NOTA BENE.

Entered in accord with Congressional Act
In the District Clerk's Office, so please note the fact,
Of the State of Rhode Island, in language quite terse,
And withal inconvenient to weave into verse.
Of this we feel certain, Eighteen Sixty-nine
Are the figures that noted the year at the time.
So be it remembered 'tis the author's own function
To be ruined by "Fitz"—so beware an injunction.
And to all whom these presents with greeting may come A caution we give, though you may think it fun:
Don't meddle with this our poetical thunder;
'Tis best "Nitro G."—so beware of a blunder.
And now, lest this entry should not hold in verse, We'll put it in language more legal and terse;
So below see it printed in lawyer-like prose, Though we fancy our stanza more gracefully flows.

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1869, by GEORGE DOUGLAS BREWERTON, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the District of Rhode Island.

To
GEN. CHARLES COLLINS VAN ZANDT, OF NEWPORT, R. I.

DEAR COLLINS:—I never read a production of yours without a better understanding of what true poetry means. I confess that I envy the power with which your facile pen weaves into glowing fabrics the raw material of the brain. They need but one added charm, and find it in the oratorical grace with which, in the presence of an audience, your eloquence adorns the offspring of an ever genial and sympathetic heart.

As a token of my remembrance of our life-long friendship, I have ventured to dedicate to you this poem. If it find favor in your sight, it will more than compensate the labor of

Your sincere friend,

THE AUTHOR.

STUDIO, NEWPORT, R. I., October 26, 1869.

GRACE BEFORE MEAT.

“GRACE before meat,” if meat should be found ;

If not, the comparison falls to the ground,
And but for the freedom to tread on some toes, Our Preface perchance might be written in prose :

A “poetical license,”—yet when taken out,
Or under what law, is a matter of doubt.
Our subject is broad as the billows that fling Their arms round the green isle whose summer we sing,

Free as the air that humanity breathes,
High as the heaven, and deep as the seas ;
The old story still, as the centuries creep,— The ulcers of pride that lie festering deep

In the hearts of the careless, the giddy, and vain Who receive of their fellows, yet give not again, Whose lives are a vacuum nothing can fill, Forgetting they're only God's tenants at will, Stewards whom the Master each moment may call

To account for their talents, and render up all.
If with a free pen we appear to have sketched, Remember our subject is never far-fetched, For the journey is swift from the brain to the hand,

And many the fancies that rise at command ;
Nor think that we toil without purpose or plan,
As with critical vision our labor you scan ;
Though, were it allowed to apologize here, We'd endeavor to tickle your merciful ear
By pleading poor Modesty's ancient excuse, — Pen and ink out of gear and rusting for use.
Enough that we realize our work is half done,
And only regret it was ever begun.

And now for what we're about to receive,
May each reader prove grateful, nor suddenly leave

A repast to which all are freely invited, For our dishes, true snobs, are unused to be slighted ;

And your host, after proving and ardently pressing,

Might grieve to have wasted both dinner and blessing.

PRELUDE.

THINK not of summer dreams I sing,
Or on the high heroic wing
My Muse may hope to rise and soar Above the low and level floor Where Commonplace sees common things;
But though our little tea-bell rings
While others swing the tocsin loud,
That calls each worshipper to crowd
Some shrine where highest art shall raise New monuments their skill to praise,
We do our work with lance-like pen
To probe the hurts of Upper-ten,
And thus perchance the wound to cure
By letting out the cause impure.
O could my Muse "the giftie gie them To see themselves as ithers see them!"
But in this world we often find,
He sees the best who stands behind The mighty looking-glass of Fashion, That mirror ever stained by passion, Where envy, hate, and ceaseless strife Divorce the husband from the wife, Make home a hell and friends a curse, Then take the vices in to nurse.

FITZ POODLE AT NEWPORT.

AN INCIDENT OF THE SEASON.

YOUR hero may boast of a lofty line, Though his grandsire slipped from a scaffold, Ending his fall by a twist in the spine,
And a drop that e'en surgery baffled.
For the doctors discovered a fracture compound,
'Twixt the second and third of the vertebra found.
To give the story as told at the club,
By Fitz Poodle, the innocent martyr,
By way of reply to bitter MacSnub, Who delights in performing the Tartar.
"He was speaking a piece," though quite in the dark,
Having drawn on a night-cap by way of a lark;
But the carpenter fastened the floor in a way Which soon brought about the event of the day, For the scaffolding broke, and Poodle Grand-père
Was caught by a rope that hung dangling there.
But where by that stout cord he managed to swing,
Is to touch with rude hand on a delicate thing.

We are told he was talking in accents quite loud,
On topics befitting the place and the crowd, When the accident happened that silenced his tongue,
For all but Fitz Poodle declare he was hung.

At least he was buried, and Poodle James Peter,
The father of Fitz and a regular eater,
Was left a lone orphan and out of employ,
With a stomach and hunger,—bad things for a boy.

He was puzzled a little to sup and to dine, Having nothing to eat and abundance of time ;
So when Sirloin, the butcher and pork-packer too —

The fellow who sits in the red velvet pew — Offered Peter a place, and he might have done worse,

He preferred a full meal to a ride in the hearse.
Now Peter had ever an eye bright and keen,
A sharp eye for business, as soon will be seen,
For he managed old Sirloin to carve in a way That quite won the heart of one Mistress O'Flay, Half-sister to Sirloin, a widow to boot, Who called her first husband, when living, a brute.

But when he was dead, the case was reversed ;
She vowed that no babe was more tenderly nursed

Than her darling O'Flay, the dearest, the best —

Here up went her kerchief, and sobs drowned the rest.

Now this widow was buxom, and Peter was young,

With a fine pair of legs and a flattering tongue ;
And O'Flay had left money, a nice little sum, For he gambled in stocks, and, more singular, won.

If the lady was solid, why, so was her pelf ;
So Peter concluded to venture himself ;
Proposed, was accepted, and married of course, Yet but for her wealth would have sued for divorce ;

When — just as his trials had verged on despair —

Dame Poodle presented a son and an heir,
And then, in a highly considerate way, Took her leave of this world on the following day.

Old Poodle — we trust he will pardon the slip — Still talks of her virtues with tremulous lip ;
She had of this cold world so little of leaven, He had long felt the saint was a subject for heaven ;

Had expected to see her go up without wings, Till he grew quite resigned to the aspect of things.

So since his affliction it hardly seems strange That most people think he has met with a change.

Meanwhile young Poodle was cooling his color, And cutting his teeth without aid from his mother ;

While his father waxed rich, grew pompous and proud,

And forgot the old time when under a cloud.
But still there was something of shop in his way ;

He had dealt in cold cuts for many a day ;
His work had been slashing, through tendon and nerve,

Through brain and through sinew, his purpose to serve.

What wonder the habit should harden him still To forget the poor heart-strings he severed might thrill ?

But enough of old Poodle: he gathers his wealth ;

Let us hope that ere long he'll be gathered himself.

Fitz Poodle was weaned in a summary way, Though men at the club have offered to lay

A wager the fellow was still out to nurse.

They concede that his weakness is not of the purse,

And MacSnub has remarked that though simply a fool,

Our hero might learn in Necessity's school ;

That a doctor of old had suggested the way,

When he said, "Live on sixpence, and earn it each day."

But this is decided, that as to his head,
His brain-pan is soft as a new feather-bed, And his heart so defiled by the dross of his wealth,

That the man cannot even be true to himself.
Be this as it may, with his folly or vice,
And the world has enough of his kind to suffice, He stands as a type of a class who pretend To hold themselves higher than those they offend.

How Fitz Poodle passed safely through measles and rash,

And bragged to the boys of his pony and cash,
What progress he made in acquiring knowledge Of meanness at school and vices at college, How he wasted, and gambled, and sometimes did worse,

Are things much too common to weave into verse.

Suffice it to say that he grew up a man ;
We don't like the word, for it injures our plan ;
For a puppy is one thing, a man is another, Though Darwin may fancy the monkey a brother.

And now, as the reader perchance is a lady, We'll sketch from a photograph, taken by Brady, Of our hero arrived at the advent of twenty, —
A very ripe age if your greenbacks prove plenty ;
For life is a hot-house, where fruit may be forced,

Though many the blossom through rottenness lost.

Imagine a youth with carrotty hair,
A thin pair of legs, and the vacantest stare,
With a nose somewhat large, and withal slightly red, —

Perchance its complexion was caught from his head, —

With a weak crop of whiskers, quite English in style,

Whose care served their purpose, his time to beguile ;

But though nature proved chary and niggard in gift,

His tailor, more gracious, lent Poodles a lift ;
For his coats were unrivaled, his vests quite au fait,

And his breeches a wonder unmatched in their day.

'Tis said that the flower with least of perfume, Is most gorgeous in blossom, most brilliant in bloom ;

E'en so the Fitz Poodles put on to the back Each outer adornment, to make up the lack Of the incense arising from virtue and sense ;
In a word, shield their weakness with silly pretence.

Fitz Poodle's papa had a place by the sea,
A cottage ornée — he might have had three ;
For his gilt-paper virtues were known to the ring.

Each stock that he bulled was a promising thing ;

But alas for the holders who found him a bear :
When lord of the panic with truculent air,
The widow and fatherless pleaded in vain
To a heart that felt only the maxims of gain.

The season was spring, and the weather quite mild,

The heavens looked pure as a babe undefiled,
With slow drifting billows of feathery cloud, Whose breakers of pearl seemed to jostle and crowd,

As through the soft ether they floated away,
With here a bright island and there a blue bay ;
Fitz Poodle was passing a night at the club,
With Augustus Redower, a friend from the Hub, Whose legs led the German, an intricate maze,
Which he who attempts should look well to his ways.

Fitz Poodle begins, " Au Gus, do you know,
I think that to Newport this season we'll go ;
So drop us a line, and by Jove we will meet When we get the old gentleman out of the street ;

For summer 's the season, you see, for repose,
And business grows dull, as my governor knows ;
So we'll make up a party with Towzer and Fearing,

And bring down the blacks with the new patent gearing.

Then, if the old man is encouraging loans, We'll drop into Watson's and rattle the bones."' Redower assented, for dear Mrs. Aram, With two charming daughters, Carlotta and Fan,

Who suited his step in the dance to a hair,
Had taken a cottage, and meant to be there;
So the bargain was made, and the first of July Was fixed for their meeting ere Gus said good-by.

The roses of June found Fitz Poodle arrayed
In a travelling suit by his Schneider just made,
On the deck of a steamer, the Bristol, of course,
With good entertainment for biped and horse.
Next morning behold him arrived at the wharf,
With a carriage in waiting, in haste to be off To the villa suburban that looks o'er the deep, Where his night trip enhances the blessings of sleep.

The season advances; the church on the hill, Shut up for the winter, once more gets its fill Of sinners in satin, who flock to declare Their creed differs much from the clothing they wear;
For while they renounce all pomp and vainglory,
Their milliner's bill tells a far different story.
Still the singing is perfect, the music divine, Though some deem the Catholic better in time;
But when the dear pastor the pulpit ascends,

His manner so winning, all caviling ends,
And 'tis really delightful, when asked out to dine,
To feel that his blessing has prefaced the wine.
The Atlantic is open, the Ocean House too, And Cozzens buys stock of the tasteful and new For Dives, who comes bringing servants and all,
With daughters to flourish at party or ball, While old Newport puts forth her best foot to receive

The guests whom she welcomes for what they may leave.

Fitz Poodle had rested and got out his clothes,
And tried the last wash for his ruby-red nose,
When Redower arrived to open the ball ;
So they ordered the horses at Aram's to call.
They found the dear creatures at home when they came,

For Fan was Redower's particular flame ; While as to Fitz Poodle, they both knew full well,

He was reckoned a catch, as their father could tell ;

For Aram was anxious to get his girls married,
A hope that too often had sadly miscarried, For Carlotta was thirty, and Fannie had been Twenty-one to a day since the year she grew thin.

The damsels were dressed to suit the occasion,
In toilet so rich, we forbear the relation ;
For both were investments on sale for the season,

With trappings thrown in for an excellent reason, —

Accomplishments too; but 'twould lengthen our verse,

If the list of their extras we here should rehearse.

Suffice it to say they both simpered and smiled, While our gay cavaliers a brief hour beguiled
With small talk and flattery, gross and distasteful,

For of that which costs nothing we're apt to be wasteful.

And now, lest the reader find cause for complaint,

We'll pencil a sketch, which, though feeble and faint,

May serve to present these young ladies more fully,

Though Fitz Poodle declares they are "perfectly bully" —

A slangy expression we cannot indorse,
For we've heard the same title prefixed to a horse.

Carlotta was dark, and quite Spanish in style,
With a good set of teeth and perpetual smile, While Fannie, the younger, was shrewish and thin,

With nose retroussé and a long pointed chin.

'Tis said in affinities opposites meet, —

In which case a row is a positive treat, —

That differing souls love each other the best,
And only the jarring by Hymen are blest.
Be this as it may, Gus and Fan seem united, While Fitz with Carlotta is greatly delighted.
In short, he was smitten, poor sensitive youth,
No novel event, if we publish the truth,
For our hero was spoony; yet butterfly bred, He would sip of each flower that grew on the bed;

Yet of woman's devotion, her love, and her trust, He knew scarcely more than a worm of the dust;

For his soul was a cistern a dew-drop might fill,

And his heart in himself had its tenant at will.

'Twas proposed and agreed that the party should reach

At ten on the morrow the brown bathing beach, Where, with marvellous costume, and bluey-white lip,

The children of fashion go down for their dip.
Fitz Poodle and Gus would have shortened the time,

Discussing the theme as they sat o'er their wine, But the hours go round in the old-fashioned way,

And heed no petition for haste or delay.

Yet the morn came at last, and the equipage too,
The ladies in white and the servants in blue;
And great was the flutter amid the gay throng,

When close to the billows the carriage was borne,
With a glitter of panels and swift-flashing wheels, While Fitz Poodle full many a tender glance steals,

And makes an engagement for croquet and tea With charming Carlotta, his dark vis-à-vis.

The tickets are purchased, and houses obtained In the height of the season not easily gained ;
So straight to their shelter the party repair
To shed all their clothing and part of their hair ;
For when to the beach Beauty goes on a train, She must part with her locks ere she trusts to the main.

'Tis well that poor Love is proverbially blind, For 'twixt the rude sea and the blustering wind, Pale Beauty, disheveled and stripped of each art,
Is surely no sight for a sensitive heart ;
As witness the show from morning till noon
Of belles reft of chignon, of panier, and bloom, Reduced to the limits by Nature provided,
Not always becoming the thin and slab-sided.

But now, from their boxes emerging, we see Our party all ready equipped for the sea.
Good heavens! Can these be the queens of croquet,
Or those the spruce beaux of bewitching Broadway ?

The ladies are robed in flame-colored red,
Quite paling the fires of Poodle's soft head,

With a trimming of braid, three rows on the skirt,

And trousers to match, like a Bloomerite flirt ;

But our hero's thin legs in a blue flanel case,

Resemble a monkey's got up for a race,

Or a skeleton form from a medical school,

While Gus plays the clown like a natural fool.

The footmen both suicker, the coachman looks grim,

But relaxes a little as Poodle goes in.

With a run, and a skip, and a faint little scream,

In a few moments more 'mid the crowd they are seen,

Who go bobbing like corks on the crest of the sea,

Or duck when the incoming breaker swings free.

What wonder we laugh as we stand on the shore !

You doctored divine might inspire our awe,

But now, in old breeches and battered sea-hat,

You can only remark his exuberant fat,

As, like an old porpoise, he awkwardly blows

(We are sketching from fancy) his bibulous nose.

How they danced, how they shouted, and tum-bled about,

Were long to relate, but at length they came out ;

The ladies cerulean, but not in their clothes,

And Fitz P. with a chill from his head to his toes.

Then swift to their houses they speedily fly ;
Let us hope that no curious cynic is nigh,
To scan the fair creatures with critical eye.

At length from their closets once more they emerge :

Can these be the figures we saw in the surge?
Has Fannie grown fat, and Carlotta found bloom, Though ghastly before as a ghost from the tomb?
Now into the carriage and back to the hill Ere the white flag go down, and the men take their fill

Of breasting the ocean in Nature's own dress ; A garb that the poor might have reason to bless,

Were the climate more mild, or the audience less,

But gone out of fashion since Eve took to working,

And sewed up her fig-leaves by way of a curtain.

The season has crept to the hōt August days, When the landscape lies soft 'neath the silvery haze,

And o'er the blue billows the gray vapors creep On the wings of the breeze from the wastes of the deep.

What wonder old Newport attracts the gay throng!

What wonder the weary ones ardently long To escape the gay city's sirocco and heat,
The turmoil of business, the crowd of the street,
The jar of its bustle, the strife of its ways, Its long, sultry nights, and its thrice fervent days,

To find by our bright waves the dolce-far-niente,
And a place to deplete if your cash be too plenty.

To return to our mutton — the Frenchman is right,

'Tis a phrase for our hero close-fitting and tight;
A poor silly sheep to be speedily shorn, Though few for his shearing may honestly mourn.
But a truce to this trifling; so lest we should tire,

We beg to present Mrs. Snobby Pariah —
A lady substantial in person and dollars, Though perhaps not the best of grammatical scholars.

As a crusty old fellow was heard to remark (There's somebody always to snap and to bark), He'd venture the thought, though hastily thrown,
"She spoke every language excepting her own."
But an ample excuse, we know, will be voted,
When Mrs. Pariah's beginnings are quoted.
A chimney-sweep's daughter, in factory life She worked as a maid, ere they made her a wife;

And 'tis said when Pariah popped out his proposal,

Putting himself at her instant disposal,
She took twenty-four hours the case to decide 'Twixt the dressmaker's trade and the wreath of a bride.

It seems her decision turned out for the best,
For Pariah waxed rich, and good luck did the rest,

While Mrs. Pariah, in fashion's gay crowd, Sailed a frigate, saluting in style rather loud,
With colors, and streamers, and other gay things,
Not to mention a hat with a garnish of wings.
But a dash of the factory hangs round her still,
A flavor e'en cash cannot banish at will,
As fawned on, and flattered, and flurried along,
The pleasant amusement and jest of the throng, She shakes out her feathers, and turns up her nose,

Like a pig when the wind of the hurricane blows ;

Ah ! little she thinks, as she gives herself airs, That the low "common people," at whom she thus stares,

Have a way of remembering things of the past,
And this sort of style makes it likely to last.

Now Mrs. Pariah — old P. was just nothing, Save a bank and a butt for continual bluffing — Determined to give, perhaps for that reason,
A fête to eclipse every ball of the season.
The cards were all out, and Fitz Poodle invited ;
Of the Arams and Redower neither were slighted.

The thing proved successful ; Pariah displayed A grace that quite rivaled her favorite maid ; Though the coachman declared, " Our old woman was looking
As red round the gills as if she'd been cooking."

But 'tis not with Pariah our Muse has to do ;
We have chosen a hero, and hope to prove true ;

So leave to your fancy each full matinée,
The concerts by night and the boating by day,
The music and dust of the drive to the Fort,
With other diversions, for cash to be bought,
To all their gay doings persistently dumb, Though the fête of Pariah die sad and unsung.

In a spot well defended in flank and in rear, Where the coyest of maids could have nothing to fear,

And a lover might " pop," if he felt so inclined,
Nor dread some impertinent puppy behind,
There, there in that bower, with blossoms agleam, Like Love 'mid the roses, Fitz Poodle was seen ; Nor alone did he sit, but close pressed to his side

Sat Carlotta, his promised and possible bride ; For the girl was no fool, and had tickled his brain,

No difficult task when 'tis shallow and vain,
And stirred the small heart that just matched with his head,

Till the fellow forgot that its color was red.
In short, he was led like a pup by his chain ;
She was training her Poodle with might and with main,

To fetch and to carry, and even to beg, Though, unlike Columbus, 'twas not her first egg.

She had practiced before in more difficult cases,
And laid in a stock of emotion and graces — Could weep in a hurry, or get up a fit ;
We hope that the biter may never be bit.

For a while let us wander away from the pair To Redower and Fan, who are taking the air Where a nice little terrace looks over the sea, In a place made for two, but too little for three.
He stoops, and she listens with eyelids downcast ;

The look on her face would be pleasant to last,
A something that lights it, as if from within — Love's own magic lantern, when not made of tin.
His words are quite broken, but still we may guess

The depth of devotion he seeks to express.
There's a language full common, and old as the world,

Comprehended wherever a flag is unfurled ;
There's no mountain so high, no valley so deep, Where that tongue may not move us to smile or to weep.

'Tis the language unspoken of lips and of eyes,

The first one e'er born, and the last one that dies ;
The story of Eden, that never grows old, Yet yields nothing new, though a thousand times told.

'Twill be seen that our party have somewhat progressed Since we saw them afloat on old Ocean's rude breast,
Or rather adrift, with a wave for a pillow, And a cool bathing-tub in the trough of the billow ;
But boating, and driving, and walks on the cliff,
Not to mention their daily matutinal dip,
Had brought the affair to this fortunate close, Notwithstanding poor Poodle's exuberant nose ;
But Carlotta had scruples, in spite of papa, Not to speak of the lectures received from mamma,
Ere she yielded her charms to even a catch, Though all deemed Fitz Poodle an excellent match.
Still, in spite of her fondness for horses and dash,
He gained his fair charmer at last by a smash —
A regular breakdown — unknown e'en to Fan, Whose principal agent of course was a man ;
A Count, with a ribbon and arrogant air, From Turkey, or Texas, or Tophet knows where,

With snaky black eyes and a twisted moustache, Whose debts were apparent, more so than his cash,
Who fished for Carlotta, and baited his hook — For to do the Count justice he talked like a book —
With romance and flattery, commingled with tales
Of hardships and exile, of battles and gales.

So Carlotta was won, the elopement all planned, But the Count came in haste his ring to demand,
When at the last moment he suddenly found His hopes of her fortune all dashed to the ground:
For old Aram had been a lame duck in his day,
And living on credit don't generally pay.

Meanwhile poor Carlotta had given her heart ; Though artful and tricky, the tear-drops would start,

When she thought of the man — a barber at home —

With whom she was willing the wide world to roam.

'Tis pity some pedagogue, versed in rattan, Could not give a hint to that no-a-Count man,
For a fellow who chatters and swindles by rule, Should learn of the rod in Severity's school.

Thus Poodle was blessed through his barber-ous rival,

At least when she found him beginning to trifle,

For a maid disappointed is willing to choose Where before she determined to flout and refuse ;

But alas for the swain who a vacuum fills,
As a possible cure for positive ills !

So the ladies were wooed, not " married and a',"
For as yet the affair was unknown to papa — Not Aram indeed, who would ne'er have objected,

But one with whom Fitz was more closely connected, —

For James Peter was absent, with men of the ring,

To get up a corner, and make a sure thing ;

'Twas true a few thousands would lose, but who cares ?

What are Poverty's groans to the bulls and the bears ?

So he'd gone with his friends to manipulate gold,

And smash the poor sinners left out in the cold.
For 'twas thought if the Government cash was controlled,

'Twould pay for the keen ones to buy it and hold

Till it rose to the tune of a hundred per cent., When the bulls would unload at the top of their bent,

While the market was stocked at their sovereign pleasure,

Or kept short of funds in Custom House treasure ;

But to do the thing well, there were wires to pull,

A Bear to be trained, and likewise a Bull, —

An uncertain menagerie e'en at the best,

The curse of our country, a national pest ;

Moreover, 'twould help if the President's fame Could be tarnished awhile by the use of his name,

And a certain great dealer in steamboats and stocks

Tie up all the gold by that safest of locks, —

The promise that Grant should not hammer the ring

When the traps were all baited and ready to spring.

But our Muse may not dwell on the pumping and sounding ;

Let the rogues lay their plans, and Grant do the pounding.

So back to our lovers we go with a fling,
And farewell awhile to the men of the ring.

Their courting went on in the old fashioned way,
With dancing by night, and coquetting by day ;
'Tis strange, while in most things the world is progressing,

No new patent's out in the way of caressing ;
For on Adam and Eve we may hardly improve ;
'Tis the old story still, though the centuries move ;

So for little endearments, and sweet honeyed words,

With billings and cooings, — we quote from the birds, —

We leave them to fancy, no mighty exertion, When most people take to this kind of diversion.

'Mid other amusements 'twas planned they should go

For a trip to the Lime Rocks, and possible row —

Should Miss Ida prove gracious, and winds gently blow —

In the Rescue, a boat by that heroine won,

As a sort of reminder of what she had done, For saving twelve lives — though one was a fleece, —

Pulling them out at a hundred apiece.

We don't mean to say that she did it for gain,
But this being written, 'tis well to explain, — That folks came by thousands to question and stare,

To fill the small parlor, and even the stair,
And beset the poor girl by night and by day ;
Till, weary and sick, she was going away,
And then gave a pitiful thousand in all,
To pay her for working through summer and fall ;

For the life-saving business proved easier far,
Than playing the public's particular star.

The day was well chosen, the breezes in tune,
And the ladies looked sweet as the roses of June ;

So lest their arrangements with others might clash,

Fitz Poodle had hired a boat of old Ash,
A captain renowned in the little craft way,
For sailing "Ye Maidens" o'er billow and bay.
Then quick to the landing, in haste to embark,
Our party all drove, in the mood for a lark ;
For though timid on water, the girls seldom fail

With laughter and shout to get into a gale.
There were bundles and baskets of grub to be shipped,

There were shrieks if the sail-boat was suddenly tipped,
With just the least blushing when called to disclose Of a neat-fitting gaiter much more than the
toes ;
For their ankles were good, though their figures were bad, —
A promise unfilled that's decidedly sad ;
For 'tis Nature's own outward and visible sign,
The show-window card, if the form be divine ;
For even the hand may be judged by the foot ;
If the gauntlet be little, why so is the boot.
But enough of æsthetics ; while the gay party start,
We'll bring to a period our lecture on art.

At length they are off, with a cheer and a shout,
And a waving of kerchiefs that fluttered about ;
With the wind right abaft to the Lime Rocks they ran,
But still kept their course as suggested by Fan, Intending to coast by Conanicut's shore, And, unless the young ladies should deem it a bore,
To visit old Beaver Tail Light, and then stop On their way back to town at Miss Ida's small dock.
How the visit was made, how Fitz acted silly, How Fannie turned sick, and Carlotta felt chilly, How Redower's legs got entwined in a rope

That almost extinguished the German's best hope,
We doubt not were written by Ash in his log;
But this much we know, they were caught in a fog,
With a thin driving mist and a spatter of rain,
A fact by the Arams remembered with pain;
For bonnets cost money, and when short of cash,
To boat in your best is decidedly rash.

Now on their return 'twas discussed and approved,
And a vote of the house was accordingly moved,
That on the next night, at the Ocean House hop,
All parties should meet at the party to stop, Till each took a turn, and perhaps a turnover, In which case an action would soon lie for trover,
In that maze so divine of twisting and squirming, —
A giddy go round if the pupil be learning.
But the heads of our lovers, though silly and weak,
Would have scorned to complain, though they danced for a week; Though stupid enough where the brain had a hand in,
“At least in their legs they'd a strong understanding.”

At ten of the clock, on the evening appointed,
Our beaux, by their barbers all newly anointed, Drove up to the Ocean House steps with a whirl,

Each fully content with his favorite girl.
The Arams caused quite a sensation that night, Though the ladies declared them a horrible fright ;

For Carlotta was robed in ruby red silk,
And Fannie in satin the color of milk ;
Their get-up was stunning ; e'en Mrs. Pariah, Whose head wore a helmet suggestive of fire, Confessed herself vanquished when Fannie appeared

With Augustus Redower, all neck-tie and beard.

'Twas a scene for a painter, at least a reporter, Or one not too chary of sister or daughter,
To view the girls languish, and see the men squeeze,

While brothers and fathers looked on at their ease ;

But alas for the husband by jealousy damned, Watching his wife by each roué eye scanned, While her points and her paces are fully discussed,

And not even her character suffered to rust.
God help the world ! if mothers and wives Are to waste in such follies the morn of their lives,

While duties neglected cry loudly at home,

And the babe in its cradle makes sorrowful moan.

Yet steadily sweeping the fashion tide still Flows through the long hall with its tremulous thrill,

Till the night air grows heavy and faint with perfume,

And the dancers seem flowers of tropical bloom, With diamonds like dew-drops to hang on each belle, —

Not all of them paid for, as jewelers tell.

And the waltz! O, that wonderful waltz! where the heels

Of thrice active Redower made magical reels, Till a boarder declared — the impudent lubber — His legs were a compound of breeches and rubber;

While Carlotta, with dark flowing hair, went the pace,

With soft sliding step, and each languishing grace,

Though her eyes caught full many an amorous glance,

As sustained by Fitz Poodle, she swept through the dance;

And Fannie, who feels she is looking her best In the arms of Redower seems perfectly blest.

Of Bullion the banker, with velvet and squint,
The satirical pen might flow without stint, — Whose horses and flunkies, bright buttons and bays,

Quite rival the circus in various ways ;
For the clown seldom rides with his roystering crew, While in Bullion's big wagon he's always on view.

'Tis quite a sensation to see them dash by,
Though some view the turn-out with critical eye.
At the footmen, at least, no cynic should frown, As, with buttons beplastered, and coat-tails hung down,

Their livery aids to prevent the mistake, More frequent than pleasant, of those who might take

The man for the master, and thus spoil the plan Of the party who ride in this small caravan.

'Tis said that the dash is all on the street,
That the servants complain there is little to eat,
That the cook finds her reckoning kept to a dot,
And woe to the clerk who a ledger should blot.
But enough of our Bullion ; we cherish the name,

And expect to subscribe to his posthumous fame,
By placing a statue, perhaps in the Park,
At which no impertinent puppy may bark, (Near the one by our princely Belmont just erected,

In which, like its donor, no flaw is detected,) Whose brass so enduring, or gray island stone, For slights of the past should amply atone ;
And while we'd not dictate, or seem to command,

We'd suggest to the artist, a wide open hand;
 But whether extended to give or receive,
 To those who best know him we willingly leave.
 An inscription might follow, both plain and terse,
 If fifty per cent. could be woven in verse.
 Yet the lines we annex might be made to suffice, Though unworthy the theme they are truthfully nice :

IN MEMORIAM.

Here lies— how appropriate— Bullion the banker,
 For whom all who miss him persistently hanker;
 So devoted a husband, so tender, so true,
 In an infidel age was refreshing to view;
 As a master unrivaled, forbearing, and kind,
 To his debts ever prompt, to his dues almost blind;
 This marble, put up by his friends of the street, Bears witness his spirit was gracious and sweet;
 Enough— be it written in letters de oro, “Hic jacet vir nulla non donandus lauro.”

Thus much of description— and less might have done, But 'tis hard to leave off when once you've begun—
 Is meant as a preface, though not very brief,
 To a new episode of our subject in chief.

Mrs. B. gave a party quite striking and new,
To flutter each fop on the long avenue ;
For tableaux vivants were the principal treat, Where the faces make up for the absence of feet.

We don't mean the feet that bipeds must walk in,
But the feat that's involved in ranting and talking ;

A very bad jest, and as badly expressed ;
We refer you to Miller (not Hugh) for the rest.
To this party exclusive our friends were invited, With the Count, and some Englishman recently knighted,

With other bright stars of the upper-ten world, That realm recherche, all beflooned and becurled.

So our lovers decided, blow high or blow low,
To the Bullions' grand party they'd certainly go.
Moreover, Carlotta and Fitz were to take A part in the tableau intended to make The sensation par excellence, high and supreme ; Let us hope the dénouement may realize their dream.

The picture referred to involved a live goose, Whose uproar saved Rome from fagot and noose ;
For such were the horrors, and worse, of a sack,
When the enemy crept to their midnight attack.
For the fowl caught a glimpse of some form that looked ill,

Then cackled so loudly, the guard on the hill, Aroused by the clamor, sprang quick to his feet,

And forced the armed foe to a speedy retreat ; Though the story be new to boys fresh from college,

'Tis a trite one to graybeards in classical knowledge.

For further particulars, apply to Liddel, Who to honor the goose which once cackled so well,

Spins a yarn rather tough, and quite hard to believe,

Of some soldiers so pious they saw fit to leave
To a goddess, one Juno, by way of a treat, A fine flock of fowls, though they'd nothing to eat.

Yet we fancy no priest of her temple grew thin, Though to dine off of goose were a capital sin.
So the scene was selected, but only the goose Was permitted his voluble tongue to let loose, While the rest of the figures stood speechless and dumb,

For the better inspection of all who might come ;
With a background of sentries alarmed or asleep,

Where a maiden and matron should silently weep, Parts left to Carlotta, and Mrs. Aram ; While Fitz Poodle played goose as instructed by Fan.

How he practiced and cackled until he was hoarse,

And studied from nature, are matters of course,
With an old speckled bird exciting his dander,

Till he fairly wore out the unfortunate gander,
Not to mention a mask like a huge feather bed,
With a yellowish bill, and a long goosey head.

The evening came round, and the audience too; Carlotta wears tunic of wonderful hue,
In longitude scant, like the "Ledger's" last text,
"The rest of this tail will be found in our next."
While the Count as her backer, with buckler and bill, Stood for Manlius roused from his sleep on the hill.

But the goose after all was the star of the night, Till, sad to relate, to our hero's great fright,
His false head fell off, and his real one appeared,
With the faint English whiskers by way of a beard ;

While between, like a lantern that hangs in a bush,
You could see his eyes peep, and his ruby nose blush.

The curtain fell quick, mid a burst of applause;
But alas for Fitz Poodle, the innocent cause, Who, while cursing his stars, and unfortunate luck,

Was christened anew, the Red-headed Duck.
So ended the farce, and Carlotta retired,
An event by our hero extremely desired ;
For to wait as a butt when you came butt to shoot,

Is insult and injury added to boot.

Our story has lingered too long by the way ;
We haste to conclude without further delay :
An elopement was planned the world to deceive,
Not that Aram papa would exceedingly grieve ;
But as Poodle James P. was just then Major

Ursa,

The job was confided in quiet to Curser ;
No flourish of trumpets or flourish of tongues,
No bills for trousseau to bring about duns ;
But a quiet affair, with a witness to prove They stood for each other, — their promise to love.

So the bargain was made, and the articles sold, Depending, alas, on a corner in gold, Though of this the young ladies are yet to be told ;

But both of them promise to take and to keep,
While Fannie alone looks ready to weep ;
For Carlotta seems iced, with a curl on her lip —

She had talked with the Count ere she ventured the trip.

But now before Heaven, “in sickness and health,”

’Neath poverty’s frown, or the fullness of wealth, “Till death them do part,” she vows she will cling,

To what she well knows is a poor brainless thing.

Will her heart keep the vow that her lips doth record ?

Will the spirit find rest that so lately hath warred ?

Ask not of the future its secrets to tell — But hark to the sound of the steamer's last bell.

They are off, but their fancies take different ways :

While the Poodles go North, on Niagara to gaze, Augustus considers the air of "The Hub," Not to mention his father — ah, there comes the rub, —

Might require his presence at least to disclose
The match as yet secret, and under the rose.
And now ere we drop them for aye from our story,

We'll sum them up briefly like "old Mother Morey."

His father declined the pair to support,
And even Redower's allowance cut short;
So he proves that extremes may frequently meet,
By working his jaws through the play of his feet;
In a word, he's turning his legs to account,
And now receives pupils to any amount,
With Mrs. Redower, who helps fill the purse; But lately her spirits have changed for the worse,

Though expecting a pupil, a lively one too,
For whose better reception she now has in view
A neat little wardrobe, quite small at the best,
With worked under-clothes and diminutive vest;

At which, while the fiddle is going without,
She patiently toils with some little doubt,
If business should fail, or matters grow worse
What figure Augustus might cut as a nurse.

Meanwhile the Fitz Poodles are off on a train,
A double one too, though the meaning is plain, They have rolled through the Sound on the Admiral's boat,

With music to keep you awake while afloat, Where Fisk reigns omnipotent, great in his wealth;

He has dealt in his gold till he's gilded himself, While his virtues reflected shine out in the brass,

Which begins with the Captain, and ends with the gas.

Quite natural too, for we seldom go far
On a journey by rail, or a trip with a wife, Without that slight swerving so common in life,
Which is seen on the stage in "Family Jars,"
And is equally felt in "A Ride on the Cars."
But Niagara is reached with its thundering roar;
A carriage obtained; they stand at the door Of a first-class hotel, where Poodle goes in,
In clothes superfine and a large diamond pin, Despite of Carlotta, who fain would repress,
With a taste better bred, his monkeyfied dress.
So behold them all settled, yet strange to relate,
The Count reached the town by a train rather late,

And more singular far, "had happened to glance

At their registered names—a fortunate chance," Which enabled that snaky-eyed exile to take A room for the present,— "indeed he might make

His stay quite as long as the Poodles should stop ; "

Then glanced at Carlotta, who blushed and spoke not.

So the time sped along. Fitz Poodle soon found His enjoyment consisted in circling round, Mid billiards and bars, with horses and grooms, While the Count and Carlotta would chat in his rooms.

At length when his purse is depleted and low,
He is driven by need to James Peter to go ;
So sits down to pencil a note to "mon pere," Who thus far had honored the drafts of his heir.

He wrote, "I dare say you're astonished to see,

And wonder why I at Niagara should be ;
But in fact, my Paternal, I've just settled down,
And cut all the vices, so low, of the town,—
You know the old rule if a rake should reform, He makes the best husband that ever was born ;

If this should prove true, my Carlotta is blessed, But send me a thousand, and don't mind the rest.

I'll drop in ere long, in a sociable way (By by, old Gov.) when convenient to stay, But just now Carlotta don't care for the sea ;
With love from my spouse, your devoted Fitz P."
To this came an answer like telegram terse,
" I can't send the money, Fitz Poodle, I'm burst ;
I leave by the steamer ; my margin's rubbed out ;
You must shift for yourself ; I can't e'en give my route."

Fitz Poodle was ruined ; bad news travels fast ;
'Tis vain to repent of extravagance past ;
But was it not worse that his wife should elope With the Count, and her jewels, his ultimate hope ?

Fitz Poodle was missed ; 'twas supposed that he fell,

But of this no observer the story could tell ;
Yet certain it is that his body was found Where the waltz of the whirlpool goes merrily round.

It may be the man, though erring and wild, Deep down in his heart kept one well undefiled, The love he had staked on his false wife, and lost,

To leave him a wreck on the wave tempest tossed,

Till despairing of life, and forgetful of God,
He sought a cold pillow beneath the green sod,
With coward heart hoping in rest of the grave
To escape a disaster he dared not to brave.

And Carlotta the perjured — how fares it with her?
Has Memory no power that false soul to stir; Has Conscience no hold on the heart that so lied
To the husband who honestly made her his bride?
Though polluted e'en then by the serpent's foul breath,
She vowed to prove faithful, and true to the death.
Though so near with her lover, she heard not the doom
Of the mate left to perish in blackness of gloom, While she found with the Count a poor dwelling beside
The river that sweeps with Niagara's full tide.
She was walking far down by the brink of the stream,
In idle mood watching its bright eddies gleam, When the wave flung a corpse on the shore at her feet, Tossing the dead arm as if it would greet With a gesture of welcome the foul faithless wife,
Who a brief space before had caressed it in life.
The shock was too great, and reason dethroned,
For the sin of the past, if it might be atoned.
Yet ever in madness she walks by the stream,

And sees the pale corpse with its hollow eyes gleam,
While the white ghostly fingers seem beckoning still,
Clutching her own with their terrible thrill ;
For the spoiler who now should have guarded her best, Leaves his victim 'mid strangers to rave or to rest,
And goes with the jewels which most he could prize, —
For purity ne'er was a gem in his eyes ;
The flower once gathered, was soon thrown aside,
For he valued the widow e'en less than the bride ;
But fled with his gains — the tale is of old, —
A slave to his lust, and still more to his gold.

Though Justice moves slowly, she's sure in the end ;
As witness an "invite" the Count has to spend A few years to come at a quiet retreat, Where every arrangement, though simple, is neat,
And ill-disposed people kept out by a grating,
Are constantly watched by servants in waiting ;
For the host is so jealous he never can bear That his guests should feel lonely while taking the air.
So a careful companion is always provided,
To whose constant attention the inmate's confided,

As clothed in a uniform, coarse but complete,
He shuffles along with his iron-clad feet.
An order of merit he fain would decline,
Were talking permitted by word or by sign.
Moreover, the Count has been trying the bathing, Though greatly opposed to the cutting and shaving.

GRACE AFTER MEAT.

THE vision has fled ; like a dream of the night
The actors and actresses passed out of sight ;
The drop curtain falls, and my fancy forms melt, Like the nebulous stars of the lacteal belt, When the day dawn creeps coldly above the dark hill,

And the breath of the morning the night vapors thrill.

Nor fancy the figures my wand has thus raised,
To be characters living, on which you have gazed.

They are met with each day in city or mart,
The silly in head, and corrupted in heart.

Nor suppose that the poor and the mean are exempt,

That 'tis only to Lazarus talents are lent
Of justice and purity, honor and truth, Abiding in age, as implanted in youth.

All these may be found mid the wealthy and learned ;

God heeds not the altar where incense is burned ; Though the ceuser be jeweled, or hewn from the stone,

The All-seeing regards the oblation alone.

There are hands ever open by riches made full, While the poorer man's purse his heart-strings may pull;

There is meanness in low life as well as in high,
The proud, scornful lip, and the arrogant eye.
We are all of us failing; e'en Charity needs The prayer "Help me, Lord," as the saint tells her beads.

Then this be our motto, mid folly and pride, Remember the mansion we're walking beside,
Whose roof is of sod, and its fashion of old,
With earth for a pillow, and dust to enfold, Where the night is unbroken, the season the same,

And the sleeper unmindful of honor or shame.
Then pause for a moment, in Fashion's gay tide, In the mansions you build by the blue water
side;

There's rebuke in each billow that breaks 'neath the cliff,

There's a tremulous story on Ocean's white lip,
As it falls into foam, and the wild waters moan, For it speaks of an Ocean more vast than its own, —

A sea that is shoreless, yet silent and still,
To which we go down, let us strive as we will;
Where the rich and the poor, the high and the low,

Are lost mid its solemn mysterious flow;
Where humanity meets unstripped of its pride, Save its record with God, and nothing beside.
