? Make friends of tigers!

Lay not your young, oh, mothers, on the breast,

For fear they turn to serpents as they lie,

And pay you for their nourishment with death!—

Carlos is dead, and Leonora dying!

Both innocent, both murder'd, both by me.

Zan. Must I despise thee too, as well as hate
thee?

Complain of grief, complain thou art a man.—

Priam from fortune's lofty summit fell;

Great Alexander 'midst his conquests mourn'd;

Heroes and demi-gods have known their sorrows

Cessars have wept; and I have had—my blow;

But, 'tis reveng'd, and now my work is done.

Yet, ere I fall, be it one part of vengeance

To force thee to confess that I am just.—

Thou seest a prince, whose father thou hast slain,

Whose native country thou hast laid in blood,

Whose sacred person (oh!) thou hast profan'd,

Whose reign extinguish'd—what was left to me,

So highly born? No kingdom, but revenge;

No treasure but thy tortures and thy groans.

If men should ask who brought thee to thy end,

Tell them, the Moor, and they will not despise
thee.

If cold white mortals censure this great deed,

Warn them, they judge not of superior beings,

Souls made of fire, and children of the sun,

With whom revenge is virtue. Fare thee well—

Now, fully satisfied, I should take leave:

But one thing grieves me, since thy death is near,

I leave thee my example how to die.

As he is going to stab himself, ALONZO rushes upon him to prevent him. In the mean time, enter DON ALVAREZ, attended. They disarm and seize ZANGA. ALONZO puts the dagger in his bosom.

Alon. No, monster, thou shalt not escape by death.

Oh, father!

Alv. Oh, Alonzo!—Isabella,

'Touch'd with remorse to see her mistress' pangs,

Told all the dreadful tale.

Alon. What groan was that?

Zan. As I have been a vulture to thy heart—

So will I be a raven to thine ear,

As true as ever snuff'd the scent of blood,

As ever flap'd its heavy wing against

The window of the sick, and croak'd despair.
Thy wife is dead.

[ALVAREZ goes aside, and returns.

Alv. The dreadful news is true.

Alon. Prepare the rack; invent new torments for him.

Zan. This too is well. The fix'd and noble mind
Turns all occurrence to its own advantage;
And I'll make vengeance of calamity.
Were I not thus reduc'd, thou wouldst not know,
That, thus reduc'd, I dare/defy thee still.
Torture thou may'st, but thou shalt ne'er despise
me.

The blood will follow where the knife is driven,
The flesh will quiver where the pincers tear,
And sighs and cries by nature grow on pain.
But these are foreign to the soul: not mine
The groans that issue, or the tears that fall;
They disobey me; on the rack I scorn thee,
As when my falchion clove thy helm in battle.

Alv. Peace, villain!

Zan. While I live, old man, I'll speak:
And, well I know, thou dar'st not kill me yet;
For that would rob thy blood-hounds of their prey.

Alon. Who call'd Alonzo?

Alv. No one call'd, my son.

Alon. Again!—'Tis Carlos' voice, and I obey.
Oh, how I laugh at all that this can do!

[Shows the dagger.

VOL. I. . . . 2 X

The wounds that pain'd, the wounds that murder'd me,

Were given before; I am already dead;

This only marks my body for the grave.

Afric, thou art reveng'd.—Oh, Leonora!
[Stabs himself.

Zan. Good ruffians, give me leave; my blood is yours,

The wheel's prepar'd, and you shall have it
all.

Let me but look one moment on the dead.

And pay yourselves with gazing on my pangs.

[He goes to ALONZO'S body.

Is this Alonzo? Where's the haughty mien?

Is that the hand which smote me? Heavens, how pale!

And art thou dead! So is my enmity.

I war not with the dust. The great, the proud,

The conqueror of Afric, was my foe.

A lion preys not upon carcasses.

This was the only method to subdue me.

Terror and doubt fall on me: all thy good

Now blazes, all thy guilt is in the grave.

Never had man such funeral applause:

If I lament thee, sure thy worth was great.

Oh, vengeance, I have follow'd thee too far.

And to receive me, hell blows all her fires.

[Exeunt.

THE RIVALS:

A COMEDY,

IN FIVE ACTS.

BY R. B. SHERIDAN, Esq.

REMARKS.

This was the earliest theatrical production of Mr. Sheridan, and was first brought on the stage at Covent Garden in the year 1775, when it was disliked by the audience, and of course laid aside.

On subsequent revival, at Covent Garden and at Drury Lane, the public were highly delighted with it; and it is still looked upon as an excellent specimen of pure and just Comedy, which the judges of theatrical composition had so long deplored the want of.

Comedy proposes for its object the exposure of the follies and slighter vices of mankind, so as to raise in the beholders a sense of their impropriety, and to expose them to censure and laughter: it endeavours to “Catch the manners living as they rise;”

and, in the Rivals, its judicious author has given pictures taken from among ourselves: he has satirized the reigning vices; and exhibited to the age a faithful copy of itself, with its humours, its follies, its manners, and its extravagancies.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Street at Bath.

COACHMAN crosses the Stage.—Enter FAG, looking after him.

Fag. What, Thomas! Sure, 'tis he!—What, Thomas, Thomas!

Coach. Hey! odd's life! Mr. Fag; give us your hand, my old fellow-servant!

Fag. Excuse my glove, Thomas; I'm devilish glad to see you, my lad! why, my prince of chario-teers, you look as hearty!—but who the deuce thought of seeing you in Bath?

Coach. Sure, master, Madam Julia, Harry, Mrs. Kate, and the postillion, be all come.

Fag. Indeed!

Coach. Ay: master thought another fit of the gout was coming to make him a visit, so he'd a mind to gi't the slip,—and whip! we were all off at an hour's warning.

Fag. Ay, ay; hasty in every thing, or it would not be Sir Anthony Absolute.

Coach. But tell us, Mr. Fag, how does young master? Odd, Sir Anthony will stare, to see the captain here!

Fag. I do not serve Captain Absolute now.

Coach. Why, sure!

Fag. At present, I am employed by Ensign Beverley.

Coach. I doubt, Mr. Fag, you ha'n't changed for the better.

Fag. I have not changed, Thomas.

Coach. No! why, didn't you say, you had left young master?

Fag. No. Well, honest Thomas, I must puzzle you no further;—briefly then—Captain Absolute and Ensign Beverley are one and the same person.

Coach. The devil they are: do tell us, Mr. Fag, the meaning on't.

Fag. You'll be secret, Thomas?

Coach. As a coach horse.

Fag. Why, then the cause of all this is love,—love, Thomas, who has been a masquerader ever since the days of Jupiter.

Coach. But, pray, why does your master pass only for ensign?—now, if he had shammed general, indeed—

Fag. Ah, Thomas! there lies the mystery o' the matter!—Harkye, Thomas, my master is in love with a lady of a very singular taste—a lady, who likes him better as a half-pay ensign, than if she knew he was son and heir to Sir Anthony Absolute, a baronet of three thousand a year.

Coach. That is an odd taste, indeed! but has she got the stuff, Mr. Fag? is she rich, eh?

Fag. Rich! why, I believe she owns half the stocks! Zounds, Thomas, she could pay the national debt, as easily as I could my washerwoman!—She has a lap-dog that eats out of gold—she feeds her parrot with small pearls, and all her thread papers are made of bank notes!

Coach. Bravo, faith!—Odd! I warrant she has a set of thousands, at least; but does she draw kindly with the captain?

Fag. As fond as pigeons.

Coach. May one hear her name?

Fag. Miss Lydia Languish:—But there is an odd tough aunt in the way—though, by the bye, she has never seen my master—for he got acquainted with Miss, while on a visit in Gloucestershire.

Coach. Well, I wish they were once harnessed together in matrimony. But, pray, Mr. Fag, what kind of a place is this Bath? I ha' heard a great deal of it;—here 's a mort o' merry making, eh?

Fag. Pretty well, Thomas, pretty well—'tis a good lounge—but, damn the place, I'm tired of it; their regular hours stuffy me—not a fiddle or a card, after eleven! however, Mr. Faulkland's gentleman and I keep it up a little, in private parties;—I'll introduce you there, Thomas, you'll like him much.—But, Thomas, you must polish a little—indeed, you must;—Here, now, this wig! what, the devil, do you do with a wig, Thomas? none of the London whips, of any degree of ton, wear wigs now.

Coach. More 's the pity, more 's the pity, I say—Odds life! when I heard how the lawyers and doctors had took to their own hair, I thought how 'twould go next. Odd rabbit it! when the fashion had got foot on the bar, I guessed 'twould mount to the box! but 'tis all out of character, believe me, Mr. Fag: and lookye, I'll never give up mine, the lawyers and doctors may do as they will.

Fag. Well, Thomas, we'll not quarrel about that. But hold, mark—mark, Thomas.

Coach. Zooks, 'tis the captain! Is that the lady with him?

Fag. No, no, that is Madam Lucy, my master's mistress' maid; they lodge at that house—but I must after him, to tell him the news.

Coach. Odd, he's giving her money!—Well, Mr. Fag—

Fag. Good bye, Thomas; I have an appointment in Gyde's porch, this evening, at eight; meet me there, and we'll make a little party.

[Exeunt severally.]

SCENE II.—A Dressing-Room in Mrs. MALAPROP'S Lodgings.

LYDIA LANGUISH sitting on a Sofa, with a book in her hand; LUCY, as just returned from a message.

Lucy. Indeed, Ma'am, I traversed half the town in search of it: I don't believe there's a circulating library in Bath I ha'n't been at.

Lyd. And could not you get "The Reward of Constancy"?

Lucy. No, indeed, Ma'am.

Lyd. Nor "The Fatal Connexion"?

Lucy. No, indeed, Ma'am.

Lyd. Nor "The Mistakes of the Heart"?

Lucy. Ma'am, as ill luck would have it, Mr. Bull said, Miss Sukey Saunter had just fetched it away.

Lyd. Heigho! Did you inquire for "The Delicate Distress"?

Lucy. Or, "The Memoirs of Lady Woodford"? Yes, indeed, Ma'am, I asked every where for it; and I might have brought it from Mr. Frederick's, but lady Slattern Lounger, who had just sent it home, had so soiled and dog's-eared it, it wa'n't fit for a Christian to read.

Lyd. Heigho! Yes, I always know when lady Slattern has been before me: She has a most observing thumb, and, I believe, cherishes her nails for the convenience of making marginal notes. Well, child, what have you brought me?

Lucy. Oh, here, Ma'am! [Taking books from under her cloak, and from her pockets.] This is "The Man of Feeling," and this, "Peregrine Pickle."—Here are "The Tears of Sensibility," and "Humphrey Clinker."

Lyd. Hold! here's some one coming—quick, see who it is—[Exit Lucy.—Surely, I heard my cousin Julia's voice!

Enter LUCY.

Lucy. Lud, Ma'am! here is Miss Melville!

Lyd. Is it possible!

Enter JULIA.

Lyd. My dearest Julia, how delighted am I: [Embrace.] How unexpected was this happiness!

Jul. True, Lydia, and our pleasure is the greater; but what has been the matter? you were denied to me at first.

Lyd. Ah, Julia, I have a thousand things to tell you! but first inform me what has conjured you to Bath?—Is Sir Anthony here?

Jul. He is; we are arrived within this hour, and I suppose he will be here to wait on Mrs. Malaprop as soon as he is dressed.

Lyd. Then, before we are interrupted, let me impart to you some of my distress; I know your gentle nature will sympathize with me, though your prudence may condemn me: My letters have informed you of my whole connexion with Beverley; but I have lost him, Julia!—My aunt has discovered our intercourse, by a note she intercepted, and has confined me ever since: Yet, would you believe it? she has fallen absolutely in love with a tall Irish baronet, she met one night, since we have been here, at lady Mac-shuffle's rout.

Jul. You jest, Lydia.

Lyd. No, upon my word:—She really carries on a kind of correspondence with him, under a feigned name though, till she chooses to be known to him;—but it is a Delia, or a Ceila, I assure you.

Jul. Then, surely, she is now more indulgent to her niece?

Lyd. Quite the contrary: since she has discovered her own frailty, she is become more suspicious of mine—Then I must inform you of another plague; that odious Acres is to be in Bath to-day, so that I protest, I shall be teased out of all spirits!

Jul. Come, come, Lydia, hope for the best:—Sir Anthony shall use his interest with Mrs. Malaprop.

Lyd. But you have not heard the worst:—Unfortunately I had quarrelled with my poor Beverley, just before my aunt made the discovery, and I have not seen him since, to make it up.

Jul. What was his offence?

Lyd. Nothing at all; but I don't know how it was, as often as we had been together, we had never had a quarrel; and, somehow, I was afraid he would never give me an opportunity; so, last Thursday, I wrote a letter to myself, to inform myself that Beverley was, at that time, paying his addresses to another woman.—I signed it, 'Your friend unknown,' showed it to Beverley, charged him with his falsehood, put myself in a violent passion, and vowed I'd never see him more.

Jul. And you let him depart so, and have not seen him since?

Lyd. 'Twas the next day my aunt found the matter out; I intended only to have teased him three days and a half, and now I've lost him for ever.

Jul. If he is as deserving and sincere as you have represented him to me, he will never give you up so. Yet consider, Lydia, you tell me he is but an ensign—and you have thirty thousand pounds!

Lyd. But, you know, I lose most of my fortune, if I marry, without my aunt's consent, till of age; and that is what I have determined to do ever since I knew the penalty; nor could I love the man who would wish to wait a day for the alternative.

Jul. Nay, this is caprice!

Lyd. What, does Julia tax me with caprice? I thought her lover Faulkland had injured her to it.

Jul. I do not love even his faults.

Lyd. But a-propos! you have sent to him, I suppose?

Jul. Not yet, upon my word! nor has he the least idea of my being in Bath:—Sir Anthony's resolution was so sudden I could not inform him of it.

E. d. Well, Julia, you are your own mistress, though under the protection of Sir Anthony; yet have you, for this long year, been a slave to the caprice, the whim, the jealousy, of this ungrateful Faulkland, who will ever delay assuming the right of a husband, while you suffer him to be equally imperious as a lover.

Jul. Nay, you are wrong entirely:—We were contracted before my father's death: That, and some consequent embarrassments, have delayed what I know to be my Faulkland's most ardent wish.—He is too generous to trifle on such a point;—and, for his character, you wrong him there too.—No, Lydia, he is too proud, too noble to be jealous; if he is captious, 'tis without dissembling; if fretful, without rudeness. Unused to the fopperies of love, he is negligent of the little duties expected from a lover.—This temper, I must own, has cost me many unhappy hours; but I have learned to think myself his debtor for those imperfections which arise from the ardour of his attachment.

Lyd. Well, I cannot blame you for defending him; but, tell me candidly, Julia—had he never saved your life, do you think you should have been attached to him as you are? Believe me, the rude blast that upset your boat was a prosperous gale of love to him.

Jul. Gratitude may have strengthened my attachment to Mr. Faulkland, but I loved him before he had preserved me; yet, surely, that alone were an obligation sufficient—

Lyd. Obligation! why, a water spaniel would have done as much! Well, I should never think of giving my heart to a man because he could swim!—What's here?

Enter LUCY, in a hurry.

Lucy. O, Ma'am, here is Sir Anthony Absolute, just come home with your aunt!

Lyd. They'll not come here:—Lucy, do you watch. [Exit LUCY.]

Jul. Yet I must go; Sir Anthony does not know I am here, and if we meet, he'll detain me, to show me the town. I'll take another opportunity of paying my respects to Mrs. Malaprop, when she shall treat me, as long as she chooses, with her select words, so ingeniously misapplied, without being mispronounced.

Enter LUCY.

Lucy. O lud, Ma'am! they are both coming up stairs!

Lyd. Well, I'll not detain you.—Adieu, my dear Julia! I'm sure you are in haste to send to Faulkland.—There—through my room you'll find another staircase.

Jul. Adieu!

[Exit JULIA.]

Lyd. Here, my dear Lucy, hide these books.—Quick, quick.—Fling "Peregrine Pickle" under the toilet—throw "Roderick Random" into the closet—put "The Innocent Adultery" into "The Whole Duty of Man"—thrust "Lord Aimworth" under the sofa—cram "Ovid" behind the bolster—there—put "The Man of Feeling" into your pocket.—Now for them!

Enter MRS. MALAPROP and SIR ANTHONY ABSOLUTE.

Mrs. M. There, Sir Anthony, there sits the deliberate simpleton, who wants to disgrace her family, and lavish herself on a fellow not worth a shilling.

Lyd. Madam, I thought you once—

Mrs. M. You thought, Miss! I don't know any business you have to think at all: thought does not become a young woman. But the point we would request of you is, that you will promise to forget this fellow—to illiterate him, I say, from your memory.

Lyd. Ah, Madam! our memories are independent of our wills. It is not so easy to forget.

Mrs. M. But, I say, it is, Miss! there is nothing on earth so easy as to forget, if a person chooses to set about it. I'm sure I have as much forgot your poor dear uncle, as if he had never existed; and I thought it my duty to do so; and let me tell you, Lydia, these violent memories don't become a young woman.

Sir A. Why, sure, she won't pretend to remember what she's ordered not! ay, this comes of her reading!

Lyd. What crime, Madam, have I committed, to be treated thus?

Mrs. M. Now don't attempt to extirpate yourself from the matter; you know I have proof controvertible of it: but, tell me, will you promise to do as you're bid? will you take a husband of your friends' choosing?

Lyd. Madam, I must tell you plainly, that, had no preference for any one else, the choice you have made would be my aversion.

Mrs. M. What business have you, Miss, with preference and aversion? they don't become a young woman; and you ought to know, that, as both always wear off, 'tis safest, in matrimony, to begin with a little aversion. I am sure I hated your poor, dear uncle, before marriage, as if he'd been a black-a-moor; and yet, Miss, you are sensible what a wife I made? and when it pleased Heaven to release me from him, 'tis unknown what tears I shed! But, suppose we were going to give you another choice, will you promise us to give up this Beverley?

Lyd. Could I belie my thoughts so far as to give that promise, my actions would certainly as far belie my words.

Mrs. M. Take yourself to your room; you are fit company for nothing but your own ill humours.

Lyd. Willingly, Ma'am; I cannot change for the worse. [Exit.]

Mrs. M. There's a little intricate hussy for you!

Sir A. It is not to be wondered at, Ma'am; all this is the natural consequence of teaching girls to read. In my way hither, Mrs. Malaprop, I observed your niece's maid coming forth from a circulating library; she had a book in each hand—they were half-bound volumes, with marble covers; from that moment, I guessed how full of duty I should see her mistress!

Mrs. M. Those are vile places, indeed!

Sir A. Madam, a circulating library in a town is, as an evergreen tree of diabolical knowledge?—It blossoms through the year! and depend on it, Mrs. Malaprop, that they who are so fond of handling the leaves will long for the fruit at last.

Mrs. M. Fie, fie, Sir Anthony! you surely speak laconically.

Sir A. Why, Mrs. Malaprop, in moderation, now, what would you have a woman know?

Mrs. M. Observe me, Sir Anthony—I would by no means wish a daughter of mine to be a progeny of learning; I don't think so much learning becomes a young woman;—for instance—I would never let her meddle with Greek, or Hebrew, or Algebra, or Simony, or Fluxions, or Paradoxes, or such inflammatory branches of learning: nor would it be necessary for her to handle any of your mathematical, astronomical, diabolical instruments; but, Sir Anthony, I would send her, at nine years old, to a boarding-school, in order to learn a little ingenuity and artifice. Then, Sir, she should have a supercilious knowledge in accounts; and, as she grew up, I would have her instructed in geometry, that she might know something of the contagious countries. This, Sir Anthony, is what I would have a woman know; and I don't think there is a superstitious article in it.

Sir A. Well, well, Mrs. Malaprop, I will dispute the point no further with you; though I must confess, that you are a truly moderate and polite arguer, for almost every third word you say is on my side of the question.—But, Mrs. Malaprop, to the more important point in debate,—you say you have no objection to my proposal?

Mrs. M. None, I assure you.—I am under no positive engagement with Mr. Acres; and as Lydia is so obstinate against him, perhaps your son may have better success.

Sir A. Well, Madam, I will write for the boy directly.—He knows not a syllable of this yet, though I have for some time had the proposal in my head. He is at present with his regiment.

Mrs. M. We have never seen your son, Sir Anthony; but I hope no objection on his side.

Sir A. Objection!—let him object if he dare!—No, no, Mrs. Malaprop: Jack knows, that the least demur puts me in a phrenzy directly. My process was always very simple—in their younger days, 'twas, "Jack do this,"—if he demurred, I knocked him down; and if he grumbled at that, I always sent him out of the room.

Mrs. M. Ay, and the properest way, o'my conscience!—Nothing is so conciliating to young people as severity.—Well, Sir Anthony, I shall give Mr. Acres his discharge, and prepare Lydia to receive your son's invocations; and I hope you will represent her to the captain as an object not altogether illegible.

Sir A. Madam, I will handle the subject prudently. Well, I must leave you; and let me beg you, Mrs. Malaprop, to enforce this matter roundly to the girl—take my advice, keep a tight hand—if she rejects this proposal, clap her under lock and key; and if you were just to let the servants forget to bring her dinner for three or four days, you can't conceive how she'd come about.

[Exit SIR ANTHONY.]

Mrs. M. Well, at any rate, I shall be glad to get her from under my intuition. She has somehow discovered my partiality for Sir Lucius O'Trigger. Sure, Lucy can't have betrayed me!—No, the girl is such a simpleton, I should have made her confess it.—Lucy! Lucy! [Calls.] Had she been one of your artificial ones, I should never have trusted her.

Enter LUCY.

Lucy. Did you call, Ma'am?

Mrs. M. Yes, girl.—Did you see Sir Lucius while you was out?

Lucy. No indeed, Ma'am, not a glimpse of him.

Mrs. M. You are sure, Lucy, that you never mentioned—

Lucy. O gemini! I'd sooner cut my tongue out!

Mrs. M. Well, don't let your simplicity be imposed on.

Lucy. No, Ma'am.

Mrs. M. So, come to me presently, and I'll give you another letter to Sir Lucius—but mind, Lucy, if ever you betray what you are intrusted with (unless it be other people's secrets to me,) you forfeit my malevolence for ever: and your being a simpleton shall be no excuse for your locality.

[Exit.

Lucy. Ha, ha, ha! So, my dear simplicity, let me give you a little respite; [Altering her manner.] let girls, in my station, be as fond as they please of being expert and knowing in their trusts, commend me to a mask of silliness, and a pair of sharp eyes for my own interest under it!—Let me see to what account have I turned my simplicity lately; [Looks at a paper.] For abetting Miss Lydia Languish in a design of running away with an ensign! in money, sundry times, twelve pound twelve—gowns, five; hats, ruffles, caps, &c. &c. numberless.—From the said ensign, within this last month, six guineas and a half—About a quarter's pay!—Item, from Mrs. Malaprop, for betraying the young people to her—when I found matters were likely to be discovered,—two guineas and a black paduasoy.—Item, from Mr. Acres, for carrying divers letters—which I never delivered—two guineas and a pair of buckles.—Item, from Sir Lucius O' Trigger, three crowns, two gold pocket-pieces, and a silver snuff-box!—Well done, simplicity! yet I was forced to make my Hibernian believe, that he was corresponding, not with the aunt, but with the niece; for, though not over rich, I found he had too much pride and delicacy to sacrifice the feelings of a gentleman to the necessities of his fortune.

[Exit.

ACT II.

SCENE I.—CAPTAIN ABSOLUTE'S Lodgings.

CAPTAIN ABSOLUTE and FAG.

Fag. Sir, while I was there, Sir Anthony came in; I told him you had sent me to inquire after his health, and to know if he was at leisure to see you.

Capt. A. And what did he say, on hearing I was at Bath?

Fag. Sir, in my life, I never saw an elderly gentleman more astonished!

Capt. A. Well, Sir, and what did you say?

Fag. O, I lied, Sir—I forget the precise lie, but, you may depend on't, he got no truth from me.—Yet, with submission, for fear of blunders in future, I should be glad to fix what has brought us to Bath, in order that we may lie a little consistently.—Sir Anthony's servants were curious, Sir, very curious indeed.

Capt. A. You have said nothing to them?—

Fag. Oh, not a word, Sir, not a word; Mr. Thomas, indeed, the coachman (whom I take to be the discreetest of whips)—

Capt. A. 'Sdeath!—you rascal! you have not trusted him?

Fag. Oh, no, Sir—no—no—not a syllable, upon my veracity!—He was, indeed, a little inquisitive; but I was sly, Sir—devilish sly!—My master (said I) honest Thomas (you know, Sir, one says honest to one's inferiors) is come to Bath to recruit—yes, Sir—I said to recruit—and whether for men, money, or constitution, you know, Sir, is nothing to him, nor any one else.

Capt. A. Well—recruit will do—let it be so—

Fag. Oh, Sir, recruit will do surprisingly;—

indeed, to give the thing an air, I told Thomas, that your honour had already enlisted five disbanded chairmen, seven minority waiters, and thirteen billiard markers.

Capt. A. You blockhead, never say more than is necessary.

Fag. I beg pardon, Sir—I beg pardon—But, with submission, a lie is nothing unless one supports it.—Sir; whenever I draw on my invention for a good current lie, I always forge indorsements as well as the bill.

Capt. A. Well, take care you don't hurt your credit by offering too much security. Is Mr. Faulkland returned?

Fag. He is above, Sir, changing his dress.

Capt. A. Can you tell whether he has been informed of Sir Anthony's and Miss Melville's arrival?

Fag. I fancy not, Sir; he has seen no one since he came in, but his gentleman, who was with him at Bristol.—I think, Sir, I hear Mr. Faulkland coming down—

Capt. A. Go, tell him I am here.

Fag. Yes, Sir—[Going.] I beg pardon, Sir, but should Sir Anthony call, you will do me the favour to remember that we are recruiting, if you please.

Capt. A. Well, well.

Fag. And in tenderness to my character, if your honour could bring in the chairmen and waiters, I shall esteem it as an obligation;—for, though I never scruple a lie to serve my master, yet it hurts one's conscience to be found out.

[Exit.

Capt. A. Now for my whimsical friend:—If he does not know that his mistress is here, I'll tease him a little before I tell him—

Enter FAG.

Fag. Mr. Faulkland, Sir.

[Exit.

Enter FAULKLAND.

Capt. A. Faulkland, you're welcome to Bath again: you are punctual in your return.

Faulk. Yes; I had nothing to detain me, when I had finished the business I went on. Well, what news since I left you? how stand matters between you and Lydia?

Capt. A. Faith, much as they were.

Faulk. Nay, then you trifle too long—if you are sure of her, propose to the aunt, in your own character, and write to Sir Anthony for his consent.

Capt. A. Softly, softly, for though I am convinced my little Lydia would elope with me as Ensign Beverley, yet am I by no means certain that she would take me with the impediment of our friends' consent, a regular humdrum wedding, and the reversion of a good fortune on my side.—Well, but Faulkland, you'll dine with us to-day at the hotel?

Faulk. Indeed, I cannot; I am not in spirits to be of such a party.

Capt. A. By heavens! I shall forswear your company. You are the most teasing, captious, incorrigible lover!—Do love like a man.

Faulk. Ah! Jack, your heart and soul are not, like mine, fixed immutably on one only object.—You throw for a large stake, but losing, you could stake and throw again; but I have set my sum of happiness on this cast, and not to succeed were to be stripped of all.

Capt. A. But, for heaven's sake, what grounds for apprehension can your whimsical brain conjure up at present?

Faulk. What grounds for apprehension, did you say? Heavens! are there not a thousand! I fear for her spirits—her health—her life—O! Jack, when delicate and feeling souls are separated, there is not a feature in the sky, not a movement in the elements, not an aspiration of the breeze, but hints some cause for a lover's apprehension!

Capt. A. Ay, but we may choose whether we will take the hint or not.—So then, Faulkland, if you were convinced that Julia were well, and in spirits, you would be entirely content?

Faulk. I should be happy beyond measure—I am anxious only for that.

Capt. A. Then cure your anxiety at once—Miss Melville is in perfect health, and is at this moment in Bath.

Faulk. Nay, Jack—don't trifle with me.

Capt. A. She is arrived here with my father, within this hour.

Faulk. Can you be serious?

Capt. A. I thought you knew Sir Anthony better than to be surprised at a sudden whim of this kind.—Seriously then, it is as I tell you—upon my honour.

Faulk. My dear Jack—now nothing on earth can give me a moment's uneasiness.

Enter FAG.

Fag. Sir, Mr. Acres, just arrived, is below.

Capt. A. Stay, Faulkland, this Acres lives within a mile of Sir Anthony, and he shall tell you how your mistress has been ever since you left her.—Fag, show the gentleman up.

[Exit FAG.]

Faulk. What, is he much acquainted in the family?

Capt. A. Oh, very intimate: he is likewise a rival of mine—that is, of my other self's, for he does not think his friend, Captain Absolute, ever saw the lady in question;—and it is ridiculous enough to hear him complain to me of one Beverley, a concealed, skulking rival, who—Faulk. Hush! He's here!

Enter ACRES.

Acres. Hah! my dear friend, noble captain, and honest Jack, how dost thou? just arrived, 'faith, as you see.—Sir, your humble servant. Warm work on the roads, Jack—odds whips and wheels! I've travelled like a comet, with a tail of dust all the way, as long as the Mall.

Capt. A. Ah! Bob, you are indeed an eccentric planet, but we know your attraction hither—give me leave to introduce Mr. Faulkland to you; Mr. Faulkland, Mr. Acres.

Acres. Sir, I am most heartily glad to see you: Sir, I solicit your connexions.—Hey, Jack—what, this is Mr. Faulkland, who—

Capt. A. Ay, Bob, Miss Melville's Mr. Faulkland.

Acres. Ah! Mr. Faulkland, you are indeed a happy man!

Faulk. I have not seen Miss Melville yet, Sir.—I hope she enjoyed full health and spirits in Devonshire?

Acres. Never knew her better in my life, Sir—never better.—Odds blushes and blooms! she has been as healthy as the German spa.

Faulk. Indeed!—I did hear that she had been a little indisposed.

Acres. False, false, Sir—only said to vex you: quite the reverse, I assure you.

Faulk. There Jack, you see she has the advantage of me; I had almost fretted myself ill.

Capt. A. Now you are angry with your mistress for not having been sick!

Faulk. No, no, you misunderstand me:—yet surely a little trifling indisposition is not an unnatural consequence of absence from those we love.—Now confess—is't there something unkind in this violent, robust, unfeeling health?

Capt. A. Oh, it was very unkind of her to be well in your absence, to be sure!

Acres. Good apartments, Jack.

Faulk. Well, Sir, but you was saying that Miss Melville has been so exceedingly well—what then, she has been merry and gay, I suppose?—always in spirits, hey?

Acres. Merry! odds crickets! she has been the bell and spirit of the company wherever she has been—so lively and entertaining! so full of wit and humour!

Faulk. By my soul! there is an innate levity in woman that nothing can overcome!—What! happy, and I away!

Capt. A. Just now, you were only apprehensive for your mistress' spirits.

Faulk. Why, Jack, have I been the joy and spirit of the company?

Capt. A. No, indeed, you have not.

Faulk. Have I been lively and entertaining?

Capt. A. Oh, upon my word, I acquit you.

Faulk. Have I been full of wit and humour?

Capt. A. No, 'faith, to do you justice, you have been confoundedly stupid, indeed.

Acres. What's the matter with the gentleman?

Capt. A. He is only expressing his great satisfaction at hearing that Julia has been so well and happy—that's all—hey, Faulkland?

Faulk. Yes, yes, she has a happy disposition!

Acres. That she has, indeed—then she is so accomplished—so sweet a voice—so expert at her harpsichord—such a mistress of flat and sharp, squallante, rumbante, and quiverante!—there was this time month—odds minims and crotchets! how she did chirrup at Mrs. Piano's concert! [Sings.] My heart's my own, my will is free. That's very like her.

Faulk. Fool! fool that I am! to fix all my happiness on such a trifer! 'Sdeath! to make herself the pipe and ballad-monger of a circle! to soothe her light heart with catches and glees!—What can you say to this, Sir?

Capt. A. Why, that I should be glad to hear my mistress had been so merry, Sir.

Faulk. Nay, nay, nay—I'm not sorry that she has been happy—no, no, I am glad of that—but she has been dancing too, I doubt not!

Acres. What does the gentleman say about dancing?

Capt. A. He says the lady we speak of dances as well as she sings.

Acres. Ay, truly does she—there was at our last race ball—

Faulk. Hell and the devil! There! there—I told you so! I told you so! oh! she thrives in my absence!—Dancing!

Capt. A. For Heaven's sake, Faulkland, don't expose yourself so!—Suppose she has danced, what then?—does not the ceremony of society often oblige—

Faulk. Well, well, I'll contain myself—perhaps, as you say—for form sake.—I say, Mr.—Mr.—What's his damned name?

Capt. A. Acres, Acres.

Faulk. O ay, Mr. Acres, you were praising Miss Melville's manner of dancing a minuet—hey?

Acres. Oh, I dare insure her for that—but what I was going to speak of, was her country dancing:—odds swimmings! she has such an air with her!—

Faulk. Now, disappointment on her!—defend this, Absolute! why don't you defend this?—country dances! jigs and reels! am I to blame now? a minuet I could have forgiven—I should not have minded that—I say, I should not have regarded a minuet—but country dances! Zounds! had she made one in a cottillion—I believe I could have forgiven even that—but to be monkey-led for a night!—to run the gauntlet through a string of amorous, palming puppies!—to show paces, like a managed filly!—Oh, Jack, there never can be but one man in the world whom a truly modest and delicate woman ought to pair with in a country dance; and, even then, the rest of the couples should be her great uncles and aunts!

Capt. A. Ay, to be sure, grandfathers and grandmothers!

Faulk. If there be but one vicious mind in the set, it will spread like a contagion—the action of their pulse beats to the lascivious movement of the jig—their quivering, warm-breathed sighs impregnate the air—the atmosphere becomes electrical to love, and each amorous spark darts through every link of the chain!—I must leave you—I own I am somewhat flurried—and that confounded looby has perceived it. [Going.]

Capt. A. Nay, but stay, Faulkland, and thank Mr. Acres for his good news.

Faulk. Damn his news. [Exit.]

Capt. A. Ha, ha, ha! poor Faulkland! five minutes since—"nothing on earth could give him a moment's uneasiness!"

Acres. The gentleman wasn't angry at my praising his mistress, was he?

Capt. A. A little jealous, I believe, Bob.

Acres. You don't say so! ha, ha! jealous of me!—that's a good joke!

Capt. A. There's nothing strange in that, Bob; let me tell you, that sprightly grace and insinuating manner of yours will do some mischief among the girls here.

Acres. Ah! you joke—ha, ha! mischief—ha, ha! you know I am not my own property! my dear Lydia has forestalled me.—She could never abide me in the country, because I used to dress so badly—but, odds frogs and tambours! I sha'n't take matters so here—now ancient Madam has no voice in it—I'll make my old clothes know who's master—I shall straightway cashier the hunting-frock, and render my leather breeches incapable—My hair has been in training some time.

Capt. A. Indeed!

Acres. Ay—and thoff the side curls are a little restive, my hind part takes it very kindly.

Capt. A. O, you'll polish, I doubt not.

Acres. Absolutely I propose so—then, if I can find out this ensign Beverley, odds triggers and flints! I'll make him know the difference o't.

Capt. A. Spoke like a man—but, pray, Bob, I observe you have got an odd kind of a new method of swearing—

Acres. Ha, ha! you've taken notice of it—'tis genteel, isn't it?—I didn't invent it myself though; but a commander in our militia, a great scholar, I assure you, says that there is no meaning in the common oaths, and that nothing but their antiquity makes them respectable; because, he says, the ancients would never stick to an oath or two, but would say, by Jove! or by Bacchus! or by Mars! or by Venus! or by Pallas! according to the sentiment;—so that to swear with propriety says my little major, the "oath should be an echo to the sense!" and this we call the oath referential, or sentimental swearing—ha, ha, ha! 'tis genteel, isn't it?

Capt. A. Very genteel, and very new indeed—and I dare say will supplant all other figures of imprecation.

Acres. Ay, ay, the best terms will grow obsolete—Dammes have had their day.

Enter FAG.

Fag. Sir, there is a gentleman below desires to see you—Shall I show him into the parlour?

Capt. A. Ay—you may.

Acres. Well, I must be gone—

Capt. A. Stay; who is it, Fag?

Fag. Your father, Sir.

Capt. A. You puppy, why didn't you show him up directly? [Exit FAG.]

Acres. You have business with Sir Anthony. I expect a message from Mrs. Malaprop at my lodgings. I have sent also to my dear friend, Sir Lucius O'Trigger. Adieu, Jack, we must meet at night, when you shall give me a dozen bumpers to little Lydia.

Capt. A. That I will, with all my heart. [Exit ACRES.] Now for a parental lecture—I hope he has heard nothing of the business that has brought me here; I wish the gout had held him fast in Devonshire, with all my soul!

Enter SIR ANTHONY.

Sir, I am delighted to see you here, and looking so well! your sudden arrival at Bath made me apprehensive for your health.

Sir A. Very apprehensive, I dare say, Jack. What, you are recruiting here, hey?

Capt. A. Yes, Sir, I am on duty.

Sir A. Well, Jack, I am glad to see you, though I did not expect it! for I was going to write to you on a little matter of business. Jack, I have been considering that I grow old and infirm, and shall probably not trouble you long.

Capt. A. Pardon me, Sir, I never saw you look more strong and hearty, and I pray fervently that you may continue so.

Sir A. I hope your prayers may be heard, with all my heart. Well then, Jack, I have been considering that I am so strong and hearty, I may continue to plague you a long time. Now, Jack, I am sensible that the income of your commission, and what I have hitherto allowed you, is but a small pittance for a lad of your spirit.

Capt. A. Sir, you are very good.

Sir A. And it is my wish, while yet I live, to have my boy make some figure in the world. I have resolved, therefore, to fix you at once in a noble independence.

Capt. A. Sir, your kindness overpowers me. Yet, Sir, I presume you would not wish me to quit the army?

Sir A. Oh! that shall be as your wife chooses.

Capt. A. My wife, Sir!

Sir A. Ay, ay, settle that between you, settle that between you.

Capt. A. A wife, Sir, did you say?

Sir A. Ay, a wife: why, did not I mention her before?

Capt. A. Not a word of her, Sir.

Sir A. Odd so; I mustn't forget her, though. Yes, Jack, the independence I was talking of is by a marriage; the fortune is saddled with a wife: but I suppose that makes no difference?

Capt. A. Sir, Sir! you amaze me!

Sir A. Why, what the devil 's the matter with the fool? just now you were all gratitude and duty.

Capt. A. I was, Sir: you talked to me of independence and a fortune, but not a word of a wife.

Sir A. Why, what difference does that make? Odds life, Sir! if you have the estate, you must take it with the live stock on it, as it stands.

Capt. A. Pray, Sir, who is the lady?

Sir A. What 's that to you, Sir? come, give me your promise to love, and to marry her directly.

Capt. A. Sure, Sir, that is not very reasonable, to summon my affections for a lady I know nothing of!

Sir A. I am sure, Sir, 'tis more unreasonable in you to object to a lady you know nothing of.

Capt. A. You must excuse me, Sir, if I tell you, once for all, that in this point I cannot obey you.

Sir A. Harkye, Jack;—I have heard you for some time with patience—I have been cool,—quite cool; but take care; you know I am compliance itself, when I am not thwarted; no one more easily led, when I have my own way; but don't put me in a frenzy.

Capt. A. Sir, I must repeat it; in this I cannot obey you.

Sir A. Now, damn me, if ever I call you Jack again while I live!

Capt. A. Nay, Sir, but hear me.

Sir A. Sir, I wont hear a word, not a word! not one word! so give me your promise by a nod, and I'll tell you what, Jack—I mean, you dog—if you don't, by—

Capt. A. What, Sir, promise to link myself to some mass of ugliness; to—

Sir A. Zounds! sirrah! the lady shall be as ugly as I choose: she shall have a hump on each shoulder; she shall be as crooked as the crescent; her one eye shall roll like the bull's in Cox's museum; she shall have a skin like a nummy, and the beard of a Jew—She shall be all this, sirrah! yet I'll make you ogle her all day, and sit up all night, to write sonnets on her beauty.

Capt. A. This is reason and moderation, indeed!

Sir A. None of your sneering, puppy! no grinning, jackanapes!

Capt. A. Indeed, Sir, I never was in your humour for mirth in my life.

Sir A. 'Tis false, Sir; I know you are laughing in your sleeve; I know you'll grin when I am gone, sirrah!

Capt. A. Sir, I hope I know my duty better.

Sir A. None of your passion, Sir! none of your violence, if you please; it wont do with me, I promise you.

Capt. A. Indeed, Sir, I never was cooler in my life.

Sir A. 'Tis a confounded lie! I know you are in a passion in your heart; I know you are, you hypocritical young dog; but it wont do.

Vor. I. . . . 2 Y

Capt. A. Nay, Sir, upon my word—

Sir A. So you will fly out! can't you be cool, like me? what the devil good can passion do! passion is of no service, you impudent, insolent, overbearing reprobate! there, you sneer again! don't provoke me! but you rely upon the mildness of my temper, you do, you dog! you play upon the meekness of my disposition! yet, take care; the patience of a saint may be overcome at last! but mark! I give you six hours and a half to consider of this: if you then agree, without any condition, to do every thing on earth that I choose, why—confound you! I may in time forgive you. If not, zounds! don't enter the same hemisphere with me! don't dare to breathe the same air, or use the same light with me; but get an atmosphere and a sun of your own: I'll strip you of your commission: I'll lodge a five-and-threepence in the hands of trustees, and you shall live on the interest. I'll disown you, I'll disinherit you, I'll unget you! and damn me! if ever I call you Jack again! [Exit.]

Capt. A. Mild, gentle, considerate father! I kiss your hands.

Enter FAG.

Fag. Assuredly, Sir, your father is wrath to a degree; he comes down stairs eight or ten steps at a time—muttering, growling, and thumping the bannisters all the way; I, and the cook's dog, stand bowing at the door; rap, he gives me a stroke on the head with his cane; bids me carry that to my master: then, kicking the poor turnspit into the area, damns us all for a puppy triumvirate! upon my credit, Sir, were I in your place, and found my father such bad company, I should certainly drop his acquaintance.

Capt. A. Cease your impertinence, Sir; did you come in for nothing more?—Stand out of the way.

[Pushes him aside, and exit.]

FAG, solus.

So! Sir Anthony trims my master; he is afraid to reply to his father, and vents his spleen on poor Fag! when one is vexed by one person, to revenge one's self on another who happens to come in the way, shows the worst of tempers, the—

Enter ERRAND BOY.

Boy. Mr. Fag, Mr. Fag! your master calls you. Fag. Well, you little dirty puppy, you needn't bawl so;—the meanest disposition, the—

Boy. Quick! quick, Mr. Fag.

Fag. Quick, quick! you impudent jackanapes! am I to be commanded by you too, you little, impertinent, insolent, kitchen bred—

[Kicks him off.]

SCENE II.—The North Parade.

Enter LUCY.

Lucy. So, I shall have another rival to add to my mistress' list; Captain Absolute:—however, I shall not enter his name till my purse has received due notice in form. Sir Lucius is generally more punctual, when he expects to hear from his dear Delia, as he calls her: I wonder he 's not here!—

Enter SIR LUCIUS O'TRIGGER.

Sir L. Hah! my little ambassadress! upon my conscience I have been looking for you; I have been on the South parade this half hour.

Lucy. [Speaking simply.] O gemini! and I have been waiting for your worship here on the North.

Sir L. 'Faith! may be that was the reason we did not meet; and it is very comical too, how you could go out, and I not see you, for I was only taking a nap at the Parade Coffee-house, and I chose the window, on purpose that I might not miss you.

Lucy. My stars! now I'd wager a sixpence I went by while you were asleep.

Sir L. Sure enough it must have been so; and I never dream'd it was so late, till I waked. Well, but my little girl, have you got nothing for me?

Lucy. Yes, but I have; I've got a letter for you in my pocket.

Sir L. I'faith! I guessed you weren't come empty-handed; well, let me see what the dear creature says.

Lucy. There, Sir Lucius.

[Gives him a letter.

Sir L. [Reads.] Sir—There is often a sudden incentive impulse in love, that has a greater induction than years of domestic combination: such was the commotion I felt at the first superfluous view of Sir Lucius O'Trigger. Very pretty upon my word! Female punctuation forbids me to say more; yet let me add, that it will give me joy infallible to find Sir Lucius worthy the last criterion of my affections. Yours, while meretricious.

DELIA.

Upon my conscience, Lucy, your lady is a great mistress of language! 'faith, she's quite the queen of the dictionary!

Lucy. Ay, Sir, a lady of her experience.

Sir L. Experience! what, at seventeen?

Lucy. O, true, Sir; but then she reads so, my stars! how she will read off hand!

Sir L. 'Faith, she must be very deep read, to write this way; though she is rather an arbitrary writer, too—for here are a great many poor words pressed into the service of this note, that would get their habeas corpus from any court in Christendom. However, when affection guides the pen, he must be a brute who finds fault with the style.

Lucy. Ah, Sir Lucius, if you were to hear how she talks of you!

Sir L. Oh, tell her, I'll make her the best husband in the world, and Lady O'Trigger into the bargain! but we must get the old gentlewoman's consent, and do every thing fairly.

Lucy. Nay, Sir Lucius, I thought you wa'n't rich enough to be so nice!

Sir L. Upon my word, young woman, you have hit it: I am so poor, that I can't afford to do a dirty action. If I did not want money, I'd steal your mistress and her fortune with a great deal of pleasure. However, my pretty girl, [Gives her money.] here's a little something to buy you a riband; and meet me in the evening, and I will give you an answer to this. So, hussy, take a kiss beforehand, to put you in mind. [Kisses her]

Lucy. O lud! Sir Lucius—I never seed such a gemman! my lady wont like you, if you're so impudent.

Sir L. 'Faith she will, Lucy; that same—pho; what's the name of it; modesty! is a quality in a lover more praised by the women than liked; so, if your mistress asks you whether Sir Lucius ever gave you a kiss, tell her fifty, my dear.

Lucy. What, would you have me tell her a lie?

Sir L. Ah then, you baggage! I'll make it a truth presently.

Lucy. For shame now; here is some one coming.

Sir L. O faith, I'll quiet your conscience!

[Sees Fag; exit, humming a tune.

Enter Fag.

Fag. So, so, Ma'am. I humbly beg pardon.

Lucy. O lud!—now, Mr. Fag—you flurry one so!

Fag. Come, come, Lucy, here's no one by—so a little less simplicity, with a grain or two more sincerity, if you please—You play false with us, Madam—I saw you give the baronet a letter.—My master shall know this—and if he don't call him out—I will.

Lucy. Ha, ha, ha! you gentlemen's gentlemen are so hasty!—That letter was from Mrs. Malaprop, simpleton.—She is taken with Sir Lucius' address.

Fag. How! what tastes some people have! Why, I suppose I have walked by her window a hundred times.—But what says our young lady?—any message to my master?

Lucy. Sad news, Mr. Fag! A worse rival than Acres! Sir Anthony Absolute has proposed his son.

Fag. What, Captain Absolute?

Lucy. Even so. I overheard it all.

Fag. Ha, ha, ha! very good, 'faith! Good bye, Lucy, I must away with this news.

Lucy. Well you may laugh, but it is true, I assure you. [Going.] But, Mr. Fag, tell your master not to be cast down by this.

Fag. Oh, he'll be so disconsolate!

Lucy. And charge him not to think of quarrelling with young Absolute.

Fag. Never fear—never fear.

Lucy. Be sure bid him keep up his spirits.

Fag. We will—we will. [Exeunt severally.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The North Parade.

Enter CAPTAIN ABSOLUTE.

Capt. A. 'Tis just as Fag told me, indeed!—Whimsical enough, 'faith! My father wants to force me to marry the very girl I am plotting to run away with! He must not know of my connexion with her yet awhile. He has too summary a method of proceeding in these matters; however, I'll read my recantation instantly. My conversion is something sudden, indeed; but, I can assure him, it is very sincere—So, so, here he comes—he looks plaguy gruff! [Steps aside]

Enter SIR ANTHONY ABSOLUTE.

Sir A. No—I'll die sooner than forgive him! Die, did I say? I'll live these fifty years to plague him. At our last meeting, his impudence had almost put me out of temper—An obstinate, passionate, self-willed boy! Who can he take after? This is my return for getting him before all his brothers and sisters! for putting him, at twelve years old, into a marching regiment, and allowing him fifty pounds a year, besides his pay, ever since! But I have done with him—he's any body's son for me—I never will see him more—never—never—never—never.

Capt. A. Now for a penitential face! [Aside.]

Sir A. Fellow, get out of my way!

Capt. A. Sir, you see a penitent before you.

Sir A. I see an impudent scoundrel before me.

Capt. A. A sincere penitent. I am come, Sir, to acknowledge my error, and to submit entirely to your will.

Sir A. What's that?

Capt. A. I have been revolving, and reflecting, and considering on your past goodness, and kindness, and condescension to me.

Sir A. Well, Sir?

Capt. A. I have been likewise weighing and balancing, what you were pleased to mention concerning duty, and obedience, and authority.

Sir A. Well, puppy?

Capt. A. Why, then, Sir, the result of my reflections is, a resolution to sacrifice every inclination of my own to your satisfaction.

Sir A. Why, now you talk sense, absolute sense; I never heard any thing more sensible in my life. Confound you! you shall be Jack again.

Capt. A. I am happy in the appellation.

Sir A. Why then, Jack, my dear Jack, I will now inform you who the lady really is. Nothing but your passion and violence, you silly fellow, prevented me telling you at first. Prepare, Jack, for wonder and rapture—prepare! What think you of Miss Lydia Languish?

Capt. A. Languish! What, the Languishes of Worcestershire?

Sir A. Worcestershire! no. Did you never meet Mrs. Malaprop, and her niece, Miss Languish, who came into our country just before you were last ordered to your regiment?

Capt. A. Malaprop! Languish! I don't remember ever to have heard the names before. Yet, stay, I think I do recollect something—Languish—Languish—She squints, don't she!—A little red-haired girl?

Sir A. Squints!—A red-haired girl! Zounds, no!

Capt. A. Then I must have forgot; it ca'n't be the same person.

Sir A. Jack, Jack! what think you of blooming, love-breathing seventeen?

Capt. A. As to that, Sir, I am quite indifferent; if I can please you in the matter, 'tis all I desire.

Sir A. Nay, but Jack, such eyes! such eyes, so innocently wild, so bashfully irresolute, not a glance but speaks and kindles some thought of love! Then Jack, her cheeks! her cheeks, Jack! so deeply blushing at the insinuations of her tell-tale eyes! Then, Jack, her lips! O, Jack, lips, smiling at their own discretion! and, if not smiling, more sweetly pouting—more lovely in sullenness! Then Jack, her neck! O, Jack, Jack!

Capt. A. And which is to be mine, Sir, the niece, or the aunt?

Sir A. Why, you unfeeling, insensible puppy, I despise you. When I was of your age, such a description would have made me fly like a rocket. The aunt, indeed! Odds life! when I ran away with your mother, I would not have touched any thing old or ugly, to gain an empire.

Capt. A. Not to please your father, Sir?

Sir A. To please my father—Zounds! not to please—O, my father—Odds so!—Yes, yes; if my father, indeed, had desired—that's quite another matter—Though he wasn't the indulgent father that I am, Jack.

Capt. A. I dare say not, Sir.

Sir A. But, Jack, you are not sorry to find your mistress is so beautiful!

Capt. A. Sir, I repeat it, if I please you in this affair, 'tis all I desire. Not that I think a woman the worse for being handsome; but, Sir, if you please to recollect, you before hinted something about a hump or two, one eye, and a few more graces of that kind—now, without being very nice, I own I should rather choose a wife of mine to have the usual number of limbs, and a limited quantity of back: and, though one eye may be very agreeable, yet, as the prejudice has always run in favour of two, I would not wish to affect a singularity in that article.

Sir A. What a phlegmatic sot it is! Why, sirrah, you are an anchorite! A vile, insensible stock! You a soldier! you're a walking block, fit only to dust the company's regimentals on! Odds life, I've a great mind to marry the girl myself!

Capt. A. I am entirely at your disposal, Sir; if you should think of addressing Miss Languish yourself, I suppose you would have me marry the aunt; or, if you should change your mind, and take the old lady,—'tis the same to me, I'll marry the niece.

Sir A. Upon my word, Jack, thou't either a very great hypocrite, or—but, come, I know your indifference on such a subject must be all a lie, I'm sure it must—come, now, damn your demure face, come, confess, Jack, you have been lying—ha'n't you? You have been playing the hypocrite, hey?—I'll never forgive you, if you ha'n't been lying and playing the hypocrite.

Capt. A. I'm sorry, Sir, that the respect and duty which I bear to you should be so mistaken.

Sir A. Hang your respect and duty! But come along with me, I'll write a note to Mrs. Malaprop, and you shall visit the lady directly. Her eyes shall be the Promethean torch to you—come along, I'll never forgive you, if you don't come back, stark mad with rapture and impatience—if you don't, 'egad, I'll marry the girl myself. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—JULIA'S Dressing Room.

Enter FAULKLAND.

Faulk. They told me Julia would return directly: I wonder she is not yet come!—How mean does this captious, unsatisfied temper of mine appear to my cooler judgment! What tender, honest joy sparkled in her eyes when we met!—How delicate was the warmth of her expressions!—I was ashamed to appear less happy, though I had come resolved to wear a face of coolness and upbraiding. Sir Anthony's presence prevented my proposed expostulations: yet I must be satisfied that she has not been so very happy in my absence. She is coming—Yes, I know the nimbleness of her tread, when she thinks her impatient Faulkland counts the moments of her stay.

Enter JULIA.

Jul. I had not hoped to see you again so soon. Faulk. Could I, Julia, be contented with my first welcome, restrained as we were, by the presence of a third person?

Jul. Oh, Faulkland! when your kindness can make me thus happy, let me not think that I discovered something of coldness in your first salutation.

Faulk. 'Twas but your fancy, Julia. I was rejoiced to see you—to see you in such health: Sure I had no cause for coldness?

Jul. Nay, then, I see you have taken something ill: You must not conceal from me what it is.

Faulk. Well, then, shall I own to you, that my joy at hearing of your health and arrival here, by your neighbour Acres, was somewhat damped, by his dwelling much on the high spirits you had enjoyed in Devonshire; on your mirth—you sing ing—dancing—and I know not what! For such is my temper, Julia, that I should regard every mirthful moment, in your absence, as a treason to constancy. The mutual tear, that steals down the cheek of parting lovers, is a compact, that no smile shall live there till they meet again.

Jul. Must I never cease to tax my Faulkland with this teasing, minute caprice? Can the idle reports of a silly boor weigh, in your breast, against my tried affection?

Faulk. They have no weight with me, Julia: No, no, I am happy, if you have been so—yet only say that you did not sing with mirth,—say that you thought of Faulkland in the dance.

Jul. I never can be happy in your absence. If I wear a countenance of content, it is to show that my mind holds no doubt of my Faulkland's truth. Believe me, Faulkland, I mean not to upbraid you when I say, that I have often dressed sorrow in smiles, lest my friends should guess whose unkindness had caused my tears.

Faulk. You were ever all goodness to me! Oh, I am a brute, when I but admit a doubt of your true constancy!

Jul. If ever, without such cause from you as I will not suppose possible, you find my affections veering but a point, may I become a proverbial scoff for levity and base ingratitude!

Faulk. Ah, Julia! that last word is grating to me! I would I had no title to your gratitude! Search your heart, Julia: perhaps what you have mistaken for love, is but the warm effusion of a too thankful heart!

Jul. For what quality must I love you?

Faulk. For no quality: To regard me for any quality of mind or understanding were only to esteem me! And for person—I have often wished myself deformed, to be convinced that I owed no obligation there for any part of your affection.

Jul. Where nature has bestowed a show of nice attention in the features of a man, he should laugh at it as misplaced. I have seen men, who in this vain article, perhaps, might rank above you; but my heart has never asked my eyes if it were so or not.

Faulk. Now, this is not well from you, Julia: I despise person in a man, yet, if you loved me as I wish, though I were an Æthiop, you'd think none so fair.

Jul. I see you are determined to be unkind—The contract, which my poor father bound us in, gives you more than a lover's privilege.

Faulk. Again, Julia, you raise ideas that feed and justify my doubts. How shall I be sure, had you remained unbound in thought or promise, that I should still have been the object of your persevering love.

Jul. Then try me now—Let us be free as strangers, as to what is past: My heart will not feel more liberty.

Faulk. There, now! so hasty, Julia! so anxious to be free! If your love for me were fixed and ardent, you would not loose your bonds, even though I wished it!

Jul. Oh, you torture me to the heart! I cannot bear it!

Faulk. I do not mean to distress you: If I loved you less, I should never give you any uneasy moment. I would not boast, yet let me say, that I have neither age, person, or character, to found dislike on; my fortune such, as few ladies could be charged with indiscretion in the match. O,

Julia! when love receives such countenance from prudence, nice minds will be suspicious of its birth.

Jul. I know not whether your insinuations would tend; but, as they seem pressing to insult me, I will spare you the regret of having done so—I have given you no cause for this!

[Exit in tears.]

Faulk. In tears? stay, Julia—stay but for a moment—The door is fastened!—Julia, my soul! but for one moment!—I hear her sobbing! 'Sdeath! what a brute am I to use her thus!—Yet stay—Ay, she is coming now: how little resolution there is in woman! how a few soft words can turn them!—No, zounds! she's not coming, nor don't intend it, I suppose! This is not steadiness, but obstinacy! Yet I deserve it. What, after so long an absence, to quarrel with her tenderness! 'twas barbarous and unmanly!—I should be ashamed to see her now.—I'll wait till her just resentment is abated, and when I distress her so again, may I lose her for ever!

[Exit.]

SCENE III.—MRS. MALAPROP'S Lodgings.

MRS. MALAPROP, with a letter in her hand, and CAPTAIN ABSOLUTE.

Mrs. M. Your being Sir Anthony's son, captain, would itself be a sufficient accommodation; but, from the ingenuity of your appearance, I am convinced you deserve the character here given of you.

Capt. A. Permit me to say, Madam, that, as I never yet have had the pleasure of seeing Miss Languish, my principal inducement in this affair, at present, is the honour of being allied to Mrs. Malaprop, of whose intellectual accomplishments, elegant manners, and unaffected learning, no tongue is silent.

Mrs. M. Sir, you do me infinite honour! I beg, captain, you'll be seated. [Sits.] Ah! few gentlemen, now-a-days, know how to value the ineffectual qualities in a woman! few think how a little knowledge becomes a gentlewoman! Men have no sense now but for the worthless flower of beauty!

Capt. A. It is but too true, indeed, Ma'am; yet I fear our ladies should share the blame; they think our admiration of beauty so great, that knowledge, in them, would be superfluous. Thus, like garden trees, they seldom show fruit, till time has robbed them of the more specious blossom: few, like Mrs. Malaprop, and the orange-tree, are rich in both at once!

Mrs. M. Sir, you overpower me with good breeding.—He is the very pine-apple of politeness! You are not ignorant, captain, that this giddy girl has, somehow, contrived to fix her affections on a beggarly, strolling, eves-dropping ensign, whom none of us have seen, and nobody knows any thing of.

Capt. A. Oh, I have heard the silly affair before. I'm not at all prejudiced against her on that account, but it must be very distressing, indeed, Ma'am.

Mrs. M. Oh, it gives me the hydrostatics to such a degree!—I thought she had persisted, from corresponding with him; but behold, this very day, I have interceded another letter, from the fellow—I believe I have it in my pocket.

Capt. A. Oh, the devil! my last note! [Aside.]

Mrs. M. Ay, here it is.

Capt. A. Ay, my note, indeed! O, the little traitress, Lucy!

[Aside.]

Mrs. M. There, perhaps you may know the writing.

Capt. A. I think I have seen the hand before—yes, I certainly must have seen this hand before.

Mrs. M. Nay, but read it, captain.

Capt. A. [Reads.] My soul's idol, my adored Lydia!—Very tender, indeed!

Mrs. M. Tender! ay, and profane too, o' my conscience!

Capt. A. I am excessively alarmed at the intelligence you send me, the more so as my new rival—

Mrs. M. That's you, Sir.

Capt. A. As for the old weather-beaten shepherd, an accomplished gentleman, and a man of honour.—Well, that's handsome enough.

Mrs. M. Oh, the fellow has some design in writing so.

Capt. A. That he had, I'll answer for him, Ma'am.

Mrs. M. But go on, Sir—you'll see presently.

Capt. A. *As for the old weather-beaten shepherd, who guards you—*Who can he mean by that?

Mrs. M. Me, Sir—me—he means me there—what do you think now?—but go on a little further.

Capt. A. Impudent scoundrel!—it shall go hard but I will elude her vigilance; as I am told that the same ridiculous vanity, which makes her dress up her coarse features, and deck her dull chat with hard words which she don't understand—

Mrs. M. There, Sir, an attack upon my language! what do you think of that?—an aspersion upon my parts of speech! was ever such a brute! Sure if I reprehend any thing in this world, it is the use of my oracular tongue, and a nice derangement of epitaphs.

Capt. A. He deserves to be hanged and quartered! let me see—same ridiculous vanity—

Mrs. M. You need not read it again, Sir!

Capt. A. I beg pardon, Ma'am—does also lay her open to the grossest deceptions from flattery and pretended admiration—an impudent coxcomb—so that I have a scheme to see you shortly, with the old harridan's consent, and even to make her a go-between in our interviews.—Was ever such assurance!

Mrs. M. Did you ever hear any thing like it?—He'll elude my vigilance, will he?—yes, yes!—ha, ha! he's very likely to enter these doors!—we'll try who can plot best!

Capt. A. So we will, Ma'am—so we will.—Ha, ha, ha! a conceited puppy! ha, ha, ha!—Well, but Mrs. Malaprop, as the girl seems so infatuated by this fellow, suppose you were to wink at her corresponding with him for a little time—let her even plot an elopement with him—then do you connive at her escape—while I, just in the nick, will have the fellow laid by the heels, and fairly contrive to carry her off in his stead.

Mrs. M. I am delighted with the scheme; never was any thing better perpetrated.

Capt. A. But pray, could I not see the lady for a few minutes now?—I should like to try her temper a little.

Mrs. M. Why, I don't know—I doubt she is not prepared for a visit of this kind.—There is a decorum in these matters.

Capt. A. O Lord, she wont mind me!—only all her, Beverley—

Mrs. M. Sir?

Capt. A. Gently, good tongue! [Aside.]

Mrs. M. What did you say of Beverley?

Capt. A. Oh, I was going to propose that you should tell her, by way of jest, that it was Beverley who was below—she'd come down fast enough then—ha, ha, ha!

Mrs. M. 'T would be a trick she well deserves—besides, you know the fellow tells her he'll get my consent to see her—ha, ha!—Let him, if he can, I say again. Lydia, come down here! [Calling.] He'll make me a go-between in their interviews!—ha, ha, ha!—Come down, I say, Lydia!—I don't wonder at your laughing—ha, ha, ha! his impudence is truly ridiculous.

Capt. A. 'T is very ridiculous, upon my soul, Ma'am!—ha, ha, ha!

Mrs. M. The little hussy wont hear.—Well, I'll go and tell her at once how it is—she shall know that Captain Absolute is come to wait on her.—And I'll make her behave as becomes a young woman.

Capt. A. As you please, Ma'am.

Mrs. M. For the present, captain, your servant—Ah, you've not done laughing yet, I see—elude my vigilance! yes, yes—Ha, ha, ha! [Exit.]

Capt. A. Ha, ha, ha! one would think, now, that I might throw off all disguise at once, and seize my prize with security—but such is Lydia's caprice, that, to undeceive, were probably to lose her. I'll see whether she knows me.

[Walks aside, and seems engaged in looking at the pictures.]

Enter LYDIA.

Lyd. What a scene am I now to go through! surely nothing can be more dreadful, than to be obliged to listen to the loathsome addresses of a stranger to one's heart.—I have heard of girls persecuted, as I am, who have appealed, in behalf of their favoured lover, to the generosity of his rival: suppose I were to try it—there stands the hated rival—an officer too!—but, oh, how unlike my Beverley!—I wonder he don't begin—truly, he seems a very negligent wooer! quite at his ease, upon my word!—I'll speak first—Mr. Absolute!

Capt. A. Ma'am. [Turns round.]

Lyd. O heavens! Beverley!

Capt. A. Hush!—hush, my life!—softly! be not surprised!

Lyd. I am so astonished! and so terrified! and so overjoyed!—for heaven's sake, how came you here?

Capt. A. Briefly—I have deceived your aunt—I was informed that my new rival was to visit here this evening, and, contriving to have him kept away, have passed myself on her for Captain Absolute.

Lyd. Oh, charming!—And she really takes you for young Absolute?

Capt. A. Oh, she's convinced of it.

Lyd. Ha, ha, ha! I can't forbear laughing, to think how her sagacity is over-reached.

Capt. A. But we trifle with our precious moments—such another opportunity may not occur; then let me now conjure my kind, my condescending angel, to fix the time when I may rescue her from undeserving persecution, and, with a licensed warmth, plead for reward.

Lyd. Will you then, Beverley, consent to forfeit that portion of my paltry wealth!—that burden on the wings of love?

Capt. A. Oh, come to me—rich only thus; in loveliness! Bring no portion to me but thy love; 'twill be generous in you, Lydia; for well you know, it is the only dower your poor Beverley can repay.

Lyd. How persuasive are his words! how charming will poverty be with him!

Capt. A. By heavens, I would fling all goods of fortune from me with a prodigal hand, to enjoy the scene where I might clasp my Lydia to my bosom, and say, the world affords no smile to me but here. [Embracing her.]

Lyd. Now could I fly with him to the Antipodes—but my persecution is not yet come to a crisis.

Enter MRS. MALAPROP, listening.

Mrs. M. I am impatient to know how the little hussy departs herself. [Aside.]

Capt. A. So pensive, Lydia! is then your warmth abated?

Mrs. M. Warmth abated?—so! she has been in a passion, I suppose.

Lyd. No—nor ever can, while I have life.

Mrs. M. An ill-tempered little devil! She'll be in a passion all her life, will she?

Lyd. Let her choice be Captain Absolute, but Beverley is mine.

Mrs. M. I am astonished at her assurance!—to his face; this to his face!

Capt. A. Thus, then, let me enforce my suit. [Kneeling.]

Mrs. M. Ay—poor young man! down on his knees, entreating for pity! I can contain no longer. Why, thou vixen! I have overheard you.

Capt. A. Oh, confound her vigilance! [Aside.]

Mrs. M. Captain Absolute; I know not how to apologise for her shocking rudeness.

Capt. A. So; all's safe, I find. [Aside.] I have hopes, Madam, that time will bring the young lady—

Mrs. M. O, there's nothing to be hoped for from her! she's as headstrong as an allegory on the banks of Nile.

Lyd. Nay, Madam, what do you charge me with now?

Mrs. M. Why, thou unblushing rebel, didn't you tell this gentleman to his face, that you loved another better? didn't you say you never would be his?

Lyd. No, Madam, I did not.

Mrs. M. Good heavens, what assurance! Lydia, you ought to know that lying don't become a young woman! Didn't you boast that Beverley, that stroller, Beverley, possessed your heart? Tell me that, I say.

Lyd. 'Tis true, Ma'am; and none but Beverley—

Mrs. M. Hold! hold, assurance! you shall not be so rude.

Capt. A. Nay, pray, Mrs. Malaprop, don't stop the young lady's speech: she's very welcome to talk thus, it does not hurt me in the least, I assure you.

Mrs. M. You are too good, captain—too amiably patient: but come with me, Miss; let us see you again soon, captain; remember what we have fixed.

Capt. A. I shall, Ma'am.

Mrs. M. Come, take a graceful leave of the gentleman.

Lyd. May every blessing wait on my Beverley, my loved Bev—

Mrs. M. Hussy! Come along—come along.

[Exeunt severally; CAPTAIN ABSOLUTE kissing his hand to LYDIA, MRS. MALAPROP stops her speaking.]

SCENE IV.—ACRES' Lodgings.

ACRES and DAVID discovered: ACRES as just dressed.

Acres. Indeed, David,—dress does make a difference, David.

David. 'Tis all in all, I think—difference! why, an' you were to go now to Clod Hall, I am certain the old lady wouldn't know you: Master Butler wouldn't believe his own eyes, and Mrs. Pickle would cry, "Lard presarve me!" our dairy maid would come giggling to the door; and I warrant Dolly Tester, your honour's favourite, would blush like my waistcoat: Ooons! I'll hold a gallon, there an't a dog in the house but would bark, and I question whether Phillis would wag a hair of her tail.

Acres. Ay, David, there's nothing like polishing.

David. So I says of your honour's boots; but the boy never heeds me!

Acres. But, David, has Mr. De la Grace been here? I must rub up my balancing, and chasing, and boring.

David. I'll call again, Sir.

Acres. Do, and see if there are any letters for me at the Post-office.

David. I will. By the mass, I can't help looking at your head! if I hadn't been at the cooking, I wish I may die if I should have known the dish again myself?

[Exit. ACRES comes forward, practising a dancing step.]

Acres. Sink, slide, coupée. Confound the first inventors of cotillions, say I! they are as bad as algebra, to us country gentlemen; I can walk a minuet easy enough, when I am forced! and I have been accounted a good stick in a country dance. Odds jigs and tabor! I never valued your cross-over two couple—figure in—right and left—and I'd foot it with e'er a captain in the country! but these outlandish heathen allemandes and cotillions are quite beyond me! I shall never prosper at them, that's sure, mine are true born English legs; they don't understand their cursed French lingo! their pas this, and pas that, and pas t'other!

Enter DAVID.

David. Here is Sir Lucius O'Trigger to wait on you, Sir.

Acres. Show him in. [Exit DAVID.]

Enter SIR LUCIUS O'TRIGGER.

Sir L. Mr. Acres, I am delighted to embrace you.

Acres. My dear Sir Lucius, I kiss your hands.

Sir L. Pray, my friend, what has brought you so suddenly to Bath?

Acres. 'Faith, I have followed Cupid's jack-a-lantern, and find myself in a quagmire at last! In short, I have been very ill-used, Sir Lucius. I don't choose to mention names, but look on me as a very ill-used gentleman.

Sir L. Pray, what is the case? I ask no names.

Acres. Mark me, Sir Lucius; I fall as deep as need be in love with a young lady; her friends take my part. I follow her to Bath; send word of my arrival; and receive answer, that the lady is to be otherwise disposed of. This, Sir Lucius, I call being ill-used.

Sir L. Very ill, upon my conscience! Pray, can you divine the cause of it?

Acres. Why, there's the matter: she has another lover, one Beverley, who, I am told, is now in Bath. Odds slanders and lies! he must be at the bottom of it.

Sir L. A rival in the case, is there? and you think he has supplanted you unfairly?

Acres. Unfairly! to be sure he has. He never could have done it fairly.

Sir L. Then sure you know what is to be done!

Acres. Not I, upon my soul!

Sir L. We wear no swords here, but you understand me?

Acres. What! fight him?

Sir L. Ay, to be sure: what can I mean else?

Acres. But he has given me no provocation.

Sir L. Now, I think he has given you the greatest provocation in the world. Can a man commit a more heinous offence against another, than to fall in love with the same woman? Oh, by my soul, it is the most unpardonable breach of friendship.

Acres. Breach of friendship? Ay, ay; but I have no acquaintance with this man. I never saw him in my life.

Sir L. That's no argument at all—he has the less right then to take such a liberty.

Acres. 'Gad, that's true—I grow full of anger, Sir Lucius! I fire apace; odds hilts and blades! I find a man may have a deal of valour in him, and not know it! But couldn't I contrive to have a little right on my side?

Sir L. What the devil signifies right, when your honour is concerned? do you think Achilles, or my little Alexander the Great, ever inquired where the right lay? No, by my soul, they drew their broad swords, and left the lazy sons of peace to settle the justice of it.

Acres. Your words are a grenadier's march to my heart! I believe courage must be catching! I certainly do feel a kind of valour arising as it were—a kind of courage, as I may say—odds flints, pans, and triggers! I'll challenge him directly.

Sir L. Ah, my little friend! if I had Blunderbuss Hall here—I could show you a range of ancestry, in the O'Trigger line, that would furnish the New Room; every one of whom had killed his man! For though the mansion-house and dirty acres have slipped through my fingers, I thank Heaven, our honour and the family pictures are as fresh as ever.

Acres. Oh, Sir Lucius, I have had ancestors too! every man of them colonel or captain in the militia, odd's balls and barrels! say no more—I'm braced for it. The thunder of your words has soured the milk of human kindness in my breast! Zounds! as the man in the play says, "I could do such deeds."

Sir L. Come, come, there must be no passion at all in the case; these things should always be done civilly.

Acres. I must be in a passion, Sir Lucius; I must be in a rage. Dear Sir Lucius, let me be in a rage, if you love me.—Come, here's my pen and paper. [Sits down to write.] I would the ink were red! Indite, I say, indite! How shall I begin?

Odd's bullets and blades! I'll write a good bold hand, however.

Sir L. Pray, compose yourself.

Acres. Come—now, shall I begin with an oath? Do, Sir Lucius, let me begin with a damme.

Sir L. Pho, pho! do the thing decently, and like a Christian. Begin now—Sir.

Acres. That's too civil by half.

Sir L. To prevent the confusion that might arise—

Acres. Well.

Sir L. From our both addressing the same lady—

Acres. Ay—there's the reason—same lady—Well.

Sir L. I shall expect the favour of your company,—

Acres. Zounds! I'm not asking him to dinner?

Sir L. Pray, be easy.

Acres. Well, then, honour of your company,—

Sir L. To settle our pretensions,—

Acres. Well.

Sir L. Let me see; ay, King's-Mead-fields will do; in King's-Mead-fields.

Acres. So, that's done. Well, I'll fold it up presently; my own crest, a hand and dagger, shall be the seal.

Sir L. You see now, this little explanation will put a stop at once to all confusion or misunderstanding that might arise between you.

Acres. Ay, we fight to prevent any misunderstanding.

Sir L. Now, I'll leave you to fix your own time. Take my advice, and you'll decide it this evening, if you can; then, let the worst come of it, 'twill be off your mind to-morrow.

Acres. Very true.

Sir L. So I shall see nothing more of you, unless it be by letter, till the evening. I would do myself the honour to carry your message; but, to tell you a secret, I believe I shall have just such another affair on my own hands. There is a gay captain here who put a jest on me lately at the expense of my country, and I only want to fall in with the gentleman, to call him out.

Acres. By my valour, I should like to see you fight first! Odds life, I should like to see you kill him, if it was only to get a little lesson!

Sir L. I shall be very proud of instructing you. Well, for the present—but remember now, when you meet your antagonist, do every thing in a mild and agreeable manner. Let your courage be as keen, but at the same time as polished, as your sword. [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—ACRES' Lodgings.

ACRES and DAVID.

David. Then, by the mass, Sir, I would do no such thing! ne'er a Sir Lucius O'Trigger in the kingdom should make me fight, when I wa'n't so minded. Oons! what will the old lady say, when she hears o't?

Acres. But my honour, David, my honour! I must be very careful of my honour.

David. Ay, by the mass! and I would be very careful of it, and I think in return my honour couldn't do less than to be very careful of me.

Acres. Odds blades! David, no gentleman will ever risk the loss of his honour!

David. I say, then, it would be but civil in honour never to risk the loss of a gentleman.

Lookye, master, this honour seems to me to be a marvellous false friend; ay, truly, a very courtier-like servant. Put the case, I was a gentleman (which, thank God, no one can say of me;) well—my honour makes me quarrel with another gentleman of my acquaintance. So, we fight. (Pleasant enough that.) Boh! I kill him; (the more 's my luck.) Now, pray, who gets the profit of it? why, my honour. But put the case that he kills me! by the mass! I go to the worms, and my honour whips over to my enemy.

Acres. No, David, in that case! Odds crowns and laurels! your honour follows you to the grave!

David. Now, that's just the place where I could make a shift to do without it.

Acres. Zounds! David, you are a coward! It doesn't become my valour to listen to you.—What, shall I disgrace my ancestors? think of that, David; think what it would be to disgrace my ancestors!

David. Under favour, the surest way of not disgracing them is to keep as long as you can out of their company. Lookye now, master, to go to them in such haste—with an ounce of lead in your brains—I should think it might as well be let alone. Our ancestors are very good kind of folks; but they are the last people I should choose to have a visiting acquaintance with.

Acres. But, David, now, you don't think there is such very, very, very great danger, hey? Odds life! people often fight without any mischief done!

David. By the mass, I think 'tis ten to one against you. Ooons! here to meet some lion-headed fellow, I warrant, with his damned double-barrelled swords and cut-and-thrust pistols! Lord bless us! it makes me tremble to think o't; those be such desperate bloody-minded weapons! well, I never could abide them; from a child I never could fancy them! I suppose there an't been so merciless a beast in the world as your loaded pistol!

Acres. Zounds! I wont be afraid; odds fire and fury! you sha'n't make me afraid. Here is the challenge, and I have sent for my dear friend, Jack Absolute, to carry it for me.

David. Ay, i'the name of mischief, let him be the messenger. For my part, I wouldn't lend a hand to it for the best horse in your stable. By the mass! it don't look like another letter! it is, as I may say, a designing and malicious-looking letter! and i' warrant smells of gunpowder, like a soldier's pouch! Ooons! I wouldn't swear it mayn't go off!

Acres. Out, you poltroon! you ha'n't the valour of a grasshopper.

David. Well, I say no more: 'twill be sad news, to be sure, at Clod Hall! but I ha' done. How Phillis will howl when she hears of it! ay, poor bitch, she little thinks what shooting her master's going after! and i' warrant old Crop, who has carried your honour, field and road, these ten years, will curse the hour he was born!

Acres. It wont do, David, I am determined to fight; so get along, you coward, while I'm in the mind.

David. Good bye, master. [Whimpering.]
Acres. Get along, you cowardly, dastardly, croaking raven! [Exit DAVID.]

Enter CAPTAIN ABSOLUTE.

Capt. A. What s the matter, Bob?

Acres. A vile, sheep-hearted olockhead! If I hadn't the valour of St. George, and the dragon to boot—

Capt. A. But what did you want with me, Bob?

Acres. Oh!—there—

[Gives him the challenge.]
Capt. A. To Ensign Beverley. So—what's going on now? [Aside.] Well, what's this?

Acres. A challenge!

Capt. A. Indeed! why, you wont fight him, will you, Bob?

Acres. 'Egad, but I will, Jack. Sir Lucius has wrought me to it. He has left me full of rage, and I'll fight this evening, that so much good passion mayn't be wasted.

Capt. A. But what have I to do with this?

Acres. Why, as I think you know something of this fellow, I want you to find him out for me, and give him this mortal defiance.

Capt. A. Well, give it me, and trust me he gets it.

Acres. Thank you, my dear friend, my dear Jack; but it is giving you a great deal of trouble.

Capt. A. Not in the least—I beg you wont mention it. No trouble in the world, I assure you.

Acres. You are very kind. What it is to have a friend! you couldn't be my second, could you, Jack?

Capt. A. Why no, Bob—not in this affair—it would not be quite so proper.

Acres. Well, then, I must get my friend Sir Lucius. I shall have your good wishes, however, Jack?

Capt. A. Whenever he meets you, believe me.

Enter SERVANT.

Serv. Sir Anthony Absolute is below, inquiring for the captain.

Capt. A. I'll come instantly. Well, my little hero, success attend you. [Going.]

Acres. Stay, stay Jack. If Beverley should ask you what kind of a man your friend Acres is, do tell him I am a devil of a fellow, will you, Jack?

Capt. A. To be sure, I shall. I'll say you are a determined dog; hey, Bob?

Acres. Ay, do, do; and if that frightens him, 'egad, perhaps he mayn't come. So tell him I generally kill a man a week; will you, Jack?

Capt. A. I will, I will; I'll say you are called, in the country, "Fighting Bob."

Acres. Right, right; 'tis all to prevent mischief; for I don't want to take his life, if I clear my honour.

Capt. A. No! that's very kind of you.

Acres. Why, you don't wish me to kill him, do you, Jack?

Capt. A. No, upon my soul, I do not. But a devil of a fellow, hey? [Going.]

Acres. True, true; but stay, stay Jack; you may add, that you never saw me in such a rage before; a most devouring rage.

Capt. A. I will, I will.

Acres. Remember, Jack—a determined dog!

Capt. A. Ay, ay, "Fighting Bob."

[Exit severally.]

SCENE II.—MRS. MALAPROP'S Lodgings.

MRS. MALAPROP and LYDIA.

Mrs. M. Why, thou perverse one! tell me what you can object to him? Isn't he a handsome man? tell me that. A genteel man? a pretty figure of a man?

Lyd. She little thinks whom she is praising!
[Aside.] So is Beverley, Ma'am.

Mrs. M. No caparisons, Miss, if you please. Caparisons don't become a young woman. No! Captain Absolute is indeed a fine gentleman.

Lyd. Ay, the Captain Absolute you have seen.
[Aside.]

Mrs. M. Then he's so well bred; so full of alacrity and adulation! I protest, when I saw him, I thought of what Hamlet says in the play: "Hesperian curls—the front of Job himself! an eye, like March, to threaten at command! a station, like Harry Mercury, new"—something about kissing—on a hill—however, the similitude struck me directly.

Lyd. How enraged she'll be presently, when she discovers her mistake.
[Aside.]

Enter SERVANT.

Serv. Sir Anthony and Captain Absolute are below, Ma'am.

Mrs. M. Show them up here. [Exit SERVANT.] Now, Lydia, I insist on your behaving as becomes a young woman. Show your good breeding, at least, though you have forgot your duty.

Lyd. Madam, I have told you my resolution! I shall not only give him no encouragement, but I wont even speak to, or look at him.

[Flings herself into a chair, with her face from the door.]

Enter SIR ANTHONY and CAPTAIN ABSOLUTE.

Sir A. Here we are, Mrs. Malaprop; come to mitigate the frowns of unrelenting beauty, and difficulty enough I had to bring this fellow: I don't know what's the matter, but if I had not held him by force, he'd have given me the slip.

Mrs. M. You have infinite trouble, Sir Anthony, in the affair. I am ashamed for the cause! Lydia, Lydia, rise, I beseech you! pay your respects.
[Aside to her.]

Sir A. I hope, Madam, that Miss Languish has reflected on the worth of this gentleman, and the regard due to her aunt's choice, and my alliance. [Aside to Mrs. M.] Now, Jack, speak to her.
[Aside to the Captain.]

Capt. A. What the devil shall I do? [Aside.] You see, Sir, she wont even look at me whilst you are here. I knew she wouldn't! I told you so. Let me entreat you, Sir, to leave us together!
[To his Father.]

Lyd. [Aside.] I wonder I ha'n't heard my aunt exclaim yet! sure she can't have looked at him! perhaps their regimentals are alike, and she is something blind.

Sir A. I say, Sir, I wont stir a foot yet.

Mrs. M. I am sorry to say, Sir Anthony, that my affluence over my niece is very small. Turn round, Lydia, I blush for you!
[Aside to her.]

Sir A. May I not flatter myself, that Miss Languish will assign what cause of dislike she can have to my son? why don't you begin, Jack? speak, you puppy, speak!
[Aside to him.]

Mrs. M. It is impossible, Sir Anthony, she can have any. She will not say she has. Answer, hussy! why don't you answer?
[Aside to her.]

Sir A. Then, Madam, I trust that a childish and hasty predilection will be no bar to Jack's happiness. Zounds! sirrah! why don't you speak?

[Aside to him.]

Capt. A. Hem, hem! Madam, hem! [ABSOLUTE attempts to speak, then returns to SIR ANTHONY.] 'Faith! Sir, I am so confounded! and so—so—confused! I told you I should be so, Sir, I knew it. The—the—tremor of my passion entirely takes away my presence of mind.

Sir A. But it don't take away your voice, fool, does it? go up, and speak to her directly! [ABSOLUTE makes signs to MRS. MALAPROP to leave them together.] What the devil are you at? unlock your jaws, sirrah, or—
[Aside to him.]

Capt. A. [Draws near LYDIA.] Now Heaven send she may be too sullen to look round! I must disguise my voice. [Aside. Speaks in a low, hoarse tone.] Will not Miss Languish lend an ear to the mild accents of true love? will not—

Sir A. What the devil ails the fellow? why don't you speak out? not stand croaking like a frog in a quinsy!

Capt. A. The—the—excess of my awe, and my—my—modesty, quite choke me!

Sir A. Ah! your modesty again! I'll tell you what, Jack; if you don't speak out directly and glibly too, I shall be in such a rage! Mrs. Malaprop, I wish the lady would favour us with something more than a side-front.

[MRS. MALAPROP seems to chide LYDIA.]

Capt. A. So all will out, I see! [Goes up to LYDIA, speaks softly.] Be not surprised, my Lydia, suppress all surprise at present.

Lyd. [Aside.] Heavens! 'tis Beverley's voice! [Looks round by degrees, and then starts up.] Is this possible? my Beverley! how can this be! my Beverley?

Capt. A. Ah! 'tis all over!
[Aside.]

Sir A. Beverley! the devil! Beverley! what can the girl mean? This is my son, Jack Absolute.

Mrs. M. For shame, hussy! for shame! your head runs on on that fellow, that you have him always in your eyes! beg Captain Absolute's pardon, directly.

Lyd. I see no Captain Absolute, but my loved Beverley!

Sir A. Zounds, the girl's mad! her brain's turned by reading!

Mrs. M. O' my conscience, I believe so! what do you mean by Beverley, hussy? you saw Captain Absolute before to-day; there he is; your husband that shall be.

Lyd. With all my soul, Ma'am: when I refuse my Beverley—

Sir A. Oh, she's as mad as Bedlam! or has this fellow been playing us a rogue's trick! Come here, sirrah, who the devil are you?

Capt. A. 'Faith, Sir, I am not quite clear myself; but I'll endeavour to recollect.

Sir A. Are you my son or not? answer for your mother, you dog, if you wont for me.

Capt. A. Ye powers of impudence, befriend me! [Aside.] Sir Anthony, most assuredly I am your wife's son; and that I sincerely believe myself to be yours also, I hope my duty has always shown. Mrs. Malaprop, I am your most respectful admirer, and shall be proud to add, affectionate nephew. I need not tell my Lydia, that she sees her faithful Beverley, who, knowing the singularity of her temper, assumed that name, and a station, which has proved a test of the most disinterested love, which he now hopes to enjoy in a more elevated character.

Lyd. So! there will be no elopement after all! Sir A. Upon my soul, Jack, thou art a very impudent fellow! to do you justice, I think I never saw a piece of more consummate assurance!

Capt. A. Oh, you flatter me, Sir, you compliment: 'tis my modesty, you know, Sir; my modesty, that has stood in my way.

Sir A. Well, I am glad you are not the dull, insensible varlet you pretended to be, however! I'm glad you have made a fool of your father, your dog—I am—So this was your penitence, your duty, and obedience! I thought it was damned sudden—you never heard their names before, not you! what, the Languishes of Worcestershire, hey? if you could please me in this affair, 'twas all you desired! ah! you dissembling villain! what! [Pointing to LYDIA.] she squints, don't she! a little redhaired girl! hey? why, you hypocritical, young rascal, I wonder you a'n't ashamed to hold up your head!

Capt. A. 'Tis with difficulty, Sir—I am confused—very much confused, as you must perceive.

Mrs. M. O lud! Sir Anthony! a new light breaks in upon me! hey! how! what! captain, did you write the letters then? what! am I to thank you for the elegant compilation of "an old weather-beaten she-dragon"—hey? O mercy! was it you that reflected on my parts of speech?

Capt. A. Dear Sir! my modesty will be overpowered at last, if you don't assist me. I shall certainly not be able to stand it.

Sir A. Come, come, Mrs. Malaprop, we must forget and forgive; odds life! matters have taken so clever a turn all of a sudden, that I could find in my heart to be so good-humoured! and so gallant! hey! Mrs. Malaprop! come, we must leave them together; Mrs. Malaprop, they long to fly into each other's arms, I warrant! Jack, isn't the cheek as I said, hey? and the eye, you rogue! and the lip, hey? come, Mrs. Malaprop, we'll not disturb their tenderness; theirs is the time of life for happiness! [Sings.] Youth's the season made for joy, hey! odd's life! I'm in such spirits, I don't know what I could not do! permit me, Ma'am. [Gives his hand to MRS. MALAPROP. Sings.] Tol de rol—'gad I should like to have a little fooling myself—Tol de rol! de rol!

[Exit singing, and handing MRS. MALAPROP. LYDIA sits sullenly in the chair.]

Capt. A. So much thought bodes me no good [Aside.] So grave, Lydia!

Lyd. Sir!

Capt. A. So! 'egad! I thought as much! that damned monosyllable has froze me! [Aside.] what, Lydia, now that we are as happy in our friends' consent as in our mutual vows—

Lyd. Friends' consent, indeed! [Peevishly.]

Capt. A. Come, come, we must lay aside some of our romance; a little wealth and comfort may be endured after all. And for your fortune, the lawyers shall make such settlements as—

Lyd. Lawyers! I hate lawyers!

Capt. A. Nay, then we will not wait for their lingering forms, but instantly procure the license, and—

Lyd. The license! I hate license!

Capt. A. Oh, my love! be not so unkind; thus let me entreat— [Kneeling.]

Lyd. Pshaw! what signifies kneeling, when you know I must have you?

Capt. A. [Rising.] Nay, Madam, there shall be no constraint upon your inclinations, I promise you. If I have lost your heart, I resign the rest 'Gad, I must try what a little spirit will do.

[Aside.]

Lyd. [Rising.] Then, Sir, let me tell you, the interest you had there was acquired by a mean, unmanly imposition, and deserves the punishment of fraud. What, you have been treating me like a child! humouring my romance! and laughing, I suppose, at your success!

Capt. A. You wrong me, Lydia, you wrong me—only hear—

Lyd. So, while I fondly imagined we were deceiving my relations, and flattered myself that I should outwit and incense them all—behold my hopes are to be crushed at once, by my aunt's consent and approbation, and I am myself the only dupe at last! [Walking about in a heat.] but here, Sir, here is the picture; Beverley's picture! [Taking a miniature from her bosom.] which I have worn, night and day, in spite of threats and entreaties! there, Sir, [Flings it to him.] and be assured, I throw the original from my heart as easily.

Capt. A. Nay, nay, Ma'am, we will not differ as to that—here, [Taking out a picture.] here is Miss Lydia Languish:—what a difference! ay, there is the heavenly assenting smile, that first gave soul and spirit to my hopes! those are the lips which sealed a vow, as yet scarce dry in Cupid's calendar! and there the half-resentful blush, that would have checked the ardour of my thanks. Well, all that's past; all over, indeed! There, Madam; in beauty, that copy is not equal to you, but in my mind, its merit over the original, in being still the same, is such—that—I'll put it into my pocket. [Puts it up again.]

Lyd. [Softening.] 'Tis your own doing, Sir—I, I, I suppose you are perfectly satisfied.

Capt. A. Oh, most certainly; sure now, this is much better than being in love! ha, ha, ha! there's some spirit in this! what signifies breaking some scores of solemn promises; all that's of no consequence, you know. To be sure, people will say, that Miss didn't know her own mind; but never mind that: or, perhaps, they may be ill-natured enough to hint, that the gentleman grew tired of the lady, and forsook her; but don't let that fret you.

Lyd. There's no bearing this insolence!

[Bursts into tears.]

Enter MRS. MALAPROP AND SIR ANTHONY.

Mrs. M. [Entering.] Come, we must interrupt your billing and cooing awhile.

Lyd. This is worse than your treachery and deceit, you base ingrate! [Sobbing.]

Sir A. What the devil's the matter now! Zounds! Mrs. Malaprop, this is the oddest billing and cooing I ever heard!—but what the deuce is the meaning of it?—I'm quite astonished!

Capt. A. Ask the lady, Sir.

Mrs. M. Oh, mercy! I'm quite analysed, for my part! why, Lydia, what is the reason of this?

Lyd. Ask the gentleman, Ma'am.

Sir A. Zounds! I shall be in a frenzy! why, Jack, you are not come out to be any one else, are you?

Mrs. M. Ay, Sir, there's no more trick, is there? you are not, like Cerberus, three gentlemen at once, are you?

Capt. A. You'll not let me speak; I say the lady can account for this much better than I can.

Lyd. Ma'am, you once commanded me never to think of Beverley again—there is the man; I now obey you: for, from this moment, I renounce him for ever. [Exit LYDIA.]

Mrs. M. O mercy and miracles! what a turn here is! Why sure, captain, you haven't behaved disrespectfully to my niece?

Sir A. Ha, ha, ha!—ha, ha, ha! now I see it. Ha, ha, ha! now I see it; you have been too lively, Jack.

Capt. A. Nay, Sir, upon my word—

Sir A. Come, no lying, Jack, I'm sure 'twas so. Come, no excuses, Jack; why your father, your rogue, was so before you: the blood of the Absolutes was always impatient.

Capt. A. By all that's good, Sir—

Sir A. Zounds! say no more, I tell you; Mrs. Malaprop shall make your peace. You must make his peace, Mrs. Malaprop: you must tell her, 'tis Jack's way; tell her, 'tis all our ways: it runs in the blood of our family! Come away, Jack, ha, ha, ha! Mrs. Malaprop, a young villain!
[Pushes him out.]

Mrs. M. Oh, Sir Anthony! O, fie, captain!
[Exeunt severally.]

SCENE III.—The North Parade.

Enter SIR LUCIUS O'TRIGGER.

Sir L. I wonder where this Captain Absolute hides himself. Upon my conscience, these officers are always in one's way in love affairs: I remember I might have married Lady Dorothy Carmine, if it had not been for a little rogue of a major, who ran away with her before she could get sight of me! And I wonder what it is the ladies can see in them to be so fond of them; unless it be a touch of the old serpent in them; that makes the little creatures be caught, like vipers, with a bit of red cloth. Ha, isn't this the captain coming? faith, it is! There is a probability of succeeding about that fellow, that is mighty provoking! who the devil is he talking to? [Steps aside.]

Enter CAPTAIN ABSOLUTE.

Capt. A. To what fine purpose have I been plotting! a noble reward for all my schemes, upon my soul! a little gipse! I did not think her so damned absurd either. 'Sdeath, I never was in a worse humour in all my life! I could cut my own throat, or any other person's, with the greatest pleasure in the world!

Sir L. O, 'faith! I'm in the luck of it. I never could have found him in a sweeter temper for my purpose; to be sure I'm just come in the nick! now to enter into conversation with him, and so quarrel genteelly. [SIR LUCIUS goes to ABSOLUTE.] With regard to that matter, captain, I must beg leave to differ in opinion with you.

Capt. A. Upon my word, then, you must be a very subtle disputant: because, Sir, I happened just then to be giving no opinion at all.

Sir L. That's no reason; for give me leave to tell you, a man may think an untruth as well as speak one.

Capt. A. Very true, Sir; but if a man never utters his thoughts, I should think they might stand a chance of escaping controversy.

Sir L. Then, Sir, you differ in opinion with me, which amounts to the same thing.

Capt. A. Harkye, Sir Lucius, what you can drive at, unless you mean to quarrel with me, I cannot conceive!

Sir L. I humbly thank you, Sir, for the quickness of your apprehension; [Bowing.] you have named the very thing I would be at.

Capt. A. Very well, Sir, I shall certainly not balk your inclinations; but I should be glad you would please to examine your motives.

Sir L. Pray, Sir, be easy, the quarrel is a very pretty quarrel, as it stands; we should only spoil it by trying to explain it. However, your memory is very short; or you could not have forgot an affront you passed on me within this week. So, no more, but name your time and place.

Capt. A. Well, Sir, since you are so bent on it, the sooner the better; let it be this evening, here by the Spring Gardens. We shall scarcely be interrupted.

Sir L. 'Faith! that same interruption, in affairs of this nature, shows very great ill-breeding. I don't know what's the reason, but in England, if a thing of this kind gets wind, people make such a pother, that a gentleman can never fight in peace and quietness. However, if it's the same to you, captain, I should take it as a particular kindness, if you'd let us meet in King's-Mead-fields, as a little business will call me there about six o'clock, and I may dispatch both matters at once.

Capt. A. 'Tis the same to me exactly. A little after six, then, we will discuss this matter more seriously.

Sir L. If you please, Sir; there will be a very pretty small-sword light, though it wont do for a long shot. So, that matter's settled; and my mind's at ease. [Exit.]

Enter FAULKLAND, meeting CAPTAIN ABSOLUTE.

Capt. A. Well met. I was going to look for you. Oh, Faulkland! all the demons of spite and disappointment have conspired against me! I'm so vexed, that if I had not the prospect of a resource, in being knocked o' the head by and by, I should scarce have spirits to tell you the cause.

Faulk. What can you mean? Has Lydia changed her mind? I should have thought her duty and inclination would now have pointed to the same object.

Capt. A. Ay, just as the eyes do of a person who squints: when her love-eye was fixed on me, t'other, her eye of duty, was finely obliged: but, when duty bid her point that the same way, off t'other turned on a swivel, and secured its retreat with a frown!

Faulk. But what's the resource you—

Capt. A. Oh, to wind up the whole, Sir Lucius O'Trigger, you know him by sight, for some affront, which I am sure I never intended, has obliged me to meet him this evening at six o'clock: 'tis on that account I wish to see you, you must go with me.

Faulk. Nay, there must be some mistake, sure. Sir Lucius shall explain himself, and I dare say matters may be accommodated: but this evening, did you say? I wish it had been any other time.

Capt. A. Why? there will be light enough: there will (as Sir Lucius says) 'be very pretty, small-sword light, though it will not do for a long shot.' Confound his long shots.

Faulk. But I am myself a good deal ruffled, by a difference I have had with Julia. My vile, tormenting temper has made me treat her so cruelly that I shall not be myself till we are reconciled.

Capt. A. By Heavens, Faulkland, you don't deserve her!

Enter Servant; gives FAULKLAND a letter.

Faulk. O, Jack! this is from Julia; I dread to open it.

Capt. A. Here, let me see. [Takes the letter and opens it.] Ay, a final sentence, indeed! 'tis all over with you, 'faith!

Faulk. Nay, Jack, don't keep me in suspense.

Capt. A. Hear then. [Reads.]

As I am convinced, that my dear Faulkland's own reflections have already upbraided him for his last unkindness to me, I will not add a word on the subject. I wish to speak with you as soon as possible. Yours, ever and truly. JULIA.

There's stubbornness and resentment for you! [Gives him the letter.] Why, man, you don't seem one whit the happier at this!

Faulk. Oh, yes, I am—but—but—

Capt. A. Confound your buts! You never hear any thing that would make another man bless himself, but you immediately damn it, with a but!

Faulk. Now, Jack, as you are my friend, own honestly—don't you think there is something forward, something indelicate, in this haste to forgive? Women should never sue for reconciliation; that should always come from us: They should retain their coldness till wooed to kindness; and their pardon, like their love, should "Not unsought, be won."

Capt. A. I have not patience to listen to you—thou'rt incorrigible! so say no more on the subject. I must go to settle a few matters; let me see you before six, remember, at my lodgings. A poor industrious devil, like me, who have toiled, and drudged, and plotted to gain my ends, and am, at last, disappointed by other people's folly, may, in pity, be allowed to swear and grumble a little! but a captious sceptic in love; a slave to fretfulness and whim, who has no difficulties but of his own creating, is a subject more fit for ridicule than compassion! [Exit.]

Faulk. I feel his reproaches; yet I would not change this too exquisite nicety, for the gross content with which he tramples on the thorns of love. His engaging me in this duel has started an idea in my head, which I will instantly pursue: I'll use it as the touchstone of Julia's sincerity and disinterestedness; if her love prove pure and sterling ore, my name will rest on it with honour; and, once I've stamped it there, I'll lay aside my doubts for ever! [Exit.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—JULIA'S Dressing-Room.

JULIA.

Jul. How this message has alarmed me! what dreadful accident can he mean? why such charge to be alone? O Faulkland! how many unhappy moments, how many tears, have you cost me!

Enter FAULKLAND.

What means this? why this caution, Faulkland?

Faulk. Alas, Julia! I am come to take a long farewell!

Jul. Heavens! what do you mean?

Faulk. You see before you a wretch whose life is forfeited. Nay, start not; the infirmity of my temper has drawn all this misery on me: I left you, fretful and passionate,—an untoward accident drew me into a quarrel; the event is, that I must fly this kingdom instantly! Oh, Julia, had I been so fortunate as to have called you mine entirely, before this mischance had fallen on me, I should not so deeply dread my banishment.

Jul. My soul is oppressed with sorrow at the nature of your misfortune; had these adverse circumstances arisen from a less fatal cause, I should have felt strong comfort in the thought, that I could now chase from your bosom every doubt of the warm sincerity of my love. My heart has long known no other guardian: I now entrust my person to your honour,—we will fly together: when safe from pursuit, my father's will may be fulfilled, and I receive a legal claim to be the partner of your sorrows, and tenderest comforter.

Faulk. O Julia! I am bankrupt in gratitude! Would you not wish some hours to weigh the advantages you forego, and what little compensation poor Faulkland can make you besides his solitary love?

Jul. I ask not a moment. No, Faulkland, I have loved you for yourself: and if I now, more than ever, prize the solemn engagement which so long has pledged us to each other, it is because it leaves us no room for hard aspersions on my fame, and puts the seal of duty to an act of love. But let us not linger, perhaps this delay—

Faulk. 'Twill be better I should not venture out again till dark: yet am I grieved to think what numberless distresses will press heavy on your gentle disposition!

Jul. Perhaps your fortune may be forfeited by this unhappy act? I know not whether 'tis so, but sure that alone can never make us unhappy. The little I have will be sufficient to support us, and exile never should be splendid.

Faulk. Ay, but in such an abject state of life my wounded pride, perhaps, may increase the natural fretfulness of my temper, till I become a rude, morose companion, beyond your patience to endure.

Jul. If your thoughts should assume so unhappy a bent, you will the more want some mild and affectionate spirit to watch over and console you, one who, by bearing your infirmities with gentleness and resignation, may teach you so to bear the evils of your fortune.

Faulk. Julia, I have proved you to the quick! and with this useless device, I throw away all my doubts. How shall I plead to be forgiven this last unworthy effect of my restless, unsatisfied disposition!

Jul. Has no such disaster happened as you related?

Faulk. I am ashamed to own that it was all pretended. Let me to-morrow, in the face of Heaven, receive my future guide and mistress, and expiate my past folly, by years of tender adoration.

Jul. Hold, Faulkland! that you are free from a crime, which I before feared to name, Heaven knows, how sincerely I rejoice! These are tears of thankfulness for that! But, that your cruel doubts should have urged you to an imposition that has wrung my heart, gives me now a pang more keen than I can express!

Faulk. By Heavens! Julia.

Jul. Yet hear me. My father loved you, Faulkland! and you preserved the life that tender parent gave me! in his presence I pledged my hand; joyfully pledged it, where before I had given my heart. When, soon after, I lost that parent, it seemed to me, that Providence had, in Faulkland, shown me whither to transfer, without a pause, my grateful duty as well as my affection: Hence I have been content to bear from you, what pride and delicacy would have forbid me from another. I will not upbraid you by repeating how you have trifled with my sincerity.

Faulk. I confess it all! yet, hear—

Jul. After such a year of trial, I might have flattered myself that I should not have been insulted with a new probation of my sincerity, as cruel as unnecessary! I now see that it is not in your nature to be content, or confident, in love. With this conviction I never will be yours.

Faulk. Nay, but, Julia, by my soul and honour! If, after this—

Jul. But one word more. As my faith has once been given to you, I never will barter it with another. I shall pray for your happiness with the truest sincerity; and the dearest blessing I can ask of Heaven to send you, will be, to charm you from that unhappy temper, which alone has prevented the performance of our solemn engagement. All I request of you is, that you will yourself reflect upon this infirmity; and, when you number up the many true delights it has deprived you of, let it not be your least regret, that it lost you the love of one who would have followed you in beggary through the world! [Exit.

Faulk. She's gone! for ever! There was an awful resolution in her manner, that rivetted me to my place. O fool! dolt! barbarian! Cursed as I am, with more imperfections than my fellow-wretches, kind fortune sent a heaven-gifted cherub to my aid, and, like a ruffian, I have driven her from my side! I must now haste to my appointment. Well, my mind is tuned for such a scene! I shall wish only to become a principal in it, and reverse the tale my cursed folly put me upon forging here. O love! tormentor! fiend! whose influence, like the moon's, acting on men of dull souls, makes idiots of them, but meeting subtler spirits, betrays their course, and urges sensibility to madness! [Exit.

Enter MAID and LYDIA.

Maid. My mistress, Ma'am, I know, was here just now—perhaps she is only in the next room. [Exit.

Lydia. Heigho! Though he has used me so, this fellow runs strangely in my head. I believe one lecture from my grave cousin will make me recall him.

Enter JULIA.

Oh, Julia, I am come to you with such an appetite for consolation! Lud, child! what's the matter with you? You have been crying! I'll be hanged if that Faulkland has not been tormenting you!

Jul. You mistake the cause of my uneasiness;—Something has flurried me a little. Nothing that you can guess at. I would not accuse Faulkland to a sister. [Aside.

Lydia. Ah! whatever vexations you may have, I can assure you mine surpass them. You know who Beverley proves to be?

Jul. I will now own to you, Lydia, that Mr. Faulkland had before informed me of the whole affair.

Lydia. So, then, I see I have been deceived by every one! but I don't care, I'll never have him.

Jul. Nay, Lydia—

31*

Lydia. Why, is it not provoking, when I thought we were coming to the prettiest distress imaginable, to find myself made a mere Smithfield bargain of at last!—There had I projected one of the most sentimental elopements!—so becoming a disguise!—so amiable a ladder of ropes!—Conscious moon—four horses—Scotch parson—with such surprise to Mrs. Malaprop! and such paragraphs in the newspapers!—Oh! I shall die with disappointment!

Jul. I don't wonder at it.

Lydia. Now, sad reverse!—what have I to expect, but, after a deal of flimsy preparation, with a bishop's license, and my aunt's blessing, to go simpering up to the altar; or, perhaps, be cried three times in a country church, and have an unmannerly fat clerk ask the consent of every butcher in the parish, to join John Absolute, and Lydia Languish, spinster!—Oh, that I should live to hear myself called spinster!

Jul. Melancholy, indeed!

Lydia. How mortifying to remember the dear delicious shifts I used to be put to, to gain half a minute's conversation with this fellow!—How often have I stole forth, in the coldest night in January, and found him in the garden stuck like a dripping statue!—There would he kneel to me in the snow, and sneeze and cough so pathetically!—he shivering with cold, and I with apprehension!—and while the freezing blast numbed our joints, how warmly would he press me to pity his flame, and glow with mutual ardour!—Ah, Julia, that was something like being in love!

Jul. If I were in spirits, Lydia, I should chide you only by laughing heartily at you, but it suits more the situation of my mind at present earnestly to entreat you, not to let a man, who loves you with sincerity, suffer that unhappiness from your caprice, which I too well know caprice can inflict.

Lydia. Oh, Lud! what has brought my aunt here?

Enter MRS. MALAPROP and DAVID.

Mrs. M. So, so! here's fine work!—here's fine suicide, parricide, and simulation, going on in the fields! and Sir Anthony not to be found to prevent the antistrophe!

Jul. For Heaven's sake, Madam, what's the meaning of this?

Lydia. Oh, patience!—Do, Ma'am, for Heaven's sake! tell us what is the matter!

Mrs. M. Why, murder's the matter! slaughter's the matter! killing's the matter!—but he can tell you the perpendiculars.

Jul. Do speak, friend. [To DAVID.

David. Lookye, my lady—by the mass, there's mischief going on. Folks don't use to meet for amusement with fire arms, firelocks, fire engines, fire screens, fire offices, and the devil knows what other crackers beside!—This, my lady, I say, has an angry favour.—To be sure, Captain Absolute—

Jul. But who is engaged?

David. My poor master—under favour for mentioning him first. You know me, my lady—I am David—and my master of course is, or was, 'squire Acres—and Captain Absolute.—Then comes 'squire Faulkland.

Jul. Do, Ma'am, let us instantly endeavour to prevent mischief.

Mrs. M. Oh, fie! it would look very inelegant in us:—we should only participate things.

Lyd. Do, my dear aunt, let us hasten to prevent them.

David. Ah, do, Mrs. Aunt, save a few lives!—they are desperately given, believe me.—Above all, there is that blood-thirsty Philistine, Sir Lucius O'Trigger.

Mrs. M. Sir Lucius O'Trigger!—O mercy! have they drawn poor little dear Sir Lucius into the scrape!—Why, how you stand, girl! you have no more feeling than one of the Derbyshire putrifactions!

Lyd. What are we to do, Madam?

Mrs. M. Why, fly, with the utmost felicity, to be sure, to prevent mischief!—here, friend—you can show us the place? Come, Sir, lead the way, and we'll precede.

David. Oh, never fear; and one good thing is, we shall find it out by the report of the pistols.

All Ladies. The pistols!—Oh, let us fly.

[Exeunt, DAVID talking.]

SCENE II.—King's-Meadow-fields.

SIR LUCIUS and ACRES, with Pistols.

Acres. By my valour, then, Sir Lucius, forty yards is a good distance—Odds levels and aims! I say, it is a good distance.

Sir L. It is, for muskets or small field-pieces; upon my conscience, Mr. Acres, you must leave these things to me. Stay, now—I'll show you. [Measures paces along the Stage.] There, now, that is a very pretty distance, a pretty gentleman's distance.

Acres. Zounds! we might as well fight in a sentrybox! I tell you, Sir Lucius, the farther he is off, the cooler I shall take my aim.

Sir L. 'Faith, then, I suppose you would aim at him best of all if he was out of sight!

Acres. No, Sir Lucius, but I should think forty, or eight and thirty yards—

Sir L. Pho! pho! nonsense! three or four feet between the mouths of your pistols is as good as a mile.

Acres. Odds bullets, no! by my valour there is no merit in killing him so near! Do, my dear Sir Lucius, let me bring him down at a long shot: a long shot, Sir Lucius, if you love me!

Sir L. Well—the gentleman's friend and I must settle that. But tell me now, Mr. Acres, in case of an accident, is there any little will or commission I could execute for you?

Acres. I am much obliged to you, Sir Lucius, but I don't understand—

Sir L. Why, you may think there's no being shot at without a little risk; and, if an unlucky bullet should carry a quietus with it—I say, it will be no time then to be bothering you about family matters.

Acres. A quietus!

Sir L. For instance, now, if that should be the case, would you choose to be pickled, and sent home? or would it be the same to you to lie here in the Abbey? I'm told there is very snug lying in the Abbey?

Acres. Pickled! snug lying in the Abbey! Odds tremors! Sir Lucius, don't talk so!

Sir L. I suppose, Mr. Acres, you were never engaged in an affair of this kind before.

Acres. No, Sir Lucius, never before.

Sir L. Ah, that's a pity! there's nothing like being used to a thing. Pray, now, how would you receive the gentleman's shot?

Acres. Odds files! I've practised that—there,

Sir Lucius, there [Puts himself in an attitude. a side-front, hey? Odd, I'll make myself small enough, I'll stand edgeways.

Sir L. Now, you're quite out—for if you stand so when I take my aim— [Levelling at him.]

Acres. Zounds, Sir Lucius! are you sure it is not cocked?

Sir L. Never fear.

Acres. But—but—you don't know—it may go off of its own head!

Sir L. Pho! be easy. Well, now, if I hit you in the body, my bullet has a double chance—for if it misses a vital part of your right side, 'twill be very hard if it don't succeed on the left.

Acres. A vital part!

Sir L. But, there—fix yourself so— [Placing him.] let me see the broadside of your full front—there—now a ball or two may pass clean through your body, and never do you any harm at all.

Acres. Clean through me! a ball or two clean through me!

Sir L. Ay, and it is much the genteelst attitude into the bargain.

Acres. Lookye! Sir Lucius—I'd just as lieve be shot in an awkward posture as a genteel one—so, by my valour! I will stand edgeways.

Sir L. [Looking at his Watch.] Sure, they don't mean to disappoint us—ha! no, 'faith—I think I see them coming.

Acres. Hey! what! coming!

Sir L. Ay, who are those yonder, getting over the stile?

Acres. There are two of them indeed! well—let them come—hey, Sir Lucius!—we—we—we we—wont run.

Sir L. Run!

Acres. No, I say—we wont run, by my valour!

Sir L. What the devil's the matter with you?

Acres. Nothing, nothing, my dear friend—my dear Sir Lucius—but I—I—I don't feel quite so bold, somehow, as I did.

Sir L. O fie! consider your honour.

Acres. Ay, true—my honour—do, Sir Lucius, edge in a word or two every now and then, about my honour.

Sir L. Well, here they're coming. [Looking.]

Acres. Sir Lucius, if I wasn't with you I should almost think I was afraid: if my valour should leave me! valour will come and go.

Sir L. Then pray keep it fast while you have it.

Acres. Sir Lucius, I doubt it is going; yes, my valour is certainly going; it is sneaking off! I feel it oozing out, as it were, at the palms of my hands!

Sir L. Your honour, your honour. Here they are.

Acres. Oh, that I was safe at Clod Hall! or could be shot before I was aware!

Enter FAULKLAND and CAPTAIN ABSOLUTE.

Sir L. Gentlemen, your most obedient; ha! what, Captain Absolute! so, I suppose, Sir, you are come here, just like myself, to do a kind office, first for your friend, then to proceed to business on your own account?

Acres. What, Jack! my dear Jack! my dear friend!

Capt. A. Harkye, Bob, Beverley's at hand.

Sir L. Well, Mr. Acres, I don't blame you saluting the gentleman civilly. So, Mr. Beverley [To FAULKLAND.] if you choose your weapons, the captain and I will measure the ground.

Faulk. My weapons, Sir!

Acres. Odds life! Sir Lucius, I'm not going to fight Mr. Faulkland; these are my particular friends!

Sir L. What, Sir, did not you come here to fight Mr. Acres?

Faulk. Not I, upon my word, Sir.

Sir L. Well, now, that 's mighty provoking! but I hope, Mr. Faulkland, as there are three of us come on purpose for the game, you wont be so cantankerous as to spoil the party, by sitting out.

Capt. A. Oh, pray, Faulkland, fight, to oblige Sir Lucius.

Faulk. Nay, if Mr. Acres is so bent on the matter.

Acres. No, no, Mr. Faulkland, I'll bear my disappointment like a christian: lookye, Sir Lucius, there 's no occasion at all for me to fight; and if it is the same to you, I'd as lieve let it alone.

Sir L. Observe me, Mr. Acres; I must not be trifled with. You have certainly challenged somebody, and you came here to fight him. Now, if that gentleman is willing to represent him, I can't see, for my soul, why it isn't just the same thing.

Acres. Why, no, Sir Lucius, I tell you, 'tis one Beverley I've challenged; a fellow, you see, that dare not show his face: if he were here, I'd make him give up his pretensions directly!

Capt. A. Hold, Bob, let me set you right: there is no such man as Beverley in the case. The person who assumed that name is before you: and as his pretensions are the same in both characters, he is ready to support them in whatever way you please.

Sir L. Well, this is lucky. Now you have an opportunity—

Acres. What, quarrel with my dear friend, Jack Absolute! not if he were fifty Beverleys! Zounds! Sir Lucius, you would not have me be so unnatural!

Sir L. Upon my conscience, Mr. Acres, your valour has oozed away with a vengeance!

Acres. Not in the least; odds backs and abettors! I'll be your second with all my heart, and if you should get a quietus, you may command me entirely. I'll get you snug lying in the Abbey here; or pickle you, and send you over to Blunderbuss-hall, or any thing of the kind, with the greatest pleasure.

Sir L. Pho! pho! you are little better than a coward.

Acres. Mind, gentlemen, he calls me a coward; coward was the word, by my valour!

Sir L. Well, Sir?

Acres. Lookye, Sir Lucius, 'tisn't that I mind the word coward; coward may be said in joke; but if you had called me a poltroon, odds daggers and balls—

Sir L. Well, Sir?

Acres. I should have thought you a very ill-bred man.

Sir L. Pho! you are beneath my notice.

Capt. A. Nay, Sir Lucius, you can't have a better second than my friend Acres. He is a most determined dog; called, in the country, fighting Bob. He generally kills a man a week; don't you, Bob?

Acres. Ay,—at home.

Sir L. Well, then, captain, 'tis we must begin; so come out, my little counsellor, [Draws his sword.] and ask the gentleman, whether he will resign the lady without forcing you to proceed against him?

Capt. A. Come then, Sir, [Draws.] since you wont let it be an amicable suit, here 's my reply.

Enter SIR ANTHONY, DAVID, and the Ladies.

David. Knock 'em all down, sweet Sir Anthony; knock down my master in particular; and bind his hands over to their good behaviour.

Sir A. Put up, Jack, put up, or I shall be in a frenzy; how came you in a duel, Sir?

Capt. A. 'Faith, Sir, that gentleman can tell you better than I; 'twas he called on me, and you know, Sir, I serve his majesty.

Sir A. Here 's a pretty fellow! I catch him going to cut a man's throat, and he tells me he serves his majesty! zounds; sirrah, then how durst you draw the king's sword against one of his subjects?

Capt. A. Sir, I tell you, that gentleman called me out, without explaining his reasons.

Sir A. 'Gad, Sir, how came you to call my son out, without explaining your reasons?

Sir L. Your son, Sir, insulted me in a manner which my honour could not brook.

Sir A. Zounds, Jack! how durst you insult the gentleman in a manner which his honour could not brook?

Mrs. M. Come, come, let's have no honour before ladies. Captain Absolute, come here; how could you intimidate us so? here 's Lydia has been terrified to death for you.

Capt. A. For fear I should be killed, or escape, Ma'am?

Mrs. M. Nay, no delusions to the past, Lydia is convinced: speak, child.

Sir L. With your leave, Ma'am, I must put in a word here; I believe I could interpret the young lady's silence—Now mark—

Lyd. What is it you mean, Sir?

Sir L. Come, come, Delia, we must be serious now; this is no time for trifling.

Lyd. 'Tis true, Sir; and your reproof bids me offer this gentleman my hand, and solicit the return of his affections.

Capt. A. Oh, my little angel, say you so? Sir Lucius, I perceive there must be some mistake here:—with regard to the affront which you affirm I have given you, I can only say that it could not have been intentional. And as you must be convinced, that I should not fear to support a real injury, you shall now see that I am not ashamed to atone for an inadvertency; I ask your pardon. But for this lady, while honoured with her approbation, I will support my claim against any man whatever.

Sir L. Well said, Jack, and I'll stand by you, my boy.

Acres. Mind, I give up all my claim; I make no pretensions to any thing in the world: and if I can't get a wife without fighting for her, by my valour! I'll live a bachelor.

Sir L. Captain, give me your hand: an affront handsomely acknowledged becomes an obligation; and as for the lady, if she chooses to deny her own hand-writing here— [Takes out letters.]

Mrs. M. Oh, he will dissolve my mystery! [Aside.] Sir Lucius, perhaps there is some mistake, perhaps I can illuminate—

Sir L. Pray, old gentlewoman, don't interfere where you have no business. Miss Languish, are you my Delia, or not?

Lyd. Indeed, Sir Lucius, I am not.

[LYDIA and ABSOLUTE walk aside.]

Mrs. M. Sir Lucius O'Trigger, ungrateful as you are, I own the soft impeachment; pardon my camelion blushes, I am Delia.

Sir L. You Delia? pho, pho, be easy.

Mrs. M. Why thou barbarous Vandyke, those letters are mine. When you are more sensible of my benignity, perhaps I may be brought to encourage your addresses.

Sir L. Mrs. Malaprop, I am extremely sensible of your condescension; and whether you or Lucy have put this trick upon me, I am equally beholden to you.—And, to show you I am not ungrateful, Captain Absolute, since you have taken that lady from me, I'll give you my Delia into the bargain.

Capt. A. I am much obliged to you, Sir Lucius; but here's my friend, fighting Bob, unprovided for.

Sir L. Ha! little valour—here, will you make your fortune?

Acres. Odds wrinkles! No.—But give me your hand, Sir Lucius, forget and forgive; but if ever I give you a chance of pickling me again, say Bob Acres is a dunce, that's all.

Sir A. Come, Mrs. Malaprop, don't be cast down—you are in your bloom yet.

Mrs. M. O Sir Anthony;—men are all barbarians!

[All retire but JULIA and FAULKLAND.]

Jul. He seems dejected and unhappy—not sullen:—there was some foundation, however, for the tale he told me—O woman! how true should be your judgment, when your resolution is so weak!

Faulk. Julia!—how can I sue for what I so little deserve? I dare not presume—yet hope is the child of penitence.

Jul. Oh! Faulkland, you have not been more faulty in your unkind treatment of me, than I am now in wanting inclination to resent it. As my heart honestly bids me place my weakness to the account of love, I should be ungenerous not to admit the same plea for yours.

[SIR ANTHONY comes forward.]

Sir A. What's going on here! So you have been quarrelling too, I warrant.—Come, Julia,

I never interfered before; but let me have a hand in the matter at last. All the faults I have ever seen in my friend Faulkland, seemed to proceed from what he calls the delicacy and warmth of his affection for you. There, marry him directly, Julia; you'll find he'll mend surprisingly.

[The rest come forward.]

Sir L. Come, now, I hope there is no dissatisfied person but what is content; for as I have been disappointed myself, it will be very hard if I have not the satisfaction of seeing other people succeed better—

Acres. You are right, Sir Lucius. So, Jack, I wish you joy.—Mr. Faulkland, the same. Ladies,—come now, to show you I'm neither vexed nor angry, odds tabors and pipes! I'll order the fiddles in half an hour, to the New Rooms—and I insist on your all meeting me there.

Sir A. 'Gad! Sir, I like your spirit; and at night we single lads will drink a health to the young couples, and a good husband to Mrs. Malaprop.

Faulk. Our partners are stolen from us, Jack—I hope, to be congratulated by each other—yours for having checked in time the errors of an ill-directed imagination, which might have betrayed an innocent heart; and mine for having, by her gentleness and candour, reformed the unhappy temper of one, who by it made wretched whom he loved most, and tortured the heart he ought to have adored.

Capt. A. True, Faulkland, we have both tasted the bitters, as well as the sweets of love; with this difference only, that you always prepared the bitter cup for yourself, while I—

Lyd. Was always obliged to me for it, hey! Mr. Modesty! But come, no more of that; our happiness is now as unalloyed as general.

Jul. Then let us study to preserve it so: and while hope pictures to us a flattering scene of happiness, let us deny its pencil those colours which are too bright to be lasting. When hearts diffusing happiness would unite their fortunes, virtue would crown them with an unfading garland of modest, hurtless flowers; but ill-judging passion will force the gaudier rose into the wreath, whose thorn offends most when its leaves are dropped!

THE DEUCE IS IN HIM:

A FARCE,

IN TWO ACTS.

BY GEORGE COLMAN, Esq.

REMARKS.

A PARTIAL hint for this piece, was suggested, to the elegant writer, by the episode of Lindor, in Marmontel's tales; and the part relative to Mademoiselle Florival, from a story in the British Magazine.

A delicate vein of satire on the absurdities of Platonic love, runs through this laughable and well-written farce, which originally met with great and deserved success.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Room in EMILY's House.

Enter EMILY with a letter open in her hand—and MADemoisELLE FLORIVAL in man's clothes.

Em. Be assured, that I will do every thing in my power to serve you; my brother knew that he might command my service—Be comforted, I beseech you, Madam.

Flo. You cannot wonder, Madam, that I should be shocked, extremely shocked, at the cruel necessity of appearing before you in so indelicate a disguise.

Em. Indeed, you need not: there is something in your manner, which convinces me, that every action of your life carries its apology along with it; though I will not venture to inquire into the particulars of your story till your mind is more at ease.

Flo. Alas, Madam, it is my interest to make you acquainted with my story. I am the daughter of Monsieur Florival, a French physician, in the island of Belleisle. An English officer, who had been desperately wounded, was, after the capitulation, for the sake of due attendance, taken into my father's house; and as I, in the very early part of my life, had resided in England, he took some pleasure in my conversation. In a word, he won my affections, and asked me of my father in marriage: but he, alas! too much influenced by the narrow prejudices so common between the two nations, forbade the officer his house, but not before we were, by the most solemn engagements, secretly contracted to each other.

Em. May I ask the officer's name?

Flo. Excuse me, Madam. Till I see or hear from him once more, my prudence, vanity, or call it what you will, will scarce suffer me to mention it. Your brother, indeed, is acquainted with—

Em. I beg your pardon—I hope, however, you have no reason to think yourself neglected or forgotten!

Flo. Oh, no; far from it. He was soon recalled by orders from England: and on my father's pressing me to consent to another match, my passion—I blush to own it—transported me so far, as to depart abruptly from Belleisle. I came over in an English ship to Portsmouth, where I expected according to letters he had contrived to send me, to find the officer. But, judge of my disappointment, when I learned that he embarked but three days before for the siege of the Havannah.

Em. The Havannah! You touch me nearly—pray go on.

Flo. In a strange kingdom—alone—and a woman—what could I do? In order to defeat inquiries after me, I disguised myself in this habit; and mixed with the officers of the place; but your brother soon discovered my uneasiness, and saw through my disguise. I frankly confessed to him every particular of my story: in consequence of which, he has thus generously recommended me to your protection.

Em. And you may depend on my friendship.

—Your situation affects me strangely.

Flø. Oh, Madam, it is impossible to tell you half its miseries; especially since your brother has convinced me, that I am so liable to be discovered.

Em. You shall throw off that dress as soon as possible, and then I will take you into the house with me and my sister—In the meantime, let me see you every day—every hour. I shall not be afraid that your visits will affect my reputation.

Flø. You are too good to me. [Weeping.]

Em. Nay, this is too much; it overcomes me. Pray, be cheerful.

Flø. I humbly take my leave.

Em. Adieu. I shall expect you to dinner.

Flø. I shall do myself the honour of waiting on you. [Exit.]

Em. Poor woman! I thought my uneasiness almost insupportable; and yet, how much must her anxiety exceed mine!

Enter BELL.

Bell. So, sister! I met your fine gentleman. Upon my word, the young spark must be a favourite.—You have had a lête-à-lête of above half an hour together.

Em. How d'ye like him.

Bell. Not at all: a soft lady-like gentleman, with a white hand, a mincing step, and a smooth chin. Where does this pretty master come from?

Em. From my brother.

Bell. Who is he?

Em. A present to you.

Bell. A present to me! what d'ye mean?

Em. Why, did not my brother promise to take care of you before he went abroad?

Bell. Well, and what then?

Em. What then! Why, he has taken care of you—sent you a pretty fellow for a husband—could he possibly take better care of you?

Bell. A husband!—a puppet, a doll, a—

Em. A soldier, Bell!—a red coat, consider.

Bell. A fine soldier indeed!—I can't bear to see a red coat cover any thing but a man, sister.—Give me a soldier that looks as if he could love me and protect me; ay, and tame me too, if I deserved it. If I was to have this thing for a husband, I would set him at the top of my India cabinet with the China figures, and bid the maid take care she did not break him.

Em. Well, well; if this is not the case, I don't know what my brother will say to you. Here's his letter; read it, and send him an answer yourself.

Bell. [Reads.] Dear sister,—The bearer of this letter is—a lady!—So, so! your servant, Madam!—and yours too, sister!—whose case is truly compassionate, and whom I most earnestly recommend to your protection,—Um—um—um—take care of her—Um—um—um—not too many questions—Um—um—um—in town in a few days.—I'll be whipped, now, if this is not some mistress of his.

Em. No, no, Bell, I know her whole history,—It is quite a little novel. She is a Frenchwoman, Mademoiselle Florival, run away from her father at Belleisle, and dying for an English gentleman at the Havannah.

Bell. The Havannah!—Not for Colonel Tamper, I hope, sister.

Em. If Colonel Tamper had been at the taking of Belleisle too, I should have been frightened out of my wits about it.

Bell. Suppose I should bring you some news of him.

Em. Of whom?

Bell. Colonel Tamper.

Em. What do you mean?

Bell. Only a card.

Em. A card!—From whom? What card?

Bell. Oh, what a delightful flutter it puts her into!

Em. Nay, but tell me.

Bell. Well then—while your visitor was here, there came a card from Major Belford; and I took the liberty of sending an answer to it.

Em. Let me see it! Dear Bell, let me see it!

Bell. Oh, it was nothing but his compliments, and desiring to have the honour of waiting on you any time this morning, from Colonel Tamper.

Em. From Colonel Tamper!—What can this mean?—I am ready to sink with fear—Why does he not come himself?

Bell. He's not arrived—nor come to town yet, I suppose.

Em. Oh, Bell! I could suppose twenty things that terrify me to death.

Bell. I think now, such a message ought to put you quite out of your pain: he could not come from Colonel Tamper, if there was no such person in being.

Em. Ay, but suppose any accident should have happened to him! Heaven forbid! How unfortunate it is to dote upon a man, whose profession exposes him hourly to the risk of his life!

Bell. Lord, Emily, how can you torment yourself with such horrid examinations? Besides, should the worst come to the worst—it is but a lover lost; and that is a loss easily repaired, you know.

Em. Go, you mad-cap! but you'll pay for all this one day, I warrant you. When you come to be heartily in for it yourself, Bell, you will know, that when a pure and disinterested passion fills the breast, when once a woman has set her heart upon a man, nothing in the world but that very man will ever make her happy.

Bell. I admire your setting your heart, as you call it, of all things. Your love, my dear Emily, is not so romantic. You pitch upon a man of figure and fortune, handsome, sensible, good-natured, and well-bred; of rank in life, and credit in his profession; a man that half the women in town would pull caps for; and then you talk, like a sly prude, of your pure and disinterested passion.

Em. Why then, I declare, if he had not a friend on earth, or a shilling in the world—if he was as miserable as the utmost malice of ill fortune could make him, I would prefer Colonel Tamper to the first duke in the kingdom.

Bell. Oh, sister, it is a mighty easy thing for persons rolling in affluence and a coach-and-six, to talk of living on bread and water, and the comforts of love in a cottage.

Em. The coach-and-six, Bell, would give little happiness to those who could not be happy without it. When once the heart has settled its affections, how mean is it to withdraw them for any paltry considerations, of what nature soever!

Bell. I think the lady doth protest too much.

Em. Ay, but she'll keep her word.

Enter SERVANT.

Serv. Major Belford, Madam!

Em. Show him in—[Exit SERVANT.] Oh, Bell, I am ready to drop with apprehension!

Enter MAJOR BELFORD.

Belf. Ladies, your humble servant—[Salutes them.] I rejoice to find you so well.

Bell. And we congratulate you, Major, on your safe return from the Havannah—How does your friend Colonel Tamper do?

Belf. He is very well, Madam; but—

Em. But what, Sir—I am frighted beyond expression—Is he in England?

Belf. Yes, Madam.

Em. In town?

Belf. Yes, Madam.

Em. Why have not we the pleasure of seeing him then?

Belf. He'll be here immediately, Madam.

Em. Oh, well.

Belf. But it was thought proper that I should wait on you first, to prepare you for his reception.

Em. To prepare me! What does he mean?

Belf. Only to prevent your being alarmed at his appearance, Madam.

Em. Alarmed! you terrify me more and more—What is the matter?

Belf. Nay, nothing—A trifle—the mere chance of war, la fortune de la guerre, as the French call it; that's all, Madam.

Em. I'm upon the rack—Dear Sir, explain—

Belf. The colonel, you know, Madam, is a man of spirit.—Having exposed his person very gallantly in the several actions before the town of the Havannah, he received many wounds; one or two of which have been attended with rather disagreeable circumstances.

Em. But is the colonel well at present, Sir?

Belf. Extremely well, Madam.

Em. Are not the consequences of his wounds likely to endanger his life?

Belf. Not in the least, Madam.

Em. I am satisfied—Pray go on, Sir.

Belf. Do not you be alarmed, Madam—

Em. Keep me no longer in suspense, I beseech you, Sir!

Bell. What can all this mean?

Belf. The two principle wounds which the colonel received, Madam, were one a little above the knee, and another in his face. In consequence of the first, he was reduced to the necessity of saving his life by the loss of a leg; and the latter has deprived him of the sight of an eye.

Em. Oh, Heavens! [Ready to faint.]

Bell. Poor Emily! How could you be so abrupt, Sir? The violent agitation of her mind is too much for her spirits.

Belf. Excuse me, Madam—I was afraid of making you uneasy; and yet it was necessary you should be acquainted with these circumstances, previous to your seeing the colonel.

Em. [Recovering.] Lost a leg and an arm did you say, Sir?

Belf. No, not an arm—an eye, Madam.

Em. An eye! worse and worse—Poor colonel!

Belf. Rather unfortunate, to be sure. But we should consider, Madam, that we have saved his life; and these were sacrifices necessary for its preservation.

Em. Very true. Ay—ay—so as he has but his life, I am happy. And I ought now to be attached to him, not only from tenderness, but compassion.

Belf. After all, Madam, his appearance is much better than you may imagine. His face, by the help of a black ribband, is very little disfigured; and he has got a false leg, made so naturally, that, except a small hitch in his gait, there is no material alteration in his person and deportment—Besides which, in point of health and spirits, he is particularly well.

Em. I am glad of it.—But, alas! he, whose person was so charming!—And his eyes, that were so brilliant!—So full of sensibility!

Belf. This accident, Madam, on his own account gives him no uneasiness: to say the truth, he seems rather vain upon it: I could wish therefore, when he comes, that you would not seem too deeply affected, but rather assume an air of cheerfulness, lest any visible uneasiness in you should shock the colonel.

Em. Poor colonel! I know his sensibility. Let me endeavour, therefore, to convince him, that he is as dear to me as ever! Oh, yes, cost me what it will, I must show him, that the preservation of his life is an entire consolation to me.

Enter SERVANT.

Serv. Colonel Tamper, Madam.

Em. Eh! what!

Bell. Desire the colonel to walk up—Compose yourself, my dear!—Poor Emily! I am in pain for her.

[Aside.]

Enter COLONEL TAMPER—runs up to EMILY.

Tam. My dearest Emily!—how happy am I to see you once again! I have brought back the honest heart and hand which I devoted to you: as to the rest of my body, you see I did not care sixpence what became of it. Miss Bell, I rejoice to see you so well.—Major, I am yours—but my Emily—

Em. Oh, colonel!

[Bursts into tears; leans upon BELL.]

Tam. How's this? tears!

Bell. You should not have followed the major so soon, colonel; she had scarce recovered the first shock from his intelligence.

Tam. My impatience would suffer me to delay no longer—Why do you weep so, Emily?—Are you sorry to see me again?

Em. Sorry to see you unfortunate.

[Weeping.]

Tam. Unfortunate! call me rather fortunate; I am come back alive; alive and merry, Emily.

Em. I am glad you have saved your life.

[Weeping.]

Tam. I dare say you are. Look on me then; what, not one glance! Wont you deign to look on your poor maimed soldier? [Pausing.]—Is it possible, then, that any alteration of my person can occasion a change in your sentiments?

Em. Never, colonel, never: it is surely no mark of want of affection to be so much hurt at your misfortunes.

Tam. Misfortunes! no misfortunes at all—none at all to a soldier—nothing but the ordinary incidents and common casualties of his life—marks of honour—and tokens of valour—I declare, I wear them about with me as the most honourable badges of my profession.—I am proud of them—I would not part with this wooden leg for the best flesh and blood in Christendom.

Em. And can you really be so unconcerned at this accident?

Tam. Really; and you shall be unconcerned too, Emily. You shall find more in me still, than in half the battered rakes and fops about town. It injures me no more than it does a fine tree, to lop my branches. My trunk is heart of oak, and I shall thrive the better for it.

Em. But is there no hope of recovering your eye again? Oh, we must have the best advice—Is the sight quite lost?

Tam. Quite—blind as a mill-horse—Blind as a beetle, Emily—But what does that signify? Love is blind, you know; and if I have lost one eye, why, they say, I shall see the clearer with the other.

Em. I cannot look at him without shuddering.

[Retires and sits down.]

Bell. What action was it you suffered in, colonel?

Tam. Before the Moro castle, Ma'am, before the Moro—Hot work, hissing hot, by sea and land, I assure you, Ma'am. Ah, the Moro, the Moro!—But if men go to run their heads against stone-walls, they must expect to have a sconce or two broken before they make their way through them—Eh, Major?

Bell. Major Belford was with you?

Tam. All the while. The major and I fought side by side, cheek by jowl, till I fell, Ma'am! We paid the Dons—didn't we, major? But Velasco, poor Velasco! A fine brave Don, must be owned—I had rather have died like Velasco, than have lived to be Generalissimo.

Bell. [To EMILY.] How are you, sister?

Tam. Nay, prythee, Emily, be comforted! more than all this might have happened to me at home. I might have thrown away my life in a duel, or broke my neck in a fox-chace: a fit of the gout, or an apoplexy, might have maimed me ten times worse for ever; or a palsy, perhaps, have killed one half of me at a single stroke—You must not take on thus—If you do, I shall be extremely uneasy.

Em. Excuse me, I cannot help it—but be assured, I esteem you as much as ever, Sir.

Tam. Esteem! and Sir!—This is cold language—I have not been used to hear you talk in that style, Emily.

Em. I don't know what I say—I am not well—let me retire.

Tam. When shall we name the happy day? I shall make shift to dance on that occasion—though as Withrington fought—on my stumps, Emily. Tell me, when shall we be happy?

Em. I grow more and more faint—Lead me to my chamber, Bell.

Bell. She is very ill—don't tease her now, colonel: but let us try to procure her some repose.

Tam. Ay, a short sleep and a little reflection, and all will be well, I dare say—I will be here again soon, and administer consolation, I warrant you. Adieu, my dear Emily.

Em. Adieu.—Oh, Bell!

[Exit in tears, with BELL.]

Tam. [Assuming his natural air and manner.] Ha, ha, ha!—Well, Belford, what is your opinion now? Will she stand the test or no?

Belf. If she does, it is more than you deserve. I could wish she would give you up with all my heart, if I did not think you would run stark mad with vexation.

Tam. Why so?

Belf. Because, as I have often told you before, this is a most absurd and ridiculous scheme, a mere trick to impose upon yourself, and most probably end in your losing the affections of an amiable lady.

Tam. You know, Belford, there is an excess of sensibility in my temper—

Belf. That will always make you unhappy.

Tam. Rather say, it will insure the future happiness of my life. Before I bind myself to abide by a woman at all events, and in all circumstances, I must be assured that she will, at all events, and in all circumstances, retain her affection for me.

Belf. 'Sdeath, I have no patience to hear you. Have not you all the reason in the world to rest assured, that Emily entertains a most sincere passion for you?

Tam. Perhaps so; but then I am not equally assured of the basis on which that passion is founded.

Belf. Her folly, I am afraid.

Tam. Nay, but I am serious, major.

Belf. You are very ridiculous, colonel.

Tam. Well, well; it does not signify talking. I must be convinced that she loves me for my own sake, for myself alone; and that, were I divested of every desirable gift of fortune and of nature, and she was to be addressed by fifty others who possessed them all in the most eminent degree, she would continue to prefer me to all the rest of mankind.

Belf. Most precious refinement, truly! This is the most high-flown metaphysics in sentiment I ever heard in my life—picked up in one of your expeditions to the coast of France, I suppose—No plain Englishman ever dreamed of such a whim—Love you for yourself! for your own sake!—not she, truly.

Tam. How then?

Belf. Why, for her own, to be sure—and so would any body else. I am your friend, and love you as a friend; and why? because I am glad to have commerce with a man of talents, honour, and honesty. Let me once see you behave like a poltroon or a villain, and you know I would cut your throat, colonel!

Tam. I don't doubt you, major; but if she don't love me for my own sake, for myself, as I said, how can I ever be certain that she will not transfer that love to another?

Belf. "For your own sake! for yourself, again!"—Why what, in the common name of sense, is this self of yours, that you make such a rout about? Your birth, your fortune, your character, your talents, and perhaps, sweet colonel, that sweet person of yours—all these may have taken her—and habitude, and continual intercourse, must increase her partiality for them in you, more than in any other person. But, after all, none of these things are yourself. You are but the ground; and these qualities are woven into your frame. Yet it is not the stuff, but the richness of the work, that stamps a value on the piece.

Tam. Why, this is downright sermonizing, major. Give you pudding-sleeves and a grizzled wig, you might be chaplain to the regiment. Yet matrimony is a leap in the dark indeed, if we cannot beforehand make ourselves at all certain of the fidelity and affection of our wives.

Belf. Marriage is precarious, I grant you, and must be so. You may play like a weary gamester, 'tis true. I would not marry a notorious profligate, nor a woman in a consumption; but there is no more answering for the continuance of her good disposition, than that of her good health.

Tam. Fine maxims! make use of them yourself; they wont serve me. A fine time, indeed, to experience a woman's fidelity—after marriage; a time when every thing conspires to render it her interest to deceive you! No, no; no fool's paradise for me, Belford.

Belf. A fool's paradise is better than a wise-acre's purgatory.

Tam. Sdeath, Belford, who comes here?—I shall be discovered.

[Resuming his counterfeit manner.]

Entrè PRATTLE.

Prat. Gentlemen, your most obedient; mighty sorry, extremely concerned, to hear the lady's taken ill—I was sent for in a violent hurry—had forty patients to visit—resolved to see her, however—Major Belford, I rejoice to see you in good health—Have I the honour of knowing this gentleman?

[Pointing to TAMPER and going up to him.]

Tam. Hum, hum!

[Limping away from PRATTLE.]

Belf. An acquaintance of mine, Mr. Prattle. You don't know him, I believe—A little hurt in the service—that's all.

Prat. Accidents, accidents, will happen—No less than seven brought into our infirmary yesterday, and ten into the hospital—Did you hear, Major Belford, that poor lady Di. Racket broke her arm last night, by an overturn, from her horses taking fright among the vast crowd of coaches getting in at Lady Thunder's rout: and yesterday morning, Sir Helter Skelter, who is so remarkably fond of driving, put out his collar-bone by a fall from his own coach-box.

Tam. Pox on his chattering! I wish he'd be gone!

[Aside. Belf. But your fair patient, Mr. Prattle—I am afraid we detain you.]

Prat. Not at all;—I'll attend her immediately—[Going, returns.—] You have not heard of the change in the ministry!

Tam. Psha!

[Aside.]

Belf. I have.

Prat. Well, well—[Going, returns.—] Lady Sarah Melville brought to-bed within these two hours—a boy—Gentlemen, your servant, your very humble servant.

[Exit.]

Tam. Chattering jackanapes!

Belf. So, the apothecary's come already—we shall have a consultation of physicians, the knocker tied up, and straw laid in the street shortly—But are you not ashamed, Tamper, to give her all this uneasiness?

Tam. No matter—I'll make her ample amends at last—What could possess them to send for this blockhead? He'll make her worse and worse—He will absolutely talk her to death.

Belf. Oh, the puppy's in fashion, you know.

Tam. It is lucky enough the fellow did not know me. He's a downright he-gossip!—and any thing he knows might as well be published in the Daily Advertiser. But come, for fear of discovery, we had better decamp for the present.

March!

Belf. You'll expose yourself confoundedly,

Tamper.

Tam. Say no more. I am resolved to put her affection to the trial. If she's thorough proof, I'm made for ever. Come along.

[Going.]

Belf. Tamper!

Tam. Oh, I am lame—I forgot.

[Limping.]

Belf. Lord, Lord! what a fool self-love makes of a man!

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—EMILY'S Dressing-Room.

EMILY, BELL, PRATTLE, sitting on a Sofa.

Bell. I think you seem to be a good deal recovered, Emily?

Em. I am much better than I was, I thank you—heigh ho!

Prat. Ay, ay, I knew we should be better by and by—These little nervous disorders are very common all over the town—merely owing to the damp weather, which relaxes the tone of the whole system. The poor Duchess of Porcelain has had a fever on her spirits these three weeks—Lady Teaser's case is absolutely hysterical; and Lady Betty Dawdle is almost half mad with lowness of spirits, headaches, tremblings, vain fears, and wanderings of the mind.

Em. Pray, Mr. Prattle, how does poor Miss Crompton do?

Prat. Never better, Ma'am. Somebody has removed her disorder, by prescribing very effectually to the Marquis of Cranford. His intended match with Miss Richman, the hundred thousand pound fortune, is quite off; and so, Ma'am, Miss Crompton is perfectly well again—By the bye too, she has another reason to rejoice: for her cousin, Miss Dorothy, who lives with her, and began, you know, to grow rather old maidish, as we say, Ma'am, made a sudden conquest of Mr. Bumper, a Lancashire gentleman of a great estate, who came up to town for the Christmas; and they were married at Miss Crompton's yesterday evening.

Bell. Is it true, Mr. Prattle, that Sir John Medley is going to the south of France for the recovery of his health.

Prat. Very true, Ma'am, very true that he's going, I promise you; but not for the recovery of his health. Sir John's well enough himself—but his affairs are in a galloping consumption, I assure you. No less than two executions in his house. I heard it for a fact at Lady Modish's. Poor gentleman, I have known his chariot stand at Arthur's till eight o'clock in the morning. He has had a sad run a long time; but that last affair at Newmarket totally undid him. Pray, ladies, have you heard the story of Alderman Manchester's lady?

Bell. Oh, no. Pray, what is it?

Prat. A terrible story indeed—Eloped from her husband, and went off with Lord John Sprightly. Their intention, it seems, was to go over to Holland; but the Alderman pursued them to Harwich, and caught them just as they were going to embark. He threatened Lord John with a prosecution: but Lord John, who knew the Alderman's turn, came down with a thousand pounds:

and so the Alderman received his wife, and all is well again.

Bell. I vow, Mr. Prattle, you are extremely amusing. You know the chit-chat of the whole town.

Prat. Can't avoid picking up a few slight anecdotes, to be sure, Ma'am—Go into the best houses in town—attend the best families in the kingdom—nobody better received—nobody takes more care—nobody tries to give more satisfaction.

Bell. Is there any public news of any kind, Mr. Prattle?

Prat. None at all, Ma'am—except that the officers are most of them returned from the Havannah.

Em. So we hear, Sir.

Prat. I saw Colonel Tamper yesterday. O, ay! and Major Belford, and another gentleman, as I came in here this morning.

Bell. That was Colonel Tamper, Sir.

Prat. That gentleman, Colonel Tamper, Ma'am!

Bell. Yes, Sir.

Prat. Pardon me, Ma'am! I know Colonel Tamper very well.—That poor gentleman was somewhat disabled—had suffered a little in the wars—Colonel Tamper is not so unfortunate.

Em. O yes, that horrid accident!

Prat. What accident?

Bell. His wounds—his wounds—Don't you know, Sir?

Prat. Wounds, Ma'am!—Upon my word, I never heard he had received any.

Bell. No! Why he lost a leg and eye at the siege of the Havannah.

Prat. Did he? Why then, Ma'am, I'll be bold to say he is the luckiest man in the world.

Bell. Why so, Sir?

Prat. Because, Ma'am, if he lost a leg or an eye at the Havannah, they must be grown again, or he has somehow procured others that do the business every whit as well.

Em. Impossible!

Prat. I wish I may die, Ma'am, if the colonel had not yesterday two as good legs and fine eyes as any man in the world. If he lost one of each at the Havannah, we practitioners in physic should be much obliged to him to communicate his receipt, for the benefit of Greenwich and Chelsea hospitals.

Em. Are you sure that the colonel has had no such loss, Sir?

Prat. As sure as that I am here, Ma'am! I saw him going into the what-d'ye-call-him ambassador's, just over against my house, yesterday; and the last place I was at this morning was Mrs. Daylight's, where I heard the colonel was at her route last night, and that every body thought he was rather improved than injured by his late expedition. But, odso! Lack-a-day, lack-a-day, lack-a-day!—now I recollect—ha, ha, ha!

[Laughing very heartily.]

Bell. What's the matter, Mr. Prattle?

Prat. Excuse me, ladies; I can't forbear laughing—ha, ha, ha!—the gentleman in the other room, Colonel Tamper! ha, ha, ha!—I find the colonel had a mind to pay a visit in masquerade this morning—I spoke to Major Belford—I thought I knew his friend too—but he limped away and hid his face, and would not speak to me.—Upon my word, he did it very well! I could have sworn there had been an amputation—He would make a figure at a masked ball. Ha, ha, ha!

Em. Bell. Ha, ha, ha!

[Looking at each other and affecting to laugh.]

Prat. Ha, ha, ha! very comical! Ha, ha, ha!

Bell. A frolic, Mr. Prattle, a frolic: I think, however, you had better not take any notice of it abroad.

Prat. Me! I shall never breathe it, Ma'am: I am close as oak—an absolute free-mason for secrecy—But, Ma'am, [Rising.] I must bid you good morning—I have several patients to visit before dinner. Mrs. Tremor, I know, will be dying with the vapours till she sees me; and I am to meet Dr. Valerian at Lord Hectic's in less than half an hour.

Em. Ring the bell, my dear—Mr. Prattle, your servant.

Prat. Ladies, your very humble servant. I shall send you a cordial mixture, Ma'am, to be taken in any particular faintness, or lowness of spirits; and some draughts, for morning and evening. Have a care of catching cold, be cautious in your diet, and I make no doubt but in a few days we shall be perfectly recovered. Ladies, your servant: your most obedient, very humble servant. [Exit.]

[The Ladies sit for some time silent.]

Bell. Sister Emily.

Em. Sister Bell!

Bell. What d'ye think of Colonel Tamper now, sister?

Em. Why I am so provoked, and so pleased; so angry, and so diverted; that I don't know whether I should be in or out of humour, at this discovery.

Bell. No!—Is it possible you can have so little spirit? This tattling apothecary will tell this fine story at every house he goes into—it will be town-talk—If a lover of mine had attempted to put such an impudent deceit upon me, I would never see his face again.

Em. If you had a lover that you liked, Bell, you would not be quite so violent.

Bell. Indeed, but I should. What! to come here with a Canterbury tale of a leg and an eye, and Heaven knows what, merely to try the extent of his power over you—To gratify his inordinate vanity, in case you should retain your affection for him; or to reproach you for your weakness and infidelity, if you could not reconcile yourself to him on that supposition.

Em. It is abominably provoking, I own; and yet, Bell, it is not a quarter of an hour ago, but I would have parted with half my fortune to have made it certain that there was a trick in the story.

Bell. Well, I never knew one of these men of extraordinary sense, as they are called, that was not in some instances a greater fool than the rest of mankind.

Em. After all, Bell, I must confess that this stratagem has convinced me of the infirmity of my temper. This supposed accident began to make strange work with me.

Bell. I saw that plain enough. I told you what your pure and disinterested passion, sister, would come to, long ago. Yet this is so flagrant an affront, I would not marry him these seven years.

Em. That, perhaps, might be punishing myself, sister.

Bell. We must plague him, and heartily too.

Oh, for a bright thought now, some charming invention to torment him!

Em. Oh, as to that matter, I should be glad to have some comical revenge on him, with all my heart.

Enter SERVANT.

Serv. Captain Johnson, Ma'am.

Em. Desire him to walk up. [Exit SERVANT.] I am fit to see any company now. This discovery will do me more good, I believe, than all Mr. Prattle's cordial mixtures, as he calls them.

Bell. Oh, you're in charming spirits, sister—But Captain Johnson! you abound in the military, captains, colonels, and majors, by wholesale: who is Captain Johnson, pray?

Em. Only the name that Mademoiselle Florival, the Belleisle Lady you saw this morning, goes by.

Bell. Oh, sister, the luckiest thought in the world—such a use to make of this lady.

Em. What d'ye mean?

Bell. Captain Johnson shall be Colonel Tamper's rival, sister!

Em. Hush! here she is.

Enter MADEMOISELLE FLORIVAL.

Em. Give me leave, Madam, to introduce you to my sister.

Bell. I have heard your story, Madam, and take part in your misfortunes.

Flo. I am infinitely obliged both to you and that lady, Madam.

Em. Oh! Madam, I have been extremely ill since you was here this morning, and terrified almost beyond imagination.

Flo. I am very sorry to hear it; may I ask what has alarmed you?

Em. It is so ridiculous, I scarce know how to tell you.

Bell. Then I will. You must know, Ma'am, that my sister was engaged to an officer, who went out on a late military expedition. He is just returned, but is come home with the strangest conceit that ever filled the brain of a lover. He took it into his head to try my sister's faith by pretending to be maimed and wounded, and has actually visited her this morning in a counterfeit character. We have just now detected the imposition, and want your assistance to be pleasantly revenged on him.

Flo. I cannot bring myself to be an advocate for the lady's cruelty—But you may both command me in any thing.

Em. There is no cruelty in the case; I fear I am gone too far for that. As you are, in appearance, such a smart young gentleman, my sister has waggishly proposed to make you the instrument of exciting Colonel Tamper's jealousy, by your personating the character of a supposed rival—Was not that your device, sister?

Bell. It was; and if this lady will come into it, and you play your part well, we'll tease the wise colonel, and make him sick of his rogueries, I warrant you.

Flo. I have been a mad girl in my time, I confess, and remember when I should have joined in such a frolic with pleasure. At present, I fear I am scarce mistress enough of my temper to maintain my character with any tolerable humour. However, I will summon up all my spirits, and do my best to oblige you.

Bell. Oh, you will have but little to do—The business will lie chiefly on your hands, Emily—You must be most intolerably provoking. If you do but irritate him sufficiently, we shall have charming sport with him.

Em. Never fear me, Bell; Mr. Prattle's intelligence has given me spirits equal to any thing. Now I know it is but a trick, I shall scarce be able to see him limping about without laughing.

Enter SERVANT.

Serv. Colonel Tamper, Madam.

Em. Show him in! [Exit SERVANT.]—Now, ladies!

Bell. Now, sister!—Work him heartily; cut him to the bone, I charge you. If you show him the least mercy, you are no woman.

Enter COLONEL TAMPER.

Tam. This is to have new servants! not at home, indeed!—A pack of blockheads, to think of denying my Emily to me. I knew the poor dear soul was a little out of order indeed—but—[Seeing FLORIVAL.]—I beg pardon, Madam! I did not know you had company.

Bell. Oh, this gentleman is a particular friend of my sister's—he's let in at any time.

Tam. Hum! [Disordered.]

Em. I did not expect to see you return so soon, Sir!

Tam. No; I believe I am come somewhat unexpectedly indeed, Madam!

Em. If your return had not been so extremely precipitate, Sir, I should have sent you a message on purpose to prevent your giving yourself that trouble.

Tam. Madam! a message! for what reason?

Em. Because I am otherwise engaged.

[With indifference.]

Tam. Engaged! I don't apprehend you, Madam.

Em. No; you are extremely dull then: don't you see I have company? Was you at the opera last night, Captain Johnson?

[Coquetting with FLORIVAL.]

Tam. I am thunderstruck. Madam! Miss Emily! Madam!

Em. Sir!—Colonel Tamper!—Sir!

Tam. I say, Madam!—

Em. Sir!

Tam. 'Sdeath, I have not power to speak to her. This strange and sudden alteration in your behaviour, Madam—

Em. Alteration! none at all, Sir; the change is on your side, not mine. I'll be judged by this gentleman. Captain Johnson, here's a miniature of the colonel, which he sat for just before he went abroad—done by a good hand, and reckoned a striking likeness. Did you ever see a poor creature so altered? [Giving a bracelet.]

Flo. Why really, Madam, there is, I must own, a very visible difference at present. That black riband [Looking by turns on the picture and COLONEL TAMPER] makes a total eclipse of the brilliancy of this right eye—and then, the irregular motion of the leg gives such a twist to the rest of the body, that—

Tam. Sir!—But it is to you I address myself at present, Madam. I was once fond and foolish enough to imagine, that you had a heart truly generous and sensible; and flattered myself that it was above being shaken by absence, or affected by events. How have I been deceived! I find that—

Em. Pardon me, Sir, I never deceived you; nay, you see that I disdained the thought of deceiving you even for a day. Out of respect to our late mutual attachment, I am resolved to deal openly with you. In a word, then, every thing between us must now be at an end.

Tam. Confusion!—Every thing at an end! and can you, you, Emily, have the courage to tell me so?

Em. Why not? Come, come, Colonel Tamper, vanity is your blind side.

Tam. Zounds, Madam!

Em. Don't be in a passion—Do but consider the matter calmly; and though it may rather be displeasing, yet when you have duly weighed all circumstances I'm sure you must do me the justice to acknowledge my sincerity.

Tam. I shall run mad—Is it possible, Emily?—Sincerity do you call this?—Dissimulation—damned dissimulation!

Em. Have patience, Sir! The loss of your whole fortune would have been trifling to me; but how can I reconcile myself to this mangling of your figure?—Let me turn the tables on you for a moment—Suppose now, colonel, that I had been so unfortunate as to have lost a leg and an eye, should you, d'ye think, have retained your affection inviolable for me.

Tam. False, false woman!—Have a care, Emily! have a care I say, or you'll destroy your fame and happiness for ever. Consider what you are doing, ere you make a final resolution—You'll repent your inconstancy, I tell you beforehand—upon my soul, you will—you'll have more reason to repent it, than you can possibly imagine.

Em. Why will you oblige me now to say shocking things to you? It goes against me to tell you so, but I can't even see you now without horror; nay, was I even, from a vain point of honour, to adhere to my engagements with you, I could never conquer my disgust. It would be a most unnatural connection. Would not it, Captain Johnson?

Tam. Hell! 'sdeath! confusion!—How steadily she persists in her perfidy! Madam! Madam!—I shall choke with rage—But one word, and I am gone for ever—for ever, for ever, Madam!

Em. What would you say, Sir.

Tam. Tell me then—and tell me truly: have not you received the addresses of that gentleman?

Em. He has honoured me with them, I confess, Sir; and every circumstance is so much in his favour, that I could have no manner of objection to him, but my unfortunate engagements to you—But since your ill fortune has invincibly divorced us from each other, I think I am at liberty to listen to him.

Tam. Matchless confidence!—Mighty well, Madam!—It is not then the misfortunes that have befallen me, but the charms you have found in that gentleman, which have altered your inclination.

Flo. Well, Sir! and what then, Sir! the lady, I presume, is not included, like an old mansion-house, in the rent-roll of your estate, or the inventory of your goods and chattles. Her hand, I hope, is still her own property, and she may bestow it on you or me, or any body else, just as she pleases.

Tam. You are a villain, Sir!—Withdraw.

Bell. Oh heavens! here will be murder—Don't stir, I beg you, Sir.

Flo. O never fear me, Madam; I am not such a poltroon as to contend with that gentleman—Do you think I would set my strength and skill against a poor blind man, and a cripple?

Tam. Follow me, Sir; I'll soon teach you to use your own legs.

Flo. Oh, the sturdy beggar! stir your stumps and begone; here's nothing for you, fellow!

Tam. Villain!

Flo. Poor man!

Tam. Scoundrel!

Flo. Prithee, man, don't expose yourself.

Tam. Puppy!

Flo. Poor wretch!

Em. What, quarrel before ladies! Oh, for shame, colonel!

Tam. This is beyond all sufferance. I can contain no longer—Know then, Madam, {To Emily.} to your utter confusion, I am not that mangled thing which you imagine me—You may see Madam— [Resuming his natural manner.]

Em. Bell. Flo. Ha, ha, ha, ha! [Laughing violently.]

Em. A wonderful cure of lameness and blindness—Your case is truly curious, Sir;—and attested by three credible witnesses—Will you give us leave to print it in the public papers?

Tam. Madam, Madam!

Flo. I think the story would make a figure in the Philosophical Transactions.

Tam. Sir!

Bell. A pretty leg, indeed. Will you dance a minuet with me, colonel?

Em. Your wounds are not mortal, I hope, colonel.

Tam. No, Madam! my person, I thank Heaven, is still unhurt. I have my legs, both legs, Madam; and I will use them to transport me as far as possible from so false a woman—I have my eyes, too—my eyes, Madam—but they shall never look on you again, but as the most faithless and ungrateful of your sex.

Em. If I'm not surprised how he could act it so well! Pray, let us see you do it over again, colonel—How was it, eh? [Mimicking.] hip-hop-hip-hop, like Prince Volscious, I think.

Tam. I took that method, Madam, to try your truth, constancy, and affection. I have found you void of all those qualities, and shall have reason to rejoice at the effect of my experiment as long as I live.

Em. If you meant to separate yourself from me, you have indeed taken an excellent method. And a mighty proof you have given of your own affection, truly! Instead of returning, after an anxious absence, with joy into my presence, to come home with a low and mean suspicion, with a narrow jealousy of mind, when the frankness and generosity of my behaviour ought to have engaged you to repose the most unlimited confidence in me!

Tam. The event, Madam, has but well warranted my experiment.

Em. And shall justify it, Sir, still more: for here, before your face, I give my hand to this gentleman;—solemnly declaring, that it shall never be in your power to dissolve the connection formed between us.

Tam. As to you, Madam, your infidelity be your punishment. But that gentleman shall hear from me.

Flo. I defy you, Sir!

Em. Nothing further remains between us—leave me, Sir!

Tam. I am gone, Madam! and so help me Heaven, never, never to return— [Going.]

Enter MAJOR BELFORD.

Belf. How! going in a passion?—Hold, Tamper—All in confusion!—I thought so—and came to set matters to rights again.

Flo. What do I see! Major Belford!—Major Belford! oh! [Faints.]

Belf. Ha, my name, and fainting?—What can this mean? [Runs and takes her in his arms.] By heavens, a woman! May I hope that—Hold, she recovers—It is, it is she! my dear Florival herself!—and we shall still be happy.

Tam. Belford's Belleisle lady, as I live!—My rival a woman! I begin to feel myself very ridiculous.

Belf. What wonder, my love, has brought you hither, and in this habit?

Flo. Oh, Sir, I have a long story to relate. At present, let it suffice to say, that that lady's brother has been the noblest of friends to me; and she herself this morning generously vouchsafed to take me under her protection.

Belf. I am bound to them for ever. At my return I found letters from your father, who, supposing you was in England with me, wrote to acquaint me that he was inconsolable for your loss, and that he would consent to our union if I would but assure him that you was safe and well. The next post shall acquaint him of our good fortune. Well, Tamper, am not I a lucky fellow?

Tam. Oh, Belford! I am the most miserable dog in the world.

Belf. What, have you dropped your mask, I see—you're on your legs again—I met Prattle in the street—He stopped his chariot to speak to me about you, and I found that he had blown you up, and discovered to the ladies that you was returned quite unhurt from the Havannah.

Tam. Did that coxcomb betray me? That accounts for all Emily's behaviour—Oh, major, I am ruined past redemption—I have behaved most extravagantly, both to your lady and Emily. I shall never be able to look them in the face again.

Belf. Ay, ay, I foresaw this. Did not I tell you that you would expose yourself confoundedly?—However, I'll be an advocate for you—my Florival shall be an advocate for you; and I make no doubt but you will be taken into favour again.

Em. Does he deserve it, major?

Belf. Why, Madam, I can't say much for him—or myself either, faith—We must rely entirely on your goodness.

Flo. He's a true penitent, I see, Madam, and I'll answer for it, he loves you to excess. Nay, look on him.

Em. Was it well done, colonel, to cherish a mean distrust of me? to trifle with the partiality I had shown to you? and to endeavour to give me pain, merely to secure a poor triumph over my weakness to yourself?

Tam. I am ashamed to answer you.

Belf. Ashamed! and so you well may indeed.

Tam. I see my absurdity; all I wish is to be laughed at, and forgiven.

Belf. A very reasonable request. Come, Madam, pity the poor fellow, and admit him to your good graces again.

Flo. Let us prevail on you, dear Madam.

Em. Well; now I see he is most heartily mortified, I am half inclined to pity him.

Tam. Generous Emily!

Em. Go, you provoking wretch! 'tis more than you deserve. [To TAMPER.]

Tam. It shall be the future study of my life to deserve this pardon.—[Kissing her hand.]—Belford, I give you joy—Madam—[To FLORIVAL.]—I have behaved so ill to you, I scarce know how to give you joy as I ought.

Belf. Come, come, no more of this at present—Now we have on all sides ratified the preliminaries, let us settle the definitive treaty as soon as we can—We have been two lucky fellows, Tamper—I have been fortunate in finding my mistress, and you as fortunate in not losing yours.

Tam. So we have, Belford; and I wish every brave officer in his majesty's service had secured to himself such comfortable winter-quarters, as we have, after a glorious campaign. [Exeunt.]

GUSTAVUS VASA:

OR,

THE DELIVERER OF HIS COUNTRY.

AN HISTORICAL TRAGEDY,

IN FIVE ACTS.

BY HENRY BROOKE, Esq.

REMARKS.

THIS tragedy was accepted at Drury-Lane theatre in 1739, and, during the rehearsals, excited great expectations of success; a prohibitory order from the lord chamberlain, however, deprived the author of his expected laurels on the stage, but rendered his production so popular, that, on its publication the same year, not less than a thousand pounds are said to have been the clear produce. The present ministry allowed its representation in 1805, when Master Betty attempted the character of Gustavus.

The genuine lover of liberty will here meet with those noble principles of action which elevate humanity and have expanded the energies of free minds in free countries; but it cannot be concealed, that the play is deficient in interest, bustle, and incidents for the prevailing dramatic taste. The following extract will furnish the plot:—"Gustavus I. king of Sweden, known by the name of Gustavus Vasa, was born in 1490. He was the son of Eric Vasa, Duke of Gripsholm, and descended from the ancient kings of Sweden. Christiern II. king of Denmark, having got Gustavus into his hands, in the war in which he reduced Sweden, kept him several years prisoner at Copenhagen. He, at length, made his escape, and having prevailed on the Dalecarlians to throw off the Danish yoke, he put himself at their head."—Modern Universal History.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—The inside of the Copper Mines in Dalecarlia.

Enter ANDERSON and ARNOLDUS.—GUSTAVUS lying down in the distance.

And. You tell me wonders.

Arn. Soft, behold, my lord—

[Points to GUSTAVUS.]

Behold him stretch'd, where reigns eternal night,
The flint his pillow, and cold damps his cov'ring
Yet, bold of spirit, and robust of limb,
He throws inclemency aside, nor feels
The lot of human frailty.

And. What horrors hang around! the savage race
Ne'er hold their den but where some glimmering
ray

May bring the cheer of morn—What then is he?
His dwelling marks a secret in his soul,
And whispers somewhat more than man about
him.

Arn. Draw but the veil of his apparent wretchedness,

And you shall find, his form is but assum'd,
To hoard some wondrous treasure, lodg'd within.

And. Let him bear up to what thy praises speak
him,

And I will win him, spite of his reserve,
Bind him with sacred friendship to my soul,
And make him half myself.

Arn. 'Tis nobly promised;

For worth is rare, and wants a friend in Sweden;
And yet I tell thee, in her age of heroes,
When, nursed by freedom, all her sons grew great,
And every peasant was a prince in virtue,
I greatly err, or this abandon'd stranger
Had stepp'd the first for fame—though now he seeks

To veil his name, and cloud his shine of virtues;
For there is danger in them.

And. True, Arnoldus.

Were there a prince throughout the sceptred globe,
Who search'd out merit for its due preference,
With half that care our tyrant seeks it out
For ruin,—happy, happy were that state,
Beyond the golden fable of those pure
And earliest ages—

When came this stranger hither?

Arn. Six moons have chang'd upon the face of
night,

Since here he first arriv'd, in servile weeds,
But yet of mien majestic. I observ'd him,
And, ever as I gaz'd, some nameless charm,
A wondrous greatness, not to be conceal'd,
Broke through his form, and aw'd my soul before
him.

Amid these mines he earns the hireling's portion;
His hands out-toil the hind, while on his brow
Sits patience, bath'd in the laborious drop
Of painful industry.—I oft have sought,
With friendly tender of some worthier service,
To win him from his temper; but he shuns
All offers, yet declin'd with graceful act,
Engaging beyond utterance; and at eve,
When all retire to some domestic solace,
He only stays, and, as you see, the earth
Receives him to her dark and cheerless bosom.

And. Has no unwary moment e'er betray'd
The labours of his soul, some fav'rite grief,
Whereon to raise conjecture?

Arn. I saw, as some bold peasants late deplor'd
Their country's bondage, sudden passion seiz'd,
And bore him from his seeming ease; strait his
Was turn'd to terror, ruin fill'd his eye,
And his proud step appear'd to awe the world:
But sadness soon usurp'd upon his brow,
And the big tear roll'd graceful down his visage.

And. Forbear—he rises—Heavens, what majesty!

GUSTAVUS comes forward.

Your pardon, stranger, if the voice of virtue,
If cordial amity from man to man,
And somewhat that should whisper to the soul,
To seek and cheer the sufferer, led me hither,
Impatient to salute thee. Be it thine
Alone to point the path of friendship out;
And my best power shall await upon thy fortunes.

Gust. There is a wondrous test,

The truest, worthiest, noblest, cause of friendship
Dearer than life, than interest, or alliance,
And equal to your virtues.

And. Say—unfold.

Gust. Art thou a soldier, a chief lord in Sweden,
And yet a stranger to thy country's voice,
That loudly calls the hidden patriot forth!
But what's a soldier? What's a lord in Sweden?
All worth is fled, or fallen—nor has a life
Been spar'd, but for dishonour; spar'd to breed
More slaves for Denmark, to beget a race
Of new-born virgins for th' unsated lust
Of our new masters.—Sweden! thou'rt no more!
Queen of the North! thy land of liberty,
Thy house of heroes, and thy seat of virtues,
Is now the tomb where thy brave sons lie speechless.

And. O 'tis true.

But wherefore? To what purpose?

Gust. Think of Stockholm!

When Christiern seiz'd upon the hour of peace,
And drench'd the hospitable floor with blood;
Then fell the flower of Sweden, mighty names!
Her hoary senators, and gasping patriots!
The tyrant spoke, and his licentious band
Of blood-train'd ministry were loos'd to ruin.

Husbands, sons, and sires,
With dying ears drank in the loud despair
Of shrieking chastity. Is there a cause for this?
For sin without temptation, calm, cool villainy,
Deliberate mischief, unimpassion'd lust,
And smiling murder? Lie thou there, my soul,
Sleep, sleep upon it, image not the form
Of any dream but this, 'till time grows pregnant,
And thou canst wake to vengeance.

And. Thou'st greatly mov'd me. Ha! thy tears start forth.

Yes, let them flow, our country's fate demands
them;

But wherefore talk of vengeance? 'Tis a word
Should be engraven on the new-fallen snow,
Where the first beam may melt it from observance.
Vengeance on Christiern? Norway and the Dane,
The sons of Sweden, all the peopled North,
Bend at his nod! my humbler boast of power
Meant not to cope with crowns.

Gust. Then what remains

Is briefly this: your friendship has my thanks,
But must not my acceptance:—no—
First sink, thou baleful mansion, to the centre!
And be thy darkness doubled round my head;
Ere I forsake thee for the bliss of paradise,
To be enjoy'd beneath a tyrant's sceptre.

And. Nor I, while I can hold it; but, alas!
That is not in our choice.

Gust. Why? where's that power, whose engines are of force

To bend the brave and virtuous man to slavery?
He has debauch'd the genius of our country,
And rides triumphant, while her captive sons
Await his nod! the silken slaves of pleasure,
Or fetter'd in their fears.

And. No doubt, a base submission to our wrongs
May well be term'd a voluntary bondage;
But, think, the heavy hand of power is on us;
Of power, from whose imprisonment and chains
Not all our free-born virtue can protect us

Gust. 'Tis there you err, for I have felt their force;

And had I yielded to enlarge these limbs,
Or share the tyrant's empire, on the term
Which he propos'd—I were a slave indeed.

No—in the deep and poisonous damp of dungeons,
The soul can rear her sceptre, smile in anguish,
And triumph o'er oppression.

And. O glorious spirit! think not I am slack
To relish what thy noble scope intends;
But then the means, the peril, and the consequence!

Great are the odds, and who shall dare the trial?
Gust. I dare.

O wert thou still that gallant chief,
Whom once I knew! I could unfold a purpose,
Would make the greatness of thy heart to swell,
And burst in the conception.

And. Give it utterance.—You say you know me;
But give a tongue to such a cause as this,
And, if you hold me tardy in the call,
You know me not.—But thee, I've surely known;
For there is somewhat in that voice and form,
Which has alarm'd my soul to recollection;
But, 'tis as in a dream, and mocks my reach.

Gust. Then name the man, whom it is death to know,

Or, knowing, to conceal—and I am he.

And. Gustavus! Heavens! 'Tis he, 'tis he himself!

Enter ARVIDA, speaking to a SERVANT.

Arv. I thank you, friend, he's here, you may retire. [Exit SERVANT.]

And. Good morning to my noble guest, you're early! [GUSTAVUS walks apart.]

Arv. I come to take a short and hasty leave:
'Tis said, that from the mountain's neighb'ring
brow

The carvass of a thousand tents appears,
Whitening the vale—Suppose the tyrant there;
You know my safety lies not in the interview—
Ha! What is he, who, in the shreds of slavery,
Supports a step, superior to the state
And insolence of ermine?

Gust. Sure that voice

Was once the voice of friendship and Arvida!

Arv. Ha! Yes—'tis he!—ye powers! it is Gustavus!

Gust. Thou brother of adoption! In the bond
Of every virtue wedded to my soul,
Enter my heart: it is thy property.

Arv. I'm lost in joy and wondrous circumstance.

Gust. Yet, wherefore, my Arvida, wherefore is it,

That, in a place and at a time like this,
We should thus meet? Can Christiern cease from cruelty?

'Say, whence is this, my brother? How escap'd you?
Did I not leave thee in the Danish dungeon?

Arv. Of that hereafter. Let me view thee first.

Flow graceful is the garb of wretchedness,
When worn by virtue! Fashions turn to folly;
Their colours tarnish, and their pomps grow poor
To her magnificence.

Gust. Yes, my Arvida,

Beyond the sweeping of the proudest train
That shades a monarch's heel, I prize this humble
dress,

For it is sacred to my country's freedom.
A mighty enterprize has been conceiv'd,
And thou art come auspicious to the birth,
As sent to fix the seal of Heaven upon it.

Arv. Point but thy purpose—let it be to bleed—

Gust. Your hands, my friends!

All. Our hearts.

Gust. I know they're brave.

Of such the time has need, of hearts like yours,
Faithful and firm, of hands inur'd and strong,
For we must ride upon the neck of danger,
And plunge into a purpose big with death.

And. Here let us kneel, and bind us to thy side.

Gust. No, hold,—if we want oaths to join us,
Swift let us part, from pole to pole asunder.

A cause like ours is its own sacrament;
Truth, justice, reason, love, and liberty,
Th' eternal links that clasp the world, are in it;
And he, who breaks their sanction, breaks all
law,

And infinite connection.

Arv. True, my lord.

And. And such the force I feel.

Arv. And I.

Arv. And all.

Gust. Know, then, that ere our royal Stenon fell,
While this my valiant cousin and myself
By chains and treachery lay detained in Denmark,
Upon a dark and unsuspected hour

The bloody Christiern sought to take my head.
I escap'd,

Led by a generous arm, and some time lay
Conceal'd in Denmark; for my forfeit head

Became the price of crowns, each port and path
Was shut against my passage, 'till I heard

That Stenon, valiant Stenon, fell in battle,
And freedom was no more. O then what bounds

Had power to hem the desp'rate! I o'erpass'd them,
Travers'd all Sweden, thro' ten thousand foes,

Impending perils, and surrounding tongues,
That from himself inquired Gustavus out.

Witness, my country; how I toil'd to wake
Thy sons to liberty! in vain—for fear,

Cold fear, had seiz'd on all.—Here last I came
And shut me from the sun, whose hateful beams

Serv'd but to show the ruins of my country.
When here, my friends, 'twas here at length I found,

What I had left to look for, gallant spirits,
In the rough form of untaught peasantry.

And. Indeed they once were brave; our Dale-carlians

Have oft been known to curb despotic sway:
And, as their only wealth has been their liberty,

From all th' unmeasur'd graspings of ambition
They've held that gem untouch'd—though now

'tis fear'd—
Gust. It is not fear'd—I say, they still shall hold it.

I've search'd these men, and find them like the soil,
Barren without, and to the eye unlovely,

But they've their minds within; and this the day,
In which I mean to prove them.

Arv. O Gustavus!

Most aptly hast thou caught the passing hour,
Upon whose critical and fated hinge

The state of Sweden turns.
Gust. And to this hour

I've therefore held me in this darksome womb,
That sends me forth as to a second birth

Of freedom, or through death to reach eternity.
This day, return'd with every circling year,

In thousands pours the mountain peasants forth,
Each with his batter'd arms and rusty helm,

In sportive discipline well train'd and prompt
Against the day of peril.—Thus disguised,

Already have I stirr'd their latent sparks
Of slumbering virtue, apt as I could wish

To warm before the lightest breath of liberty

Arn. How will they kindle, when, confess'd to view,
Once more their lov'd Gustavus stands before them!

Arn. It cannot fail.

And. It has a glorious aspect.

Arn. Now, Sweden! rise and re-assert thy rights,
Or be for ever fallen.

And. Then be it so.

Arn. Lead on, thou arm of war,
To death or victory.

Gust. Why thus, my friends, thus join'd in such a cause,

Are we not equal to a host of slaves?
You say, the foe's at hand—Why, let them come;
Steep are our hills, not easy of access,
And few the hours we ask for their reception.
For I will take these rustic sons of liberty
In the first warmth and hurry of their souls;
And, should the tyrant then attempt our heights,
He comes upon his fate.—Arise, thou sun!
Haste, haste to rouse thee to the call of liberty,
That shall once more salute thy morning beam,
And hail thee to thy setting.

Arn. Were it not worth a hazard of a life,
To know if Christiern leads his powers in person,
And what his scope intends? Be mine that task.
Even to the tyrant's tent I'll win my way,
And mingle with his councils.

Gust. Go, my friend.

Dear as thou art, whene'er our country calls,
Friends, sons, and sires, should yield their treasure up,

Nor own a sense beyond the public safety.

But, tell me, my Arvida, ere thou goest,

Tell me what hand has made thy friend its debtor,
And given thee up to freedom and Gustavus?

Arn. Ha! let me think of that, 'tis sure she loves him. [Aside.]

Away, thou skance and jaundic'd eye of jealousy,
That tempts my soul to sicken at perfection;
Away! I will unfold it.—To thyself
Arvida owes his freedom.

Gust. How, my friend?

Arn. Some months are pass'd, since, in the Danish dungeon,

With care emaciate, and unwholesome damps,
Sick'ning I lay, chain'd to my flinty bed,
And call'd on death to ease me—straight a light
Shone round, as when the ministry of Heaven
Descends to kneeling saints. But, oh! the form
That pour'd upon my sight.—Ye angels, speak!
For ye alone are like her; or present
Such visions pictured to the nightly eye
Of fancy tranc'd in bliss. She then approach'd,
The softest pattern of embodied meekness,
For pity had divinely touch'd her eye,
And harmoniz'd her motions.—Ah, she cried,
Unhappy stranger, art not thou the man,
Whose virtues have endear'd thee to Gustavus?
Gust. Gustavus, did she say?

Arn. Yes.

Loos'd from my bonds, I rose at her command;
When, scarce recovering speech, I would have kneel'd,

But, haste thee, haste thee for thy life, she cried,
And oh, if e'er thy envied eyes behold
Thy lov'd Gustavus; say, a gentle foe
Has given thee to his friendship.

Gust. You've much amaz'd me! is her name a secret?

Arn. To me it is—but you, perhaps, may guess.

Gust. No, on my word.

Arn. You too had your deliverer. [friends,

Gust. A kind, but not a fair, one—Well, my
Our cause is ripe, and calls us forth to action.

Tread ye not lighter? Swells not every breast

With ampler scope to take your country in,

And breathe the cause of virtue? Rise, ye Swedes!

Rise greatly equal to this hour's importance.

On us the eyes of future ages wait,

And this day's close decides our country's fate.

[Exeunt.

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The Camp.

Enter CHRISTIERN, Attendants, &c. PETERSON
meets him.

Christ. What from Dalecarlia?

Peter. Late last night,

I sent a trusty slave,

And hourly wait some tidings.

Christ. Sure

The wretches will not dare such quick perdition.

I cannot think it.

Peter. I think they will not.—Though of old
I know them,

All born to broils, the very sons of tumult;

Waste is their wealth, and mutiny their birthright,

And this the yearly fever of their blood,

Their holiday of war; a day apart,

Torn out from peace, and sacred to rebellion.

Oft has their battle hung upon the brow

Of yon wild steep, a living cloud of mischiefs,

Pregnant with plagues, and empty'd on the heads

Of many a monarch.

Enter ARVIDA, guarded, and a GENTLEMAN.

Arn. Now, fate I'm caught, and what remains is obvious.

Gent. A prisoner, good my lord.

Christ. When taken?

Gent. Now, even here, before your tent;

I mark'd his careless action, but his eye

Of studied observation—then his port

And base attire ill-suited—I inquir'd,

But found he was a stranger.

Christ. A sullen scorn

Knits up his brow, and frowns upon our presence.

What—ay—thou wouldst be thought a mystery,

Some greatness in eclipse—whence art thou, slave?

Silent! nay, then—bring forth the torture!

A smile! damnation!—How the wretch assumes

The wreck of state, the suffering soul of majesty!

What, have we no pre-eminence, no claim?

Dost thou not know thy life is in our power?

Arn. 'Tis therefore I despise it.

Christ. Matchless insolence!

What art thou? speak!

Arn. Be sure, no friend to thee; for I'm a foe to tyrants.

Christ. Fiends and fire!—

A whirlwind tear thee, most audacious traitor.

Arn. Do rage and chase, thy wrath's beneath me, Christiern.

How poor thy power, how empty is thy happiness,

When such a wretch, as I appear to be,

Can ride thy temper, harrow up thy form,

And stretch thy soul upon the rack of passion!

Christ. I will know thee!—Bear him hence!

Why, what are kings, if slaves can brave us thus?

Go, Peterson, hold him to the rack—Tear, search

Sting him deep.— [him,

{Exit PETERSON with ARVIDA guarded.

Enter a MESSENGER.

What wouldst thou, fellow?

Mess. O, my sovereign lord,
I am come fast and far, from even 'till morn,
Five times I've cross'd the shade of sleepless night,
Impatient of thy presence.

Christ. Whence?

Mess. From Denmark.

Commended from the consort of thy throne
To speed and privacy.

Christ. Your words would taste of terror—

Mess. A secret malady, my gracious liege,
Some factious vapour, rising from off the skirts
Of southmost Norway, has diffus'd its bane,
And rages now within the heart of Denmark.

Christ. It must not, cannot, 'tis impossible!
What, my own Danes!

Enter PETERSON, who kneels and gives a letter.
CHRISTIAN reads it.

Christ. Gustavus!

So near us, and in arms! [time;
What's to be done! Now, Peterson, now's the Waken all the wondrous statesman in thee.

This curs'd Gustavus
Invades my shrinking spirits, awes my heart,
And sits upon my slumbers—All in vain
Has he been daring, and have I been vigilant;
He still evades the hunter,
And, if there's power in heaven or hell, it guards
him.

His name's a host, a terror to my legions.
And by my triple crown, I swear, Gustavus,
I'd rather meet all Europe for my foe,
Than see thy face in arms!

Peter. Be calm, my liege,
And listen to a secret big with consequence,
That gives thee back the second man on earth
Whose valour could plant fears around thy throne:
Thy prisoner—

Christ. What of him?

Peter. The Prince Arvida.

Christ. How!

Peter. The same.

Christ. My royal fugitive!

Peter. Most certain. [hither.

Christ. Now, then, 'tis plain who sent him

Peter. Yes. [cross me;

Pray give me leave, my lord—a thought comes
If so, he must be ours— [Pauses.

Your pardon for a question—Has Arvida
E'er seen your beautiful daughter, your Christina?

Christ. Never—yes—possibly he might, that day
When the proud pair, Gustavus and Arvida,
Through Copenhagen drew a length of chain,
And graced my chariot wheels.—But why the question?

Peter. I'll tell you: while even now he stood before us,

I mark'd his high demeanour, and my eye
Claim'd some remembrance of him, though in clouds

Doubtful and distant, but a nearer view
Renew'd the characters effac'd by absence.
Yet, lest he might presume upon a friendship
Of ancient league between us, I dissembled,
Nor seem'd to know him. On he proudly strode,
As who should say,—back, fortune, know thy distance!

Thus steadily he pass'd, and mock'd his fate.
When, lo! the princess to her morning walk
Came forth attended. Quick amazement seiz'd

Arvida at the sight; his steps took root,
A tremor shook him; and his alter'd cheek
Now sudden flush'd, then fled its wonted colour,
While with an eager and intemperate look,
He bent his form, and hung upon her beauties.

Christ. Ha! did our daughter note him?

Peter. No, my lord:

She pass'd regardless. Straight his pride fell from
And at her name he started; [him
Then heav'd a sigh, and cast a look to heaven,
Of such a mute, yet eloquent, emotion,
As seem'd to say—Now, Fate, thou hast prevail'd,
And found one way to triumph o'er Arvida!

Christ. But whither would this lead?

Peter. To this, my lord—

While thus his soul's unseated, shook by passion,
Could we engage him to betray Gustavus—

Christ. O empty hope! impossible!
Do I not know him, and the curs'd Gustavus?
Both fix'd in resolution deep as hell.

Peter. Ah, my liege,

No mortal footing treads so firm in virtue,
As always to abide the slippery path,
Nor deviate with the bias. Some have few,
But each man has his failing, some defect,
Wherein to slide temptation.—Leave him to me.

Christ. If thou canst bend this proud one to our purpose,

And make the lion crouch, 'tis well—if not,
Away at once, and sweep him from remembrance.

Peter. Then I must promise deep.

Christ. Ay, any thing; outbid ambition.

Peter. Love?—

Christ. Ha! yes—our daughter too—if she can bribe him:
But then to win him to betray his friend!

Peter. Oh, doubt it not, my lord: for if he loves,
As sure he greatly does, I have a stratagem
That holds the certainty of fate within it.
Love is a passion whose effects are various:
It ever brings some change upon the soul,
Some virtue, or some vice, 'till then unknown,
Degrades the hero, and makes cowards valiant.

Christ. True; when it pours upon a youthful temper,
Open and apt to take the torrent in,
It owns no limits, no restraint it knows,
But sweeps all down, though Heaven and Hell oppose. [Exeunt.

SCENE II.—A Prison.

ARVIDA discovered in chains; Guards preparing instruments of death and torture.—He advances in confusion.

Arr. Off, off, vain cunbrance, ye conflicting thoughts!

Leave me to Heaven.—O peace!—It will not be—
Just when I rose above mortality,
To pour her wondrous weight of charms upon me!
At such a time, it was—it was too much!—
For every pang these tortur'd limbs shall feel,
Descend in tenfold blessings on Gustavus! [joy,
Yes, bless him, bless him! Crown his hours with His head with glory, and his arms with conquest;
Set his firm foot upon the neck of tyrants,
And be his name the balm of every lip
That breathes through Sweden! Worthiest to be styled [king
Their friend, their chief, their father, and their

Enter PETERSON.

Peter. Unbind your prisoner.

Arv. How!

Peter. You have your liberty,
And may depart unquestion'd.

Arv. Do not mock me.

It is not to be thought, while power remains,
That Christiern wants a reason to be cruel.
But let him know, I would not be oblig'd.
He, who accepts the favours of a tyrant,
Shares in his guilt; they leave a stain behind them.

Peter. You wrong the native temper of his
soul;

Cruel of force, but never of election;
Prudence compell'd him to a show of tyranny;
Howe'er, those politics are now no more,
And mercy in her turn shall shine on Sweden.

Arv. Indeed! it were a strange, a bless'd reverse,
Devoutly to be wish'd: but then, the cause,
The cause, my lord, must surely be uncommon.
May I presume?—
Perhaps a secret?

Peter. No—or, if it were,
The boldness of thy spirit claims respect,
And should be answered.—Know, the only man,
In whom our monarch ever knew repulse,
Is now our friend; that terror of the field,
Th' invincible Gustavus.

Arv. Ha! Friend to Christiern?—Guard thyself, my heart!

Nor seem to take alarm—[Aside.]—Why, good
my lord,

What terror is there in a wretch proscrib'd,
Naked of means, and distant as Gustavus?

Peter. There you mistake—Nor knew we, till this hour,

The danger was so near.—From yonder hill
He sends proposals, back'd with all the powers
Of Dalecarlia, those licentious resolute,
Who, having nought to hazard in the wreck,
Are ever foremost to foment a storm.

Arv. I were too bold to question on the terms.

Peter. No—trust me, valiant man, whoe'er
thou art,

I would do much to win a worth like thine,
By any act of service, or of confidence.—
The terms Gustavus claims, indeed are haughty;
The freedom of his mother, and his sister,
His forfeit province, Gothland, and the isles
Submitted to his sceptre.—But the league,
The bond of amity and lasting friendship,
Is, that he claims Christina for his bride.—
You start, and seem surpris'd.

Arv. A sudden pain

Just struck athwart my breast.—But say, my lord,
I thought you nam'd Christina?

Peter. Yes.

Arv. O torture!

[Aside.]

What of her, my good lord?

Peter. I said, Gustavus claim'd her for his bride.

Arv. His bride! his wife!

You did not mean his wife?—Do fiends feel this?
[Aside.]

Down, heart, nor tell thy anguish!—Pray excuse
me,

Did you not say, the princess was his wife?

Whose wife, my lord?

Peter. I did not say what was, but what must be.

Arv. Touching Gustavus, was it not?

Peter. The same.

Arv. His bride!

Peter. I say his bride, his wife; his lov'd Christina!

Christina, fancied in the very prime

And youthful smile of nature; form'd for joys
Unknown to mortals. You seem indispos'd.

Arv. The crime of constitution—Oh Gustavus!

[Aside.]

This is too much!—And think you then, my lord—
What, will the royal Christiern e'er consent
To match his daughter with his deadliest foe?

Peter. What should he do? War else must be eternal.

Besides, some rumours from his Danish realms
Make peace essential here.

Arv. Yes, peace has sweets
That Hybla never knew; it sleeps on down,
Cull'd gently from beneath the cherub's wings;
No bed for mortals—Man is warfare.—All
A hurricane within; yet friendship stoops,
And gilds the gloom with falsehood—Undone!
undone Arvida!—

Peter. Is't possible, my lord! the prince Ar-vida! My friend!

[Embraces him.]

Arv. Confusion to the name!

[Turns.]

Peter. Why this, good Heaven? And wherefore thus disguis'd?

Arv. Yes, that accomplish'd traitor, that Gustavus;

While he sat planning private scenes of happiness,
Oh, well dissembled! he, he sent me hither;
My friendly, unsuspecting heart a sacrifice,
To make death sure, and rid him of a rival.

Peter. A rival! Do you then love Christiern's daughter?

Arv. Name her not, Peterson, since she can't be mine:

Gustavus! how, ah! how hast thou deceiv'd me!
Who could have look'd for falsehood from thy
brow,

Whose heavenly arch was as the throne of virtue!
Thy eye appear'd a sun, to cheer the world,
Thy bosom truth's fair palace, and thy arms,
Benevolent, the harbour for mankind.

Peter. What's to be done? Believe me, valiant prince,

I know not which most sways me to thy interests,
My love to thee, or hatred to Gustavus.

Arv. Would you then save me? Think, contrive it quickly!

[vengeance,

Lend me your troops—by all the powers of Myself will face this terror of the North,
This son of fame—this—O, Gustavus—What?
Where had I wander'd! Stab my bleeding country!
Save, shield me from that thought!

Peter. Retire, my lord;

For, see, the princess comes!

Arv. Where, where!

Ha! Yes, she comes indeed! her beauties drive
Time, place, and truth, and circumstance before them!

Perdition pleases there—pull—tear me from her!
Yet must I gaze—but one—but one look more,
And I were lost for ever.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—An Apartment in CHRISTIERN'S
Palace.

Enter CHRISTINA and MARIANA.

Christina. Forbid it, shame! Forbid it, virgin modesty!

No, no, my friend, Gustavus ne'er shall know it.
O! I am overpaid with conscious pleasure:

The sense but to have sav'd that wondrous man,
Is still a smiling cherub in my breast,
And whispers peace within.

[consequence,

Mar. 'Tis strange, a man, of his high note and

Should so evade the busy search of thousands;
That six long months have shut him from inquiry,
And not an eye can trace him to his covert.

Christina. Once 'twas not so; each infant lisp'd, Gustavus!

It was the favourite name of every language.
His slightest motions fill'd the world with tidings;
Wak'd he, or slept, fame watch'd th' important
hour,

And nations told it round.

Mar. Madam, I've heard, that when Gustavus lay detain'd in Denmark,
Your royal father sought the hero's friendship,
And offer'd ample terms of peace and amity.

Christina. He did: he offer'd that, my Mariana,
For which contending monarchs sued in vain;
He offer'd me, his darling, his Christina;
But I was slighted, slighted by a captive,
Though kingdoms swell'd my dowry.

Mar. Amazement fix me!

Rejected by Gustavus!

Christina. Yes, Mariana;—but rejected nobly.
Not worlds could win him to betray his country!
Had he consented, I had then despis'd him.
What's all the gaudy glitter of a crown?
What, but the glaring meteor of ambition,
That leads a wretch benighted in his errors,
Points to the gulf, and shines upon destruction.

Mar. You wrong your charms, whose power might reconcile

Things opposite in Nature—Had he seen you?

Christina. I'll tell thee—Yet while inexpert of years,

I heard of bloody spoils, the waste of war,
And dire conflicting man; Gustavus' name
Superior rose, still dreadful in the tale:
Then first he seiz'd my infancy of soul,
As somewhat fabled of gigantic fierceness,
Too huge for any form; he scar'd my sleep,
And fill'd my young idea. Not the boast
Of all his virtues (graces only known
To him and heavenly natures!) could erase
The strong impression, 'till that wondrous day
In which he met my eyes.

What then was my amazement! he was chain'd:
Was chain'd! Like the robes
Of coronation, worn by youthful kings,
He drew his shackles. The Herculean nerve
Brac'd his young arm; and, soften'd in his cheek, Lived more than woman's sweetness! Then his eye!

His mien! his native dignity! He look'd,
As though he had captivity in chains,
And we were slaves around.

Mar. Did he observe you?

Christina. He did: for, as I trembled, look'd, and sigh'd,

His eyes met mine; he fix'd their glories on me.
Confusion thrill'd me then, and secret joy,
Fast throbbing, stole its treasures from my heart,
And, mantling upward, turn'd my face to crimson.
I wish'd—but did not dare to look—he gaz'd;
When sudden, as by force, he turn'd away,
And would no more behold me.

Enter LAERTES

Laer. Ah, bright imperial maid! my royal mistress!

Christina. What wouldst thou say? Thy looks speak terror to me.

Laer. Oh, you are ruin'd, sacrific'd, undone!

I heard it all; your cruel, cruel father,
Has sold you, given you up a spoil to treason,
The purchase of the noblest blood on earth—
Gustavus!

Christina. Ah! What of him? Where, where is he?

Laer. In Dalecarlia, on some great design,
Doom'd in an hour to fall by faithless hands:
His friend, the brave, the false, deceiv'd Arvida,
Even now prepares to lead a band of ruffians
Beneath the winding covert of the hill,
And seize Gustavus, obvious to the snares
Of friendship's fair dissemblance. And your father
Has vow'd your beauties to Arvida's arms,
The purchase of his falsehood.

Christina. Shield me, Heaven!

Is there no let, no means of quick prevention?

Laer. Behold my life, still chain'd to thy direc-
My will shall have a wing for every word [tion];
That breathes thy mandate.

Christina. Will you, good Laertes?

Alas! I fear to overtask thy friendship.

Say, will you save me then—Oh, go, haste, fly!

Acquaint Gustavus—if, if he must fall,
Let hosts that hem this single lion in,
Let nations hunt him down—let him fall nobly.

Laer. I go, and Heaven direct me to him.

[Exit.]

Christina. Ye powers! if deaf to all the vows I
Yet shield Gustavus, for Gustavus' sake; [make,
Protect his virtues from a faithless foe,
And save your only image left below. [Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—Mountains of Dalecarlia.

Enter GUSTAVUS as a peasant; SIVARD and Dalecarlians following.

Gust. Ye men of Sweden, wherefore are ye come?

See ye not yonder, how the locusts swarm,
'To drink the fountains of your honour up,
And leave your hills a desert?—Wretched men!
Why came ye forth? Is this a time for sport?
Or are ye met with song and jovial feast, [ants?]
To welcome your new guests, your Danish visit-
To stretch your supple necks beneath their feet,
And fawning, lick the dust!—Go, go my countrymen,

Each to your several mansions, trim them out,
Cull all the tedious earnings of your toil, [ters,
To purchase bondage.—Bid your blooming daugh-
And your chaste wives, to spread their beds with softness;

Then go ye forth, and with your proper hands
Conduct your masters in; conduct the sons
Of lust and violation—O, Swedes! Swedes!
Heavens! are ye men, and will ye suffer this?
There was a time, my friends, a glorious time!
When, had a single man of your forefathers
Upon the frontier met a host in arms,
His courage scarce had turn'd; himself had stood,
Alone had stood, the bulwark of his country.
Come, come ye on then. Here I take my stand!
Here on the brink, the very verge, of liberty;
Although contention rise upon the clouds,
Mix heaven with earth, and roll the ruin onward,
Here will I fix, and breast me to the shock,
Till I or Denmark fall.

Siv. And who art thou,
That thus wouldst swallow all the glory up,
That should redeem the times? Behold this breast,
The sword has till'd it; and the stripes of slaves

Shall ne'er trace honour here; shall never blot
The fair inscription.—Never shall the cords
Of Danish insolence bind down these arms,
That bore my royal master from the field.

Gust. Ha! Say you, brother? Were you there.—

Oh, grief!

Where liberty and Stenon fell together?

Siv. Yes, I was there.—A bloody field it was,
Where conquest gasp'd, and wanted breath to tell
Its o'er-toil'd triumph. There our bleeding king,
There Stenon on this bosom made his bed,
And, rolling back his dying eyes upon me,
Soldier, he cried, if e'er it be thy lot
To see my gallant cousin, great Gustavus,
Tell him—for once, that I have fought like him,
And would like him have—
Conquer'd.

Gust. Oh, Danes! Danes!

You shall weep blood for this. Shall they not,
brother?

Yes, we will deal our might with thrifty vengeance,
A life for every blow, and, when we fall,
There shall be weight in't; like the tott'ring
That draw contiguous ruin. [towers,

Siv. Brave, brave man!

My soul admires thee.—By my father's spirit,
I would not barter such a death as this
For immortality! Nor we alone—

Here be the trusty gleanings of that field,
Where last we fought for freedom; here's rich poverty, [nions;

Though wrapp'd in rags, my fifty brave compa-
Who through the force of fifteen thousand foes
Bore off their king, and sav'd his great remains.

Gust. Why, captain,

We could but die alone, with these we'll conquer.
My fellow lab'ers to—What say ye, friends?
Shall we not strike for't?

Siv. Death! Victory or death!

All. No bonds! no bonds!

Arn. Spoke like yourselves.—Ye men of Dalecarlia,

Brave men and bold! Whom every future age
Shall mark for wondrous deeds, achievements won
From honour's dangerous summit, warriors all!
Say, might ye choose a chief—

Speak, name the man,

Who then should meet your wish?

Siv. Forbear the theme. [weight

Why wouldst thou seek to sink us with the
Of grievous recollection? Oh, Gustavus!
Could the dead wake, thou wert the man.

Gust. Didst thou know Gustavus?

Siv. Know him! Oh, Heaven! what else, who else was worth

The knowledge of a soldier? That great day,
When Christiern, in his third attempt on Sweden,
Had summ'd his powers, and weigh'd the scale
of fight;

On the bold brink, the very push of conquest,
Gustavus rush'd, and bore the battle down;
In his full sway of prowess, like Leviathan
That scoops his foaming progress on the main,
And drives the shoals along—forward I sprung,
All emulous, and lab'ring to attend him;
Fear fled before, behind him rout grew loud,
And distant wonder gaz'd.—At length he turn'd,
And having eyed me with a wondrous look [ble!
Of sweetness mix'd with glory—Grace inestima-
He pluck'd this bracelet from his conquering arm,
And bound it here.—My wrist seem'd treble nerv'd:
My heart spoke to him, and I did such deeds.

VOL. I. . . 3 C

33

As best might thank him.—But from that bless'd
day

I never saw him more—yet still to this,
I bow, as to the relics of my saint:
Each morn I drop a tear on every bead,
Count all the glories of Gustavus o'er,
And think I still behold him.

Gust. Rightly thought;
For so thou dost, my soldier.

Behold your general,
Gustavus! come once more to lead you on
To laurel'd victory, to fame, to freedom!

Siv. Strike me, ye powers!—It is illusion all!
It cannot—It is, it is!

[Falls and embraces his knees

Gust. Oh, speechless eloquence!

Rise to my arms, my friend.

Siv. Friend! say you, friend?

O, my heart's lord! my conqueror! my—

Gust. Approach, my fellow soldiers, your Gus-Claims no precedence here. [tavus

Haste, brave men!
Collect your friends, to join us on the instant;
Summon our brethren to their share of conquest,
And let loud echo, from her circling hills,
Sound freedom, till the undulation shake
The bounds of utmost Sweden.

[Exeunt Dalecarlians, shouting

Enter LAERTES.

Laer. Thy presence nobly speaks the man I wish, Gustavus.

Gust. Thou hast a hostile garb;

Ha! say—art thou Laertes? If I err not,
There is a friendly semblance in that face,
Which answers to a fond impression here,
And tells me I'm thy debtor—

Laer. No, valiant prince, you over-rate my service;

There is a worthier object of your gratitude,
Whom yet you know not.—Oh, I have to tell-
But then, to gain your credit, must unfold
What haply should be secret.—Be it so;
You are all honour.

Gust. Let me to thy mind,
For thou hast wak'd my soul into a thought
That holds me all attention.

Laer. Mightiest man!

To me alone you held yourself oblig'd
For life and liberty.—Had it been so,
I were more bless'd, with retribution just
To pay thee for my own.—For on the day
When by your arm the mighty Thraces fell,
Fate threw me to your sword.—You spar'd my
And, in the very whirl and rage of fight, [youth,
Your eye was taught compassion—from that hour
I vow'd my life the slave of your remembrance;
And often as Christina, heavenly maid!
The mistress of my service, question'd me

Of wars and vent'rous deeds, my tidings came
Still freighted with thy name, until the day
In which yourself appear'd, to make praise speech
Christina saw you then, and on your fate [less.
Dropp'd a kind tear; and, when your noble scorn
Of proffer'd terms provok'd her father's rage
To take the deadly forfeit, she she only,
Whose virtues watch'd the precious hour of mercy,

All trembling, sent my secret hand to save you,
Where, through a pass unknown to all your keepers,

I led you forth and gave you to your liberty

Gust. Oh, I am sunk, o'erwhelm'd with wondrous goodness,
But were I rich and free as open mines,
That teem their golden wealth upon the world,
Still I were poor, unequal to her bounty.
Nor can I longer doubt, whose generous arm,
In my Arvida, in my friend's deliverance,
Gave double life and freedom to Gustávus.

Laer. A fatal present! Ah, you know him not;
Arvida is misled; undone by passion;
False to your friendship, to your trust unfaithful.

Gust. Ha! hold!

Laer. I must unfold it.

Gust. Yet forbear.

This way—I hear some footing—pray you, soft—
If thou hast aught to urge against Arvida,
The man of virtue, tell it not the wind;
Lest slander catch the sound, and guilt should triumph. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—Mountains of Dalecarlia.

Enter ARVIDA, speaking to a MESSENGER.

Arv. He's here —bear back my orders to your
That not a man, on peril of his life, [fellows,
Advance in sight 'till call'd.

Mess. My lord, I will. [Exit.]

Arv. Have I not vow'd it, faithless as he is,
Have I not vow'd his fall? Yet, good Heaven!
Why start these sudden tears? On, on I must,
For I am half way down the dizzy steep, [now—
Where my brain turns.—A draught of Lethe
Oh, that the world would sleep—to wake no more!
Or that the name of friendship bore no charm
To make my nerve unsteady, and this steel
Fly backward from its task! it shall be done.—
Empire! Christina! though th' affrighted sun
Start back with horror of the direful stroke,
It shall be done. Ha! he comes!
How steadily he looks, as Heaven's own book,
The leaf of truth, were open'd on his aspect!
Up, up dark minister—his fate calls out

[Puts up the dagger.]

To nobler execution; for he comes
In opposition, singly, man to man,
As though he brav'd my wish.

Enter GUSTAVUS.

[They look for some time on each other; ARVIDA lays his hand on his Sword, and withdraws it by turns; then advances irresolutely.]

Gust. Is it then so?

Arv. Defend thyself.

Gust. No—strike—

I would unfold my bosom to thy sword,
But that I know, the wound you give this breast
Would doubly pierce thy own.

Arv. I know thee not—

It is the time's eclipse, and what should be
In nature, now is nameless.

Gust. Ah, my brother!

Arv. What wouldst thou?

Gust. Is it thus we two should meet?

Arv. Art thou not false? Deep else, oh, deep
Were my damnation. [Indeed,

Gust. Dear, unhappy man!
My heart bleeds for thee. False I'd surely been,
Had I like thee been tempted.

Arv. Ha! Speak, speak,
Didst thou not send to treat with Christiern?

Gust. Never.

I know thy error, but I know the arts,
The frauds, the wiles, that practis'd on thy virtue;
Firm how you stood, and tower'd above mortality;
Till, in the fond unguarded hour of love,
The wily undermining tempter came,
And won thee from thyself—a moment won thee—
For still thou art Arvida, still the man
On whom thy country calls for her deliverance.
Already are her bravest sons in arms; [Shout.
Mark how they shout, impatient of our presence,
To lead them on to a new life of liberty,
To name, to conquest.—Ha! Heaven guard my brother!

Thy cheek turns pale, thy eye looks wild upon me;
Wilt thou not answer me?

Arv. Gustavus!

Gust. Speak.

Arv. Have I not dream'd?

Gust. No other I esteem it.

Where lives the man, whose reason slumbers not?
Still pure, still blameless, if, at wonted dawn,
Again he wakes to virtue.

Arv. Oh, my dawn

Must soon be dark. Confusion dissipates,
To leave me worse confounded.

Gust. Think no more on't.

Come to my arms, thou dearest of mankind!

Arv. Stand off! Pollution dwells within my tough,

And horror hangs around me.—Cruel man!
Oh, thou hast doubly damn'd me with this good-
For resolution held the deed as done, [ness;
That now must sink me.—Hark! I'm summon'd
hence,

My audit opens! Poise me! for I stand

Upon a spire, against whose sightless base

Hell breaks his wave beneath. Down, down I dare not,

And up I cannot look, for justice fronts me.—

Thou shalt have vengeance; though my purpling
blood

Were nectar for Heaven's bowl, as warm and rich,
As now 'tis base, it thus should pour for pardon.

[GUSTAVUS catches his arm, and in the struggle the dagger falls.]

Gust. Ha! hold, Arvida.—No, I will not lose
thee—

Forbid it, Heaven! thou shalt not rob me so;

No, I will struggle with thee to the last,

And save thee from thyself. Oh, answer me!

Wilt thou forsake me? Answer me, my brother.

Arv. Expose me, cage me, brand me for the tool

Of crafted villains, for the veriest slave,

On whom the bend of each contemptuous brow

Shall look with loathing. Ah, my turpitude

Shall be the vile comparative of knaves

To boast and whiten by!

Gust. Not so, not so.

He, who knows no fault, knows no perfection.

The rectitude, that Heaven appoints to man,

Leads on through error; and the kindly sense

Of having stray'd, endears the road to bliss;

It makes Heaven's way more pleasing! O my

'Tis hence a thousand cordial charities [brother, Derive their growth, their vigour, and their sweetness.

This short lapse

Shall to thy future foot give cautious treading,

Erect and firm in virtue.

Arv. Give me leave.

[Offers to pose]

Gust. You shall not pass.

Arr. I must.

Gust. Whither ?

Arr. I know not—O Gustavus !

Gust. Speak.

Arr. You can't forgive me.

Gust. Not forgive thee !

Arr. No :

Look there. [Points to the Dagger.]

And yet, when I resolv'd to kill thee,
I could have died—indeed I could—for thee,
I could have died, Gustavus !

Gust. Oh, I know it. [passion,]
A generous mind, though sway'd a while by
Is like the steely vigour of the bow,
Still holds its native rectitude, and bends
But to recoil more forceful. Come, forget it.

Enter SIVARD.

Stv. My lord, as now I pass'd the mountain's
brow,

I spy'd some men, whose arms, and strange attire,
Give cause for circumspection.

Gust. Danes, perhaps ;

Haste, intercept their passage to the camp.

[Exit SIVARD.]

Arr. Those are the Danes, that witness to my shame. [Arvida ;]

Gust. Perish th' opprobrious term ! not so,
Myself will be the guardian of thy fame ;
Trust me, I will—But see, our friends approach—

Oh, clear,

While I attend them, clear that cloud, my brother,
That sits upon the morning of thy youth.

Enter ANDERSON, ARNOLDUS, SIVARD, OFFICERS, &c.

And. Let us all see him ! [hearts,]

Gust. Amazement, I perceive, hath fill'd your
And joy, for that your lost Gustavus, 'scap'd Through wounds, imprisonments, and chains, and deaths,

Thus sudden, thus unlook'd for, stands before ye.

As one escap'd from cruel hands I come,

From hearts that ne'er knew pity ;

And know no music but the groans of Sweden.

Yet, not for that my sister's early innocence

And mother's age now grind beneath captivity ;

Nor that one bloody, one remorseless hour

Swept my great sire and kindred from my side ;

For them, Gustavus weeps not ;

But, O great parent, when I think on thee !

Thy numberless, thy nameless, shameful infamies,

My widow'd country ! Sweden ! when I think

Upon thy desolation, spite of rage—

And vengeance that would choke them—tears will flow.

And. Oh, they are villains, every Dane of them,
Practis'd to stab and smile ; to stab the babe,
That smiles upon them.

Arr. What accursed hours

Roll o'er those wretches, who, to fiends like these,

In their dear liberty have barter'd more

Than worlds will rate for ?

Gust. O liberty, Heaven's choice prerogative !

True bond of law, thou social soul of property,

Thou breath of reason, life of life itself !

For thee the valiant bleed. O sacred liberty !

Wing'd from the summer's snare, from flattering ruin,

Like the bold stork you seek the wintery shore,

Leave courts, and poms, and palaces to slaves,

Cleave to the cold, and rest upon the storm.

Upborne by thee, my soul disdain'd the terms
Of empire—are ye not at the hands of tyrants ?

Are ye not mark'd, ye men of Dalecarlia,

Are ye not mark'd by all the circling world

As the last stake ; what but liberty, [years,]

Through the fam'd course of thirteen hundred

Alloof hath held invasion from your hills,

And sanctified their shame ?—And will ye, will ye

Shrink from the hopes of the expecting world ;

Bid your high honours stoop to foreign insult,

And in one hour give up to infamy

The harvest of a thousand years of glory ?

And. Die all first !

Gust. Yes, die by piecemeal !

Leave not a limb o'er which a Dane may triumph

Now from my soul I joy, I joy my friends,

To see ye fear'd ; to see, that even your foes

Do justice to your valour !—There they be,

The powers of kingdoms, summ'd in yonder host,

Yet kept aloof, yet trembling to assail ye.

And, oh, when I look round and see you here,

Of number short, but prevalent in virtue,

My heart swells high, and burns for the encounter.

True courage but from opposition grows ;

And what are fifty, what a thousand slaves,

Match'd to the sinew of a single arm

That strikes for liberty ? that strikes to save

His fields from fire, his infants from the sword,

His couch from lust, his daughters from pollution,

And his large honours from eternal infamy ?

What doubt we then ? Shall we, shall we stand here !

Let us on !

Oh, yes, I read your lovely fierce impatience !

You shall not be withheld ; we will rush on them—

This is indeed to triumph.

And. Oh, lead us on, Gustavus ; one word more
Is but delay of conquest.

Gust. Take your wish.

He, who wants arms, may grapple with the foe,

And so be furnish'd. You, most noble Anderson,

Divide our powers, and with the fam'd Olaus

Take the left route—You, Eric, great in arms !

With the renown'd Nederbi, hold the right,

And skirt the forest down ; then wheel at once,

Confess'd to view, and close upon the vale :

Myself, and my most valiant cousin here,

Th' invincible Arvida, gallant Sivard,

Arnoldus, and these hundred hardy veterans,

Will pour directly on, and lead the onset.

Bold are our hearts, and nervous are our hands.

With us, truth, justice, fame, and freedom close,

Each singly equal to a host of foes. [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—The Palace.

Enter CHRISTIERN, CHRISTINA, MARIANA, and PETERSON.

Christina. I heard, it was your royal pleasure
I should attend your highness. [Sir]

Christ. Yes, Christina,

But business interferes.

[Exeunt CHRISTINA and MARIAN]

Enter an OFFICER

Off. My sovereign liege,

Wide o'er the western shelving of yon hill,

We think, though indistinctly, we can spy,

Like men in motion mustering on the heath,

And there is one, who saith he can discern

A few of martial gesture, and bright arms,

Who this way bend their action.

Christ. Friends, perhaps,
For foes it were too daring.—Haste thee, Peterson,
Detach a thousand of our Danish horse
To rule their motions—we will out ourself,
And hold our powers in readiness.—Lead on.

[Exeunt.

SCENE II.—Another Apartment in the Palace.

Enter CHRISTINA and MARIANA.

Mar. Ha! did you mark, my princess, did you mark?

Should some reverse, some wondrous whirl of fate,
Once more return Gustavus to the battle,
New nerve his arm, and wreath his brow with conquest;

Say, would you not repent that e'er you sav'd
This dreadful man, the foe of your great race;
Who pours impetuous in his country's cause
To spoil you of a kingdom?

Christina. No, my friend.

Had I to death, or bondage, sold my sire,
Or had Gustavus on our native realms
Made hostile inroad; then, my Mariana,
Had I then sav'd him from the stroke of justice,
I should not cease my suit to Heaven for pardon.
But if, though in a foe, to reverence virtue,
Withstand oppression, rescue injur'd innocence,
Step boldly in betwixt my sire and guilt,
And save my king, my father, from dishonour;
If this be sin, I have shook hands with penitence.
First perish crowns, dominion, all the shine
And transience of this world, ere guilt shall serve
To buy the vain incumbrance.

Blasted be that royalty, [glorious!
Which murder must make sure, and crimes in-
The bulk of kingdoms, nay, the world is light,
When guilt weighs opposite—Oh, would to Heaven,

The loss of empire would restore his innocence,
Restore the fortunes and the precious lives
Of thousands, fallen the victims of ambition!

Enter LAERTES.

Does he live?

Laer. He does,

But death, ere night, must fill a long account;
The camp, the country's in confusion: war
And changes ride upon the hour that hastes
To intercept my tongue—I else could tell
Of virtues hitherto beyond my ken;
Courage, to which the lion stoops his crest,
Yet grafted upon qualities as soft
As a rock'd infant's meekness; such as tempts
Against my faith, my country, and allegiance,
To wish thee speed, Gustavus.

Christina. Then you found him! [death

Laer. I did; and warn'd him, but in vain; for
To him appear'd more grateful than to find
His friend's dishonour.

Christina. Give me the manner—quick—soft, good Laertes!

Enter CHRISTIERN, PETERSON, Danes, &c.

Christ. Damn'd! double traitor! O curs'd, false Arvida!

Guard well the Swedish prisoners.
Stand to your arms.—Bring forth the captives
there!

Enter AUGUSTA and GUSTAVA, guarded.

Peter. My liege—

Christ. Away!

Fortune! we will not trust the changing more
But wear her girt upon our armed loins,
Or pointed in our grasp.

Enter an OFFICER.

Off. The foe's at hand.
With gallant show your thousand Danes rods
forth,

But shall return no more!—I mark'd the action.
A band of desperate resolute rushed on them,
Scarce numbering to a tenth, and in midway
They closed; the shock was dreadful, nor your Danes [stood;

Could bear the madding charge; a while they
They shrank, and broke and turn'd—When, lo!
behind,

Fast wheeling from the right and left, there pour'd,
Who intercepted their return, and caught
Within the toil they perish'd.

Christ. 'Tis Gustavus!

No mortal else, not Ammon's boasted son,
Not Cæsar, would have dar'd it. Tell me, say,
What numbers in the whole may they amount to?

Off. A'bout five thousand.

Christ. And no more?

Off. No more,

That yet appear.

Christ. We count six times their sum.—

Haste, soldier, take a trumpet, tell Gustavus
We have of terms to offer, and would treat
Touching his mother's ransom; say, her death
Suspended by our grace, but waits his answer.

[Exit OFFICER.

Madam, it should well suit with your authority,
[To AUGUSTA.

To check this frenzy in your son—Look to it,
Or, by the saints, this hour's your last of life!

Aug. Come, my Gustava, come, my little captive!

We shall be free:

And I will give thee to thy father's fondness,
And to the arms of all thy royal race
In heaven; who sit on thrones, with loves and joys.

Christ. Is this my answer?

Come forth, ye ministers of death, come forth.

Enter Ruffians, who seize AUGUSTA and GUSTAVA.

Pluck them asunder! We shall prove you, lady;

Christina. Ah! I can hold no longer. Royal Sir, Thus on my knees, and lower, lower still—

Christ. My child! what mean you?

Christina. O my gracious father!

Kill, kill me rather—let me perish first;

But do not stain the sanctity of kings

With the sweet blood of helpless innocence.

Augusta. Ha! who art thou,

That look'st so like the 'habitants of heaven,

Like mercy sent upon the morning's blush,

To glad the heart, and cheer a gloomy world

With light 'till now unknown?

Christ. Away, they come.

I'll hear no more of your ill-timed petitions.

Christina. Oh yet for pity!

Christ. I will none on't, leave me.

Pity! it is the infant fool of nature;

Tear off her hold, and bear her to her tent.

[Exeunt CHRISTINA, MARIANA, LAERTES and Attendants.

Enter an OFFICER.

Off. My liege, Gustavus, though with much reluctance,

Consents to one hour's truce. His soldiers rest Upon their arms, and, follow'd by a few
He comes to know your terms.

Christ. I see.

Be ready, slaves, and on the word,
Plunge deep your daggers in their bosoms.

[Points to AUGUSTA.]

Enter GUSTAVUS, ARVIDA, ANDERSON, ARNOLDUS, SIVARD, &c.

Hold!

Gust. Ha! 'tis, it is my mother!

Christ. Tell me, Gustavus, tell me why is this?

That, as a stream diverted from the banks
Of smooth obedience, thou hast drawn those men

Upon a dry unchannell'd enterprize,
To turn their inundation?—Are the lives
Of my misguided people held so light,
That thus thou'dst push them on the keen rebuke
Of guarded majesty?

Look round, unruly boy, thy battle comes
Like raw, disjointed mustering; feeble wrath!
A war of waters borne against the rock
Of our firm continent, to fume, and chafe,
And shiver in the toil.

Gust. Mistaken man!

I come empower'd, and strengthen'd in thy weakness.

For though the structure of a tyrant's throne
Rise on the necks of half the suffering world,
Fear trembles in the cement!

Christ. Gustavus, wouldst thou yet return to grace,

And hold thy motions in the sphere of duty,
Acceptance might be found.

Gust. Imperial spoiler!

Give me my father, give me back my kindred,
Give me the fathers of ten thousand orphans,
Give me the sons, in whom thy ruthless sword
Has left our widows childless: mine they were,
Both mine, and every Swede's, whose patriot
breast

Bleeds in his country's woundings! O thou canst not!

Give me then,
My all that's left, my gentle mother there,
And spare yon little trembler!

Christ. Yes, on terms
Of compact and submission.

Gust. Ha! with thee? [country?

Compact with thee! and mean'st thou for my
For Sweden! No—so hold my heart but firm, Although it wring for't; though blood drop for
tears,

And at the sight my straining eyes start forth—
They both shall perish first.

Christ. Slaves, do your office.

Gust. Hold yet.—'T'hou canst not be so damn'd?
my mother!

I dare not ask thy blessing.—Where's Arvida?
Where art thou? Come, my friend, thou'st known temptation—

And therefore best canst pity, or support me.

Arv. Alas! I shall but serve to weigh thee downward,

To pull thee from the dazzling, sightless height,
At which thy virtue soars. For, oh, Gustavus,
My soul is dark, disconsolate and dark;
Sick to the world, and hateful to myself,
I have no country now; I've nought but thee,
And should yield up the interest of mankind,

Where thine 's in question.

Aug. See, my son relents;

Behold, O king! yet spare us but a moment,
His little sister shall embrace his knees,
And these fond arms, around his duteous neck,
Shall join to bend him to us.

Christ. Could I trust ye—

Arv. I'll be your hostage!

Christ. Granted.

Gust. Hold, my friend.

[Here ARVIDA breaks from GUSTAVUS, and passes to CHRISTIERN'S party, while AU-GUSTA and GUSTAVA go over to GUSTAVUS.]

Aug. Is it then given, yet given me, ere I die,
To see thy face, Gustavus? thus to gaze,
To touch, to fold thee thus!—My son, my son!
And have I liv'd to this? It is enough.
All arm'd and, in my country's precious cause,
Terribly beauteous, to behold thee thus!
Why, 'twas my only, hourly suit to Heaven,
And now 'tis granted. O my glorious child,
Bless'd were the throes I felt for thee, Gustavus!
For from the breast, from out your swathing bands
You stepp'd the child of honour.

Gust. O my mother! [eye?

Aug. Why stands that water trembling in thy Why heaves thy bosom? Turn not thus away,
'Tis the last time that we must meet, my child,
And I will have the whole. Why, why Gustavus,
Why is this form of heaviness? For me
I trust it is not meant; you cannot think
So poorly of me: I grow old, my son,
And to the utmost period of mortality,
I ne'er should find a death's hour like to this,
Whereby to do thee honour.

Gust. Roman patriots!

Ye Decii, self-devoted to your country!
You gave no mothers up! Will annals yield
No precedent for this, no elder boast
Whereby to match my trial?

Aug. No, Gustavus;

For Heaven still squares our trial to our strength,
And thine is of the foremost.—Noble youth!
Even I, thy parent, with a conscious pride,
Have often bow'd to thy superior virtues.
Oh, there is but one bitterness in death,
One only sting—

Gust. Speak, speak!

Aug. 'Tis felt for thee.

Too well I know thy gentleness of soul,
Melting as babes; even now the pressure 's on thee,
And bends thy loveliness to earth—Oh, child!
The dear but sad foretaste of thy affliction
Already kills thy mother—But behold,
Behold thy valiant followers, who to thee,
And to the faith of thy protecting arm,
Have given ten thousand mothers, daughters too;
Who in thy virtue yet may learn to bear
Millions of freeborn sons to bless thy name,
And pray for their deliverer—Oh farewell!
This and but this, the very last adieu!
Heaven sit victorious on thy arm, my son!
And give thee to thy merits!

Christ. Ah, thou traitress!

Aug. See, Gustavus,

My little captive waits for one embrace.

Gust. Come to my arms, thou lamblike sacrifice;
Oh, that they were of force to fold thee ever,
To let thee to my heart! there lock thee close,
But 'twill not be!

Arv. Hear me, thou most dear Gustavus!
Thus low I bend my prayer, reject me not:

If once, if ever, thou didst love Arvida,
Oh leave me here to answer to the wrath
Of this fell tyrant.— Save thy honour'd mother
And that sweet lamb from slaughter!

Gust. Cruel friendship!

Christ. And by my life! I'd take thee at thy word,
But that I know 'twould please thee.

Aug. No, generous prince, thy blood shall never be

The price of our dishonour. Come, my child;
Weep not, sweet babe, there shall no harm come nigh thee.

Christ. 'Tis well, proud dame; you are return'd,
I see—

Each to his charge—Here break we off, Gustavus;
For to the very teeth of thy rebellion
We dash defiance back.

Gust. Alas, my mother!

Grief chokes up utterance, else I have to say
What never tongue unfolded—Yet return,
Come back, and I will give up all to save thee;
Thou fountain of my life!

Dearer than mercy is to kneeling penitence,
My early blessing, first and latest joy;
Return, return and save thy lost Gustavus!

Christ. No more, thou trifler!

Aug. Oh, farewell for ever!

[Exeunt CHRISTIERN and his party. GUSTAVUS and his party remain.]

Gust. Then she is gone—Arvida! Anderson!
For ever gone—Arnoldus, friends, where are ye?
Help here, heave, heave this mountain from me—
Oh—

Heaven keep my senses!—So—We will to battle;

But let no banners wave—Be still, thou trump!
And every martial sound, that gives the war
To pomp or levity; for vengeance now
Is clad with heavy arms, sedately stern,
Resolv'd, but silent as the slaughter'd heaps;
O'er which my soul is brooding.

Arn. O Gustavus!

Is there a Swede of us, whose sword and soul
Grapple not to thee, as to all they hold
Of earthly estimation? Said I more,
It were but half my thought.

And. On thee we gaze,

As one unknown till this important hour;
Pre-eminent of men!

Siv. Accurs'd be he,
Who, in thy leading, will not fight and strive,
And bleed, and gasp with pleasure!

And. We are thine.

Arn. Though; to yield us up,
Had scarce been less than virtue.

Gust. O my friends!

I see, 'tis not for man to boast his strength.
Before the trial comes—'Tis his very hour,
Had I a thousand parents, all seem'd light,
When weigh'd against my country; and but now,
One mother seem'd of weight to poise the world,
I though conscious truth and reason were against
her.

For, oh, howe'er the partial passions sway,
High Heaven assigns but one unbiass'd way;
Direct through every opposition leads,
Where shelves decline, and many a steep impedes.
Here hold we on—though thwarting fiends alarm,
Here hold we on—though devious syrens charm;
In Heaven's disposing power events unite,
Nor aught can happen wrong to him, who acts aright. [Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—The Royal Tent, near the Field of Battle.

Enter CHRISTINA and MARIANA.

Christina. Hark! Mariana, list!—No—all is silent—

It was not fancy, sure—didst thou not hear?

Mar. Too plain, the voice of terror seiz'd my ear,

And my heart sinks within me.

Christina. Oh, I fear
The war is now at work—As winds, methought,
Long borne through hollow vaults, the sound approach'd;

One sound, yet laden with a thousand notes

Of fearful variation; then it swell'd

To distant shouts, now coming on the gale;

Again borne backward with a parting groan,

All sunk to horrid stillness.

Enter LAERTES.

Laer. Christina, fly! thou royal virgin,
This morn beheld thee mistress of the north,
Bright heir of Scandinavia; and this hour
Has left thee not, throughout thy wide dominions,
Whereon to rest thy foot.

Christina. Now, praise to Heaven!

Say, but my father lives!

Laer. At your command

I went; and, from a neighbour'ing summit, view'd

Where either host stood adverse, sternly wedg'd;

Reflecting, on each other's gloomy front,

Fell hate and fix'd defiance.—When at once

The foe mov'd on, attendant to the steps

Of their Gustavus—He, with mournful pace,

Came slow and silent; till two hapless Danes

Prick'd forth, and on his helm discharg'd their fury;

Then rous'd the lion! To my wondering sight

His stature grew twofold, before his eye

All force seem'd wither'd, and his horrid plume

Shook wild dismay around; as Heaven's dread bolt

He shot, he pierc'd our legions; in his strength

His shouting squadron gloried, rushing on

Where'er he led their battle—Full five times,

Hemm'd by our mightier host, the foe seem'd lost,

And swallow'd from my sight; five times again,

Like flames they issued to the light—And thrice

These eyes beheld him, they beheld Gustavus

Unhorsed, and by a host girt singly in;

And thrice he broke through all.

Christina. My blood runs chill.

Laer. With such a strenuous, such a labour'd conflict,

Sure never field was fought! until Gustavus

Aloud cried, Victory! and on his spear

High rear'd th' imperial diadem of Denmark;

Then slack'd the battle; then recoil'd our host;

His, echoed, Victory! and now would know

No bounds; rout follow'd, and the face of fight—

She heeds me not.

Christina. Oh, ill-starr'd royalty!

My father! cruel, dear, unhappy father!

Summon'd so sudden! fearful, fearful thought!

Enter CHRISTIERN, flying, without his helmet, in disorder, his Sword broke, and his garments bloody; he throws away his Sword.

Christ. Give us new arms of proof—fresh horses—quick!

A watch without there—Set a standard up
To guide our scatter'd powers! Haste, my friends, haste!

We must be gone—Oh for some cooling stream,
To slake a monarch's thirst!

Laer. A post, my liege,
A second post from Denmark, says—

Christ. All's lost.
Is it not so? Be gone,
Give me a moment's solitude—Thought, thought,
Where wouldst thou lead?

Christina. He sees me not—Alas, alas my father!

Oh, what a war there lives within his eye!
Where greatness struggles to survive itself.
I tremble to approach him; yet I fain
Would bring peace to him—Dont you know me,
Sir?

Christ. My child!

Christina. I am.

Christ. Curse me, then! curse me! join with Heaven, and earth,
And hell, to curse!

Christina. Patience and peace
Possess thy mind! Not all thy pride of empire
E'er gave such bless'd sensations, as one hour
Of penitence, though painful—Let us hence—
Far from the blood and bustle of ambition.
Be it my task to watch thy rising wish,
To smooth thy brow, find comfort for thy cares,
And for thy will, obedience; still to cheer
The day with smiles, and lay the nightly down
Beneath thy slumbers.

Christ. Oh! thou all that's left me!
Even in the riot, in the rage of fight,
Thy guardian virtues watch'd around my head,
When else no arm could aid; for through my
ranks,

My circling troops, the fell Gustavus rush'd;
Vengeance! he cried, and with one eager hand
Grip'd fast my diadem—his other arm,
High rear'd the deathful steel—suspended yet;
For in his eye, and through his varying face,
Conflicting passions fought—he look'd—he stood
In wrath reluctant—then, with gentler voice;
Christina, thou hast conquer'd! Go, he cried,
I yield thee to her virtues. [Exeunt.

Enter GUSTAVUS, ANDERSON, ARNOLDUS, SI-
VARD, &c. in triumph. GUSTAVUS advances, and the rest range themselves on each side of the Stage.

Gust. That we have conquer'd, first we bend to Heaven!

And. And next to thee!

All. To thee, to thee, Gustavus!

Gust. No, matchless men! my brothers of the war!

Be it my greatest glory to have mix'd
My arms with yours, and to have fought for once
Like to a Dalecarlian; like to you,
The sires of honour, of a new born fame.
To be transmitted, from your great memorial,
To climes unknown, to age succeeding age,
Till time shall verge upon eternity,
And patriots be no more—

Arn. Behold, my lord,
The Danish prisoners, and the traitor Peterson,
Attend their fate.

Gust. Send home the Danes with honour,
And let them better learn, from our example,
To treat whom next they conquer with humanity.

And. But then, for Peterson?

Gust. His crimes are great;
A single death were a reward for treason,
Let him still languish—let him be exiled,
No more to see the land of liberty,
The hills of Sweden, nor the native fields
Of known, endear'd Idea.

And. Royal Sir,
This is to pardon, to encourage villains:
And hourly to expose that sacred life,
Where all our safety centres.

Gust. Fear them not.
The fence of virtue is a chief's best caution;
And the firm surety of my people's hearts
Is all the guard that e'er shall wait Gustavus.
I am a soldier from my youth;
Trust me, my friend,
Except in such a cause as this day's quarrel,
I would not shed a single wretch's blood,
For the world's empire!

Arn. O exalted Sweden!
Bless'd people! Heaven! wherein have we deserv'd
A man like this to rule us?

Enter ARVIDA, leading in CHRISTINA—he runs to GUSTAVUS.

Gust. My Arvida!

Arn. My king! O hail! Thus let me pay my homage. [Kneels

Christina. Renown'd Gustavus! Mightiest
among men!

If such a wretch, the captive of thy arms,
Trembling and awed in thy superior presence,
May find the grace, that every other finds,
(For thou art said to be of wondrous goodness!)
Then hear, and oh, excuse a foe's presumption,
While low, thus low, you see a suppliant child
Now pleading for a father; for a dear,
Much lov'd, if cruel, yet unhappy father.
If he with circling nations could not stand Against thee single; singly, what can he
When thou art fenc'd with nations?

Gust. Ha! that posture!

Oh, rise—surpris'd, my eye perceiv'd it not
I've much to say, but that my tongue, my thoughts
Are troubled; warr'd on by unusual passions.
'Twas hence thou hadst it in thy power to ask
Ere I could offer—Come, my friend, assist,
Instruct me to be grateful. O Christina,
I fought for freedom, not for crowns, thou fair one,
They shall sit brighter on that beauteous head,
Whose eye might awe the monarchs of the earth,
And light the world to virtue—My Arvida!

Arn. I read thy soul, I see the generous conflict,
And come to fix, not trouble, thy repose.
Could you but know with what an eager haste
I sprung to execute thy late commands;
To shield this lovely object of thy cares,
And give her thus, all beauteous, to thy eyes!
For I've no bliss but thine, have lost the form
Of every wish that's foreign to thy happiness.

Gust. Alas! your cheek is pale—you bleed, my brother!

Arn. I do indeed—to death.

Gust. You have undone me:
Rash, headstrong man!—Oh, was this well, Ar-vida?

Arn. Pardon, Gustavus! mine 's the common lot,
The fate of thousands fallen this day in battle.
I had resolv'd on life, to see you bless'd;
To see my king and his Christina happy.
Turn, thou below'd, thou honour'd next to Heaven,

And to thy arms receive a penitent,
Who never more shall wrong thee.

Gust. O Arvida!

Friend! Friend!

[Embraces him.]

Arv. Thy heart beats comfort to me! in this breast,

Let thy Arvida, let thy friend, survive.

Oh, strip his once lov'd image of its frailties,

And strip it too of every fonder thought,

That may give thee affliction—Do, Gustavus;

It is my last request; for Heaven and thou

Art all the care, and business—of Arvida.

[Dies.]

Gust. Wouldst thou too leave me?

Not if the heart, the arms, of thy Gustavus,

Have force to hold thee.

Christina. O delightful notes!

That I do love thee, yes, 'tis true, my lord.

The bond of virtue, friendship's sacred tie,

The lover's pains, and all the sister's fondness;

But I have a father,

If cruel, yet a father:

Abandon'd now by every supple wretch,
That fed his years with flattery. I am all

That's left to calm, to sooth, his troubled soul

To penitence, to virtue.

[Exit.]

[*GUSTAVUS looks after CHRISTINA, then turns and looks on ARVIDA:—ANDERSON, AR-
NOLDUS, &c. advance.*]

Gust. Come, come, my brothers all! Yes, I will strive

To be the sum of every title to ye,

And you shall be my sire, my friend reviv'd.

My sister, mother, all that's kind and dear;

For so Gustavus holds ye.—Oh, I will

Of private passions all my soul divest,

And take my dearer country to my breast.

To public good transfer each fond desire,

And clasp my Sweden, with a lover's fire.

Well pleas'd, the weight of all her burdens bear,

Dispense all pleasure, but engross all care.

Still quick to find, to feel, my people's woes,

And wake, that millions may enjoy repose.

[Exeunt.]

SHE STOOPS TO CONQUER:

A COMEDY,

IN FIVE ACTS.

BY DR. GOLDSMITH.

REMARKS.

It has been observed, that no man took less pains with his compositions than Goldsmith, and yet produced so powerful an effect: a happy originality distinguishes all his writings. Nature and Genius preside over the comedy before us, which restored to the stage, wit, gaiety, incident, and character, in the place of that over-dose of sentimentality and affectation which so long prevailed.

"The language throughout is easy and characteristic; the manners of the times are slightly, but faithfully, represented; the satire is not ostentatiously displayed, but involved in the business of the play; and the suspense of the audience is artfully kept up to the last."—Davies.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Chamber in an old-fashioned House.

Enter HARDCASTLE and MRS. HARDCASTLE.

Mrs. H. I vow, Mr. Hardcastle, you're very particular. Is there a creature in the whole country, but ourselves, that does not take a trip to town now and then to rub off the rust a little? There's the two Miss Hoggs, and our neighbour, Mrs. Grigsby, go to take a month's polishing every winter.

Hard. Ay, and bring back vanity and affectation to last them the whole year. I wonder why

London cannot keep its own fools at home. In my time, the follies of the town crept slowly among us, but now they travel faster than a stage-coach. Its fopperies come down, not only as inside passengers, but in the very basket.

Mrs. H. Ay, your times were fine times indeed, you have been telling us of them for many a long year. Here we live in an old rumbling mansion, that looks for all the world like an inn, but that we never see company. Our best visitors are old Mrs. Oddfish, the curate's wife, and little Cripple-gate, the lame dancing-master; and all our entertainment your old stories of Prince Eugene and the Duke of Marlborough. I hate such old-fashioned trumpery.

Hard. And I love it. I love every thing that's old; old friends, old times, old manners, old books, old wine; and I believe, Dorothy, [Taking her hand.] you'll own I have been pretty fond of an old wife.

Mrs. H. Lord, Mr. Hardcastle, you're for ever at your Dorothy's and your old wives. You may be a Darby, but I'll be no Joan, I promise you. I'm not so old as you'd make me by more than one good year. Add twenty to twenty, and make money of that.

Hard. Let me see; twenty added to twenty makes just fifty and seven.

Mrs. H. It's false, Mr. Hardcastle: I was but twenty when I was brought to bed of Tony, that I had by Mr. Lumpkin, my first husband; and he's not come to years of discretion yet.

Hard. Nor ever will, I dare answer for him. Ay, you have taught him finely.

Mrs. H. No matter; Tony Lumpkin has a good fortune. My son is not to live by his learning. I don't think a boy wants much learning to spend fifteen hundred a year.

Hard. Learning, quotha! a mere composition of tricks and mischief.

Mrs. H. Humour, my dear; nothing but humour. Come, Mr. Hardcastle, you must allow the boy a little humour.

Hard. I'd sooner allow him a horsepond. If burning the footman's shoes, frightening the maids, worrying the kittens, be humour, he has it. It was but yesterday he fastened my wig to the back of my chair, and when I went to make a bow, I poppd my bald head into Mrs. Frizzle's face.

Mrs. H. And am I to blame? The poor boy was always too sickly to do any good. A school would be his death. When he comes to be a little stronger, who knows what a year or two's Latin may do for him?

Hard. Latin for him! a cat and a fiddle. No, no, the alehouse and the stable are the only schools he'll ever go to.

Mrs. H. Well, we must not snub the poor boy now; for I believe we sha'n't have him long among us. Any body that looks in his face may see he's consumptive.

Hard. Ay, if growing too fat be one of the symptoms.

Mrs. H. He coughs sometimes.

Hard. Yes, when his liquor goes the wrong way.

Mrs. H. I'm actually afraid of his lungs.

Hard. And truly, so am I; for he sometimes whoops like a speaking-trumpet—[TONY hallooing behind the scenes.]—O there he goes—A very consumptive figure, truly.

Enter TONY, crossing the stage.

Mrs. H. Tony, where are you going, my charmer? Won't you give papa and I a little of your company, lovee?

Tony. I'm in haste, mother, I can't stay.

Mrs. H. You sha'n't venture out this raw evening, my dear; you look most shockingly.

Tony. I can't stay, I tell you. The Three Pigeons expect me down every moment. There's some fun going forward.

Hard. Ay; the alehouse, the old place: I thought so.

Mrs. H. A low, paltry set of fellows.

Tony. Not so low, neither. There's Dick Muggins the exciseman, Jack Slang the horse-doctor, little Aminidab that grinds the music-box, and Tom Twist that spins the pewter-platter.

Mrs. H. Pray, my dear, disappoint them for one night at least.

Tony. As for disappointing them, I should not so much mind: but I can't abide to disappoint myself.

Mrs. H. [Detaining him.] You sha'n't go.

Tony. I will, I tell you.

Mrs. H. I say, you sha'n't.

Tony. We'll see which is strongest, you or I.

[Exeunt.]

Hard. Ay, there goes a pair that only spoil each other. But is not the whole age in a combination to drive sense and discretion out of doors? There's my pretty darling Kate; the fashions of the times have almost infected her too. By living a year or two in town, she is as fond of gauze and French frippery, as the best of them.

Enter MISS HARDCASTLE.

Hard. Blessings on my pretty innocence!—Dressed out as usual, my Kate. Goodness! what a quantity of superfluous silk hast thou got about thee, girl! I could never teach the fools of this age, that the indigent world could be clothed out of the trimmings of the vain.

Miss H. You know our agreement, Sir. You allow me the morning to receive and pay visits, and to dress in my own manner; and in the evening, I put on my housewife's dress to please you.

Hard. Well, remember I insist on the terms of our agreement: and by the by, I believe I shall have occasion to try your obedience this very evening.

Miss H. I protest, Sir, I don't comprehend your meaning.

Hard. Then to be plain with you, Kate, I expect the young gentleman I have chosen to be your husband from town this very day. I have his father's letter, in which he informs me his son is set out, and that he intends to follow himself shortly after.

Miss H. Indeed! I wish I had known something of this before. Bless me, how shall I behave? It's a thousand to one I sha'n't like him; our meeting will be so formal, and so like a thing of business, that I shall find no room for friendship or esteem.

Hard. Depend upon it, child, I'll never control your choice; but Mr. Marlow, whom I have pitched upon, is the son of my old friend, Sir Charles Marlow, of whom you have heard me talk so often. The young gentleman has been bred a scholar, and is designed for an employment in the service of his country. I am told he's a man of excellent understanding.

Miss H. Is he?

Hard. Very generous.

Miss H. I believe I shall like him.

Hard. Young and brave.

Miss H. I'm sure I shall like him.

Hard. And very handsome.

Miss H. My dear papa, say no more; [Kissing his hand.] he's mine, I'll have him.

Hard. And, to crown all, Kate, he's one of the most bashful and reserved young fellows in the world.

Miss H. Eh! you have frozen me to death again. That word reserved has undone all the rest of his accomplishments. A reserved lover, it is said, always makes a suspicious husband

Hard. On the contrary, modesty seldom resides in a breast that is not enriched with nobler virtues. It was the very feature in his character that first struck me.

Miss H. He must have more striking features to catch me, I promise you. However, if he be so young, so handsome, and so every thing, as you mention, I believe he'll do still. I think I'll have him.

Hard. Ay, Kate, but there is still an obstacle. It's more than an even wager he may not have you.

Miss H. My dear papa, why will you mortify one so?—Well, if he refuses, instead of breaking my heart at his indifference, I'll only break my glass for its flattery; set my cap to some newer fashion, and look out for some less difficult admirer.

Hard. Bravely resolved! In the mean time I'll go prepare the servants for his reception; as we seldom see company, they want as much training as a company of recruits the first day's muster. [Exit.

Miss H. Lud, this news of papa's puts me all in a flutter. Young, handsome; these he puts last; but I put them foremost. Sensible, good-natured; I like all that. But then reserved and sheepish; that's much against him. Yet can't he be cured of his timidity, by being taught to be proud of his wife? Yes, and can't I—But I vow I'm disposing of the husband, before I have secured the lover.

Enter MISS NEVILLE.

Miss H. I'm glad you're come, Neville, my dear. Tell me, Constance, how do I look this evening? Is there any thing whimsical about me? Is it one of my well looking days, child? am I in face to-day?

Miss N. Perfectly, my dear. Yet now I look again—bless me! surely no accident has happened among the canary birds or the gold fishes. Has your brother or the cat been meddling? Or has the last novel been too moving?

Miss H. No; nothing of all this. I have been threatened—I can scarce get it out—I have been threatened with a lover.

Miss N. And his name—

Miss H. Is Marlow.

Miss N. Indeed!

Miss H. The son of Sir Charles Marlow.

Miss N. As I live, the most intimate friend of Mr. Hastings, my admirer. They are never asunder. I believe you must have seen him when we lived in town.

Miss H. Never.

Miss N. He's a very singular character, I assure you. Among women of reputation and virtue, he is the modestest man alive; but his acquaintance give him a very different character among creatures of another stamp: you understand me.

Miss H. An odd character indeed. I shall never be able to manage him. What shall I do? Pshaw, think no more of him; but trust to occurrences for success. But how goes on your own affair, my dear? has my mother been courting you for my brother Tony, as usual?

Miss N. I have just come from one of our agreeable tete-a-tetes. She has been saying a hundred tender things, and setting off her pretty monster as the very pink of perfection.

Miss H. And her partiality is such, that she actually thinks him so. A fortune like yours is no small temptation. Besides, as she has the sole management of it, I'm not surprised to see her unwilling to let it go out of the family.

Miss N. A fortune like mine, which chiefly consists in jewels, is no such mighty temptation. But at any rate, if my dear Hastings be but constant, I make no doubt to be too hard for her at last. However, I let her suppose that I am in love with her son, and she never once dreams that my affections are fixed upon another.

Miss H. My good brother holds out stoutly. I could almost love him for hating you so.

Miss N. It is a good natured creature at bottom, and I'm sure would wish to see me married to any body but himself. But my aunt's bell rings for our afternoon's walk round the improvements. Allon's, courage is necessary, as our affairs are critical.

Miss H. Would it were bed time, and all were well.

SCENE II.—An Alehouse Room.

Several shabby fellows, with punch and tobacco.

TONY at the head of the table.

Omnes. Hurra, hurra, hurra, bravo.

I Fel. Now, gentlemen, silence for a song. The squire is going to knock himself down for a song.

Omnes. Ay, a song, a song.

Tony. Then I'll sing you, gentlemen, a song I made upon this alehouse, the Three Pigeons.

Let schoolmasters puzzle their brain,

With grammar, and nonsense, and learning;

Good liquor, I stoutly maintain,

Gives genius a better discerning.

Let them brag of their heathenish gods,

Their Lethes, their Styxes, and Stygians,

Their quis, and their quas, and their quods,

They're all but a parcel of pigeons.

Toroddle, toroddle, toroll.

When methodist preachers come down

A preaching that drinking is sinful,

I'll wager the rascals a crown,

They always preach best with a skinful.

But when you come down with your pence,

For a slice of their scurvy religion,

I'll leave it to all men of sense,

But you, my good friend, are the pigeon.

Toroddle, &c.

Then come, put the jorum about,

And let us be merry and clever;

Our hearts and our liquors are stout,

Here's the Three Jolly Pigeons for ever.

Let some cry up woodcock or hare,

Your bustards, your ducks, and your widgcons,

But of all the birds in the air,

Here's a health to the Three Jolly Pigeons.

Toroddle, &c.

Omnes. Bravo, bravo.

1 Fel. The squire has got spunk in him.

2 Fel. I loves to hear him sing, bekeays he never gives us nothing that's low.

3 Fel. O, damn any thing that's low; I can't bear it.

4 Fel. The genteel thing is the genteel thing at any time, if so be that a gentleman bees in a concatenation accordingly.

3 Fel. I like the maxum of it, master Muggins. What though I am obligated to dance a bear, a man may be a gentleman for all that. May this be my poison if my bear ever dances but to the very genteelst of tunes;—"Water parted," or the minuet in Ariadne.

2 Fel. What a pity it is the squire is not come to his own. It would be well for all the publicans within ten miles round of him.

Tony. Ecod, and so it would, master Slang. I'd then show what it was to keep choice of company.

2 Fel. Oh, he takes after his own father for that. To be sure old 'squire Lumpkin was the finest gentleman I ever set my eyes on. For winding the straight horn, or beating a thicket for a hare, or a wench, he never had his fellow. It was a saying in the place, that he kept the best horses, dogs, and girls, in the whole country.

Tony. Ecod, and when I'm of age I'll be no bastard, I promise you. I have been thinking of Bet Bouncer and the miller's gray mare to begin with. But come, my boys, drink about and be merry, for you pay no reckoning. Well, Stingo, what's the matter?

Enter LANDLORD.

Land. There be two gentlemen in a post-chaise at the door. They have lost their way up o' the forest, and they are talking something about Mr. Hardcastle.

Tony. As sure as can be, one of them must be the gentleman that's coming down to court my sister. Do they seem to be Londoners?

Land. I believe they may. They look woundily like Frenchmen.

Tony. Then desire them to step this way, and I'll set them right in a twinkling. [Exit LANDLORD.] Gentlemen, as they mayn't be good enough company for you, step down for a moment, and I'll be with you in the squeezing of a lemon. [Exeunt Mob.] Father-in-law has been calling me whelp, and hound, this half year. Now if I pleased, I could be so revenged upon the old grumbletonian. But then I'm afraid!—of what? I shall soon be worth fifteen hundred a year, and let him frighten me out of that if he can.

Enter LANDLORD, conducting MARLOW and HASTINGS.

Mar. What a tedious, uncomfortable day have we had of it. We were told it was but forty miles across the country, and we have come above threescore.

Hast. And all, Marlow, from that unaccountable reserve of yours, that would not let us inquire more frequently on the way.

Mar. My own, Hastings, I am unwilling to lay myself under an obligation to every one I meet; and often stand the chance of an unmannerly answer.

Hast. At present, however, we are not likely to receive any answer.

Tony. No offence, gentlemen; but I'm told you have been inquiring for one Mr. Hardcastle, in these parts. Do you know what part of the country you are in?

Hast. Not in the least, Sir; but should thank you for information.

Tony. Nor the way you came?

Hast. No, Sir; but if you can inform us—

Tony. Why, gentlemen, if you know neither the road you are going, nor where you are, nor the road you came, the first thing I have to inform you is, that—you have lost your way.

Mar. We wanted no ghost to tell us that.

Tony. Pray, gentlemen, may I be so bold as to ask the place from whence you came?

Mar. That's not necessary towards directing us where we are to go.

Tony. No offence: but question for question is all fair, you know. Pray, gentlemen, is not this same Hardcastle a cross-grained, old-fashioned, whimsical fellow, with an ugly face, a daughter, and a pretty son?

Hast. We have not seen the gentleman, but he has the family you mention.

Tony. The daughter, a tall, trapesing, trolloping, talkative maypole—the son, a pretty, well-bred, agreeable youth, that every body is fond of.

Mar. Our information differs in this: the daughter is said to be well-bred and beautiful; the son, an awkward booby, reared up and spoiled a his mother's apron-string.

Tony. He-he-hem—Then, gentlemen, all I have to tell you is, that you wont reach Mr. Hardcastle's house this night, I believe.

Hast. Unfortunate!

Tony. It's a damned long, dark, boggy, dirty, dangerous way. Stingo, tell the gentlemen the way to Mr. Hardcastle's; [Winking upon the LANDLORD.] Mr. Hardcastle's, of Quagmire-marsh, you understand me.

Land. Master Hardcastle's! Lack-a-daisy, my masters, you're come a deadly deal wrong! When you came to the bottom of the hill, you should have crossed down Squash-lane.

Mar. Cross down Squash-lane.

Land. Then you were to keep straight forward till you came to four roads.

Mar. Come to where four roads meet?

Tony. Ay, but you must be sure to take only one of them.

Mar. Oh, Sir, you're facetious.

Tony. Then keeping to the right, you are to go sideways till you come upon Crack-skull common: there you must look sharp for the track of the wheel; and go forward till you come to farmer Murrain's barn. Coming to the farmer's barn, you are to turn to the right, and then to the left, and then the right about again, till you find out the old mill—

Mar. Zounds, man! we could as soon find out the longitude!

Hast. What's to be done, Marlow?

Mar. This house promises but a poor reception; though perhaps the landlord can accommodate us.

Land. Alack, master, we have but one spare bed in the whole house.

Tony. And, to my knowledge, that's taken up by three lodgers already. [After a pause, in which the rest seem disconcerted.] I have hit it; don't you think, Stingo, our landlady could accommodate the gentlemen by the fireside, with—three chairs and a bolster?

Hast. I hate sleeping by the fireside.

Mar. And I detest your three chairs and a bolster.

Tony. You do, do you?—then let me see—what—if you go on a mile farther, to the Buck's Head, the old Buck's Head on the hill, one of the best inns in the whole country?

Hast. O ho! so we have escaped an adventure for this night, however.

Land. [Apart to TONY.] Sure you ben't sending them to your father's as an inn, be you?

Tony. Mum, you fool you; let them find that out. [To them.] You have only to keep on straight forward till you come to a large house by the road side: you'll see a pair of large horns over the door: that's the sign. Drive up the yard, and call stoutly about you.

Hast. Sir, we are obliged to you. The servants can't miss the way?

Tony. No, no: but I tell you, though, the landlord is rich, and going to leave off business; so he wants to be thought a gentleman, saving your presence, he, he, he! He'll be for giving you his company, and ecod if you mind him, he'll persuade you that his mother was an alderman, and his aunt a justice of peace.

Land. A troublesome old blade, to be sure; but a keeps as good wines and beds as any in the whole country.

Mar. Well, if he supplies us with these, we shall want no further connection. We are to turn to the right, did you say?

Tony. No, no, straight forward. I'll just step myself, and show you a piece of the way. [To Land.] Mum.

Land. Ah, bless your heart, for a sweet, pleasant—damned mischievous son of a whore. [Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—An old-fashioned House.

Enter HARDCASTLE, followed by three or four awkward SERVANTS.

Hard. Well, I hope you're perfect in the table exercise I have been teaching you these three days. You all know your posts and your places, and can show that you have been used to good company, without stirring from home.

Omnès. Ay, ay.

Hard. When company comes, you are not to pop out and stare, and then run in again, like frightened rabbits in a warren.

Omnès. No, no.

Hard. You, Diggory, whom I have taken from the barn, are to make a show at the side-table; and you, Roger, whom I have advanced from the plough, are to place yourself behind my chair. But you're not to stand so, with your hands in your pockets. Take your hands from your pockets, Roger, and from your head, you blockhead you. See how Diggory carries his hands. They're a little too stiff, indeed, but that's no great matter.

Dig. Ay, mind how I hold them: I learned to hold my hands this way when I was upon drill for the militia. And so being upon drill—

Hard. You must not be too talkative, Diggory; you must be all attention to the guests. You must hear us talk, and not think of talking; you must see us drink, and not think of drinking; you must see us eat, and not think of eating.

Dig. By the laws, your worship, that's perfectly impossible. Whenever Diggory sees yeating going forwards, ecod he's always wishing for a mouthful himself.

Hard. Blockhead! is not a bellyful in the kitchen as good as a bellyful in the parlour? Stay your stomach with that reflection.

Dig. Ecod I thank your worship; I'll make a shift to stay my stomach with a slice of cold beef in the pantry.

Hard. Diggory you are too talkative. Then if I happen to say a good thing, or tell a good story at table, you must not all burst out a laughing, as if you made part of the company.

Dig. Then ecod your worship must not tell the story of Ould Diggory in the gun-room: I can't help laughing at that—he, he, he!—for the soul of me. We have laughed at that these twenty years—ha, ha, ha!

Hard. Ha, ha, ha! The story is a good one. Well, honest Diggory, you may laugh at that—but still remember to be attentive. Suppose one of the company should call for a glass of wine, how will you behave? A glass of wine, Sir, if you please. [To Diggory.]—Eh, why don't you move?

Dig. Ecod, your worship, I never have courage till I see the eatables and drinkables brought up to the table, and then I'm as bauld as a lion.

Hard. What, will nobody move?

1 Serv. I'm not to leave this place.

2 Serv. I'm sure it's no pleace of mine.

3 Serv. Nor mine, for sartin.

Dig. Wauns, and I'm sure it canna be mine.

Hard. You numskulls! and so while, like your betters, you are quarrelling for places, the guests must be starved. Oh, you dunces! I find I must begin all over again. But don't I hear a coach drive into the yard? To your posts, you block-heads. I'll go in the mean time and give my old friend's son a hearty welcome at the gate. [Exit.]

Dig. By the elevens, my place is gone quite out of my head.

Roger. I know that my place is to be every where.

1 Serv. Where the devil is mine?

2 Serv. My place is to be nowhere at all; and so I'ze go about my business.

[Exeunt SERVANTS, running.]

Enter MARLOW and HASTINGS.

Hast. After the disappointments of the day, welcome once more, Charles, to the comforts of a clean room and a good fire. Upon my word, a very well-looking house; antique, but creditable.

Mar. The usual fate of a large mansion. Having first ruined the master by good house-keeping, it at last comes to levy contributions as an inn.

Hast. As you say, we passengers are to be taxed to pay all these fineries. I have often seen a good sideboard, or a marble chimney-piece, though not actually put in the bill, inflame the bill confoundedly.

Mar. Travellers, George, must pay in all places; the only difference is, that in good inns you pay dearly for luxuries; in bad inns you are fleeced and starved.

Hast. You have lived pretty much among them. In truth, I have been often surprised, that you, who have seen so much of the world, with your natural good sense, and your many opportunities, could never yet acquire a requisite share of assurance.

Mar. The Englishman's malady; but tell me, George, where could I have learned that assurance you talk of? My life has been chiefly spent in a college or an inn, in seclusion from that lovely part of the creation, that chiefly teach men confidence. I don't know that I was ever familiarly acquainted with a single woman except my mother. But among females of another class, you know—

Hast. Ay, among them you are impudent enough of all conscience.

Mar. They are of us, you know.

Hast. But in the company of women of reputation I never saw such an idiot, such a trembler—you look for all the world as if you wanted an opportunity of stealing out of the room.

Mar. Why, man, that's because I do want to steal out of the room. Faith, I have often formed a resolution to break the ice, and rattle away at any rate. But I don't know how, a single glance from a pair of fine eyes has totally overset my resolution. An impudent fellow may counterfeit modesty, but I'll be hanged if a modest man can ever counterfeit impudence.

Hast. If you could but say half the fine things to them that I have heard you lavish upon the barmaid of an inn, or even a college bed-maker—

Mar. Why, George, I can't say fine things to them. They freeze, they petrify me. They may talk of a comet, or a burning mountain, or some such bagatelle; but to me a modest woman, dress'd out in all her finery, is the most tremendous object of the whole creation.

Hast. Ha, ha, ha! At this rate, man, how can you ever expect to marry?

Mar. Never, unless, as among kings and princes, my bride were to be courted by proxy. If, indeed, like an eastern bridegroom, one were to be introduced to a wife he never saw before, it might be endured. But to go through all the terrors of a formal courtship, together with the episode of aunts, grandmothers, cousins, and at last to blurt out the broad start-question of, Madam, will you marry me? No, no, that's a strain much above me, I assure you.

Hast. I pity you; but how do you intend behaving to the lady you are come down to visit at the request of your father?

Mar. As I behave to all other ladies. Bow very low. Answer yes, or no, to all her demands—But for the rest, I don't think I shall venture to look in her face till I see my father's again.

Hast. I'm surprised that one who is so warm a friend can be so cool a lover.

Mar. To be explicit, my dear Hastings, my chief inducement down was to be instrumental in forwarding your happiness, not my own. Miss Neville loves you; the family don't know you; as my friend you are sure of a reception, and let honour do the rest.

Enter HARDCASTLE.

Hard. Gentlemen, once more you are heartily welcome. Which is Mr. Marlow? Sir, you're heartily welcome. It's not my way, you see, to receive my friends with my back to the fire; I like to give them a hearty reception in the old style at my gate: I like to see their horses and trunks taken care of.

Mar. [Aside.] He has got our names from the servants already. [To HARDCASTLE.] We approve your caution and hospitality, Sir. [To HASTINGS.] I have been thinking, George, of changing our travelling dresses in the morning; I am grown confoundedly ashamed of mine.

Hard. I beg, Mr. Marlow, you'll use no ceremony in this house.

Hast. I fancy, George, you're right: the first blow is half the battle.

Hard. Mr. Marlow—Mr. Hastings—gentlemen—pray be under no restraint in this house. This is Liberty-hall, gentlemen; you may do just as you please here.

Mar. Yet, George, if we open the campaign too fiercely at first, we may want ammunition before it is over. We must show our generalship, by securing, if necessary, a retreat.

Hard. Your talking of a retreat, Mr. Marlow, puts me in mind of the Duke of Marlborough, when he went to besiege Denain. He first summoned the garrison.

Mar. Ay, and we'll summon your garrison, old boy.

Hard. He first summoned the garrison, which might consist of about five thousand men.

Hast. Marlow, what's o'clock.

Hard. I say, gentlemen, as I was telling you, he summoned the garrison, which might consist of about five thousand men.

Mar. Five minutes to seven.

Hard. Which might consist of about five thousand men, well appointed with stores, ammunition, and other implements of war. Now, says the Duke of Marlborough, to George Brooks that stood next to him—You must have heard of George Brooks—I'll pawn my dukedom; says he, but I take that garrison without spilling a drop of blood. So—

Mar. What, my good friend, if you give us a glass of punch in the mean time, it would help us to carry on the siege with vigour.

Hard. Punch, Sir!—This is the most unaccountable kind of modesty I ever met with.

[Aside.

Mar. Yes, Sir, punch. A glass of warm punch, after our journey, will be comfortable.

Enter SERVANT, with a tankard.

This is Liberty-hall, you know.

Hard. Here's a cup, Sir.

Mar. So this fellow, in his Liberty-hall, will only let us have just what he pleases. [Aside.

Hard. [Taking the cup.] I hope you'll find it to your mind. I have prepared it with my own hands, and I believe you'll own the ingredients are tolerable. Will you be so good as to pledge me, Sir? Here, Mr. Marlow, here is to our better acquaintance. [Drinks.

Mar. A very impudent fellow this! but he's a character, and I'll humour him a little. [Aside.] Sir, my service to you. [Drinks, and gives the cup to HASTINGS.

Hast. I see this fellow wants to give us his company, and forgets that he's an innkeeper, before he has learned to be a gentleman. [Aside.

Mar. From the excellence of your cup, my old friend, I suppose you have a good deal of business in this part of the country. Warm work, now and then, at elections, I suppose.

[Gives the tankard to HARDCASTLE.
Hard. No, Sir, I have long given that work over. Since our betters have hit upon the expedient of electing each other, there's no business for us that sell ale.

[Gives the tankard to HASTINGS.

Hast. So then you have no turn for politics, I find.

Hard. Not in the least. There was a time, indeed, I fretted myself about the mistakes of government, like other people; but finding myself every day grow more angry, and the government growing no better, I left it to mend itself. Since that, I no more trouble my head about who's in or who's out, than I do about John Nokes and Tom Stiles. So my service to you.

Hast. So that with eating above stairs and drinking below, with receiving your friends within and amusing them without, you lead a good, pleasant, bustling life of it.

Hard. I do stir about a good deal, that's certain.

Half the differences in the parish are adjusted in this very parlour.

Mar. [After drinking.] And you have an argument in your cup, old gentleman, better than any in Westminster-hall.

Hard. Ay, young gentleman, that, and a little philosophy.

Mar. Well, this is the first time I ever heard of an innkeeper's philosophy. [Aside.

Hast. So then, like an experienced general, you attack them on every quarter. If you find their reason manageable, you attack them with your philosophy; if you find they have no reason, you attack them with this. Here's your health, my philosopher. [Drinks.]

Hard. Good, very good, thank you; ha, ha! Your generalship puts me in mind of prince Eugene when he fought the Turks at the battle of Belgrade. You shall hear.

Mar. Instead of the battle of Belgrade, I think it's almost time to talk about supper. What has your philosophy got in the house for supper?

Hard. For supper, Sir!—Was ever such a request to a man in his own house! [Aside.

Mar. Yes, Sir, supper, Sir; I begin to feel an appetite. I shall make devilish work to-night in the larder, I promise you.

Hard. Such a brazen dog sure my eyes never beheld. [Aside.] Why really, Sir, as for supper, I can't well tell. My Dorothy and the cookmaid settle these things between them. I leave these kind of things entirely to them.

Mar. You do, do you?

Hard. Entirely. By the by, I believe they are in actual consultation upon what's for supper this moment in the kitchen.

Mar. Then I beg they'll admit me as one of their privy council. It's a way I have got. When I travel I always choose to regulate my own supper. Let the cook be called. No offence, I hope, Sir.

Hard. O no, Sir, none in the least: yet I don't know how, our Bridget, the cookmaid, is not very communicative upon these occasions. Should we send for her, she might scold us all out of the house.

Hast. Let's see the list of the larder then. I ask it as a favour. I always match my appetite to my bill of fare.

Mar. [To HARDCASTLE, who looks at them with surprise.] Sir, he's very right, and it's my way too.

Hard. Sir, you have a right to command here. Here, Roger, bring us the bill of fare for to-night's supper. I believe it's drawn out. Your manner, Mr. Hastings, puts me in mind of my uncle, Colonel Wallop. It was a saying of his, that no man was sure of his supper till he had eaten it.

[Servant brings bill of fare, and exits.]

Hast. All upon the high ropes! His uncle a colonel! we shall soon hear of his mother being a justice of peace. But let's hear the bill of fare.

[Aside.]

Mar. [Perusing.] What's here? For the first course; for the second course; for the desert. The devil, Sir, do you think we have brought down the whole joiners' company, or the corporation of Bedford, to eat up such a supper? Two or three little things, clean and comfortable, will do.

Hast. But let's hear it.

Mar. [Reading.] For the first course; at the top, a pig and prune sauce.

Hast. Damn your pig, I say.

Mar. And damn your prune sauce, say I.

Hard. And yet, gentlemen, to men that are hungry, pig, with prune sauce, is very good eating.—Their impudence confounds me. [Aside.] Gentlemen, you are my guests, make what alteration you please. Is there any thing else you wish to retrench or alter, gentlemen?

Mar. Item. A pork pie, a boiled rabbit and sausages, a florentine, a shaking pudding, and a dish of tiff—taff—taffety cream!

Hast. Confound your made dishes! I shall be as much at a loss in this house, as at a green and yellow dinner at the French ambassador's table. I'm for plain eating.

Hard. I'm sorry, gentlemen, that I have nothing you like; but if there be any thing you have a particular fancy to—

Mar. Why really, Sir, your bill of fare is so exquisite, that any one part of it is full as good as another. Send us what you please. So much for supper. And now to see that our beds are aired, and properly taken care of.

Hard. I entreat you'll leave all that to me. You shall not stir a step.

Mar. Leave that to you! I protest, Sir, you must excuse me, I always look to these things myself.

Hard. I must insist, Sir, you'll make yourself easy on that head.

Mar. You see I'm resolv'd on it.—A very troublesome fellow, as ever I met with. [Aside.]

Hard. Well, Sir, I'm resolved at least to attend you.—This may be modern modesty, but I never saw any thing look so like old-fashioned impudence. [Exeunt MARLOW and HARDCASTLE.]

Hast. So I find this fellow's civilities begin to grow troublesome. But who can be angry with those assiduities which are meant to please him? Ha! what do I see? Miss Neville, by all that's happy!

Enter MISS NEVILLE.

Miss N. My dear Hastings! To what unexpected good fortune, to what accident, am I to ascribe this happy meeting?

Hast. Rather let me ask the same question, as I could never have hoped to meet my dearest Constance at an inn.

Miss N. An inn! sure you mistake! my aunt, my guardian, lives here. What could induce you to think this house an inn?

Hast. My friend, Mr. Marlow, with whom I came down, and I, have been sent here as to an inn, I assure you. A young fellow, whom we accidentally met at a house hard by, directed us hither.

Miss N. Certainly it must be one of my hopeful cousin's tricks, of whom you have heard me talk so often; ha, ha, ha, ha!

Hast. He whom your aunt intends for you? He of whom I have such just apprehensions?

Miss N. You have nothing to fear from him, I assure you. You'd adore him if you knew how heartily he despises me. My aunt knows it too, and has undertaken to court me for him, and actually begins to think she has made a conquest.

Hast. Thou dear dissembler! You must know, my Constance, I have just seized this happy opportunity of my friend's visit here to get admittance into the family. The horses that carried us down are now fatigued with the journey, but he'll soon be refreshed; and then, if my dearest girl will trust in her faithful Hastings, we shall soon be landed in France, where even among slaves the laws of marriage are respected.

Miss N. I have often told you, that, though ready to obey you, I yet should leave my little fortune behind with reluctance. The greatest part of it was left me by uncle, the India Director, and chiefly consists in jewels. I have been for some time persuading my aunt to let me wear them. I fancy I am very near succeeding. The instant they are put into my possession, you shall find me ready to make them and myself yours.

Hast. Perish the baubles! Your person is all I desire. In the mean time, my friend Marlow must not be let into his mistake. I know the strange reserve of his temper is such, that, if abruptly informed of it, he would instantly quit the house before our plan was ripe for execution.

Miss N. But how shall we keep him in the deception? Miss Hardcastle is just returned from walking; what if we persuade him she is come to this house as to an inn?—Come this way.

[They confer.]

Enter MARLOW.

Mar. The assiduities of these good people tease me beyond bearing. My host seems to think it ill manners to leave me alone, and so he claps not only himself, but his old-fashioned wife on my back. They talk of coming to sup with us too; and then, I suppose, we are to run the gauntlet through all the rest of the family—What have we got here?—

Hast. My dear Charles, let me congratulate you—The most fortunate accident!—Who do you think has just alighted?

Mar. Cannot guess.

Hast. Our mistresses, boy; Miss Hardcastle and Miss Neville. Give me leave to introduce Miss Constance Neville to your acquaintance. Happening to dine in the neighbourhood, they called on their return to take fresh horses here. Miss Hardcastle has just stepped into the next room, and will be back in an instant. Wasn't it lucky? eh!

Mar. I have just been mortified enough of all conscience, and here comes something to complete my embarrassment.

[Aside.]

Hast. Well! but wasn't it the most fortunate thing in the world?

Mar. Oh! yes. Very fortunate—a most joyful encounter.—But our dresses, George, you know, are in disorder.—What if we should postpone the happiness till to-morrow?—To-morrow at her own house—it will be very convenient—and rather more respectful—To-morrow let it be.

[Offering to go.]

Miss N. By no means, Sir. Your ceremony will displease her. The disorder of your dress will show the ardour of your impatience. Besides, she knows you are in the house, and will permit you to see her.

Mar. Oh! the devil! how shall I support it? Hem! hem! Hastings, you must not go. You are to assist me, you know. I shall be confoundably ridiculous. Yet, hang it! I'll take courage. Hem!

Hast. Pshaw, man! 'tis but the first plunge, and all's over. She's but a woman you know.

Mar. And of all women she that I dread most to encounter

Enter MISS HARDCASTLE, returned from walking.

Hast. [Introducing them.] Miss Hardcastle, Mr. Marlow. I'm proud of bringing two persons together, who only want to know, to esteem each other.

Miss H. [Aside.] Now, for meeting my modest gentleman with a demure face, and quite in his own manner. [After a pause, in which he appears very uneasy and disconcerted.] I'm glad of your safe arrival, Sir—I'm told you had some accidents by the way.

Mar. Only a few, Madam. Yes, we had some. Yes, Madam, a good many accidents, but should be sorry, Madam—or, rather glad of an accidents—that are so agreeably concluded. Hem!

Hast. [To MAR.] You never spoke better in your whole life. Keep it up, and I'll ensure you the victory.

Miss H. I'm afraid you flatter, Sir. You that have seen so much of the finest company, can find little entertainment in an obscure corner of the country.

Mar. [Gathering courage.] I have lived, indeed, in the world, Madam; but I have kept very little company. I have been but an observer upon life, Madam, while others were enjoying it.

Miss H. An observer, like you, upon life, were I fear disagreeably employed, since you must have had much more to censure than to approve.

Mar. Pardon me, Madam; I was always willing to be amused. The folly of most people is rather an object of my mirth than uneasiness.

Hast. [To MAR.] Bravo, bravo! Never spoke so well in your whole life. Well! Miss Hardcastle, I see that you and Mr. Marlow are going to be very good company. I believe our being here will but embarrass the interview.

Mar. Not in the least, Mr. Hastings. We like your company of all things. [To HAST.] Zounds! George, sure you won't go! How can you leave us?

Hast. Our presence will but spoil conversation, so we'll retire to the next room. [To MAR.] You don't consider, man, that we are to manage a little tete-a-tete of our own.

[Exeunt.]

Miss H. [After a pause.] But you have not been wholly an observer, I presume, Sir? The ladies, I should hope, have employed some part of your addresses.

Mar. [Relapsing into timidity.] Pardon me Madam, I—I—I—as yet have studied—only—to deserve them.

Miss H. And that, some say, is the very worst way to obtain them.

Mar. Perhaps so, Madam; but I love to converse only with the more grave and sensible part of the sex—But I'm afraid I grow tiresome.

Miss H. Not at all, Sir; there is nothing I like so much as grave conversation myself; I could hear it for ever. Indeed I have often been surprised how a man of sentiment could ever admire those light airy pleasures, where nothing reaches the heart.

Mar. It's—a disease—of the mind, Madam. In the variety of tastes there must be some who, wanting a relish—for—um—a—um.

Miss H. I understand you, Sir. There must be some who, wanting a relish for refined pleasures, pretend to despise what they are incapable of tasting.

Mar. My meaning, Madam; but infinitely better expressed. And I can't help observing that in this age of hypocrisy—a—

Miss H. Who could ever suppose this fellow impudent upon some occasions! [Aside.] You were going to observe, Sir—

Mar. I was observing, Madam—I protest, Madam, I forget what I was going to observe.

Miss H. I vow, and so do I. [Aside.] You were observing, Sir, that in this age of hypocrisy, something about hypocrisy, Sir.

Mar. Yes, Madam; in this age of hypocrisy there are few who upon inquiry do not—a—a—Miss H. I understand you perfectly, Sir.

Mar. 'Egad! and that's more than I do myself. [Aside.]

Miss H. You mean that in this hypocritical age there are few that do not condemn in public what they practise in private, and think they pay every debt to virtue when they praise it.

Mar. True, Madam; those who have most virtue in their mouths, have least of it in their bosoms. But I see Miss Neville expecting us in the next room. I would not intrude for the world.

Miss H. I protest, Sir, I never was more agreeably entertained in all my life. Pray go on.

Mar. Yes, Madam, I was—but she beckons us to join her. Madam, shall I do myself the honour to attend you.

Miss H. Well then, I'll follow.

Mar. This pretty smooth dialogue has done for me. [Aside, exit.]

Miss H. Ha, ha, ha! Was there ever such a sober, sentimental interview? I'm certain he scarce looked me in my face the whole time. Yet the fellow, but for his unaccountable bashfulness, is pretty well too. He has good sense, but then so buried in his fears, that it fatigues one more than ignorance. If I could teach him a little confidence, it would be doing somebody that I know of a piece of service. But who is that somebody?—that, faith, is a question I can scarce answer. [Exit.]

Enter TONY and MISS NEVILLE, followed by MRS. HARDCASTLE and HASTINGS.

Tony. What do you follow me for, cousin Con? I wonder you're not ashamed to be so very engaging.

Miss N. I hope, cousin, one may speak to one's own relations, and not be to blame.

Tony. Ay, but I know what sort of a relation you want to make me though; but it wont do. I tell you, cousin Con, it wont do; so I beg you'll keep your distance; I want no nearer relationship. [She follows, coquetting him.]

Mrs. H. Well! I vow, Mr. Hastings, you are very entertaining. There's nothing in the world I love to talk of so much as London, and the fashions, though I was never there myself.

Hast. Never there! you amaze me! from your air and manner, I concluded you had been bred all your life either at Ranelagh, St. James', or Tower-wharf.

Mrs. H. O! Sir, you're only pleased to say so. We country persons can have no manner at all. I'm in love with the town, and that serves to raise me above some of our neighbouring rustics; but who can have a manner that has never seen the Pantheon, the Grotto Gardens, the Borough, and such places where the nobility chiefly resort? all I can do, is to enjoy London at second-hand.

VOL. I. . . . 3 E

34*

I take care to know every tete-a-tete from the Scandalous Magazine, and have all the fashions as they come out, in a letter from the two Miss Ricketts of Crooked-lane. Pray how do you like this head, Mr. Hastings?

Hast. Extremely elegant and degagee, upon my word, Madam. Your friseur is a Frenchman, I suppose.

Mrs. H. I protest, I dressed it myself from a print in the Ladies' Memorandum-book for the last year.

Hast. Indeed! Such a head in a side-box at the playhouse, would draw as many gazers as my lady mayoress at a city ball.

Mrs. H. One must dress a little particular, or one may escape in the crowd.

Hast. But that cannot be your case, Madam, in any dress. [Boying.]

Mrs. H. Yet what signifies my dressing, when I have such a piece of antiquity by my side as Mr. Hardcastle? all I can say will not argue down a single button from his clothes. I have often wanted him to throw off his great flaxen wig, and where he was bald to plaster it over, like my lord Pately, with powder.

Hast. You are right, Madam; for, as among the ladies there are none ugly, so among the men there are none old.

Mrs. H. But what do you think his answer was? Why, with his usual Gothic vivacity, he said I only wanted him to throw off his wig to convert it into a tete for my own wearing.

Hast. Intolerable! at your age you may wear what you please, and it must become you.

Mrs. H. Pray, Mr. Hastings, what do you take to be the most fashionable age about town?

Hast. Some time ago, forty was all the mode; but I'm told the ladies intend to bring up fifty for the ensuing winter.

Mrs. H. Seriously. Then I shall be too young for the fashion.

Hast. No lady begins now to put on jewels till she's past forty. For instance, Miss there, in a polite circle, would be considered as a child, a mere maker of samplers.

Mrs. H. And yet Mrs. Niece thinks herself as much a woman, and is as fond of jewels, as the oldest of us all.

Hast. Your niece, is she? And that young gentleman a brother of yours, I should presume?

Mrs. H. My son, Sir. They are contracted to each other. Observe their little sports. They fall in and out ten times a day, as if they were man and wife already. [To them.] Well, Tony, child, what soft things are you saying to your cousin Constance this evening?

Tony. I have been saying no soft things; but that it's very hard to be followed about so. Ecod! I've not a place in the house now that's left to myself but the stable.

Mrs. H. Never mind him, Con, my dear. He's in another story behind your back.

Miss N. There's something generous in my cousin's manner. He falls out before faces to be forgiven in private.

Tony. That's a damned confounded—crack.

Mrs. H. Ah! he's a sly one. Don't you think they're like each other about the mouth, Mr. Hastings? The Blenkinsop mouth to a T. — They're of a size too. Back to back, my pretties, that Mr. Hastings may see you. Come, Tony.

Tony. You had as good not make me, I tell you

Miss N. O lud! he has almost cracked my head.

Mrs. H. O the monster! for shame, Tony. You a man, and behave so!

Tony. If I'm a man, let me have my fortin. Ecod! I'll not be made a fool of any longer.

Mrs. H. Is this, ungrateful boy, all that I'm to get for the pains I have taken in your education? I, that have rocked you in your cradle, and fed that pretty mouth with a spoon! Did not I work that waistcoat to make you genteel?

Tony. But, ecod! I tell you, I'll not be made a fool of no longer.

Mrs. H. Was'n't it all for your good, viper? Wasn't it all for your good?

Tony. I wish you'd let me and my good alone then. Snubbing this way when I'm in spirits. If I'm to have any good, let it come of itself; not to keep dinging it, dinging it into one so.

Mrs. H. That's false; I never see you when you're in spirits. No, Tony, you then go to the alehouse or kennel. I'm never to be delighted with your agreeable wild notes, unfeeling monster!

Tony. Ecod! mamma, your own notes are the wildest of the two.

Mrs. H. Was ever the like? But I see he wants to break my heart, I see he does.

Hast. Dear Madam, permit me to lecture the young gentleman a little. I'm certain I can persuade him to his duty.

Mrs. H. Well, I must retire. Come, Constance, my love. You see, Mr. Hastings, the wretchedness of my situation; was ever poor woman so plagued with a dear, sweet, pretty, provoking unfeeling boy. [Exit Mrs. HARDCASTLE and MISS NEVILLE.]

Tony. [Singing.] *There was a young man riding by,
And fain would have his will. Rang do dillo de.*

Don't mind her. Let her cry. It's the comfort of her heart. I have seen her and sister cry over a book for an hour together, and they said they liked the book the better, the more it made them cry.

Hast. Then you're no friend to the ladies, I find, my pretty young gentleman?

Tony. That's as I find 'em.

Hast. Not to her of your mother's choosing, I dare answer? And yet she appears to me a pretty well-tempered girl.

Tony. That's because you don't know her as well as I. Ecod! I know every inch about her; and there's not a more bitter cantankerous toad in all Christendom.

Hast. Pretty encouragement this for a lover.

Tony. I have seen her since the height of that. She has as many tricks as a hare in a thicket, or a colt, in the first day's breaking.

Hast. To me she appears sensible and silent.

Tony. Ay, before company. But when she's with her playmates, she's as loud as a hog in a gate.

Hast. But there is a meek modesty about her that charms me.

Tony. Yes; but curb her never so little, she kicks up, and you're flung in the ditch.

Hast. Well, but you must allow her a little beauty—Yes, you must allow her some beauty.

Tony. Bandbox! she's all a made up thing, nun. Ah! could you but see Bet Bouncer of these parts, you might then talk of beauty. Ecod, she has two eyes as black as sloes, and cheeks as broad and red as a pulpit cushion. She'd make two of she.

Hast. Well, what say you to a friend that would take this bitter bargain off your hands?

Tony. Anon.

Hast. Would you thank him that would take Miss Neville, and leave you to happiness and your dear Betsy?

Tony. Ay; but where is there such a friend, for who would take her?

Hast. I am he. If you but assist me, I'll engage to whip her off to France, and you shall never hear more of her.

Tony. Assist you! Ecod, I will, to the last drop of my blood. I'll clap a pair of horses to your chaise, that shall trundle you off in a twinkling, and may be get you a part of her fortin, beside, in jewels, that you little dream of.

Hast. My dear 'squire, this looks like a lad of spirit.

Tony. Come along then, and you shall see more of my spirit before you have done with me. [Singing.]

We are the boys

That fears no noise

Where thundering cannons roar.

[Exit.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The Same

Enter HARDCASTLE.

Hard. What could my old friend, Sir Charles, mean by recommending his son as the modestest young man in town? To me he appears as the most impudent piece of brass that ever spoke with a tongue. He has taken possession of the easy chair by the fireside already. He took off his boots in the parlour, and desired me to see them taken care of. I'm desirous to know how his impudence affects my daughter—She will certainly be shocked at it.

Enter MISS HARDCASTLE, plainly dressed.

Well, my Kate, I see you have changed your dress, as I bid you; and yet, I believe, there was no great occasion.

Miss H. I find such a pleasure, Sir, in obeying your commands, that I take care to observe them without ever debating their propriety.

Hard. And yet, Kate, I sometimes give you some cause, particularly when I recommended my modest gentleman to you as a lover to-day.

Miss H. You taught me to expect something extraordinary, and I find the original exceeds the description.

Hard. I was never so surprised in my life! He has quite confounded all my faculties!

Miss H. I never saw any thing like it; and a man of the world too!

Hard. Ay, he learned it all abroad.

Miss H. It seems all natural too him.

Hard. A good deal assisted by bad company, and a French dancing-master.

Miss H. Sure you mistake, papa! a French dancing-master could never have taught him that timid look—that awkward address—that bashful manner—

Hard. Whose look? whose manner, child?

Miss H. Mr. Marlow's! his mauvaise honte, his timidity, struck me at the first sight.

Hard. Then your first sight deceived you; for I think him one of the most brazen first sights that ever astonished my senses.

Miss H. Sure, Sir, you rally! I never saw any one so modest.

Hard. And can you be serious? I never saw such a bouncing, swaggering puppy since I was born. Bully Dawson was but a fool to him.

Miss H. Surprising! he met me with a respectful bow, a stammering voice, and a look fixed on the ground.

Hard. He met me with a loud voice, a lordly air, and a familiarity that made my blood freeze again.

Miss H. He treated me with diffidence and respect; censured the manners of the age; admired the prudence of girls that never laughed; tired me with apologies for being tiresome; then left the room with a bow, and, Madam, I would not for the world detain you.

Hard. He spoke to me as if he knew me all his life before. Asked twenty questions, and never waited for an answer. Interrupted my best remarks with some silly pun; and when I was in my best story of the duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene, he asked me if I had not a good hand at making punch. Yes, Kate, he asked your father if he was a maker of punch.

Miss H. One of us must certainly be mistaken.

Hard. If he be what he has shown himself, I'm determined he shall never have my consent.

Miss H. And if he be the sullen thing I take him, he shall never have mine.

Hard. In one thing then we are agreed—to reject him.

Miss H. Yes, but upon conditions. For if you should find him less impudent, and I more presuming; if you find him more respectful, and I more importunate—I don't know—the fellow is well enough for a man—Certainly we don't meet many such at a horse race in the country.

Hard. If we should find him so? But that's impossible. The first appearance has done my business. I'm seldom deceived in that.

Miss H. And yet there may be many good qualities under that first appearance. But as one of us must be mistaken, what if we go to make farther discoveries?

Hard. Agreed. But depend on't I'm in the right.

Miss H. And depend on't I'm not much in the wrong. [Exeunt.]

Enter TONY, running with a casket.

Tony. Ecod! I have got them. Here they are. My cousin Con's necklaces, bobs and all. My mother sha'n't cheat the poor souls out of their fortune, neither. O! my genius, is that you?

Enter HASTINGS.

Hast. My dear friend, how have you managed with your mother? I hope you have amused her with pretending love for your cousin, and that you are willing to be reconciled at last: our horses will be refreshed in a short time, and we shall soon be ready to set off.

Tony. And here's something to bear your charges by the way. [Giving the casket.] Your sweetheart's jewels. Keep them, and hang those, I say, that would rob you of one of them.

Hast. But how have you procured them from your mother?

Tony. Ask me no questions, and I'll tell you no fibs. I procured them by the rule of thumb. If I had not a key to every drawer in mother's bureau, how could I go to the alehouse so often as I do? An honest man may rob himself of his own at any time.

Hast. Thousands do it every day. But, to be plain with you, Miss Neville is endeavouring to procure them from her aunt this very instant. If she succeeds, it will be the most delicate way at least of obtaining them.

Tony. Well, keep them, till you know how it will be. But I know how it will be, well enough; she'd as soon part with the only sound tooth in her head.

Hast. But I dread the effects of her resentment, when she finds she has lost them.

Tony. Never you mind her resentment, leave me to manage that. I don't value her resentment the bounce of a cracker. Zounds! there they are. Morrice; prance. [Exit HASTINGS.]

Enter MRS. HARDCASTLE and MISS NEVILLE.

Mrs. H. Indeed, Constance, you amaze me. Such a girl as you want jewels! It will be time enough for jewels, my dear, twenty years' hence, when your beauty begins to want repairs.

Miss N. But what will repair beauty at forty, will certainly improve it at twenty, Madam.

Mrs. H. Yours, my dear, can admit of none. That natural blush is beyond a thousand ornaments. Besides, child, jewels are quite out at present. Don't you see half the ladies of our acquaintance, my lady Kill-day-light, and Mr. Crump, and the rest of them, carry their jewels to town, and bring nothing but paste and marcasites back.

Miss N. But who knows, Madam, but somebody that shall be nameless would like me best with all my finery about me?

Mrs. H. Consult your glass, my dear, and then see if, with such a pair of eyes, you want any better sparklers. What do you think, Tony, my dear, does your cousin Con want any jewels, in your eyes to set off her beauty!

Tony. That's as hereafter may be.

Miss N. My dear aunt, if you knew how it would oblige me.

Mrs. H. A parcel of old fashioned rose and table cut things. They would make you look like the court of king Solomon at a puppet-show. Besides, I believe I can't readily come at them. They may be missing, for aught I know to the contrary.

Tony. [Apart to MRS. HARDCASTLE.] Then why don't you tell her so at once, as she's so longing for them. Tell her they're lost. It's the only way to quiet her. Sav they're lost, and call me to bear witness.

Mrs. H. [Apart to TONY.] You know, my dear, I'm only keeping them for you. So, if I say they're gone, you'll bear me witness, will you? he, he, he!

Tony. Never fear me. Ecod! I'll say I saw them taken out with mine own eyes.

Miss N. I desire them but for a day, Madam. Just to be permitted to show them as relics, and then they may be locked up again.

Mrs. H. To be plain with you, my dear Constance, if I could find them, you should have them. They're missing I assure you! Lost, for ought I know; but we must have patience wherever they are.

Miss N. I'll not believe it! this is but a shallow pretence to deny me. I know they're too valuable to be so slightly kept, and as you are to answer for the loss.

Mrs. H. Don't be alarmed, Constance. If they be lost, I must restore an equivalent. But my son knows they are missing, and not to be found.

Tony. That I can bear witness to. They are missing, and not to be found, I'll take my oath on't.

Mrs. H. You must learn resignation, my dear; for though we lose our fortune, yet I should not lose our patience. See me, how calm I am.

Miss N. Ay, people are generally calm at the misfortunes of others.

Mrs. H. Now I wonder a girl of your good sense should waste a thought upon such trumpery. We shall soon find them; and, in the mean time, you shall make use of my garnets till your jewels be found.

Miss N. I detest garnets.

Mrs. H. The most becoming things in the world, to set off a clear complexion. You have often seen how well they look upon me. You shall have them. [Exit.]

Miss N. I dislike them of all things. You sha'n't stir—Was ever any thing so provoking, to mislay my own jewels, and force me to wear trumpery.

Tony. Don't be a fool. If she gives you the garnets, take what you can get. The jewels are your own already. I have stolen them out of her bureau, and she does not know it. Fly to your spark, he'll tell you more of the matter. Leave me to manage her.

Miss N. My dear cousin.

Tony. Vanish. She's here, and has missed them already. Zounds! how she fidgets and spits about like a Catharine wheel.

Enter MRS. HARDCASTLE.

Mrs. H. Confusion! thieves! robbers! We are cheated, plundered, broke open, undone.

Tony. What's the matter, what's the matter, mamma? I hope nothing has happened to any of the good family.

Mrs. H. We are robbed. My bureau has been broke open, the jewels taken out, and I'm undone.

Tony. Oh! is that all? Ha, ha, ha! By the laws, I never saw it better acted in my life. Ecod, I thought you was ruin'd in earnest, ha, ha, ha!

Mrs. H. Why, boy, I am ruined in earnest. My bureau has been broke open, and all taken away.

Tony. Stick to that! ha, ha, ha! stick to that; call me to bear witness.

Mrs. H. I tell you, Tony, by all that's precious, the jewels are gone, and I shall be ruined for ever.

Tony. Sure I know they're gone, and I am to say so.

Mrs. H. My dearest Tony, but hear me.—They're gone, I say.

Tony. By the laws, mamma, you make me for to laugh, ha, ha, ha! I know who took them well enough, ha, ha, ha!

Mrs. H. Was there ever such a blockhead, that can't tell the difference between jest and earnest. I tell you I'm not in jest, booby.

Tony. That's right, that's right: you must be in a bitter passion, and then nobody will suspect either of us. I'll bear witness that they are gone.

Mrs. H. Can you bear witness that you're no better than a fool? Was ever poor woman beset with fools on one hand and thieves on the other!

Tony. I can bear witness to that.

Mrs. H. Bear witness again, you blockhead you, and I'll turn you out of the room directly. My poor niece, what will become of her! Do you laugh, you unfeeling brute, as if you enjoyed my distress?

Tony. I can bear witness to that.

Mrs. H. Do you insult me, monster? I'll teach you to vex your mother, I will.

Tony. I can bear witness to that.

[Runs off; MRS. HARDCASTLE follows him.]

Enter MISS HARDCASTLE and MAID.

Miss H. What an unaccountable creature is that brother of mine, to send them to the house as an inn, ha, ha! I don't wonder at his impudence.

Maid. But what is more, Madam, the young gentleman, as you passed by in your present dress, asked me if you were the bar-maid? He mistook you for the bar-maid, Madam.

Miss H. Did he? Then as I live I'm resolved to keep up the delusion. Tell me, how do you like my present dress? Don't you think I look something like Cherry in the Beaux' Stratagem?

Maid. It's the dress, Madam, that every lady wears in the country, but when she visits or receives company.

Miss H. And are you sure he does not remember my face or person?

Maid. Certain of it.

Miss H. I vow I thought so; for though we spoke for some time together, yet his fears were such, that he never once looked up during the interview. Indeed if he had, my bonnet would have kept him from seeing me.

Maid. But what do you hope from keeping him in his mistake?

Miss H. In the first place, I shall be seen; and that is no small advantage to a girl who brings her face to market. Then I shall perhaps make an acquaintance; and that's no small victory gained over one who never addresses any but the wildest of her sex. But my chief aim is to take my gentleman off his guard, and like an invisible champion of romance, examine the giant's force before I offer to combat.

Maid. But are you sure you can act your part, and disguise your voice, so that he may mistake that, as he has already mistaken your person.

Miss H. Never fear me. I think I have got the true bar cant—Did your honour call?—Attend the Lion there—Pipes and tobacco for the Angel—The Lamb has been outrageous this half hour.

Maid. It will do, Madam, but he's here.

[Exit.]

Enter MARLOW.

Mar. What a bawling in every part of the house! I have scarce a moment's repose. If I go to the best room, there I find my host and his story. If I fly to the gallery, there we have my hostess with her courtesy down to the ground. I have at last got a moment to myself, and now for recollection. [Walks and muses]

Miss H. Did you call, Sir? did your honour call?

Mar. [Musing.] As for Miss Hardcastle, she's too grave and sentimental for me.

Miss H. Did your honour call?

[She still places herself before him, he turning away.]

Mar. No, child [Musing.] Besides, from the glimpse I had of her, I think she squints.

Miss H. I'm sure, I heard the bell ring.

Mar. No, no. [Musing.] I have pleased my father, however, by coming down, and I'll tomorrow please myself by returning.

[Takes his tablets and reads.]

Miss H. Perhaps the other gentleman called, Sir.

Mar. I tell you, no.

Miss H. I should be glad to know, Sir. We have such a parcel of servants.

Mar. No, no, I tell you. [Looks full in her face.] Yes, child, I think I did call. I wanted—I wanted—I vow, child, you are vastly handsome.

Miss H. O la, Sir, you'll make one ashamed.

Mar. Never saw a more sprightly, malicious eye. Yes, yes, my dear, I did call. Have you got any of your—a—what d'ye call it, in the house?

Miss H. No, Sir, we have been out of that these ten days.

Mar. One may call in this house, I find, to very little purpose. Suppose I should call for a taste, just by way of trial, of the nectar of your lips; perhaps I might be disappointed in that too.

Miss H. Nectar! nectar! that's a liquor there's no call for in these parts. French, I suppose. We keep no French wines here, Sir.

Mar. Of true English growth, I assure you.

Miss H. Then it's odd I should not know it. We brew all sorts of wines in this house, and I have lived here these eighteen years.

Mar. Eighteen years! why one would think, child, you kept the bar before you were born. How old are you?

Miss H. O! Sir, I must not tell my age. They say women and music should never be dated.

Mar. To guess at this distance, you can't be much above forty. [Approaching.] Yet nearer I don't think so much. [Approaching.] By coming close to some women they look younger still; but when we come very close indeed—

[Attempting to kiss her.]

Miss H. Pray, Sir, keep your distance. One would think you wanted to know one's age as they do horses, by mark of mouth.

Mar. I protest, child, you use me extremely ill. If you keep me at this distance, how is it possible you and I can ever be acquainted?

Miss H. And who wants to be acquainted with you? I want no such acquaintance, not I. I'm sure you did not treat Miss Hardcastle that was here awhile ago in this obstreperous manner. I'll warrant me, before her you look'd dash'd, and kept bowing to the ground, and talk'd, for all the world, as if you was before a justice of the peace.

Mar. 'Egad! she has hit it, sure enough. [Aside.] In awe of her, child? Ha, ha, ha! A mere awkward, squinting thing. No, no. I find you don't know me. I laugh'd, and rallied her a little; but I was unwilling to be too severe. No, I could not be too severe, curse me!

Miss H. O! then, Sir, you are a favourite, I find, among the ladies?

Mar. Yes, my dear, a great favourite. And yet, hang me, I don't see what they find in me to follow. At the ladies' club in town, I'm called their agreeable Rattle. Rattle, child, is not my real name, but one I'm known by. My name is Solomons. Mr. Solomons, my dear, at your service.

[Offering to salute her.]

Miss H. Hold, Sir, you were introducing me to your club, not to yourself. And you're so great a favourite there, you say?

Mar. Yes, my dear. There's Mrs. Mantrap, Lady Betty Blackleg, the Countess of Sligo, Mrs. Longhorns, old Miss Biddy Buckskin, and your humble servant, keep up the spirit of the place.

Miss H. Then it's a very merry place, I suppose?

Mar. Yes, as merry as cards, supper, wine, and old women can make us.

Miss H. And their agreeable Rattle, ha, ha, ha!

Mar. 'Egad! I don't quite like this chit. She looks knowing, methinks. [Aside.] You laugh, child!

Miss H. I can't but laugh to think what time they all have for minding their work or their family.

Mar. All's well, she don't laugh at me. [Aside.] Do you ever work, child?

Miss H. Ay, sure. There's not a screen or a quilt in the whole house but what can bear witness to that.

Mar. Odso! Then you must show me your embroidery. I embroider and draw patterns myself a little. If you want a judge of your work, you must apply to me. [Seizing her hand.]

Miss H. Ay, but the colours don't look well by candle-light. You shall see all in the morning.

[Struggles.]

Mar. And why not now, my angel? Such beauty fires beyond the power of resistance.—Pshaw! the father here! My old luck! I never nick'd seven that I did not throw aces ace three times following. [Exit.]

Enter HARDCASTLE, who stands in surprise.

Hard. So, Madam! So I find this is your modest lover. This is your humble admirer, that kept his eyes fixed on the ground, and only adored at humble distance. Kate, Kate, art thou not ashamed to deceive your father so?

Miss H. Never trust me, my dear papa, but he's still the modest man I first took him for: you'll be convinced of it as well as I.
