I crave leave, with all humility and respect, to address you and Madam Ellis, and with the utmost submission and concern, do humbly beg your pardons for the fears and surprise my misfortunes reduced me to put you and the children into, whose cries moved so much compassion in me that I had not power to pursue with any rigour my desperate designs, which your ladyship must have perceived by the consternation I was struck into on a sudden. My sole intention was, if I could have got £50 to settle myself in a public house, and to take up an honest course of life, and do own at best it is a very heinous crime. Yet, madam, you will recollect after what manner I treated you, and at the same time consider the methods taken by others on the like occasion. This necessity I was drove to, by adhering to a certain master I lately served, and to obey his wicked and pernicious commands, in following his wicked and pernicious counsels, brought me to poverty, and consequently to this unhappy state I now labour under, and was become almost as much as himself, the scorn and hatred of mankind. I say, madam, if you will be so good as to consider all these unhappy circumstances, and that necessity admits of no contradiction, they will, I am persuaded, inspire compassion in generous souls (a character you both deservedly bear); and as a fellow-creature, I beg mercy at your ladyship's hands, by signing a petition to the Recorder for me, to the end, he may be induced to make a favourable report, and thereby move his most sacred Majesty to clemency, by the sentence to some other corporal punishment, and shall dedicate the rest of my days in praying for both your happiness and prosperity in this world, and eternal felicity and bliss in that to come, and crave leave, with due deference, madam, to subscribe myself,
Your ladyship's most devoted, Afflicted humble servant,
John Everett

The Ordinary of Newgate, in the account he has given of this prisoner, has drawn as bad a character as he is able, and in order to it, has gathered together all the ill-terms he could think of, even though some of them are contrary to one another. The truth is, that the fellow in himself had abundance of ill-qualities, with some good ones, and especially good nature of which he had a very large share. Lewd women were what brought him to his ruin, for to their company he continually addicted himself, and with his low intrigues amongst them is the book I have mentioned stuffed from one end to the other. As to religion, it is certain he had very little of it before he was confined, so it is not very likely that he should make any great proficiency while he remained there. He was careless, indeed, under his misfortunes, but did not give himself up to any loose or profane expressions, but on the contrary attended at Chapel with decency at least, if not with devotion.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Some attempts were made to save his life, by engaging him to make discoveries in an affair of high concern, but all was ineffectual, and he suffered on the 20th of February, 1729-30, with less apprehension than might have been expected from a man under his unhappy circumstances. The executioner, to put the prisoner sooner out of his pain, jumped upon his shoulders, and thereby broke the rope, but he was soon tied up again, and there remained until the rest were cut down.

At the time of his execution, he was forty-four years of age or thereabouts.

February 28: Henry Knowland and Thomas Westwood, footpads, were hanged on the Tyburn gallows outside London.²⁸⁰

Henry Knowland was the son of a father of the same name who was a butcher. He received tolerably good education at school, and was brought up by his father to his own business; but he was of a lewd disposition, continually running after whores, keeping lewd company, gaming and drinking until he was able neither to stand nor go. He married his first cousin, who had formerly been the wife of Neeves, the evidence. It seems this very Knowland had been put into Whitechapel gaol upon her swearing a robbery against him for taking a gold chain off her neck, but that affair being accommodated, he a little after married her, which was perhaps no small cause of his future ruin.

He was always dishonest in his principles, and ready to lay hold of any money without ever thinking of paying it again. At Smithfield he used to be very dextrous in cheating country graziers of their cattle. The method by which he did it was generally thus. Taking advantage of a countryman whom he saw looked unacquainted with things, he struck a bargain as soon as possible, and for any price he pleased, for his goods; then stepping in to drink a mug and receive the money, Knowland had an accomplice already planted, who coming hastily into the room told him with a submissive air that a gentleman at such a place desired to speak with him. Upon this he, arising in a hurry, tells the countryman he would return immediately and pay him his money, while the attendant in the meanwhile drove off with the beast; and so the poor man was left without hopes of seeing either the money or bullock and perhaps ruined into the bargain for being obliged to pay his master for the beast that was lost. Thomas Westwood, the second of these offenders, was a man descended of very mean parents, who either had it not in their power, or were so careless as to afford him little or no education. He himself, also, was a stupid, obstinate fellow, who never took any pains to attain the least degree of knowledge, but contented himself with living like a beast, in a continual round of eating and drinking and sleeping. By trade he was a sawyer, and when he wanted business in his trade, which, as the Ordinary tells us, he often did bring a poor purblind creature, he either sold sawdust about town, or else practised as a bailiffs follower, a profession which led him into yet greater debaucheries and extravagancies than otherwise possible he might have ever fallen into.

280. LIVES OF THE MOST REMARKABLE CRIMINALS WHO HAVE BEEN CONDEMNED AND EXECUTED FOR MURDER, THE HIGHWAY, HOUSEBREAKING, STREET ROBBERIES, COINING OR OTHER OFFENCES / COLLECTED FROM ORIGINAL PAPERS AND AUTHENTIC MEMOIRS, AND PUBLISHED IN 1735 / Edited by Arthur L. Hayward

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Knowland and he were apprehended on suspicion for being robbers, and were tried at the Old Bailey on four indictments, all said to have been committed on the same day, viz., on the 23rd of November, 1729. The first was for assaulting John Molton in an open field, putting him in fear, and taking from him four shillings; the second was for assaulting Mary Butler and taking from her sixpence in money; the third was for assaulting Nicholas Butler, and taking from him half a guinea and one shilling; the fourth was for assaulting Anne Nailor, and taking from her three and sixpence in money.

The prosecutors on all these indictments swore positively to the prisoners' faces. Mr. Butler was desperately wounded (the Ordinary says he was mortally wounded) but through God's grace recovered. In their defence they called a great number of people to prove them in other places at the time those robberies were committed, which they positively swore, but the jury giving credit to the prosecutors' evidence, they were both found guilty. However, they absolutely denied the crimes to the last suffering at Tyburn with great marks of sorrow and loud exclamations to God to have mercy on their souls, the 28th of February, 1730. Knowland being twenty-four years of age, and Westwood twenty-seven, at the time of their deaths.

After March 1: Hugh Houghton, alias Awton, alias Norton, who had robbed the Bristol Mail, hanged himself by his belt and handkerchief from the window bars of his prison cell.²⁸¹

This unfortunate person was the son of honest and reputable people of Lancaster, who took care to give him a very good education, sufficient to have fitted him for any trade whatever. Afterwards they bound him out apprentice to a wine-cooper, to whom he served out his time very carefully and honestly, and appeared in his temper and disposition to be a civil, good-natured young man. For some time after his coming out of his time, he followed his trade of a wine-cooper, but being pressed on board a man-of-war, during the French War in the late Queen's time, he behaved himself so well on board that he acquired the goodwill of all his officers, attained to the degree of a midshipman, and was afterwards gunner's mate, receiving also a title to five pound per annum, out of the Pension Chest at Chatham.

281. LIVES OF THE MOST REMARKABLE CRIMINALS WHO HAVE BEEN CONDEMNED AND EXECUTED FOR MURDER, THE HIGHWAY, HOUSEBREAKING, STREET ROBBERIES, COINING OR OTHER OFFENCES / COLLECTED FROM ORIGINAL PAPERS AND AUTHENTIC MEMOIRS, AND PUBLISHED IN 1735 / Edited by Arthur L. Hayward

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

After this he came to London, married a wife and was a housekeeper in town; and for his better support got himself into the Horse Guards, where he served with reputation, until some small time before his death, when some clothes of value being taken away, and he being strongly suspected on that score was dismissed the service, whereby he fell into great difficulties for want of money.

It seems that for many months before his death he had frequented the house of one Mr. Marlow, and was indebted to him for a considerable sum of money, but one day he came and discharged it, having for that purpose changed a twenty pound bank-note at a brewer's not far distant. But the Bristol mail happening about that time to be robbed, and the bank-note, after various circulations, being discovered to be one of those taken out of it, Houghton was thereupon seized and committed, being at the next sessions brought to his trial at the Old Bailey for the fact, when the course of the evidence appeared against him as follows. He was arraigned on an indictment for dealing from Stephen Crouches, on the King's highway, after putting him in fear, a sorrel gelding value five pounds, the property of Thomas Ostwich, a mail value four pounds, and fifty leather bags, value five pounds, the property of our Sovereign Lord the King, on the first of March, 1730.

Stephen Crouches deposed that on the day laid in the indictment, he was going with the Bristol and Gloucester mail, being near Knightsbridge, a man of the prisoner's size, who spoke like him, came out of the gateway and bid him stand; that he laid the horse to the farther side of a field, commanded him to show him the Bristol bag, which he took and went off with the horse, leaving this evidence bound with his hands behind him, threatening to murder him in case he made the least noise.

Daniel Burton deposed that the prisoner Houghton had more than once proposed to him the robbing of the Bristol mail, and upon his refusing to be concerned in it, would then have had him rob their landlady, Mrs. Marlow, which when her husband came to know, he turned him out of doors.

The next witness that was called was Mr. Marlow, who deposed that on the 2nd of March, the prisoner Houghton paid him five pounds which was owing to him, having changed for that purpose a bank-note of twenty pounds at Mr. Broadhead's the brewer. Then the note itself was produced, which had been paid by Mr. Broadhead to Mr. King, a factor, and by him to Mr. Dictorine's man, in Thames Street, and by him again to the servant of Messrs. Knight and Jackson, by whom it was brought into Court, an endorsement being upon it not to be paid till the fifth of May. But Mr. Marlow being asked as to his being acquainted by Burton with the prisoner's attempts to persuade him to robbing the Bristol mail, and afterwards robbing his house, Mr. Marlow answered that he did not remember he had ever been told such a thing, but that he did indeed know the prisoner together with one Masa, was for scandalous practices turned out of the Guards. William Burligh deposed that he took out of the prisoner's pocket a pocket-book in which was several notes, which pocketbook the prisoner said he took up in Covent Garden. Mr. Langley, the Turnkey of Newgate, deposed that after he was committed to his custody, he searched his pocket and found therein three bank-notes of Mr. Hoare, which he gave to Mr. Archer. Mr. Archer deposed that he did receive such notes, which were so taken as had been before sworn by Mr. Langley.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

There were some other persons produced who swore to some slips of leather which were found in Houghton's lodgings, and which were believed to be cut out of the bag which were taken from the Bristol Mail. The prisoner in his defence said he believed there was a trap laid for him and exclaimed against Burton. Two women positively deposed that Houghton all that night was not out of his lodgings. But the jury notwithstanding that, gave so much credit to the evidence offered for the King, that they found him guilty.

Under sentence of death, he said that he had hitherto lived free from most of those enormous vices into which criminals are usually plunged, who came to his unhappy fate. He said that through the course of his life he had always been a good husband, a loving parent, and had provided carefully for his family; that he had served the Government twelve years by land, and twelve years by sea, and in all that time never had any reflection upon him until the unhappy accident in the Guards, which he said he was not guilty of, and had been since confessed by another man. As to the fact for which he was to die, he said that the same day the mail was robbed (which was on a Sunday morning) at six or seven o'clock he found a bundle of papers which he took up, and perceived them to be a parcel taken out of the Bristol mail, and therefore having perused them carefully, and taken out of them such as he judged proper, he being at that time out of business and in great want, put up the rest of them in a sheet of paper, directed to the Post Master General, and laid them down in the box-house at Lincoln's Inn Fields, being afraid to go with them to the office, because a great reward was offered for the robber. And that he, having changed a twenty-pound bank-note, paid five pounds of it away to his landlord, Mr. Marlow. He reflected also very severely on the evidence given against him by Mr. Burton, which he said was the very reverse of the truth. Burton having often solicited him to go upon the highway as the shortest method of easing his misfortunes and bringing them both money.

As he persisted in averring the confession he made to be the truth, it was objected to him that it was a story, the most improbable in the world, that when a man had hazarded his life to rob the Bristol mail, he should then throw away all the booty, and leave it in such a place as Covent Garden, for any stranger to take up as he came by; yet neither this nor anything else that could be said to him had so much weight as to move him to a free confession of his guilt, but on the contrary, he gave greater and more evident signs of a sullen, morose and reserved disposition, spoke little, desired not to be interrupted, made general confessions of his sins, pleased himself with high conceits of the Divine Mercy, and endeavoured as much as possible to avoid conferences with anybody, and especially declined speaking of that offence for which he was to die.

When he first came to Newgate, the keepers had, it seems, a strong apprehension that he would attempt something against his own life, and upon this suspicion they were very careful of him, and enjoined a barber who shaved him in prison to be so, lest he should take that occasion to cut his throat. Yet nothing of this happened until the day of his execution, when the keepers coming to him in the morning, found him praying very devoutly in his cell; but about twenty minutes after, going thither again, they perceived he had fastened his sword belt which he wore always about him to the grate of the window which looked out of his cell, to the end of which he tied his handkerchief, and having then adjusted that about his neck, he strangled himself with it, and was dead when the keepers opened the doors to look in.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

The Ordinary makes this remark upon his exit, that it is to be feared he was a hypocrite and that little of what he said can be believed. For my part, I am far from taking upon me either to enter into the breasts of men or pretend to set bounds to the mercy of God, and therefore without any further remarks, shall conclude his life with informing my readers that at the time he put an end to his own being, he was about forty-eight years of age, and a man in his person and behaviour very unlikely to have been such a one as it is to be feared (notwithstanding all his denials) he really was.

April 5: Stephen Dowdale was hanged for theft on the Tyburn gallows outside London.²⁸²

This unfortunate man was the son of parents in good circumstances in the Kingdom of Ireland, who were very careful of giving him the best education they were capable of, both as to letters and as to the principles of the Christian religion. Yet from some hope they had of his succeeding in a military way, they chose rather to let him serve in the army than breed him to any particular trade. It seems he behaved so well in the regiment of dragoons in which he served, that his officers advanced him to the post of sergeant, and just as the Peace was concluded, he had hopes of being made a quartermaster. But the regiment then being broke, his hopes were all dissipated, and he thrown into the world to shift for himself as well as he could.

In Ireland he remained with his friends some years, but finding by degrees that their kindness cooled, and that it would be impossible for him to subsist much longer upon the bounty of his relations, he thereupon resolved to come over at once to England and endeavour to live here by his wits. The gaming tables were the places where he chiefly resorted, but finding that fortune was a mistress not to be depended upon he resolved to take some more certain method of living, and for that purpose associated himself with ten or a dozen knights of the road. He continued his practices without the least suspicion for a very considerable time, in all which he appeared one of the greatest beaux at the other end of the town.

282. LIVES OF THE MOST REMARKABLE CRIMINALS WHO HAVE BEEN CONDEMNED AND EXECUTED FOR MURDER, THE HIGHWAY, HOUSEBREAKING, STREET ROBBERIES, COINING OR OTHER OFFENCES / COLLECTED FROM ORIGINAL PAPERS AND AUTHENTIC MEMOIRS, AND PUBLISHED IN 1735 / Edited by Arthur L. Hayward

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

But growing uneasy in the midst of that seeming gaiety in which he lived, and being under some apprehensions that one or more of his companions was meditating means of making peace with the government at the expense of his life, he resolved to prevent them; and thereupon surrendered himself of his own accord into the hands of a constable, and gave the best information he was able against all his confederates. But however it was, most of them had previous knowledge of the warrants issued against them, and thereby made their escapes. Others who were apprehended were acquitted by the jury, notwithstanding this evidence against them, so that the public not being likely to reap any benefit by his discovery, some people thought proper to turn his own confession upon himself. Accordingly, at the next Sessions at the Old Bailey, he was indicted for feloniously stealing a gold watch value twenty pounds, out of the house of Thomas Martin, on the 30th of August preceding the indictment. He was also indicted a second time for feloniously stealing a diamond ring out of the shop of John Tribble, on the 25th of August. Both these facts were in the information he had made, and therefore the proof was dear and direct against him, and beyond his power to avoid by any defence.

Under sentence of death he behaved himself with great resignation, seemed to be very penitent for those numerous offences he had committed, though now and then he let fell expressions which showed that he thought himself hardly dealt with by those who had received his confession. However, what with fear and concern, and what with the moistness of the place wherein he was confined, he fell into a grievous distemper, which quickly increased into a high fever, which affected his senses, and shortly after took away his life, just as a very worthy gentleman in the commission for the peace for Middlesex had procured his life, which was thus ended by the course of Nature though in the cells of Newgate, he being then in the forty-fourth year of his age. He died on the 5th of April, 1730.

May 12 (Old Style): Abraham Israel, a Jew, was hanged for theft on the Tyburn gallows outside London.²⁸³

As it is a very ordinary case for fiction to be imposed on the world for truth, so it sometimes happens that truth hath such extraordinary circumstances attending it, as well nigh bring it to pass for fiction. The adventures of this unhappy man, who was a Hebrew by nation, have something in them strange, and which excite pity; for a man must be wanting in humanity who can look upon a young person endowed with the natural advantage of a good genius, lightened by the acquired accomplishments of learning, fall of a sudden from an honest and reputable behaviour into debauchery, wickedness and rapine, methods that lead to certain destruction, and as it were to drag men to violent and shameful deaths.

This unfortunate person, Abraham Israel, was born of parents of the Hebrew nation, of good character and in good circumstances, at Presburg, in the kingdom of Hungary. They were exceedingly desirous of giving their son a good education, and therefore sent him to study in the Jewish College at Prague, in Bohemia, where they allowed him about two hundred pounds Stirling a year. He improved under the tuition of the rabbis there to a great degree, insomuch that he was admired by them as a prodigy of learning. His behaviour in every other way being unblamable, and therefore not spending above half what his father sent him, he distributed the rest among the indigent scholars there, of all nations and religions. As a mark of his early and polite genius, we have thought proper to entertain our readers with a short description of the city of Prague, which he wrote in the German tongue, and which on this occasion we have ventured to translate into English.

283. LIVES OF THE MOST REMARKABLE CRIMINALS WHO HAVE BEEN CONDEMNED AND EXECUTED FOR MURDER, THE HIGHWAY, HOUSEBREAKING, STREET ROBBERIES, COINING OR OTHER OFFENCES / COLLECTED FROM ORIGINAL PAPERS AND AUTHENTIC MEMOIRS, AND PUBLISHED IN 1735 / Edited by Arthur L. Hayward

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Prague is the capital of the Kingdom of Bohemia, which, as if protected by nature, is encompassed round with high mountains. Throughout all Europe there is no soil in general more fertile or better adapted to the plough. The fruits there are excellent and great quantities of fowl are plentiful almost to excess, the cattle are large and excellent. In fine nothing is poor, wretched or miserable there except the people, who are slaves to their lords, and never enjoy even the fruits of their own hard labour. But to return to Prague, it is a city situated on a hill, part of it stretching down the plain, having the river Muldau running through it. The buildings are of so large extent that this city is divided into three, and by some into four cities. The old city lies on the east of the river, is exceedingly populous, and houses in that quarter fair, but old-fashioned. Here is the quarter assigned unto our nation (i.e., the Jews) where we enjoy greater privileges and are treated with more lenity than in any other part of Germany. The heads of our people deal to very great advantage in jewels and precious stones dug out of the Bohemian mines. The lesser town on the other side of the river is more beautiful in its building than the old town, has fine gardens and stately palaces, among which there is the famous one of Count Wallenstein, the magnificence of which, may be the better guessed from our knowing that a hundred houses were pulled down to make room for it. Its hall is thought one of the finest in all Europe, its gardens are wonderfully stately, and the stables which he built here for his horses are almost beyond description, marble pillars parted the standing of each horse from another. The racks were of polished steel, and their mangers of the finest marble, and over the head of each stand was placed the figure of each horse, as large as the life. This famous man who was the greatest captain of his time, after having built this sumptuous palace, re-established the Emperor's power, almost utterly broken by the Swedes, growing at last too powerful for a subject, or as the Germans say, endeavouring to make himself master of the Kingdom of Bohemia, he was, if not by the command, at least by the connivance of the Emperor Ferdinand, privately assassinated in the city of Egra, in the year 1634, by certain Irish officers, in whom he reposed the greatest confidence. Since his time Prague has seen no greater powerful persons among her countrymen; on the contrary, the inhabitants now in general are poor, their habits mean, the Hebrew nation being obliged, both men and women, to wear a particular garb. Its streets are dirty, and nothing but the Imperial Palace preserves anything of its ancient grandeur; the same fate hath befallen the other Bohemian cities, and thus in a land of Paradise the people live like slaves.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

When at the age of thirteen, the unfortunate Abraham was recalled by his father from college, at his return home, every one was surprised at that prodigious knowledge which he had acquired while at Prague. Those of their nation who resided at Presburg desired Abraham's father that his son might, according to the custom of the Hebrews, read in the synagogue, which accordingly he did with great and deserved applause. His relations, and the rich Jews of the town, loaded him the next day with valuable presents, in order to show their veneration for the religion and learning of their ancestors; but these encouragements being heaped on a vain and ambitious temper, were the ruin of a youth hitherto virtuous in his conduct and passionately fond of learning. For growing on a sudden conceited with his own abilities, puffed up with the vanity of having excelled his equals, he began to addict himself to acquire higher accomplishments, grew fond of music, delighted in dancing-schools, would needs be taught fencing and riding, and from the studies preparative to making a grave rabbi, jumped all of a sudden to the qualities necessary to finish a Jewish fop. His relations soon showed by the alteration of their conduct how little they approved of his new state of life, but that signified nothing to him, he still went on at his old rate; until at last perceiving his parents would do nothing for him, he went with an idle woman to Amsterdam. There he was uneasy, not knowing what course of life to take, but at last submitted to wearing a livery, and got into service. He behaved himself amongst the Spanish Jews so well that they gave him a recommendation to Baron Swaffo in England, upon which he came over thither, and entered into his service. He recommended him to Mr. Jacob Mendez da Costa, where he stayed for some time, with a good character as a diligent servant. From him he went to Mr. Villareal on College Hill. It seems that while he continued at the Hague, he fell in love with a young woman there, who continually ran in his head after his coming over hither. As soon, therefore, as he got money enough, he went over to the Hague, on purpose to make her a visit. When he came there, he found she was gone, which made him very uneasy, yet he resolved not to go to Amsterdam, whither he heard she went from the Hague.

However, it was not long before she was thrown in his way, for upon his coming over again to London, where he got into the service of Mr. Jacob Mendez da Costa, he heard at a barber's shop of a young maid just brought over from Holland who was then at her uncle's in St. Mary Axe, not knowing where to get a place. Upon enquiring her name, he found it to be his old acquaintance and mistress at the Hague. It was not long before he turned out the cook at the place where he lived, and brought her home in her place.

For a while she behaved like an honest and industrious servant,

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

but one night as Abraham went to bed, he saw her opening an escrutoire with a knife, which she said she could at any time do. Abraham at first forbid her, but she by her endearments, quickly brought him over to her party, insomuch that after having lain with her, he consented to rummage the escrutoire. In it they found diamond rings and other jewels to a very great value. The wench said to him, holding up a fine diamond ring, Abraham, you might take this, and it would prove the making of us both. But the fellow would not listen to her. However, they agreed to take five guineas, which when they had done, they went to bed together according to custom.

Sometime after they begged a holiday and going out borrowed some more money from the same bank, but staying out all night she lost her place, whereupon she went back to her uncle's, and afterwards got a place in Winchester Street. There Abraham visited her, and suspecting that she was with child, asked her very gravely and kindly whether it were so or not? She said, No, and pretended to want money, upon which he turned back and gave her a guinea. Some time after he came to see her again, asked her the same question, and had the same answer, yet in a few hours after she caused him to be apprehended by the parish officers, the expenses whereof cost him five guineas immediately, and he was obliged to deposit fourteen guineas more as a security that he would indemnify the parish.

This threw him out of his place, and though he got into another, and behaved well in it, yet going into the service of Mr. John Mendez da Costa, he became there so uneasy on account of his child, and some other troublesome affairs, that he ventured on stealing eight silver spoons, five silver forks, two pair of silver canisters, a diamond ring value two hundred and fifty pounds, a pair of diamond ear-rings worth ninety pounds, three diamond buckles, and other goods of a great value. For this fact he was prosecuted, and on very full evidence convicted.

Under sentence of death, the Ordinary informs us that he appeared to be better acquainted with Hebrew than is common amongst Jews. He came up to the chapel rather for the air than for devotion. However, he one day sung part of a Psalm. His hatred against his prosecutor was strong and unconquerable, for when the minister told him it was his duty to forgive him, he said he did not know whether it was or no according to their law, and sometimes said that Heaven might deal with the same justice by him hereafter, as he had been dealt with here.

As the time of his death approached, he grew graver, and read more constantly in those books he had in Hebrew characters of his own religion. However, he wrote a letter to the gentleman he robbed in very harsh terms, and applied to him some of the imprecations of the hundred and ninth Psalm. At the place of execution he had two men with him, who were muttering something or other in his ear. He had a little Hebrew prayer-book in his hand, and read in it. When being again persuaded to forgive his prosecutor, he at last, in a faint voice, answered that he did, and then submitted to his fate at Tyburn, on the 12th of May, 1730, being then about twenty-two years of age. He had several relations who had a great deal of money in England, and they took care of his body.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

May 13: James Dalton was hanged for theft on the Tyburn gallows outside London.²⁸⁴

The character of this criminal is already so infamous, and his crimes so notorious that I may spare myself any introductory observation which I have made use of as to most of the rest with respect to his birth. He was so unfortunate as to have the gallows hereditary to his family, his father, who was by birth an Irishman, and in the late Wars in Flanders a sergeant, coming over here was indicted and hanged for a street robbery. After his death, Dalton's mother married a butcher, who, not long before Dalton's death, was transported, and she herself for a like crime shared in the same punishment.

This unhappy young man himself went between his father's legs in the cart when he made his fatal exit at Tyburn. It has, indeed, remained a doubt whether Dalton the father were a downright thief or not; his own friends say that he was only a cheat, and one of the most dexterous sharpers at cards in England. It seems he fell in with some people of his own profession, who thought he got their money too much easily, and therefore made bold to fix him with a downright robbery.

As for James Dalton the younger, from his infancy he was a thief and deserved the gallows almost as soon as he wore breeches. He began his pranks with robbing the maid where he went to school. By eleven years old he got himself into the company of Fulsom and Field, who were evidences against Jonathan Wild and Blueskin, and in their company committed villainies of every denomination, such as picking pockets, snatching hats and wigs, breaking open shops, filching bundles at dusk of the evening. All the money they got by these practices was spent among the common women of the town, whose company they frequented. Then the Old Bailey and Smithfield Cloisters became the place of their resort, from whence they carried away goods to a considerable quantity, sold them at under-rates, and squandered away the money upon strumpets.

Towards Smithfield and the narrow lanes and allies about it, are

284. LIVES OF THE MOST REMARKABLE CRIMINALS WHO HAVE BEEN CONDEMNED AND EXECUTED FOR MURDER, THE HIGHWAY, HOUSEBREAKING, STREET ROBBERIES, COINING OR OTHER OFFENCES / COLLECTED FROM ORIGINAL PAPERS AND AUTHENTIC MEMOIRS, AND PUBLISHED IN 1735 / Edited by Arthur L. Hayward

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

the chief houses of entertainment for such people, where they are promiscuously admitted, men or women, and have places every way fitted for both concealing and entertainment. The man and woman of the house frequently take their commodities off their hand at low prices, and the women who frequent these sort of places help them off with what trifling sums of money they receive; for though they are utterly devoid of education, yet dinning and flattery are so perfectly practised by them, that these bewitched young robbers make no scruple of venturing soul and body to acquire wherewith to purchase their favours, which are frequently attended with circumstances that would send them rotten to their graves, if the gallows did not intercept and take them before they are got half way. But it happened that Field was apprehended, and to save himself immediately made an information against his companions, named Dalton and Fulsom, whereupon they were obliged to be very cautious and durst venture out only in the night. It happened that in Broad Street, St. Giles's they met about twelve o'clock at night a captain in the Foot-Guards. Dalton commanded the gentleman to surrender, but persons of his cloth seldom parting with their money so peaceably, there happened a skirmish, in which Fulsom knocked him down, and afterwards they rifled him, taking some silver and a leaden shilling out of his pocket, together with a pocket book, which had some bank notes in it, and therefore was burnt by them for fear it should betray them. But in this fact, Dalton, who had not even honesty enough for a thief, cheated his companion of seven guineas and a watch.

The woman to whom they sold their stolen goods was one Hannah Britton, who, upon Lambert's being committed to New Prison, was named in his information, taken up and committed to Newgate. At the sessions after she was convicted for that offence, and thereupon whipped from Holborn Bars to St. Giles's Pound; which proceeding so affrighted Dalton that he resolved for a time to retire out of London.

Thereupon he and one of his companions went down to Bristol, to see what they could make at the Fair. But they were not over-lucky in their country expedition, for they were apprehended for breaking a shop open, and tried at the assizes; but the witness not being able to swear directly to their persons, they were acquitted through the defect of evidence. As soon as they were out of prison, Dalton returned to London as speedily as he was able, where joining himself with the remainder of the old gang, shortly after his arrival they broke open a toy-shop near Holborn Bars, and carried off eight hundred pounds worth of goods, with a pretty large sum in ready money. Of the goods they did not make above two hundred and fifty pounds, and for the ready money, which was about twenty pounds, they shared it amongst them.

Dalton about that time frequenting a house near Golden Lane, found doxies there to help him off with it, and reduced him to the necessity of making t'other large stride in the way to Tyburn. Not long after, therefore, he committed a robbery in the road to Islington, for which being taken up he brought three who personated a doctor, apothecary and surgeon at his trial, who swore that the time the robbery was said to have been committed he was sick and even at the point of death, upon which he was acquitted.

But as this was a narrow escape, so his liberty was of no long continuance, for his companion Fulson, being apprehended for a felony, to save himself, made an information against his comrades, and amongst the rest named Dalton, and gave so exact an account of his haunts that he was quickly after apprehended, and at the ensuing sessions convicted and ordered for transportation.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

At sea a great storm arising, they were glad to call up such of the criminals as they thought might be of use towards managing the ship, amongst whom was James Dalton, who no sooner was upon deck but he was contriving to make the crew mutiny and seize the ship. In a very little time he brought enough of them to be of his mind in order to execute their intent, and accordingly got the fire-arms and made themselves masters of the ship, and obliged the men to navigate her to a little port near Cape Finisterre, in Spain, where they robbed the ship of about a hundred pounds, and then went on shore and travelled by land to Vigo. They were scarce got thither before the ship arrived, and the captain charged them with the piracy they had committed; but from the lenity of the Spanish Government, they quickly got released, without giving the captain any satisfaction. The Governor, when they were discharged from their confinement, gave them a pass in which, after reciting their names, he styled them all English thieves, which putting them in no small fright, they resolved to prevent its doing them a mischief, committed it to the flames, and then ran the hazard of travelling the country without one. This, accordingly, they did, until they met with a Dutch ship, the master of which readily gave them a passage to Amsterdam, from whence Dalton and two or three more, found means to get over again to England, and came up to London.

On their arrival here they fell to robbing with such fury that the streets were hardly safe when the sun was set; but Dalton apprehending that this trade would not last long, resolved to make a country expedition, in order to get out of the way. Thereupon down he went again to his old city of refuge, Bristol. There he did not continue long before he was apprehended for breaking open a linen-draper's shop but the burglary not being clearly proved, the jury found him guilty of the felony only, whereupon he was once more transported to Virginia.

He did not continue long in that plantation before growing weary of labour, he thought fit to threaten his master, so that the man was glad to discharge him, and thought himself happy of getting rid of such a servant. Upon which Dalton soon found out one Whalebone, a fellow of a like disposition with himself; and they went about stealing boats and negroes, running away with them and selling them in other colonies. At last Dalton met with a ship which carried him for England. By the way he was pressed on board the Hampshire man-of-war, in which he was a spectator of the last siege of Gibraltar.²⁸⁵

On his return he received his wages and lived on it for a little time. Then he with Benjamin Branch and William Field, took to snatching of pockets. At last they took Christopher Rawlins into their society and in a few months' time they three snatched five hundred pockets. Amongst the rest Dalton cut off one from a woman's side at St. Andrew's, Holborn, for which Branch being in company was taken and executed, although Dalton and Rawlins did all they could to have made up the affair with the prosecutor but in vain. This trade therefore being at an end, he and his 285. On Feb. 22, 1727, when the Spaniards attacked with 20,000 men and were repulsed with a loss of 5,000. The English lost 300.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

companion Rawlins fell next to robbing coaches in the streets, and being once more apprehended, he found himself under a necessity of making an information against his companions, six or seven of whom were executed upon his evidence. He also received ten guineas to swear against Nichols the peruke-maker, but after he received the money, his conscience checked him, and though he did not return it, yet he absolutely refused to give any evidence against him. But Neeves, who had been taken into the same plot, went through with it, and as has been said before, hanged him for a fact which he never committed.²⁸⁶

A multitude of wives Dalton married during his life, and many of them were alive at the time of his decease, four of them coming at once to see him in Newgate when under his last misfortune, and appearing at that time to be very friendly together. He had not been long out of Newgate before he fell to his old practices, and a few sessions after was apprehended, and tried for stopping the coach of an eminent physician with an intent to rob it. For this he was sentenced to a fine and imprisonment, which upon insulting the court was ordered to be in one of the condemned cells in Newgate. But he did not remain long there, being the very next sessions brought to his trial on an indictment for robbing John Waller in a certain field or open place near the highway, putting him in fear of his life, and taking from him twenty-five handkerchiefs, value four pounds, five ducats value forty-eight shillings, two guineas, a three guilder piece, a French pistol, and five shillings in silver, on the 22nd of November, 1729. The prosecutor deposed, that being a Holland trader, the prisoner met with him as he was drinking at the Adam and Eve at Pancras, in his return from Hampstead, where he had sold some goods, and received a little money; that Dalton perceiving it grow dark, desired to walk to town with him, and that they had a link with them, which Dalton put out in the fields, and then knocked him down, beat him and abused him, and then robbed him of the things mentioned in the indictment; and that he threatened to blow his brains out if he made any noise or called for help. He swore also to a pistol which had been produced against Dalton on a former trial.

In his defence the prisoner insisted peremptorily upon his innocence, charged the prosecutor with being a common affidavit man, and a fellow of as bad if not worse character than himself. However, in order to falsify some circumstances which he had deposed against him, Dalton called three witnesses, Charles North, Edward Brumfield, and John Mitchell, who were all prisoners in Newgate, but were permitted by the Court to come down. Some of them contradicted the prosecutor as to a gingham waistcoat which he had sworn Dalton wore in Newgate. They swore also to the prosecutor's visiting Dalton there, and owing that he never damaged him a farthing in his life. But the jury on the whole found him guilty, and he received sentence of death.

As he had little reason to hope for pardon, so he never deluded himself with false expectations about it, but applied himself, as diligently as he was able, to repent of those manifold sins and offences which he had committed. He confessed very frankly the manifold crimes and horrid enormities in which he had involved himself. He seemed to be very sensible of that dreadful state into which his own wickedness had plunged him. He behaved himself gravely when at public prayers at the chapel, and applied himself with great diligence to praying and singing of Psalms when in his cell; but as to the particular crime of which he was convicted, that he absolutely denied from first to last, with the strongest asseverations that not one word of all the prosecutor's evidence was true, and indeed there has since appeared great likelihood that he spoke nothing but the truth. For this Waller going on in the same fact after the death of Dalton, became an evidence against many others, sometimes in one country by one name, by and by in another country by another name. In Cambridgeshire, particularly, he convicted two men for a robbery whose lives were saved by means of the Clerk of the Peace entertaining some suspicion of this Mr. Waller's veracity. But as practices of this sort, though they may continue undiscovered for some time, rarely escape for good and all, so Waller's fate came home to him at last; for a worthy magistrate suspecting the truth of an information which he gave before him by another name, and he coming afterwards and owning his true name to be Waller, he was apprehended for the perjury contained in the said examination, and committed to Newgate, and at the next sessions at the Old Bailey received sentence for this offence to stand in the pillory near the Seven Dials. He had scarce been exalted above five minutes, before the mob knocked him on the head, for which fact Andrew Dalton, who did it to revenge the death of his brother, the criminal of whom we are now speaking, together with one Richard Griffith, at the time I am now writing, are under sentence of death.

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

But to return to James Dalton, he continued to behave uniformly and penitently all the time he lay under conviction, and as the friends and relations of Nichols applied themselves to him about clearing the innocence of their deceased friend, he said that Neeves himself actually committed the fact, which he swore upon the person they mentioned, and that he was entirely innocent of whatever was laid to his charge.

When the bellman came to repeat the verses, which he always does the night before the malefactors are to die, Dalton illuminated his cell with six candles. In his passage to the place of execution he appeared very cheerful. When he arrived there, having once more denied in the most solemn manner the fact for which he was to suffer, he yielded up his breath at Tyburn, the 13th of May, 1730, being then somewhat above thirty years of age.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

June 1, Monday (Old Style): Captain George Scott, just turned 24 years of age, set out in his Little George for a Middle Passage across the Atlantic Ocean. Crammed beneath the decks of his sloop was a cargo of 35 black men and 61 black women and black children, on their way to Newport, Rhode Island and to a market for human flesh.

English society placed a high value on appropriate conduct. For instance, on this day at the Tyburn gallows outside London, John Doyle and John Young were paying a price for their crimes as highwaymen.²⁸⁷

When once men have plunged themselves so far into sensual pleasures as to lose all sense of any other delight than that arises from the gratification of the senses, there is no great cause of wonder if they addict themselves to illegal methods of gaining wherewith to purchase such enjoyments; since the want of virtue easily draws on the loss of all other principles, nor can it be hoped from a man who has delivered himself over to the dominion of these vices that he should stop short at the lawful means of obtaining money by which alone he can be enabled to possess them.

Common women are usually the first bane of those unhappy persons who forfeit their lives to the Law as the just punishment of their offences; these women, I say, are so far from having the least concern whether their paramours run any unhappy courses to obtain the sums necessary to supply their mutual extravagance, that on the contrary they are ever ready, by oblique hints and insinuations, to put them upon such dangerous exploits which as they are sure to reap the fruits of, so sometimes when they grow weary of them, they find it an easy method to get rid of them and at the same time put money in their own pockets. Yet so blind are these unhappy wretches, that although such things fall out yearly, yet they are never to be warned, but run into the snare with as much readiness as if they were going unto the possession of certain and lasting happiness. But to come to the adventures of the unhappy person whose life we are going to relate. John Doyle was born in the town of Carrough, in Ireland, and of very honest parents who gave him as good education as could be expected in that country, instructing him in writing and accounts, and made some progress in Latin. When he was fit for a trade, his friends agreed to put him out, and not thinking they should find a master good enough for him in a country place, they sent him to Dublin, and bound him to a tallow-chandler and soap-boiler in St. Thomas's Street, whom he faithfully served seven years, and his master gave him a good character. Being out of his time, his master prevailed with him to work journey-work for him, which he did for nine months; but having got acquainted by that time with some of the town ladies and pretending to his friends that he was in hopes of better business, his friends remitted him fifty pounds to help him forward.

He lived well while that money lasted, but when it was almost spent, he knew not what to turn himself to, for working did not agree with him. He took a resolution to come to England, and on the 19th of April, 1715, he came over in a packet-boat. Having no more money left than three pounds ten shillings, and not seeing which way he could get a further supply unless he went to work, which he could not endure, he resolved to rob on the highway; and to fit him for it, he bought a pair of pistols at West Chester which cost him forty shillings. He continued in that city till the Chester coach was to go for London. At four miles distant from the town he attacked it, and robbed four passengers that were in it of fourteen pounds, six shillings and ninepence, two silver watches and a mourning ring, which was the first attempt of that kind that ever he made in his life; then he went off a by-way undiscovered.

287. LIVES OF THE MOST REMARKABLE CRIMINALS WHO HAVE BEEN CONDEMNED AND EXECUTED FOR MURDER, THE HIGHWAY, HOUSEBREAKING, STREET ROBBERIES, COINING OR OTHER OFFENCES / COLLECTED FROM ORIGINAL PAPERS AND AUTHENTIC MEMOIRS, AND PUBLISHED IN 1735 / Edited by Arthur L. Hayward

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Having got a pretty good booty, he travelled across the country to Shrewsbury, and having stayed there about two days, he happened to meet a man that had been formerly a collector on the road, who had a horse to sell. He bought the horse for seven guineas, though indeed it was worth twenty, as it proved afterwards; no man soever was master of a better bred horse for the highway. He was not willing to stay long at Shrewsbury, so he went from thence and going along the country, met two ladies in a small chaise, with only one servant and a pair of horses. He robbed them of a purse with twenty-nine half guineas, nine shillings in silver and twopence brass, and two gold watches. The servant who rode by had a case of pistols which he took from him, and then made off undiscovered. His horse at that time was much better acquainted with coming up to a coach door than he was. Sometime afterwards he passed across the country, and came to Newbury, in Berkshire, where he remained for about fourteen days, during which time he was very reserved and kept no company. But growing weary, he departed from that place the same morning that the Newbury coach was to set out for London: and when it was about five miles distant from the town of Newbury, he came up to the coach door, and making a ceremony, as became a man of business, demanded their all, which they very readily consented to deliver, which proved to be about twenty-nine pounds in money, a silver watch, a plain wedding ring, a tortoiseshell snuff box, and a very good whip.

There was also a family ring which a gentleman begged very hard for, whereupon by his earnest application he gave it back, and the man assured him he would never appear against him. He was a man of honour, for he happened to meet him some time after at the Rummer and Horseshoe in Drury Lane, where he treated Doyle handsomely, and showed him the ring, and withal declared that he would not be his enemy on any account whatsoever.

Doyle being at this time a young beginner, thought what he got for the preceding time to be very well, and in a few days after this arrived at Windsor, where he stayed one night, and there being a gentleman's family bound for London, that lay that night at the Mermaid Inn in the town, he changed his lodging and removed to the inn; and having stayed there that night, he minded where they put their valuable baggage up. The next morning he paid his reckoning and came away, and got about four miles out of the town before them; then coming up and making the usual ceremony, he demanded their money, watches and rings. The gentleman in the coach pulled out a blunderbuss, but Doyle soon quelled him by clapping a pistol to his nose, telling him that if he stirred hand or foot he was a dead man. Then he made him give his blunderbuss first, then his money which was fifty guineas, fifteen shillings in silver, and five-pence in brass, a woman's gold watch and a pocket book in which were seven bank-notes, which the gentleman said he took that day in order to pay his servants' wages. After this he made the best of his way to

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

London and got into James's Street, Westminster, where he drank a pint of wine, and then crossed over to Lambeth, and put up his horse at the Red Lion Inn, and stayed there that night.

The next morning he came to the Coach and Horses in Old Palace Yard, Westminster, where he dined, and about seven at night departed from thence and went to the Phoenix gaming-house in the Haymarket, to which place, he said, he believed a great many owe their ruin. He remained some time at the Phoenix, and seeing them gaming hard, he had a mind to have a touch at it; when coming into the ring he took the box in his turn, and in about thirty minutes lost thirty-seven pounds, which broke him. But having some watches about him, he went immediately to the Three Bowls in Market Lane, St. James, and pawned a gold watch for sixteen guineas; and returning back to the Phoenix went to gaming a second time, and in less than an hour recovered his money and forty-three pounds more. And seeing an acquaintance there he took him to the Cardigan's Head tavern, Charing Cross, and made merry. That night he lay at the White Bear in Piccadilly, and stayed there until the next evening, after which, having paid his reckoning, he went to Lambeth to his landlord who had his horse in his care, and remained there that night. The next morning he went away having discharged the house.

Having then a pretty sum of money about him, he had an inclination to see the country of Kent, and accordingly went that day to Greenwich, and put up his horse while he went to see the Hospital; and having baited the horse he parted from thence, and going over Blackheath, he happened to meet a gentleman, who proved to be Sir Gregory Page. Doyle took what money he had about him, which was about seventy guineas in a green purse, a watch, two gold seals and eighteen pence in silver. That night he rode away to Maidstone, and from thence to Canterbury.

In a few days he returned to London, and was for a long time silent, even for about six months, and never robbed or made an attempt to rob any man, but kept his horse in a very good order, and commonly went in an afternoon to Hampstead, sometimes to Richmond, or to Hackney. In short, he knew all the roads about London in less than six months as well as any man in England. His money beginning now to grow short, not having turned out so long, and the keeping his horse on the other hand being costly, he resolved that his horse should pay for his own keeping, and turned out one evening and robbed a Jew of seventy-five pounds, and of his and his lady's watches, a gold box and some silver, and returned to town undiscovered. The next day Doyle went Brentford way, and coming to Turnham Green stayed some time at the Pack Horse, where he saw two Quakers on horseback. He rode gently after them till they got to Hounslow Heath, where he secured what money they had, which was something above a hundred pounds. They begged hard for some money back, when he gave them a guinea, taking from them their spurs and whips, and at some distance threw them away. Those two men, as he found some days after by the papers, were two meal factors that were going to High Wycombe market in Buckinghamshire, to buy either wheat or flour.

This last being a pretty good booty, he had a mind afterwards to go for Ireland and accordingly set out for his journey thither. He took shipping at King's Road near Bristol, on board a small vessel bound to Waterford, where he arrived and stayed at the Eagle in Waterford three days, and from thence went directly to Dublin. Doyle was not long in Dublin before he became acquainted with his wife, whom he courted for some time and was extravagant in spending his money on her. He also soon got acquainted with one N. B., a man now alive, and they turned out together. None was able to stand against them, for they had everything that came in their way, and in plain terms, there was not a man that carried money about him, within eight miles of Dublin, but if they met him they were sure to get what he had. Being grown so wicked Doyle was at length taken for a robber and committed to Newgate, then kept by one Mr. Hawkins, who used him so barbarously that he wished himself out of his hands. Accordingly he got his irons off and broke out of the gaol. Hawkins knowing all the bums²⁸⁸ in Dublin, sent them up and down the city to take him, but to no purpose. However, they rooted him fairly out of that neighbourhood.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Then he returned to Waterford, where he appointed his wife and friend should meet him, which they did; and in about four hours after he came there he found them out, and there being a ship bound for Bristol, he sent them on board, agreed with the captain and went himself on board the same night. They hoisted their sails and got down to the Passage near Waterford, but the wind proving contrary, they were obliged to return back, and then concluded it was determined for Doyle to be taken; which he had been had he kept on board, but he luckily got on shore, when it was agreed to go to Cork. There they met with an honest cock of a landlord, and he kept himself very private, making the poor man believe that his companion and he were two that were raising men for the Chevalier's²⁸⁹ service, and that their keeping so private proceeded from a fear of being discovered. The poor man had then a double regard for them, he being a lover in his heart of —. Doyle then sent his wife to seek for a ship; but Hawkins having pursued him from Dublin, happened to see her, and dogged her to the ship where she went on board, sending officers to search, for he was sure he should find him there. He was mistaken, but they took his poor wife up to see if they could make her discover where he was, and ordered a strong guard to bring her to Cork gaol. A boat was provided to bring her on shore, but she telling the men some plausible stories that her husband was not the man they represented him to be, one of the watermen having stripped off his clothes in order to row, and there being a great many honest fellows in the boat, they assisted her in putting on waterman's clothes, which as soon as done, she fairly got away from them, and came and acquainted Doyle that Hawkins was in town, and how she had been in danger. They then concluded on leaving Cork, hired horses that night, and came to a place called Mallow, within ten miles of Cork. The next day they travelled to Limerick, where Doyle bought a horse, bridle, etc., and went towards Galloway, and in all his journey round about got but two prizes, which did not amount to above fifteen pounds.

Sometime after, his wife was transported, which gave him a great deal of concern, and he could not be in any way content without her. So getting some money together he went to Virginia, and having arrived there soon met with her, having had intelligence where to enquire for her. The first house he came into was one

288. i.e., bailiffs, informers and spies.

289. The Pretender, whose name was only to be mentioned with baited breath.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

William Dalton's, who had some days before bought the late noted James Dalton,²⁹⁰ who was then his servant, whom he very often used to send along with Doyle in his boat to put him on board a ship. Then he thought it his best way to buy his wife's liberty, which he did, paying fifteen pounds for it.

He had then a considerable deal of money about him, and removed from that part of the country where she was known and went to New York. Being arrived there he soon got acquainted with some of his countrymen, with whom he had used to go a-hunting and to the horse races; so he spent some time in seeing the country. By chance he came to hear of a namesake of his, that lived in an island a little distant from New York, and being willing to see any of his name, he sent for him, and according to Doyle's request, he wrote to him that he would come the next day, which he did, and proved to be his uncle. The old man was overjoyed to see Doyle, and carried him home with him, where he stayed a long time, and spent a great deal of money.

His uncle was very much affronted at Doyle's ill-treatment of the natives, whom he severely beat, insomuch that the whole place was afraid of him, and all intended to join and take the law of him. Soon after he departed from New York and went to Boston, where he remained some time, and at length he resolved within himself to settle and work at his trade, thinking it better to do so than to spend all his money, and be obliged to return to England or Ireland without a penny in his pocket. He did so, and having agreed with a master he went to work, and was very saving and frugal.

He remained with that man till by his wife's industry he had got, including what was his own, about two hundred pounds English money. Then he advised his wife to go for Ireland in the first ship that was bound that way, laying all her money out to twenty pounds, and shipped the goods which he had brought on board for her account. She then went to Ireland and Doyle for England, promising to go over to her as soon as he could get some money, for he had then an inclination to leave off his old trade of collecting.

Being arrived at London, he met with a certain person with whom he joined, and as he himself terms it, never had man a braver companion, for let him push at what he would, his new companion never flinched one inch. They turned out about London for some time, and got a great deal of money, for nothing hardly missed them. They used a long time the roads about Hounslow, Hampstead, and places adjacent, until the papers began to describe them, on which they went into Essex, and robbed several graziers, farmers and others. Then they went to Bishop's Stortford, in Hertfordshire, where they robbed one man in particular who had his money tied up under his arm in a great purse. Doyle says that he had some intelligence from a friend that the man had money about him, he made him strip in buff, and then found out where he lodged it, and took it, but he did not use him in any way ill, for he says it was the man's business to conceal it, as much as his to discover it.

Doyle and his partner hearing of a certain fair which was to be held a few days after, they resolved to go to it, and coming there took notice who took most money. In the evening they took their horses, and about three miles distant from the town there was a green, over which the people were obliged to come from the fair. There came a great many graziers and farmers, whom they robbed of upwards of eight hundred pounds. At this time Doyle had in money and valuable things, such as diamonds, rings, watches, to the amount of about sixteen hundred pounds. His partner had also a great deal of money, but not so much as Doyle, by reason that he (D) had got some very often which he had no right to have a share of.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Doyle went again for Ireland, and carried all his money with him, and having a great many poor relations, distributed part of it amongst them; some he lent, which he could never get again, and in a little his money grew short, having frequented horse races and all public places. However, before all was spent he returned to England. Following his old course of life, he happened into several broils, with which a little money and a few friends he got over. In a short space of time he became acquainted with Benjamin Wileman. They two, with another person concerned with them, committed several robberies. At length they were discovered, apprehended and committed to Newgate. Wileman, it seems, had an itching to become an evidence against Doyle and W. G. But Doyle made himself an evidence, being really, as he said, for his own preservation and not for the sake of any reward.

Doyle's wife being for a second time transported, he went with her in the same ship, and having arrived in Virginia, slaved there some time, until he began to grow weary of the place. But as he was always too indulgent to her, he bought her her liberty, and shipped her and himself on board the first ship that came to England, when in seven weeks time they arrived in the Downs. Soon after they came up to England, but were not long in town before his wife was taken up for returning from transportation, and committed to Newgate, where she remained until the sessions following, and being brought upon her trial, pleaded guilty. When they came to pass sentence upon her, she produced his Majesty's most gracious pardon, and was admitted to bail to plead the same, and thereupon discharged. Doyle, a short time after, went to the West of England, where he slaved some time, following his old way of life; and associating himself with a certain companion, got a considerable sum of money, and came to Marlborough. And having continued some time in that neighbourhood, they usually kept the markets, where they commonly cleared five pounds a day. Going from Marlborough they came to Hungerford, and put up their horses at the George Inn; and having ordered something for dinner, saw some graziers on the road, but one of them being an old sportsman, and a brother tradesman of Doyle's formerly, he knew the said Doyle immediately, by the description given of him, and very honestly came to him, and told him that he had a charge of money about him, and withal begged that he would not hurt him, since he had made so ingenuous a confession, desiring Doyle to make the best of his way to another part of the country, telling him at the same time where he lived in London, and that if he should act honourably by him, he would put a thousand pounds in his pocket in a month's time. According to the grazier's directions, Doyle and his companions departed, but having met, as Doyle phrases it, with a running chase in their cross way, which they had taken for safety, they were obliged to return back into the main road again, and by accident put up at the same inn where the grazier and his companions were that evening. The grazier, as soon as he saw Doyle, came in and drank a bottle with him, and then retired to his companions, without taking any manner of notice of him.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

As they came for London, they took everything that came into their net, and in three days time Doyle paid his brother sportsman, the grazier, a visit, who received him handsomely, and appointed him to meet him the next market day at the Greyhound in Smithfield, in order to make good part of his promise to him. Doyle and his companion went to him, put up their horses at the same inn and passed for country farmers. This grazier, who formerly had been one of the same profession being now grown honest and bred a butcher, was then turned salesman in Smithfield, and sold cattle for country graziers, and sent them their money back by their servants who had brought the cattle to town. Having drunk a glass of wine together, they began to talk about business, and the grazier being obliged to go into the market to sell some beasts, desired Doyle and his companion to stay there until he returned. When he came he gave them some little instructions how they should proceed in an affair he had then in view to serve them in, and having taken his advice, they rode out of town; and it being a West Country fair they rode Turnham Green way.

They had not time to drink a pint of wine before the West Country chapman came ajogging along. They took two hundred and forty pounds from him, making (as D. terms it) a much quicker bargain with him than he had done with the butcher at Smithfield. The chapman begged hard for some money to carry him home to his family, and after they had given him two guineas, he said to them that he had often travelled that road with five hundred pounds about him, and never had been stopped. To which Doyle replied, that half the highwaymen who frequented the road were but mere old women, otherwise he would never have had that to brag of, and then parted. Doyle says that the honest man at Smithfield had poundage of him as well as from the grazier, so that he acted in a double capacity.

That night they came to London, and having put up their horses, put on other clothes and went to Smithfield, where not finding the butcher at home, they write a note and left it for an appointment to meet him at the Horn Tavern in Fleet Street, where they had not stayed long before he came. After taking a cheerful glass they talked the story over, and out of the booty Doyle gave turn fifty guineas, after which the butcher promised to be his friend upon a better affair. After paying the reckoning they parted and appointed to meet the next market day at Smithfield. They went at the time appointed, and having drunk a morning glass, stepped into the market and stayed some time. Their brother sportsman being very busy, he made excuse to Doyle and his companion, telling them there was nothing to be done in their way till the evening, desiring them to be patient. They remained in and about Smithfield till then, and market being entirely over, their friend came up to the place appointed, and showed them a man on horseback to whom he had just paid fifty pounds. Doyle and his companion immediately called for their horses, took leave of their friend, and kept in sight of the countryman until he was out of town. And when he was got near the Adam and Eve, at Kensington, they came up to him, and made a ceremony, as became men of their profession. He was very unwilling to part from his money, making an attempt to ride away, but they soon overtook him, and after some dispute took every penny that he received in Smithfield, and for his residing gave him back only a crown to bear his charges home. In his memoirs Doyle makes this observation, that they always robbed between sun and sun, so that the persons robbed might make the county pay them that money back if they thought fit to sue them for it.²⁹¹ Next morning Doyle and his companion came to the place appointed, and not meeting with their brother sportsman sent for him, where they drank together, and talked as usual about business, paying him poundage out of what money they had collected on his information (for they usually dealt with him as a custom-house officer does by an informer); after which they parted for that time, and did not meet for a month after.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Afterwards they went up and down Hertfordshire, but got scarce money enough to bear their expenses; but where there were small gettings they lived the more frugally, for Doyle observed that if the country did not bear their expenses wherever he travelled, he thought it very hard, and that if he failed of gaming one day, he commonly got as much the next as he could well destroy.

Hitherto we have kept very close to those memoirs which Mr. Doyle left behind him, which I did with this view, that my readers might have some idea of what these people think of themselves. I shall now bring you to the conclusion of his story, by informing you that finding himself beset at the several lodgings which he kept by way of precaution, he for some days behaved himself with much circumspection; but happening to forget his pistols, he was seized, coming out of an inn in Drury Lane, and though he made as much resistance as he was able, yet they forced him unto a coach and conveyed him to Newgate. It is hard to say what expectations he entertained after he was once apprehended, but it is reasonable to believe that he had strong hopes of life, notwithstanding his pleading guilty at his trial, for he dissembled until the time of the coming down of a death warrant, and then declared he was a Roman Catholic, and not a member of the Church of England, as he had hitherto pretended.

He seemed to be a tolerably good-natured man, but excessively vicious at the same time that he was extravagantly fond of the woman he called his wife. He took no little pleasure in the relations of those adventures which happened to him in his exploits on the highway, and expressed himself with much seeming satisfaction, because as he said, he had never been guilty of beating or using passengers ill, much less of wounding or attempting to murder them. In general terms, he pretended to much penitence, but whether it was that he could not get over the natural vivacity of his own temper, or that the principles of the Church of Rome, as is too common a case, proved a strong opiate in his conscience, however it was, I say, Doyle did not seem to have any true contrition for his great and manifold offences. On the contrary, he appeared with some levity, even when on the very point of death.

He went to execution in a mourning coach; all the way he read with much seeming attention in a little Popish manual, which had been given him by one of his friends. At the tree he spoke a little to the people, told them that his wife had been a very good wife to him, let her character in other respects be what

291. Passengers robbed on the highway between sunrise and sunset, could sue the county for the amount of their loss, it being the duty of the officials to keep the roads safe.

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

it would. Then he declared he had left behind him memoirs of his life and conduct, to which he had nothing to add there, and from which I have taken verbatim a great part of what I have related. And then, having nothing more to offer to the world, he submitted to death on the first of June, 1730, but in what year of his age I cannot say.

However, before I make an end of what relates to Mr. Doyle, it would be proper to acquaint the public that the vanity of his wife extended so far as to make a pompous funeral for him at St. Sepulchre's church, whereat she, as chief mourner assisted, and was led by a gentleman whom the world suspected to be of her husband's employment.

I have more than once remarked in the course of these memoirs that of all crimes, cruelty makes men the most generally hated, and that from this reasonable cause, that they seem to have taken up an aversion to their own kind. This was remarkably the case of the unhappy man of whom we are now speaking.

He was, it seems, the son of very honest and industrious parents, his father being a gardener at Kensington. From him he received as good an education as it was in his power to give him, and was treated with all the indulgence that could be expected from a tender parent; and it seems that after five years' stay at school, he was qualified for any business whatsoever. So after consulting his own inclinations he was put out apprentice to a coach-maker in Long Acre, where he stayed not long; but finding all work disagreeable to him, he therefore resolved to be gone,

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

let the consequence be what it would. When this resolve was once taken, it was but a very short time before it was put into execution. Living now at large, and not knowing how to gain money enough to support himself, and therefore being in very great straits, he complied with the solicitations of some hackney-coachmen, who advised him to learn their trade. They took some pains to instruct him, employed him often, and in about six months time he became perfect master of his business, and drove for Mr. Blunt, in Piccadilly. His behaviour here was so honest that Mr. Blunt gave him a good character, and he thereby obtained the place of a gentleman's coachmen. In a short time he saved money and began to have some relish for an honest life; and continuing industriously to hoard up what he received either in wages or vales [tips] at last by these methods he drew together a very considerable sum of money.

The IDLE 'PRENTICE Executed at Tyburn.

And then it came into his head to settle himself in an honest way of life, in which design his father gave him all the encouragement that was in his power, telling him in order to do it, he should marry an honest, virtuous woman. Whereupon, with the advice and consent of his parents, he married a young woman of a reputable family from Kentish Town, who, as to fortune, brought him a pretty little addition to his own savings, so that altogether he had, according to his own account, a very pretty competency wherewith to begin the world.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

For some time after his marriage he indulged himself in living without employment, but finding such a course wasted his little stock very fast, he began to apply his thoughts to the consideration of what course was the most likely to get his bread in. After beating his brains for some little time on this subject he at last resolved on keeping a public-house; which agreeing very well with his father's and relations' notions, he thereupon immediately took the King's Arms, in Red Lion Street, where for some time he continued to have very good business. In all, he remained there about five years, and might in that time have got a very pretty sum of money if he had not been so unhappy as to grow proud, as soon as he had anything in his pocket. It was not long, therefore, before he gave way to his own roving disposition, going over to Ireland, where he remained for a considerable space, living by his wits as he expresses it, or, in the language of honest people, by defrauding others.

But Ireland is a country where such sort of people are not likely to support themselves long; money is far from being plentiful, and though the common people are credulous in their nature, yet tradesmen and the folks of middling ranks are as suspicious as any nation in the world. The county of West Meath was the place where he had fixed his residence for the greatest part of the time he continued in the island, but at last it grew too hot for him. The inhabitants became sensible of his way of living, and gave him such disturbance that he found himself under an indispensable necessity of quitting that place as soon as possibly he could; and so having picked up as much money as would pay for his passage, he came over again into England, out of humour with rambling while he felt the uneasiness it had brought upon him, but ready to take it up again as soon as ever his circumstances were made a little easy, which in his present condition was not likely to happen in haste.

His friends received him very coldly, his parents had it not in their power to do more for him. In a word, the countenance of the world frowned upon him, and everybody treated him with that disdain and contempt which his foolish behaviour deserved. However, instead of reclaiming him, this forced him upon worse courses. His wife, it seems, either died in his absence, or was dead before he went abroad, and soon after his return he contracted an acquaintance with a woman, who was at that time cook in the family of a certain bishop; her he courted and a short time after, married. She brought him not only some ready money, but also goods to a pretty large value. Young being not a bit mended by his misfortunes, squandered away the first in a very short time, and turned the last into ready money. However, these supplies were of not very long continuance, and with much importunity his friends, in order, if it were possible, to keep him honest, got him in a small place in the Revenue, and he was put in as one of the officers to survey candles. In this post he continued for about a twelvemonth, and then relapsing into his former idle and profligate courses, he was quickly suspected and thereby put to his shifts again, though his wife at that time was in place, and helped him very frequently with money. This, it seems, was too servile a course for a man of Mr. Young's spirit to take, so that he picked up as much as bought him a pair of pistols, and then went upon the highway, to which it seems the foolish pride of not being dependant upon his wife did at that time not a little contribute. In his first adventure in this new employment, he got fifteen guineas, but being in a very great apprehension of a pursuit, his fears engaged him to fly down to Bristol, in order, if it were possible, to avoid them. After staying there some considerable time, he began at last to take heart, and to fancy he might be forgotten. Upon these hopes he resolved with himself to come up towards London again; and taking advantage of a person travelling with him to Uxbridge, he made use of every method in his power to insinuate himself into his fellow traveller's good graces. This he effected, insomuch that at High Wycombe, in Buckinghamshire, as Young himself told the story, he prevailed on him to lend him three half-crowns to defray his expenses, pretending that he had some friend or relation hard by who would repay him. But unfortunately for the man, he had talked too freely of a sum of money which he pretended to have about him. It thereupon raised an inclination in Young to strip him and rob him of this supposed great prize; for which purpose he attacked him in a lone place, and not only threatened him with shooting him, but as he pretended, by his hand shaking, was as good as his word, and actually wounded him in such a manner as he in all probability at that time took to be mortal; but taking advantage of the condition in which the poor man was, he made the best of his way off, and was so lucky as to escape for the present, although that crime brought him afterwards to his execution.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

When he had considered a little the nature of the fact which he had committed, it appeared even to himself of so black and barbarous a nature that he resolved to fly to the West of England, in order to remain there for some time. But from this he was deterred by looking into a newspaper and finding himself advertised there; the man whom he had shot being also said to be dead, this put him into such a consternation that he returned directly to London, and going to a place hard by where his wife lived, he sent for her, and told her that he was threatened with an unfortunate affair which might be of the greatest ill-consequence to him if he should be discovered. She seemed to be extremely moved at his misfortunes, and gave him what money she could spare, which was not a little, insomuch that Young at last began to suspect she made bold now and then to borrow of her mistress; but if she did, that was a practice he could forgive her. At last he proposed taking a lodging for himself at Horsely Down,²⁹² as a place the likeliest for him to be concealed in. There his wife continued to supply him, until one Sunday morning she came in a great hurry and brought with her a pretty handsome parcel of guineas. Young could not help suspecting she did not come very honestly by them. However, if he had the money he troubled not his head much which way he came by it, and he had so good a knack of wheedling her that he got twenty pounds out of her that Sunday.

A very few days after, intelligence was got of his retreat, and the man whom he had robbed and shot made so indefatigable a search after him, that he was taken up and committed to the New Gaol, and his wife, a very little time after, was committed to

292. This district, at the Dockhead end of Tooley Street, was at that time a sort of No Man's Land, where horses were grazed and a few poverty-stricken wretches lived in sheds and holes in the ground.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Newgate for breaking open her lady's escrutoire, and robbing her of a hundred guineas. This was what Young said himself and I repeat it because I have his memoirs before me. Yet in respect to truth, I shall be obliged to say something of another nature in its due place; but to go on with our narration according to the time in which facts happened.

A Habeas Corpus was directed to the sheriff of Surrey, whereupon Young was brought to Newgate, and at the next sessions of the Old Bailey was indicted for the aforesaid robbery, which was committed in the county of Middlesex. The charge against him was for assaulting Thomas Stinton, in a field or open place near the Highway, and taking from him a mare of the value of seven pounds, a bridle value one shilling and sixpence, a saddle value twelve shillings, three broad-pieces of gold and nine shillings in silver, at the same time putting the said Thomas Stinton in fear of his life.

Upon this indictment the prosecutor deposed that meeting with the prisoner about seven miles on this side of Bristol, and being glad of each other's company, they continued and lodged together till they came to Oxford; where the prisoner complaining that he was short of money, the prosecutor lent him a crown out of his pocket, and at Loudwater, the place where they lodged next night, he lent him half a crown more. The next morning they came for London, and being a little on this side of Uxbridge, Young said he had a friend in Hounslow who would advance him the money which he had borrowed from the prosecutor, and thereupon desired Mr. Stinton to go with him thither, to which he agreed; and Young thereupon persuaded him to go by a nearer way, and under that pretence after making him leap hedges and ditches, at last brought him to a place by the river side, where on a sudden he knocked him off his horse, and that with such force that he made the blood gush out of his nose and mouth.

As soon as Young perceived that the prosecutor had recovered his senses a little, he demanded his money, to which Mr. Stinton replied, Is this the manner in which you treat your friend? You see, I have not strength to give you anything. Whereupon Young took from him his pocket-book and money. And Mr. Stinton earnestly entreating that he would give him somewhat to bear his expenses home, in answer thereto Young said, Ay, I'll give you what shall carry you home straight, and then shot him in the neck, and pushing him down into the ditch, said, Lie there. Some time after with much ado, Mr. Stinton crawled out and got to a house, but saw no more of the prisoner, or of either of their mares.

George Hartwell deposed that he helped both the prisoner and the prosecutor to the inn where they lay at Oxford. Sarah Howard deposed that she kept the inn or house where they lodged at Loudwater the night before the robbery was committed. And all the witnesses, as well as the prosecutor being positive to the person of the prisoner, the charge seemed to be as fully proved as it was possible for a thing of that nature to admit.

The prisoner in his defence did not pretend to deny the fact, but as much as he was able endeavoured to extenuate it. He said, that for his part he did not know anything of the mare; that the going off the pistol was merely accidental; that he did, indeed, take the money, and therefore, did not expect any other than to suffer death, but that it would be a great satisfaction to him, even in his last moments, that he neither had or ever intended to commit any murder. But those words in the prosecutor's evidence, I'll give you something to carry you home, and Lie there (that is in the ditch) being mentioned in summing up the evidence to the jury, Young, with great warmth and many asseverations, denied that he made use of them. The jury, after a very short consideration, being full satisfied with the evidence which had been offered, found him guilty.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

The very same day his wife was indicted for the robbery of her mistress, when the fact was charged upon her thus: that she on a Sunday, conveyed Young secretly upstairs in her mistress's house, where she passed for a single woman; that he took an opportunity to break open a closet and to steal from thence ninety guineas, and ten pounds in silver; a satin petticoat value thirty shillings, and an orange crepe petticoat were also carried off; and she asking leave of her lady to go out in the afternoon, took that opportunity to go quite away, not being heard of for a long time. Upon her husband being apprehended for the fact for which he died, somebody remembered her and the story of her robbing her mistress, caused her thereupon to be apprehended. Not being able to prove her marriage at the time of her trial, she was convicted, and ordered for transportation. This was a very different story from that which Young told in his relations of his wife's adventure, but when it came to be mentioned to that unhappy man and pressed upon him, though he could not be brought to acknowledge it, yet he never denied it; which the Ordinary says, was a method of proceeding he took up, because unwilling to confess the truth, and afraid when so near death to tell a lie.

When under sentence of death, this unfortunate person began to have a true sense of his own miserable condition; he was very far from denying the crime for which he suffered, although he still continued to deny some of the circumstances of it. The judgment which had been pronounced upon him, he acknowledged to be very just and reasonable, and was so far from being either angry or affrighted at the death he was to die that on the contrary he said it was the only thing that gave his thoughts ease. To say truth, the force of religion was never more visible in any man than it was in this unfortunate malefactor. He was sensible of his repentance being both forced and late, which made him attend to the duties thereof with an extraordinary fervour and application. He said that the thoughts of his dissolution had no other effect upon him than to quicken his diligence in imploring God for pardon. To all those who visited him either from their knowledge of him in former circumstances, or, as too many do, from the curiosity of observing how he would behave under those melancholy circumstances in which he then was, he discoursed of nothing but death, eternity, and future judgment. The gravity of his temper and the serious turn of his thoughts was never interrupted in any respect throughout the whole space of time in which he lay under condemnation; on the contrary, he every day appeared to have more and more improved from his meditations and almost continual devotions, appearing frequently when at chapel wrapped up as it were in ecstasy at the thoughts of heaven and future felicity, humbling himself, however, for the numberless sins he had committed, and omitting nothing which could serve to show the greatness of his sorrow and the sincerity of his contrition.

The day he was to die, the unfortunate old man his father, then upwards of seventy years of age, came to visit him, and saw him haltered as he went out to execution. Words are too feeble to express that impetuosity of grief which overwhelmed both the miserable father and the dying son. However, the old man, bedewing him with a flood of tears, exhorted him not to let go on his hopes in Christ, even in that miserable conjuncture; but that he should remember the mercy of God was over all his works, and in an especial manner was promised to those who were penitent for their sins, which Christ had especially confirmed in sealing the pardon of the repenting thief, even upon the cross.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

At the place of execution he appeared scarce without any appearance of terror, much less of obstinacy or contempt of death. Being asked what he did with the pocket-book which he took from Mr. Stinton, and which contained in it things of very great use to him, Young replied ingeniously that he had burnt it, for which he was heartily sorry, but that he did not look into or make himself acquainted with its contents. Just before the cart drew away, he arose and spoke to the people, and said, The love of idleness, being too much addicted to company, and a too greedy love of strong liquors has brought me to this unhappy end. The Law intends my death for an example unto others; let it be so, let my follies prevent others from falling into the like, and let the shame which you see me suffer, deter all of you from the commission of such sins as may bring you to the like fatal end. My sentence is just, but pray, ye good people, for my soul, that though I die ignominiously here, I may not perish everlastingly.

He was executed the first of June, 1730, being at the time about thirty-nine years of age.

October 7, Wednesday (Old Style): Thomas Polson, alias Hitchin was hanged for having been a footpad and highwayman, Samuel Armstrong was hanged for housebreaking, and Nicholas Gilburn was hanged as a highwayman on the Tyburn gallows outside London.²⁹³

Habit is the most dangerous of all evils. The transports of passion are sometimes prevented from having fatal effects, either by the precautions of those with whom we quarrel, or because a sudden reflection of our own minds checks our hand. But where men have abandoned themselves to wickedness, and given themselves up to the commission of every kind of evil without restraint, there is little hope to be entertained of their ever mending; and if the fear of a sudden death work a true repentance, it is all that can be hoped.

As for this unfortunate man of whose actions the course of our memoirs obliges us to treat, he was descended from parents who lived at Marlow, in the county of Salop, who were equally honest in their reputations, and easy in their circumstances. They spared nothing in the education of their son, and it is hard to say whether their care of him was more or his application was less. Even while a child and at school he gave too evident symptoms of that lazy, indolent disposition which attended him so flagrantly and was justly the occasion of all the misfortunes of his succeeding life. Learning was of all things his aversion. It was with difficulty that he was taught to read and write. As to employment, his father brought him up to husbandry and the business of a rural life.

293. LIVES OF THE MOST REMARKABLE CRIMINALS WHO HAVE BEEN CONDEMNED AND EXECUTED FOR MURDER, THE HIGHWAY, HOUSEBREAKING, STREET ROBBERIES, COINING OR OTHER OFFENCES / COLLECTED FROM ORIGINAL PAPERS AND AUTHENTIC MEMOIRS, AND PUBLISHED IN 1735 / Edited by Arthur L. Hayward

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

When he was of age his father gave him an estate of twenty pounds per annum, freehold, and got him into a very good farm. He procured for him also a wife, who had ten pounds a year more of her own, and settled him in such a manner that no young man in the country had a better prospect of doing well than himself. But, alas! to what purpose are the endeavours of others, where a man studies nothing so much as to compass his own ruin? On a sudden he took a love to card-playing, and addicted himself to it with such earnestness that he neglected his business and squandered his money. Want was what of all things he hated, except work, and therefore rather than labour to retrieve, he bethought himself of an easier way of getting money, and that was to steal.

His first attempt was upon his father, whom he robbed of a considerable sum of money. He not being in the least suspected, a poor maid who lived in the house bore the blame for about six months, and nobody in all that time being charged with it but her, there was at last a design in the old man's head to prosecute her. This reaching young Polson's ear, he resolved not to let an innocent person suffer, which was indeed a very just and honourable act, whereupon he wrote an humble letter to his father, acknowledging his fault, begging pardon for his offences, and desiring that he would not prosecute the poor woman, or suffer her to be any longer under the odium of a fact of which she had not the least knowledge. This, to be sure, had its effect on his father, who was a very honest and considerate man. He took care to restore the wench to her good character and his favour, though for a while he with just reason continued to frown upon his son. At last paternal tenderness prevailed, and after giving him several cautions and much good advice, he promised, on his good behaviour, to forgive him what had past. The young man promised fairly, but falling quickly into necessities, want of money had its old effect upon him again, that is, impatient to be at his old practices, tired with work, and yet not knowing how to get money, he at length resolved to go into Wales and steal horses.

This project he executed, and took one from one Mr. Lewis of a considerable value. He sold it to a London butcher for about sixteen pounds, at a village not far from Shrewsbury. That money did him a little good, and therefore the next time he was in a strait he readily bethought himself of Wales. Accordingly he equipped himself with a little pad, and out he set in quest of purchase. At a little inn in Wales he met with a gentleman whom he had reason to suppose had money about him, whereupon our highwayman was very industrious first to make him drink, and then to get him for a bed-fellow, both of which designs he in the end brought to pass, and by that means robbed him of six pounds odd money, taking care to go in the morning a different road from what he had talked of, and by that means easily escaped what pursuit was made after him.

When he had committed this fact he retired towards Canterbury, giving himself over entirely to thieving or cheating, on which design he traversed the whole county of Kent, but found the people so cautious that he did it with very little advantage; until at last coming near Maidstone, he observed a parcel of fine linen hanging upon a hedge. He immediately bethought himself that though the people were wise, yet their hedges might be otherwise, upon which stepping up to it, he fairly stripped it of ten fine shirts, and so left the people who had washed them to account for it. After this exploit, he made the best of his way to London, where he speedily sold the stolen linen for five pounds to a Life Guardsman; and when he had spent a good part of it, down he went into Norfolk. And being afraid that the inhabitants would take notice of a stranger setting up his abode there for any considerable time, he thought fit to pretend to be very lame. Having continued as long as he thought proper in this place, he took his opportunity to carry off a fine mare out of the grounds of Sir John Habbard, Baronet, now the Right Honourable the Lord Blickling. This was one of the most dangerous feats he ever committed in his life, for the scent was so strong upon him, and so quickly followed, that he was forced to take a multitude of byways to get to London, where he set her up in the Haymarket. However he quickly found there was no possibility of disposing of her here, information having been given of her to all the great jockeys; so that for present money he was obliged to borrow four guineas of the man at the inn, and to leave her in his hands by way of security, which was making but a poor hand of what he had hazarded his life for.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

By this time his father had received some intelligence of his way of living, and out of tenderness of its consequences, wrote to him assuring him of forgiveness for all that was past, if he would come down into the country and live honestly. Such undeserved tenderness had some weight even with our criminal himself, and he at last began to frame his mind to comply with the request of so good a father. Accordingly, down he came, and for a little space, behaved himself honestly and as he should do; but his old distemper, laziness quickly came in his way, and finding money not to come in so fast as he would have it, he began to think of his old practice again, and prepared himself once more to sally out upon his illegal adventures. For this purpose taking with him a little mare of his brothers, for at that time he had no horse proper for the designs he went on, forth he rode in search of prey.

Wales was the place he first visited, and after riding up and down for a good while without meeting with any purchase worth taking, he at last unluckily stumbled upon a poor old man in Flintshire, who had one foot already in the grave. From him he took a silver watch, worth about five pounds, and five shillings in money, which was all the poor man had, and making thereupon the greatest haste he could out of the country, he got clear away before it was discovered. After this he came again to London, where what little money he had he lavished away upon women of the town.

It was not long before want overtook him again, upon which he determined to visit Yorkshire, in hopes of raising some considerable booty there. All the way down, according to his common practice, he bilked the public-houses, and at last arriving at Doncaster, began to set heartily about the work for which he came down. On a market day, he robbed an old farmer of forty shillings and a pair of silver buckles, taking his horse also from him, which, when he had ridden about fifteen miles across country, he turned loose. He rambled from thence on foot, as well as he could, in order to get into his native country of Shropshire, where after the commission of a multitude of such actions, none of which afforded him any great booty, he arrived.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

His father took him home again, and he lived for eleven months tolerably honest. However, to keep his hand in use, he now and then stole a shoulder of mutton, a joint which he particularly loved; but sometimes to please his father he would work a little, though it always went much against the grain. At last he quarrelled with his wife, and thereupon threatened to go away again, which very quickly after he did, turning his course, notwithstanding his former ill-success into Yorkshire once more. He was at several of the races in that county, and having no particular business at any place, did nothing but course the country round, pilfering and stealing whatever came in his way; insomuch that at one inn, finding nothing else to lay his hands on, he stole the people's sheets off the bed he lay in, and marched off in the morning so early, that he was out of danger before they perceived the theft.

But finding that he could not do any considerable matter amongst the people, who are cunning to a proverb, he bethought himself of returning to London, and the society of those strumpets in which he took a delight. However, all the way on the road he made a shift to pick up as much as kept him pretty well all the way. On his arrival in town he set up his place of residence in an inn near Leather Lane, Holborn, where he remained one whole day to rest himself after the fatigue of his northern journey. There he reflected on the sad state in which his affairs were, being without money and without friends, justly disregarded by his friends in the country, and hated and despised by all his neighbours. His debts, too, amounted there to near a hundred and forty pounds, so that there was no hopes in going back. The result of these cogitations was that the next day he would go out on the road towards Hampstead, and see what might be made there. He accordingly did so, but with very ill success. However, he returned a second time and had no better; the third day, towards evening, he observed an old gentleman in a chaise by himself, whom he robbed of six guineas, a watch, a mourning-ring, and nine and sixpence in silver, and then making over the fields got home very safe.

For three days he thought fit to remain within doors, under pretence of sickness, fearing lest he should be advertised and described in the public prints; but finding nothing of that happened, he grew bold, and for about fourteen nights continued the same trade constantly, getting, sometimes, two or three pieces, and sometimes losing his labour and getting nothing at all. At length, waiting pretty late for an old man, who, as he was informed, was to come that night with eight hundred pounds about him, although he was so feeble that a child might be able to take it from him, he at length grew impatient, and resolved to rob the first man he met. This proved to be one Mr. Andrews, who raised so quick a pursuit upon him that he never lost sight of him until the time of his being apprehended, when he was carried to Newgate and prosecuted the next sessions for the aforesaid robbery.

He was then indicted for taking from the said Thomas Andrews, after putting him in fear, six or seven shillings in money, a bay mare, bridle and saddle, and a cane, on the 23rd of July, 1730. The evidence was exceedingly clear, he having, as I have said, never gone out of sight, from the time of the robbery to the time he was taken. Under sentence of death the prisoner behaved with great piety and resignation. He showed great concern for the offences of his former life, and testified the utmost sorrow for having blemished an honest family by the shame of his vices and their just punishment. The night before his execution he wrote a letter to his parents in the country, which though it be written in a very uncouth style, yet I have thought fit to insert it verbatim, because there is a strain in it of unusual confusion and concern, expressing the agony of a dying man with more truth and tenderness than the best penned epistle could have done.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Honoured Parents,
My duty to both, my love to my brother-in-law. I wish to God I had been ruled by you, for now I see the evil of my sin, but I freely die, only the disgrace I have brought on you, my wife and children. I wrote to my wife last Saturday was seven night but had no answer, for I should have been glad to have heard from you before I die, which will be on Wednesday the seventh of this instant October, hoping I have made my peace with God Almighty. I freely forgive all the world, and die in charity with all people. Had it not been for Joyce Hite's sister and Mr. Howel, I might have starved, he told me it has cost him fifteen shillings on my account, and he gave me four more. I desire Thomas Mason will give my wife that locket for my son.
I have nothing more to say, but my prayers to God for you all day and night, and for God's sake, be as kind to my poor wife and children as in your power lies. I desire there might be some care taken of that Estate at Minton for my son. Mr. Botfield hath the old writings, and I beg you will get them and give them to my wife, and pray show her this letter and my love to her, and my blessing to my children, begging of her as I am a dying man to be good to them, and not make any difference in them, but be as kind to one as the other, and if she is able to put the boy to some trade. Mr. Waring and Thomas Tomlings have each of them a book of mine, pray ask for them, which is all I have to say, but my prayers to God for you all, which is all from your Dying Son, Richard Polson. In my Cell. October the 6th. P.S. My love to all my friends. Pray show this letter to my wife as soon as you can, and desire of her to bring up my children in the fear of the Lord, and to make my son a scholar if she is able. There is five of us to die.

In this disposition of mind, and without adding anything to his former confessions he suffered on the seventh of October, 1730, being then in the thirty-third year of his age.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

I have heretofore remarked the great danger there is in having a bad character, and keeping ill-company, from the probability of truth which it gives to every accusation that either malice or interest may induce men to bring against one.

This malefactor was the son of parents in tolerable circumstances, who were careful of his education, and when he grew up bound him apprentice to Captain Matthews, commander of a vessel which traded to Guinea and the West Indies. He behaved at sea very well, and had not the least objection made to his character when he came home. Happy had it been for him if he had gone to sea again, without suffering himself to be tainted with the vices of this great city.

Unfortunately for him, he fell in love with a young woman, and lived with her for some time as his wife. His fondness for this creature drew him to be guilty of those base actions which first brought him to Newgate and the bar at the Old Bailey, and so far blasted his character and unfortunately betrayed him to his death. In the company of this female he quickly lavished what little money he had, and not knowing how to get more, he fell into the persuasions of some wicked young fellows who advised him to take to robbing in the streets. Certain it is that he had not made many attempts (he himself said none) before he was apprehended, and that the first fact he was ever concerned in was stealing a man's hat and tobacco box in Thames Street. This was committed by his companion, who gave them to him, and then running away, left him to be answerable for the fact, for which being indicted at the next sessions at the Old Bailey, he was found guilty, but it being a single felony only it did not affect his life.

However, having been seen there by one Holland, who turned evidence, he thought fit to save his own life by swearing him into the commission of a burglary which himself and one Thomas Griffith actually committed. However, his oath being positive, and the character of this unhappy lad so bad, the people who were robbed were induced to prosecute him with great vehemence, and the jury, on the same presumptions, found him guilty. Griffith, who received sentence with him but afterwards had a pardon, acknowledged that he himself was guilty, but declared at the same time that this unhappy young man was absolutely clear of what was laid to his charge, Holland and himself being the only persons who committed that burglary, and took away the kitchen things which were sworn against him. Moreover, that Armstrong coming to Newgate, and seeing Holland and speaking to him about something, Holland took that opportunity of asking who Armstrong was, and what he came there for, being told the story of his conviction for the hat and wig, he thought fit to add him to his former information against Griffith, and so by swearing against two, effectually secured himself. In this story both the unhappy person of whom we are speaking and Thomas Griffith, who was condemned for and confessed the fact agreed, and Armstrong went to death absolutely denying the fact for which he was to suffer.

At the place of execution his colour changed, and though at other times he appeared to be a bold young man, yet now his courage failed him, he trembled and turned pale, besought the people to pray for his soul, and in great agony and confusion, submitted to death on the seventh day of October, 1730, being at the time of his death about twenty-two years of age.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

This unfortunate person was born at Ballingary, near Limerick, in the west of Ireland, of parents in very tolerable circumstances, who gave him a very good education; but perceiving that he had a martial disposition, they resolved not to cross it, and therefore, though he was not above fourteen years of age, got him recommended to an officer, who received him as a dragoon. He served about four years with a very good reputation in the army; but he had a brother who then rode in a regiment of horse, who wrote to him from London, and encouraged him to come over into England, which occasioned his writing to his officer to desire his discharge. To this his officer readily agreed.

He went thereupon from the north of Ireland to the west, to his friend, where having equipped himself with clothing, linen and other necessaries, he then came to London, expecting to meet his brother. But on his arrival here he was disappointed, and that disappointment, together with his want of money, made him very uneasy. At last, in order to procure bread, he resolved to list himself in the Foot Guards. He did so, and continued in them for about two years, during which time, he says in his dying declaration, that he did duty as well, and appeared as clean as any man in the company; nay, in all that time, he avers that he never neglected his guard but once, which was very fatal to him, for it brought him into the acquaintance of those who betrayed him to measures which cost him his life. For being taken up and carried to the Savoy for the afore-mentioned offence, he had not been long in prison before Wilson, who had been concerned with Burnworth, alias Frazier, and the rest in the murder of Mr. Ball in the Mint; and one Mr. G—, an old highwayman, though he had never conversed with him before, came to pay him a visit.

They treated him both with meat and drink, seemed to commiserate his condition very much, and promised him that he should not want twelvepence a day, during the time in confinement. This promise was very well kept, and Gilburn in a few days obtained his liberty. The next day he met Wilson in St. James's Park, who after complimenting him upon his happy deliverance, invited him to a house in Spring Gardens to drink and make merry together. Gilburn readily consented, and after discoursing of courage, want of money, the miseries of poverty, and some other preparatory articles, Wilson parted with him for that time, appointing another meeting with him at eleven o'clock the next morning. There Wilson pursued his former topic, and at last told him plainly that the best and shortest method to relieve their wants was to go on the highway; and when he had once made this step, he scrupled not to make a further, telling Gilburn that there was no such danger in those practices as was generally apprehended, for that with a little care and circumspection the gallows might be well enough avoided, which he said was plain enough from his own adventures, since he had lived several years in the profession, and by being cautious enough to look about him, had escaped any confinement.

Gilburn heard this account with terror. He had never committed anything of this kind hitherto, and knew very well that if he once engaged he could never afterwards go back. Wilson seemed not at all uneasy at his pause, but artfully introducing discourse on other subjects, plied him in the meanwhile with liquor, until he saw him pretty warm, and then resumed the story of his own adventures and of the facility of acquiring money when a man is but well stored with courage and has ever so little conduct. This artifice unfortunately had its effect, Wilson's conversation and the fumes of liquor prevailing so far upon Gilburn that, as he himself phrased it, he resolved at last upon business.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

The day following, Gilburn provided himself with pistols, and removed his quarters to go and live with Wilson, who encouraged him with all the arguments he was able to stick to his new profession, and Gilburn in return swore he would live and die with him. So at night they went out together in quest of adventures. The road they took was towards Paddington. A little after they were come into the fields, they attacked a gentleman and took from him eight shillings, with which Gilburn was very much pleased, though they had little luck after, so that they returned at last to their lodgings, weary and fatigued, and were obliged to mount guard the next morning. When their guard was over, they were, as Mr. Gilburn expresses it in his last speech, as bare as a bird's arse, so no time was to be lost, and accordingly that very night they made their second expedition. Nobody coming in their way, Gilburn began to fret, and at last falling into a downright passion, swore he would rob the first man he met. He was as good as his word, and the booty he got proved a tolerable provision for some days.

But guard-day drawing nigh again, Wilson told him there was no mounting without money, and the same methods were taken as formerly; but as the leagues by which men are united in villainy are liable to a thousand inconveniencies which are uneasily born, and yet hard to be remedied, so Wilson's humours being very different from that of Gilburn, they soon began to differ about the money they acquired by plunder. At last, coming one night very much tired and fatigued to a public-house where Wilson was acquainted, they called for some drink to refresh themselves, which when they had done, Gilburn was for dividing the money, himself standing in need of linen and other necessaries. Wilson, on the other hand, was for having a bowl of punch, and words thereupon arose to such a height that at last they fell to fighting. This quarrel was irreconcilable, and they absolutely parted company, though Gilburn unfortunately pursued the same road; and having robbed a gentleman on horseback of several yards of fine padusoy, he was shortly after apprehended and committed to Newgate.

At first he absolutely denied the fact, but when he was convicted, and saw no hopes of pardon, he acknowledged what had been sworn against him by the prosecutor to be true, attended with much gravity at chapel, and seemed to be greatly afflicted through a due sense of those many sins which he had committed. Wilson, his companion, had a little before been executed at Kingston, and Gilburn with all outward signs of contrition, suffered the same death at Tyburn, at the same time with the before-mentioned malefactor, being at the time of his death about twenty-two years of age.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

November 16, Monday (Old Style): James O'Bryan, Hugh Morris, and Robert Johnson, highwaymen and street-robbers, were hanged on the Tyburn gallows outside London.²⁹⁴

Amongst the many flagrant vices of the present age, there is none more remarkable than the strange property we see in young people to commit the most notorious crimes, provided they may thereby furnish themselves with money enough to support their lavish expenses in vices which in former times were scarce heard of by lads of that age, at which our boldest highwaymen begin to exert themselves now.

The first of these unfortunate lads, James O'Bryan, was born at Dublin, was brought over hither young, and had a good education given him which he had very little inclination to make a proper use of. Nothing could persuade him to go out to a trade; on the contrary, he pretended he would apply himself to his father's employment, which was that of a plasterer. But as working was required, he soon grew out of humour with it, and addicted himself wholly to strolling about the streets with such wicked lads as himself, and so was easily drawn in to think of supplying himself with money by the plunder of honest people, in order to carry on those debaucheries in which, though a lad, he was already deeply immersed.

Women, forsooth, drew this spark away from the paths of virtue and goodness at about sixteen years old, after which time he lost all sense of duty to his parents, respect of laws divine or human, and even care of himself. It seems he found certain houses in Chick Lane, where they met abundance of loose young men and women, accustomed themselves to every kind of debauchery which it was possible for wicked people to commit or the most fruitful genius to invent. Here he fell into the company of his two companions, Morris and Johnson.

The first of these was the son of an unfortunate tradesman who had once kept a great shop, and lived in good reputation in the Strand, but through the common calamities of life, he was so unfortunate as to break, and laying it too much to heart, died soon after it, happy, however, in one thing, that he did not live to see the deplorable end of his son by the hand of justice. Robert Johnson was the son of honest parents, and had a very good education, but put it to a very ill use; for having all his life time been addicted to pilfering and thieving, at last he fell into the company of these unfortunate young men who led him a directer way to the gallows than perhaps he might have found himself. One of his chief inducements to forfeit reputation and hazard life by engaging in street robberies, was his commencing an amour with his father's servant-maid, and not long after falling into a multitude of such like adventures, the ready road to inevitable ruin.

294. LIVES OF THE MOST REMARKABLE CRIMINALS WHO HAVE BEEN CONDEMNED AND EXECUTED FOR MURDER, THE HIGHWAY, HOUSEBREAKING, STREET ROBBERIES, COINING OR OTHER OFFENCES / COLLECTED FROM ORIGINAL PAPERS AND AUTHENTIC MEMOIRS, AND PUBLISHED IN 1735 / Edited by Arthur L. Hayward

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

These three sparks, together with Bernard Fink, and another person who turned evidence against them, came all at the same time to a resolution of attacking people in the streets; and having provided themselves with pistols and whatever else they thought necessary for putting their design in execution, they immediately set about it, and though but boys, committed bolder and more numerous robberies than had ever hitherto been heard of. It may, indeed, seem surprising that lads of their age should be able to intimidate passengers, but when it is considered that having less precaution than older rogues, they were more ready at firing pistols or otherwise injuring those whom they attacked, than any set of fellows who had hitherto disturbed the crown, this wonder will wear off.

It was not above two months that they continued their depredations, but in that time they had been exceedingly busy, and had committed a multitude of facts. One gentleman whom they attacked in Lincoln's Inn Fields, refused to surrender, and drew his sword upon Morris. That young robber immediately fired his pistol, and the rest coming to his assistance, the gentleman thought it but prudent to retire, the noise they made having alarmed the watch and so prevented his losing anything.

After this it became a very common practice with them, as soon as they stopped anybody, to clap a pistol under their nose, and bid them smell at it, while one of their companions, with a thousand execrations, threatened to blow their brains out if they made the least resistance. As soon as the business of the night was over, they immediately adjourned to their places of rendezvous at Chick Lane, or to other houses of the same stamp elsewhere, and without the least consideration of the hazards they had run, squandered the wages of their villainies upon such impudent strumpets as for the lucre of a few shillings prostituted themselves to them in these debaucheries.

Mr. O'Bryan was the hero of this troop of infant robbers; he valued himself much on never meddling with small matters or committing any meaner crime than that of the highway. It happened he had a mistress coming out of the country and he would needs have his companions take each of them a doxy and go with him as far as Windsor to receive her. They readily complied, and at Windsor they were all seized and from thence brought to town, two of their own gang turning evidence, so that on the clearest proof, they were all three convicted.

Under sentence of death they behaved with great audacity, seemed to value themselves on the crimes they had committed, caused several disturbances at chapel and discovered little or no sense of that miserable condition in which they were. O'Bryan died a Papist, and in the cart read with great earnestness a book of devotions in that way. He wrote a letter to his father the day before he died, and also something which he called verses to his sister, both of which I have subjoined verbatim that my readers may have the better idea of the capacity of those poor creatures.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

To Mr. Terrance O'Bryan, living in Burleigh Street in the Strand. Honoured Father and Mother,
The uneasiness I give you is more terror to me than the thoughts of death, but pray make yourselves as easy as you can, for I hope I am going to a better place; for God is my refuge and my strength, and my helper in time of tribulation, and pray take care of my brother now whilst he is young, and make him serve God, and keep him out of bad company. If I had served God as I ought to have done, and kept out of bad company, I had not come to this unhappy misfortune, but I hope it is for the good of my soul, it is good I hope what God has at present ordained for me, for there is mercy in the foresight of death, and in the time God has given me to prepare for it. A natural death might have had less terror, for in that I might have wanted many advantages which are now granted me. My trust is in God, and I hope he won't reward me according to my deserts. All that I can suffer here must have an end, for this life is short, so are all the sufferings of it, but the next life is Eternal. Pray give my love to my sister, and desire her not to neglect her duty to God. I hope you are all well, as I am at present, I thank God. So no more at present.

From your unhappy and undutiful son, James O'Bryan.

The verses sent by James O'Bryan to his sister two days before his execution:

My loving tender sister dear,
From you I soon must part I fear.
Think not on my wretched state,
Nor grieve for my unhappy fate,
But serve the Lord with all your heart,
And from you He'll never part.
When I am dead and in my tomb,
For my poor soul I hope there's room,
In Heaven with God above on high,
I hope to live eternally.

At the time of their execution James O'Bryan was about twenty, Hugh Morris seventeen, and Robert Johnson not full twenty years of age, which was on the 16th of November, 1730.

December 23, Wednesday (Old Style): Abraham White, Francis Sanders, John Mines, alias Minsham, alias Mitchell, Constance Buckle, and Joshua Cornwall, thieves and housebreakers, were hanged on the Tyburn gallows outside London.²⁹⁵

Of these unfortunate lads, Abraham White was born of mean parents who had it not in their power to give him much education, but taught him, however, the business of a bricklayer, which was his father's trade, and by which, doubtless, if he had been careful, he might have got his bread. But he unfortunately addicting himself from childhood to drinking and lewd company, soon plunged himself into all manner of wickedness, and quickly brought on a fatal necessity of stepping into the road of the gallows; and associating himself with Sanders and Minsham, they had all gone together upon the road for about six weeks before they were taken.

295. LIVES OF THE MOST REMARKABLE CRIMINALS WHO HAVE BEEN CONDEMNED AND EXECUTED FOR MURDER, THE HIGHWAY, HOUSEBREAKING, STREET ROBBERIES, COINING OR OTHER OFFENCES / COLLECTED FROM ORIGINAL PAPERS AND AUTHENTIC MEMOIRS, AND PUBLISHED IN 1735 / Edited by Arthur L. Hayward

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Francis Sanders was a young fellow of very tolerable arts and education. He had been put out apprentice to a stay-maker, attained to a great proficiency in his trade; and by the help of his friends, who were very willing to lend him their assistance, he might have done very well in the world if it had not been for that unfortunate inclination to roving, which continually possessed him. His acquaintance with a certain bad woman was in all probability the first cause of his addicting himself to ill-courses, and as in the papers I have before me relating to him, her history is also contained, I thought it would not be unentertaining to my readers if I ventured to insert it. This woman's true name was Mary Smith. She was brought up, while young, from her native country of Yorkshire to London, where getting into the service of an eminent shopkeeper, she might, had she been honest and industrious, have lived easily and with credit; but unfortunately both for herself and her master's apprentice, the young man took a liking to her, and one night, having first taken care to make himself master of the key of her door, he came out of his chamber into hers, where after a faint resistance, he got to bed to her. Their correspondence was carried on for a good while without suspicion, but the young man having one night stole a bottle of rum with a design that it should make his mistress and he merry together before they went to bed, they inconsiderately drank so heartily of it that the next morning they slept so sound that their master and mistress came upstairs at ten o'clock, and found them in bed together. Upon this, the wench, without more ado, was turned out of doors, and was forced to live at an alehouse of ill-repute, where Sanders used to come of an evening, and so got acquainted with her.

John Minsham was an unfortunate wretch, born of mean parents, and equally destitute of capacity or education. From the time he had been able to crawl alone, he had known scarce any other home than the street. Shoe-blacks and such like vagabonds were his constant companions, and the only honest employment he ever pretended to was that of a hackney-coachman, which the brethren of the whip had taught him out of charity.

Thus furnished with bad principles, and every way fitted for those detestable practices into which they precipitated themselves, they first got into one another's company at a dram-shop near St. Giles in the Fields, much frequented by Constance Buckle, a most lewd and abandoned strumpet, and one Rowland Jones, a fellow of as bad principles as themselves. One night, having intoxicated themselves with the vile manufacture of the house, they went out, after they had spent their money, and in Bloomsbury Square attacked one John Ross, from whom they took away a hat value five shillings, and fourpence halfpenny in money. This man, it seems, lived the very next door to the gin-shop where they frequented. Going there the next day, to make complaint, he was immediately told that the people who had robbed him had sold his hat, and were coming thither by and by to drink the money out in gin. Upon this information Ross procured proper assistance, and the people keeping their appointment pretty exactly, were all surprised and taken.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

In the confusion they were under when first apprehended, Minsham and Sanders in part owned the fact, but Rowland Jones making a full and frank discovery, was accepted as an evidence, and produced against them at their trial at the ensuing sessions at the Old Bailey, where, upon full evidence, they were all convicted of this fact, and Francis Sanders, Constance Buckle, and Robert Tyler, were indicted for assaulting Richard Smith on the highway, putting him in fear, and taking from him a hat value five shillings.

Rowland Jones, the evidence, deposed that the night the robbery was committed he was in company with the prisoners at a brandy shop, where having drunk until they were all pretty much elevated, they went out in order to see what they could pick up. And not far from the place they went from, overtaking a man whom they saw had a pretty good hat on, Sanders hit him a blow in the face, and that not doing the business, he repeated it, and at the second blow, the hat fell off from his head, whereupon Constance Buckle caught it and clapped it under her coat. The constable deposed that by the information of Rowland Jones, he apprehended the prisoners. Constance Buckle acknowledged that she was in their company when the man was knocked down and the hat taken, whereupon the jury, without withdrawing, found them guilty, and they received sentence of death.

The woman Constance Buckle pleaded her being with child, and a jury of matrons being impannelled, they found she was quick, and thereby procured her a respite of execution, and soon after her sentence was changed to transportation. The rest, under conviction, behaved themselves very indifferently, and manifested sufficiently that though custom and an evil disposition might make them bold in the commission of robberies, yet when death looked them steadily and unavoidably in the face, all that resolution forsook them, and in their last moments they behaved with all the appearances of terror which are usually seen in souls just awakened to a due sense of their guilt. They died on the 23rd of December, 1730; White being eighteen, Sanders near eighteen, and Minsham sixteen years of age.

Though vices are undoubtedly the chief instruments that bring unhappy persons to that ignominious death which the Law hath appointed for enormous offences, yet it very often happens that folly rather than wickedness brings them first into the road of ruin; in which, led on by delusive hopes, they continue to run until a disastrous fate overtakes them, and puts an end at once to their vicious race, and to their lives. The criminal whose memoirs at present employ our pen is such an example as I hope, while it entertains, may also instruct my readers to avoid his errors.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

This unfortunate man was the son of reputable and honest parents in the town of Brigg in the county of Lincoln. Their circumstances were such as enabled them to give him an education; and the desire they had of doing everything that was possible for their son inclined them not to be wanting in this particular. His mother, was fond of him to a fault, and being permitted by her indulgence to run up and down amongst young people of his own age, riding across the country to friends and other diversions of a like nature, he lost all liking to things of a serious nature, and without thinking how to procure the necessaries of life, was altogether taken up in enjoying those pleasures to which he had the greatest inclination. In the midst of this pleasant situation of things (at least as it appeared to him at that time) the prospect was darkened by the death of his mother. His friends retained for him a due paternal affection, but had no notion of permitting him to go on the life he led, and therefore to break him of that as well as to make him acquainted with an honest method of getting his living, his father put him out apprentice to a baker in Hull.

The IDLE 'PRENTICE Executed at Tyburn.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

But as kindness seemed of all things the most fatal to this unhappy man, so the acquaintance and friendship which his master had for Cornwall's family became a new means of leading him into misfortune, for treating the young man rather with a tenderness due to a son than that severity which is usually practised towards apprentices and servants, it gave him an opportunity of renewing his old course of life. Instead of inclining him to behave in a manner which might deserve such lenity, it gave him, on the contrary, occasion frequently to abuse it by running from one dancing bout and merry-making to another, without the least care of his master's business, who out of downright affection forbore to restrain his follies with that harshness which they deserved, and which any other person would have used.

At length, having acquired so great a habit of laziness and so strong an aversion to business that he found it impossible for him to live longer in the country, he came up to London, that great receptacle of those who are either unable or unwilling to live anywhere else. Here he got into service as a footman with several persons of worth, and discharged his duty well (as indeed it was a kind of life which of all others suited him best), so that he obtained a tolerable reputation whereby he got into the service of one Mr. Fenwick, a gentleman of affluent fortune. Here it was that through desire of abounding in money he either drew in others, or was drawn in himself to commit that crime which cost him his life.

It seems that in Mr. Fenwick's family there was a great deal of plate used, which stood on a buffet. This tempted Cornwall, and it is highly likely gave him the first notion of attempting to rob the house. When he had once formed this project he resolved to take in one Rivers, a debauched companion of his, as a partner in the designed theft.

This Rivers was certainly easy enough prevailed on to join in the commission of this fact, and after several meetings to consult upon proper measures, Rivers at last proposed that their scheme should be put in execution as soon as possible; and that he might the more perfectly conceive how it was to be managed, he went home with Cornwall, and looked upon the house. Soon after this they held their last consultation, and Cornwall saying to Rivers that he must bring some other persons to assist him, Rivers made choice of one Girst, and coming with him at the appointed hour, Cornwall in his shirt opened the door and let them in. In the buffet there stood a lighted candle in a silver candle-stick, by which they were directed to the rest of the plate, which as soon as they had taken out, they placed all together upon the carpet, and fell next to rifling Mr. Fenwick's bureau, and took out a great quantity of linen, a lady's lace, the tea equipage, and two silver canisters. Then making it up in a bundle, it was carried to River's lodgings in Vinegar Yard, Drury Lane.

All this could not be performed with so little noise as not to disturb the family. Mr. Fenwick himself heard the noise, being awakened by his wife, who had heard it for some time, but it ceasing they fell asleep again until one of the servants came up in the morning, and told his master that the house had been robbed, the plate taken away, and a window in the back parlour left open, about which, as he could observe no marks of violence, he was led to suspect it was opened by somebody in the family; upon which Cornwall and a maid in the house were immediately thought to have a hand in. However, as there was no sort of proof, Mr. Fenwick forbore seizing them at that time, and contented himself with advertizing his plate; which advertisement coming into the hands of a pawnbroker, to whom a part of it had been pledged, he immediately gave notice that it was pawned to him by Rivers. A warrant being upon this obtained for the searching of River's lodging, a note was there found, directed to Thomas Rivers, Glover, in Guy's Court, Vinegar Yard, Drury Lane, in which were these words:

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Dear Tom,

Let me see you at seven o'clock to-morrow morning, at the Postern Spring, Tower Hill, be sure.

Joshua Cornwall.

Upon this Cornwall was immediately taken up and Girst readily offered himself an evidence. In a few days after, sessions coming on, Joshua Cornwall and Thomas Rivers were indicted for burglariously breaking the house of Nicholas Fenwick, Esq., and taking thence divers pieces of plate, to the value of eighty-five pounds nineteen shillings, holland shirts to the value of twenty pounds, and other goods of the said Mr. Fenwick, on the 8th day of September, 1730. This indictment being fully proved, the jury found Thomas Rivers guilty thereof. But being dubious whether Joshua Cornwall, as a servant within the house of Mr. Fenwick, could be properly convicted of burglariously breaking into his said master's house, they found their verdict as to him special; which the judges having considered, they were unanimously of opinion that the crime was in its nature a burglary. Whereupon, at the following sessions at the Old Bailey, the criminal was brought to the bar, and being acquainted with their lordships' opinion, received sentence of death.

Under conviction, he behaved himself with great penitence, said he had not been guilty of many of those atrocious crimes commonly practised by such as come to that fatal end whither his folly had led him. At the place of execution he, with great fervency, justified the character of a young woman who had lived fellow-servant with him at Mr. Fenwick's. He declared, as he was a dying man, that she was not in the least privy to the injury done her master, and that he had no other than an acquaintance with her, without either having, or attempting any criminal conversation with her. Having done this justice, he seemed to die with much composure, in the twenty-second year of his age, on the 23rd of December, 1730.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

THE HISTORY OF THE LIFE AND SURPRISING ADVENTURES OF

JOHN GOW, ALIAS SMITH,

A MOST NOTORIOUS PIRATE AND MURDERER²⁹⁶

The principal use to which a work of this nature can be applied is to engage persons to refuse the first stirrings of their passions, and the slighted emotions of vice in their breasts, since they see before their eyes so many sad examples of the fatal consequences which follow upon rash and wicked enterprises, of which the following history exhibits as extraordinary an instance as perhaps is anywhere to be found.

In giving an account of this malefactor, we are obliged to begin with his embarking on board the vessel which he afterwards seized and went a-pirating in. It was called the George galley, and was of about two hundred tons burden, commanded by Oliver Ferneau, a Frenchman, but a subject of the Crown of England, who entertained this Gow as a private seaman only, but afterwards, to his great misfortune, preferred him to be the second mate in the voyage of which we are next to speak.

Captain Ferneau being a man of reputation among the merchants of Amsterdam, got a voyage for his ship from thence to Santa Cruz on the coast of Barbary, to load beeswax, and to carry it to Genoa, which was his delivering port; and as the Dutch, having war with the Turks of Algiers, were willing to employ him as an English ship, so he was as willing to be manned with English seamen, and accordingly among the rest, he unhappily took on board this Gow with his wretched gang, such as MacCauly, Melvin, Williams and others. But not being able to man themselves wholly with English or Scots, he was obliged to take some Swedes, and other seamen to make his complement, which was twenty-three in all. Among the latter sort, one was named Winter, and another Peterson, both of them Swedes by nation, but wicked as Gow and his other fellows were. They sailed from the Texel in the month of August, 1724, and arrived at Santa Cruz on the second of September following, where having a super-cargo on board, who took charge of the loading, and four chests of money to purchase it, they soon got the beeswax, on board, and on the third of November they appointed to set sail to pursue the voyage.

That day the ship having lain two months in the road at Santa Cruz, taking in her lading, the captain made preparations to put to sea, and the usual signals for sailing having been given, some of the merchants from on shore, who had been concerned in furnishing the cargo, came on board in the forenoon to take their leave of the captain, and wish him a good voyage, as is usual on such occasions. Whether it was concerted by the whole gang beforehand, we know not, but while the captain was treating and entertaining the merchants under the awning upon the quarter deck, as is the custom in those hot countries, three of the seamen, viz., Winter and Peterson, two Swedes, and MacCauly a Scotchman, came rudely upon the quarter deck as if they took the opportunity because the merchants were present, believing the captain would not use any violence with them in the presence of the merchants.

296. LIVES OF THE MOST REMARKABLE CRIMINALS WHO HAVE BEEN CONDEMNED AND EXECUTED FOR MURDER, THE HIGHWAY, HOUSEBREAKING, STREET ROBBERIES, COINING OR OTHER OFFENCES / COLLECTED FROM ORIGINAL PAPERS AND AUTHENTIC MEMOIRS, AND PUBLISHED IN 1735 / Edited by Arthur L. Hayward

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

They made a long complaint of all their ill-usage, and particularly of their provisions and allowance, as they said, being not sufficient nor such as was ordinarily made in other merchant ships, seeming to load the captain, Monsieur Ferneau, with being the occasion of it, and that he did it for his private gain, which however had not been true. If the fact had been true, the overplus of provisions (if the stores had been more than sufficient) belonged to the owners, not to the captain, at the end of the voyage, there being also a steward on board to take the account. In making this complaint they seemed to direct their speech to the merchants as well as to the captain, as if they had been concerned in the ship, or as if desiring them to intercede for them with the captain, that they might have redress and a better allowance.

The captain was highly provoked at this rudeness, as indeed he had reason, it being a double affront to him as it was done in the view of the merchants who were come on board to him, to do him an honour at parting. However, he restrained his passion, and gave them not the least angry word, only that if they were aggrieved they had no more to do but to let him have know of it; that if they were ill-used it was not by his order that he would enquire into it and if anything was amiss it should be rectified, with which the seamen withdrew, seemingly well satisfied with his answer.

About five the same evening they unmoored the ship and hove short upon their best bower anchor, awaiting the land breeze (as is usual on that coast) to carry them out to sea; but instead of that, it fell stark calm, and the captain fearing the ship would fall foul of her own anchor, ordered the mizen top-sail to be furled. Peterson, one of the malcontent seamen, being the nearest man at hand seemed to go about it, but moved so carelessly and heavily that it appeared plainly he did not care whether it was done or no, and particularly as if he had a mind the captain should see it and take notice of it. Which the captain did, for perceiving how awkwardly he went about it, he spoke a little tartly to him, and asked him what was the reason he did not stir a little and furl the sail. Peterson, as if he had waited for the question, answered in a surly tone, and with a kind of disdain, So as we eat, so shall we work. This he spoke aloud, so that he might be sure the captain heard him and the rest of the men also, and it was evident that as he spoke in plural numbers, We, so he spoke their minds as well as his own, and words which they all agreed to before.

The captain, however, though he heard plain enough what he said, took not the least notice of it, or gave him the least reason to believe he had heard him, being not willing to begin a quarrel with the men and knowing that if he took any notice at all of it, he must resent it and punish it too.

Soon after this, the calm went off, and the land breeze sprang up, and they immediately weighed and stood out to sea; but the captain having had these two bustles with his men just at their putting to sea, was very uneasy in his mind, as indeed he had reason to be; and the same evening, soon after they were under sail, the mate being walking on the quarter deck, he went, and taking two or three turns with him, told him how he had been used by the men, particularly how they affronted him before the merchants, and what an answer Peterson had given him on the quarter deck, when he ordered him to furl the mizen top sail. The mate was as surprised at these things as the captain, and after some other discourse about it, in which it was their unhappiness not to be so private as they ought to have been in a case of such importance, the captain told him he thought it was absolutely necessary to have a quantity of small arms brought immediately into the great cabin, not only to defend themselves if there should be occasion, but also that he might be in a posture to correct those fellows for their insolence, especially should he meet with any more of it. The mate agreed that it was necessary to be done, and had they said no more, or said this more privately, all had been well, and the wicked design had been much more difficult, if not the execution of it effectually prevented.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

But two mistakes in this part was the ruin of them all. First, that the captain spoke it without due caution, so that Winter and Peterson, the two principal malcontents, who were expressly mentioned by the captain to be corrected, overheard it, and knew by that means what they had to expect if they did not immediately bestir themselves to prevent it. The other mistake was that when the captain and mate agreed that it was necessary to have arms got ready, and brought into the great cabin, the captain unhappily bid him go immediately to Gow, the second mate and gunner, and give him orders to get the arms cleared and loaded for him, and to bring them up to the great cabin; which was in short to tell the conspirators that the captain was preparing to be too strong for them, if they did not fall to work with him immediately.

Winter and Peterson went immediately forward, where they knew the rest of the mutineers were, and to whom they communicated what they had heard, telling them that it was time to provide for their own safety, for otherwise their destruction was resolved on, and the captain would soon be in such a posture that there would be no muddling with him. While they were thus consulting, as they said, only for their own safety, Gow and Williams came into them with some others to the number of eight, and no sooner were they joined by these two, but they fell downright to the point which Gow had so long formed in his own mind, viz., to seize upon the captain and mate, and all those that they could not bring to join with them; in short, to throw them into the sea, and to go upon the account. All those who are acquainted with the sea language know the meaning of that expression, and that it is, in few words, to run away with the ship and turn pirates.

Villainous designs are soonest concluded; as they had but little time to consult upon what measures they should take, so very little consultation served for what was before them, and they came to this short but hellish resolution, viz., that they would immediately, that very night, murder the captain and such others as they named, and afterwards proceed with the ship as they should see cause. And here it is to be observed that though Winter and Peterson were in the first proposal, namely to prevent their being brought to correction by the captain, yet

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Gow and Williams were the principal advisers in the bloody part, which however the rest came into soon; for, as I said before, as they had but little time to resolve in, so they had but very little debate about it but what was first proposed was forthwith engaged in and consented to.

It must not be omitted that Gow had always had the wicked game of pirating in his head, and that he had attempted it, or rather tried to attempt it before, but was not able to bring it to pass; so he and Williams had also several times, even in this very voyage, dropped some hints of this vile design, as they thought there was room for it, and touched two or three times at what a noble opportunity they had of enriching themselves, and making their fortunes, as they wickedly called it. This was when they had the four chests of money on board and Williams made it a kind of jest in his discourse, how easily they might carry it off, ship and all. But as they did not find themselves seconded, or that any of the men showed themselves in favour of such a thing, but rather spoke of it with abhorrence they passed it over as a kind of discourse that had nothing at all in it, except that one of the men, viz., the surgeon, once took them up short for so much as mentioning such a thing, told them the thought was criminal and it ought not to be spoken of among them, which reproof was supposed cost him his life afterwards.

As Gow and his comrade had thus started the thing at a distance before, though it was then without success, yet they had the less to do now, when other discontents had raised a secret fire in the breasts of the men; for now, being as it were mad and desperate with apprehensions of their being severely punished by the captain, they wanted no persuasions to come into the most wicked undertaking that the devil or any of his angels could propose to them. Nor do we find that upon any of their examinations they pretended to have made any scruples or objections to the cruelty of the bloody attempt that was to be made, but came to it at once, and resolved to put it in execution immediately, that is to say, the very same evening.

It was the captain's constant custom to call all the ship's company into the great cabin every night at eight o'clock to prayers, and then the watch being set, one went upon deck, and the other turned in, or, as the seamen phrase it, went to their hammocks to sleep; and here they concerted their devilish plot. It was the turn of five of the conspirators to go to sleep, and of these Gow and Williams were two. The three who were to be upon the deck were Winter, Rowlinson, and Melvin, a Scotchman. The persons they immediately designed for destruction were four, viz., the captain, the mate, the super-cargo, and the surgeon, whereof all but the captain were gone to sleep, the captain himself being upon the quarter deck.

Between nine and ten at night, all being quiet and secure, and the poor gentlemen that were to be murdered fast asleep, the villains that were below gave the watch-word, which was, Who fires next? At which they all got out of their hammocks with as little noise as they could, and going in the dark to the hammocks of the chief mate, super-cargo and surgeon, they cut all their throats. The surgeon's throat was cut so effectually that he could struggle very little with them, but leaping out of his hammock, ran up to get upon the deck, holding his hand upon his throat. But he stumbled at the tiller, and falling down had no breath, and consequently no strength to raise himself, but died where he lay.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

The mate, whose throat was cut but not his windpipe, struggled so vigorously with the villain who attacked him that he got away from him and into the hold; and the super-cargo, in the same condition, got forwards between decks under some deals and both of them begged with the most moving cries and entreaties for their lives. And when nothing could prevail, they begged with the same earnestness for but a few moments to pray to God, and recommend their souls to mercy. But alike in vain, for the wretched murderers, heated with blood, were past pity, and not being able to come at them with their knives, with which they had begun the execution, they shot them with their pistols, firing several times upon each of them until they found they were quite dead.

As all this, even before the firing, could not be done without some noise, the captain, who was walking alone upon the quarter-deck, called out and asked what was the matter. The boatswain, who sat on the after bits, and was not of the party, answered he could not tell, but he was afraid there was somebody overboard; upon which the captain stepped towards the ship's side to look over. Then Winter, Rowlinson and Melvin, coming that moment behind him, laid hands on him, and lifting him up, attempted to throw him overboard into the sea; but he being a nimble strong man, got hold of the shrouds and struggled so hard with them that they could not break his hold. Turning his head to look behind him to see who he had to deal with, one of them cut his throat with a broad Dutch knife; but neither was that wound mortal, for the captain still struggled with them, and seeing he should undoubtedly be murdered, he constantly cried up to God for mercy, for he found there was none to be expected from them. During this struggle, another of the murderers stabbed him with a knife in the back, and that with such a force that the villain could not draw the knife out again to repeat his blow, which he would otherwise have done.

At this moment Gow came up from the butchery he had been at between decks, and seeing the captain still alive, he went close up to him and shot him, as he confessed, with a brace of bullets. What part he shot him in could not be known, though they said he had shot him in the head; however, he had yet life enough (though they threw him overboard) to take hold of a rope, and would still have saved himself but they cut that rope and then he fell into the sea, and was seen no more.

Thus they finished the tragedy, having murdered four of the principal men in command in the ship, so that there was nobody now to oppose them; for Gow being second mate and gunner, the command fell to him, of course, and the rest of the men having no arms ready, not knowing how to get at any, were in utmost consternation, expecting they would go on with the work and cut their throats. In this fright everyone shifted for himself. As for those who were upon deck, some got up in the round tops, others got into the ship's head, resolving to throw themselves into the sea rather than be mangled with knives and murdered as the captain and mate, etc., had been. Those who were below, not knowing what to do, or whose turn it should be next, lay still in their hammocks expecting death every moment, and not daring to stir lest the villains should think they did it in order to make resistance, which however they were in no way capable of doing, having no concert one with another, not knowing anything in particular of one another, as who was alive or who was dead. Had the captain, who was himself a bold and stout man, been in his great cabin with three or four men with him, and his fire-arms, as he intended to have had, those eight fellows had never been able to have done their work. But every man was taken unprovided, and in the utmost surprise, so that the murderers met with no resistance; and as for those what were left, they were less able to make resistance than the other, so that, as has been said, they were in the utmost terror and amazement, expecting every minute to be murdered as the rest had been. But the villains had done. The persons who had any command were dispatched, so they cooled a little as to blood. The first thing they did afterwards, was to call up all the eight upon the quarter deck, where they congratulated one another, and shook hands together, engaging to proceed by joint consent in their resolved design, that is, of turning pirates. In order to which, they unanimously chose Gow to command the ship, promising all subjection and obedience to his orders, so that we must now call him Captain Gow, and he, by the same consent of the rest, named Williams his lieutenant. Other officers they appointed afterwards.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

The first orders they issued was to let all the rest of the men know that if they continued quiet and offered not to meddle with any of their affairs, they should receive no hurt, but chiefly forbade any man to set a foot abaft the main mast, except they were called to the helm, upon pain of being immediately cut to pieces, keeping for that purpose one man at the steerage door, and one upon the quarter deck with drawn cutlasses in their hands. But there was no need for it, for the men were so terrified with the bloody doings they had seen, that they never offered to come in sight until they were called.

Their next work was to throw overboard the three dead bodies of the mate, the surgeon, and the super-cargo, which they said lay in their way; that was soon done, their pockets being first searched and rifled. From thence they went to work with the great cabin and with all the lockers, chests, boxes and trunks. These they broke open and rifled, that is, such of them as belonged to the murdered persons, and whatever they found there they shared among themselves. When they had done this, they called for liquor, and sat down to drinking until morning, leaving the men, as above, to keep guard, and particularly to guard the arms, but relieved them from time to time as they saw occasion.

By this time they had drawn in four more of the men to approve of what they had done, and promised to join with them, so that now there were twelve in number, and being but twenty-four at first, whereof four were murdered, they had but eight men to be apprehensive of, and those they could easily look after. So the next day, they sent for them all to appear before their new captain, where they were told by Gow what his resolution was, viz., to go a-cruising or to go upon the account. If they were willing to join with them and go into their measures, they should be well used, and there should be no distinction among them but they should all fare alike; he said that they had been forced to do what they had done by the barbarous usage of Ferneau, but that there was now no looking back; and therefore, as they had not been concerned in what was past, they had nothing to do but to act in concert, do their duty as sailors, and obey orders for the good of the ship, and no harm should come to any of them.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

As they all looked like condemned prisoners brought up to the bar to receive sentence of death, so they all answered by a profound silence, which Gow took as they meant it, viz, as a consent because they durst not refuse. So they were then permitted to go up and down everywhere as they used to do, though such of them as sometimes afterwards showed any reluctance to act as principals, were never trusted, always suspected and very often severely beaten. Some of them were in many ways inhumanly treated and that particularly by Williams, the lieutenant, who was in his nature a merciless, cruel, and inexorable wretch, as we shall have occasion to take notice of again in its place.

They were now in a new circumstance of life, and acting upon a different stage of business, though upon the same stage as to the element, the water. Before they were a merchant ship, laden upon a good account, with merchants' goods from the coast of Barbary, and bound to the coast of Italy; but they were now a crew of pirates, or as they call them in the Levant, Corsairs, bound nowhere but to look out for purchase and spoil wherever they could find it. In pursuit of this wicked trade they first changed the name of the ship, which was before called the George galley, and which they called now the Revenge, a name, indeed, suitable to the bloody steps they had taken. In the next place they made the best of the ship's forces. The ship had but twelve guns mounted when they came out of Holland, but as they had six more good guns in the hold with cartridges and everything proper for service (which they had in store through being freighted for the Dutch merchants, and the Algerians being at war with the Dutch), they supposed they might want them for defence. Now they took care to mount them for a much worse design, so that now they had eighteen guns, though too many for the number of hands they had on board. In the third place, instead of pursuing their voyage to Genoa with the ship's cargo, they took a clear contrary course, and resolved to station themselves upon the coasts of Spain and Portugal, and to cruise upon all nations; but what they chiefly aimed at was a ship with wine, if possible, for that they wanted extremely.

The first prize they took was an English sloop, belonging to Pool, Thomas Wise commander, bound from Newfoundland with fish for Cadiz. This was a prize of no value to them, so they took out the master, Mr. Wise and his men, who were but five in number, with their anchors, cables and sails, and what else they found worth taking, and sunk the vessel. The next prize they took was a Scotch vessel, bound from Glasgow with herrings and salmon from thence to Genoa, and commanded by one Mr. John Somerville, of Port Patrick. This vessel was likewise of little value to them, except that they took as they had done from the other, their arms, ammunition, clothes, provisions, sails, anchors, cables, etc., and everything of value, and sunk her too as they had done the sloop. The reason they gave for sinking these two vessels was to prevent their being discovered, for as they were now cruising on the coast of Portugal, had they let their ships have gone with several of their men on board, they would presently have stood in for shore, and have given the alarm, and the men-of-war, of which there were several, as well Dutch as English, in the river of Lisbon, would immediately have put out to sea in quest of them, and they were very unwilling to leave the coast of Portugal until they had got a ship with wine, which they very much wanted.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

After this they cruised eight or ten days without seeing so much as one vessel upon the seas, and were just resolving to stand more to the to the coast of Galicia, when they descried a sail to the southward, being a ship about as big as their own, though they could not perceive what force she had. However they gave chase, and the vessel perceiving it, crowded from them with all the sail they could make, hoisting up French colours, and standing away to the southward. They continued the chase three days and nights, and though they did not gain much upon her, the Frenchman sailing very well, yet they kept her in sight all the while and for the most part within gunshot. But the third night, the weather proving a little hazy, the Frenchman changed her course in the night, and so got clear of them, and good reason they had to bless themselves in the escape they had made, if they had but known what a dreadful crew of rogues they had fallen among if they had been taken.

They were now gotten a long way to the southward and being greatly disappointed, and in want of water as well as wine, they resolved to stand away for the Madeiras, which they knew were not far off; so they accordingly made the island in two days more, and keeping a large offing, they cruised for three or four days more, expecting to meet with some Portuguese vessel going in or coming out. But it was in vain, for nothing stirred. So, tired with waiting, they stood in for the road, and came to anchor, though at a great distance. Then they sent their boat towards the shore with seven men, all well armed, to see whether it might not be practicable to board one of the ships in the road, and cutting her away from her anchors, bring her off; or if they found that could not be done, then their orders were to intercept some of the boats belonging to the place, which carry wines on board the ships in the road, or from one place to another on the coast. But they came back again disappointed in both, everybody being alarmed and aware of them, knowing by their posture what they were.

Having thus spent several days to no purpose, and finding themselves discovered, at last (being apparently under a necessity to make an attempt somewhere) they stood away for Porto Santo,²⁹⁷ about ten leagues to the windward of Madeiras, and belonging also to the Portuguese. Here putting up British colours, they sent their boat ashore with Captain Somerville's bill of health, and a present to the governor of three barrels of salmon, and six barrels of herrings, and a very civil message, desiring leave to water, and to buy some refreshments, pretending to be bound to —.

The Governor very courteously granted their desire, but with more courtesy than discretion went off himself, with about nine or ten of his principal people, to pay the English captain a visit, little thinking what kind of a captain it was they were going to compliment, and what price it might have cost them. However, Gow, handsomely dressed, received them with some ceremony, and entertained them tolerably well for a while. But the Governor having been kept as long by civility as they could, and the refreshments from the shore not appearing, he was forced to unmask; and when the Governor and his company rose up to take their leave, to their great surprise they were suddenly surrounded with a gang of fellows with muskets, and an officer at the head of them. These told them, in so many words, they were the captain's prisoners, and must not think of going on shore any more until the water and provisions which were promised should come on board.

297. The most northerly of the islands.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

It is impossible to conceive the consternation and surprise the Portuguese gentry were in, nor is it very decently to be expressed. The poor Governor was so much more than half dead with fright that he really befouled himself in a piteous manner, and the rest were in not much better condition. They trembled, cried, begged, crossed themselves, and said their prayers as men going to execution, but it was all one, they were told flatly that the captain was not to be trifled with, that the ship was in want of provisions, and they would have them, or they should carry them all away. They were, however, well enough treated, except for the restraint of their persons, and were often asked to refresh themselves; but they would neither eat nor drink any more all the while they stayed on board, which was until the next day in the evening, when to their great satisfaction they saw a great boat come off from the fort, and which came directly on board with seven butts of water, a cow and a calf, and a good number of fowls.

When the boat came alongside and delivered the stores, Captain Gow complimented the Governor and his gentlemen, and discharged them to their great joy, and besides that gave them in return for their provisions two cerons of beeswax, and fired them three guns at their going away. It is to be supposed they would have a care how they went on board any ship again, in compliment to their captain, unless they were very sure who they were. Having had no better success in this out of the way run to the Madeiras, they resolved to make the best of their way back again to the coast of Spain and Portugal. They accordingly left Porto Santo the next morning with a fair wind, standing directly for Cape St. Vincent or the Southward Cape.

They had not been upon the coast of Spain above two or three days, before they met with a New England ship, one Cross commander, laden with slaves, and bound for Lisbon, being to load there with wine for London. This was also a prize of no value to them, and they began to be very much discouraged with their bad fortune. However, they took out Captain Cross and his men, which were seven or eight in number, with most of the provisions and some of the sails, and gave the ship to Captain Wise, the poor man whom they took at first in a sloop from Newfoundland; and in order to pay Wise and his men for what they took from them, and make them satisfaction, as they called it, they gave to Captain Wise and his mate twenty-four cerons of wax, and to his men who were four in number, two cerons of wax each. Thus they pretended honesty, and to make reparation of damages by giving them the goods which they had robbed the Dutch merchants of, whose super-cargo they had murdered.

The day before the division of the spoil they saw a large ship to windward, which at first put them into some surprise, for she came bearing down directly upon them, and they thought she had been a Portuguese man-of-war, but they found soon after that it was a merchant ship, had French colours and bound home, as they supposed from the West Indies; and so it was, for they afterwards learned that she was laden at Martinico and bound for Rochelle. The Frenchmen not fearing them came on large to the wind, being a ship of much greater force than Gow's ship, carrying thirty-two guns and eighty men, besides a great many passengers.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

However, Gow at first made as if he would lie by for them, but seeing plainly what a ship it was, and that they should have their hands full of her, he began to consider; and calling his men together upon the deck, told them what was in his mind, viz., that the Frenchman was apparently superior in force in every way; that they were but ill-manned, and had a great many prisoners on board, and that some of their own people were not very well to be trusted; that six of their best hands were on board the prize; and that all they had left were not sufficient to ply their guns and stand by the sails, and that therefore as they were under no necessity to engage, so he thought it would be next to madness to think of it.

The generality of the men were of Gow's mind, and agreed to decline the fight, but Williams, his lieutenant, strenuously opposed it; and being not to be appeased by all that Gow could say to him, or any one else, flew out into a rage at Gow, upbraiding him with being a coward, and not fit to command a ship of force. The truth is, Gow's reasoning was good, and the thing was just, considering their own condition; but Williams was a fellow incapable of any solid thinking, had a kind of savage, brutal courage, but nothing of true bravery in him, and this made him the most desperate and outrageous villain in the world, and the most cruel and inhuman to those whose disaster it was to fall into his hands, as had frequently appeared in his usage of the prisoners under his power in this very voyage. Gow was a man of temper, and notwithstanding all the ill-language Williams gave him, said little or nothing but by way of argument against attacking the French ship, which would certainly have been too strong for them; but this provoked Williams the more, and he grew so extraordinary an height, that he demanded boldly of Gow to give his orders for fighting, which Gow declining still Williams presented his pistol at him, and snapped it, but it did not go off, which enraged him the more.

Winter and Peterson standing nearest to Williams, and seeing him so furious, flew at him immediately, and each of them fired a pistol at him. One shot him through the arm, and the other into his belly, at which he fell, and the men about him laid hold of him to throw him overboard, believing he was dead; but as they lifted him up, he started violently out of their hands, and leaped directly into the hold, and from thence ran desperately into the powder-room with his pistol cocked in his hand, swearing he would blow them all up. He had certainly done it, if they had not seized him just as he had gotten the scuttle open, and was that moment going to put his hellish resolution into practice.

Having thus secured the distracted, raving creature, they carried him forward to the place which they had made on purpose between decks to secure their prisoners, and put him amongst them, having first loaded him with irons, and particularly handcuffed him with his hands behind him, to the great satisfaction of the other prisoners, who knowing what a butcherly furious fellow he was, were terrified to the last degree to see him come in among them, until they beheld the condition he came in. He was, indeed, the terror of all the prisoners, for he usually treated them in a barbarous manner, without the least provocation, and merely for his humour, presenting pistols to their breasts, swearing he would shoot them that moment, and then would beat them unmercifully, and all for his diversion as he called it. Having thus laid him fast, they presently resolved to stand away to the westward, by which they quitted the Martinico ship, who by that time was come nearer to them, and farther convinced them they were in no condition to have engaged her, for she was a stout ship and full of men. All this happened just the day before they shared their last prize among the prisoners, in which they put on such a mock face of doing justice to the several captains and mates and other men, their prisoners, whose ships they had taken away, and to whom now they made reparation, by giving them what they had taken violently from another, so that it was a strange medley of mock justice made up of rapine and generosity blended together.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Two days after this they took a Bristol ship bound from Newfoundland to Oporto with fish. They let her cargo alone, for they had no occasion for fish, but they took out almost all their provisions, all the ammunition, arms, etc., and her good sails, also her best cables, and forced two of her men to go away with them, and then got ten of the Frenchman on board and let her go. But just as they were parting with her, they consulted together what to do with Williams the lieutenant, who was then among the prisoners and in irons. And after a short debate, they resolved to put him on board the Bristol-man and send him away too, which accordingly was done, with directions to the master to deliver him on board the first English man-of-war they should meet with, in order to get his being hanged for a pirate, as they jeeringly called him, as soon as he came to England, giving the master an account of some of his villainies.

The truth is, this Williams was a monster rather than a man. He was the most inhuman, bloody and desperate creature that the world could produce, and was even too wicked for Gow and all his crew, though they pirates and murderers, as has been shown. His temper was so savage, so villainous, so merciless, that even the pirates themselves told him it was time he was hanged out of the way.

One instance of the barbarity of Williams cannot be omitted, and will be sufficient to justify all that can be said of him. When Gow gave it as a reason against engaging with the Martinico ship, that he had a great many prisoners on board, and some of their own men that they could not depend on, Williams proposed to have them all called up one by one, and to cut their throats and throw them overboard—a proposal so horrid that the worst of the crew shook their heads at it. Gow answered him very handsomely, that there had been too much blood spilled already; yet the refusing this, heightened the quarrel, and was the chief occasion of his offering to pistol Gow himself. After which his behaviour was such as made all the ship's crew resolved to be rid of him, and it was thought if they had not had an opportunity to send him away, as they did by the Bristol ship, they would have been obliged to have hanged him themselves. This cruel and butchery temper of Williams being carried to such a height, and so near to the ruin of them all, shocked some of them, and as they acknowledged gave some check in the heat of their wicked progress, and had they had an opportunity to have gone on shore at that time, without falling into the hands of Justice, it is believed the greatest part of them would have abandoned the ship, and perhaps the very trade of a pirate too. But they had dipped their hands in blood, and Heaven had no doubt determined to bring them, that is, the chief of them, to the gallows for it, as indeed they all deserved, so they went on. When they put Williams on board the Bristol-man, and he was told what directions they gave with him, he began to relent, and made all the intercession he could to Captain Gow for pardon, or at least not to be put on board the ship, knowing that if he was carried to Lisbon, he should meet with his due from the Portuguese, if not from the English; for it seems he had been concerned in some villainies among the Portuguese before he came on board the George galley. What they were he did not confess, nor indeed did his own ship's crew trouble themselves to examine him about it. He had been wicked enough among them, and it was sufficient to make them use him as they did. It was more to be wondered, indeed, that they did not cut him to pieces upon the spot and throw him into the sea, half on one side of the ship, and half on the other, for there was scarce a man in the ship but on one occasion or other had some apprehensions of him, and might be said to go in danger of his life from him. But they chose to shift their hands of him this bloodless way, so they double fettered him and brought him up. When they brought him among the men, he begged they would throw him into the sea and drown him; then entreated for his life with a meanness which made them despise him, and with tears, so that one time they began to relent. But then the devilish temper of the fellow overruled it again, so at last they resolved to let him go, and did accordingly put him on board, and gave him many a hearty curse at parting, wishing him a good voyage to the gallows, which was made good afterwards, though in such company as they little thought of at that time. The Bristol captain was very just to him, for according to their orders, as soon as they came to Lisbon, they put him on board the Argyle, one of His Majesty's ships, Captain Bowles commander, then lying in the Tagus, and bound home for England, who accordingly brought him home. Though, as it happened, Heaven brought the captain and the rest of the crew so quickly to an end of their villainies that they all came home time enough to be hanged with their lieutenant. But to return to Gow and his crew. Having thus dismissed the Bristol-man, and cleared his hands of most of his prisoners, with the same wicked generosity he gave the Bristol captain thirteen cerons of beeswax, as a gratuity for his trouble and charge with the prisoners, and in recompense, as he called it, for the goods he had taken from him, and so they parted. This was the last prize they took, not only on the coast of Portugal, but anywhere else, for Gow, who, to give him his due, was a fellow of council and had a great presence of mind in cases of exigence, considered that as soon as the Bristol ship came into the river of Lisbon, they would certainly give an account of them, as well of their strength, and of their station in which they cruised, and that consequently the English men-of-war (of which there are generally some in that river) would immediately come abroad to look for them. So he began to reason with his officers that the coast of Portugal would be no proper place at all for them, unless they resolved to fall into the hands of the said men-of-war, and they ought to consider immediately what to do. In these debates some advised one thing, some another, as is usual in like cases. Some were for going to the coast of Guinea, where, as they said, was purchase²⁹⁸ enough, and very rich ships to be taken; others were for going to the West Indies,

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

298. The word is here used in its original sense, indicating something acquired by seeking—or hunting—pour chasser.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

and to cruise among the Islands, and take up their station at Tobago; others, and not those of the most ignorant, proposed standing in to the Bay of Mexico, and joining in with some of a new sort of pirates at St. Jago de la Cuba, who are all Spaniards, and call themselves Guarda del Costa, that is Guard ships for the coast (though under that pretence they make prize of ships of all nations, and sometimes even of their own countrymen too, but especially of the English), but when this was proposed, it was answered they durst not trust the Spaniards. Others said they should go first to the islands of New Providence [Bahama Islands], or to the mouth of the Gulf of Florida, and then cruising on the coast of North America, and making their retreat at New Providence, cruise from the Gulf of Florida, north upon the coast of Carolina, and as high as the Capes of Virginia.

But nothing could be resolved on, until at last Gow let them into the secret of a project, which, as he told them, he had long had in his thoughts, and this was to go away to the North of Scotland, near the coast of which, as he said, he was born and bred, and where he said, if they met with no purchase upon the sea, he could tell them how they should enrich themselves by going on shore. To bring them to concur with this design, he represented the danger they were in where they were, the want they were in of fresh water, and of several kinds of provisions, but above all, the necessity they were in of careening and cleaning their ship; that it was too long a run for them to go to southward, and that they had not provisions to serve them till they could reach to any place proper for that purpose, and might be driven to the utmost distress, if they should be put by from watering, either by weather or enemies.

Also, he told them, if any of the men-of-war came out in search of them, they would never imagine they were gone away to the northward, so that their run that way was perfectly secure, and he could assure them of his own knowledge that if they landed in such places as he should direct, they could not fail of considerable booty in plundering some gentlemen's houses, who lived secured and unguarded very near the shore; and that though the country should be alarmed, yet before the Government could send any men-of-war to attack them, they might clean their ship, lay in a store of fresh provisions, and be gone. Beside that, they would get a good many stout fellows to go along with them upon his encouragement, so that they should be better manned than they were yet, and should be ready against all events.

These arguments and their approaching fate concurring, had a sufficient influence on the ship's company to prevail on them to consent, so they made the best of their way to the northward; and about the middle of January they arrived at Carristoun,²⁹⁹ in the Isles of Orkney, and came to an anchor in a place which Gow told them was safe riding under the lee of a small island at some distance from the port. But now their misfortunes began to come on, and things looked but with an indifferent aspect upon them, for several of their men, especially such of them as had been forced or decoyed into their service, began to think of making their escape from them, and to cast about for means to bring it to pass.

The first to take an opportunity to go away was a young man who was originally one of the ship's company, but was forced by fear of being murdered (as has been observed) to give a silent assent to go with them. It was one evening when the boat went on shore, for they kept a civil correspondence with the people of the town, that this young fellow, being one of the ship's crew and having been several times on shore before, and therefore not suspected, gave them the slip and got away to a farm-house which lay under a hill out of sight. There, for two or three pieces-of-eight, he got a horse, and soon by that means escaped to Kirkwall, a market town and chief of the Orkneys, about twelve miles from the place where the ship lay. As soon as he came there he surrendered himself to the Government, desiring protection, and informed them who Gow was, and what the ship's crew were, and upon what business they were abroad, with what else he knew of their designs, as to plundering the gentlemen's houses, etc. Upon this they immediately raised the country, and got a strength together to defend themselves.

299. The island of Carrick.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

But the next disaster that attended the pirates (for misfortunes seldom come alone) was more fatal than this, for ten of Gow's men, most of them likewise forced into their service, went away with the long-boat, making the best of their way for the mainland of Scotland. These men, however they did it, or what shift soever they made to get so far, were taken in the Firth of Edinburgh, and made prisoners there.

Hardened for his own destruction and Justice evidently pursuing him, Gow grew the bolder for the disaster, and notwithstanding that the country was alarmed, and that he was fully discovered, instead of making a timely escape, he resolved to land, and so put his intended project of plundering the gentlemen's houses into execution, whatever it cost him.

In order to this he sent the boatswain and ten men on shore the very same night, very well armed, directing them to go to the house of Mr. Honeyman of Grahamsey, sheriff of the county, and who was himself at that time, to his great good fortune, from home. The people of the house had not the least notice of their coming, so that when they knocked at the door, it was immediately opened. Upon which they all entered the house at once, except one Panton, who they set sentinel and ordered him to stand at the door to secure their retreat, and to hinder any from coming in after them. Mrs. Honeyman and her daughter were extremely frightened at the sight of so many armed men coming into the house, and ran screaming about like people distracted, while the pirates, not regarding them, were looking about for chests and trunks, where they might expect to find some plunder; and Mrs. Honeyman in her fright coming to the door asked Panton, the man who stood sentinel there, what the meaning of it all was. He told her freely they were pirates, and that they came to plunder her house. At this she recovered some courage, and ran back into the house immediately, and knowing where her money lay, which was very considerable and all in gold, she put the bag in her lap and boldly rushing by Panton, who thought she was only running from them in a fright, carried it all off, and so made her escape with the treasure.

The boatswain being informed that the money was carried off, resolved to revenge himself by burning the writings and papers, which they call there the charters of their estates, and are always of great value in gentlemen's houses of estates but the young lady, Mr. Honeyman's daughter hearing them threaten to burn the writings, watched her opportunity, and running to the charter-room where they lay, tied the most considerable of them up in a napkin and threw them out of the window, jumped out after them herself, and escaped without damage, though the window was one storey high at least.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

However, the pirates had the plundering of all the rest of the house besides, and carried off a great deal of plate, and things of value, and forced one of the servants, who played very well on the bagpipes, to march along, piping before them, when they carried it off to the ship. The next day they weighed anchor, intending though they had cleaned but one side of the ship, to put out to sea and quit the coast. But sailing eastward, they came to anchor again at a little island called Calf Sound. And having some further mischief in their view here the boatswain went on shore again with some armed men; but meeting with no other plunder they carried off three women, whom they kept on board some time and used so inhumanly that when they set them on shore again they were not able to go or stand, and it is said one of them died on the beach where they left them.

The next day they weighed again, holding the same course eastward, through the openings between the islands, till they came off Ross Ness; and now Gow resolved to make the best of his way for the Island of Eday, to plunder the house of Mr. Fea, a gentleman of a considerable estate, and with whom Gow had some acquaintance, having been at school together, when they were youths. On the 13th of February in the morning, Gow appearing with his ship off Calf Sound, Mr. Fea and his family were very much alarmed, not being able to get together above six or seven men for his defence. He therefore wrote a letter to Gow intending to send it on board as soon as he should get into the harbour, to desire him to forbear the usual salutes, with his great guns, because Mrs. Fea his wife was so very much indisposed, and this as he would oblige his old school fellow; telling him at the same time that the inhabitants were all fled to the mountains, on the report of his being a pirate, which he hoped would not prove true. In which case, he should be very ready to supply him with all such necessities as the island would afford, desiring him to send the messengers safe back, at whose return the alarms of the people would immediately be at an end.

The tide it seems runs extremely rapid among those islands, and the navigation is thereby rendered very dangerous and uncertain. Gow was an able seaman, but was no pilot for that place, and which was worse, he had no boat to assist in case of extremity, to ware the ship, and in turning into Calf Sound, he stood a little too near the point of a little island called the Calf, and which lay in the middle of the passage. Here his ship missing stays, was in great danger of going on shore; to avoid which, he dropped an anchor under his foot, which taking good hold, brought him up, and he thought the danger was over. Gow was yet in distress and had no remedy but to send his small boat on shore to Mr. Fea to desire his assistance, that is to say, to desire him to lend him a boat to carry out an anchor and heave off the ship. Mr. Fea sent back the boat, and one James Laing in it, with the letter already mentioned. Gow sent him back immediately with an answer, by word of mouth, viz., that he would write to nobody, but if Mr. Fea would order his people to assist him with a boat to carry out an anchor, he would reward them handsomely. In the meantime Mr. Fea ordered his great boat, for he had such a one as Gow wanted, to be staved and launched into the water and sunk, and the masts, sails and oars to be carried out of sight. While this was doing Mr. Fea perceived Gow's boat coming on shore, with five persons in her. These men having landed on the main island, left their boat on the beach, and altogether marched directly up to the mansion house. This put him into some surprise at first, however, he resolved to meet them in a peaceable manner, though he perceived they were all double-armed. When he came up to them, he entreated them not to go up to the house, because of the languishing condition of his wife, who was already frightened with the rumours which had been raised of their being pirates, and that she would certainly die with the fear she was in for herself and family, if they came to the door.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

The boatswain answered they did not desire to fright his wife, or anybody else, but they came to desire the assistance of his boat, and if he would not grant them so small a favour, he had nothing to expect from them but the utmost extremity. Mr. Fea returned that they knew well enough he could not venture to give them or lend them his boat or any help, as they appeared to be such people as were reported, but that if they would take them by force, he could not help himself. But in the meantime, talking still in a friendly manner to them, he asked them to go to a neighbouring house, which he said was a change-house, that is a public-house, and take a cup of ale with him. This they consented to, seeing Mr. Fea was alone; so they went all with him. In the meantime Mr. Fea found means to give secret orders that the oars, masts and sails of the pirates' boat should be all carried away, and that a quarter of an hour after they had sat together, he should be called hastily out of the room, on some pretence or other of somebody to speak with him; all which was performed to a tittle. When he was got from them, he gave orders that his six men, who before he had got together, and who were now come to him well armed, should place themselves at a certain stile behind a thick hedge, and which was about half way between the alehouse and his own house, saying that if he came that way with the boatswain alone, they should suddenly start out upon them both, and throwing him down, should seize upon the other, but that if all the five came with him, he would take an occasion to be either before or behind them, so that they might all fire upon them, without danger of hurting him.

Having given these orders, and depending upon their being well executed, he returned to the company and having given them more ale, told them he would gladly do them any service that he could lawfully do, and that if they would take the trouble of walking up to his house in a peaceable manner so that his family might not be frightened with seeing him among them, they should have all the assistance that was in his power. The fellows (whether they had taken too much ale, or whether the condition of their ship and the hopes of getting a boat to help them, blinded their eyes, is not certain) fell with ease into this snare, and agreed readily to go along with Mr. Fea; but after a while resolved not to go all of them, only deputed the boatswain to go, which was what Mr. Fea most desired.

The boatswain was very willing to accept of the trust, but it was observed he took a great deal of care of his arms, which were no less than four pistols, all loaded with a brace of bullets each, nor would he be persuaded to leave any of them behind him, no not with his own men. In this posture, Mr. Fea and the boatswain walked along together very quietly, until they came to the stile, having got over which Mr. Fea, seeing his men all ready, turned short about upon the boatswain, and taking him by the collar, told him he was his prisoner and the same moment, the rest of his men rushing in upon them, threw both down, and so secured the boatswain, without giving him time so much as to fire one pistol. He cried out, indeed, with all his might to alarm his men, but they soon stopped his mouth by first forcing a pistol into it, and then a handkerchief; and having disarmed him, bound his hands behind him and his feet together. Then Mr. Fea left him there under a guard, and with his other five men, but without arms, at least such that could be seen, returned to the alehouse to the rest. The house having two doors, they divided themselves and rushing in at both doors at the same time, they seized the four men before they were aware, or had time to lay hold of their arms. They did indeed what men could do, and one of them snapped a pistol at Mr. Fea, but it did not go off, and Mr. Fea at the same time snatching at the pistol to divert the shot if it had fired, struck his hand with such force against the cock, as very much bruised it.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

They were all five now in his power, and he sent them away under a good guard to a village in the middle of the island, where they were kept separate from one another, and sufficiently secured. Mr. Fea then despatched expresses to the gentlemen in the neighbouring island to acquaint them with what he had done, and to desire their speedy assistance, also desiring earnestly that they would take care that no boat should go within reach of the pirates' guns. And at night Mr. Fea caused fires to be made upon the hills round him, to alarm the country, and ordered all the boats round the Island to be hauled up upon the beach, as far as it was possible, and disabled also, lest the pirates should swim from the ship, and get any of them into their possession.

Next day, the 4th, it blew very hard all day, and in the evening about high water, it shifted to W.N.W., upon which the pirates set their sails, expecting to get off and so to lay it round the island, and put out to sea. But the fellow who was ordered to cut the cable, missing several strokes, the cable checked the ship's way, and consequently on a sudden she took all aback. Then the cable being parted when it should have been held, the ship ran directly on shore on the Calf Island, nor could all their speed prevent it. With an air of desperation Gow told them they were all dead men, nor could it indeed be otherwise, for having lost the only boat they had, and five of their best hands, they were able to do little or nothing towards getting their ship off; besides, as she went on shore at the top of high water, and a spring tide, there was no hope of getting her off afterward. Wherefore the next morning, being Monday, the 15th, they hung out a white flag, as a signal for a parley, and sent a man on shore upon Calf Island, for now they could go on shore out of the ship at half flood.

Now Mr. Fea thought he might talk with Gow, in a different style from what he did before; so he wrote a letter to him, wherein he complained of the rude behaviour of his five men, for which he told him, he had been obliged to seize on them, and make them prisoners, letting him know that the country being all alarmed would soon be too many for him, and therefore advised him to surrender himself peaceably, and be the author of a quiet surrender of the rest, as the only means to obtain any favour; and then he might become an evidence against the rest, and so might save his own life. This letter Mr. Fea sent by a boat with four armed men to the island, to be given to the fellow that Gow had sent on shore, and who waited there; at the same time, he gave them a letter from Gow to Mr. Fea, for now he was humbled enough to write, which before he refused. Gow's letter to Mr. Fea was to let him have some men and boats, to take out the best of the cargo, in order to lighten the ship, and set her afloat; offering himself to come on shore and be hostage for the security of men and boats and to give Mr. Fea a thousand pounds in goods for the service. He declared at the same time, that if this small succour was refused him, he would take care nobody should better himself by his misfortunes, for rather than they would suffer themselves to be taken, they would set fire to the ship, and would all perish together.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Mr. Fea replied to this letter that he had a boat indeed, that would have been fit for his service, but that she was staved and sunk; but if he would come on shore quietly without arms, and bring his carpenter with him to repair the boat, he might have her. Mr. Fea did this to give Gow an opportunity to embrace his first offer of surrendering. But Gow was neither humble enough to come in nor sincere enough to treat with him fairly, if he had intended to let him have the boat; and if he had, it is probable that the former letter had made the men suspicious of him, so that now he could do nothing without communicating it to the rest of the crew. About four in the afternoon Mr. Fea received an answer to his last letter, the copy of which is exactly as follows:

From on board our Ship the Revenge, Feb. 16th, 1725.

Honoured Sir,

I am sorry to hear of the irregular proceedings of my men; I gave no orders to that effect, and what hath been wrongfully done to the country, was contrary to my inclinations. It is my misfortune to be in this condition at present; it was in your power to have done otherwise in making my fortune better. Since my being in the country, I have wronged no man, nor taken anything but what I have paid for. My design in coming was to make the country better, which I am still capable to do, providing you are just to me. I thank you for the concern you have for my bad fortune, and am sorry I cannot embrace your proposal as to being evidence, my people have already made use of that advantage. I have by my last signified my design of proceeding, provided I can procure no better terms. Please to send James Laing on board to continue till my return. I should be glad to have the good fortune to commune with you upon that subject. I beg that you would assist me with a boat, and be assured I do no man harm, were it in my power, as I am now at your mercy. I cannot surrender myself prisoner, I'd rather commit myself to the mercy of the seas; so that if you will incline to contribute to my escape, I shall leave my ship and cargo at your disposal.

I continue, Honoured Sir etc., John Smith

Upon this letter, and especially that part wherein Gow desired to commune with him, Mr. Fea, believing he might do some service in persuading him to submit, went over to Calf Island and went on shore alone, ordering his boat to lie in readiness to take him in again, but not one man to stir out of her, and calling to Gow with a speaking trumpet desired him to come on shore. This the other readily did, but Mr. Fea, before he ventured, wisely foresaw that whilst he was alone upon the Island, the pirates might unknown from him, get the ship by different ways, and under cover of shore might get behind and surround him. To prevent which, he set a man upon the top of his own house, which was on the opposite shore and overlooked the whole island, and ordered him to make signals with his flag, waving his flag once for every man that he saw come on shore, but if four or more came on shore, then to keep the flag waving continually, till he (Mr. Fea) should retire. This precaution was very needful, for no sooner was Mr. Fea advanced upon the island, expecting Gow to come on shore to meet him, but he saw a fellow come from the ship, with a white flag, a bottle, a glass and a bundle, then turning to his own house, he saw his man make the signals appointed, and that the man kept the flag continually waving. Upon which he immediately retired to his boat, and he was no sooner got into it, but he saw five fellows running under shore, with lighted matches and grenadoes in their hands to have intercepted him, but seeing him out of their reach, they retired to the ship.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

After this the fellow with the white flag came up and gave Mr. Fea two letters; he would have left the bundle, which he said was a present to Mr. Fea, and the bottle which he said was a bottle of brandy, but Mr. Fea would not take them, but told the fellow his captain was a treacherous villain, and he did not doubt that he should see him hanged, and as to him (the fellow) he had a great mind to shoot him; upon which the fellow took to his heels, and Mr. Fea being in his boat did not think it worth while to land again to pursue him. This put an end to all parley for the present, but had the pirates succeeded in this attempt, they would have so far gained their point, either that they must have been assisted, or Mr. Fea must have been sacrificed.

The two letters from Gow were one for Mr. Fea, and the other for his wife. The first was much to the same purpose as the former, only that in this Gow requested the great boat with her masts, sails and oars, with some provisions to transport themselves whither they thought fit to go for their own safety, offering to leave the ship and cargo to Mr. Fea, and threatening that if the men-of-war arrived (for Mr. Fea had given him notice that he expected two men-of-war) before he was thus assisted, they would set fire to the ship, and blow themselves up, so that as they had lived so they would die together. The letter to Mrs. Fea was to desire her to intercede with her husband, and plead that he was their countryman and had been her husband's schoolfellow, etc. But no answer was returned to either of these letters.

On the 17th, in the morning, contrary to expectation, Gow himself came on shore upon the Calf Island³⁰⁰, unarmed except for his sword, and alone, only one man at a distance, carrying a white flag, making signals for a parley. Mr. Fea, who by this time had gotten more people about him, immediately sent one Mr.

300. According to Johnson's HISTORY OF THE PIRATES (Chap. XVIII) Gow's real motive for returning to the Orkneys was to wed a girl whose parents had repulsed him on account of his poverty. She was the daughter of one Mr. G——, a well-to-do man.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Fea, of Whitehall, a gentleman of his own family, with five other persons well-armed over the island, with orders to secure Gow if it were possible by any means, either dead or alive. When they came on shore, Gow proposed that one of them, whose name was Schottary, a master of a vessel, should go on board the ship as hostage for this Gow's safety, and Schottary consenting, Gow himself conducted him to the ship's side.

Mr. Fea perceiving this from his own house, immediately took another boat and went over to the island himself, and while he was expostulating with his men for letting Schottary go for hostage, Gow returned, and Mr. Fea made no hesitation, but told him that he was his prisoner. At this Gow started and said that it ought not to be so, since there was a hostage delivered for him. Mr. Fea said he gave no order for it, and it was what they could not justify, and since Schottary had ventured without orders, he must take his fate, he would run the venture of it; but he advised Gow, as he expected good usage himself, that he would send the fellow who carried his white flag back to the ship with orders for them to return Schottary in safety, and to desire Winter and Peterson to come with him. Gow declined giving any such orders, but the fellow said he would readily go and fetch them, and did so, and they came along with him. When Gow saw them, he reproached them for being so easily imposed on, and ordered them to go back to the ship immediately, but Mr. Fea's men, who were too strong for them, surrounded them and took them all. When this was done, they demanded Gow to deliver his sword, but he said he would rather die with it in his hand, and begged them to shoot him, but was denied; and Mr. Fea's men disarming him of his sword, carried him with the other two into their boat, and after that to the main island, where Mr. Fea lived.

Having thus secured the captain, Mr. Fea prevailed with him to go to the shore over against the ship, and to call the gunner and another man to come on shore on Calf Island, which they did. But they were no sooner there, but they also were surrounded by some men which Mr. Fea had placed out of sight upon the island for that purpose. Then they made Gow call to the carpenter to come on shore, still making them believe they would have a boat; and Mr. Fea went over and met him alone, and talking with him, told him they could not repair the boat without help and without tools. So persuading him to go back and bring a hand or two with him, and some tools, some oakum, nails, etc., the carpenter being thus deluded, went back and brought a Frenchman and another with him, with all things proper for their work. All of whom, as soon as they came on shore, were likewise seized and secured by Mr. Fea and his men.

But there were still a great many men in the ship, whom it was necessary to bring if possible to a quiet surrender; so Mr. Fea ordered his men to make a feint as if they would go to work upon the great boat which lay on the shore upon the island but in sight of the ship. There they hammered and knocked and made a noise as if they were really caulking and repairing her, in order to her being launched off and put into their possession; but towards night he obliged Gow to write to the men that Mr. Fea would not deliver the boat until he was in possession of the ship, and therefore he ordered them all to come on shore, without arms, and in a peaceable manner. This occasioned many debates in the ship, but as they had no officers to guide them and were all in confusion, they knew not what to do. So after some time bewailing their hard fate, and dividing what money was left in the ship among them, they yielded and went on shore, and were all made prisoners, to the number of eight-and-twenty, including those who were secured before.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Being now all secured and in custody in the most proper places in the island, Mr. Fea took care to give notice to the proper officers in the country, and by them to the Government of Edinburgh, in order to get help for the carrying them to England. The distance being so great, it took up some time; for the Government at Edinburgh not being immediately concerned in it, but rather the Court of Admiralty of Great Britain, expresses were dispatched from thence to London, that his Majesty's pleasure might be known; in return to which, orders were despatched into Scotland to have them immediately sent up into England with as much expedition as the case would admit. Accordingly they were brought up by land to Edinburgh first, and from thence being put on board the Greyhound frigate, they were brought by sea to England. This necessarily took up a great deal of time, so that had they been wise enough to improve the hours that were left, they had almost half a year's time to prepare themselves for death, though they cruelly denied the poor mate of a few moments to commend his soul to God's mercy, even after he was half murdered before. They were most of them in custody the latter end of January, and were not executed till the 11th of June.

The Greyhound arrived in the river the 25th of March, and the next day came to an anchor at Woolwich; and the pirates being put into boats appointed to receive them, with a strong guard to attend them, were brought on shore on the 30th, and conveyed to the Marshalsea prison in Southwark, where they were delivered to the keepers of the said prison, and were laid in irons. There they had the mortification to meet Lieutenant Williams, who was brought home by the Argyle man-of-war, from Lisbon, and had been committed to the same prison but a very few days before.

Indeed, as it was a mortification to them, so it was more to him, for though he might be secretly pleased that those who had so cruelly, as he called it, put him into the hands of Justice by sending him to Lisbon, were brought into the same circumstances with himself, yet on the other hand, it could not but be a terrible mortification to him that here were now sufficient witnesses found to prove his crimes against him, which were not so easy to be had before.

Being thus laid fast, it remained to proceed against them in due form, and this took up some long time still. On Friday, the 2nd of April, they were all carried to Doctors' Commons, where the proper judges being present, they were examined; by which examination the measures were taken for the farther proceedings. For as they were not equally guilty, so it was needful to determine who it was proper to bring to an immediate trial, and who, being less guilty, were more proper objects of the Government's clemency, as being under force and fear and consequently necessitated to act as they did; and also who it might be proper to single out as an evidence against the rest. After being thus examined they were remanded to the Marshalsea. On Saturday, the 8th of May, the five who were appointed for evidence against the rest, and whose names are particularly set down in its place, were sent from the Marshalsea prison to Newgate, in order to give their information.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Being thus brought up to London, and committed to the Marshalsea prison, and the Government being fully informed, what black uncommon offenders they were, it was thought proper to bring them to speedy justice. In order to this, some of them, as has been said, who were less criminal than the rest, and who apparently had been forced into their service, were sorted out, and being examined (giving first an account of themselves, and then of the whole fraternity) it was thought fit to make use of their evidence for the more clear detecting and convincing of the rest. These were George Dobson, John Phinnes, Timothy Murphy, and William Booth.

These were the principal evidences, and were indeed more than sufficient, for they so exactly agreed in their evidence, and the prisoners (pirates) said so little in their defence, that there was no room for the jury to question their guilt, or to doubt the truth of any part of the account given in. Robert Read was a young man, mentioned before, who escaped from the boat in the Orkneys, where he surrendered himself, after getting a horse at a farmer's house, and conveying himself to Kirkwall, the chief town of the said Orkneys. Nevertheless, he was brought up as a prisoner with the rest, nor was he made use of as an evidence but was tried upon most, if not all the indictments with the rest. But Dobson, one of the witnesses, did him the justice to testify that he was forced into their service, as others were, for fear of having their throats cut, as many had been served before their faces, and that in particular he was not present at, or concerned in any of the murders for which the rest were indicted. Upon which evidence, he was acquitted by the jury. Also he brought one Archibald Sutor, the man of the house said before to be a farm-house, as to whether the said Read made his escape in the Orkneys, who testified that he did so escape to him, and that he begged him to procure him a horse, to ride off to Kirkwall, which he did, and there he surrendered himself; also he testified that Read gave him (Sutor) a full account of the ship and the pirates that were in her, and what they were; and that he (Sutor) revealed it all to the collector of the Customs, by which means the country was alarmed, and he added, that it was by this man's means that all the prisoners were apprehended (though that was going too far, for 'tis plain, that it was by the vigilance and courage of Mr. Fea, chiefly, that they were reduced to such distresses as obliged them to surrender). However, it was true that Read's escape did alarm the country, and that he merited very well of the public for the timely discovery he made, so he came off clear as indeed it was but just, for he was not only forced to serve them, but as Dobson testified for him, he had often expressed his uneasiness at being obliged to act with them, and that he wished he could get away, and he was sincere in those wishes, as appeared by his taking the first opportunity he could get to put it in practice. This Dobson was one of the ten men who ran away with the pirates' long-boat from the Orkneys, and who were afterwards made prisoners in the Firth of Leith, and carried up to Edinburgh. Gow was now a prisoner among the rest in the Marshalsea. His behaviour there was sullen and reserved, rather than penitent. It had been hinted to him by Mr. Fea, as by others, that by his behaviour he should endeavour to make himself an evidence against others, and to merit his life by a ready submission, and obliging others to do the like. But Gow was no fool, and he easily saw there were too many gone before who had provided for their own safety at his expense, and besides that he knew himself too deeply guilty of cruelty and murder to be accepted by public justice as an evidence, especially where so many other less criminals were to be had. This made him, with good reason, too, give over any thoughts of escaping by such means as that; and perhaps seeing so plainly that there was no room for it might be the reason why he seemed to reject the offer, otherwise he was not a person of such nice honour as that we should suppose he would not have secured his own life at the expense of his comrades. Gow appeared to have given over all thoughts of life, from the first time he came to England. Not that he showed any tokens of his repentance, or any sense of his condition suitable to that which was before him, but continuing sullen and reserved, even to the very time he was brought to the bar, when he came there, he could not be tried with the rest, for the arraignment being made in the usual form, he refused to plead. The Court used all the arguments which humanity dictates in such cases,³⁰¹ to prevail on him to come into ordinary course of other people in like government, laying before him the sentence of the law in such cases, namely that he must be pressed to death, the only torturing execution which however they were obliged to inflict.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

But he continued inflexible, carried on his obstinacy to such a height as to receive the sentence in form, as usual in such cases. The execution being appointed to be done the next morning, he was carried back to Newgate in order to it. But whether he was prevailed with by argument and the reasons of those about him, or whether the apparatus for the execution and the manner of the death he was to die terrified him, we cannot say, but the next morning he yielded, and petitioned to be allowed to plead, and he admitted to be tried in the ordinary way. Which being granted, he was brought to the bar by himself and pleaded, being arraigned again upon the same indictment upon which he had been sentenced as a mute, and was found guilty.

Williams the lieutenant, who was put on board the Bristol ship (as hath been said) with orders to deliver him on board the first English man-of-war they should meet with, comes, of course, to have the rest of his history made up in this place. The captain of the Bristol ship, though he received his orders from the crew of pirates and rogues, whose instructions he was not obliged to follow, and whose accusation of Williams they were not obliged to give credit to, yet punctually obeyed the order, and put him on board the Argyle, Captain Bowler, then lying in the port of Lisbon and bound for England; who, as they took him in irons, kept him so, and brought him to England, in the same conditions. But as the pirates did not send any of their company, nor indeed could they do it, along with him to be evidence against him, and the men who went out of the pirate ship on board the Bristol ship, being till then kept as prisoners on board the pirate ship (and perhaps could not have said enough, or given particular evidence, sufficient to convict him in a course of justice), Providence supplied the want by bringing the whole crew to the same place; for Williams was in the Marshalsea prison before them, and by that means they furnished sufficient evidence against Williams also, so that they were all tried together.

301. One of these humane arguments, according to Johnson, op. cit., consisted in tying his thumbs together with whipcord, "which was done several times by the executioner and another officer; they drawing the cord until it broke."

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

In Williams's case the evidence was as particular as in Gow's, and Dobson and the other swore positively that Williams boasted that after MacCauly had cut the super-cargo's throat imperfectly, he (Williams) murdered him, and added that he would not give him time to say his prayers, but shot him through the head. Phinnes and Timothy Murphy testified the same, and to show the bloody disposition of this wretch, William Booth testified that Williams proposed afterwards to the company that if they took any more ships they should not encumber themselves with the men, having already so many prisoners that in case of a fight they should not be safe with them; but that they should take them and tie them, back to back, and throw them all overboard into the sea.

It should not be omitted here also in the case of Gow himself (as I have observed in the introduction) that Gow had long meditated the kind of villainy which he now put in practice, and that it was his resolution to turn pirate the first opportunity he should get, whatever voyage he undertook, and that I observed he had intended it on board a ship in which he came home from Lisbon, and failed only for want of a sufficient party. So this resolution of his is confirmed by the testimony and confession of James Belvin, one of his fellow-criminals, who upon trial declared that he knew that Gow and the crew of the George galley had a design to turn pirates from the beginning, and added that he discovered it to George Dobson, in Amsterdam, before the ship went out to sea. For the confirmation of this, George Dobson was called up again, after he had given his evidence upon the trials, and being confronted by Belvin, he did acknowledge that Belvin had said so, and that in particular he had said that the boatswain had a design to murder the master and some others and run away with the ship. Being asked why he did not immediately reveal it to the master, Captain Ferneau, he answered that he heard Belvin tell the mate of it, and that the mate told the captain; but the captain made light of it. But the boatswain finding himself discovered, refused to go, upon which Gow was made second mate, and Belvin was made boatswain; and he had been as honest afterwards as before (whereas on the contrary, he was as forward and active as any of them, except that he was not in the first secret nor in the murders), he might have escaped what afterwards became so justly his due. But as they acted together, Justice required that they should suffer together, and accordingly, Gow and Williams, Belvin, Melvin, Winter, Peterson, Rowlinson and MacCauly, received the reward of their cruelty and blood at the gallows, being all executed together on the eleventh of June.

It happened that Gow being a very strong man, and giving a kind of spring, it so strained the rope that, on some people pulling him by the legs, it broke and he fell down, after he had remained about four minutes suspended. His fall stunned him a little, but as soon as he was taken up, he recovered himself so far as to be able to ascend the ladder a second time, which he did with very little concern, dying with the same brutal ferocity which animated all his actions while alive. His body hangs in chains over against Greenwich, as that of Williams does over against

STATE MURDER

Blackwall.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1731

October: Captain Macferson and four others were tried for piracy and hanged.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1732

June 4, Sunday (Old Style): The 1st hanging in England for the crime of forgery.³⁰²

302. The greatest number of executions for that crime would occur during 1818 with 24 such hangings. The final such hanging would take place on December 31, 1829.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1735

During this year someone prepared, from original papers and authentic memoirs, three volumes entitled LIVES OF THE MOST REMARKABLE CRIMINALS WHO HAVE BEEN CONDEMNED AND EXECUTED FOR MURDER, THE HIGHWAY, HOUSEBREAKING, STREET ROBBERIES, COINING OR OTHER OFFENCES, and published these volumes in London. The volumes gave the history of hangings at England's most active turn-off location, the triple-tree gallows erected at the crossroads known as Tyburn just to the west of London, during the span of years in which such executions had been public spectacles.

July: We learn from a pamphlet by the Reverend Samuel Moody that a native American servant, known as Samson and as Patience Boston, had killed a child out of her tribulation of mind, and had then confessed in order to satisfy some inner demon that demanded she be “guilty of Murder indeed.” Having enacted this sin, she then was able to seek forgiveness of the Lord, and find it, apparently, and in this month at the age of 23, in York, Patience was fully catechized and prayed with and then hanged by the neck until she was dead.

The Reverend Moody characterized this as a marvellous Work of sovereign and superabundant Grace.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1736

The Massachusetts code for punishment was fairly standardized, as far as getting yourself hanged went:

	Theft	Burglary
Strike 1	fine or whip	brand on forehead
Strike 2	treble damages, an hour on the gallows with a rope around the neck, then thirty stripes at the whipping post	an hour on the gallows with a rope around the neck, then thirty stripes at the whipping post
Strike 3	hang	hang

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1738

Abigail Davis's novel HANGING KATHERINE GARRET (Heritage Press, 2003) uses a 21st-century protagonist to research the mysteries surrounding the 1737 trial of Katherine Garret, a Pequot accused of infanticide in Saybrook, Connecticut, and her hanging in this year in New London.

Some sailors were hanged at Newport, Rhode Island for having been guilty of a mutiny at sea.

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

May 28, Sunday (Old Style): Joseph-Ignace Guillotin was born at Saintes. The story has it that the infant's mother had gone into labor while watching the torture execution of a man on the wheel.

STATE MURDER

LA GUILLOTINE

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1739

April 7: Richard (Dick) Turpin, highwayman, was hanged at York.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1740

The General Court of Massachusetts, upon the suggestion of the royal governor, Jonathan Belcher, considered awarding to a descendent of Friend Mary Dyer, one Samuel Dyer, a sum of money in compensation for sufferings inflicted by Boston upon his ancestor. The offer of blood money was declined, the descendant writing to the court that he found “their sense of the injury and injustice committed” to be sufficient for him and his family. He added that they freely forgave all the actors in that dismal catastrophe.

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

COLDBLOODED MURDER

January 19: The Quakers of Pennsylvania, responding to demands for the creation and funding of an obligatory militia, pointed out that there was a subtle differentiation to be made between military violence and police violence. To kill “a burglar who broke into our houses, plundered us of our goods, and perhaps would have murdered too, if he could not have otherwise accomplished his ends” would be to kill someone who was violating “laws human and divine,” whereas to kill a soldier would be to kill someone who supposed himself to be acting “in the discharge of his duty” and in “obedience to the commands of his sovereign.” –Very different, to kill someone who knew he was doing wrong, versus someone who was supposing incorrectly that he was doing right! –OK, you understand now, right?³⁰³

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

THE QUAKER PEACE TESTIMONY

November 24, day (Old Style): William Duell, a murderer, was hanged at Tyburn in London and without this being noticed by the executioner made it all the way to the dissection table unconscious but still alive.³⁰⁴

303. It is to be noted that the Quaker case for nonviolence in Pennsylvania was being considerably weakened by their support for capital punishment.

304. Of course, you’re hoping that this story had a happy ending.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1741

March/April: In New-York, a series of suspicious fires and reports of slave conspiracy led to a general hysteria³⁰⁵ similar to the hysteria that had developed in Spring 1712.

The series of “suspicious” fires began with the destruction of Fort George, the Governor’s residence. This set off a panic among the white residents, that the enslaved community (numbering over 2,000 out of the city’s population of 11,000) was intending in servile insurrection to set fire to the city, in order to kill whites as they attempted to extinguish the flames.³⁰⁶

The resulting Salem-like (or McCarthyesque) show trials, held throughout that spring and summer, would find over 100 slaves guilty of arson and/or conspiracy to commit murder. About 70 would be deported, 18 hanged, and 13 burned at the stake.

Commenting on the Scorsese movie “Gangs of New York”:
 “In my own research of New York history, through first-person accounts and newspaper reports, I have found that our past was often at least as violent and squalid, if not more so, than the movie depicts.”

— Kevin Baker

Per Daniel Horsmanden’s THE NEW-YORK CONSPIRACY, OR THE HISTORY OF THE NEGRO PLOT: WITH THE JOURNAL OF THE PROCEEDINGS AGAINST THE CONSPIRATORS AT NEW-YORK IN THE YEARS 1741-2: TOGETHER WITH SEVERAL INTERESTING TABLES CONTAINING THE NAMES OF THE WHITE AND BLACK PERSONS ARRESTED ON ACCOUNT OF THE CONSPIRACY, THE TIMES OF THEIR TRIALS, THEIR SENTENCES, THEIR EXECUTIONS BY BURNING AND HANGING, NAMES OF THOSE TRANSPORTED, AND THOSE DISCHARGED: WITH A VARIETY OF OTHER USEFUL AND HIGHLY INTERESTING MATTER (1741/1742), and A JOURNAL OF THE PROCEEDINGS IN THE DETECTION OF THE CONSPIRACY FORMED BY SOME WHITE PEOPLE, IN CONJUNCTION WITH NEGRO AND OTHER SLAVES, FOR BURNING THE CITY OF NEW-YORK IN AMERICA AND MURDERING THE INHABITANTS (1744):

The parties accused of the conspiracy were numerous, and
 305. Read all about it in Jill Lepore’s new LIBERTY, SLAVERY, AND CONSPIRACY IN EIGHTEENTH-CENTURY MANHATTAN (NY: Alfred A. Knopf, 2005). —This just in: anything written by Jill Lepore is worth your undivided attention. Also relevant: Thomas J. Davis’s A RUMOR OF REVOLT (Amherst MA: U of Massachusetts P, 1985) and Daniel Horsmanden’s THE NEW YORK CONSPIRACY (Boston MA: Beacon Press, 1971).

306. Clearly, there’s a terminology problem here. In an effort to resolve this terminology issue, at the Republican National Convention in New York during August 2004 –at which the Republican Party would for four days make an effort to strip from its face its mask of hostility to the plight of the downtrodden and reveal its true countenance of benevolent conservatism and concern– these people would be sensitively referred to by a Hoosier Republican running for the US Senate as “involuntary immigrants.”

So, perhaps, this is a good point at which to insert a story about involuntary immigrants that has been passed on to us by Ram Varmha, a retired IBM engineer whose father had briefly served as Maharaja after the independence of Cochin. He relates the story as narrated to him by his paternal grandmother who lived in Thripoonithura, Cochin: “When my grandmother (born 1882) was a young girl she would go with the elder ladies of the family to the Pazhayannur Devi Temple in Fort Cochin, next to the Cochin Lantha Palace built by the Dutch (Landers = Lantha), which was an early establishment of the Cochin royal family before the administration moved to Thripoonithura. My grandmother often told us that in the basement of the Lantha Palace, in a confined area, a family of Africans had been kept locked up, as in a zoo! By my Grandmother’s time all the Africans had died. But, some of the elder ladies had narrated the story to her of ‘Kappiries’ (Africans) kept in captivity there. It seems visitors would give them fruits and bananas. They were well cared for but always kept in confinement. My grandmother did not know all the details but according to her, ‘many’ years earlier, a ship having broken its mast drifted into the old Cochin harbor. When the locals climbed aboard, they found a crewless ship, but in the hold there were some chained ‘Kappiries’ still alive; others having perished. The locals did not know what to do with them. Not understanding their language and finding the Africans in chains, the locals thought that these were dangerous to set free. So they herded the poor Africans into the basement of the Cochin Fort, and held them in captivity, for many, many years! I have no idea when the initial incident happened, but I presume it took place in the late 1700s or early 1800s. This points to the possibility that it was, in fact, a slave ship carrying human cargo from East Africa to either the USA or the West Indies. An amazing and rather bizarre story. Incidentally, this is not an ‘old woman’s tale’! Its quite reliable. My grandmother would identify some of the older ladies who had actually seen the surviving Kappiries.”

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

business by degrees multiplied so fast upon the grand jury, which bore the burthen of this inquiry, that there would have been an immediate necessity for others to have lent a helping hand in taking examinations from the beginning, if the judges had not found it expedient to examine the persons accused, upon their first taking into custody, whereby it seemed most likely the truth would bolt out, before they had time to cool, or opportunity of discoursing in the jail with their confederates, who were before committed.

The examinations thus taken by the judges, were soon after laid before the grand jury, who interrogated the parties therefrom in such manner, as generally produced from them the substance of the same matter, and often something more, by which means there accrued no small advantage; for though were the last examination brought to light new discover, yet it will be seldom found, there is any thing in such further examinations contradictory to the former, but generally a confirmation of them; and in such case, the setting forth the same at large, may not be thought a useless tautology; not that this will happen often, and where it does, it will be chiefly found in the examinations and confessions of negroes, who, in ordinary cases, are seldom found to hold twice in the same story; which, for its rarity therefore, if it carried not with it the additional weight of the greater appearance of truth, may make this particular the more excusable; and further, this is a diary of the proceedings, that is to be exhibited, therefore, in conformity to that plan, nothing should be omitted, which may be of use. All proper precautions were taken by the judges, that the criminals should be kept separate; and they were so, as much as the scanty room in the jail would admit of; and new apartments were fitted up for their reception: but more particular care was taken, that such negroes as had made confession and discovery, and were to be made use of as witnesses, should be kept apart from the rest, and as much from each other, as the accommodations would allow of, in order to prevent their caballing from each other first, as well upon the trials, as otherwise, and then generally confronted with the persons they accused, who were usually sent for and taken into custody upon such examinations, if they were to be met with; which was the means of bringing many others to a confession, as well as were newly taken up, as those who had long before been committed, perhaps upon slighter grounds, and had insisted upon their innocence; for they had generally the cunning not to own their guilt, till they knew their accusers. But notwithstanding this was the ordinary method taken, both by the judges and grand jury, to send for the parties as soon as impeached, (which however might sometimes through hurry be omitted) yet several who happened then to be out of the way, were afterwards forgot, and slipped through our fingers, from the multiplicity of business in hand, as will hereafter appear; which therefore is particularly recommended to the notice of their owners.

The trouble of examining criminals in general, may be easily guessed at; but the fatigue in that of negroes, is not to be conceived, but by those that have undergone the drudgery. The difficulty of bringing and holding them to the truth, if by chance it starts through them, is not to be surmounted, but by the closest attention; many of them have a great deal of craft; their unintelligible jargon stands them in great stead, to conceal their meaning; so that an examiner must expect to encounter with much perplexity, grope through a maze of obscurity, be obliged to lay hold of broken hints, lay them carefully together, and thoroughly weigh and compare them with each other, before he can be able to see the light, or fix those creatures to any certain determinate meaning.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

April 21, Tuesday (Old Style): At New-York, the great servile insurrection conspiracy. Of those captured, 13 black slaves would be burned at the stake, 18 would be hanged, and 70 would be sold to the islands of the Caribbean.³⁰⁷

At a Supreme Court of judicature held for the province of New York, at the city-hall of the city of New York, on Tuesday, April 21, 1741-Present, Frederick Philipse, esq. Second justice; Daniel Horsmanden, esq. third justice.

The grand jury were called. The following persons appeared, and were sworn-viz.:

Mr. Robert Watts, merchant, foreman; Messrs. Jeremiah Latouche, Joseph Read, Anthony Rutgers, John M'Evers, John Cruger, jun. John Merritt, Adoniah Schuyler, Isaac De Peyster, Abraham Keteltass, David Provoost, Rene Hett, Henry Beekman, jun. David Van Horne, George Spencer, Thomas Duncan, Winant Van Zant, merchants. Mr. Justice Philipse gave the charge to the grand jury, as followeth:

Gentlemen of the grand jury,

It is not without some concern, that I am obliged at this time to be more particular in your charge, than for many preceding terms there hath been occasion. The many frights and terrors which the good people of this city have of late been put into, by repeated and unusual fires, and burning of houses, give us too much room to suspect, that some of them at least, did not proceed from mere chance, or common accidents; but on the contrary, from the premeditated malice and wicked pursuits of evil and designing persons; and therefore, it greatly behoves us to use our utmost diligence, by all lawful ways and means to discover the contrivers and perpetrators of such daring and flagitious undertakings: that, upon conviction, they may receive condign punishment; for although we have the happiness of living under a government which exceeds all others in the excellency of its constitution and laws, yet if those to whom the execution of them (which my lord Coke calls the life and soul of the law) is committed, do not exert themselves in a conscientious discharge of their respective duties, such laws which were intended for a terror to the evil-doer, and a protection to the good, will become a dead letter, and our most excellent constitution turned into anarchy and confusion; every one practising what he listeth, and doing what shall seem good in his own eyes: to prevent which, it is the duty of all grand juries to inquire into the conduct and behaviour of the people in their respective counties; and if, upon examination, they find any to have transgressed the laws of the land, to present them, that so they may by the court be put upon their trial, and then either to be discharged or punished according to their demerits.

I am told there are several prisoners now in jail, who have been committed by the city magistrates, upon suspicion of having been 307. Supreme Court of Judicature of New-York, "New York Conspiracy," Journal of the Proceedings Against the Conspirators, at New York in 1741.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

concerned in some of the late fires; and others, who under pretence of assisting the unhappy sufferers, by saving their goods from the flames, for stealing, or receiving them. This indeed, is adding affliction to the afflicted, and is a very great aggravation of such crime, and therefore deserves a narrow inquiry: that so the exemplary punishment of the guilty (if any such should be so found) may deter others from committing the like villainies; for this kind of stealing, I think, has not been often practised among us.

Gentlemen,

Arson, or the malicious and voluntary burning, not only a mansion house, but also any other house, and the out buildings, or barns, and stables adjoining thereto, by night or by day, is felony at common law; and if any part of the house be burned, the offender is guilty of felony, notwithstanding the fire afterwards be put out, or go out of itself.

This crime is of so shocking a nature, that if we have any in this city, who, having been guilty thereof, should escape, who can say he is safe, or tell where it will end?

Gentlemen,

Another Thing which I cannot omit recommending to your serious and diligent inquiry, is to find out and present all such persons who sell rum, and other strong liquor to negroes. It must be obvious to every one, that there are too many of them in this city; who, under pretence of selling what they call a penny dram to a negro, will sell to him as many quarts or gallons of rum, as he can steal money or goods to pay for.

How this notion of its being lawful to sell a penny dram, or a pennyworth of rum to a slave, without the consent or direction of his master, has prevailed, I know not; but this I am sure of, that there is not only no such law, but that the doing of it is directly contrary to an act of the assembly now in force, for the better regulating of slaves. The many fatal consequences flowing from this prevailing and wicked practice, are so notorious, and so nearly concern us all, that one would be almost surprised, to think there should be a necessity for a court to recommend a suppression of such pernicious houses: thus much in particular; now in general.

My charge, gentlemen, further is, to present all conspiracies, combinations, and other offences, from treasons down to trespasses; and in your inquiries, the oath you, and each of you have just now taken will, I am persuaded, be your guide, and I pray God to direct and assist you in the discharge of your duty. Court adjourned until to-morrow morning ten o'clock.

The grand jury having been informed, that Mary Burton could give them some account concerning the good stolen from Mr. Hogg's, sent for her this morning, and ordered she should be sworn; the constable returned and acquainted them, that she said she would not be sworn, nor give evidence; whereupon they ordered the constable to get a warrant from a magistrate, to bring her before them. The constable was some time gone, but at length returned, and brought her with him; and being asked why she would not be sworn, and give her evidence? she told the grand jury she would not be sworn; and seemed to be under some great uneasiness, or terrible apprehensions; which gave suspicion that she knew something concerning the fires that had lately happened: and being asked a question to that purpose, she gave no answer; which increased the jealousy that she was privy to them; and as it was thought a matter of the utmost concern, the grand jury was very importunate, and used many arguments with her, in public and private, to persuade her to speak the truth, and tell all she knew about it. To this end, the lieutenant governor's proclamation was read to her, promising indemnity, and the reward of one hundred pounds to any person, confederate or not, who should make discovery, etc. She seemed to despise it, nor could the grand jury by any means, either threats or promises, prevail upon her, though they assured her withal, that she should have the protection of the magistrates, and her person be safe and secure from harm; but hitherto all was in vain: therefore, the grand jury desired alderman Bancker to commit her; and the constable was charged with her accordingly; but before he had got her to jail, she considered better of it, and resolved to be sworn, and give her evidence in the afternoon.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Accordingly, she being sworn, came before the grand jury; but as they were proceeding to her examination, and before they asked her any questions, she told them she would acquaint them with what she knew relating to the goods stolen from Mr. Hogg's, but would say nothing about the fires.

This expression thus, as it were providentially, slipping from the evidence, much alarmed the grand jury; for, as they naturally concluded, it did by construction amount to an affirmative, that she could give an account of the occasion of the several fires; and therefore, as it highly became those gentlemen in the discharge of their trust, they determined to use their utmost diligence to sift out the discovery, but still she remained inflexible, till at length, having recourse to religious topics, representing to her the heinousness of the crime which she would be guilty of, if she was privy to, and could discover so wicked a design, as the firing houses about our ears; whereby not only people's estates would be destroyed, but many person might lose their lives in the flames: this she would have to answer for at the day of judgment, as much as any person immediately concerned, because she might have prevented this destruction, and would not; so that a most damnable sin would lie at her door; and what need she fear from her divulging it; she was sure of the protection of the magistrates? or the grand jury expressed themselves in words to the same purpose; which arguments at last prevailed, and she gave the following evidence, which however, notwithstanding what had been said, came from her, as if still under some terrible apprehensions or restraints.

Deposition, No. 1.-Mary Burton, being sworn, deposeth,

1. "That Prince (a) and Caesar (b) brought the things of which they had robbed Mr. Hogg, to her master, John Hughson's house, and that they were handed in through the window, Hughson, his wife, and Peggy receiving them, about two or three o'clock on a Sunday morning. (c) 2. "That Caesar, prince, and Mr. Philipse's negro man (Cuffee) used to meet frequently at her master's house, and that she had heard them (the negroes) talk frequently of burning the fort; and that they would go down to the Fly (d) and burn the whole town; and that her master and mistress said, they would aid and assist them as much as they could. 3. "That in their common conversation they used to say, that when all this was done, Caesar should be governor, and Hughson, her master, should be king. 4. "That Cuffee used to say, that a great many people had too much, and others too little; that his old master had a great deal of money, but that, in a short time, he should have less, and that he (Cuffee) should have more. 5. "That at the same time when the things of which Mr. Hogg was robbed, were brought to her master's house, they brought some indigo and bees wax, which was likewise received by her master and mistress. 6. "That at the meetings of the three aforesaid negroes, Caesar, Prince and Cuffee, at her master's house, they used to say, in their conversations, that when they set fire to the town, they would do it in the night, and as the white people came to extinguish it, they would kill and destroy them. 7. "That she has known at times, seven or eight guns in her master's house, and some swords, and that she has seen twenty or thirty negroes at one time in her master's house; and that at such large meetings, the three aforesaid negroes, Cuffee, Prince and Caesar, were generally present, and most active, and that they used to say, that the other negroes durst not refuse to do what they commanded them, and they were sure that they had a number sufficient to stand by them. 8. "That Hughson (her master) and her mistress used to threaten, that if she, the deponent, ever made mention of the goods stolen from Mr. Hogg, they would poison her; and the negroes swore, if ever she published, or discovered the design of burning the town, they would burn her whenever they met her. 9. "That she never saw any white person in company when they talked of burning the town, but her master, her mistress, and Peggy."

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

This evidence of a conspiracy, not only to burn the city, but also destroy and murder the people, was most astonishing to the grand jury, and that any white people should become so abandoned as to confederate with slaves in such an execrable and detestable purpose, could not but be very amazing to every one that heard it; what could scarce be credited; but that the several fires had been occasioned by some combination of villains, was, at the time of them, naturally to be collected from the manner and circumstances attending them.

The grand jury therefore, as it was a matter of the utmost consequence, thought it necessary to inform the judges concerning it, in order that the most effectual measures might be concerted, for discovering the confederates; and the judges were acquainted with it accordingly.

SUPREME COURT

Friday, May 1.

Present, the second and third justices.

The king against Caesar and prince, negroes. On trial.

The jury called, and the prisoners making no challenge, the following persons were sworn, viz.:

Roger French, John Groesbeek, John Richard, Abraham Kipp, George Witts, John Thurman, Patrick Jackson, Benjamin Moore, William Hamersley, John Lashier, Joshua Sleydall, John Shurmur.

These two negroes were arraigned on two indictments, the twenty fourth of April last; the one for their entering the dwelling house of Robert Hogg, of this city, merchant, on the first day of March then last past, with intent then and there to commit some felony; and for feloniously stealing and carrying away then and there the goods and chattels of the said Robert Hogg, of the value of four pounds five shillings sterling, against the form of the statutes in such case made and provided, and against the peace of our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity.

The other for their entering the dwelling house of Abraham

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Meyers Cohen in this city, merchant, on the first day of March with the intent then and there to commit some felony; and for feloniously stealing and carrying away then and there the goods and chattels of the said Abraham Meyers Cohen of the value of five pounds sterling, against the form of the statutes, etc. And against the king's peace, etc.

To each of which indictments they pleaded, not guilty.

The Attorney General having opened both the indictments, he with Joseph Murray, Esq. of council for the king, proceeded to examine the witnesses, viz.,

For the king, Mrs. Hogg, Mrs. Boswell, Christopher Wilson, Rachina Guerin, Mr. Robert Hogg, Mr. Robert Watts, Margaret Sorubiero, alias Kerry, Abraham Meyers Cohen, James Mills, Thomas Wenman, John Moore, Esq. Cornelius Brower, Anthony Ham, Mary Burton.

For the prisoners, Alderman Bancker, Alderman Johnson, John Auboyneau.

The prisoners upon their defence denied the charge against them. And,

The evidence being summed up, which was very strong and full, and the jury charged, they withdrew; and being returned, found them guilty of the indictments.

Ordered, that the trials of the Hughsons and Margaret Kerry, be put off until Wednesday of the 6th inst.

Court adjourned until Monday morning, 4th May, at ten o'clock. (a) Caesar.

SUPREME COURT Friday, May 8

Present, the second and third justices.

The king against Caesar and Prince, negroes.

The prisoners having been capitally convicted on two several indictments for felony, and being brought to the bar the court proceeded to give sentence; which was passed by the second justice as followeth:

You, Caesar and Prince, the grand jury having found two indictments against each of you, for feloniously stealing and taking away from Mr. Hogg, and Mr. Meyers Cohen, sundry goods of considerable value. To these indictments you severally pleaded not guilty; and for your trials put yourselves upon God and the country; which country having found you guilty, it now only remains for the court to pronounce that judgment which the law requires, and the nature of your crimes deserve.

But before I proceed to sentence, I must tell you, that you have been proceeded against in the same manner as any white man, guilty of your crimes, would have been. You had not only the liberty of sending for your witnesses; asking them such questions as you thought proper; but likewise making the best defence you could; and as you have been convicted by twelve honest men upon their oaths, so the just judgement of God has at length overtaken you.

I have great reason to believe, that the crimes you now stand convicted of, are not the least of those you have been concerned in; for by your general characters you have been very wicked fellows, hardened sinners, and ripe, as well as ready, for the most enormous and daring enterprizes, especially you, Caesar: and as the time you have yet to live is to be but very short, I earnestly advise and exhort both of you to employ it in the most diligent and best manner you can, by confessing your sins, repenting sincerely of them, and praying God of his infinite goodness to have mercy on your souls: and as God knows the secrets of your hearts, and cannot be cheated or imposed upon, so you must shortly give an account to him, and answer for all your actions; and depend upon it, if you do not truly repent before you die, there is a hell to punish the wicked eternally. And as it is not in your powers to make full restitution for the many injuries you have done the public; so I advise both of you to do all that in you is, to prevent further mischiefs, by discovering such persons as have been concerned with you, in designing or endeavouring to burn this city, and to destroy its inhabitants. This I am fully persuaded is in your power to do if you will; if so, and you do not make such discovery, be assured God almighty will punish you for it, though we do not: therefore I advise you to consider this well, and I hope both of you will tell the truth.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

And now, nothing further remains for me to say, but that you Caesar, and you Prince, are to be taken hence to the place whence you came, and from thence to the place of execution, and there you, and each of you, are to be hanged by the neck until you be dead. And I pray the Lord to have mercy on your souls.

Ordered, that their execution be on Monday next, the eleventh day of this instant, between the hours of nine and one of the same day. And further ordered that after the execution of the said sentence, the body of Caesar be hung in chains.

Court adjourned till Monday morning next ten o'clock.

August 29, Saturday (Old Style): A young white man who was being referred to as John Ury, presumably from Ireland, was hanged in New-York. This probably wasn't his name. He had been charged with being a Catholic priest, which was a crime because General James Oglethorpe, the founder of Georgia, had allegedly uncovered a plot by Spanish priests "to burn every English town in the Colonies," and, also, with having made a practice of aiding and abetting the town's negroes, many of whom were Catholic. This hanging was the culmination of a spasm in which, over a period of a few weeks, a grand total of 21 white New-Yorkers had been interrogated under torture (4 of them then hanged), 14 black New-Yorkers burned at the stake, 20 black New-Yorkers hanged in chains, and 71 black New-Yorkers seized and sold into slavery. How had this spasm of fears of servile insurrections begun? Well, do you remember having learned in school of a poem by Samuel Woodworth, titled "The Old Oaken Bucket"? This poem refers to the Tea Water Pump at the junction of what is now Park Row and Roosevelt Street in New-York. Near this pump with its oaken bucket and its tea-colored water was a groggery and roominghouse for negroes, run by an immigrant shoemaker named Long John Hughson. It was rumored that Long John was a fence who bought stolen goods from the city's negro sneak-thieves. One of the tenants in this boardinghouse was this young white man, and in addition, the Hughsons were harboring, as their servant girl, a 16-year-old white orphan named Mary Burton. The Flamborough, an English man-'o-war, had entered New-York harbor with a Spanish prize ship they had captured, and aboard this prize ship were a number of black Catholics who insisted they were not slaves but freeborn sailors. Nevertheless they were of course sold into slavery and flogged repeatedly. Mary Burton, observing the young white tenant washing and bandaging the black men's whip wounds, and giving these enslaved men rum, went to the authorities with a tale which was almost certainly concocted in order to gain for herself some personal notice. This crew had allegedly been overheard bragging about how, on February 28th, they had gotten some silverware and a little money at the Robert Hogg residence at Broad and South William Streets. The Hughson family and 2 of the black Catholic sailors, who were being referred to in New-York as "Prince" and "Caesar," were tortured by the police to obtain a confession. Then, suddenly, in March, there was a fire at Governor's House that destroyed a number of structures, including King's Chapel — and fires were breaking out all over the English settlement on Manhattan Island. There was a rumor that a negro had been seen jumping out of the window of a burning building. A woman named Earle was watching 3 black men walk together down Broadway when she heard one of them exclaim "Fire! Fire! Scorch! Be more mebbe by 'n by!" Soon there were 154 blacks being held in the New-York jail, “every black man who cannot give a satisfactory account of himself.” Again Mary Burton stepped forward, this time to seek a reward of £100 that had been offered by the Common Council for evidence regarding this “Negro Plot to burn the city.” She swore she had overheard Long John Hughson conspire with these black men to be made King of New-York, with the slave called “Caesar” to become Governor, and Catholic black man, called “Jack,” to command a black army. A white prisoner who had been accused of robbing the Lieutenant Governor obtained his freedom by corroborating her story. Hundreds of white families fled the city while white mobs roamed the city looking for blacks to kill and succeeding in finding, and burning at the stake, 2 black New-Yorkers. On May 11th, “Prince” and “Caesar,” having been tried and found guilty, were hanged. On June 12th, it taking longer to try and convict a white family, this Mr. and Mrs. Hughson and an associated Peggy Kerry of the boardinghouse were hanged. They had protested their entire innocence to the last. The body of Long John Hughson was gibbeted and hung in chains on Battery Point as “a lesson to other conspirators.” Near where the Nathan Hale statue now is in City Hall park, 2 black New-Yorkers called “Quace” and “Cuffee” were burned simultaneously, on stakes 50 feet apart, while the others were burned not there or collectively but individually, at a site about 100 yards farther to the north. At this time Mary Burton stepped forward a 3d time, to identify Mr. Hughson’s mysterious tenant as a Catholic priest in plain clothes and as the ringleader of the Negro Plot to burn the city. And this man confessed that in fact he was a priest, and that he had said Mass many times, and that he had taught black adults and children to read and write. Finally, when after this execution of this priest being referred to as “John Ury,” Mary Burton’s allegations continued, and continued to become more and more preposterous, the authorities turned against her as well. She was stoned in the streets, and it is possible that she committed suicide or was confined in a madhouse.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

ANTI-CATHOLICISM

November 21, Saturday (Old Style): Friend Samuel Chew, a Quaker magistrate of Pennsylvania on his way to becoming a non-Quaker, demanded to be informed how his fellow Quaker magistrates could be easy in their consciences when they “forcibly put another to death, after his hands are tied behind him,” for a crime, when they remained uneasy in their consciences about the military killing of people who were in “unlawful resistance.” This was entirely too much: soon the other members of his Duck Creek monthly meeting would publicly disown him for this considered opposition to state-sanctioned coldblooded murder.

COLDBLOODED MURDER

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

THE QUAKER PEACE TESTIMONY

December 31, Thursday (Old Style): Believing that Roman Catholic priests had on orders from Spain been inciting slaves to burn New-York, and that this had been the cause of the series of suspicious fires that had broken out in the Big Apple during March and April of this year, 4 whites and 18 blacks were hanged and 13 blacks were burned at the stake. For their supposed complicity or affiliation in servile insurrection, 71 slaves were “deported,” that is, sold south. (General James Oglethorpe would report this news to the trustees in a letter of May 28, 1742. He would also mention fires at Charles Town, and a Negro insurrection in Carolina in which Mr. Bathurst and above 20 white people and 40 Negroes were killed.)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1744

October: Thomas and James Greentree were fined £10 each because they had refused to impound their goats at Peak Gutt on St. Helena for inspection. They were advised that they were being treated mercifully, because disobeying the law was the beginning of rebellion and the consequence of rebellion was of course execution.

“Voted by ye Chh yt as things appear at present our Sister Sarah Robbins about ye last of May was guilty of ye Sin of Drunkenness & in Consideration thereof ye She be debarred from Communion in ye Special ordinances of ye Gospel for a Season, — yt we will privately use Means for her Conviction, & are ready to hear with Candour any thing which She may offer in her own Vindication within Six weeks from this Time.”³⁰⁸

308. An excerpt from the records of the 1st Parish in Brewster MA on Cape Cod, which was formerly the 1st Parish in Harwich.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1745

January 18, Friday (1744, Old Style): The contemptible long-term petty criminal Samuel Smith whom the 12-year-old John Thoreau perhaps would hear and then see hanged in Concord, Massachusetts on December 26, 1799 was on this day born in Middleton, Connecticut. (This would put this man close to his 55th birthday when he ascended to the platform just after Christmas and a few days prior to the turn of the 19th Century.)

“MAGISTERIAL HISTORY” IS FANTASIZING: HISTORY IS CHRONOLOGY

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1752

In England, the enactment of An Act for better preventing the horrid Crime of Murder, 25 Geo. 2, c. 37, 1752, meant that henceforward, the practice of dissecting, and the practice of gibbeting, would become additional punishments that were to be meted out to the corpses of murderers alone.

HANGING

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1755

September: In Charlestown in the Massachusetts Bay Colony, the slaves Mark, Phillis, and Phebe, along with Quaco and Robin, were convicted of murdering the slavemaster, Captain John Codman.³⁰⁹

Having ascertained that their master had, by his will, made them free at his death, they poisoned him in order to obtain their liberty so much the sooner.

Phillis, since she was a woman, was burned alive. Mark, since he was a man and, knowing how to read and write, the evident leader of the slave conspiracy,³¹⁰ was dragged by horses to his place of execution on the town common, throttled, disemboweled³¹¹ and beheaded, and then his body was hung up in chains by the side of the public thoroughfare.

SERVILE INSURRECTION

309. Captain John Codman was the son of Stephen Codman and Elizabeth Randall Codman of Charlestown, born on October 4, 1696. He married Parnell Foster, daughter of Richard Foster, and she died on September 15, 1752, at the age of 56.

310. He was known, for instance, to have read the BIBLE through.

311. The records suggest he was noticed to be already dead, rather than merely unconscious, while he was being disemboweled.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1760

In Newport, Rhode Island, some sailors were hanged for having been guilty of a mutiny at sea.

Some of the Quaker group in Newport, including some of the elders and some of the ministers, were, however little superior in morality to such condemned persons, for they were not only slavemasters but also were still entangled in the international slave trade. For instance, at this point the Wanton family that would produce Stephen Wanton Gould was still engaging in this trade. Friend John Woolman wrote that he and his companions “in bowedness of spirit went to the Yearly Meeting at Newport, where I understood that a large number of slaves were imported from Africa and then on sale by a member of our Society.... At this time I had a feeling of the condition of Habakkuk as thus expressed: ‘When I heard, my belly trembled, my lips quivered, my appetite failed, and I grew outwardly weak. I trembled in myself that I might rest in the day of trouble.’ I had many cogitations and was sorely distressed.” Habakkuk 3:16 is of course a graphic description of the wrath of God; the verse concluding with “I sigh for the day of distress to dawn over my assailants.”

Friend John engaged in a successful effort to read in Yearly Meeting session a petition to the Rhode Island legislature to discourage the importation of slaves. Apparently he got through this with his customary delicate, compassionate, and forceful persuasion. Having been able to read the petition aloud in the hearing of Friends, he “felt easy to leave the essay amongst Friends, for them to proceed on it as they believed best.”

Then, however, the Yearly Meeting took up the question of lotteries, and Friend John evidently was not able to maintain his temperance. He reports that “The matter was zealously handled by some on both sides.... And in the heat of zeal, I once made reply to what an ancient Friend said, which when I sat down I saw that my words were not enough seasoned with charity, and after this I spake no more on the subject. ...Some time after ... I, remaining uneasy with the manner of my speaking ... could not see my way clear to conceal my uneasiness, but was concerned that I might say nothing to weaken the cause in which I had laboured. And then after some close exercise and hearty repentance for that I had not attended closely to the safe guide, I stood up and ... acquainted Friends that though I dare not go from what I had said as to the matter, yet I was uneasy with the manner of my speaking, as believing milder language would have been better. As this was uttered in some degree of creaturely abasement, it appeared to have a good savor amongst us, after a warm debate.” Woolman had managed to rein in his anger and distress during his careful and skillful management of his antislavery petition, using the emotional energy to power his compassion, discernment, and charity toward the slaveholders themselves, but then during the discussion of lotteries his anger had slipped out. Following the general Meeting, however Woolman was able to meet with a number of slaveholding ministers, elders, overseers, and others, and was able to report that “My exercise was heavy and I was deeply bowed in spirit before the Lord, who was pleased to favour with the seasoning virtue of Truth, which wrought a tenderness amongst us, and the subject was mutually handled in a calm and peaceable spirit.”

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Visit, in Company with Samuel Eastburn, to Long Island, Rhode Island, Boston, etc. — Remarks on the Slave-Trade at Newport; also on Lotteries — Some Observations on the Island of Nantucket.

FOURTH Month, 1760. — Having for some time past felt a sympathy in my mind with Friends eastward, I opened my concern in our Monthly Meeting, and, obtaining a certificate, set forward on the 17th of this month, in company with my beloved friend Samuel Eastburn. We had meetings at Woodbridge, Rahway, and Plainfield, and were at their Monthly Meeting of ministers and elders in Rahway. We laboured under some discouragement, but through the invisible power of truth our visit was made reviving to the lowly-minded, with whom I felt a near unity of spirit, being much reduced in my mind. We passed on and visited most of the meetings on Long Island. It was my concern from day to day, to say neither more nor less than what the Spirit of truth opened in me, being jealous over myself lest I should say anything to make my testimony look agreeable to that mind in people which is not in pure obedience to the cross of Christ.

The spring of the ministry was often low, and through the subjecting power of truth we were kept low with it; from place to place they whose hearts were truly concerned for the cause of Christ appeared to be comforted in our labours, and though it was in general a time of abasement of the creature, yet, through His goodness who is a helper of the poor, we had some truly edifying seasons both in meetings and in families where we tarried. Sometimes we found strength to labour earnestly with the unfaithful, especially with those whose station in families or in the Society was such that their example had a powerful tendency to open the way for others to go aside from the purity and soundness of the blessed truth.

At Jericho, on Long Island, I wrote home as follows: —

24th of the Fourth Month, 1760.

DEARLY BELOVED WIFE, — We are favoured with health; have been at sundry meetings in East Jersey and on this island. My mind hath been much in an inward, watchful frame since I left thee, greatly desiring that our proceedings may be singly in the will of our Heavenly Father.

As the present appearance of things is not joyous, I have been much shut up from outward cheerfulness, remembering that promise, "Then shalt thou delight thyself in the Lord"; as this from day to day has been revived in my memory, I have considered that His internal presence in our minds is a delight of all others the most pure, and that the honest-hearted not only delight in this, but in the effect of it upon them. He regards the helpless and distressed, and reveals His love to His children under affliction, who delight in beholding His benevolence, and in feeling divine charity moving in them. Of this I may speak a little, for, though since I left you I have often an engaging love and affection towards thee and my daughter and friends about home, and going out at this time, when sickness is so great amongst you, is a trial upon me; yet I often remember there are many widows and fatherless, many who have poor tutors, many who have evil examples before them, and many whose minds are in captivity; for whose sake my heart is at times moved with compassion, so that I feel my mind resigned to leave you for a season, to exercise that gift which the Lord hath bestowed on me, which though small compared with some, yet in this I rejoice that I feel love unfeigned towards my fellow-creatures. I recommend you to the Almighty, who, I trust, cares for you, and under a sense of His heavenly love remain, Thy loving husband, J. W.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

We crossed from the east end of Long Island to New London, about thirty miles, in a large open boat; while we were out, the wind rising high, the waves several times beat over us, so that to me it appeared dangerous, but my mind was at that time turned to Him who made and governs the deep, and my life was resigned to Him; as He was mercifully pleased to preserve us, I had fresh occasion to consider every day as a day lent to me, and felt a renewed engagement to devote my time, and all I had, to Him who gave it.

We had five meetings in Narraganset, and went thence to Newport on Rhode Island. Our gracious Father preserved us in an humble dependence on Him through deep exercises that were mortifying to the creaturely will. In several families in the country where we lodged, I felt an engagement on my mind to have a conference with them in private, concerning their slaves; and through divine aid I was favoured to give up thereto. Though in this concern I differ from many whose service in travelling is, I believe, greater than mine, yet I do not think hardly of them for omitting it; I do not repine at having so unpleasant a task assigned me, but look with awfulness to Him who appoints to His servants their respective employments, and is good to all who serve Him sincerely.

We got to Newport in the evening, and on the next day visited two sick persons, with whom we had comfortable sittings, and in the afternoon attended the burial of a Friend. The next day we were at meetings at Newport, in the forenoon and afternoon; the spring of the ministry was opened, and strength was given to declare the Word of Life to the people.

The day following we went on our journey, but the great number of slaves in these parts, and the continuance of that trade from thence to Guinea, made a deep impression on me, and my cries were often put up to my Heavenly Father in secret, that He would enable me to discharge my duty faithfully in such way as He might be pleased to point out to me.

We took Swansea, Freetown, and Taunton in our way to Boston, where also we had a meeting; our exercise was deep, and the love of truth prevailed, for which I bless the Lord. We went eastward about eighty miles beyond Boston, taking meetings, and were in a good degree preserved in an humble dependence on that arm which drew us out; and though we had some hard labour with the disobedient, by laying things home and close to such as were stout against the truth, yet through the goodness of God we had at times to partake of heavenly comfort with those who were meek, and were often favoured to part with Friends in the nearness of true gospel fellowship. We returned to Boston and had another comfortable opportunity with Friends there, and thence rode back a day's journey eastward of Boston. Our guide being a heavy man, and the weather hot, my companion and I expressed our freedom to go on without him, to which he consented, and we respectfully took our leave of him; this we did as believing the journey would have been hard to him and his horse.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

In visiting the meetings in those parts we were measurably baptized into a feeling of the state of the Society, and in bowedness of spirit went to the Yearly Meeting at Newport, where we met with John Storer from England, Elizabeth Shipley, Ann Gaunt, Hannah Foster, and Mercy Redman, from our parts, all ministers of the gospel, of whose company I was glad. Understanding that a large number of slaves had been imported from Africa into that town, and were then on sale by a member of our Society, my appetite failed, and I grew outwardly weak, and had a feeling of the condition of Habakkuk, as thus expressed: "When I heard, my belly trembled, my lips quivered, I trembled in myself, that I might rest in the day of trouble." I had many cogitations, and was sorely distressed. I was desirous that Friends might petition the Legislature to use their endeavours to discourage the future importation of slaves, for I saw that this trade was a great evil, and tended to multiply troubles, and to bring distresses on the people for whose welfare my heart was deeply concerned. But I perceived several difficulties in regard to petitioning, and such was the exercise of my mind that I thought of endeavouring to get an opportunity to speak a few words in the House of Assembly then sitting in town.

This exercise came upon me in the afternoon on the second day of the Yearly Meeting, and on going to bed I got no sleep till my mind was wholly resigned thereto. In the morning I inquired of a Friend how long the Assembly was likely to continue sitting, who told me it was expected to be prorogued that day or the next. As I was desirous to attend the business of the meeting, and perceived the Assembly was likely to separate before the business was over, after considerable exercise, humbly seeking to the Lord for instruction, my mind settled to attend on the business of the meeting; on the last day of which I had prepared a short essay of a petition to be presented to the Legislature, if way opened. And being informed that there were some appointed by that Yearly Meeting to speak with those in authority on cases relating to the Society, I opened my mind to several of them, and showed them the essay I had made, and afterwards I opened the case in the meeting for business, in substance as follows: —

I have been under a concern for some time on account of the great number of slaves which are imported into this colony. I am aware that it is a tender point to speak to, but apprehend I am not clear in the sight of Heaven without doing so. I have prepared an essay of a petition to be presented to the Legislature, if way open; and what I have to propose to this meeting is that some Friends may be named to withdraw and look over it, and report whether they believe it suitable to be read in the meeting. If they should think well of reading it, it will remain for the meeting to consider whether to take any further notice of it, as a meeting, or not.

After a short conference some Friends went out, and, looking over it, expressed their willingness to have it read, which being done, many expressed their unity with the proposal, and some signified that to have the subjects of the petition enlarged upon, and signed out of meeting by such as were free, would be more suitable than to do it there. Though I expected at first that if it was done it would be in that way, yet such was the exercise of my mind that to move it in the hearing of Friends when assembled appeared to me as a duty, for my heart yearned towards the inhabitants of these parts, believing that by this trade there had been an increase of inquietude amongst them, and way had been made for the spreading of a spirit opposite to that meekness and humility which is a sure resting-place for the soul; and that the continuance of this trade would not only render their healing more difficult, but would increase their malady.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Having proceeded thus far, I felt easy to leave the essay amongst Friends, for them to proceed in it as they believed best. And now an exercise revived in my mind in relation to lotteries, which were common in those parts. I had mentioned the subject in a former sitting of this meeting, when arguments were used in favour of Friends being held excused who were only concerned in such lotteries as were agreeable to law. And now, on moving it again, it was opposed as before; but the hearts of some solid Friends appeared to be united to discourage the practice amongst their members, and the matter was zealously handled by some on both sides. In this debate it appeared very clear to me that the spirit of lotteries was a spirit of selfishness, which tended to confuse and darken the understanding, and that pleading for it in our meetings, which were set apart for the Lord's work, was not right. In the heat of zeal, I made reply to what an ancient Friend said, and when I sat down I saw that my words were not enough seasoned with charity. After this I spoke no more on the subject. At length a minute was made, a copy of which was to be sent to their several Quarterly Meetings, inciting Friends to labour to discourage the practice amongst all professing with us.

Some time after this minute was made I remained uneasy with the manner of my speaking to the ancient Friend, and could not see my way clear to conceal my uneasiness, though I was concerned that I might say nothing to weaken the cause in which I had laboured. After some close exercise and hearty repentance for not having attended closely to the safe guide, I stood up, and, reciting the passage, acquainted Friends that though I durst not go from what I had said as to the matter, yet I was uneasy with the manner of my speaking, believing milder language would have been better. As this was uttered in some degree of creaturely abasement after a warm debate, it appeared to have a good savour amongst us.

The Yearly Meeting being now over, there yet remained on my mind a secret though heavy exercise, in regard to some leading active members about Newport, who were in the practice of keeping slaves. This I mentioned to two ancient Friends who came out of the country, and proposed to them, if way opened, to have some conversation with those members. One of them and I, having consulted one of the most noted elders who had slaves, he, in a respectful manner, encouraged me to proceed to clear myself of what lay upon me. Near the beginning of the Yearly Meeting, I had had a private conference with this said elder and his wife concerning their slaves, so that the way seemed clear to me to advise with him about the manner of proceeding.

I told him I was free to have a conference with them all together in a private house; or, if he thought they would take it unkind to be asked to come together, and to be spoken with in the hearing of one another, I was free to spend some time amongst them, and to visit them all in their own houses. He expressed his liking to the first proposal, not doubting their willingness to come together; and, as I proposed a visit to only ministers, elders, and overseers, he named some others whom he desired might also be present. A careful messenger being wanted to acquaint them in a proper manner, he offered to go to all their houses, to open the matter to them, — and did so. About the eighth hour the next morning we met in the meeting-house chamber, the last-mentioned country Friend, my companion, and John Storer being with us. After a short time of retirement, I acquainted them with the steps I had taken in procuring that meeting, and opened the concern I was under, and we then proceeded to a free conference upon the subject. My exercise was heavy, and I was deeply bowed in spirit before the Lord, who was pleased to favour with the seasoning virtue of truth, which wrought a tenderness amongst us; and the subject was mutually handled in a calm and peaceable spirit. At length, feeling my mind released from the burden which I had been under, I took my leave of them in a good degree of satisfaction; and by the tenderness they manifested in regard to the practice, and the concern several of them expressed in relation to the manner of disposing of their negroes after their decease, I believed that a good exercise was spreading amongst them: and I am humbly thankful to God, who supported my mind and preserved me in a good degree of resignation through these trials.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Thou who sometimes travellest in the work of the ministry, and art made very welcome by thy friends, seest many tokens of their satisfaction in having thee for their guest. It is good for thee to dwell deep, that thou mayest feel and understand the spirits of people. If we believe truth points towards a conference on some subjects in a private way, it is needful for us to take heed that their kindness, their freedom and affability, do not hinder us from the Lord's work. I have experienced that, in the midst of kindness and smooth conduct, to speak close and home to them who entertain us, on points that relate to outward interest, is hard labour. Sometimes, when I have felt truth lead towards it, I have found myself disqualified by a superficial friendship; and as the sense thereof hath abased me and my cries have been to the Lord, so I have been humbled and made content to appear weak, or as a fool for His sake; and thus a door hath been opened to enter upon it. To attempt to do the Lord's work in our own way, and to speak of that which is the burden of the Word in a way easy to the natural part, doth not reach the bottom of the disorder. To see the failings of our friends, and think hard of them, without opening that which we ought to open, and still carry a face of friendship, tends to undermine the foundation of true unity. The office of a minister of Christ is weighty, and they who now go forth as watchmen have need to be steadily on their guard against the snares of prosperity and an outside friendship.

After the Yearly Meeting we were at meetings at Newtown, Cushnet, Long Plain, Rochester, and Dartmouth. From thence we sailed for Nantucket, in company with Ann Gaunt, Mercy Redman, and several other Friends. The wind being slack we only reached Tarpawling Cove the first day; where, going on shore, we found room in a public-house, and beds for a few of us, — the rest slept on the floor. We went on board again about break of day, and though the wind was small, we were favoured to come within about four miles of Nantucket; and then about ten of us got into our boat and rowed to the harbour before dark; a large boat went off and brought in the rest of the passengers about midnight. The next day but one was their Yearly Meeting, which held four days, the last of which was their Monthly Meeting for business. We had a labourious time amongst them; our minds were closely exercised, and I believe it was a time of great searching of heart. The longer I was on the island the more I became sensible that there was a considerable number of valuable Friends there, though an evil spirit, tending to strife, had been at work amongst them. I was cautious of making any visits except as my mind was particularly drawn to them; and in that way we had some sittings in Friends' houses, where the heavenly wing was at times spread over us, to our mutual comfort. My beloved companion had very acceptable service on this island.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

When meeting was over, we all agreed to sail the next day if the weather was suitable and we were well; and being called up the latter part of the night, about fifty of us went on board a vessel; but, the wind changing, the seamen thought best to stay in the harbour till it altered, so we returned on shore. Feeling clear as to any further visits, I spent my time in my chamber, chiefly alone; and after some hours, my heart being filled with the spirit of supplication, my prayers and tears were poured out before my Heavenly Father for His help and instruction in the manifold difficulties which attended me in life. While I was waiting upon the Lord, there came a messenger from the women Friends who lodged at another house, desiring to confer with us about appointing a meeting, which to me appeared weighty, as we had been at so many before; but after a short conference, and advising with some elderly Friends, a meeting was appointed, in which the Friend who first moved it, and who had been much shut up before, was largely opened in the love of the gospel. The next morning about break of day going again on board the vessel, we reached Falmouth on the Main before night, where our horses being brought, we proceeded towards Sandwich Quarterly Meeting. Being two days in going to Nantucket, and having been there once before, I observed many shoals in their bay, which make sailing more dangerous, especially in stormy nights; also, that a great shoal which encloses their harbour prevents the entrance of sloops except when the tide is up. Waiting without for the rising of the tide is sometimes hazardous in storms, and by waiting within they sometimes miss a fair wind. I took notice that there was on that small island a great number of inhabitants, and the soil not very fertile, the timber being so gone that for vessels, fences, and firewood, they depend chiefly on buying from the Main, for the cost whereof, with most of their other expenses, they depend principally upon the whale fishery.³¹²

312. I considered that as towns grew larger, and lands near navigable waters were more cleared, it would require more labour to get timber and wood. I understood that the whales, being much hunted and sometimes wounded and not killed, grow more shy and difficult to come at. I considered that the formation of the earth, the seas, the islands, bays, and rivers, the motions of the winds and great waters, which cause bars and shoals in particular places, were all the works of Him who is perfect wisdom and goodness; and as people attend to His heavenly instruction, and put their trust in Him, He provides for them in all parts where he gives them a being; and as in this visit to these people I felt a strong desire for their firm establishment on the sure foundation, besides what was said more publicly, I was concerned to speak with the women Friends in their Monthly Meeting of business, many being present, and in the fresh spring of pure love to open before them the advantage, both inwardly and outwardly, of attending singly to the pure guidance of the Holy Spirit, and therein to educate their children in true humility and the disuse of all superfluities. I reminded them of the difficulties their husbands and sons were frequently exposed to at sea, and that the more plain and simple their way of living was the less need there would be of running great hazards to support them.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

I also encouraged the young women to continue their neat, decent way of attending themselves on the affairs of the house; showing, as the way opened, that where people were truly humble, used themselves to business, and were content with a plain way of life, they had ever had more true peace and calmness of mind than they who, aspiring to greatness and outward show, have grasped hard for an income to support themselves therein. And as I observed they had so few or no slaves, I had to encourage them to be content without them, making mention of the numerous troubles and vexations which frequently attended the minds of the people who depend on slaves to do their labour.

We attended the Quarterly Meeting at Sandwich, in company with Ann Gaunt and Mercy Redman, which was preceded by a Monthly Meeting, and in the whole held three days. We were in various ways exercised amongst them, in gospel love, according to the several gifts bestowed on us, and were at times overshadowed with the virtue of truth, to the comfort of the sincere and stirring up of the negligent. Here we parted with Ann and Mercy, and went to Rhode Island, taking one meeting in our way, which was a satisfactory time. Reaching Newport the evening before their Quarterly Meeting, we attended it, and after that had a meeting with our young people, separated from those of other societies. We went through much labour in this town; and now, in taking leave of it, though I felt close inward exercise to the last, I found inward peace, and was in some degree comforted in a belief that a good number remain in that place who retain a sense of truth, and that there are some young people attentive to the voice of the Heavenly Shepherd. The last meeting, in which Friends from the several parts of the quarter came together, was a select meeting, and through the renewed manifestation of the Father's love the hearts of the sincere were united together.³¹³ From Newport we went to Greenwich, Shanticut, and Warwick, and were helped to labour amongst Friends in the love of our gracious Redeemer. Afterwards, accompanied by our friend John Casey from Newport, we rode through Connecticut to Oblong, visited the meetings in those parts, and thence proceeded to the Quarterly Meeting at Ryewoods. Through the gracious extendings of divine help, we had some seasoning opportunities in those places. We also visited Friends at New York and Flushing, and thence to Rahway. Here our roads parting, I took leave of my beloved companion and true yokemate Samuel Eastburn, and reached home the 10th of Eighth Month, where I found my family well. For the favours and protection of the Lord, both inward and outward, extended to me in this journey, my heart is humbled in grateful acknowledgments, and I find renewed desires to dwell and walk in resignedness before Him.

313. The poverty of spirit and inward weakness, with which I was much tried the fore part of this journey, has of late appeared to me a dispensation of kindness. Appointing meetings never appeared more weighty to me, and I was led into a deep search whether in all things my mind was resigned to the will of God; often querying with myself what should be the cause of such inward poverty, and greatly desiring that no secret reserve in my heart might hinder my access to the divine fountain. In these humbling times I was made watchful, and excited to attend to the secret movings of the heavenly principle in my mind, which prepared the way to some duties, that, in more easy and prosperous times as to the outward, I believe I should have been in danger of omitting.

HDT

WHAT?

INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

No image of Friend John ever was made

May 5, Monday: Laurence Shirley, 4th Earl Ferrers, was hanged on the Tyburn gallows outside London. (This is the only peer of the realm to be hanged for murder, so far.)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1762

October: Dr. Erasmus Darwin dissected the cadaver of a hanged “malefactor.”

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1765

April 24, Wednesday: The General Court having authorized the construction of a new gallows, Boston sheriff Stephen Greenlief asked if it would be all right to move the gallows to a little rise on the left side of the Neck beyond the clay pond, a site at which he felt it would be somewhat more convenient for him to hang people.

In the Margeride Mountains of south-central France there had been a series of roughly a hundred or so gruesome rural killings. The victims had been mostly women and adolescents pasturing their flocks, and they seemed to have fallen prey to some mysterious creature that the gazettes were referring to, increasing their sales greatly, as la bête du Gévaudan. The corpses were generally found with their throats torn out. Most of Europe had been captivated by the story and several high-profile hunting expeditions had been arranged, including by King Louis XV (who had recently lost a war), whose delegates tracked down and killed several suspiciously large wolves. Why contemporaries supposed this to have been the work of some mysterious monster rather than merely a pack of wolves is not now clear, but the church was clearly profiting because the Bishop of Mende was blaming the spiritual failings of the inhabitants themselves for their misfortune — this beast had been sent by God to punish them for a local shortage of piety. There were a few survivors, who reported that the beast in question looked to them like a wolf but was much larger, about as big as a calf. The head was like that of a large dog, with small straight ears and a large mouth which exposed very large teeth. It had a broad chest. Although its fur was red, its back was streaked with black. On this day Jean-Francois Tassy de Montluc reported to the intendant Ballainvilliers that his own brother had gone off to join the d'Ennevals as they attempted with dogs to track down the mysterious monster. (Eventually a large wolf would be shot by a local hunter and a legend would develop that this had required “a blessed silver bullet,” and when the monster’s stomach had been opened there had been found human remains.)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1767

Charles Lynch had been born in 1736 into what would seem to have been a Roman Catholic family on a plantation in Virginia. By 1754, while Charles was about eighteen years of age, his mother Sarah Clark Lynch had begun to invite neighbors into her home to worship in the Quaker manner. There is, however, no mention of her husband's involvement in such religious activities. In 1757, three years later, while her son Charles was about 21 years of age, these people had organized South River Meetinghouse as a monthly meeting of the Religious Society of Friends, and Charles would have been considered as a member of that body. However, in this year, when Charles won election to the Virginia House of Burgesses, this participation in civil government of course led to his disownment, since at that time Quakers were not allowing themselves to take the requisite oaths or to hold such public office. (Had he not been disowned for this, then certainly he would have been disowned later for taking part in the revolutionary fighting, if not for owning slaves.) Therefore, when he served as a district Judge during the revolutionary fighting, he was in no sense acting as a Quaker. It should be mentioned, also, that while Judge Lynch did in those hectic times dispense a "summary" sort of justice, what he dispensed was never capital punishment: there is no record of his having ordered that any person brought before him be hanged or otherwise executed. The stories of the tree in the yard, the one which was used after court as the hanging tree, are to the best of my knowledge merely further accretions to the nice legend of "Lynch Law," and are to be dismissed alongside the ridiculous accretion "Judge Lynch was a Quaker."

In this year Cesare Beccaria, in ON CRIMES AND PUNISHMENT, was insisting that there was no justification for the state's taking of life. Soon capital punishment would be abolished in Austria and in Tuscany.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1771

By this point judges in London were asking the King to pardon fully half of those unfortunates whom the law was requiring them to (pretend to) sentence to death.

HANGING

This intriguing statistic comes from Netta Murray Goldsmith's THE WORST OF CRIMES: HOMOSEXUALITY AND THE LAW IN EIGHTEENTH-CENTURY LONDON (Ashgate, 1998). She has discovered that in cases involving sodomy, judges regularly adopted a very high standard of proof because it was a capital offense, which would only be expected, but that also they adopted the same very high standard of proof even in cases of attempted sodomy, which was a mere misdemeanor and quite mildly punished. Why would that have been the case, had they seriously disapproved of sodomy? She has studied 17 sodomitical cases involving 22 men, taking place between 1730 and 1751, and has found that in only one case was a man who had been found guilty of the capital offense of sodomy then actually hanged. Even the notoriously severe Judge Sir Francis Page declined to sentence to death the several sodomites tried before him, adopting instead very stringent legal requirements designed to allow him to acquit them despite overwhelming evidence against them of "the worst of all possible crimes."—And this was going on around 1750, a time when public opinion (as revealed in newspapers etc.) had turned decidedly against leniency due to concern over the rising crime rate. An interesting series of cases beginning in 1745 involved one Richard Manning, found guilty of attempted sodomy after having been observed in the full act with a consenting partner (who also was convicted) but sentenced only to be whipped, rather than hanged. In 1746 this Manning who had been whipped was again indicted, this time for having made a sodomitical assault upon a porter at an inn — this time he was sentenced by the judge, Sir Thomas Denison, to stand in the pillory and then serve a year in gaol, and fined one shilling.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

In 1752 Manning again was brought into Old Bailey, charged with the capital offense of having stolen a silver watch from a man he had met while strolling at night in St. James's Park. The judge in this case was the one who had tried him in 1746, but rather than sentence him to death for this grand larceny Sir Thomas Denison merely ordered him transported for seven years. In 1751 Sir Thomas sentenced to death, as required, a man who had sodomized a 12-year-old boy and then turned around and took steps a month later to ensure that the pederast would be pardoned. While the 50 offenses that had called for death in the late seventeenth century were being increased by 33 more capital offenses under King George II and a further 63 under King George III, there was simultaneously growing a very sharp difference between the rhetoric, which was severe, and the practice, which was lenient.

HOMOSEXUALITY

December 17, Tuesday: A French official was condemned to be hanged for admitting foreign tobacco into the country.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1772

In his gallows speech before the church congregation of Concord on December 26, 1799, Samuel Smith would aver that early on he had led “an honest industrious life, entirely free, not only from the crime, but without any inclination fraudulently to take the property of another person,” but that then at the age of 27 (roughly this year 1772) he had had an unhappy love affair which had involved the theft from him of all he possessed –some $200– and in result had been led “frequently to the excessive use of ardent spirits, which caused me very soon to commit the crime of theft, of which I was suspected, apprehended and committed to Litchfield gaol & tried, found guilty, and publicly punished.”

HANGING

HOWEVER, HISTORY'S NOT MADE OF WOULD. WHEN SOMEONE REVEALS SOMETHING LIKE THE ABOVE, IN WHICH THE REALITY OF THE PRESENT OF 1772 IS INFORMED BY THE PUTATIVE REALITY OF A BUNCH OF THINGS THAT AS OF 1772 HAD NEVER HAPPENED YET, S/HE DISCLOSES THAT WHAT IS BEING CRAFTED IS NOT REALITY BUT PREDESTINARIANISM. THE RULE OF REALITY IS THAT THE FUTURE HASN'T EVER HAPPENED, YET. AT THIS POINT WHAT WE'VE GOT IS A YOUNGSTER WHO IS REELING FROM A SETBACK, OR A YOUNGSTER WHO IS ACQUIRING AN ATTITUDE, OR A SET OF BAD HABITS, OR A CONVENIENT EXCUSE.

1775

April 19, Wednesday: People were trying to kill each other at Lexington, and then people were trying to kill each other at Concord.

AMERICAN REVOLUTION

The Reverend Asa Dunbar recorded of this day in his journal that: “Hostilities commenced at Concord & Lexington.” The day that would be remembered as “Patriots Day” because folks perceived was a one-day reprieve from the obtrusive Old Testament commandment “Thou shalt not kill,” and from the intrusive new New Testament commandment “Love thine enemy.”³¹⁴ For 24 hours, apparently, the operating rule would be not the Ten Commandments (portrayed here as they have been presented on a T-shirt), not the Golden Rule, but a much more intriguing “Thou shalt lay waste thine enemy.” The Bedford Minutemen, for instance, bore with them a banner emblazoned with the motto of the Dukes of Kent, “Conquer or die.”

[next screen]

314. A POP ESSAY QUESTION. In terms of the above, define and provide synonyms for the term “patriot”:

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

WALDEN: I was witness to events of a less peaceful character. One day when I went out to my wood-pile, or rather my pile of stumps, I observed two large ants, the one red, the other much larger, nearly half an inch long, and black, fiercely contending with one another. Having once got hold they never let go, but struggled and wrestled and rolled on the chips incessantly. Looking farther, I was surprised to find that the chips were covered with such combatants, that it was not a duellum, but a bellum, a war between two races of ants, the red always pitted against the black, and frequently two reds ones to one black. The legions of these Myrmidons covered all the hills and vales in my wood-yard, and the ground was already strewn with the dead and dying, both red and black. It was the only battle which I have ever witnessed, the only battle-field I ever trod while the battle was raging; internecine war; the red republicans on the one hand, and the black imperialists on the other. On every side they were engaged in deadly combat, yet without any noise that I could hear, and human soldiers never fought so resolutely. I watched a couple that were fast locked in each other's embraces, in a little sunny valley amid the chips, now at noon-day prepared to fight till the sun went down, or life went out. The smaller red champion had fastened himself like a vice to his adversary's front, and through all the tumblings on that field never for an instant ceased to gnaw at one of his feelers near the root, having already caused the other to go by the board; while the stronger black one dashed him from side to side, and, as I saw on looking nearer, had already divested him of several of his members. They fought with more pertinacity than bull-dogs. Neither manifested the least disposition to retreat. It was evident that their battle-cry was Conquer or die.... I should not have wondered by this time to find that they had their respective musical bands stationed on some eminent chip, and playing their national airs the while, to excite the slow and cheer the dying combatants. I was myself excited somewhat even as if they had been men. The more you think of it, the less the difference. And certainly there is not the fight recorded in Concord history, at least, if in the history of America, that will bear a moment's comparison with this, whether for the numbers engaged in it, or for the patriotism and heroism displayed. For numbers and for carnage it was an Austerlitz or Dresden. Concord Fight! Two killed on the patriots' side, and Luther Blanchard wounded! Why here every ant was a Buttrick, -"Fire! for God's sake fire!"- and thousands shared the fate of Davis and Hosmer. There was not one hireling there. I have no doubt that it was a principle they fought for, as much as our ancestors, and not to avoid a three-penny tax on their tea; and the results of this battle will be as important and memorable to those whom it concerns as those of the battle of Bunker Hill, at least.

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

This all came about because the army that had been camped on Boston Common, early that morning, embarked to cross the Charles River estuary with muffled oarlocks at the point which is now the corner of Boylston and Charles streets (this part of the estuary long since filled in and the intersection now sports a statue of Edgar Allan Poe). The “two lantern” signal from the steeple of one or another Boston church (we don’t actually know which one, perhaps the Congregational church of which Revere was a member, or the nearby Anglican church in the North End) meant that the soldiers were crossing the Charles River (Quinobequin) and being marched through Cambridge, not that they were coming by sea, and the “one lantern” signal would have meant that the soldiers were being marching down Boston Neck, through Roxbury. The two lanterns which were used had been made in the workshops of Paul Revere or Rivière.³¹⁵ General Thomas Gage had sent an army detail to dismantle the steeple of the Old West Church, to ensure that it could not be used for any such signaling.

SLAVERY

As the Army marched up the Charlestown road from the Boston ferry landing, it would have passed a specimen of local justice: an old set of chains with human bones inside them, dating to an incident of September 1755. This had been an African slave, Mark, who had been left to rot after throttling, disemboweling and beheading upon suspicion of having poisoned, or of having attempted to poison, his American owner, Captain John Codman. (Keep this cage in mind, when you are tempted to suspect that what these indignant colonials had decided to fight for was freedom and justice for all.)

315. This Huguenot silversmith received the warning signal from the church steeple while still in Boston and only afterward departed from the city on his errand, rather than seeing the signal from the opposite shore as has commonly been fantasized.

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

HDT

WHAT?

INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

One of the men who were marching to unite with the Lexington militia, had slept the previous night in this house:

He was Francis Nurse, a great grandson of Goodwife Rebecca Towne Nurse who had been hanged in Salem as a witch and then, when the witch fervor had died down, been reinstated postmortem into her church.

The Lexington militia had assembled too early, in response to the riders coming out of Boston such as Revere, and when the army column had not showed up by 2AM they decided to disperse and get some sleep. Shortly before daybreak there were some 70 of them on the Lexington green, and they spread out in two lines to face the oncoming troops. Major John Pitcairn of the Marines called out to the army troops that they were not to fire but were to surround these militiamen and then take away their weapons, and Captain John Parker of the militia (ancestor of the Reverend Theodore Parker of Thoreau's day, carrying his Charleville musket) called out to the militiamen that they were not to fire, but were to disperse. At that point there was a gunshot, origins unclear, and the army troops broke ranks and began to fire at the 27 militiamen. It would be pointless to inquire who fired, as in such a situation at the instant that it occurs nobody has any idea where the round came from or where it went and therefore everyone becomes terrified and presumes that he is being fired upon and proceeds to fire as rapidly as possible at anyone who appears to be holding a weapon. As Parker stated it, the result was that the army killed "eight of our party, with out receiving any provocation therefor from us." After this killing, and presumably after the army had collected the militia's weapons,³¹⁶ neighbors were allowed to come forward to tend the wounded and remove the corpses, while the army got itself back into a column, fired off one massive victory volley to clear their weapons, and marched on toward Concord. Major

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

John Buttrick sent Captain Reuben Brown on horseback down Lexington Road toward Boston to report the firing in Lexington. Captain Brown would ride more than 100 miles to the coast and back, while the soldiers were looting his liveries and setting his barn on fire (neither the barn nor the house would be destroyed).

As the redcoat drums rumbled like thunder through the town's streets, a panic-stricken 18-year-old named Harry Gould was being consoled by the Reverend William Emerson. In Concord, while destroying what few military stores they could get their hands on, the army also set afire the liberty pole in front of the courthouse. The scene would be re-imagined and painted by Amos Doolittle and then a famous lithograph would be made

316. Likewise, we do not refer here to the militia as “the Americans” and the army as “the British,” since that is a later conceptual framework and anyhow would have been false to the actual constitution of these bodies of armed men. There were in fact many Americans in the paid colonial army, and I know of at least one Brit who was assembled with the Minutemen militia — before the battle we know that he put aside his rifle for awhile and went down the hill to chat up various Redcoats. This was a struggle of a militia faction of British subjects in America, the separatist faction, versus an army faction of British subjects in America, the loyalist faction, similar to the struggle during the Iranian Revolution of 1979 between the Imperial Iranian Air Force cadets and warrant officers, adherents of the religious faction in Iranian politics, versus the Imperial Iranian Ground Forces brigades, controlled by officers adherent to the secular faction in Iranian politics. It is significant, then, using this more accurate terminology, that rather than attempt to seize “the militia’s” stores and withdraw with them to Boston, “the army” was attempting to destroy those military stores in place. This means that, going into this action, “the army” was already regarding its withdrawal to Boston to be the difficult part of the day’s military operation, because, had they seized and relocated these military stores, “the army” could have made use of them itself — the military may upon occasion become wanton in the destruction of civilian properties, just as it may upon occasion rape, but military stores are never destroyed in place without at least one damned good reason. The major military stores available to “the militia” were being stockpiled in Worcester rather than in Concord, because it was more of a march from Boston for “the army” and was therefore safer. Had “the army” succeeded in its withdrawal from Concord, of course, it would have marched to Worcester to destroy the bulk of the stores in the possession of “the militia,” in order to force “the militia” to return once again to the political faction favored by the officers of “the army.”

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

of this famous painting by Smith:

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Sparks from the liberty pole, however, ignited the courthouse roof, and while that fire was extinguished without great harm to the structure, the smoke from this fire caused the some 400 militiamen assembled in safety on the rise on the opposite side of the Concord River to presume that it was the army's intention to burn their dissident town to the ground. In a column of pairs they approached the Old North Bridge, on the Concord side of which were three army companies. The army made some attempt to render the bridge impassible by removing planks, and then fired a volley which killed the militia Captain Isaac David and Abner Hosmer, in the front rank of the Acton minutemen as their drummer, whose face was half shot away.³¹⁷ It was then that

Major John Buttrick called out “Fire, fellow soldiers, for God’s sake, fire.” Thus it came to be that here the embattled farmers stood and fired the shot heard ’round the world.³¹⁸

Not counting those who were wounded but would survive, three redcoats of the Light Infantry Company, 4th Regiment fell in the responding volley, Thomas Smith, Patrick Gray, and James Hall. One went down evidently with a bullet through the head and two would die of bodily wounds. Two would be buried by colonials where they had fallen next to the Bridge, and one would be buried in Concord center by the army (somewhere “in the ragged curb where that road wound around the side of the hill,” a gravesite now evidently disturbed during later centuries of construction activity). Through the affair Acton’s fifer, Luther Blanchard, and the drummer Francis Barker, were performing a lively Jacobin tune, “The White Cockade.”³¹⁹ According

317. When Deacon Jonathan Hosmer inspected Private Abner Hosmer’s faceless corpse, he found a breastpin his son had received for his 21st birthday.

318. A footnote to Waldo Emerson’s famed line “Here the embattled farmers stood and fired the shot heard ’round the world”: A publication of the Boeing Corporation would eventually declare that with the employees of the Boeing Corporation on the job, making Minuteman ICBMs, it was quite a bit less likely that “some future poet” would be forced to “modify the words of Ralph Waldo Emerson” into “Here the embattled farmers stood and fired the shot reaching ’round the world.”

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

to the Reverend William Emerson, the Reverend Waldo Emerson's grandfather, who was watching from an upstairs window at the Old Manse as these people shot off muskets at each other out at the North Bridge, one or the other of the seriously wounded soldiers was then struck, as he attempted to rise, on the head with a hatchet.

Ammi White was a private in Captain David Brown's company of militia. Captain Brown³²⁰ had his home near the Old North Bridge and in 1770 had been paid by the town of Concord to care for the causeway and wall associated with that bridge. As the redcoats fell back from the firing, Colonel Barrett's militia unit advanced a short distance. According to reconstructions of what happened, the gravely wounded British soldier, between the retreating and the advancing lines, was attempting to rise when he was chopped down with a small hatchet by militiaman White, "not under the feelings of humanity." He "barbarously broke his skull," he "uplifted his axe, and dealt the wounded soldier a fierce and fatal blow upon the head," with Thomas Thorp of Acton nearby but unable or unwilling to intercede:

On the Return of the Troops from Concord, they were very much annoyed, and had several Men killed and wounded, by the Rebels firing from behind Walls, Ditches, Trees, and other Ambushes; but the Brigade under the Command of Lord Percy having joined them at Lexington, with two Pieces of Cannon, the Rebels were for a while dispersed; but as soon as the Troops resumed their March, they began again to fire upon them from behind Stone Walls and Houses, and kept up in that Manner a scattering Fire during the Whole of their March of Fifteen Miles, by which Means several were killed and wounded; and such was the Cruelty and Barbarity of the Rebels, that they scalped and cut off the Ears of some of the wounded Men, who fell into their Hands.

This one circumstance has borne more fruit for me, than all that history tells us of the fight.

Nathaniel Hawthorne

The Reverend William Emerson acknowledged the fact of an ax blow and acknowledged also that the soldier languished for hours before expiring, but would insist that neither scalp nor ears were removed. When the redcoats returned from Barrett's farm and were grossing out at the sight of the wound on the head of their fallen comrade, they told one another the story that the American militia had scalped him as if they were red savages (the usual story, things like this typically are done to innocent white people by vicious persons of color). Five soldiers would testify to having themselves seen the wounded man with the skin over his eyes cut and also the top part of his ears cut off. There was not only misunderstanding, there was a considerable Fake Facts exaggeration: A rumor would begin to circulate that the dying soldier's eyes had been gouged out. Ensign Jeremy Lister later would write tendentiously and falsely that "4 men...killd who afterwards scalp'd their eyes goug'd their noses and ears cut of, such barbarity execut'd upon the Corps could scarcely be paralleled by the most uncivilised savages." The army would be forced to abandon its dead and wounded that hot day, with soldiers falling not only from bullets but also from sunstroke, and the citizens of Concord would need to dig a hole and inter two of the bodies where they lay (there being no particular reason for the extra labor of transporting these dead bodies anywhere else prior to interment), and one of the wounded soldiers, Samuel Lee

319. Major Francis Faulkner led a company, the "Acton Patriots."

320. Captain David Brown of Concord (1732-1802) kept a diary of Bunker Hill action in 1775.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

of the 10th Regiment, left behind, eventually would become a Concord citizen. The commander of the Concord column, LTC Smith, reported to his superiors Lord Percy and General Gage that “after the bridge was quitted, they scalped and otherwise ill-treated one or two of the men who were either killed or severely wounded.” General Gage would summarize this as: “... one scalped, his head much mangled and his ears cut off, though not quite dead ... a sight which struck the soldiers with horror.” In Concord, stories would be generated that the person who had used the hatchet had been merely a wood-chopping chore boy of the Emersons, or had been Frank, the Emersons’ slave (the usual story, blame everything on some nearby flunky or on some handy person of color) — but in fact there had been no such chore boy and black Frank’s activities on that date had been well vouched for by members of the Emerson family.

Here is the story per D. Michael Ryan:

Various explanations for the cause of this deed were advanced. The culprit was “half-witted”; excused only by excitement and inexperience; startled by the soldier and acted out of fear; acting to end the soldier’s suffering. Extreme claims noted that the victim was trying to drown himself in a water puddle and begged someone to kill him; had thrust at the American with his bayonet; or was an escaping prisoner. None of these theories have a basis in fact and had such mitigating circumstances existed, would certainly have been mentioned by the Reverend William Emerson. While the British publicized the incident, Americans chose to ignore it possibly due to embarrassment, fear of reprisals, failure to appreciate its importance or a notion that it would blot a historic cause. Provincial authorities hesitated to confirm that the act had occurred but in response to a Boston story insured that the burial detail testified that “neither of those persons (2 dead soldiers buried at the bridge) were scalped nor their ears cut off.” Concord historians Ripley [??] and Lemuel Shattuck ignored the incident completely while well into the 19th Century, British historians continued to write of the scalping and ear cutting episode. A long guarded secret was the name of the young culprit who tradition acknowledges as Ammi White.... The British troops returning to Boston would remember the “scalping” with fear, anger and a sense of revenge. This, together with civilian hostility in Boston and the tactics of the colonials along the retreat route, considered cowardly, would lead to army reprisals and atrocities (house burnings, killing of unarmed men, bayoneting of wounded and dead colonials, etc.) especially in the village of Menotomy. Lord Percy’s relief column had been informed of the “scalping” and General Gage would later use the story to offset atrocity charges leveled against his troops.

In a much later timeframe Waldo Emerson would declaim at this famed bridge that “Here once the embattled farmers stood / and fired the shot heard round the world” for the freedom of white people, and would sagely say nothing about the alleged offing of a defenseless, critically wounded man with a hatchet. And then at an even later date Henry Thoreau would be refused an audience in Concord, and would declare in Framingham, Massachusetts that “The inhabitants of Concord are not prepared to stand by one of their own bridges” for the freedom of black people. (That was in 1854 in his speech “Slavery in Massachusetts,” but Thoreau would be preparing this sentiment as early as 1851.)

After some two hours more in Concord, the army began its disastrous withdrawal to Lexington, where its remnants were reinforced by the 1st Brigade under Sir Hugh Percy.

In his SACRED GROUND,³²¹ Edward Linenthal has presented an extended treatment of dissidence in the Concord context in effect with one hand tied behind his back. That is, he does this while accomplishing the feat

321.  Linenthal, Edward Tabor. SACRED GROUND: AMERICANS AND THEIR BATTLEFIELDS. Urbana IL: U of Illinois P, 1991

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

of not once bringing in the name of Thoreau. Picking up on the Emersonian description of the fallen farmer minutemen of April 19, 1775 as having acted “from the simplest instincts,”³²² Linenthal states that:

These instinctive warriors were ceremoniously perceived as men whose New England origins nurtured republican principles that protected them from the moral pollution of old-world warriors. Consequently, the minuteman became a powerful cultural model for generations of Americans at war and at peace: from Billy Yank and Johnny Reb in the Civil War to the doughboys of World War I and the GI's of World War II; from the right-wing Minutemen of the 1960s to a more recent transformation into the Minuteman intercontinental ballistic missile. Patriotic rhetoric portrayed the minutemen as Christ-like saviors, and citizens of Lexington and Concord were proud that these new-world warriors drank from the wellsprings of liberty which, they believed, ran especially deep in their towns.... Beyond the ever-present threat of failing to measure up to the principles embodied by the minutemen, the specter of defilement appeared in other ways. Beginning in rancorous debate in the 1820s, a number of citizens of Lexington and Concord claimed that their town was the authentic birthplace of the nation. Each was accused of falsifying the national creation story by refusing to grant this sacred status to the other.... If the encounter on Lexington Green was not a battle but a massacre, were the martyred minutemen really the first models of how Americans die in war or just further examples of colonial victims? And if they were only victims, could that affect popular perception of the potency of their sacrifice?... On occasion, what some people perceived as defilement, others viewed as creative attempts to redefine the meaning of the events of April 19, 1775. Both the Vietnam Veterans Against the War and the Peoples Bicentennial Commission understood Lexington and Concord to be sacred ground when they held separate protests on the Battle Green and at the North Bridge in the mid-1970s. In their view, the purpose of protest was not desecration of a sacred spot, for they believed the real defilement had been perpetrated by a new class of American Tories who had severed the link between revolutionary war principles (especially the principle of dissent) and contemporary American life. Each group believed that its protest would spark the recovery of the American revolutionary tradition, which was viewed as crucial to the resuscitation of authentic American values that had fallen into disrepair because of public apathy.

OLD NORTH BRIDGE

The fifer boy of the Concord Minutemen was the son of Major John Buttrick, 15 years of age. The side drum he used would belong to the son of Colonel James Barrett, Nathan Barrett, until it would fall apart and the town would need to purchase a new one. One source alleges that a severe earthquake shook Concord.³²³ March and early April having been extraordinarily warm, the apple trees around Concord were in bloom by April 19th, and the soldiers being marched through Lexington toward Concord suffered heat prostration. Later, when Lafayette would visit Concord as part of a triumphal tour, tiny Mary Moody Emerson would approach him to let him know that she had been “‘in arms’ at the Concord fight” — she having been a newborn during that period.

When word of approaching British troops was received, Captain Charles Miles had mustered his company near the Wright Tavern.³²⁴ Included with the muster roll we can discover a handwritten note by Sergeant David

322. ■ Emerson, Ralph Waldo. A HISTORICAL DISCOURSE DELIVERED BEFORE THE CITIZENS OF CONCORD, 12 SEPTEMBER 1835 ON THE CENTENNIAL ANNIVERSARY OF THE INCORPORATION OF THE TOWN. Boston MA: W.B. Clarke, 1835.

323. Such an earthquake is not listed on the comprehensive scientific list of known New England earthquakes, which has no entries between August 15, 1772 and February 7, 1776. —Presumably some historian has misunderstood a casual comment on the order of “the earth certainly shook that day.”

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Hartwell, "Concord, April 19th 1775, then the battel begune...."

On the high ground above North Bridge where the colonial force reformed, Captain Miles then joined the officers' conference. When it was decided to march into Town, the story is, the lead was initially offered to a Concord captain but this man said he "should rather not go." Since it was Captain Miles who was in command of the senior minute company, and would not be in the lead, it is speculated that he might have been the one to have said this. Captain Isaac Davis's Acton company then led the march to the Bridge and while the position of other units is uncertain, several accounts have placed Miles's company either second or third in line. Years later, the Reverend Ezra Ripley noted that when Captain Miles was asked his feelings when marching on the Battle Bridge on April 19, 1775, he responded "that he went to the service of the day with the same seriousness and acknowledgement of God which he carried to church. During the fighting it was though that this reluctant captain had been killed, but he had only been somewhat wounded and would be able to continue to direct his company during the chasing of the Regulars back to Charlestown."

We don't have the names of the army casualties of this glorious day, only those of the militia and of bystanders. The numerical estimate of General Gage's intelligence officer was that about 25 of the soldiers had been killed and almost 150 wounded; the estimate by a soldier, John Pope, was that 90 soldiers had been killed and 181 wounded; the estimate by Ensign De Berniere was that 73 soldiers had been killed, 174 wounded, and 25 were missing in action; — and General Gage reported to his superior officer that 65 of his soldiers had been killed,

324. The Wright Tavern is called that because Amos Wright was renting the building from its owner Samuel Swan and keeping tavern there when first the local militia gathered there and then Army officers Lt. Col. Smith and Maj. Pitcairn used it as their headquarters. In such a quarrel the businessman of course would sell drinks to all comers.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

180 wounded, and 27 were missing in action.

Presumably what we would discover, if we had the names of the army casualties, would be that a significant number of them had been Americans who had enlisted in the army.

Here are the names of the militia casualties and the civilian casualties including an unarmed 14-year-old bystander (that's termed "collateral damage"):

Town	Killed	Wounded	Missing
Acton	Isaac Davis James Hayward Abner Hosmer	Luther Blanchard (would die this year of wound)
Bedford	Captain Jonathan Wilson	Job Lane
Beverly	Reuben Kenyme	Nathaniel Cleves William Dodge III Samuel Woodbury
Billerica		Timothy Blanchard John Nichols
Brookline	Isaac Gardner
Cambridge	John Hicks William Marcy Moses Richardson James Russell Jason Winship Jabez Wyman	Samuel Whittemore	Samuel Frost Seth Russell
Charlestown	Edward Barber James Miller

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Chelmsford		Oliver Barron Aaron Chamberlain
Concord		Nathan Barrett Jonas Brown Captain Charles Miles George Minot Abel Prescott, Jr.
Danvers	Samuel Cook Benjamin Deland Ebenezer Golwait Henry Jacobs Perley Putnam George Southwick Jothan Webb	Nathan Putnam Dennis Wallace	Joseph Bell
Dedham	Elias Haven	Israel Everett
Framingham		Daniel Hemminway
Lexington	John Brown Samuel Hadley Caleb Harrington Jonathan Harrington, Jr. Jonas Parker Jedidiah Munroe Robert Munroe Isaac Muzzy John Raymond Nathaniel Wyman	Francis Brown Joseph Comee Prince Estabrook Nathaniel Farmer Ebenezer Munroe, Jr. Jedidiah Munroe Solomon Pierce John Robbins John Tidd Thomas Winship
Lynn	William Flint Thomas Hadley Abednego Ramsdell Daniel Townsend	Joseph Felt Timothy Monroe	Josiah Breed
Medford	Henry Putnam William Holly
Needham	John Bacon Nathaniel Chamberlain Amos Mills Elisha Mills Jonathan Parker	Eleazer Kingsbury Xxxxx Tolman
Newton		Noah Wiswell
Roxbury			Elijah Seaver
Salem	Benjamin Pierce
Stow	Daniel Conant	Daniel Conant
Sudbury	Deacon Josiah Haynes Asahael Reed Thomas Bent	Joshua Haynes, Jr.
Watertown	Joseph Coolidge

STATE MURDER
STATE MURDER

Woburn	Daniel Thompson Asahel Porter	Jacob Bacon Xxxxx Johnson George Reed
--------	----------------------------------	---	--

Here is an example of what we don’t know. When we somewhat belatedly erected this grave marker, in the Year of Our Lord 2000, we presumed that the slain army soldier was a Brit although he may very well have been simply one of the Americans who had enlisted not in what was at that time our militia but in what was at that time our army:

Dr. Charles Russell, son of the Hon. James Russell, born in Charlestown, graduated at Harvard College, 1757, and inherited his uncle Chambers’s estate in Lincoln, where he resided as a physician. He married Miss Elizabeth Vassall of Cambridge, and from his father-in-law he contracted opinions opposed to the measures of the people in the revolution, and left Lincoln on the 19th of April, 1775, and went to Martinique, in the West-Indies, where he died.... Dr. Joseph Adams was also unfriendly to the revolution, and went to England, where he died.³²⁵

325. Lemuel Shattuck’s 1835 A HISTORY OF THE TOWN OF CONCORD;.... Boston: Russell, Odiorne, and Company; Concord MA: John Stacy
 (On or about November 11, 1837 Henry David Thoreau would indicate a familiarity with the contents of at least pages 2-3 and 6-9 of this historical study.)

STATE MURDER

Being the PARTICULARS of the VICTORIOUS BATTLE fought at and near CONCORD, situated Twenty Miles from Boston, in the Province of the Massachusetts-Bay, between Two Thousand Regular Troops, belonging to His Britannic Majesty, and a few Hundred Provincial Troops, belonging to the Province of Massachusetts-Bay, which lasted from sunrise until sunset, on the 19th of April, 1775, when it was decided greatly in favor of the latter. These particulars are published in this cheap form, at the request of the friends of the deceased WORTHIES, who died gloriously fighting in the CAUSE of LIBERTY and their COUNTRY, and it is their sincere desire that every Householder in the country, who are sincere well-wishers to America, may be possessed of the same, either to frame and glass, or otherwise to preserve in their houses, not only as a Token of Gratitude to the memory of the Deceased Forty Persons, but as a perpetual memorial of that important event, on which, perhaps, may depend the future Freedom and Greatness of the Commonwealth of America. To which is annexed a Funeral Elogy on those who were slain in the Battle.

Mr. Darling's store is the only one in the town, and Mr. Darling's store is the only one in the town, and Mr. Darling's store is the only one in the town.

The following is a list of the Fredericksburg wine grape varieties and clones.

17 Mr. James Thompson
 18 J. H. P. 11 11
 19 Mr. John Lane
 20 These commenced with the week 17th were killed by the first fire of the enemy

Three distinguished with this mark [?] were killed by the first fire of the enemy.

The groves of wounded, dying men,
 World with its agonized shriek,
 O! how I shudder like a guilty man,
 My heart and blood were left
 That all persons to avoid the fate

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

When Timothy Dwight would write of his 1795 travels, while speaking of his passing through Concord he would give a small amount of attention to the bucolic details of the place:

Concord was purchased of the Indians and incorporated in 1635. Three persons only are known to have been killed within the limits of this township by the savages, although it was the first settlement made in New England so far from the shore. From Boston it is distant nineteen miles, from Williams' in Marlboro, fifteen.

The soil of this township is various. The higher grounds have loam mixed with gravel. The plains are sandy, light but warm, and friendly to rye and maize, of which considerable quantities are carried to market. Pastures are visibly few and indifferent. Along the river, which is named from this town and runs through the middle of it, lie extensive and rich meadows. Hemp and flax grow here luxuriantly. Two acres are said to have yielded in one instance one thousand pounds of flax. Few fruits are seen except apples, and these plainly do not abound as in most other parts of the country.

The face of this township is generally a plain. A hill of no great height ascends at a small distance from the river on the eastern side and pursues a course northward, parallel with that of the river. Between this hill and the river lies the principal street. Another containing a considerable number of houses abuts upon it, perpendicularly from the western side.

The houses in Concord are generally well built, and with the outbuildings and fences make a good appearance. The public buildings are the church, courthouse, and jail, all of them neat.

But then he would devote a good deal of his attention to this locale's belligerent status as the site of this notorious squabble.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Concord will be long remembered as having been, partially, the scene of the first military action in the Revolutionary War, and the object of an expedition, the first in that chain of events which terminated in the separation of the British colonies from their mother country. A traveler on this spot, particularly an American traveler, will irresistibly recall to his mind an event of this magnitude, and cannot fail of being deeply affected by a comparison of so small a beginning with so mighty an issue. In other circumstances, the expedition to Concord and the contest which ensued would have been merely little tales of wonder and woe, chiefly recited by the parents of the neighborhood to their circles at the fireside, commanding a momentary attention of childhood, and calling forth the tear of sorrow from the eyes of those who were intimately connected with the sufferers. Now, the same events preface the history of a nation and the beginning of an empire, and are themes of disquisition and astonishment to the civilized world. From the plains of Concord will henceforth be dated a change in human affairs, an alteration in the balance of human power, and a new direction to the course of human improvement. Man, from the events which have occurred here, will in some respects assume a new character, and experience in some respects a new destiny.

General Gage, to whom was committed one of the most unfortunate trusts ever allotted to an individual, having obtained information that a considerable quantity of arms and military stores was by order of the Provincial Congress deposited in this town,¹ sent Lieut. Col. Smith and Major Pitcairn at the head of eight hundred grenadiers and light infantry, with orders to march to Concord and destroy the deposit. The troops were accordingly embarked from the common in Boston, and landed on the opposite shore in Cambridge at a place called Phipps's farm. Thence they marched by the shortest route to this town.

1. The whole amount of the warlike stores in the province of Massachusetts as they appear on a return, April 14, 1775, is contained in the following list.

Firearms	21,549
Pounds of powder	17,441
Pounds of ball	22,191
No. of flints	144,699
No. of bayonets	10,103
No. of pouches	11,979

The whole of the town stocks

Firearms	68
Pounds of powder	357 1/2
Pounds of ball	66,78
No. of flints	100,531

Duke's county and Nantucket were not included in this list.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

General Gage's principal advisers were of two classes, both very unhappily fitted to give him useful advice. One class was composed of Britons, utterly unacquainted with the state of the country, unwarrantably relying on their own prowess, and foolishly presuming on the supposed pusillanimity of the colonists. The other class was composed of colonists who had embarked their all in British measures, were generally deceived themselves, and were strongly prompted by every motive to deceive him. When the expedition to Concord was planned, it is probable that neither General Gage, nor his advisers, expected the least attempt at resistance. This opinion was bandied through the whole party in Boston. At the same time were continually circulated fulsome panegyrics on the bravery of the British troops. Silly jests and contemptible sneers were also reiterated concerning the dastardly character of the colonists. All these were spread, felt, and remembered. The expedition to Concord refuted them all.

Concord, as has been observed, lies almost equally on both sides of the river to which it gives its name. The surface of the township is generally level and low, and the river remarkably sluggish. From these facts a traveler would naturally conclude that Concord must be unhealthy. The following statement will however prove this conclusion to be unsound.

In the year 1790, the township contained 1,590 inhabitants. Of these, seventy-five were seventy years of age, or upward.

From the year 1779 to 1791 inclusive, a period of thirteen years, 222 persons died. The greatest number in a single year was twenty-five, the least ten. The average number was seventeen. Of these, fifty-nine were more than seventy, thirty others more than eighty, and eight more than ninety, amounting in the whole to ninety-seven (out of 222) who passed the limit of seventy years. It is presumed, a more remarkable instance of health and longevity cannot be produced. Almost 7/17 of the whole number deceased have during this period reached the boundary of human life. It is scarcely to be imagined that even here a similar list will be furnished a second time. Yet the Rev. Mr. Ripley, minister of Concord, who kept this register, informed me that the state of health during this period did not, so far as he had observed, differ very materially from what was common.¹

1. Ezra Ripley (1751-1841), Harvard 1776, became pastor of the First Church in Concord, Massachusetts, in 1778. There he founded what was perhaps the first temperance society in the country. He was the stepfather of Ralph Waldo Emerson.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

The salubrity of Concord violates the most received medical theories concerning such diseases as are supposed to be generated by stagnant waters. I know of no stream which approaches nearer to a state of stagnation than Concord River. Yet diseases of this class are seldom, or never, found here. The cause I shall not pretend to assign.

Within these thirteen years the baptisms in Concord amounted to 395,. Three fourths only of those who were born are supposed to have been baptized. The number of births, therefore, was about 527.

Concord contains a single congregation. The whole number of inhabitants in 1790, as has been observed, was 1,590. In 1800, it contained 227 dwelling houses, and 1,679 inhabitants; and in 1810, 1,633.

DO I HAVE YOUR ATTENTION? GOOD.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

An expedition of this nature had for some time been expected. Certain intelligence of it had been obtained the preceding afternoon by Dr. Warren, who afterwards fell in the battle of Breed's Hill,¹ and was forwarded by him with the utmost celerity to the intervening towns, particularly to Lexington, where were at that time Mr. Hancock and Mr. Adams, both afterwards governors of Massachusetts.² As these gentlemen were supposed to be the principal objects of the expedition, the expresses who carried the intelligence (Col. Paul Revere and Mr. William Dawes) were peculiarly directed to them.³ They reached Lexington, which is four miles from Concord, in such season that Messrs. Hancock and Adams made their escape.⁴ Here, however, the expresses were stopped by the British as they were advancing toward Concord; but Dr. Prescott, a young gentleman to whom they had communicated their message, escaped and alarmed the inhabitants of Concord.⁵

The British troops reached Lexington at five o'clock in the morning. Here they found about seventy militia and forty unarmed spectators by the side of the church. Major Pitcairn rode up to them and cried out with vehemence, "Disperse you rebels; throw down your arms, and disperse." As this command was not immediately obeyed, he discharged a pistol and ordered his soldiers to fire upon the inhabitants. The soldiers fired, and the people instantly fled. The soldiers, however, continued to fire at individuals. This at length provoked a return, and several were killed on both sides. Still the troops continued their march toward Concord, where they arrived early in the morning. For the purpose of defense, the inhabitants had drawn themselves up in a kind of order; but, upon discovering the number of the enemy withdrew over the North Bridge, half a mile below the church, where they waited for reinforcements. The soldiers then broke open and scattered about sixty barrels of flour, disabled two twenty-four pounders, destroyed the carriages of about twenty cannon, and threw five hundred pounds of ball into the river and neighboring wells. The principal part of the stores, however, was not discovered.

1. Joseph Warren (1741-1755), Harvard 1759, an excellent physician in Boston, became deeply involved in Revolutionary politics. Early in 1775, he gave up his profession to enter the army. He became president pro tempore of the Provincial Congress and was elected a major general four days before his death.

2. John Hancock (1737-1793), Harvard 1754, adopted by his rich uncle Thomas, joined his successful mercantile firm. The famous Revolutionary patriot was treasurer of Harvard College, 1773-1777, president of the Massachusetts Provincial Congress, and first governor of Massachusetts in the new republic, 1780-1785. His successor was Samuel Adams (1722-1803), Harvard 1740, better remembered for his incendiary role as one of the "Sons of Liberty" in the Revolution. As lieutenant governor of Massachusetts in 1789, acting governor in 1793, and elected governor, 1794-1798, this turbulent man showed little understanding of the problems of the state or of the nation.

3. See Colonel Revere's letters to the corresponding secretary of the Mass. Hist. Society....

4. Revolutionary patriot Paul Revere (1735-1818), a silversmith, was the official courier for the Massachusetts Provincial Assembly as well as an effective political cartoonist and the acknowledged leader of Boston's artisans. William Dawes (1745-1799) was one of the two men chosen to spread the alarm if the British troops should move to raid the military stores deposited in Concord.

5. Samuel Prescott (1751-c. 1777) completed the famous midnight ride after Paul Revere was captured, but died later in a prison in Halifax.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

After this work was completed, the troops advanced to the bridge in order to disperse the Americans. Major Buttrick, of Concord, who commanded the militia, being ignorant of the tragedy at Lexington, had directed his men not to begin the fire.¹ As he advanced with his party, the light infantry began to pull up the bridge; and, as he approached, fired, and killed two Americans one of them a Captain Davis, of Acton, in the neighborhood.² The fire was instantly returned, and the troops were compelled to retreat. Several of them were killed, several wounded, and a few taken prisoners.

The party was pursued; and, after they had rejoined the main body, the whole retired with the utmost expedition. On their way to Lexington they were continually harassed by an irregular and not ill-directed fire from the buildings and walls on their route. Every moment increased the number of their assailants and their own fatigue, distress, and danger. Upon the first intelligence that the Americans had betaken themselves to arms, General Gage sent a second detachment to the relief of Lieutenant Colonel Smith under the command of Lord Percy.³ It amounted to nine hundred men and marched from Boston with two fieldpieces, their music playing the tune of Yankee Doodle to insult the Americans. As they were passing through Roxbury, a young man who was making himself merry on the occasion being asked, as is said, by his lordship, why he laughed so heartily, replied "To think how you will dance by and by to Chevy Chase."

This detachment joined their friends at Lexington, where the whole body rested for a short time, and with their fieldpieces kept the Americans at a distance. The neighboring country was now in arms, and moving both to attack the enemy and to intercept their retreat. The troops, therefore speedily recommenced their march. From both sides of the road issued a continual fire, directed often by excellent marksmen, and particularly dangerous to the officers. Major Pitcairn thought it prudent to quit his horse and lose himself among the soldiery. Everywhere the retreating army was pursued and flanked. Their enemies descended from every new hill and poured through every new valley. Perplexed by a mode of fighting to which they were strangers, and from which neither their valor, nor their discipline furnished any security; exhausted by fatigue, and without a hope of succor; the troops wisely withdrew from impending destruction with the utmost celerity.

1. John Buttrick (1715-1791) was a leader of the Concord militia in action on April 19, 1775.

2. Isaac Davis (1745-1775), who led the Acton minute men against the British on the Concord bridge, was killed in the first volley.

3. Hugh Percy, Duke of Northumberland (1742-1817), apparently disapproved of the war with the American colonies although he entered military service against them.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

October 5, Sunday-7, Tuesday: Samuel Smith would indicate at the time of his execution in Concord on December 26, 1799 that subsequent to his 1st confessed crime of theft, and subsequent to his punishment in 1772 for that offense, he had continued in his practice of stealing but that nevertheless, during the America Revolution, he had “ferved my Country faithfully.” –Served his country faithfully until, that is, in the 6th Connecticut Regiment commanded by Colonel Return Jonathan Meigs, his enlistment bounty money had been wrongfully withheld! — whereupon, about 10 or 12 days before the surrender of General Burgoyne (which would have been in this timeframe), while his unit was at Peek’s Kill, a military base on the east side of the Hudson River (Peekskill, New York), he had deserted. (Smith would thus miss out on an opportunity to spend the following horrible winter in army quarters at Valley Forge, Pennsylvania.)

AMERICAN REVOLUTION

NEVER READ AHEAD! TO APPRECIATE THE PERIOD OF OCTOBER 5TH TO 7TH, 1777 AT ALL ONE MUST APPRECIATE IT AS AN EXTENDED TODAY (THE FOLLOWING DAYS, TOMORROWLAND, ARE BUT A PORTION OF THE UNREALIZED FUTURE AND IFFY AT BEST).

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

In their retreat, however, they set fire to several houses, plundered whatever pleased their fancy or gratified their avarice, and killed several unarmed persons: particularly two old men, whose hoary locks pleaded for compassion in vain. Bunker Hill, which they reached about sunset, was the first place of safety and repose in their march. The next day they returned to Boston.

In this expedition the British had sixty-five killed, and one hundred and eighty wounded, and twenty-eight made prisoners: two hundred and seventy-three. Among the wounded were fifteen officers, one of them Lieutenant Colonel Smith. Of the Americans, fifty were killed, thirty-four wounded, and four missing: eighty-eight. Several gentlemen of reputation fell in this conflict, and were regarded as martyrs in the cause of freedom and their country.

Such was the issue of this memorable day, and such the commencement of the Revolutionary War in the United States.

Whatever opinions may be adopted concerning the controversy between the British government and the colonies by those who come after us, every man of sober, candid reflection must confess that very gross and very unfortunate errors existed in the measures adopted, both in Great Britain and America, toward the colonies. In both countries information was drawn and received almost solely from those who espoused the system of the reigning administration. It hardly needs to be observed that deception and mischief were the necessary consequence. An opinion also was boldly advanced, sedulously adopted, and extensively diffused that the Americans were mere blusterers and poltroons. In the British Parliament, Colonel Grant declared, with equal folly and insolence, that at the head of five hundred, or perhaps (as numerals are easily misprinted) of five thousand men, he would undertake to march from one end of the British settlements to the other, in spite of all American opposition.¹ This declaration would almost of itself have converted a nation of real cowards into soldiers. Why it should be believed that the descendants of Englishmen, Scotchmen, and Irishmen were cowards, especially by their brethren descended from the same ancestors, I shall not take upon me to explain. The difficulties and hazards attendant upon a war conducted at the distance of three thousand miles from the source of control and supplies were certainly not realized by the British cabinet. As little did they realize the disposition or the circumstances of the Americans.

1. Probably Dwight refers to James Grant (1720-1806), member of Parliament at different times, a military man who went to America with reinforcements under Howe and became a general.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1776

June 27, Thursday: Thomas Hickey, one of General George Washington's guards, was hanged in New-York for plotting to kidnap Washington for the British, thus making himself be the 1st American soldier to be executed by the US Army.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1778

Bathsheeba Spooner of Brookfield MA, 32 years of age, being convicted of conspiring to murder her wealthy and elderly husband, and having been inspected by midwives who certified that she was not pregnant, was hanged by the neck until she was dead — but then upon autopsy a 5-month fetus was revealed.

July 2, Thursday: Ezra Ross, a single man of Ipswich, was hanged at Worcester for involvement in the murder of a Mr. Spooner (at the instigation of the wife Mr. Spooner had abandoned).

The day of his execution was kept as a season of fasting and prayer for his untimely end, in his native parish.

The United States Congress convened in Philadelphia.

AMERICAN REVOLUTION

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1779

April 19, Monday: The Reverend James Hackman, Rector of Wiveton, murderer of the opera singer Martha Ray, mistress of John Montagu, 4th Earl of Sandwich, was hanged on the Tyburn gallows outside London.

LOVE AND MADNESS

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1780

September 30, Saturday: Late in September, Major General Nathanael Greene had presided over the military court that convicted Major John André of plotting with General Benedict Arnold to betray West Point, and after the court had found him guilty as charged, he ordered his execution. On this day, on Garret Smith's farm near Tappan, New York, André was hanged and Dr. Timothy Hosmer of Avon, New York pronounced him dead.

AMERICAN REVOLUTION

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1781

June 30, Saturday: Concord budgeted for 14 of its citizen soldiers to serve for 4 additional months in the Continental Army.

AMERICAN REVOLUTION

TABLE OF REVOLUTIONARY CAMPAIGNS³²⁶

WHEN REQUIRED	MEN	TIME	WHERE EMPLOYED	BOUNTY	AMOUNT
June 15, 1781	3	5 months	Rhode Island
Bedford furnished seven; Acton, eight; Lincoln, eight; Carlisle, four, for this [the above] campaign. The whole State furnished two thousand seven hundred.
June 30, 1781	14	4 months	Continental Army
These [the above] men were hired by classes. Dea. John White was Chairman of the 3d class, which was assessed £180 to hire Joseph Cleisby. The 5th class, of which Reuben Hunt was Chairman, hired Jacob Laughton, for £90 lawful money as a bounty. Sometimes $100 were given by a single individual. All property seemed to be at the disposal of government, if required. The soldiers were paid off in government sureties which were sold for 2s. 6d. on the pound. Nathaniel French received ninety bushels of rye.
March 1, 1782		3 years	Continental Army	Hired in Classes

July 27, Friday: When François Henry de la Motte was executed as a French spy at Tyburn, the body was left to hang for almost an hour before it was taken down and decapitated, and the heart removed and thrown on a fire.

AMERICAN REVOLUTION

July 30, Monday: Gottlieb Stephanie handed Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart the libretto to Die Entführung aus dem Serail.

Abbé Claude C. Robin, chaplain to the French troops stationed in Rhode Island, described his experience in and around Providence.

ABBÉ CLAUDE C. ROBIN

AMERICAN REVOLUTION

326. Lemuel Shattuck's 1835 A HISTORY OF THE TOWN OF CONCORD;.... Boston: Russell, Odiorne, and Company; Concord MA: John Stacy
(On or about November 11, 1837 Henry Thoreau would indicate a familiarity with the contents of at least pages 2-3 and 6-9 of this historical study. On July 16, 1859 he would correct a date mistake buried in the body of the text.)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

August 4, Saturday: Just beyond the city limits of Charleston, the British hanged Colonel Isaac Hayne of the South Carolina militia.

AMERICAN REVOLUTION

August 5, Sunday: Admiral de Grasse sailed from Cap-Français, Hispaniola for America with 3 regiments and 28 ships.

AMERICAN REVOLUTION

O selig bist du! for chorus and strings by Johannes Herbst was performed for the initial time.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1782

April 11, Thursday: After deserting the revolutionary forces on the Hudson River in October 1777 before the winter at Valley Forge, Samuel Smith had had a 2nd unhappy love affair in Amherst, New Hampshire, whereupon he had lived by roving and stealing — and then in Lancaster MA on this date he and Sally Pratt, who would become the mother of his five children, were wed. Samuel would allege at the point of his hanging in Concord on December 26, 1799 that his wife Sally's [illegible] and profligacy would induce him to commit "many and shameful crimes." The family moved to Hollis, New Hampshire, where they became acquainted with one James McDaniels of Rowley, New Hampshire. Samuel desired just prior to his hanging "as a man who expects very soon to enter the eternal world ! warn all my fellow creatures" about this person James McDaniels, who he said had indicated that he had killed a man named Stone in Harvard, Massachusetts, had delivered "the fatal Blow to Captain Ephraim Jones, formerly Gaol-keeper in this Place," and had in addition to these two killings, been "likewise the Mean of his own Wife's Death."

YOUR GARDEN-VARIETY ACADEMIC HISTORIAN INVITES YOU TO CLIMB
ABOARD A HOVERING TIME MACHINE TO SKIM IN METATIME BACK
ACROSS THE GEOLOGY OF OUR PAST TIMESLICES, WHILE OFFERING UP
A GARDEN VARIETY OF COGENT ASSESSMENTS OF OUR PROGRESSION.
WHAT A LOAD OF CRAP! YOU SHOULD REFUSE THIS HELICOPTERISH
OVERVIEW OF THE HISTORICAL PAST, FOR IN THE REAL WORLD THINGS
HAPPEN ONLY AS THEY HAPPEN. WHAT THIS SORT WRITES AMOUNTS,
LIKE MERE "SCIENCE FICTION," MERELY TO "HISTORY FICTION":
IT'S NOT WORTH YOUR ATTENTION.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

June 13, Thursday: Anna Göldi or Göldin, the final person in Europe to be executed for witchcraft, was beheaded in Glarus Canton, Switzerland almost 300 years after Heinrich Kramer and Johann Sprenger's MALLEUS MALEFICARUM (THE WITCH HAMMER) had been endorsed by the Faculty of Theology at the University of Cologne and a decade before Philippe Pinel's reforms in mental treatment at the Bicêtre asylum.³²⁷

PSYCHOLOGY

FINAL EXECUTIONS
July 28, 1716	Mary HICKES and her 9-year-old daughter Elizabeth	hanged as witches in Huntingdon, England
June 13, 1782	Anna Göldi or Göldin	final person in Europe to be executed for witchcraft , beheaded in Glarus Canton, Switzerland
March 18, 1789	Christian or Catherine Murphy	hanged and then burned at the stake in front of Newgate Prison in England for having coined false money

(It would seem that what actually happened in this case was that she was the maid of a Dr. Johann Jakob Tschudi who had been taking advantage of her sexually, and she had threatened to expose this illicit sexuality.)

327. Street, W.R. A CHRONOLOGY OF NOTEWORTHY EVENTS IN AMERICAN PSYCHOLOGY. Washington DC: American Psychological Association, 1994

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1783

November 3, Monday: John Austin, a highwayman, had the honor to be the last person to be hanged in public on the triplex Tyburn gallows outside London — a gallows which had been busy on holidays ever since erected in 1571.

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

English execution rituals were being relocated from Tyburn to Newgate largely because property developers in the Tyburn area had come to feel that the large crowds on execution days, both at the hangings themselves and in the long procession following the condemned to the spot, were inconvenient for their patrons and rather less healthy than more healthy for local property values.

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

December 9, Tuesday: Giovanni Paisiello was nominated compositore della musica de' drammi by King Ferdinando IV of Naples. The composer was presently in Russia but had conducted an extensive campaign through friends to gain the position.

Hangings began at Newgate Prison, London, replacing the previous public gallows at Tyburn.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

29th day 12th month: Friend John Congdon of South Kingstown, Rhode Island manumitted a Negro Lad Named Dick about 14 years of age and pledged that for the meanwhile he would provide for instruct and direct him. “During his Infancy,” until the age of 21, Dick the former slave was to play the role of apprentice.

Name of slave	Owned by	Date of emancipation
Jane	Richard Smith	1757
Pegg	Stephen Richmond	27th 12th mo 1773
Phillis and her two children	John Knowles	1st 11th mo 1773
Casper and Judith
Richard	Jeremiah Browning	27th 9th mo 1773
Israel	William Robinson	15th 1st mo 1780
Dick	John Congdon	29th 12th mo 1783
Luce	William Congdon	29th 3d mo 1784
Jack
Fan
Cuff, otherwise Cuff Knowles	Barshebe Knowles	24th 7th mo 1783
	Robert Knowles
	Joseph Knowles
	John Congdon
	Charles Congdon
	Hannah Knowles
Job	William Peckham	4th 8th mo 1786
Rose	William Peckham	24th 8th mo 1786

Changes to St. Helena licensing laws meaning soldiers could not obtain arrack from the island’s Punch Houses. 200 soldiers, bayonets fixed, marched on the Governor.

DRUNKENNESS

Although nearly 100 would be condemned to death, only 10 would actually hang. The governor would withdraw the new liquor regulations.

ST. HELENA RECORDS

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1784

Concord procured a new town bell, from Hanover, weighing 500 pounds. It would soon break.

Concord erected a replacement courthouse.³²⁸

328. This Concord courthouse became the place of public display of the gallows upon which a local house burglar, Samuel Smith, was hung at the end of 1799 — until with this macabre and tasteless display of judicial power it was consumed in the flames of an arsonist in 1849. Here, since we do not have an image of the apparatus upon which the house burglar had been hanged, as a substitute macabre and tasteless display, is an image of the chair that Massachusetts used for its final electrocutions, at Charlestown in 1947, producing the deaths of Edward Gertson and Philip Bellino. The chair is not on display (tastes about this sort of think have obviously changed somewhat), but a photo was taken of it in a storage room at the state prison in Walpole in 1974.

STATE MURDER

Antoine-Laurent Lavoisier served as the head for a royal commission that included Benjamin Franklin (“and, ironically,” avers Stephen Jay Gould, “Dr. Guillotin, whose ‘humane’ invention would end Lavoisier’s life”³²⁹) investigating and refuting the claims of Dr. Franz Anton Mesmer about the role of animal magnetism in the cure of disease by entrancement (otherwise known as Mesmerization).

FRANZ MESMER

STATE MURDER

LA GUILLOTINE

Brossard de Beaulieu painted a portrait of Lavoisier with a Leyden Jar, to be exhibited at the Salon of 1785.

In his role as Historiographe de France, Jean François Marmontel began to prepare a history of LA RÉGENCE DU DUC D'ORLÉANS, covering the period from the death of King Louis XIV to 1721.

“HISTORICAL PERSPECTIVE” BEING A VIEW FROM A PARTICULAR POINT IN TIME (JUST AS THE PERSPECTIVE IN A PAINTING IS A VIEW FROM A PARTICULAR POINT IN SPACE), TO “LOOK AT THE COURSE OF HISTORY MORE GENERALLY” WOULD BE TO SACRIFICE PERSPECTIVE ALTOGETHER. THIS IS FANTASY-LAND, YOU’RE FOOLING YOURSELF.

329. Professor Gould is quite mistaken in regard to the irony of this. Dr. Joseph-Ignace Guillotin’s invention was not invented by Dr. Guillotin, either then or later. The device in question had already been in documented existence, at least since early in the 13th Century, and it had already a name, and it would be renamed in revolutionary France with the name of Dr. Joseph-Ignace Guillotin only in mockery of him — simply because he had pleaded before the assembly for the use of some method of execution that would be quicker and would involve less pain and humiliation than the inventive and imaginative methods of execution that had been usual before his time. What humanely and suddenly truncated the life of Antoine-Laurent Lavoisier, without torture and without humiliation as recommended by the humane Dr. Guillotin, was the fact that he had been a tax-farmer and such tax-farming had in the revolutionary period quite gone out of favor.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

THERE CANNOT BE ANY SUCH THINGIE, AS SUCH A PERSPECTIVE.

September 9, Thursday: In Rhode Island, “One Wm. Stephens hanged himself this afternoon, he left a widdow & several Children.”

SUICIDE

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1785

May 5, Thursday: The burglars William Scott and Thomas Archibald were hanged in Boston.

THE TASK OF THE HISTORIAN IS TO CREATE HINDSIGHT WHILE
INTERCEPTING ANY ILLUSION OF FORESIGHT. NOTHING A HUMAN CAN SEE CAN EVER BE SEEN AS IF THROUGH THE EYE OF GOD.

IN A BOOK THAT IS SUPPOSED TO BE ABOUT HISTORY, ISSUED BY RANDOM HOUSE IN 2016, I FIND THE PHRASE “LOOKED UPON FROM THE BIRD’S-EYE VIEW OF HISTORY,” ONLY A MERE STORYTELLER,
NEVER A HISTORIAN, COULD HAVE PENNED SUCH A PHRASE —
BECAUSE NO BIRD HAS EVER FLOWN OVER HISTORY.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Our national birthday, Monday the 4th of July: Dignitaries at an Independence Day dinner in New York raised their glasses to George Washington, to the soldiers who died in combat, to our nation’s European allies, and to “Liberty, peace and happiness to all mankind.” Note well that no dignitary proposed raising a glass to any Jefferson, either as the author of our Declaration of Independence or for any other reason.

The victory having been attained and properly celebrated, the victors proceeded to a proper distribution of their spoils of war, the former estates of departed Loyalists. During the latter half of the year, Major General Nathanael Greene would be relocating his family to the piece of the loot that had been assigned to him, a plantation called “Mulberry Grove” on the Savannah River of Georgia.

Boston began sending its convicts out to the Castle in Boston Harbor to serve their sentences.

NOBODY COULD GUESS WHAT WOULD HAPPEN NEXT

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

July 9, Saturday: Malcolm Laing was called to the Scottish bar.

At York in Yorkshire, Nancy Yeats or Yates, a 17-year-old milliner, was sentenced initially to be hanged, but then that was reduced to transportation for 7 years, for burglary with a value of 100 shillings. At Worcester in Worcestershire, Sarah Bellamy, a 15-year-old servant or weaver, was sentenced to transportation for 7 years, for having stolen a purse containing cash and promissory notes with a value of 630 shillings. After a period of confinement the two convicts would be taken from Portsmouth on May 13, 1787 at the age of 19, with 99 other such women, aboard the Lady Penrhyn on its “maiden” voyage. This vessel was also conveying the first horses that would arrive in Australia, a stallion, three mares, two fillies, and a colt. Both women would be pregnant upon the vessel’s arrival at Port Jackson in Botany Bay on January 26, 1788.

YOUR GARDEN-VARIETY ACADEMIC HISTORIAN INVITES YOU TO CLIMB ABOARD A HOVERING TIME MACHINE TO SKIM IN METATIME BACK ACROSS THE GEOLOGY OF OUR PAST TIMESLICES, WHILE OFFERING UP A GARDEN VARIETY OF COGENT ASSESSMENTS OF OUR PROGRESSION. WHAT A LOAD OF CRAP! YOU SHOULD REFUSE THIS HELICOPTERISH OVERVIEW OF THE HISTORICAL PAST, FOR IN THE REAL WORLD THINGS HAPPEN ONLY AS THEY HAPPEN. WHAT THIS SORT WRITES AMOUNTS,

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

LIKE MERE “SCIENCE FICTION,” MERELY TO “HISTORY FICTION”:
IT’S NOT WORTH YOUR ATTENTION.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1786

June 21, Wednesday: At 7:30AM Edward Griffiths, George Woodward, William Watts, Daniel Keefe, Jonathan Harwood, and William Smith were brought out of Newgate Prison in England through its Debtor's Door and led up onto its "New Drop" gallows. Their drop occurred at about 8:00AM, after which Phoebe Harris, "a well made little woman of something more than thirty years of age, with a pale complexion and not disagreeable features," was led out of the same door, terrified and trembling, by a couple of sheriff's officers to an 11-foot stake that had been erected halfway between this gallows and Newgate Street. She had been convicted of the treason of having coined false money. From a metal bracket at the top of the stake, a noose dangled. She mounted a stool and the noose was placed around her neck, and then she was allowed a few moments to pray with the Ordinary before the stool was removed. It required several minutes for her to noisily choke to death. After the body had hanged there for half an hour, an iron chain was wrapped around her upper body and fastened to the stake with nails. Two cartloads of faggots were then piled around the stake and lit. A crowd of some 20,000 was watching as the fire burned through the rope and the corpse dropped, remaining attached to the stake by the chain. The fire continued to burn until midday, by which point the corpse had been completely consumed.

Newgate having come to be a respectable business area of the City, its residents had sent a NIMBY petition to the Lord Mayor requesting that this execution happen somewhere else. Some of the locals would report that they had been made ill by the smoke and odors from this burning corpse. The London Times would offer: "The execution of a woman for coining on Wednesday morning, reflects a scandal upon the law and was not only inhuman, but shamefully indelicate and shocking. Why should the law in this species of offence inflict a severer punishment upon a woman, than a man. It is not an offence which she can perpetrate alone — in every such case the insistence of a man has been found the operating motive upon the woman; yet the man is but hanged, and the woman burned."

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1787

June 21, Thursday: Jason Parmenter and his fellow Shays Rebellion convicts were paraded at their gallows before a large crowd of spectators and then at the last instant, after they were quite likely crapping their pants, were reprieved. Go thou and rebel no more.³³⁰

HANGING

November 17, Saturday: After marrying with Sally Pratt in Lancaster MA on April 11, 1782 and living by committing “many and shameful crimes” which he would blame on Sally’s [illegible] and profligacy, the family of Samuel Smith had moved to Hollis, New Hampshire and fallen in there with one James McDaniels of Rowley NH. Samuel would desire just prior to his hanging “as a man who expects very soon to enter the eternal world ! warn all my fellow creatures” about this person James McDaniels, who he said had indicated that he had killed a man named Stone in Harvard, Massachusetts, had delivered “the fatal Blow to Captain Ephraim Jones, formerly Gaol-keeper in this Place,” and had in addition to these two killings, been “likewise the Mean of his own Wife’s Death.” Smith his family then moved from Hollis to Lancaster, Massachusetts, there supporting his family by theft, by serving as a fence for stolen goods, and by counterfeiting “the Coin of my Country.” After a move back to Hollis, on this day he was arrested for the theft of three sheep from Captain Jephthah Richardson of Groton, Innholder, a crime of which indeed he had been guilty, and “for want of Property, was committed to Goal [sic] in Concord.” During this period Samuel and Sally had been busy engendering a family of five kiddies.

LIFE IS LIVED FORWARD BUT UNDERSTOOD BACKWARD?
— NO, THAT’S GIVING TOO MUCH TO THE HISTORIAN’S STORIES.
LIFE ISN’T TO BE UNDERSTOOD EITHER FORWARD OR BACKWARD.

November 24, Saturday: Over and above the offense of sheep-stealing, while Samuel Smith was awaiting the disposition of his case he was charged also with being a counterfeiter, and, as it was impossible for him to come up with bail money, “the Sum of Three Hundred Pounds for my personal Appearance at the Supreme Court in April following,” he was “oblig’d to remain in Prison.”

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1788

February 29, Friday: Samuel Smith, charged with the stealing of sheep and with counterfeiting, had attempted to simplify the problems in his life by escaping from prison but had been “foon overtaken, brought back, put into Irons, and confin’d in the Dungeon, and there kept ’till April [1788] ; at which Time, I had my Trial, and was convicted of the above-mentioned Crime, for which I was fined, fet in the Pillory, and had my Ears cropped.”³³¹

331. According to a survey conducted by the Boston-based research and advocacy group Physicians for Human Rights in southern Iran as reported in the Journal of the American Medical Association in March 2004, under Sadaam Hussein from 1991 to 2003 men who avoided Iraqi military service had their external ears surgically removed. Here is one such person whose appearance might be comparable to the Massachusetts burglar Samuel Smith:

STATE MURDERSTATE MURDER

“HISTORICAL PERSPECTIVE” BEING A VIEW FROM A PARTICULAR POINT IN TIME (JUST AS THE PERSPECTIVE IN A PAINTING IS A VIEW FROM A PARTICULAR POINT IN SPACE), TO “LOOK AT THE COURSE OF HISTORY MORE GENERALLY” WOULD BE TO SACRIFICE PERSPECTIVE ALTOGETHER. THIS IS FANTASY-LAND, YOU’RE FOOLING YOURSELF. THERE CANNOT BE ANY SUCH THINGIE, AS SUCH A PERSPECTIVE.

April: Samuel Smith, who had attempted an escape from the prison in which he was being held after being charged with the stealing of sheep and with counterfeiting, was taken from his “Dungeon,” and “at which Time, I had my Trial, and was convicted of the above-mentioned Crime, for which I was fined, fet in the Pillory, and had my Ears cropped.”

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

June 25, Wednesday: Margaret Sullivan was hanged and then burned at the stake for treason by coining. Although there seems but little question that Sullivan was dead by the time her body was subjected to the flames, the London Times would report that “There is something so inhuman in burning a woman, for what only subjects a man to hanging, that human nature shudders at the idea. Must not mankind laugh as our long speeches against African slavery — and our fine sentiments on Indian cruelties, when just in the very eye of the Sovereign we roast a female fellow creature alive, for putting a pennyworth of quicksilver on a half-penny worth of brass. The savage barbarity of the punishment — and the smallness of the offence in the eye of God are contrasts that should meet the consideration of Government. The Gentleman’s Magazine would address Prime Minister Sir William Pitt the Younger: “the woman was brought out attended by a priest of the Romish persuasion, and as soon as she came to the stake she was placed upon a stool, which was instantly removed from under her, and she left suspended, when the faggots were placed around her, and being set on fire she was soon consumed to ashes. — Mr. Pitt, himself a lawyer, ’tis hoped, will not suffer this cruel remain of savage legislation to escape his notice, and continue a disgrace to the enlightened sense of this country.”

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1789

A young girl sentenced to death at the Old Bailey for some petty offence refused “transportation” in lieu of the sentence of death by hanging. At the time it was fashionable for the Society Ladies to attend such trials, and sit up on the bench with the judge. Mrs. Fitzherbert, the morganatic wife of the Prince Regent, and a coterie of her noble ladies, were present on this occasion and when despite the pleas of the judge and the entire courtroom—which was reduced to tears—the girl persisted, saying “she would rather die,” the judge adjourned the trial so that Mrs. Fitzherbert and her ladies might visit the girl in the holding cell adjacent to the court. The ladies pleaded with for several hours in this holding cell before this convict finally agreed to accept her alternate fate.

March 18, Wednesday: Christian or Catherine Murphy became the final British woman to suffer the female version of the penalty for high treason (coining), to wit, being hanged and then her corpse consumed by fire at the stake (her husband and 7 male co-defendants were hanged and then, as was customary, not awarded the full male penalty for treason of drawing and quartering).

FINAL EXECUTIONS
June 13, 1782	Anna Göldi or Göldin	final person in Europe to be executed for witchcraft , beheaded in Glarus Canton, Switzerland
March 18, 1789	Christian or Catherine Murphy	hanged and then incinerated at the stake in front of Newgate Prison in England for having coined false money
August 18, 1809	Susan Grant	final British woman to be executed for coining during the 19th Century

Moses Prichard was born.

June 24, Wednesday: On St. Helena, William Whaley was hanged as a “highway robber” for taking a piece of cloth from a sailor in the street.

October 8, Thursday: George Wall had been a Boston fisherman, while his wife Rachel Wall had worked on Beacon Hill as a housemaid. There not being enough money in fishing and cleaning house, they had stolen a ship docked at Essex and gone into the piracy business. These were real small-timers and their MO (modus operandi) had been that Rachel would stand at the mast making out to be in distress off the Isles of Shoals while George and some crewmen lurked. When rescuers came to save the maiden in distress, the men would leap out and kill them, take their valuables, and scuttle their ship. In 1782 the husband had drowned in a storm and Rachel Wall had been rescued. Back in Boston, she had begun to live by stealing from the cabins of ships at the docks. Eventually she was accused of murdering a sailor, an act she denied, and sentenced to hang. At her hanging on Boston Common on this day she confessed to having previously been a pirate — the only known female pirate of New England.

(Highway robbers William Dannesse and William Smith also were hanged on the Common.)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

October 10, Saturday: On the 2d day of the French Assembly's debate about the Penal Code, Dr. Joseph-Ignace Guillotin submitted a humanitarian proposal which included a recommendation that death, without the accompaniment of torture and by means of head-chopping, should become the sole and standard form of capital punishment in modern France.

HEADCHOPPING

FRENCH REVOLUTION, I

FRENCH REVOLUTION, II

December 12, Saturday: Dr. Joseph-Ignace Guillotin for the 2d time presented his humanitarian proposals. There was nothing in any of his proposals that might produce ridicule in our modern context:

- He proposed that, in general, offenses of the same kind ought not to be punished by different varieties of penalty.
- He proposed, specifically, in the case of the penalty of death, that the punishment be carried out in the same manner whatever the nature of the offence of which the individual had been accused. Any such condemned person should be decapitated by means of some simple and sure and invariant mechanism.
- He proposed that the body and head of a person whom they had executed should upon request be handed over to his family for a normal burial, with no reference made on the register as to the nature of that person's demise.
- He proposed that in view of the personal character of crime, no punishment of a guilty person was to involve any discredit in regard to his family at large. In no case should the estate of any condemned person be confiscated. The honor of those belonging to him should be in no way impugned, and they should continue to be no less admissible to any kind of profession, employment, and public function. No one would be allowed to reproach a citizen with any punishment that had been imposed on one of his relatives. Whosoever ventured to do so ought publicly to be reprimanded by the judge, and this reprimand should be posted upon the offender's door and at the public pillory for a period of 3 months.

HEADCHOPPING

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1790

April Sessions: In England, Sophia Girton was convicted of treason by coining, but her execution by being hanged and then burned at the stake would be delayed until after the British Parliament had on June 5, 1790 enacted Treason Act 30 Geo. III, c.48, which would substitute ordinary hanging, as was done with males thus convicted, for such coining offenses committed by females (Sophia would ultimately be pardoned on condition of transportation for life to New South Wales and would board ship on June 12, 1790).

October 14, Thursday: The burglars Edward Vail Brown, a white man, and John Bailey, a black man, were hanged on Boston Common.

BOSTON

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1791

June 3, Friday: The French Assembly approved a text providing that “Every person condemned to the death penalty shall have his head severed.” Guidon, a carpenter who constructed scaffolds, was authorized to build the first head-chopping machine, but, his price proving to be much too high, the order would be placed with a German maker of harpsichords, Tobias Schmidt.

LA GUILLOTINE
HEADCHOPPING

May 27, Friday: Captain Charles Williamson met with his employers, the association formed by William Johnstone Pulteney MP, former governor of Bombay William Hornby, and English promoter Patrick Colquhoun, to advise that he’s cut a deal to sell 300,000 acres of New York land to Archibald Boyd of Baltimore, pending their approval of course (for close to £75,000 they would of course authorize the deal).

In Providence, Rhode Island at 3PM, David Cumstock the young murderer was hanged before a crowd estimated at 10,000, to all appearances unrepentant, with the Reverend Snow offering the prayer at the gallows.

June 3, Friday: The French Assembly approved a text providing that “Every person condemned to the death penalty shall have his head severed.” Guidon, a carpenter who constructed scaffolds, was authorized to build the first head-chopping machine, but, his price proving to be much too high, the order would be placed with a German maker of harpsichords, Tobias Schmidt.

LA GUILLOTINE
HEADCHOPPING

June 7, Tuesday: Samuel Smith, whose cropped ears indicated that he had already had serious run-ins with the law in the past, was charged in Charlestown, Massachusetts by [Jofhus??] Welcott, “for having folen fundry Goods from him the faid [Jofhus??],” and held “in the common Goal [sic] of Concord” pending trial. His trial took place on the 2d Tuesday of September 1791, but Welcott did not appear and so Smith was discharged. (Smith would allege, before his hanging, “I now fay as a dying Man, that I was not guilty of the Crime complained of ; and I furthermore declare, that the faid Welcott did at that Time steal Money from me, out of my Bundle, and for fear I fhould complain of him, he complained of me.”)

ESSENCES ARE FUZZY, GENERIC, CONCEPTUAL;
ARISTOTLE WAS RIGHT WHEN HE INSISTED THAT ALL TRUTH IS SPECIFIC AND PARTICULAR (AND WRONG WHEN HE CHARACTERIZED TRUTH AS A GENERALIZATION).

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

September 11, 2d Tuesday: Samuel Smith, whose cropped ears indicated that he had already had his run-ins with the law in the past, had been charged in Charlestown, Massachusetts by [Joshus??] Welcott, “for having stolen fundry Goods from him the said [Joshus??],” and was being held “in the common Goal [sic] of Concord.” His trial took place on the 2d Tuesday of the month, but when Welcott did not appear before the court to make his complaint, Smith was discharged. “I now say as a dying Man, that I was not guilty of the Crime complained of ; and I furthermore declare, that the said Welcott did at that Time steal Money from me, out of my Bundle, and for fear I should complain of him, he complained of me.”

HANGING

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1792

April 10, Thursday: The procureur général syndic, Roederer, reached an accord with Tobias Schmidt, a German maker of harpsichords, for a price of 960 francs to cover the cost of devising the first head-chopping machine, which sum moreover was to provide for a leather bag for the proper disposal of the severed head.

HEADCHOPPING

LA GUILLOTINE

April 15, Tuesday: At Bicêtre, France, the first test of the new head-chopping machine was conducted on fresh human corpses at a combination hospital, prison, and old folk's home. After three pieces of human remains had been divided into six pieces of human remains, the apparatus was deemed to be producing its desired result.

HEADCHOPPING

LA GUILLOTINE

April 19, Saturday: The carpenter Guidon, who usually made scaffolds, went to Bicêtre, France to fix a newly conceived blade into position on the head-chopping machine.

HEADCHOPPING

LA GUILLOTINE

April 21, Monday: The improved head-chopping machine was again tried out at Bicêtre, France. Three more fresh corpses had been carefully selected from the military hospital, this time of three really well-built individuals, who had died suddenly and whose necks had not become thin.

HEADCHOPPING

LA GUILLOTINE

April 25, Friday: At the Place de Grève (now Place Hotel de Ville), Charles-Henri Sanson, the man who would be beheading King Louis XVI, allowed the blade of the new French killing machine to sever for the 1st time the neck of a living French subject, one Nicolas-Jacques Pelletier who had been a highwayman, and neither God nor king filed any noticeable objection.³³²

LA GUILLOTINE

THE LAST VICTIM

HEADCHOPPING

May 5, Saturday: The architect Giraud submitted a report requested by Roederer. The report said: "Although well conceived in itself, has not been perfected to the fullest possible extent. The grooves, the tongues and the gudgeons are in wood; the first should be made in brass, the others of iron; the hooks to which are attached the cords holding up the mouton are only fixed with round-headed nails; they should be fixed with strong nuts and bolts."

LA GUILLOTINE

HEADCHOPPING

332. They say there's no such thing as progress — but every year we kill you a new way. Notice how these new techniques are always innovated by use of a "thin edge of the wedge" ploy: in the first instance, the person who is executed is one who manifestly deserves such treatment, someone with whose worthiness to be offed no-one could dare to disagree, but soon we will be chopping down, in addition to blokes like this, a king and queen who never were actual highway robbers and whose cases for clemency were somewhat more problematic.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

August 21, Tuesday: The first French head-chopping machine was installed at the Place du Carroussel, where it would remain until May 7, 1793, with interruptions such as for the beheading of Louis Capet, who had been King Louis XVI of France, at what is now known as the Place de la Concorde. I simply do not know, at what point it began to be generally referred to as “la louisette” or as “le louison” (the French apparatus in question actually having been devised by a Dr. Antoine Lewis, as a refinement on a prior Italian head-chopping device) rather than as the “machine,” but it assuredly was not known as the guillotine, in mockery of the doctor who had pled for greater humanity in French public executions, prior to the turn of the 19th Century.

HEADCHOPPING

October 1, Monday: Secretary of State Thomas Jefferson wrote to James Madison, Jr. to express the vicious states-rights sentiment that anyone who would attempt to create a national paper currency for the United States of America would be a traitor to his state government, which alone possesses the undelegated authority to issue paper currency — and that the penalty for such a high treason against one’s state government ought to be the penalty of death.

The [Virginia] assembly should reason thus. The power of erecting banks & corporations was not given to the general government it remains then with the state itself. For any person to recognize a foreign [Jefferson means “federal”] legislature in a case belonging to the state itself is an act of treason against the state, and whosoever shall do any act under colour of the authority of a foreign legislature whether by signing notes, issuing them or passing them, acting as director, cashier or in any other office relating to it shall be adjudged of high treason & suffer death accordingly, by the judgment of the state courts.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1793

January 21, Monday (the 1st of Pluviose in the Year One): In Paris, at what is now known as the Place de la Concorde, Louis Capet, who had been King Louis XVI of France, became a victim of the new improved “machine.”

HEADCHOPPING

LA GUILLOTINE

I die innocent of all the crimes laid to my charge; I Pardon those who have occasioned my death; and I pray to God that the blood you are going to shed may never be visited on France.

Louis’s neck was thick and the blade needed to be drawn back up and again released for the severing to be complete.

The entire corpse would be reduced by quicklime to nothingness, to ensure that there would never be any claim that anyone was in possession of a relic (due to the doctrine of the divine right of kings, Louis had been posturing for awhile as a Christ figure more or less in the manner in which Timothy McVeigh would starve himself in order to gain the appearance of a victim while awaiting federal execution in Terre Haute).

THE MARKET FOR HUMAN BODY PARTS

Who would have guessed? The cross-section of the neck of this French monarch of the 18th Century, Louis, turned out to seem rather more similar than not in appearance to the cross-section of the neck of the English monarch of the 17th Century, Charles:

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

The event would be commemorated with a medallion:

FRENCH REVOLUTION, I

FRENCH REVOLUTION, II

As of 2012 there are plans afoot to construct a £180,000,000 “NapoleonLand” theme park on the Montereau-Fault-Yonne site, just south of Paris, of the Emperor Napoléon I’s final meaningless victory — and here is an artist’s rendition of what that theme park may come to look like:

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

AUTRICHE

- 1 La Gloriette, Schoenbrunn
- 2 Le Manège de Wagram
- 3 Le Soleil d'Austerlitz (plantation)

ITALIE

- 1 Chateau des Strozzi
- 2 Aux quatre points les motifs de la pierre au sol, représentant le plus du pays comme le Chateau de Saint Cloud
- 3 L'Angle des Montagnes
- 4 La porte d'Arcade
- 5 Venise
- 6 L'Île d'Elbe
- 7 Centre d'équitation

FRANCE

- 1 La Corée
- 2 Le chateau de Malmaison
- 3 La réserve de kangourous
- 4 Le Chateau de Saint cloud
- 5 La Bastille
- 6 La Place de Grèce
- 7 La Machine infernale
- 8 Le Sacre de Notre Dame
- 9 Les bals du Louvre
- 10 Labyrinthes et fontaines
- 11 L'Orangerie de Saint Cloud
- 12 Coup de Chapeau
- 13 Le Bivouac
- 14 La Légion d'Honneur
- 15 Soldat de Napoléon (reproduction)
- 16 Les Cents Jours
- 17 Les Invalides

PRUSSE

- 1 Les Accords de Tilsit
- 2 Les Lais de Mazurie

RUSSIE

- 1 Le Kremlin
- 2 Le Palais des Glaces
- 3 Complexe de la Blagovest
- 4 L'Incendie de Moscou (reproduction)
- 5 La Cathédrale Saint-Basile

ORIENT

- 1 Topkapi
- 2 L'Araignée du Désert
- 3 Le Sphinx
- 4 Le Mont Thabor
- 5 Les Pyramides
- 6 Palais des Mamelouks
- 7 L'Aquarium
- 8 Les Fontaines d'Aboukir
- 9 Coup de Trafalgar
- 10 Centre de Thalasso

AMÉRIQUES

- 1 Le Village des Antilles
- 2 Némphée Géante
- 3 Serre et Volière
- 4 Le Village de Louisiane
- 5 L'Île de Sainte Hélène

M. Yves Jégo, who is backing this project, hopes to have construction work underway in 2014 and an opening date during the Year of Our Lord 2017. The theme park is charted to include a museum, a hotel, shops, restaurants, and a congress. One of the exhibits is being planned as a reprise of this beheading of King Louis XVI that had taken place in the Place de la Concorde,³³³ and also they are scheming to enable visitors to “ski” around frozen corpses of soldiers and horses on a “wintry” slope.

Famous Last Words:

“What school is more profitably instructive than the death-bed of the righteous, impressing the understanding with a convincing evidence, that they have not followed cunningly devised fables, but solid substantial truth.”

— A COLLECTION OF MEMORIALS CONCERNING DIVERS DECEASED MINISTERS, Philadelphia, 1787

333. Since this is the last thing in good taste, can I have the FreedomFries concession?

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

“The death bed scenes & observations even of the best & wisest afford but a sorry picture of our humanity. Some men endeavor to live a constrained life — to subject their whole lives to their will as he who said he might give a sign if he were conscious after his head was cut off — but he gave no sign Dwell as near as possible to the channel in which your life flows.”

—Thoreau’s JOURNAL, March 12, 1853

1681	Headman Ockanickon of the Mantas	the Mantas are the “Leaping Frogs” group of the Lenape tribe	“Be plain and fair to all, both Indian and Christian, as I have been.”
1692	Massachusetts Bay colonist Giles Corey	being pressed to death for refusing to cooperate in his trial for witchcraft	“Add more weight that my misery may be the sooner ended.”
1777	John Bartram	during a spasm of pain	“I want to die.”
1790	Benjamin Franklin	unsolicited comment	“A dying man can do nothing easy.”
1793	Louis Capet, King Louis XVI of France	being beheaded in the Place de la Concorde	“I die innocent of all the crimes laid to my charge; I Pardon those who have occasioned my death; and I pray to God that the blood you are going to shed may never be visited on France.”
1793	Jean-Paul Marat	reviewing a list of names	“They shall all be guillotined.”
1793	Citizen Marie Antoinette	stepping on the foot of her executioner	“Pardonnez-moi, monsieur.”
... other famous last words ...

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

July 17, Wednesday: Alexander Mackenzie reached the Bella Coola River at Friendly Village.

CANADA

In France, this was the 28th of Messidor in the Year One. The National Convention decided to eliminate all feudal dues without compensation. Charlotte Corday d'Armont became a victim of the "machine," because of her having stabbed to death Jean-Paul Marat in his bathtub. An assistant lifted her severed head and slapped its cheek, which, it is reported, blushed — for this impropriety, François le Gros would need to serve three months in prison.

HEADCHOPPING

Famous Last Words:

"What school is more profitably instructive than the death-bed of the righteous, impressing the understanding with a convincing evidence, that they have not followed cunningly devised fables, but solid substantial truth."

— A COLLECTION OF MEMORIALS CONCERNING DIVERS DECEASED MINISTERS, Philadelphia, 1787

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

“The death bed scenes & observations even of the best & wisest afford but a sorry picture of our humanity. Some men endeavor to live a constrained life — to subject their whole lives to their will as he who said he might give a sign if he were conscious after his head was cut off — but he gave no sign Dwell as near as possible to the channel in which your life flows.”

—Thoreau’s JOURNAL, March 12, 1853

1681	Headman Ockanickon of the Mantas	the Mantas are the “Leaping Frogs” group of the Lenape tribe	“Be plain and fair to all, both Indian and Christian, as I have been.”
1692	Massachusetts Bay colonist Giles Corey	being pressed to death for refusing to cooperate in his trial for witchcraft	“Add more weight that my misery may be the sooner ended.”
1777	John Bartram	during a spasm of pain	“I want to die.”
1790	Benjamin Franklin	unsolicited comment	“A dying man can do nothing easy.”
1793	Louis Capet, King Louis XVI of France	being beheaded in the Place de la Concorde	“I die innocent of all the crimes laid to my charge; I Pardon those who have occasioned my death; and I pray to God that the blood you are going to shed may never be visited on France.”
1793	Jean-Paul Marat	reviewing a list of names	“They shall all be guillotined.”
1793	Citizen Marie Antoinette	stepping on the foot of her executioner	“Pardonnez-moi, monsieur.”
... other famous last words ...

This would-be nun’s headless corpse was then carried to a nearby hospital in order for the authorities to be able to determine in relative privacy whether or not this person had been “virginal intacta.” (If Corday had not been a virgin, of course, then her political act would have been further invalidated. Although the sketch made of her private parts by a medical student has since disappeared, we know that the consensus of this medical report indeed was that this young woman on her way to becoming a nun had been still virginal.)

THE MARKET FOR HUMAN BODY PARTS

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

October 16 (the 24th of Vendemiaire in the Year One): Publication of two works by Jan Ladislav Dussek was announced in The Times of London (these were the Sonata for piano, flute and cello C.94 and the Rondo for piano C.95).

“Publication of Universal Praise,” an anthem by William Billings, was advertised in Boston’s Columbian Centinel.

French troops halted the Austrian advance at Wattignies south of Lille.

Nine months a widow, the corpse of her husband having been reduced to nothingness by means of quicklime, Citizen Joséphe Jeanne Marie Antoinette Habsburg Bourbon, a German noblewoman who had been the queen of the French, also took a ride in an open cart to become a victim of the “machine” in the Place de la Révolution (Place de la Concorde) of Paris. She would say to the crowd “Farewell, my children, forever — I go to your Father,” but those would not be her final words.

HEADCHOPPING

Famous Last Words:

“What school is more profitably instructive than the death-bed of the righteous, impressing the understanding with a convincing evidence, that they have not followed cunningly devised fables, but solid substantial truth.”

— A COLLECTION OF MEMORIALS CONCERNING DIVERS DECEASED MINISTERS, Philadelphia, 1787

“The death bed scenes & observations even of the best & wisest afford but a sorry picture of our humanity. Some men endeavor to live a constrained life — to subject their whole lives to their will as he who said he might give a sign if he were conscious after his head was cut off — but he gave no sign Dwell as near as possible to the channel in which your life flows.”

—Thoreau’s JOURNAL, March 12, 1853

1681	Headman Ockanickon of the Mantas	the Mantas are the “Leaping Frogs” group of the Lenape tribe	“Be plain and fair to all, both Indian and Christian, as I have been.”
1692	Massachusetts Bay colonist Giles Corey	being pressed to death for refusing to cooperate in his trial for witchcraft	“Add more weight that my misery may be the sooner ended.”
1777	John Bartram	during a spasm of pain	“I want to die.”
1790	Benjamin Franklin	unsolicited comment	“A dying man can do nothing easy.”
1793	Louis Capet, King Louis XVI of France	being beheaded in the Place de la Concorde	“I die innocent of all the crimes laid to my charge; I Pardon those who have occasioned my death; and I pray to God that the blood you are going to shed may never be visited on France.”

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1793	Jean-Paul Marat	reviewing a list of names	"They shall all be guillotined."
1793	Citizen Marie Antoinette	stepping on the foot of her executioner	"Pardonnez-moi, monsieur."
... other famous last words ...

The event would be commemorated with a medallion:

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1794

February 8, Saturday: The pirates Collins, Poleski, and Fertidi were hanged on Boston Common.³³⁴

April 5 (the 16th of Germinal in the Year Two): George Jacques Danton, who had been a leader of the Revolution, became a victim of the “machine.”

HEADCHOPPING

Famous Last Words:

“What school is more profitably instructive than the death-bed of the righteous, impressing the understanding with a convincing evidence, that they have not followed cunningly devised fables, but solid substantial truth.”

— A COLLECTION OF MEMORIALS CONCERNING DIVERS DECEASED MINISTERS, Philadelphia, 1787

“The death bed scenes & observations even of the best & wisest afford but a sorry picture of our humanity. Some men endeavor to live a constrained life — to subject their whole lives to their will as he who said he might give a sign if he were conscious after his head was cut off — but he gave no sign Dwell as near as possible to the channel in which your life flows.”

—Thoreau’s JOURNAL, March 12, 1853

1794	George Jacques Danton	he had been convicted of not having made adequate use of the guillotine	“Show my head to the people. It is worth seeing.”
1798	Giovanni Casanova	having spent his life collecting sequentially and in tandem 132 pubic scalps	“I have lived as a philosopher and died as a Christian.”
1799	George Washington	fearing being buried alive (a common fear for that period), he was being heartily reassured by his physician	“’Tis well.”
1806	Charles Dickinson	he was dueling with Andrew Jackson	“Why have you put out the lights?”
1809	Thomas Paine	his physician asked whether he wished to believe Jesus to be the son of God	“I have no wish to believe on that subject.”
... other famous last words ...

334. In this year, in Pennsylvania, capital punishment was being abandoned for all offenses other than 1st degree murder. In this year, in Rhode Island, the pirate Charles Gibbs, who would be hanged on April 22, Friday, 1831 at Bellevue Prison of New-York, was being born.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

May 8, Thursday: Antoine-Laurent Lavoisier, who had been born in 1743-1794, had disproved the phlogiston theory, naming oxygen and discovered its importance in respiration and combustion. Here was a guy, I may opinion, who really knew how to think. His last letter: "I have had a fairly long life, above all a very happy one, and I think that I shall be remembered with some regrets and perhaps leave some reputation behind me. What more could I ask? The events in which I am involved will probably save me from the troubles of old age. I shall die in full possession of my faculties." Lavoisier was obliged to watch as the head of his father-in-law, Jacques Alexis Paulze, fell into the basket, before he himself stepped up to the machine that had come to be known as the Guillotine. His brain was then deprived of its oxygenated blood supply.

(He had indicated an intention to blink as long as he could after the decapitation — but no blinking was observed.)

March 12, Saturday: Some men endeavor to live a constrained life, to subject their whole lives to their wills, as he who said he would give a sign if he were conscious after his head was cut off, — but he gave no sign.

Theodore Dwight spoke before "The Connecticut Society, for the promotion of freedom and the relief of persons unlawfully holden in bondage," in Hartford, Connecticut:

... The injustice of it has been generally, if not uniformly acknowledged; and the practice of it severely reprobated. But when the question of total abolition has been seriously put, it has met with steady opposition, and has hitherto miscarried, on the ground of political expediency - That is, it is confessed to be morally wrong, to subject any class of our fellow-creatures to the evils of slavery; but asserted to be politically right, to keep them in such subjection.... In this state indeed, and with the sincerest pleasure I make the remark, in consequence of the small number of slaves, the advancement of civilization, and the diffusion of a liberal policy, the situation of the Negroes is essentially different. Exposed to few severe punishments, and indulged in many amusements, compared with what is found in most other countries, they are here flourishing and happy. But even here they are slaves. The very idea embitters every enjoyment.

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

SLAVERYABOLITIONISM

June 9, Monday (the 20th of Prairial in the Year Two): The head-chopping machine now famous as the guillotine was set up temporarily at the Place de la Bastille.

HEADCHOPPING

William Bartram was visited by some strollers, who tried to joke with him about those alligators he had allegedly fought.

William became noticeably nonresponsive and distant.

June 11 (the 22nd of Prairial in the Year Two): The head-chopping machine now famous as the guillotine was moved again, this time to the Barrière du Trône (now the Place de la Nation).

HEADCHOPPING

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

July: Samuel Smith met in Belton with two thieves, Fletcher and Gilbert, and formed with them a plan that they would break into the Boston home of a Deacon Phillips to steal his plate, and agreed to await them at a point in the woods some six miles southwest of Boston in order to convert their purloined plate into passable counterfeit silver coinage. He waited for two days at that spot in the woods, but as they did not appear and as he had no food, he left and, he alleged, never again heard of these two men or of their plan. (Later on, however, he would be caught hiking through the town of Groton with a pack full of this silver plate that had been purloined from the home of Deacon Phillips on his back.) Smith then met a person about fifty years of age using the name "Fluh," who allegedly had some plate stolen from "his honor [Governour??] Gill," but would allege that he did not become involved with this man. Not long after this Smith would be detected sneaking around with that indicative pack of silver on his back, as noted above, which would result in a sentence to 15 years in the Castle in Boston Harbor of which he would serve more than 2 years before escaping.

ESSENCE IS BLUR. SPECIFICITY,
THE OPPOSITE OF ESSENCE,
IS OF THE NATURE OF TRUTH.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

July 28, Monday: Samuel Taylor Coleridge's 1st poems appeared in the Morning Chronicle.

In revolutionary Paris this was the 10th of Thermidor of the year Two. Maximilien de Robespierre, previously one of the dudes who was sending people off to get their heads lopped, became a victim of the head-lobbing machine now famous as the guillotine.

HEADCHOPPING

YOUR GARDEN-VARIETY ACADEMIC HISTORIAN INVITES YOU TO CLIMB
ABOARD A HOVERING TIME MACHINE TO SKIM IN METATIME BACK
ACROSS THE GEOLOGY OF OUR PAST TIMESLICES, WHILE OFFERING UP
A GARDEN VARIETY OF COGENT ASSESSMENTS OF OUR PROGRESSION.
WHAT A LOAD OF CRAP! YOU SHOULD REFUSE THIS HELICOPTERISH
OVERVIEW OF THE HISTORICAL PAST, FOR IN THE REAL WORLD THINGS
HAPPEN ONLY AS THEY HAPPEN. WHAT THIS SORT WRITES AMOUNTS,
LIKE MERE "SCIENCE FICTION," MERELY TO "HISTORY FICTION":
IT'S NOT WORTH YOUR ATTENTION.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1795

August 6, Thursday: At 3PM Pomp, a black man about 28 years of age, was “carried in a cart, seated on his coffin, to the place of execution,” and hanged at Ipswich for having murdered his master, Captain Charles Furbush (1736-1795) of Andover.

Before his execution, he was carried into the meeting-house at 11 o'clock. Mr. Frisbie prayed and Mr. Dana preached from the words, “He that sheddeth man’s blood, by man shall his blood be shed.” Mr. Bradford of Rowley prayed at the gallows. Pomp remained unaffected through the whole of so awful a scene. He was directed to call on God for mercy, and he formally complied. His mind had been so little instructed and his heart so left to moral darkness, that he appeared to have no realizing perception of his guilt or of his danger in being suddenly sent into eternity. The little while he was under the care of the Ipswich ministers, they faithfully did what they could to correct the gross errors of his long neglected education.

Furbush had been given to saying things like “I might stay as long as I please at his house” and “he should not stay in this world forever,” and Pomp had taken this to mean that upon Furbush’s death “Mrs. Furbush and the farm would be mine.” Most of what we know of this is taken from a sixpence publication prepared by Jonathan Plummer, “Dying Confession of Pomp, A Negro Man, Who Was Executed at Ipswich, on the 6th August, 1795, for Murdering Capt. Charles Furbush, of Andover, Taken from the Mouth of the Prisoner, and Penned by Jonathan Plummer, Jun.” (Newburyport: Jonathan Plummer; Blunt and March). Although portions of the text of the one surviving frayed copy of this are illegible, it appears that Pomp had been born in Guinea in 1767 and arrived in Boston with his parents “when I was about three months old.” We don’t know that the family arrived as slaves because the text merely indicates “My mother soon after our arrival in this Country gave me away to Mr. Abbot of Andover.” When, shortly after turning 16 in approximately 1783, Pomp had grown dissatisfied in the Abbot household, he had sought with “the Select men of Andover to know whether I had not a right to leave it” and they had counseled him that slavery was no more, he had better continue to serve Abbot. Then “after a while it came to pass that Capt. Furbush took a notion to have a black man; and applying to the Select men, obtained their consent that I should be his servant.” A particular point of friction would be being kept from going to meeting on Sundays. He would make several attempts to run away and when recaptured would be flogged. Waking at midnight on February 6, 1795, “impressed with an idea that I must get up and kill Capt. Furbush,” Pomp was horrified but “something still kept whispering in my ear, that now is your time! kill him now! now or never! now! now!” And so he crushed Furbush’s skull with an axe and returned to bed, until he was taken into custody in his chamber. While in jail cell Pomp was intrigued to notice that his skin tone was lightening, so that he became almost like a mulatto, suspecting this to be a sign of his redemption. As the noose was adjusted around his neck he began to pray “with great solemnity,” and continued until this prayer was cut off.

August 8, Saturday: The hanging of Pomp in Ipswich, Massachusetts on the 6th was reported in the Impartial Herald.

(Let us hope that as part of its responsible reporting, this impartial herald pointed up the fact that there was no longer any such thing as slavery in Massachusetts.)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1797

April 6, Thursday: John Stewart, who had robbed the home of Captain Rust on Prince Street in Boston and hidden the loot in a tomb on Copp's Hill, was hanged on Boston Common.

The Quintet for piano, oboe, clarinet, bassoon and horn op.16 by Ludwig van Beethoven was performed for the initial time, in Vienna.

Birth of Harriet Webster, 3d child of Rebecca Greenleaf Webster with Noah Webster, Jr. (she would marry William Chauncey Fowler).

ESSENCES ARE FUZZY, GENERIC, CONCEPTUAL;
ARISTOTLE WAS RIGHT WHEN HE INSISTED THAT ALL TRUTH IS SPECIFIC AND PARTICULAR (AND WRONG WHEN HE CHARACTERIZED TRUTH AS A GENERALIZATION).

October 12, Thursday: A black burglar who had set houses afire to create diversion, Stephen Smith, was hanged on Boston Common, and his body given to local physicians for dissection.³³⁵

State Murder

"Stack of the Artist of Kouroo" Project

335. Clearly, this burglar Stephen Smith, since he was black, was no relation to the burglar Samuel Smith who would in a few years be hanged in Concord, who was white. Isn't it interesting, that we have a record that the body of the black burglar was turned over to local physicians for dissection, whereas we have no such record in regard to the body of the white burglar — despite the fact that, on the record of Samuel Smith's inconsequential life and series of crimes, he had been a no-account scumbag? (Apparently it wasn't a class thing, whose body got dissected and whose did not, but a race thing!)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1798

October 1, Monday: In Rhode Island, Hopkins Hudson was sentenced to be hanged for the murder of Rufus Randal of Cranston.

The infant Orpah Bryant died in Concord, Massachusetts without reaching her 1st birthday:

“VIVENS, DILECTISSIMA
ORPAH BRYANT.

BORN DECEMBER 24, 1797.
DIED OCTOBER 1, 1798.

SHE WAS THE JOY OF HER FATHER,
AND THE DELIGHT OF HER MOTHER

MORTUA, LACHRYMABILLIMA.”

November 10, Saturday: Wolf Tone was tried in a military court in Dublin. He admitted that he was guilty of treason and asked to die by firing squad.

November 11, Sunday: In prison in Dublin, Wolf Tone learned that he was to be hanged. He would later cut his own throat seriously but not immediately fatally, and the doctors would save him for hanging.

November 12, Monday: Johann Wolfgang von Goethe wrote to Friedrich Schiller: “Your letter found me ... in the ILIAD, to which I always return with delight. It is always as if one were in a balloon, far above everything earthly; as if one were truly in that intermediate zone where the gods float hither and thither.” (Goethe’s reference was to the balloon ascent of November 21, 1783, which had impressed him.)

November 14, Wednesday: The Captive of Spilberg, a musical drama by Jan Ladislav Dussek to words of Prince Hoare, was performed for the initial time, in Drury Lane Theatre, London. Reaction to the music was good, to the libretto, mixed.

BETWEEN ANY TWO MOMENTS ARE AN INFINITE NUMBER OF MOMENTS, AND BETWEEN THESE OTHER MOMENTS LIKEWISE AN INFINITE NUMBER,
THERE BEING NO ATOMIC MOMENT JUST AS THERE IS NO ATOMIC POINT
ALONG A LINE. MOMENTS ARE THEREFORE FIGMENTS. THE PRESENT
MOMENT IS A MOMENT AND AS SUCH IS A FIGMENT, A FLIGHT OF THE
IMAGINATION TO WHICH NOTHING REAL CORRESPONDS. SINCE PAST
MOMENTS HAVE PASSED OUT OF EXISTENCE AND FUTURE MOMENTS

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

HAVE YET TO ARRIVE, WE NOTE THAT THE PRESENT MOMENT IS ALL
THAT EVER EXISTS — AND YET THE PRESENT MOMENT BEING A MOMENT IS A FIGMENT TO WHICH NOTHING IN REALITY CORRESPONDS.

November 19, Monday: Wolf Tone succumbed to the throat wound he had inflicted on himself on November 11th.

November 22, Thursday: French troops defeated Flemish rebels at Diest, inflicting grievous losses.

November 24, Saturday: The French government placed a tax on doors and windows.

November 27, Tuesday: Louis Marie de La Revelliere, dit La Revelliere-Lepeaux replaced Jean-Baptiste Treilhard as President of the Executive Directory of France.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1799

Middle of June: According to the last and only sermon of Samuel Smith –the one he would deliver just before being hanged in Concord on December 26, 1799– in this timeframe he had been guilty of burglarizing a home in Sherburne: “I, in the Night Time, broke and entered the Houfe of one Joseph Richards, in Sherburne, and took therefrom fome Bacon, an old [Strainer??], and a Pair of Trowfers.”

BETWEEN ANY TWO MOMENTS ARE AN INFINITE NUMBER OF MOMENTS, AND BETWEEN THESE OTHER MOMENTS LIKEWISE AN INFINITE NUMBER, THERE BEING NO ATOMIC MOMENT JUST AS THERE IS NO ATOMIC POINT ALONG A LINE. MOMENTS ARE THEREFORE FIGMENTS. THE PRESENT MOMENT IS A MOMENT AND AS SUCH IS A FIGMENT, A FLIGHT OF THE IMAGINATION TO WHICH NOTHING REAL CORRESPONDS. SINCE PAST MOMENTS HAVE PASSED OUT OF EXISTENCE AND FUTURE MOMENTS HAVE YET TO ARRIVE, WE NOTE THAT THE PRESENT MOMENT IS ALL THAT EVER EXISTS — AND YET THE PRESENT MOMENT BEING A MOMENT IS A FIGMENT TO WHICH NOTHING IN REALITY CORRESPONDS.

June 20, Thursday night: Samuel Smith was passing through Natick when he window-peeked at the home of Esquire [Boden??], and about fifteen minutes after the wife had drunk a glass of spirits and gone to bed with her husband, he crept in and stole a watch and some money.

Austrian forces retook Modena and Reggio and restored Duke Ercole III Reinaldo.

June 21, Friday night: Samuel Smith broke into the store of Deacon Tucker of Sherburne and stole “a confiderable quantity of Englifh Goods, which I conveyed to the town of Sudbury, [nigh??] to the Houfe of one [Ifaac??] Moores, and left them in the Woods during the following day.” He would be apprehended when he returned to his cache of stolen goods, and Moores also would be taken into custody. They would be indicted on a capital charge of burglary in Cambridge in October 1799 “and tried for our lives.”

HANGING

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

October: Samuel Smith and [Ifaac??] Moores went on trial in Cambridge for the capital crime of burglary. Moores was found not to have been involved in the breaking and entering, and was thus convicted only of the lesser offense of theft and was not sentenced to be hanged. Smith, however, was found guilty of the full capital crime, and was therefore condemned to be hanged at Concord. During his last and only sermon, before his hanging, he would warn his Concord audience to “beware of [Ifaac??] Moores and his family.”

After Christmas: The 54-year-old burglar Samuel Smith was taken to the Concord church to be one of the recipients of the Reverend Ezra Ripley's special sermon. Mr. Ripley rose to the occasion:

Mr. RIPLEY'S SERMON, Delivered on the Day of the Execution of SAMUEL SMITH. LOVE TO OUR NEIGHBOUR EXPLAINED and URGED in a SERMON, delivered at Concord, Massachusetts, December 26, 1799, Being the Day on which Samuel Smith was executed for Burglary. By EZRA RIPLEY, A.M. Minister of Concord.

He took his text from MATTHEW xxii. 39: “THOU SHALT LOVE THY NEIGHBOR AS THYSELF.”

The reasoning which he employed was the same as if he had been Draco of Athens in 621BCE, or a bearded Taliban cleric enforcing the QUR'AN by hanging the town drunk in Afghanistan in the Year of Our Lord 2000: if you break the law of God even once even in the slightest way then you deserve to be put to death.

It is not good enough that you be a good neighbor to some neighbors, for you have been obligated to be a good neighbor to all your neighbors all the time. Loving your mother is great, but everybody loves their mother. Your father may have abused you but that's none of our business here. As a Christian individual you need to forgive others their transgressions against you but Christian society has no similar obligation to forgive individuals for transgressions. A human by being appointed as a judge becomes entitled to play God.

THE crime, which is this day to be capitally punished, is a direct violation of the law of love to our neighbour. The words read will not, therefore, it is presumed, be thought unfuitable for the theme of a discourse, on the present very solemn and affecting occasion. They are very concise and simple in expression; but their meaning is great, their contents are weighty and extremely interesting to individuals and to society. [There follows a commandment-by-commandment review of the Ten Commandments, in which we find:] ... The sixth aims directly at the heart. It forbids coveting the property and enjoyments of our neighbour; and implies that we be contented with such things as we have by the allotments of Providence, and can procure by honest industry. The coveting, which is a violation of the divine law of love to our neighbour, is an earnest desire to possess and enjoy the possessions and comforts of other people, without regard to equity and justice. To covet in this sense is sinful; and it prompts to unrighteous measures to obtain the things coveted. It induces deception, fraud, stealing, and the most atrocious crimes. Thus, to covet is the corrupt fountain whence flow those injurious vices, which frequently scourge individuals and society. This is the bitter root from which spring up fraud, injustice, stealing, robbery, and, sometimes, murder. According to the confession of the unhappy convict before us, all his crimes, which have more directly procured prosecutions, prisons, punishments (and I may add, the gallows) may be traced to this secret, fruitful, and corrupt source.... But as one perfection of God cannot be in such a sense infinite, as to infringe on any one other perfection, so neither does christian benevolence interfere with the proper exercise of justice, even when it inflicts pain and punishment. Love to others, to society, to ourselves, may require us, in a due course of law, to abridge the natural and civil liberty of individuals, to inflict punishment on offenders, and even to take away the life of malefactors, whose abuse of liberty, vicious conduct, and continuance in life are dangerous to the peace and happiness of individuals and the community. ...Love to society, to the great body of the people, frequently requires the execution of justice on individuals in pains and penalties.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Tortured property logic this, logic which Draco of Athens could have deployed to sanction any atrocity. True, this convict was a mere house burglar and house burglary is not in itself a capital offense, but being a house burglar amounts under our law to exactly the same thing as intending to commit murder (since “house-breakers for the purpose of stealing, intend to commit murder, if it be found necessary to prevent detection”) and we can reflect that it was perhaps only owing to the restraining grace of God and to circumstances, that this one did not ever in fact get to the point of the shedding of innocent blood.

Samuel Smith was then escorted from the Concord church by the Reverend Ripley and his flock, to the field east of the town’s new burying-ground, which probably was not yet being termed “Sleepy Hollow” but which at that time was still “Deacon Brown’s pretty pasture, circled with a ridge of oaks and pines ... reached only by a lane” and in use for group pic-nics, as a militia training field, and for the annual Cattle Show. There, having reached a likely spot, he was hanged by the neck until he was dead.³³⁶

FIGURING OUT WHAT AMOUNTS TO A “HISTORICAL CONTEXT” IS WHAT THE CRAFT OF HISTORICIZING AMOUNTS TO, AND THIS NECESSITATES DISTINGUISHING BETWEEN THE SET OF EVENTS THAT MUST HAVE TAKEN PLACE BEFORE EVENT E COULD BECOME POSSIBLE, AND MOST CAREFULLY DISTINGUISHING THEM FROM ANOTHER SET OF EVENTS

336. Bear in mind here that burglary is not ordinarily now considered a capital crime, it was merely that in the case of this Samuel Smith just about every other method of social control had already been attempted, up to and including the mutilation of the man’s ears. How much more lenient they were in the 18th Century with the burglar Smith, than they had been with similar burglars in the previous century! Governor John Winthrop’s law had been, in furtherance of the commandment “Thou shalt not steal,” that “If any person shall commit burglary, by breaking up any dwelling house, or shall rob any person in the field or highways, such person so offending, shall be for the first offence, branded on the forehead with the letter (B).” His penalty for a second offense was that the burglar be “branded as before and severely whipped,” and his penalty for a third such offense was that “he shall be put to death as being incorrigible.” Three strikes and you’re out. Smith had had a lot more chances than three. Because property conferred status, property could be more important than life itself. Did John Thoreau, age 12, arrive in Concord in time to attend this curious church ceremony and graveyard ceremony, and if so, did he, in 1828 when John Thoreau, Jr. was 12 and David Henry Thoreau was 10, tell them about this experience he had had at that same age? This could not have been a race case, in consideration of the differential penalty exacted by the state in the Washington Goode case some half-century later—Goode having been hanged in Boston rather than consigned to imprisonment at hard labor for the remainder of his natural life for a crime of passion obviously for one reason and one reason only, that he was black—for, since our recorders have not bothered to state of what race the hanged Samuel Smith was, then obviously he must have been a white man. EARLY AMERICAN IMPRINTS. FIRST SERIES; no. 36321 (Main-Microforms Microfiche M 00235 no. 36321): Smith, Samuel, 1745-1799. LAST WORDS AND DYING SPEECH OF SAMUEL SMITH, WHO WAS EXECUTED AT CONCORD, IN THE COUNTY OF MIDDLESEX, AND COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS, THE 26TH OF DECEMBER, A.D. 1799, FOR THE CRIME OF BURGLARY. Signed: Samuel Smith. Concord gaol, Dec. 26, 1799. One page; mourning border surrounds text in three columns and measures 42.6 x 29.2 centimeters. This was printed by Benjamin Edes in Kilby-Street, Boston to be sold at Mr. Reuben Bryant’s book-store in Concord. We have two forms of this. The first has the imprint as given above, and in addition has a relief cut of a coffin at head of title. The second, without the coffin image, bears the imprint: “To be sold at Mr. Reuben Bryant’s bookstore, Concord.—Also at Edes’s printing-office, Kilby-Street Boston.”

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

THAT COULD NOT POSSIBLY OCCUR UNTIL SUBSEQUENT TO EVENT E.

December 26, Thursday: Funeral celebrations were being held all across America. The recently deceased George Washington was being eulogized by Colonel Henry “Light Horse Harry” Lee as “1st in war, 1st in peace & 1st in hearts of his countrymen.”

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

In Concord, Massachusetts, the house burglar Samuel Smith concluded his first, last, and only sermon, before the rope was placed around his neck, by declaring, as it has been recorded: “Since I was 27 years of age, hard fortune has been my lot ; Theft my living, Gaols my habitation, and very foon the Gallows will be my companion — I fhall in a few hours be beyond the Grave [sic] ; and I pray GOD, I may enter that part of the invifible World, where Thieves do not break through and fteal. I have now to perform my laft Duty to my Fellow-Creatures, which is, to warn them all to fhun every Kind of Sin and in particular, that Sin, which has brought me to the Gallows.” Although Samuel’s father was deceased, his mother was still alive and “much inclined to the Christian Religion” as of the day of her son’s execution. The convict would be survived also by four brothers and two sisters who were said to be in good standing in their communities, as well as by five minor children of his own who would soon “hear of the fhameful death of their wretched Parent.” We have no indication that any member of Smith’s family had appeared in Concord during the church service or the hanging,³³⁷ and we have no record that anyone claimed the body for burial.³³⁸ I think it can fairly be presumed, however, that the 12-year-old John Thoreau was present for this church service and then for this hanging, and that the experience left its mark on his attitudes, including on his attitude toward capital punishment.

337. This is mostly derived from a broadsheet that was put out at the time, illustrated with a black image of a coffin and titled LAFT WORDS AND DYING SPEECH OF SAMUEL SMITH, WHO WAS EXECUTED AT CONCORD, IN THE COUNTY OF MIDDLEFEX, AND COMMONWEALTH OF MAFFACHUFETTS, THE 26TH OF DECEMBER, A. D. 1799, FOR THE CRIME OF BURGLARY.

338. Clearly, this house burglar Samuel Smith, since he was white, was no relation to the burglar Stephen Smith who had a few years before been hanged on Boston Common and then dissected — who had been black. Isn’t it interesting, that we have a record that the body of the black burglar was turned over to local physicians for dissection, whereas we have no such record in regard to the body of the white burglar — despite the fact that, on the record of Samuel Smith’s inconsequential life and series of crimes, he had been a no-class scumbag? (Apparently it wasn’t a class thingie, whose body got dissected and whose did not, but a race thingie!)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1800

➡ The Reverend Ezra Ripley had been so distressed at the hanging in Concord of the burglar Samuel Smith just after the previous Christmas, that in this year he allowed publication of the sermon which he had preached to the condemned just before his execution, “Love to our neighbour explained and urged: in a sermon, delivered at Concord, Massachusetts, December 26, 1799, being the day on which Samuel Smith was executed for burglary.” The material was “[p]ublished for the benefit of criminals,” in Boston, by Samuel Hall of Number 53, Cornhill. We note an interesting detail, that the reverend had not been able to resist adding somewhat to his sermon after the fact, along the line of pointing his audience toward the necessity of being constant and faithful church attenders.

Also, for the benefit of criminals, and as a cautionary object for the local children, the gallows on which Smith had been hanged out at the Sleepy Hollow parade ground would be placed on permanent display in the Concord courthouse.³³⁹

YOU HAVE TO ACCEPT EITHER THE REALITY OF TIME OVER THAT OF CHANGE, OR CHANGE OVER TIME — IT’S PARMENIDES, OR HERACLITUS. I HAVE GONE WITH HERACLITUS.

339. This Concord courthouse became the place of public display of the gallows upon which a local house burglar, Samuel Smith, was hung at the end of 1799 — until with this macabre and tasteless display of judicial power it was consumed in the flames of an arsonist in 1849. Here, since we do not have an image of the apparatus upon which the house burglar had been hanged, as a substitute macabre and tasteless display, is an image of the chair that Massachusetts used for its final electrocutions, at Charlestown in 1947, producing the deaths of Edward Gertson and Philip Bellino. The chair is not on display (tastes about this sort of think have obviously changed somewhat), but a photo was taken of it in a storage room at the state prison in Walpole in 1974.

HDT

WHAT?

INDEX

STATE MURDER

MR. RIPLEY'S SERMON,

DELIVERED ON THE DAY OF THE EXECUTION OF

SAMUEL SMITH.

STATE MURDER

LOVE TO OUR NEIGHBOUR EXPLAINED AND URGED

IN A

S E R M O N,

DELIVERED

AT CONCORD, MASSACHUSETTS,

DECEMBER 26, 1799,

Being the Day on which SAMUEL SMITH was executed for Burglary.

By EZRA RIPLEY, A.M.

Minister of Concord.

Published for the Benefit of Criminals.

Printed by SAMUEL HALL, No. 53, Cornhill, BOSTON.
1800.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

MATTHEW xxii. 39.

THOU SHALT LOVE THY NEIGHBOUR AS THYSELF.

THE crime, which is this day to be capitally punished, is a direct violation of the law of love to our neighbour. The words read will not, therefore, it is presumed, be thought unsuitable for the theme of a discourse, on the present very solemn and affecting occasion. They are very concise and simple in expression; but their meaning is great, their contents are weighty and extremely interesting to individuals and to society.

I shall endeavour to show,

First, The true meaning of the law of love to our neighbour in its nature and extent;

Secondly, The reasonableness and obligation of this law; and, then, make improvement by way of inference and application.

First. I am to show the true meaning of the law of love to our neighbour in its nature and extent.

It pleased God to create man in his own moral likeness; to endue him with knowledge to understand the divine character and his own duty; with rectitude of mind and holy principles of action, that he might obey his Maker, and be the object of his complacency. On the understanding and heart of man

STATE MURDER

[6]

man the Lord wrote two comprehensive and unalterable laws, viz. Love to God, and Love to men.—These were to him the rule and covenant of life. Accordingly, Jesus Christ, who taught the will of God in perfection, when this question was put to him, “Which is the great commandment of the law?” answered, “Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the first and great commandment. And the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets.”

Although by the sinful lapse of man our nature is so depraved, that we are prone to transgress, and our moral powers are so debilitated, that we cannot render perfect obedience; and, in boundless compassion, a Saviour is provided, to redeem us from sin and the curse of the law; yet Jesus Christ “came not to destroy the law, but to fulfil it.”* He came not to lower its demands and weaken its obligations, but to obey it perfectly for man; not to excuse any from the duties enjoined, nor to tolerate the least sin, but to exemplify its perfect morals, and aid us in sincere and universal imitation of himself. This law, therefore, is now our rule of life. Sincere obedience to it is a service most reasonable, useful, and necessary.

Love is one of the primary affections of the mind, and always inclines us to will and to do whatever appears to be right and good. It is the opposite of hatred, which invariably prompts to sin, unless it be directed against sin itself. Love to God exhibits itself in reverence and worship, admiration and praise, obedience and gratitude, confidence and trust. When this affection is in proper exercise, and the divine character is rightly apprehended, it becomes compla-

* Matth. v. 17.

cency,

STATE MURDER

[7]

ency, and is productive of joy and delight. Love to our neighbour expresses itself in good will and kindness, truth and justice, righteousness and charity. And when real amiableness of character is perceived, love surpasses the ordinary bounds of benevolence, and is refined into complacency, the result of which is harmony and happiness.

Let us now attend particularly to the second table of the law, love to our neighbour, which enjoins all relative and social duties, and prohibits all the contrary vices. These precepts, which are six in number, and begin with the fifth in the decalogue, have respect to all stations and relations in life, and extend as well to the desires of the heart, as to the outward actions. The first enjoins on children all due honour and obedience towards their parents; and with equal reason, on parents, all proper affection and care towards children. It requires all suitable respect to superiors, kindness to equals, and condescension to inferiors, and prohibits every sentiment and action inconsistent with these virtues. The second is, Thou shalt not kill; and forbids every disposition and action, which tends to injure the life and health of our neighbour, with all hatred, malice, and revenge; and requires a sincere desire and endeavour to preserve his life and health, and to promote his happiness. The third prohibits the violation of the marriage covenant and every kind and degree of lewdness, and requires chastity in heart, speech, and behaviour. The fourth is, Thou shalt not steal. By this command, all theft, burglary, robbery, fraud, counterfeiting the currency and legal writings, and whatever tends unjustly to deprive our neighbour of his property, is absolutely prohibited; and the opposite virtues, by parity of reason and full implication, are are strictly commanded. The fifth utterly forbids all perjury, lying, falsehood, and prevarication ; and implicitly enjoins on every man, to speak the truth to his neighbour in conversation and in witness bearing, whether he speak without or under the obligation of an oath. The sixth aims directly at the heart. It forbids coveting the property and enjoyments of our neighbour ; and implies that we be contented with such things as we have by the allotments of Providence, and can procure by honest industry. The coveting, which is a violation of the divine law of love to our neighbour, is an earnest desire to possess and enjoy the possessions and comforts of other people, without regard to equity and justice. To covet in this sense is sinful ; and it prompts to unrighteous measures to obtain the things coveted. It induces deception, fraud, stealing, and the most atrocious crimes. Thus, to covet is the corrupt fountain whence flow those injurious vices, which frequently scourge individuals and society. This is the bitter root from which spring up fraud, injustice, stealing, robbery, and, sometimes, murder. According to the confession of the unhappy convict before us, all his crimes, which have more directly procured prosecutions, prisons, punishments (and I may add, the gallows) may be traced to this secret, fruitful, and corrupt source. There is a sense in which it is virtuous to covet, viz. to “ covet earnestly the best gifts.” We may ardently desire to excel in goodness and usefulness, and for this purpose, to be distinguished by endowments. But this desire having for its objects spiritual things and the benefit of men, is the very opposite in its nature and effects to that sinful lusting, or coveting, after evil things, and things to which we have no just right.

STATE MURDER

[8]

That

STATE MURDER

[9]

That such, as above stated, is the true meaning of love to our neighbour, is evident from a great number of passages in the sacred scriptures. To cite one only may be sufficient to our present purpose.—“ Render therefore to all their dues ; tribute to whom tribute is due, custom to whom custom, fear to whom fear, honour to whom honour. Owe no man any thing, but to love one another : for he that loveth another hath fulfilled the law. For this, Thou shalt not kill, Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not bear false witness, Thou shalt not covet ; and if there be any other commandment (that is, enjoining relative duties) it is briefly comprehended in this saying, viz. Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.”*

The sense of the text will be more perspicuous, whilst we attend to the nature of love. It is a true character given in scripture of the Deity, that he “ is a God of peace, and not of confusion :” and a more perfect one, when it is said, “ God is love.” Hence all moral duty, all religion, which is designed to make men good, holy, and happy like God, is summed up in love. The moral law is a transcript of the divine mind, and consists summarily in love to God and love to men. According to this statement, it is evident that love to our neighbour is of the same nature and kind, as the love of God to men. He hath for men a love of benevolence and a love of complacency, which he expresses, as they are by moral character qualified to receive.

I will now distinctly consider love to our neighbour in both these operations.

The love of benevolence intends a disposition to do good to our neighbour, and an actual exhibition of the inward purpose. There must be both the willing

B

* Rom. xiii. 7, 8, 9.

mind

STATE MURDER

[10]

mind and the actual performance of good deeds. True benevolence is therefore totally opposed to all hatred, violence, injustice, and unkindness in disposition and behaviour. "Love worketh no ill to his neighbour."* Nor must this exercise of benevolence be the result merely of a casually unruffled state of the passions, nor be limited by particular occasions and circumstances; but it must be the prevailing bias and the habitual frame of the mind and heart. Neither is it dependent on the temper and treatment of others; but it is the most prominent and permanent feature of the soul towards our neighbour, which both really and apparently includes and gives complexion and life to all the other features. A person truly benevolent would feel a disposition to do good and to make his fellow creatures happy, though not one of them were disposed to receive his kindness, or to be grateful for his favours. In this, as he ought, he resembles God, who causeth his sun to rise and his rain to fall, as well on the evil, as on the good, as well on the ungrateful, as on the thankful. Otherwise, the benevolence of a person would be measured by the worthiness or unworthiness of the objects. In this case, multitudes would not have the least benevolence shown them, for they are wholly unworthy.

But as one perfection of God cannot be in such a sense infinite, as to infringe on any one other perfection, so neither does christian benevolence interfere with the proper exercise of justice, even when it inflicts pain and punishment. Love to others, to society, to ourselves, may require us, in a due course of law, to abridge the natural and civil liberty of individuals, to inflict punishment on offenders, and even to take away the life of malefactors, whose abuse of liberty, vicious conduct, and continuance in life are dangerous

* Rom. xiii. 10.

STATE MURDER

[11]

dangerous to the peace and happiness of individuals and the community. The law of love commands, and government is obliged, as far as possible, to preserve the peace and order of society, and the quiet possession of life, liberty, and property to individuals. Persons the most humane and benevolent, are, sometimes, constrained by the law, by a sense of duty, of justice, and benevolence to punish offenders, for whom they have pity and compassion, and whom they would joyfully relieve, could they do it in consistence with equity and fidelity. Love to society, to the great body of the people, frequently requires the execution of justice on individuals in pains and penalties. From this view it is evident that the love of benevolence due to our neighbour, is of the same nature with the disposition and moral character of God, who is infinite in benevolence.

The love we owe to our fellow-men resembles that of Deity in another respect, viz. in distinguishing between the objects of kindness and the objects of complacency. And it is only when love is considered, as complacency, that it is limited by the character of the persons loved. To this operation of love I will briefly speak.

Love becomes complacency only when the object is possessed of good and amiable moral qualities. As God, who scatters blessings on the evil and the good, hath complacency only in the good; so christians, however affectionate and charitable they may be, can have complacency only in the virtuous and good, who are possessed of such amiable qualities, as answer to their ideas of moral beauty. There is no religious harmony between the virtuous and vicious, though the latter as well as the former may possess many agreeable qualifications. Natural and acquired accomplishments accomplishments may engage our natural affections and give us real satisfaction, as social beings : but without moral goodness there can be no religious complacency and mutual delight. "For what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness ? and what communion hath light with darkness ? and what concord hath Christ with Belial ? or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel ? and what agreement hath the temple of God with idols ?" We are liable, however, through ignorance and error in judgment, to withhold our complacency from some to whom it is due, and to bestow it on others really unworthy.

STATE MURDER

[12]

The qualifying words in our text, as thyself, are designed to express the quality, rather than the degree of love. To love our neighbour as ourselves, is, to exercise towards him the same kind of tender affection, benevolent disposition, and friendly care, which we do for ourselves. This construction answers all the purposes, and preserves the force and perfection, of the precept, without involving any absurdity, or discouraging human exertions. Some persons, perhaps, may love some other, as much, as they do themselves, in some respects at least : but this sense is not enjoined, I conceive, as the rule and measure for all men. The same kind of attention, care, and endeavour, which we generally have for our own person, character, interest, and happiness being exercised towards our neighbour, is to love him as ourselves. In this light I understand the precept.

The extent of this law under consideration next demands attention.

Our blessed Saviour hath taught us by the story of the man, who fell among thieves, that we are to look upon all men as our neighbours, and especially, when when we have any concerns with them, and opportunity to show them kindness. Our Lord, on having this question put to him, "Who is my neighbour ?" answered, "A certain man went down from Jerusalem to Jericho, and fell among thieves, which stripped him of his raiment, and wounded him, and departed, leaving him half dead. And by chance, there came down a certain priest that way ; and when he saw him, he passed by on the other side. And likewise a Levite, when he was at the place, came and looked on him, and passed by on the other side. But a certain Samaritan, as he journeyed, came where he was ; and when he saw him, he had compassion on him, and went to him, and bound up his wounds, pouring in oil and wine, and set him on his own beast, and brought him to an inn, and took care of him. And on the morrow, when he departed, he took out two pence, and gave them to the host, and said unto him, Take care of him, and whatsoever thou spendest more, when I come again, I will repay thee. Which now of these three, thinkest thou, was neighbour to him that fell among the thieves ? And he said, he that shewed mercy on him. Then said Jesus unto him, go, and do thou likewise."* It is worthy notice, that the unfortunate man was a Jew ; the priest and Levite, who neglected him, were of the same nation ; but the real neighbour was a Samaritan ; and such alienation and enmity subsisted between the Jews and Samaritans, that the former had no dealings with the latter. It is here clearly set forth, that we are to consider all men as our neighbours, and that we are bound by the law of love, to aid and relieve the necessitous, whenever we have opportunity and ability.

STATE MURDER

[13]

All this is perfectly consistent with self-defence,

* Luke x. 30, &c.

and

STATE MURDER

[14]

and even taking the life of an enemy, when he will not cease to behave inimically on easier terms. I speak here only of public enemies and private assassins and robbers, who threaten, or endeavour, to destroy life. Ordinary personal enemies should be the objects of our love of benevolence. Our Lord commands, "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use you and persecute you." If we love our friends only, what reward have we? Do not even publicans and sinners the same?

Our affection may be proportioned to the nearness and dearness of relations. But I will not enlarge on this idea. One observation farther ought not to be omitted. It is the command of Christ, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye the same unto them." In this precept, there is no exception of persons or characters. Whatsoever ye would, or could, in reason and propriety, desire men to do unto you, in present, or change of, circumstances, that do ye unto them; that is the rule of your duty, the measure of your conduct towards them.

Should a transgressor of the useful and necessary laws of society, suffering punishment for evil doing, say, I would that men take no cognizance of my crimes, or that they release me from prison, and excuse me from punishment, it would be altogether unreasonable. The offender ought to query thus, Would I, that men should do unto me and mine, as I have done unto them and theirs? Would I, that they should follow such pernicious practices to my detriment, as I have followed to their injury? And were I in their place and they in mine, would I, or could I, in reason and justice, release them from prison and punishment, and suffer them to pursue their vile and mischievous

STATE MURDER

[15]

mischievous career without interruption? Such queries properly made and answered, are sufficient to silence the complaint of oppression to sufferers for evil doing, and to suppress, in criminals under punishment, that spirit of hatred and revenge against government and people, which they too frequently indulge and exhibit. Their revenge should turn upon themselves and their own evil practices, and not on society, which is obliged in self-defence, and in love to others, to discipline them by the civil law, "which is made, not for a righteous man, but for the lawless and disobedient."*

There are two essential properties of love, viz. sincerity and impartiality, which merit some attention in this place. But they are so far obviously implied in the preceding, and I have already been lengthy in explanation, that barely to mention them must suffice. I proceed

Secondly, To show the reasonableness and obligation of the law of love to our neighbour.

The reasonableness of this law appears in its adaptation to the nature, powers, condition, and exigencies of man. "God hath made of one blood all nations of men, for to dwell on the face of the earth;" and hath given to all the same general nature and destination, the same wants and obligations. We are all members of the same great family, and are necessarily connected by mutual desires, attachments, and wants. Our intellectual powers, social faculties, and animal propensities, our condition in the world, our dependence on each other, and our exigencies, being in general the same, it is most fit and reasonable that we be under the obligation of the law of good-will and kindness, of reciprocal affection and aid; and this law is properly expressed by the words, benevo-

* 1 Tim. i. 9.

lence,

STATE MURDER

[16]

lence, love, charity. Our nature and condition in this life demand, and our rational and social faculties dictate, mutual expressions of love and kindness. All the understanding of man, and all the reason and fitness of things, require, approve, and urge this divine law of love to our neighbour.

The vast benefit, which results from the exercise of love, and the destructive evils, which follow the opposite, farther prove the reasonableness of this law. The happiness to individuals, to families, and to all societies, which is the genuine fruit of love, is beyond all calculation and description. The full exercise of love towards all our relations, society, and the whole family of man, is itself a state of happiness, especially if it be accompanied by love to God. And when love is the principle, the spring, the rule of action in all the members of a family, society, or world, the whole must be most pleased and blest. There would be no discord, jealousies, nor fears; no hatred, malice, nor revenge; no injustice, fraud, nor pilfering, no violence, oppression, nor falsehood; no coveting, discontent, nor repining; no intemperance, lewdness, nor idleness; no disobedience to parents, neglect of children, nor disrespect to constituted authorities. There would be no need of penal laws, prisons, and corporal punishments. Every family, society, and the world, would be a heaven in kind.

But on the other hand, what countless evils, what sin and misery naturally and necessarily flow from the opposite principles and practices, to individuals, to families, and to society! Let us suppose, for a moment, the entire cessation of love, and the full operation of hatred one to another, and of all those corrupt lusts and passions, which spring up in the human heart. Every man would covet, and then steal, or

STATE MURDER

[17]

or violently seize the things of his neighbour. The more artful and mighty would prey upon the more weak and defenceless. Injustice and rapine would be the order of every day; and mutual fears, plots, contentions, violence, and murder, would be only the more conspicuous lines in the horrible portrait. Parents would be against children, and children against parents; husbands and wives would be plagues to each other, and brothers, sisters, connexions, and neighbours, would be mutual tormentors. Even natural affection would cease to operate under the reign of hatred; friendship would be unknown; and people would often become murderers of fathers, of mothers, of children, and deadly enemies to all about them on every trivial occasion. The general consent and practice would be, to bite and devour one another, and the unavoidable consequence would be complicated wretchedness and destruction. Every family, every society, if societies properly speaking could subsist, and the world itself would be a hell in fort, and a lively picture of the infernal regions. Who doth not see the boundless reason of love to our neighbour, and the necessity of it to human happiness and moral excellence!

To what has been said very little need be added, to show the obligation of this law on every one of the human race. Its obligation results from its reasonableness, its utility, the necessity of it to the happiness of men, and to the very existence of social order and civil society, and from the authority of God in the command. We have shown the reasonableness, the utility, and the necessity of such a law; its obligation on us, therefore, is manifest and undeniable. While the nature and condition of man shall be, as they now are, so long we shall be indissolubly bound by the

the

STATE MURDER

[18]

the law of love. In its very nature it is unalterable and perpetual; for the duties required originate in the eternal reason and fitness of things, and in the moral nature, relations, and condition of man. "Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled."* We must, therefore, obey this law of love in the sincerity of our hearts, and look by faith to Jesus Christ, as the end of the law for righteousness, or suffer for ever the penalty, the just punishment of our transgressions.

The obligation of this law appears farther, as it is joined by the authority of the eternal God. It is because, he gave the commands because they were, and are, replete with reason and goodness, most suitable and needful. But whatever God commands, whether be a moral or positive law, is obligatory on us, and the more so, if possible, in proportion to the manifest reason and fitness of the law. I will only add, on this article, they who presume to condemn this authority and disobey this law, must, one day, experience, unless they repent of sin and believe in Christ, what it is to fall under the wrath of God and the curse of this law without remedy or hope.

IMPROVEMENT.

1. The allowed transgressors of the law of love to their neighbour, have not the love of God in them, nor his love of complacency towards them: but they are enemies to him by a sinful disposition and by wicked works. "For this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments."† "And if a man say, I love God, and hate his brother, he is a liar; for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?"

Matt. v. 18. Luke xvi. 17. † 1 John, v. 3.

STATE MURDER

[19]

seen?"† There is an inseparable connexion between the two great commandments of the law. Unfeigned obedience to both, according to the gospel, is necessary to prove the renovation of our minds, the goodness of our hearts, and qualification for the blissful presence of God.

2. The transgression of this law renders necessary dreary prisons, pecuniary and corporal punishments in a course of civil law, and occasions vast infelicity and expense to the peaceable and virtuous members of society. Were it not for sins against our neighbour, yon dismal jail would be unnecessary. Those iron doors and bolts might be converted into instruments of agriculture. Idleness and vice, complaints and groans, oaths and imprecations, misery and wretchedness, would there no longer wound our sensibility and pain our hearts. No more would wretched criminals be doomed to smart beneath the painful scourge, nor mount the shameful pillory to bear the public scorn, and in their flesh receive the indelible marks of infamy and vice. The now intended use of yonder fatal gallows might be changed. Instead of a machine to take the precious life, and send a fellow-mortal to the world of spirits, it might be used to shelter, or to warm, the shivering limbs of poor and virtuous families. Instead of all this solemn pomp, this awful scene, this terrible parade of execution, at the sight of which compassion mourns, and pity weeps, each countenance bespeaks deep felt concern, and every nerve perceives unusual tremor; instead, I say, of this new trial of humanity to most of us, we might be quietly in search of sacred truth, or with united hearts and voice, proclaiming praise to God for blessings social, civil, and religious, or, in the private walks of life, engaged in pleasing offices of

† 1 John iv. 20.

STATE MURDER

[20]

of love. O, the happiness of this reverse! And O, how much to be lamented is the want of universal love to neighbours!

3. Love to society joins with self love in punishing the transgressors of this law. We form the social compact, institute civil government, enact laws, authorise judiciary courts, for the great purpose of preserving, in peace and safety, our property, our life, our civil and sacred rights and privileges. By thus entering into the obligations of civil society, we agree most solemnly, to aid and defend each other and the whole body against every one, who shall trespass on society or an individual. We should at once violate all our social and civil obligations, and expose ourselves to rapine and ruin, were we not to rise against the criminal invaders of private and public rights and property. We are bound by love and duty to each individual and the whole community, to support the order of society, and to aid the execution of the laws against the wicked disturbers of private persons and society. In the painful task of inflicting punishment on offenders, we are actuated by love, duty, conscience, and faithfulness; and ill-will, hatred, and revenge, have no part in this business. The same principles, doubtless, actuate government, which is the people by civil constitution. This consideration should prevent the indulgence and even the rising of enmity in the breasts of criminals against the government, the legislature, judicial courts, jurors, and executive officers. The motives, which prompt to punish, are the very opposite to those, which incited to acts of wickedness.

4. They who steal, break up and plunder houses and stores, set fire to buildings, rob travellers, secretly take or destroy the property of others by art or violence, violence, commit murder, or otherwise wilfully endanger the life of another, are in a state of real hostility against society and the individual members of it. They are governed by hatred to their neighbour, and by those base passions, which follow in her train. In the perpetration of the less atrocious of those crimes, their hatred may seem to them, to wear only the appearance of coveting, dishonesty, and injustice; to indulge which they feel strongly inclined. They may even imagine that they harbour no ill-will towards any person, and may in reality be kind to some neighbours,* who are situated near to them, and whose friendship and aid they frequently need. But they know not their own selves. They are deceived by a false colouring. The truth is, they are in heart and life the allowed enemies of society; and a change of local neighbours and circumstances would prove them such in every direction. Not love and goodness, but hatred and injustice reign in them, and have dominion over them. Cupidity, avarice, revenge, or some peculiar circumstances, may be the immediate spur, but the principle is hatred, or, to say the least, the absence of love gives an opening for the operation of the vile and malignant passions.

STATE MURDER

[21]

5. To exercise and cultivate love to our neighbour is of the highest importance. Thus doing, we may be harmonious and happy in all the various stages and circumstances of ordinary life. But in the contrary, we must be miserable in this world and in that which is to come. Without love to our neighbour, we are pests in society, and are prepared for

* Smith repeatedly spoke to me of his neighbourly disposition and actions, and said, it was a comfort to him, to reflect that he had been a kind neighbour.

STATE MURDER

[22]

for the company of demons in the regions of discord, hatred, and misery. A thorough change only can qualify us for a world of love and happiness.

6. It is vastly important that the social duties of love be impressed on the minds of children and youth. Great care should be taken by parents and instructors, to implant the principles of virtue and piety, and to form the dispositions and habits in early life. Thus educated, there is good ground for hope, that they will resist the force of opposite principles and temptations in riper years. Children should be encouraged in every virtuous sentiment and practice. They should be incessantly taught to revere the rights of others, and to realize the obligation of love and goodness.

7. The wilful transgressors of this command to love our neighbour, are, in that character, totally disqualified for heaven and happiness. Their dispositions and habits are opposed to love and holiness.— They have no moral taste for intellectual and religious exercises and enjoyments. It is true, they may desire happiness and dread misery. This is natural. But the bias of the mind, and the prevailing tendency of the soul, are inconsistent with the pure joys and holy employments of heaven. Being under the influence of vicious passions and habits, they must of necessity be miserable. And were they to be introduced to the immediate presence of God, and the company of saints and angels, they would feel the horrors and pains of hell: for heaven and hell consist principally in character and condition, and in the enjoyments and torments thence naturally resulting. A wicked mind, having all the passions and propensities raging, but without desired gratification, must necessarily be in misery. But on the other hand, persons persons in the full exercise of love and goodness must infallibly be pleased and happy. How, then, can the wicked and unholy, who love not their Maker and fellow men, escape the wrath to come? There is one only method, viz. repentance towards God and faith in Jesus Christ. They must so repent of all sin, as to forsake and hate moral evil, and thoroughly reform; and they must so believe in Jesus Christ, as the Son of God and only Saviour, as cordially to accept what he hath done for sinners, and sincerely conform to his gospel. Christ is the only way of salvation, the only name given under heaven whereby we must be saved. § God is ready to show mercy, to grant pardon, and to give eternal life to those, who sincerely repent of their sins, trust in Christ, and look for salvation through him. Such repentance and faith include a change of heart, a renovation of the whole man, and the restoration of that moral image of God, which was lost by sin. Thus they are qualified to enjoy heaven, while they are pardoned and justified for the sake of the complete atonement and perfect righteousness of Jesus Christ. In this way, all people, who hear the sound of the gospel, who read the Bible, have the offer of salvation from sin and wrath to come. “If any man thirst, let him come; * and whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely. † Jesus Christ is able to save them to the uttermost, that come unto God by him. ‡ He is exalted, a Prince and a Saviour, for to give repentance and forgiveness of sins.” || The chief of sinners, and at the last hour of life, if they sincerely repent, and believe in Christ, shall be accepted of God, and saved in the great day of the Lord.

STATE MURDER

[23]

It

§ Acts iv. 12.

* John vii. 37.

† Rev. xxii. 17.

‡ Heb. vii. 25.

|| Acts v. 31.

STATE MURDER

[24]

It is now proper to make application and addresses. And

1. To you, Samuel Smith, who are this day to suffer the pains of ignominious death, by the hand of civil justice, for aggravated violations of the law of love to your neighbour. Unhappy man! we feel for you the bowels of compassion, and ardent desires for your future salvation. We have aimed to instruct and benefit you, and not to increase your disgrace and wretchedness. We pretend not that your sins are more heinous in the sight of God, than the sins of many others thieves, who have not been convicted of capital offences. And it has been a satisfaction to me and others, to hear you declare with so much evidence of sincerity, that you have never had an intention to take the life of a fellow mortal. But the law, that punishes burglary with death, proceeds on the supposition, that house-breakers for the purpose of stealing, intend to commit murder, if it be found necessary to prevent detection. It may, however, have been more owing to the restraining grace of God and to circumstances, that you have not shed innocent blood, than to your own principles and resolutions.

The disappointments and troubles, which you met with, when young,* and the consequent derangement of your mind and worldly affairs, if your late declarations be true, were powerful temptations, in a mind destitute of religion, to the practice of injustice and stealing: and your sufferings deserved commiseration. But instead of turning to God and submitting to him in the day of adversity, you chose the way of wickedness. And after all that can be said in

* It is thought not expedient to mention particularly the causes of those troubles above suggested.

STATE MURDER

[25]

in your favour, it is evident that you have been a heinous sinner, during many years. This you have readily acknowledged, as also the justice of God in bringing you to legal conviction and punishment. Although, as you say, you have been kind in many instances to some people in your particular neighbourhood, and to your children, as a fond parent, yet your life, for thirty years past, has been a predatory warfare against society and individual families and persons. The law of God condemns you, as a transgressor. But had you lived without any open and gross acts of wickedness forbidden by the moral law, and yet in the neglect of Christ and his gospel, you must be under the sentence of the divine law. "He that believeth on him is not condemned; but he that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed in the name of the only begotten Son of God."* To be condemned by the law of God, as a transgressor, and for rejecting Jesus Christ, and to have that sentence executed at the final judgment, must be infinitely more dreadful, than to be condemned and executed by the laws of society.—Man hath power only to kill the body; but God is able to destroy both soul and body in hell.†

Ministers and other people have affectionately endeavoured to assist you in preparation for another world. With what success, I am not able to say.—The present is the last opportunity you will have for instruction, for repentance, and for reconciliation with God. You are now once more exhorted to repent of all your sins, and urged to fly for refuge to Christ the Saviour. Look on him, whom your sins have pierced, and mourn. Now is the day of salvation, and, I believe, literally the last day of grace and mercy

* John iii. 18. † Matt. x. 28.

STATE MURDER

[26]

mercy to you. Now, then, after so long a time, harden not your heart. †

In the most full and unfeigned manner, confess and forsake your sins, and then you may hope for mercy. "Whoso confesseth and forsaketh his sins shall have mercy." Humbly rely on Christ alone for salvation, and, then, though your sins are of a scarlet colour and a crimson dye, they shall be white as snow and wool. || "He that believeth shall be saved."

Endeavour to pray to God in the name of Christ, if peradventure the thoughts of thine heart and the sins of thy life may be forgiven. Pray that God would create in you a clean heart, and give you a right frame of spirit; and continue to seek him to the last moment of your life, with this resolution, if you perish, it shall be pleading for mercy through the glorious Redeemer.

While you have a heart to pray, to be sorry for sin, to love your neighbour, and look to Christ, you need not despair of salvation. God hath no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but that he repent, and turn, and live. § But to evidence true peace with God, you must be at peace with men. You must forgive to every one, both real and supposed injuries. You have said, people have falsely accused you, and thereby brought on you vexation and expense: but in this case, you must freely forgive them, as you hope for pardon from God. Our Saviour hath declared, "If ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses."* Indulge no hard thoughts towards any persons. O forgive your fellow-men, while you pray God to be merciful unto you a sinner. And now we commit and commend you to God and to the word and power

† Heb. iv. 7. || Isa. i. 18. § Ezek. xviii. 23, 32. * Matt. vi. 15.

STATE MURDER

[27]

power of his grace and mercy in Jesus Christ, praying that you may be eternally a monument of mercy and an heir of glory.

2. Our text furnishes an interesting portion for criminals in general. † Consider, ye transgressors of the law of love to your neighbour, your late wretched companion in wickedness, who has suffered death for his crimes; and be warned by his awful doom, to fly from the wrath to come, and to forsake those paths of vice, which lead to a similar end. Your situation is extremely dangerous and awful. You have hitherto escaped the tremendous scene and pains of execution; and most of you, perhaps, have not committed those crimes, which are made capital by the law. And as you have not had your fears alarmed by the immediate prospect of death and judgment, I have reason to believe that you are careless about your souls and another world. Do you not still put far away the evil day, and neglect to consider your ways? As you have chosen the way of transgressors, and some of you have continued long in opposition to God and men, you are in imminent danger of being forsaken of God, of being hardened in sin, so as to commit more and greater wickedness, and be brought to the gallows. You stand on slippery places, and your feet will slide in due time. ‡ You have been often reprov'd in various ways, and by many persons. Your imprisonment and corporal punishments are constant and sensible admonitions to you, and fully demonstrate to you that, "the way of transgressors is hard." You are now, by this discourse, warned and exhorted to repent, and turn from your evil ways, that iniquity be not your ruin.

Consider,

† This address has been added since the discourse was delivered.

‡ Psal. lxxiii. 13. Deut. xxxii. 35.

STATE MURDER

[25]

Confider, I befeech you, the folemn words of infpiration, "He that, being often reprov'd, hardeneth his neck, fhall fuddenly be deftroy'd, and that without remedy." || O, tremble for yourfelves, left God fhould verify to you this awful threatening, and fuddenly cut you off from the light of life and the hope of heaven !

Were you to love your neighbour as yourfelves, you would never invade, nor fteal, nor deftroy his property. You would no fooner unjuftly deprive him of his poffeffions, than you would utterly deftroy your own ; nor fooner endanger his health, or happinefs, or life, than your own. You are bound to do unto others, whatfoever ye would that they fhould do unto you. Then, "let him that ftole, fteal no more : but rather let him labour, working with his hands the thing which is good, that he may have to give to him that needeth." §

Take heed that you do not increafe your fins and treafure up wrath by indulging hatred and revenge againft fociety and particular perfons. What can they do to preferve their peace and property better, than to confine and punifh you ? Do you think, government wifhes to create unnecessary expenfe and trouble ? or that it delights in your confinement and difgrace ? no ; as it did nothing to provoke your firft offence, fo you are difciplin'd by the law, only to prevent you and others from farther crimes, and to defend the innocent in the quiet enjoyment of life, liberty, and property.

Beware of coveting the things, which belong to other people. "Thou fhalt not covet." Suffer me now, once more, to warn and befeech you, to refolve in the prefence of God, and with prayers for his aiding grace, that henceforth you will induftrioufly follow

|| Prov. xxix. 1. § Eph. iv. 28.

STATE MURDER

[29]

low fome honeft calling, and "be content with fuch things as you have ;" that you will "be diligent in bufinefs, fervent in fpirit, ferving the Lord."

3. Parents and heads of families fhould be religiously attentive to prepare the rifing generation for focial and civil life. Let it be your conftant care, to train them up in the way they fhould go, and then you may confidently hope, they will not depart from it in riper years. Some parents, like pious, but faulty Eli, are too indulgent to their children, and do not feafonably and refolutely refrain them from vicious practices : and many like him alfo, when it is too late, mourn their folly. Some parents err on the other hand, efpecially in refpect to worldly affairs. You fhould be kind and juft to your children, and to young people under your care, as well as ftrict and vigilant over them. You fhould "not be bitter againft them," nor refufe to give, or pay them, in proper time, what is reasonable and juft, "left they be difcouraged," their innocent emulation be cramped, their affections be alienated, and their minds indispos'd to the fteady purfuit of profitable bufinefs. The unhappy criminal before us, has declared to me, in a feeling manner, and with a request, that I would warn parents againft injufice to their children, that the hard treatment of his father,* when he wifhed to fettle in a family ftate, was one great fource of his early trouble, and the principal caufe of his beginning to fteal. Whether we give full credit to this ftory, or not, it is an undoubted truth, that the hardnefs and injufice of parents and mafters towards children and fervants, have very pernicious effects on their minds. Such treatment tends directly

* Smith often fpake of his mother, and always with affection and refpect. He efteem'd her as a kind parent and excellent christian.

STATE MURDER

[30]

ly to counteract a sense of equity, goodness, and love, and to quench every spark of laudable ambition. If you would have those under your care grow up and persevere in the exercise of love to their neighbour, in the full extent of the law of love, you must not only teach them their duty by precepts, but you must set before them a living example. Then shall your hearts be made glad by the wisdom and virtue of your children and charge.

4. Young people are instructed by our discourse. My young friends, you see the shame and wretchedness, which attend on vice, and that "sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death." Be solicitous to shun the paths of sin, for they lead to destruction. Cultivate a lively sense of love to mankind, and ever act on the strictest principles of benevolence, truth, and righteousness to all people. Dread the first step to any scandalous vice, and "abstain from all appearance of evil." Fear God, and keep his commandments, through Jesus Christ, as the only sure and peaceful way to honour, glory, and eternal happiness.

5. Let this numerous assembly make application. Every person is under the obligation of the law of love to God and our neighbour. How have we obeyed this law? Have we loved our neighbour as ourselves? Are not many of us guilty concerning our brother? Let us search and prove our own ways, and resolutely reform whatever we find to be inconsistent with love. Let every one set his face, as a flint, against prevailing vices. Accept the admonition, which this dying criminal hath desired might be given, not to neglect public worship, and the religious observation of the Sabbath.* Such neglect keeps

* Smith had been very faulty in respect to public worship and the Sabbath, which he lamented. He saw that it kept him ignorant and hardened, and gave him opportunity to contrive and perpetrate wickedness.

STATE MURDER

keeps people out of the way of hearing the word of God explained, and of having their duty inculcated upon them. When people forsake the house, profane the day, and neglect the word of God, let them expect that their temptations and their sins will be multiplied, and that God will cast them off forever.

This day, my hearers, for the first time in this town, we see, as to this world, the closing scene of coveting and stealing. God grant there may be none occasion for another of this kind. But if any present should ever meditate the crime of theft with approbation, let him also think of the gallows. The connexion between the crime and the gibbet, is much nearer and more natural, than many suppose. Behold this thief, and tremble at the thought of stealing, which naturally leads on to burglary, robbery, murder, and the gallows. Let sinners see and fear. Let them suppress every injurious passion, and covetous desire, lest they be imperceptibly hurried on to the commission of one crime after another, until swift destruction come upon them. Let us all resolve to embrace, by divine aid, with all our heart, the perfect law of love to God and man.

"Now unto him who is able to keep us from falling, and to present us faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy, be praise and honour forever."

A M E N.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

In this same year in which Denmark Vesey was winning the East-Bay-Street Lottery and receiving enough money to purchase his own manumission from slavery (but not enough money to obtain the freedom of his children),³⁴⁰ Gabriel Prosser (circa 1776-1800) and Jack Bowler were attempting a slave revolt near Richmond, Virginia — and in this year, also, Nat Turner was being born! These three men of 1800, Vesey, Prosser, and Turner, would later come to be regarded as the “Three Generals in the Lord’s Army.”

One group was to attack the prison which was being used as an arsenal, another was to capture the powder house, and another was to attack the city itself. If the citizens would not surrender, the rebels planned to kill all of the whites with the exception of three categories of white people, the three categories being Quakers, Methodists, and Frenchmen. The “General Gabriel” conspiracy of about a thousand slaves to attack Richmond came to light after a severe storm washed out a bridge and caused a suspension of the attack (August 30) and the conspiracy was betrayed by two of the slaves. Governor James Monroe (the future president) ordered in the militia and 16 ringleaders and 19 others were hanged (October 7). Gabriel’s Insurrection would cause white Virginians to support plans to ship black Americans back to Africa.

Here is the Virginia “servile conspiracy” statute under which all the executions would take place:

If any negro or other slaves at any time consult, advise, or conspire to rebel, or make insurrection, or shall plot to conspire the murder of any person or persons whatsoever, every such consulting, plotting, or conspiring, shall be adjudged and deemed felony, and the slave or slaves convicted thereof in manner herein after directed, shall suffer death, and be utterly excluded all benefit of clergy.

— The Statutes at Large of Virginia, from October Session 1792 to December Session 1806

SERVILE INSURRECTION

340. Here’s how this worked. Clearly under American law (everywhere except, perhaps, Louisiana) a slave could not protect property and therefore could own nothing. Vesey’s owner could have seized the winnings of this lottery with or without saying thanks and he would have still been his slave. However, in the real world egregious conduct might lead to a throat slitting or a poisoning — not just everything you can legally do to another human being is always practical. Vesey’s owner accepted the money and made out a manumission document.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

At about the beginning of the new century Henry Sanson, son of Charles-Henri Sanson, succeeded his father as the beheader of Frenchmen. Soon the apparatus the French were employing, previously referred to as “la machine,” or as “la louisette” or “le louison” in honor of its designer, would be being referred to instead as “la guillotine,” in honor of the doctor who had recommended the mercy of death by decapitation for commoners as opposed to what had been more usual, death by torture.

English felony trials of the period lasted on average less than nine minutes, from the presentation of the accused to the court to the judge’s verdict of guilt or innocence. During the opening decade of the 19th Century there would be in England a move to conduct hangings inside the Newgate prison, so they would be away from public view, or just outside that prison’s Debtor’s Door, so as to avoid all the ceremony and all the sensationalism attending the procession to Tyburn, which was felt to be not only bad for the morals of the masses of common people, but also an opportunity for pickpockets and general riotous assembly.

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

For these private hangings at the prison, the condemned person would be hanged just after 8AM after being

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

hurried through their morning devotions, confession and absolution — which might indeed be “short shrift.”

Throughout the 18th Century the day of a person who was to be either hanged or pilloried had begun at Newgate with devotions at 8AM; the procession would assemble in the court of the prison and probably wouldn't leave the gates before 9AM, and the cart wouldn't reach Tyburn before 9.30 or 10.00. If the condemned was a very popular figure and the processional route was packed with onlookers it would take much longer: as much as 3 hours has been recorded. The actual pillorying or hanging likely would take place at about mid-morning, 10.30 or even later.

For example, on Monday, 9 May 1726, when Catherine Hayes had been due to be strangled and burnt (as would be dramatized in William Makepeace Thackeray's novel CATHERINE), the day began with three sodomites, Gabriel Lawrence, William Griffin, and Thomas Wright, being taken along packed streets in a cart to Tyburn where they were suspended on the “triple tree” (Tyburn gallows was a big triangular affair with 3 cross-beams) and hanged at the same time. They had to be left hanging for a minimum of half an hour, for if they were cut down too early and happened to survive, they would have been entitled to walk away free men, having fulfilled their sentence of being hanged). In the meantime, Catherine Hayes was kept tied to her stake awaiting being burned for the murder of her husband. Before the hangman, Richard Arnett, could strangle her with a rope as was customary, the flames had reached his hands and he was forced by the heat to let go of the rope. The spectators were horrified by her screams as she struggled to kick away the burning faggots. They then watched as her eyes melted in their sockets. It required three hours for her body to be reduced to ashes and, in the meantime, three more felons arrived in another cart to be hanged.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Such mass executions as these were quite popular, and the wealthier spectators could afford to sit in the viewing stands specially erected to accommodate them. On this particular occasion, the stands collapsed under the weight of 150 spectators, six of whom were killed.

The IDLE 'PRENTICE Executed at Tyburn.

Proverbs Chap. I. Ver. 27, 28.
When thou seest as discipline, and thy destruction cometh as a whirlwind, when distress cometh upon thee, then thou shalt call upon God, but he will not answer.

CATHERINE, which Thackeray would write under the pseudonym Ikey Solomons, would appear in FRASER'S MAGAZINE, serialized from Volume XIX, Number CXIII (May, 1839) to Volume XXI, Number CXXII (February, 1840). The concluding chapter would describe her execution but would make no mention of the hangings of the sodomites just minutes before; the entire description of Catherine Hayes's execution would be omitted from all subsequent editions of the novel.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1800

Date	Name	Place of execution	Crime
29/01	Mary Connor	Cork (Gallows Green)	Murder
17/03	Mary Thorpe	York Castle	Murder
12/04	Sarah Bailey	York Castle	Forgery
23/04	Sarah Lloyd	Bury St Edmunds	Stealing in a dwelling house
31/07	Ann Mead	Hertford	Murder
23/08	Elizabeth Johnson	York Castle	Uttering forgery
18/10	Mary Lloyd	Boughton (Cheshire)	Forgery

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

May 9, Friday: French forces defeated Austrian forces at Biberach southeast of Stuttgart.

THE LAST WORDS AND DYING CONFESSION OF THE THREE PIRATES, WHO WERE EXECUTED THIS DAY, (MAY 9TH, 1800). Philadelphia: Folwell's Press, 1800

HANGING

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

October 2, Thursday: Nathaniel “Nat” Turner was born in Southampton County, Virginia, near the Great Dismal Swamp in which as an adult he would seek refuge. Nat³⁴¹ was given the name Turner because his mother was a piece of property belonging to a white man named Benjamin Turner, and because under Virginia law the legal standing of the mother of a child determined the legal standing of her child. He emerged from his mother’s womb as the property of this Mr. Turner — but in the end he would find himself being hanged for having committed an act of violence and violation against another human being! He would dictate a confession, but in his confession, despite the fact that his contemporaries acknowledge him to have been an exceedingly intelligent man, he would have difficulty getting this to make any sense at all.

SLAVERY

The Reverend Timothy Dwight visited the Reverend Gideon Hawley on the reservation at Mashpee, Massachusetts.³⁴² In TRAVELS IN NEW ENGLAND AND NEW YORK, published in 1821/1823 in London, the Reverend Dwight, who hadn’t seen Hawley since he had been a teenager, would write that “this gentleman was a most intimate friend of my parents. From his youth he had sustained as amiable and unexceptionable a character as can perhaps be found among uninspired men” (now there’s a lefthanded compliment, if ever there was one).

341. “Nat” = Nathaniel, but should we not use the name taught us by Frederick Douglass?

Otherwise, for consistency, wouldn’t we have to refer to Frederick Douglass and Nathaniel Hawthorne as Dred Douglass and Nat Hawthorne, or perhaps Dred Bailey and Nat Hawthorne? PC-people, here’s something to chew on!

342. The Reverend Dwight was a grandson of the Reverend Jonathan Edwards, under whose instruction the Reverend Hawley had served.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

October 7, Tuesday: In Richmond, Virginia, a piece of the property of Thomas Prosser, known as “Gabriel Prosser,” and 15 other similarly hued pieces of property accused in the conflict with the established order of the city of Richmond at the end of August, were hanged. All the 31 years of his short life, another piece of property, this one known as Nat Turner, would be hearing of these incredible events.

SLAVERY

An undated memo from William M. Berkeley on file among the Letters Received by James Monroe at the Governor’s Office, Record Group 3, Library of Virginia:

Letter Treasurer on the Subject of paying for Negroes executed 1800

To His Excellency

Sir

The sum estimated by the Honorable Legislature as sufficient to discharge the claims for slaves executed being entirely exhausted, and as those claims are and will be greatly increased by the late serious insurrection, permit me to call the attention of your Excellency and the Honorable Board to the subject, and at the same time to solicit you to give me the earliest information, as a claim to a considerable amount has been presented, which I have requested the Gentleman to wait for until I could communicate with your Honorable Board

With sentiments of esteem & respect,

I remain your Humble servt.

W Wm Berkeley

The above is a copy of a letter sent to his Excellency a few days ago

A letter from John Hoomes et al. to Governor James Monroe, no date, that is on file in the same collection:

John Hoomes, George Buckner Daniel Coleman John Baylor Hay Battaile & Reuben Chapman Justices of the peace in the County of Caroline who composed a Court for the trail of Scipio a negro Slave the property of Paul Thilman for Conspiracy and insurrection, We whose names are hereunder written do recommend the said Scipio to his Excellency the Governor as an object of Mercy for the following reasons the Condemned Slave is a Young lad not above 18 or 19 years of Age, he appears to be a very ignorant Lad and lived on the same plantation with Mr. Thilmans man Thornton who it appears enlisted the said Scipio & who no doubt drew him into the Conspiracy

John Baylor

Geo: Buckner

Reuben Chapman

Danl. Coleman

John Hoomes

Hay Battaile

[on reverse] Scipio condemned in Caroline Pardoned Nov. 8 1800

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

An Attestation as to the Valuation of Slaves Sentenced to Death, no date, in this same file:

His Excellency The Governor of Virginia

The following Slaves were tried and sentenced to death in Henrico County & Richmond Hustings Court– their valuations as fixed by the Court, as follows

Jack alias Jack Ditcher belonging to the estate of Wm Bowler decd $400.

Lewis to Dabney Williamson £110

Watt to Thomas Prosser £45

King to Philip N. Nicholas £80

Adam Craig C.C.

Crimes Punishable by Death in England:

Year	Number
1800	150
1837	10

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1801

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1801

Date	Name	Place of execution	Crime
01/04	Hannah Palmer	Warwick	Murder
13/04	Alice Clarke	Denby	Murder
17/04	Elizabeth Burne	Naas	Murder
02/05	Hannah Eastwood	Lancaster Castle	Forgery
23/07	Sussannah Mottershall	Lincoln Castle	Murder
03/08	Ann Baker	Rutland	Killing sheep
07/08	Sarah Claridge	Warwick	Murder

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1802

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1802

Date	Name	Place of execution	Crime
16/03	Mary Voce	Nottingham	Murder
12/04	Maria Davis	Bristol	Murder
12/04	Charlotte Bobbett	Bristol	Murder

➡ January 14, Tuesday: Karl Theodor Anton Maria Freiherr von Dalberg replaced Maximilian Christoph von Rodt as Prince-Bishop of Constance.

➡ January 15, Wednesday: Job, a slave of Mr. Defontaine, was hanged as a “highway robber” for having snatched a liquor bottle away from a drunken sailor.

DRUNKENNESS

➡ January 16, Thursday: Les deux journées, ou Le porteur d’eau, a comédie lyrique by Luigi Cherubini to words of Bouilly, was performed for the initial time, at the Theatre Feydeau, Paris (it was an enormous success with press and public).

➡ January 17, Friday: The Peace of Montluçon pacified La Vendée.

1803

An experiment in magnetism and electricity was performed upon the corpse of George Foster, who had murdered his wife and child by drowning them in the Paddington Canal. This experiment was performed by Professor Giovanni Aldini. The purpose of Professor Aldini’s experiment was to determine whether by galvanic stimulation the “vital powers” of a person recently deceased might be restored. When conductors were applied to the fresh corpse’s ear and rectum, muscular contractions were to be noted, movements giving “almost an appearance of reanimation.” These galvanic experiments continued for seven hours.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

THE MARKET FOR HUMAN BODY PARTS

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1803

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
15/04	Mary Lappidge		Warwick	Uttering forgery
01/08	Martha Chapple		York Castle	Murder
11/08	Sarah Jones	27	Shrewsbury	Murder

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1804

➡ February 8, Wednesday: Typically, in England, a woman would be hanged before a crowd, using a short rope to induce gradual strangulation rather than the sudden snapping of the spinal cord. The Newgate Calendar described the execution of Ann Hurle, 22 years of age, for forgery:

She was brought out of the debtors' door in Newgate at eight o'clock. The mode of execution by the drop having been for the time changed to that of the common gallows, she was put into a cart and drawn to the place of execution, in the widest part of the Old Bailey, where she expiated her offences in penitence and prayer. When the halter was fixed she seemed inclined to speak, but her strength evidently failed, and she was incapable. Her appearance, upon the whole, excited emotions of compassion among the spectators, who at last became so clamorous that the sheriff, in a loud voice, described to them the impropriety of their behavior, after which they were more silent. The cap was then pulled over the face of the sufferer and the cart drawn away. As it was going she gave a faint scream, and for two or three minutes after she was suspended she appeared to be in great agony, moving her hands up and down frequently.

OTHER WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1804

Date	Name	Place of execution	Crime
12/03	Elizabeth Carter	Winchester (Gallows Hill)	Murder
19/03	Elizabeth Largham	Essex	Murder
05/07	Providence Hansard	Newgate	Forgery

➡ July 24, Tuesday: The wife of Asa Martin, in Rehoboth, had hanged herself on Sunday night. "She was deranged."

Holkar of Indore attacked retreating British and Indian forces trying to cross water in their retreat from Kota. An all-day battle ensued.

In Newport, Rhode Island, Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

24 of 7 Mo 1804 / Last first day [Sunday] the 22d of the M our dear friend Nathan Hun appointed the afternoon Meeting at 5 OClock, that the inhabtance of the Town might have an opportunity to whom a general invitation was given; I believe it was a time wherein the cause of truth gained ground among the people present. He was favor'd to declare the Truth for the space of an hour & a quarter in a very living & powerful manner. — many people were much wrought upon by its powerful efficacy in their Minds, being tendered and contrited. It was a tune which I hope may never be erased from the minds of any that were there.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

—Joshua Bradly a Baptist Minister, being informed of the Meeting, he said, he would come & at the conclusion of his own gave his hearers information of ours, & requested them to come as he wished too, & should hold no evening meeting on that Account --He accordingly attended, sat very attentively the whole time, & when the meeting broke up, went in the high seat where Nathan was, took him by the hand, & said he had gained the hearts of many that evening & thought he might by staying longer in the Town do much good, for you see says he the solemnity there is in this Meeting. I have a Meeting house which is at your service, my doors are open to you at any time. he asked him where he lodged & said he must see him again that evening. whether he went on or not I dont know, but the next Morning called on him & gave him letters to his friends in Connecticut to open the way for him to have meetings among them where Nathan was going — Nathan went over the ferry on second day morning in company Sam Rodman Rowland Hazard & David Williams.—

At the aforesaid Meeting the English French & Spanish Consuls were present, & many people of note in the Town — I have not heard of any that were dissatisfied but of many that confessed themselves highly gratified at the opportunity & I hope many of the prejudices which were held against friends will be removed — I must acknowledge for myself, tho' I have attended many great & Momentous meetings, yet never did I attend one that I felt the importance of so much as this. & to my great thankfulness I am given to believe that it begun & ended well to the Glory of God

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1805

 April 13, Saturday: Mary Morgan, a 17-year-old, was hanged at Presteigne in Radnorshire two days after being found guilty of murder (seduced and abandoned by a member of the gentry there, she had disposed of the illegitimate child). Her body was given for dissection (children are now informed in that locality that her lawyer had ridden to London to obtain a reprieve and had returned an hour late).

OTHER WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1805

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
18/03	Ann Heywood		York Castle	Murder of child
25/03	Elizabeth Barber	53	Maidstone (Penenden Heath)	Murder
03/05	Ann Davis (Gordon)		Sussex	Murder of child
12/08	Betty Hulee (Rogers)		Exeter	Murder
13/11	Mary Parnel		Newgate	Forgery

Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

7 day 13 of 4 M 1805 / Last night was spent in Watching with Christs Champlin It was very tedious, he being very ill & requiring close attendance. But it was a time wherein my mind was much instructed: from looking at him in his extream bodily distress, & we are about to lanch [launch] into eternity, & appear before the awful judge of all flesh, the king immortal who reigns in heaven, & receive from him a reward according to our works. —

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1806

➡ According to Jeffrey Weeks's SEX, POLITICS AND SOCIETY (Longman, 1981), during this year in England there were actually more executions for sodomy than for murder.

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1806

Date	Name	Place of execution	Crime
08/04	Sarah Herring	Horsemonger Lane, Surrey	Coining (treason)
19/04	Mary Jackson	Lancaster Castle	Stealing in dwelling house

➡ After a special Mass at the 1st Church in Northampton, celebrated by Cardinal Cheverus, two Irish immigrants, a Dailey and a Haligan, were hanged by the neck until they were dead.

Then they were found to have been innocent — having come here for refuge, they had in effect been murdered in cold blood by local authority.³⁴³

➡ February: In Lenox, Massachusetts, Ephraim Wheeler, a white man, was led, proclaiming his innocence, to the gallows, and hanged for the rape of Betsey Wheeler, his 13-year-old daughter of mixed race. There seems little question of his guilt despite legal difficulties that had prevented his son and his wife from offering confirming testimony against him.

343. Hey, this wouldn't be the last time!

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1807

➡ February 23, Monday: Carl Maria von Weber left Carlsruhe for an extended tour to the west.

At the hanging in London of Elizabeth Godfrey, Owen Haggerty, and John Holloway a pie-seller fell over, spilling his wares and causing a riot in which a number of people in the crowd got trampled to death.

OTHER WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1807

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
January 7	Margaret Cunningham		Edinburgh	Murder of husband
July 31	Martha Aldin	32	Norwich	Murder of husband

At some point during this year, a week after her wedding to the Reverend Henry Ware, Sr., Hollis Professor of Divinity at Harvard College, Mary Otis Lincoln hanged — the reverend professor must have found this exquisitely embarrassing.³⁴⁴ Also:

Date	Sex	Method
March 5, 1786	Male	hanged self
July 5, 1790	Male	hanged self
July 5, 1790	Male	shot self
March 29, 1791	Female	not known
October 11, 1796	Male	cut throat
March 15, 1807	Male	cut throat
April 16, 1807	Male	hanged self

➡ July 31, Friday: Martha Aldin had murdered her husband, and her sentence had been that on “Friday next she should be drawn on a hurdle to the place of execution, there to be hanged by the neck till she was dead, and her body afterwards to be dissected.” Her hanging took place at high noon on Castle Hill, Norwich, before a massive crowd.

Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

6 day 31 of 7th Mo 1807 / Yesterday arrived our Ancient friend J Bringhurst from Philadelphia - as he came up from the packet he called to see me, a few minutes, & this forenoon came & set sometime with me in the shop, I esteem him as a good old man, & his company is pleasant - The day has passed with but little religious thoughtfulness. I can hardly call it carelessness nor

344. For contemporary reactions see Theophilus Parsons (fils), MEMOIR OF THEOPHILUS PARSONS (Boston, 1859, pages 316-18) and a letter from Abigail Adams to Mercy Otis Warren of March 9, 1807 (WARREN-ADAMS LETTERS, Volume 2, page 354).

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

yet carefulness -- After a very pleasant walk round the Hill in company with DR called at CR's where I found E reading the Manuscript Journal of a young man's tour in England by which I found a certain life raised, to which "a death had better be known"

6 day rode with Peter to the meeting House to meet with the School committee, then returned & Peter kindly brought me homeward to the top of Lawtons Hill which was a great help as the day was very hot - on my way home, Stopt at Saml Thurstons & was favor'd with the company of Our excellent friend Mary Mitchell her converstaion was instructing & refreshing to my mind I love her much, remembering her visits to my beloved Aunt Marthas when I was a small boy & lived with her - on my return home found my shop & little property all Safe for which I desire to be thankful, & hope I shall be endabled to return thanks in the proper way, which is increased dedication to the Service of my God - In the evening made a precious call at C R, & another at J Earls, where I found AA & fell into unexpected conversation with her - tho' I manifested rather too much Zeal in support of my own opinion yet I firmly believe I had the right side of the question

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1808

Establishment, in England, of the SDKPD.³⁴⁵ Friend William Allen, a Quaker philanthropist (not the same person as the William Allen of Concord, Massachusetts), was a co-founder of this new anti-hanging group, and Friend Peter Bedford and Friend Samuel Hoare and Friend Luke Howard were among its leaders.

Friend Luke wrote A BRIEF APOLOGY FOR QUAKERISM, INSCRIBED TO THE EDINBURGH REVIEWERS (London, printed for the author, and sold by Darton & Harvey, Gracechurch-Street; Longman & Co. Paternoster-Row; and J. Hatchard, Piccadilly). This was a graceful reply to "a production of your own, now of several months standing, in which the peculiarities of the Friends are censured in a manner which convinces me that your writer has not well understood them."

"It is quite plain to us," adds he, "that their founder George Fox was exceedingly insane!" Gentle reader, is this criticism?

...

But our critic suspects, that when Fox dwelt in a hollow tree, in the vale of Beavor, he taught sublime absurdities; and I suspect, that when he himself shall have learned in what liberal criticism consists, he will be sensible of an absurdity, not very sublime, in the employment of such methods to deprecate Fox's character and doctrines. It will be to the purpose to produce here a passage in Fox's Journal, which appears to have furnished this innuendo. "I fasted much, walked abroad in solitary places many days; and often took my Bible, and sat in hollow trees and lonesome places till night came on." Pa. 6, Edit. 1765. Such retirements, for private devout meditation and prayer, were the common practice of the age; the most prominent feature of which was, that zeal and fervour in religion now called enthusiasm.

HOWARD PUBLICATIONS

345. Don't try to pronounce this at home. The Society for the Diffusion of Knowledge upon the Punishment of Death and the Improvement of Prison Discipline would oppose the hanging of convicts for any crime other than premeditated murder. Eventually, in 1969, even that sort of retribution, a life for a life, would be eliminated from England as barbaric.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1808

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
10/02	Barbara Malcolm		Edinburgh	Murder of child
28/03	Sarah Pugh		Hereford	Murder
09/04	Mary Chandler	19	Lancaster Castle	Stealing in dwelling house

 January 1, Friday: “Mounseer Nongtonpow,” a poem expanding upon a Charles Dibdin song, published by the publishing firm of William Godwin (M.J. Godwin) and illustrated by a Godwin protégé William Mulready, that some once supposed to have been authored by that publisher’s child Mary Godwin Wollstonecraft.

Herman Willem Daendels, appointed as governor by the French-controlled Dutch government, arrived in the Dutch East Indies.

The Code Napoléon went into effect in Spain and Holland.

Princess Elisa of Lucca reduced her court orchestra to a string quartet which included Nicolò Paganini and his brother.

Sierra Leone was made a British Crown Colony.

As of this day it supposedly became impossible legally, sort of, to import any more slaves into the United States of America.³⁴⁶

346. You will notice the manner in which Section 9 of the US Constitution is persistently misrepresented in our history textbooks. Where Section 9 explicitly prohibits the new federal Congress from restricting the international slave trade before 1808, saying that “The migration or importation of such persons as any of the states now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year one thousand eight hundred and eight” our popular historians gloss this in our high schools as a victory for human liberty. This was instead a sop that had been thrown to the American enslavers. It categorically prevented the new federal government from interfering with their resupply of slaves prior to 1808 no matter how many votes there came to be, by decent and honorable Representatives, to duly restrict such an insidious traffic. Our popular historians present this concession to slavery, falsely, as if it were a 1787 declaration that as of 1808 the international trade in slaves was constitutionally declared to be outlawed. A built-in protection for slavery has been portrayed falsely in scholarly loose talk as an assault upon it. Yes, the federal congress did indeed in 1807 enact legislation making engaging in the international slave trade be a capital offense. However, we must take into account the fact that 1.) many slaveholders voted in favor of this new legislative approach, the fundamental economic motivation for this being that this legislation interfered with the international trade by others to the advantage of the national trade by themselves. This increased the value of the new crops of human property which they were themselves raising on their plantations, for sale within the nation. We must also take into account the fact that 2.) although the new legislation defined the offense as piracy, a capital offense calling for hanging, it also created a series of five loopholes through which almost anyone captured in the trade might expect always to escape unscathed. In other words, the hanging part of it was a straightforward sham. In fact between 1807 and 1861 not a single culprit “pirate” would get hanged! In 1862 one such bold “pirate” would be hanged — exactly one such criminal in the entire history of this legislation — but if you examine this one case, you will see that what he would be hanged for in 1862 was the crime of pride, in that he had neglected to make available to himself any one of these five built-in loopholes.

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

(Please note: in this assertion, the words “impossible” and “legally” entirely alter each other’s implications.)

Although importation of slaves into the United States was banned by this act which Congress –becoming for the first time enabled to overcome the constitutional restriction– had passed in 1807, making slave import into a capital crime, some 250,000 additional enslaved persons would be illegally imported between this year and 1860. Although nowadays we congratulate ourselves by paying extraordinary attention to the “success stories,” the sad fact is that the combined total of escapes (vanishingly few, mostly of unattached young males of the border states) and manumissions (vanishingly few) would come nowhere close to making a dent in such a rate of continuing “recruitment.”

“There has never been a document of culture, which is not simultaneously one of barbarism.”

– Walter Benjamin's THESES ON THE PHILOSOPHY OF HISTORY (1955)

»Es ist niemals ein Dokument der Kultur, ohne zugleich ein solches der Barbarei zu sein.«

– THESEN ÜBER DEN BEGRIFF DER GESCHICHTE (1940)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Although this international slave trade had been made a capital crime, nobody would hang for such a crime for a long, long time. There were too many too carefully built-in escape clauses. In fact, only one unfortunate would ever be hanged, and the hood would not be pulled over the head of this slave importer until the Year of Our Lord 1862!

THE MIDDLE PASSAGE

During this year the Reverend Absalom Jones would be proposing, to his African Episcopal congregation in Philadelphia, that all Americans should celebrate an annual holiday of Thanksgiving. This former slave would propose January 1st as the annual date of this Thanksgiving, it being the date on which the further importation of slaves into the US had at least ostensibly been made a federal capital crime. (Execute that turkey!)

Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal about electricity:

6th day 1st of 1st M 1808 / The year commences but poorly as to the inward condition of my mind. if there was but a living up to the light afforded, there would not be those secret condemnations which I allmost continually feel – This evening curiosity lead me to an house, to try the curious effect of electricity. I received Several Shocks for the first time in my life – Set a little while with my H the latter part of the evening –³⁴⁷

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

BETWEEN ANY TWO MOMENTS ARE AN INFINITE NUMBER OF MOMENTS, AND BETWEEN THESE OTHER MOMENTS LIKEWISE AN INFINITE NUMBER, THERE BEING NO ATOMIC MOMENT JUST AS THERE IS NO ATOMIC POINT ALONG A LINE. MOMENTS ARE THEREFORE FIGMENTS. THE PRESENT MOMENT IS A MOMENT AND AS SUCH IS A FIGMENT, A FLIGHT OF THE IMAGINATION TO WHICH NOTHING REAL CORRESPONDS. SINCE PAST

347. Stephen Wanton Gould Diary, 1807-1812: The Gould family papers are stored under control number 2033 at the Division of Rare and Manuscript Collections of Cornell University Library, Box 6 Folder 9 for July 24, 1807-April 30, 1809; also on microfilm, see Series 7

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

MOMENTS HAVE PASSED OUT OF EXISTENCE AND FUTURE MOMENTS
HAVE YET TO ARRIVE, WE NOTE THAT THE PRESENT MOMENT IS ALL
THAT EVER EXISTS — AND YET THE PRESENT MOMENT BEING A MOMENT IS A FIGMENT TO WHICH NOTHING IN REALITY CORRESPONDS.

 October 3, Monday: Seven men involved in royalist organizations to overthrow the Emperor Napoléon were executed.

Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

2 day 3rd of 10th M / This Afternoon the committee from the Directors of the Afffrican Benevolent Society met & agree'd to open a School under the Tuition of Arthur Flag Junr - Our neighbor Venson & wife spent the Afternoon & took tea with us

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

 October 11, Tuesday: François-Noël Prigent, who had led the royalist organizations working to overthrow the Emperor Napoléon, was executed by firing squad.

The 9,000 Spanish troops brought from Denmark reached Santander aboard British ships.

Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

3rd day 11 of 10 M / This day my mind hath been severly beset with Satan, but have found a Stronger than he Striving against him & if satan prevails the fault will be my own

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

 October 12, Wednesday: The Convention of Erfurt was signed by France and Russia. Russia would be allowed to occupy Moldavia, Wallachia, and Finland. France would remain neutral in any war between Russia and Turkey. The Emperor Alyeksandr would allow the Emperor Napoléon a free hand in Spain, and allied Russia with France in any war against Austria.

Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

4th day 12 of 10 M / I have again found that satan hath renewed his attack, he hath stirred up Anger that worst of Passions, so that I have still the thorn in the flesh

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1809

➡ August 18, Friday: Susan Grant was the 3d and final British woman to be executed for coining during the 19th Century.

FINAL EXECUTIONS
March 18, 1789	Christian or Catherine Murphy	hanged and then incinerated at the stake in front of Newgate Prison in England for having coined false money
August 18, 1809	Susan Grant	final British woman to be executed for coining during the 19th Century
November 7, 1817	Jeremiah Brandreth, Isaac Ludlam, and William Turner	beheaded by ax in England for Luddite activities

OTHER WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1809

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
22/02	Mary Barrington		Newgate	Personate
20/03	Mary Bateman "The Yorkshire Witch"	41	York Castle	Murder

Tsar Alyeksandr of Russia decreed that higher ranks of state service be attainable only by university study or examination.

The French government of Spain dissolved all religious orders.

Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

6th day 18 of 8th Mo// The mind again this Afternoon in a feeling State for which I desire to be thankful - Recd a letter from L Clarke giving a circumstantial account of the progress of our friends E Griffin & H Field in Narragansett & that the probability is that they have an appointed meeting this day at New London --

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

October 23, Monday: George Gordon, Lord Byron and Hobhouse left Tepeleni and arrived in Locavo.

A young German named Stapps attempted to stab the Emperor Napoléon but was intercepted by the emperor's aide, General Rapp (the man would be offered clemency by Napoléon in return for an apology but would refuse and be executed).

Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

2nd day 23 of 10 M 1809// This mornng My dear Mother related to me her feelings for sometime perhaps two years past, about society [the Society of Friends] particularly when she has been at meeting, & as she told me was much affected & wept She said that many times & almost allways when she went to meeting, she felt desolation so to prevade her mind, that she has frequently shed tears, & looked about & said to herself - where is the weight, surely we are in a very desolate condition, & what will become of us - when she told me my mind was much affected & desires were raised that I might be one that should put forth a hand to help in raising the Standard among us - She also added that yesterday she had the best meeting she had had in a long time. - In the eveng met with the Directors of the AFrican Benevolent Society at Wm Pattens

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1810

According to Jeffrey Weeks's SEX, POLITICS AND SOCIETY (Longman, 1981), during this year in England four out of five men convicted of sodomy were hanged.

Rictor Norton has pointed out in an Email message that the abolition of public execution in England at this point may have had more to do with the preservation of public order for the purposes of government than it ever had to do with compassion for criminals being executed, or for that matter with Friend William Allen's and Friend Luke Howard's Society for the Diffusion of Knowledge upon the Punishment of Death and the Improvement of Prison Discipline which had been created in 1808. He alleges that on the English scene at least, public executions were abolished in order to ensure that the revolutionary mob would not get out of control and pursue their republican interests by going on to destroy property and the crown.

He points out that it was Edmund Burke who identified the English mob with the mobs in Revolutionary France, who led in the making of statements in Parliament about the necessity of abolishing the pillory.

Fear of mob hysteria therefore was the overriding factor in abolishing public hangings and the pillory. Granted, sometimes this was clothed in the discourse of humanity towards the victims, but usually the argument we find being advanced was that such public events "brutalized the people," a phrase that he claims did not at all mean that it brutalized the minds of the better sort of citizens, but rather that it allowed and encouraged the expression of the brutish sort of people, the mainly lower-class populace who were both anti-social and anti-government. In this year at the pillorying of the Vere Street Coterie, he points out, the mob overpowered the 100 officers of the law in attendance who vainly strived to protect the men in the pillory, and what this event provoked was discussion about the dangers to society of public pillorying. The pillory would finally be abolished a generation later, mainly due to fears that the destructive power of the mob could not be controlled by the forces of law and order.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Public executions and public pilloryings, Norton summarizes, weren't abolished in England "because the public at large were developing more compassionate or humane sensibilities," but for quite the opposite reason: because "the mob were becoming more bloodthirsty."

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1810

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
12/03	Rebecca Blundell		Winchester	Murder of child
24/03	Jane Curran		Winchester	Forgery
07/04	Francis Thompson		York Castle	Uttering
13/06	Melinder Mapson		Newgate	Robbery from dwelling house
22/08	Mary Costigan		Tipperary	Murder
13/08	Betty Amphlett	21	Gloucester	Murder
17/09	Eleanor Grant		Tipperary	Murder

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1811

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1811

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
12/08	Jane Cox	31	Exeter	Murder of child
30/03	Eleanor Shiel		Tipperary	Child Murder

 December 26, Thursday: Governor Major-General Alexander Beatson had restored order on St. Helena, after about 250 soldiers had staged a Christmas Eve holiday-spirits mutiny in protest of liquor rationing. On or by this day 6 of their members, identified as ringleaders, had been hanged.

DRUNKENNESS

In a theater of Richmond, Virginia, a fire killed 5 black Americans, and 68 white Americans of whom many were from prominent local families.

Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

5th day 26th of 12 M 1811// I walked towards Portsmouth to attend our Moy [Monthly] Meeting. Rich'd Mitchell kindly gave me a ride of about 3 Miles on my way to Meeting his Sleigh, in going over one bank we over Set but neither of us was hurt. Our Meeting was small. The Womens side of the house counted but seven & them very young Women, I suppose neither of them over 30 years of life: -Ours was large in Number, perhaps 40 of 50 - Peter Lawton was Clerk & for the first time I was assistant & succeeded beyond my expectations -After meeting I rode with R Mitchell to his house & dined & after dinner a part of the way home with D Buffum in his sleigh which eased me of my journey exceedingly for if I had not have been assisted in this way it is not probable I should been able to have got home the same day. & tho' as it was my limbs were much fatigued, yet I was glad I went, for had I had not the Books & papers of neither meeting would have been there -Jonathon Dennis the two D Buffums, little Wm Chase & myself were all that were there from Newport. The Snow Banks were formidable indeed some I walked over that I doubt not were 15 feet high.

A sorrowful affair was related to me in Portsmouth It appears that about 7 an hour before sun set in the Storm the day before yesterday Joseph Cundel went out of his Mill & has not yet been seen or heard from Yet. they have been searching the Mill dam today & cannot find him whether he was suffocated in the snow drown'd in the Mill dam & got into the Sea is Yet undetermined, but there is no prospect of ever finding him alive.

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1812

➡ A bill against the Luddites proposed capital punishment for frame-breaking. George Gordon, Lord Byron's maiden speech in the House of Lords would be in opposition to such barbarity.

COLDBLOODED MURDER

WOMEN³⁴⁸ HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1812

Date	Name	Place of execution	Crime
23/03	Elizabeth Smith	Ipswich	Murder of daughter
13/06	Hannah Smith	Lancaster Castle	Riot
12/08	Catherine Foster	Newgate	Making false oath

➡ John O'Mic was hanged in the Cleveland Public Square for murdering two fur trappers.

➡ February 27, Thursday: George Gordon, Lord Byron's maiden speech at the House of Lords was in opposition to a proposal to impose capital punishment upon Luddites found guilty of frame-breaking.

LORD BYRON'S SPEECH

Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

5th day 27 of 2 Mo// Our Moy [Monthly] Meeting is this day held at Portsmouth, I would have been glad to have gone, but such is the situation of my dear H that at present I feel most easy not to leave her long at a time. — Those who attended the meeting say they had a pretty good time, but suffered much with the cold in going & coming.

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

348. Please understand that I am limiting myself to the hanging of women and girls in England not because it is more of an atrocity to hang a person who has a vagina than a person who has a penis, and not because what goes on in England is super relevant, but because this defined subset of the available data can be used to indicate the nature of that superset of data — and because if I were to consider as well all of the hundreds of men and boys who were suffering this fate, my page would become unreadable.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

April 9, Thursday: At 9:30AM José Antonio Aponte and other leaders of an uprising of blacks in Cuba were hanged. His head in an iron cage would be placed on display in front of the home in which he had lived (heads of these other leaders would also be variously posed).

THE MARKET FOR HUMAN BODY PARTS

Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

5th day 8 [sic] of 4 M // Our meeting was silent & I thought my mind was favor'd to partake of quiet, altho' some weakening things obtruded - this Afternoon, brought into serious thoughtfulness & feelings on various subjects especially the necessity of a preparation for the final chance - & the uncertainty of time. -

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

May: In this month in which Britain's Prime Minister Percival was shot dead by a bankrupt citizen, there was a food riot in Nottinghamshire and 2,000 additional British soldiers were sent to augment the about 2,600 who had already been dispatched to the district to quell this Luddite disturbance. In Lancashire/Cheshire, 6,900 soldiers were being stationed while a manufacturer was being attacked, ten Luddites were being hanged, 38 were being sentenced to be transported, and 18 were being sentenced to imprisonment. In Yorkshire, 4,000 soldiers were being stationed while there were arms raids and robberies by the Luddites.

Another expression of a Luddistic kind, also contemporary with the Luddites, was Romanticism, beginning with William Blake and William Wordsworth and George Gordon, Lord Byron particularly, who like the machine-breakers were repulsed by the Satanic mills and the getting-and-spending of the past. (The identity was so immediate for Byron at least that at one point he was even moved to write, "Down with all kings but King Ludd!") This Romanticism, and particularly its attachment to an unspoiled, machine-free nature, was echoed across the Atlantic by Nathaniel Hawthorne, Edgar Allan Poe, and Herman Melville, among literary lions, and notably by Waldo Emerson and Henry David Thoreau and their great heir, John Muir. Muir, one feels, would have been a Luddite given half the chance, and there is in his tirades against the developers of the West - "These Temple destroyers, devotees of ravaging commercialism, seem to have a perfect contempt for Nature, and instead of lifting their eyes to the God of the mountains, lift them to the Almighty Dollar" - the taste of the acrid anger found in the Luddite letters. ...What purpose does this machine serve? What problem has become so great that it needs this solution? Is this invention nothing but, as Thoreau put it, an improved means to an unimproved end?

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

May 11, Monday: Prime Minister Spencer Perceval, walking through the lobby of the House of Commons, was confronted by John Bellingham. Bellingham, a bankrupt who blamed the prime minister's policies for his own financial difficulties, pulled out a pistol and shot him point blank through the heart. (The new PM would be Robert Banks Jenkinson, 2d Earl of Liverpool, a Tory who would continue until in 1827 he would die of the most natural of causes.)

Londoners would cheer Bellingham as he ascended the steps of the scaffold. The hanging would be protected by 5,000 soldiers in order to ensure there could be no rescue. During the dissection of the corpse, the right ventricle of his heart continued to pulse for nearly four hours since the time of his hanging "and for about an Hour Longer, upon being touched with a Scalpel." His left testicle would be taken to the museum of the Royal College of Surgeons.

THE MARKET FOR HUMAN BODY PARTS

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

December 10, Thursday: Napoléon Bonaparte reached Warsaw on his way back to Paris.

Thomas Jefferson wrote to Robert Richardson: "I have occasion for some iron backs for my fire places at this place, of a particular size & form.... I have to request you to have 7. cast as soon as convenient ... as my waggon can bring them here [Poplar Forest] as a return load."

Samuel Tully was hanged as a pirate on Nook's Hill in South Boston. His accomplice, John Dalton, received a reprieve on the gallows (this is of course not the Friend John Dalton who introduced atomic theory into chemistry).³⁴⁹

349. THE LAST WORDS OF S. TULLY WHO WAS EXECUTED FOR PIRACY, AT SOUTH BOSTON, DECEMBER 10, 1812. Boston, Printed by N. Coverly, 1812

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1813

 Reviewing the French edition of Jeremy Bentham's THEORY OF PUNISHMENTS, Henry Peter Brougham agreed that:

- Legal punishment has but two legitimate aims: deterrence and reparation.
- The harm the punishment does to the convict must be greater than the advantages that had been gained by way of the crime.
- If the crime was an incident in a habitual occupation, the punishment should be in proportion to the probable benefit obtainable from such a long-term practice.
- The more uncertain it is that a criminal practitioner will be caught and punished, the harsher the punishment should be.
- The harm done to the convict by the punishment should be proportional to the harm the offender had done to others.
- There should be judicial discretion to allow for differing circumstances.
- Since some offenders are to be returned to society while others are to remain separated from society, there should be at least two types of custody, with separate facilities.
- Imprisonment is preferable to banishment or exile, which provide little equality and no example to deter others.
- Imprisonment, unlike banishment, exile, or transportation, is variable in degree, reformatory, remissible, profitable, and exemplary. All these advantages are displayed in Bentham's proposed Panopticon. It offers constant surveillance of inmates, wholesome regimen, control by the operating contractor, profitability, deterrence, and likely reformation.
- Capital Punishment should apply only to the worst cases.

a couple of damn smart dudes who figured it all out in their heads on the basis of first principles

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1813

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
29/03	Ann Arnold		Ipswich	Murder
31/03	Catherine Geran		Limerick	Burglary
02/04	Catherine Donovan		Cork (Gallows Green)	Murder
05/04	Sarah Fletcher	19	Horsemonger Lane, Surrey	Child Murder
23/04	Edith Morrey		Chester	Murder of husband
06/08	Azubah Fountain		Lincoln Castle	Murder
06/09	Elizabeth Osborne	20	Bodmin	Arson
29/12	Christian Sinclair	60	Edinburgh	Murder of child

January 8, Friday: Three Luddites were hanged at York after the murder of William Horsfall, mill owner.

William T. Knapp was born to John Leonard Knapp and Lydia Frances Freeman Knapp at Llanfoist, near Abergavenny in Monmouthshire, England.

January 16, Saturday: 14 more Luddites were hanged at York.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1814

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1814

Date	Name	Place of execution	Crime
28/03	Mary Gibbs	Ipswich	Murder of child
20/04	Sarah Owens	Ilchester	Stealing in dwelling house
01/08	Mary Cook	Dorchester	Murder of child

 May 26, Thursday: Dr. Joseph-Ignace Guillotin died of a carbuncle in his shoulder. His family would have to change its name because of the popular story that it had been he who had invented the guillotine apparatus being used for decapitation. (Actually, all Dr. Guillotin had done was ask that prisoners be done to death in a more human manner than hanging. Guillotine-like apparatuses actually date back to 1200 in Italy, and to the 1500s in Edinburgh, Scotland. The French apparatus in question actually had been devised by a Dr. Antoine Lewis, as a refinement on an Italian beheading device, and had therefore for a time been known as “la louison.”)

Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

5th day 26 of 5 M 1814 / Amos Peasly was at Meeting his Service was uncommonly lively & edifying & Powerful. indeed I do not think for power I ever heard any thing to exceed it - I have no Doubt many were sensibly edified & those who were in allmost a lifeless state had their feelings greatly quickened In the last Meeting (Monthly) considerable buisness was transacted in good harmony - Geo Dennis & Jos Wilbour Dined with us & Uncle & aunt Thurston & Eliz Freeborn took tea - In the eveng took a pleasant Walk round the Point with Br D Rodman -

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1815

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1815

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
28/03	Sarah White		Salisbury	Arson
03/04	Sarah Woodward		Ipswich	Murder of child
19/07	Jane Mulholland		Armagh	Murder of husband
25/07	Elizabeth Wollerton		Ipswich	Murder
26/07	Eliza Fenning	21	Newgate	Attempted Murder ^a
04/08	Honora Houraghan	40	Cork (Gallows Green)	Murder of husband

a. She was almost certainly innocent.

 January 21, Saturday: Horace Wells was born in Hartford, Vermont.³⁵⁰

The assembled leaders in Vienna attended a requiem mass in St. Stephen's Cathedral organized by Talleyrand, for Louis XVI on the 22d anniversary of the monarch's execution. The requiem was conducted by Antonio Salieri.

LA GUILLOTINE

From this date until March 9th, Lord and Lady Byron would be at Seaham, home of Sir Ralph and Lady Milbanke.

Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

*7th day 21st of 1st M 1815 / I have heard many speak of their satisfaction & edification at being at James Meeting last evening
This eveng rode to Portsmouth with David Williams & lodged at Cousin Z Chases*

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

 October 13, Friday: In Naples, Joachim Murat, brother-in-law of Napoléon Bonaparte who had attempted to reclaim the Neapolitan throne by force, faced a firing squad.

 December 7, Thursday: Elizabeth Hussey Whittier was born. (It is necessary to disambiguate between two persons of this name, one having been the sister of John Greenleaf Whittier and the other his niece, called "Lizzie." This is the sister.)

Marshal Michel Ney was executed by firing squad in a Paris street (he would be the only one of Napoléon Bonaparte's marshals to be put to death).

Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

350. Wells's drug experiments on himself would, on January 24, 1848, bring about his death.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

5th day 7th of 12 M / Our meeting was Small on the womens side of the house in consequence of the Rain - I thought it a season of favor, tho' "Jacob was very small" Yet a current of life appear'd to flow. - Hannah Dennis was very lively her opening was "Is there no balm in Gilead & is there not a Physician there." In the forepart of the meeting Jonathon Dennis requested that we set more compact which was repeated by father Rodman - Friends have heretofore been in the habit of Sitting scattering, Some near the door, whose age and standing would render a forward seat more appropriate. -

Last eveng about 10 OClock Died at Portsmouth Ruth Bringhurst widow of James Bringhurst late of Philadelphia -

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1816

 At about this point Joseph Deibler, the first Deibler to be working executions in France, emigrated from Germany.

HEADCHOPPING

 December 2, Monday: In the USA, our initial savings bank, the Philadelphia Savings Fund Society, opened its doors.

In England, this was a year of social unrest caused by unemployment, bad harvests, and food shortages. A 2d meeting was held at Spa Fields near London to protest the treatment that had been accorded to Henry “Orator” Hunt by the Prince Regent after the initial meeting of November 15th. Before Hunt arrived a section of the crowd, led by a tricolor, marched on the Tower of London a la Bastille (along their march they plundered a gunsmith’s shop for weapons, but were easily stopped in their tracks by a constable and a few concerned citizens, and the ringleaders taken into custody and charged with treason; eventually when things calmed down they would be acquitted).

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1816

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
11/03	Sarah Cock		Hertford	Murder of child
07/09	Dinah Riddiford	69	Gloucester	Burglary
16/09	Susanna Holroyd		Lancaster Castle	Murder

1817

➡ Friend Joseph John Gurney joined his older sister, Friend Elizabeth Gurney Fry, in attempting to bring an end to capital punishment and improve the quality of life for prisoners.

YOUR GARDEN-VARIETY ACADEMIC HISTORIAN INVITES YOU TO CLIMB ABOARD A HOVERING TIME MACHINE TO SKIM IN METATIME BACK ACROSS THE GEOLOGY OF OUR PAST TIMESLICES, WHILE OFFERING UP A GARDEN VARIETY OF COGENT ASSESSMENTS OF OUR PROGRESSION. WHAT A LOAD OF CRAP! YOU SHOULD REFUSE THIS HELICOPTERISH OVERVIEW OF THE HISTORICAL PAST, FOR IN THE REAL WORLD THINGS HAPPEN ONLY AS THEY HAPPEN. WHAT THIS SORT WRITES AMOUNTS, LIKE MERE “SCIENCE FICTION,” MERELY TO “HISTORY FICTION”:
IT’S NOT WORTH YOUR ATTENTION.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

 Thomas Benton and Charles Lucas, American lawyers, had it out with pistols. Although Lucas suffered a cut to the neck which bled copiously, preventing him from continuing, there needed to be a 2d encounter and this time he took a bullet near the heart. As he lay dying Lucas shook Benton's hand and said that he forgave him.

DUELING

Those who have paid attention to the O.J. Simpson trials will be interested in this. In England, Abraham Thornton, who stood accused of having raped and murdered Mary Ashford in the early morning of May 27th, was tried and, the verdict being not guilty, released. Mary's family being duly informed by their attorney that an old law would allow for a trial by combat (the nomenclature used for this double jeopardy was "Appeal of Murder") if her 10-year-old brother Henry Stout, Mary's heir-at-law, would champion her and challenge Abraham Thornton to a fight. This law would for the last time in England be used as the 10-year-old, acting through his mother, sued out an appeal to trial by combat on July 15th, 1818. This brought forward an ancient statute of Henry VII which prescribed that such an accused, found not guilty, would nevertheless be confined or held to bail until the period had lapsed in which an appeal to trial by combat could be completed. Interestingly, if the still accused and still imprisoned defendant Abraham Thornton were to be "found guilty" by God during this trial by combat with the boy Henry Stout, the only outcome would be that he must hang. There was no possibility of mercy or pardon by the King of England in such an appeal from a judicial decision in the King's court, to trial by combat, but not because the decision had been made by God, a superior authority to the King, but rather because such an appeal was considered under the law of the land to be a civil matter rather than a criminal action.

FAMOUS LASTS
May 12, 1797	Venetian doge Lodovico Giovanni Manin	abdicated, sort of
1817	Mary Ashford	a final appeal to Trial by Combat
November 14, 1832	Charles Carroll of Carrollton or Charles Carroll III	last of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, age 95

 A prisoner, Henry Phillips,³⁵¹ was hanged for murder in Boston. This year marked the last use of the public whipping post in the town of Spindle Hill, Connecticut, where Bronson Alcott was at this point 17 years of age.³⁵²

THE ALCOTT FAMILY

FAMOUS LASTS
1817	Mary Ashford	a final appeal to Trial by Combat
1817	pair of cattle thieves	last whipped at the whipping post of Spindle Hill, Connecticut
November 14, 1832	Charles Carroll of Carrollton or Charles Carroll III	last of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, age 95

351. This was, actually, the 2d Henry Phillips or Philips to commit murder in Boston. The initial Henry Phillips or Philips had been a gentleman who had killed another gentleman Benjamin Woodbridge in a sword duel on the Common on July 3/4, 1728, and had with the help of friends escaped judgment by fleeing to England and then France.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

The last persons so tortured, a pair of cattle thieves, received 7 lashes each across the back, over the wounds from which a quantity of rum was afterward poured.

Things were much more benign in New York State, where a new prison facility at Auburn began in this year to experiment with the scheme generally referred to as “lease prisons.” Since we honest citizens have all these prisoners we are punishing, having nothing productive to do with their wait time, let’s force them to labor for their own upkeep while under detention! (It’s only fair to us! The harder and more unpleasant their labor, the more of a punishment it will be! They’ll learn their lesson and sin no more! Why should we pay a criminal’s bills for him? Does anyone suppose that becoming a criminal gives a person some sort of right to be on the public dole? No way Jose! I mean, get serious! Etc. :-)

352. In English law the public whipping of women, which had been happening with decreasing frequency since the 1770s, was brought to a stop during this year. The public whipping of men, however, would continue in England into the 1830s.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Here's some commentary on the situation which has appeared in the April 1996 issue of Prison Legal News:

Sometimes private business entities contracted with states to operate their entire prison system; other times the state would operate the prison and "lease" the prison labor to businesses. Nineteenth-century prisons were essentially forced labor camps. Prisoners were made to produce a wide array of goods, including shoes, furniture, wagons, and stoves. For the sake of profit, they were often housed in squalid conditions, fed spoiled food, and given scant clothing or shoes. Whippings were commonplace, and medical care was nonexistent.

LEASED PRISONS

According to Jeffrey Weeks's SEX, POLITICS AND SOCIETY (Longman, 1981), during this year in England a man was sentenced to hang under the sodomy laws for having oral sex with a boy (after being thoroughly frightened, he would be pardoned).

THE TASK OF THE HISTORIAN IS TO CREATE HINDSIGHT WHILE
INTERCEPTING ANY ILLUSION OF FORESIGHT. NOTHING A HUMAN CAN SEE CAN EVER BE SEEN AS IF THROUGH THE EYE OF GOD. THE UNIVERSITY OF COLORADO'S CENTER OF THE AMERICAN WEST HAS AS ITS OFFICIAL MOTTO "TURNING HINDSIGHT INTO FORESIGHT" — WHICH INDICATES THAT ONLY PANDERERS ARE WELCOME THERE.
IN A BOOK THAT IS SUPPOSED TO BE ABOUT HISTORY, ISSUED BY RANDOM HOUSE IN 2016, I FIND THE PHRASE "LOOKED UPON FROM
THE BIRD'S-EYE VIEW OF HISTORY," ONLY A MERE STORYTELLER,
NEVER A HISTORIAN, COULD HAVE PENNED SUCH A PHRASE —
BECAUSE NO BIRD HAS EVER FLOWN OVER HISTORY.

February: Charlotte Newman and Mary Ann James were sentenced to the gallows, for forgery. Friend Elizabeth Fry began a campaign to have these women reprieved (ultimately her efforts would prove unsuccessful and they would be executed).

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1817

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
24/02	Sarah Perry		Newgate	Murder of child
05/03	Elizabeth Fricker		Newgate	Burglary
15/03	Elizabeth Witing		Lincoln Castle	Murder
21/03	Ann Statham	28	Stafford	Murder
14/04	Ann Hawlin		Warwick	Murder of child
26/07	Elizabeth Warriner		Lincoln Castle	Murder
17/10	Margaret Crossan	50	Ayr	Arson

THE TASK OF THE HISTORIAN IS TO CREATE HINDSIGHT WHILE
INTERCEPTING ANY ILLUSION OF FORESIGHT. NOTHING A HUMAN CAN SEE CAN EVER BE SEEN AS IF THROUGH THE EYE OF GOD.

IN A BOOK THAT IS SUPPOSED TO BE ABOUT HISTORY, ISSUED BY RANDOM HOUSE IN 2016, I FIND THE PHRASE “LOOKED UPON FROM THE BIRD’S-EYE VIEW OF HISTORY, ...” ONLY A MERE STORYTELLER,
NEVER A HISTORIAN, COULD HAVE PENNED SUCH A PHRASE —
BECAUSE NO BIRD HAS EVER FLOWN OVER HISTORY.

March: When Friend Elizabeth Gurney Fry and Friend Joseph John Gurney pled with the Home Secretary to spare the life of Harriet Skelton, a maidservant to a solicitor who, under pressure from her husband, had passed forged banknotes, Lord Sidmouth warned the House of Commons that these reformers were dangerous since the effect of their reforms would be to “remove the dread of punishment in the criminal classes.” This was, in every sort of way, a clash between defenders of “Restorative Justice” and advocates of “Retributive Justice” (and we all know that the mean-souled usually triumph in that sort of contest of spirit). The prisoner would be escorted to the Newgate gallows as per schedule.

“MAGISTERIAL HISTORY” IS FANTASIZING: HISTORY IS CHRONOLOGY

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

March 4, Tuesday: Inauguration of James Monroe as 5th President of the US. Delivery of his 1st Inaugural Address. President Monroe moved into the incomplete reconstructed White House in Washington DC, or “President’s House” as it was then called, and would import for it some stylish furniture purchased in Paris. Meanwhile, in England, Habeas Corpus was being suspended (until February 1818), and opposition journalists were fleeing or facing imprisonment.

Salma Hale was elected as a Democratic-Republican to the 15th Congress (until March 3, 1819; he would oppose the Missouri Compromise).

When a secret parliamentary committee reported that in its view, insurrection was imminent, habeas corpus was suspended in Britain.

Friend Elizabeth Gurney Fry wrote about her day in prison, and about capital punishment:

I have just returned from a most melancholy visit to Newgate, where I have been at the request of Elizabeth Fricker, previous to her execution [for robbery] tomorrow morning, at eight o'clock. I found her much hurried, distressed, and tormented in mind. Her hands cold, and covered with something like the perspiration preceding death, and in an universal tremor. The women who were with her said she had been so outrageous before our going that they thought a man must be sent for to manage her. However, after a serious time with her, her troubled soul became calmed. But is it for man thus to take the prerogative of the Almighty into his own hands? Is it not his place rather to endeavour to reform such; or restrain them from the commission of further evil? At least to afford poor erring fellow mortals, whatever may be their offenses, an opportunity of proving their repentance by amendment of life. Besides this poor young woman, there are also six men to be hanged, one of whom has a wife near her confinement, also condemned, and seven young children. Since the awful report came down, he has become quite mad, from horror of mind. A strait waistcoat could not keep him within bounds: he had just bitten the turnkey; I saw the man come out with his hand bleeding, as I passed the cell.

COLDBLOODED MURDER

LIFE IS LIVED FORWARD BUT UNDERSTOOD BACKWARD?
— NO, THAT’S GIVING TOO MUCH TO THE HISTORIAN’S STORIES.
LIFE ISN’T TO BE UNDERSTOOD EITHER FORWARD OR BACKWARD.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

➡ March 12, Wednesday: John Cashman was hanged before the gun shop he had looted in London during the disturbances the previous December 2d. His case had become a cause celebre because he had been wounded 9 times in the Royal Navy, and had been unable to make his way in the post-war world after being denied his back pay and prize money by the Admiralty. Working class people saw him as one of themselves wronged by the establishment, and thronged to bear witness during his execution.

COLDBLOODED MURDER

➡ March 13, Thursday: When Henry Phillips, who had murdered Gaspard Denegri near Roebuck Tavern, was hanged on Boston Neck, he was allowed to hold a handkerchief with the agreement that he would drop it when he was ready for the trap to be sprung.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

After the cap was drawn over his eyes, he sang a song of three verses, dropped the handkerchief, and was launched into eternity.³⁵³

Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

5th day 13th of 3 M / Very unexpectedly at meeting today we had the Company of Obadiah Davis & Ruth his wife - Ruth first appeared in a long & solemn testimony to parents & Youth & related the circumstances of the death of a young woman in their neighborhood who left time a few days ago in a sweet frame of mind, who expressed that many times when her parents restrained her from the ways of the World, she thought them hard. but she was then fully sensible they were right & that it was their Duty so to do - Obadiah followed her in very impressive terms to a considerable length - Ruth then appeared in solemn supplication & Obadiah wound up in a few words, excellently - It was a close searching time & I have no hesitation in saying that the Lords mighty power was felt among us & some minds were shaken by it. -My state was remarkably spoken & I have no doubt many others were 6th day 14th of 3rd M 1817 / This day John is five years old -he is a smart little fellow & I devoutly hope he may make a GOOD Man - I have no greater desire for him, even tho' he should be blessed with great riches without RELIGION, they are nothing.- This Afternoon Sister Ruth came down to see us & will stay all night. The first time she has been out since she broke her leg - I can but feel a degree of thanksgiving that she has thus comfortably got along. - My Spirit has been (particularly this Afternoon) feelingly touched & prayers begotten that I may increase in dedication

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

March 17, Monday: After five days during which mourners filed by the casket to pay their respects, “a vast multitude” followed the remains of the hanged John Cashman to the cemetery of Stepney Churchyard.

COLDBLOODED MURDER

Francis Lemuel Capen was born in Sterling, Massachusetts.

Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

2nd day 17 of 3 M / This morning Sister Ruth went home having past 3 night & 2 day [Monday]s very acceptably with us, & we are thankful she is so far restored as to be able to get about again

4th day 19th of 3rd M / My mind has of late been favord to witness the solemnizing influence of the spirit of Life flow thro' it, & desires raised that the clensing operation may be thoroughly preformed. -

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

353. Edward H. Savage's POLICE RECORDS AND RECOLLECTIONS OF BOSTON BY DAYLIGHT AND GASLIGHT FOR TWO HUNDRED AND FORTY YEARS, issued in 1873.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

➡ November 7, Friday: The hanging and then beheading for treason of 3 laborers, Jeremiah Brandreth, Isaac Ludlam, and William Turner, who had been detected in Luddite activities (that is, had been incited to lead the Pentrich Rising). In “An Address to the People on The Death of the Princess Charlotte,” Percy Bysshe Shelley would proclaim this to be a greater tragedy for the nation than the unexpected death of Princess Charlotte Augusta Hanover of Wales on the previous day.

These would prove to be the final beheadings by ax in Britain.

FINAL EXECUTIONS
August 18, 1809	Susan Grant	final British woman to be executed for coining during the 19th Century
November 7, 1817	Jeremiah Brandreth, Isaac Ludlam, and William Turner	beheaded by ax in England for Luddite activities
July 9, 1819	Rose Butler	final woman to be publicly hanged in New-York and buried in Potters' Field (Washington Square)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

NEVER READ AHEAD! TO APPRECIATE NOVEMBER 7TH, 1817 AT ALL ONE MUST APPRECIATE IT AS A TODAY (THE FOLLOWING DAY, TOMORROW, IS BUT A PORTION OF THE UNREALIZED FUTURE AND IFFY AT BEST). —IN PARTICULAR DID ANYBODY RECOGNIZE ON THIS DAY THAT THESE THREE WOULD BE THE FINAL BEHEADINGS? DID ANYBODY ON THAT SCAFFOLD GO “YOU KNOW, AFTER WE CHOP OFF YOUR HEADS WE WON’T BE DOING THIS ANYMORE, EVER?”

December 26, Friday: In the Teatro La Fenice of Venice, Lanassa, a melodramma eroico by Johann Simon Mayr to words of Rossi and Merelli after Lemierre, was performed for the initial time.

William McDonald, who had been sentenced to be hanged in Boston for the murder of his wife, died of natural causes before he could be executed.

Command over the American forces organizing to “pursue” the Seminoles of the Georgia border with Spanish East Florida was assumed by General Andrew Jackson. The black Seminoles were conveniently and readily presumed to be mere escaped slaves, a presumptive status which —unexamined and unchallenged— they occupy in our “history” books even today. This was race war. Our General Andrew “Long Knife” Jackson was ordered by the US government to do “anything necessary” to subdue them.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

“Father, after the war – will the Ten Commandments hold again?”

In the process of capturing St. Marks and Pensacola, our general would execute two British subjects. (This is generally considered a no-no.) The invasion would cause an international furor. President James Monroe and Secretary of War John C. Calhoun would simply deny having authorized Jackson’s deeds, and for awhile the cabinet would consider apologizing to Spain and Britain. They even debated the possibility of taking disciplinary action in regard to their general. Secretary of State John Quincy Adams would strongly demur, however, and would persuade Monroe that the thing to do was to justify his general’s behavior as having been necessitated by Spanish negligence. Adams would so deviously exploit the whole affair that he would be able to obtain, in 1819, the final cession of the Floridas to the United States, along with a favorable definition of the western boundary of the Louisiana Purchase.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1818

Thomas Fowell Buxton, a member of the Association for the Improvement of the Female Prisoners in Newgate, published AN INQUIRY INTO PRISON DISCIPLINE. Elected to the House of Commons to represent Weymouth, he was in a position to sponsor the work of Friend Elizabeth Fry. When Friend Elizabeth presented her finding, however, she made the mistake of commenting to the MPs that “capital punishment was evil and produced evil results,” which alienated them because they could perceive nothing at all problematic about criminals being hanged.

London Yearly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends had a leading in regard to capital punishment:

“The awful subject of the punishment of death has at this time deeply impressed our minds. We believe that where the precepts and spirit of our great Lord and Lawgiver have a complete ascendancy, they will lead to the abolition of this practice.”

COLDBLOODED MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING THE YEAR: 8

Date	Name	Place of execution	Crime
17/02	Mary Ann Jones	Newgate	Forgery
17/02	Charlotte Newman	Newgate	Forgery
10/04	Mary Connell	Cork (Gallows Green)	Murder
18/04	Margaret Dowd	Lancaster Castle	Uttering
24/04	Harriet Skelton	Newgate	Uttering
24/04	Ann Bamford	Warwick	Uttering
04/05	Ann Tye	Gloucester	Murder
11/08	Bridget Murray	Cavan	Murder of husband

CHANGE IS ETERNITY, STASIS A FIGMENT

February 8, Sunday: A sermon was delivered at Woodstock, Vermont by the Reverend Leland Howard, pastor of the 1st Baptist Society in Windsor, Vermont, prior to the hanging on February 13th of Samuel E. Godfrey (1782-1818) of Chatham on Cape Cod for the grudge murder in 1814 of Thomas Hewlett (as keeper of the Vermont State Prison where Godfrey was serving a prison sentence, Hewlett had punished him for a rule infraction; there had been in this case 3 successive trials and 3 successive orders of execution over a period of 4 years).

Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

1st day 8th of 2nd M 1818 / Our morning Meeting was an uncommonly favord season, early in the sitting a good degree of solemnity was felt to arise & D Buffum was soon engaged in a lively testimony attended with life & Power - then father Rodman, then Lydia Almy, then Hannah Dennis who rose a second time & with much feeling addressed the Youth.- In the Afternoon we were silent but a solid covering was witnessed -

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

STATE MURDER

February 13, Friday: In Philadelphia, James Forten received an urgent summons to a meeting of the vestry. Absalom Jones, the 1st black ordained priest in the Protestant Episcopal Church in America, rector of the 1st African Church of St. Thomas which he had established in 1794, had died of typhoid fever (the funeral service and procession would take place on the following Monday, with the sermon being presented by the priest who had ordained Jones, Bishop William White; eventually Mr. Prince Saunders would be chosen to step into the Reverend Jones's position as Reader or Minister at St. Thomas's).

A sermon was delivered at Woodstock, Vermont by the Reverend Leland Howard, pastor of the 1st Baptist Society in Windsor, Vermont, prior to the hanging of Samuel E. Godfrey (1782-1818) of Chatham on Cape Cod for the grudge murder in 1814 of Thomas Hewlet (as keeper of the Vermont State Prison where Godfrey was serving a prison sentence, Hewlet had punished him for a rule infraction; there had been in this case 3 successive trials and 3 successive orders of execution over a period of 4 years). It was freezing that day and a snowstorm was swirling about the site — and yet more than 10,000 turned out to witness this event.

April 29, Wednesday: Before sunrise, Major General Andrew Jackson executed two British subjects in occupied Florida for inciting the natives against him. The merchant Alexander George Arbuthnot, probably innocent, was hanged from the masthead of his schooner. A former Royal Marine, Robert Chrystie Ambrister, probably guilty, had been sentenced by the Court Martial to 50 lashes and a year at hard labor — but instead General Jackson put him before a firing squad.

STATE MURDER

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

November 6, Friday: Malcolm Laing died on his Orkney estate and his property would be inherited by his brother Samuel.

Malcolm Laing.
Historian 1762–1818

A memorial tablet would be placed on the wall of the north nave of St. Magnus Cathedral in Kirkwall, which in the 17th Century had been being used for internments and would come to contain a number of curiosities: "DEPTH, TRUTH, AND INDEPENDENCE AS AN HISTORIAN WERE," SAYS LORD COCKBURN, "THE LEAST OF HIS MERITS, FOR HE WAS A FIRM, WARM-HEARTED, HONEST MAN, WHOSE INSTRUCTIVE AND AGREEABLE COMPANIONSHIP WAS ONLY MADE THE MORE INTERESTING BY A HARD, PEREMPTORY, CELTIC MANNER AND ACCENT."

In Albany, New York James Hamilton, an Irishman, was hanged for having, while inebriated on Sunday, July 14, 1818, shot down his company commander Benjamin Birdsall of the 6th US Rifle Regiment.

At Harvard College, the Sophomore class met under a tree near Hollis Hall to plot a response to college discipline after their food riot of the previous Sunday supper in University Hall. When authority showed up to disperse this assembly, it was mocked. The number of suspensions would go up from 7 to 12, and in addition, 3 students would be "rusticated."

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

December 30, Wednesday: At a trial in Mayor's Court at the New-York City Hall, James Maurice v Samuel Judd, the dispute was over nonpayment of a fee for inspection of "fish oil," but the decision revolved around the question of whether this would include the oil from whales, and thus whether or not whales are fish. Linnaeus had separated whales from fish in 1758 because whales have lungs rather than gills and breathe air through a blowhole, have four chambers in the heart, have eyelids that move, and have flipper bones that match those in the hands and arms of humans and apes, but the current dictionaries defined fish merely as animals that live exclusively in water. Thus oysters, crabs (except for beach crabs), and whales definitely are fish. The jury would decide that the fee should be paid, which would cause the state legislature promptly to exempt whale oil from the category of fish oil (refer to D. Graham Burnett's TRYING LEVIATHAN, put out in 2007 by Princeton UP).

In Edinburgh, Scotland, executioner John Simpson made a number of tries before he was able to hang Robert Johnston for the robbery of a candlemaker. When the trap dropped on his initial try, the criminal was able to remain standing on the platform and the crowd drove the authorities away with stones, cut the offender down, removed his hood, and carried him off toward High Street. They heaved the boards of the waiting coffin through the windows of Tolbooth Church. When the police and military retrieved the 22-year-old robber, a surgeon bled him until he was sufficiently weak to be unable to resist. However, when the executioner made his 2d attempt he used too long a rope, and they needed to lift their victim while they wound the rope again and again around the hook on the scaffold beam. Then it took the man like forever to strangle.

Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

*30th of 12th M 1818 / I awoke this Morning with the recollection that this day completed my 37th year, & it has been a day of much seriousness
Thousands who were alive this day, thirty seven Years ago have since paid the debt of nature, & it has been my lot to witness the exit of some of them, both in my own immediate family & some of my aged friends. - I have grown from youth to manhood & have now arrived at what may be termed the Meridian of life & must soon expect to be looking on the Down Hill side & perhaps within a very short time be numbered with the Silent dead. - Man knoweth not his time, & I am thankful that I do not know the end of mine. - but this one thing I do know, that it is necessary for me to [be] prepared to change worlds, & I do also know that "the effect of Righteousness is PEACE."*

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

December 31, Thursday: On the previous day in Edinburgh, Scotland, executioner John Simpson had sadly botched the job of hanging robber Robert Johnston for the robbery of a candlemaker. On this day the city magistrates fired both the executioner and the master of works who had been responsible for the structure of the gallows. Although a 50-guinea reward was offered for the identification of the persons who had rescued the robber after he was able to remain standing on the platform when the trap fell, this reward would never be paid.

Arriving at the "Elmwood" mansion of Friend Moses Brown outside Providence, Rhode Island, after a boat trip and a stage ride, were two assistant teachers for the girls' department, Friends Mary Mitchell and Dorcas Gardner, a Quaker girl scholar from New Hampshire, and three Quaker girl scholars from Nantucket.

Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

12th M 31st 5 of ye Week 1818 / This Morning took Chaise & with Br D Rodman went to Portsmouth to attend the Moy [Monthly] Meeting - a little this side of Wm Baileys gate the Axle tree of the Chaise broke short off which brought us down & tho' in *the fall I lost the reins, the horse stoped & stood perfectly still, which I count a special favor & for which my heart is truly thankful to the Lord, the great ruler of events – we set the Chaise on the side of the road & went to Wm Baileys who very kindly lent us a small Waggon which safely carried us the rest of the way to the Meeting House –The first Meeting was silent, the last was a deeply exercising one. Some cases before us was deeply distressing & afforded ample scope for the exercise of christian patience & prudence. I have thought I had known some hard meetings before, but it seemed as if this was the hardest – I believe that my concern has been a right one for the welfare of society & Oh saith my soul may I hold on; & may my concern increase, –

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

We dined at Saml Thurstons – & rode Home.*

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1819

February 18, Thursday: On Boston Neck, John Williams, Peter Peterson (alias Nils Peterson), Francis Frederick and John P. Rog were hanged for the crimes of piracy and murder.³⁵⁴

Les troqueurs, an opéra comique by Louis Joseph Ferdinand Hérold to words of d'Artois and d'Artois after Vadé after La Fontaine, was performed for initial time, in the Théâtre Feydeau, Paris.

March 22, Monday: Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

2nd day 22 of 3 M / I have felt this day a renewal of life, & can say with some formerly, "has not my heart burned within me"

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

Hannah Bocking, who had poisoned Jane Grant at Wardlow Miers in Derbyshire, was only 16 when hanged, which was a female record (execution of persons under 16 would remain a possibility in England until the Children's Act of 1908).

OTHER WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1819

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
08/03	Sarah Huntingford	61	Winchester (Gallows Hill)	Murder of husband
12/03	Sarah Hurst		Aylesbury	Murder of husband
22/03	Mary Woodman	30	Exeter	Murder of husband
29/03	Mary McGarry		Downpatrick	Child Murder
23/04	Mary Bissaker	56	Warwick	Coining

354. A CONCISE SKETCH OF THE EXECUTION OF JOHN WILLIAMS, PETER PETERSON (ALIAS NILS PETERSON), FRANCIS FREDERICK AND JOHN P. ROG WHO WERE EXECUTED ON THE 18TH OF FEBRUARY, 1819, FOR MURDER AND PIRACY : PREFACED WITH MORAL REFLECTIONS : TO WHICH IS ADDED A SOLEMN ADDRESS. Boston : Printed for N. Coverly, 1819

PIRATES

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

March 23, Tuesday: Karl Ludwig Sand, a Bavarian theology student at the University of Jena, gained entry to the home of the reactionary diplomat and dramatist August Freidrich Ferdinand von Kotzebue, author of the GESCHICHTE DES DEUTSCHEN REICHES VON DESSEN URSPRUNGE BIS ZU DESSEN UNTERGANGE denouncing liberalism, civil liberties, and constitutions that had been thrown into the bonfire of the student bookburning at the Schloss Wartburg on October 18, 1817, and stabbed him repeatedly in the chest while the man's 4-year-old son watched from the nearby nursery room (after several failed attempts to commit suicide by stabbing himself, Sand would be beheaded).

HEADCHOPPING

Karl Theodor Christian Friedrich Follen's friendship with Sand would bring him under suspicion as an accomplice. Follen was able to destroy some letters linking him with Sand and would be acquitted due to lack of evidence. He would, however, be dismissed from the University of Gießen and would need to relocate, to Paris. There he would meet Charles Comte, son-in-law of Jean Baptiste Say and founder of the Censeur, a publication which he defended until he chose exile in Switzerland instead of imprisonment in France.

April 16, Friday: The publication of Muzio Clementi's Gradus ad Parnassum Volume II was entered at Stationer's Hall, London.

At Sugar Loaf near Goshen, New York, 5 persons had been found guilty of the murder of Richard Jennings, aged 70 years, as the outcome of an inheritance property dispute. His honor Judge Van Ness, after passing the sentence of the law, advised them as friends to prepare to meet their God! admonished them not to let a false hope of pardon divert their attention from the paramount duties which ensure a safety of their souls — to meet their fate as christians! On this day, the others having received lesser or commuted sentences, James Teed and David Dunning were to be hanged. Before the main events, however, the sheriff delivered the following discourse before the audience of some 20,000 or more: "It is more than 30 years since any person in the county has suffered the last pain of the law for the crime of murder. I am now, however, called to the performance of a necessary, but painful duty, appertaining to my office: I hope I shall discharge it with the feelings that become me. Let me request your attention for a few moments, before the commencement of that awful spectacle which will engross every power and bind up every faculty in terror and commiseration. The cause which stirred up the vindictive passions of the unfortunate men you now behold, was in itself trifling — in its consequences how tremendous! An aged and infirm man, in an unsuspecting moment, was the first victim of violence, and they, the authors and contrivers of his death, are now about to become the necessary sacrifice offered by the law, for the example and the safety of all. Doomed to death in the midst of health, in the prime of life — taken in a moment from the most endearing connexions; from wives and children — in agony and in shame they go to those dark and mysterious abodes, where penitence is unavailing, reformation impossible, and their punishment eternal. By your serious and orderly conduct, let the lesson of their punishment have its full effect — give to them your pity — let them have your prayers: By the inexorable decree of that law they have dreadfully violated, it is all they can ask — it is all you can grant. And may God have mercy on their souls!" Before the main events, also, the Reverend Mr. Fisk delivered a discourse from Numbers, xxxii. 23. After this James Teed offered a prayer that went on for 15 minutes. At 2:30PM Sheriff Burnet dropped the trap.

Since no local cemetery would receive the remains, Mr. James Hallock and his wife allowed the burial to take place on their pasture outside the fence of an old cemetery. In the night, however, persons unknown would pound long, sharpened locust posts down through the centers of these burials, and the pair of posts would stand out there in the pasture for more than half a century.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

 July 9, Friday: Rose Butler, a young black servant who had been found guilty of one or another major crime such as arson, was the final woman to be publicly hanged in New-York (this municipal gallows was at the location at which the masonry arch now stands, in Washington Square, which used to be the municipality's "potters' field" in which many more than 100,000 corpses had been allowing themselves to transit into useful potting soil).

FINAL EXECUTIONS
November 7, 1817	Jeremiah Brandreth, Isaac Ludlam, and William Turner	beheaded by ax in England for Luddite activities
July 9, 1819	Rose Butler	final woman to be publicly hanged in New-York and buried in Potters' Field (Washington Square)
1826	name not on record	prisoner hanged for a single homicide in Boston

 July 29, Thursday: John Duffield, age 46 or 47, Josiah Wilkes, age 52, and Thomas Earp, age 29, for the coining of counterfeit shillings, were convicted of high treason by a jury at Stafford and sentenced by the judge to be drawn on a hurdle to the place of execution and there to be hanged by the neck. Afterward the court would take mercy on Wilkes and Earp and re-sentence them to life imprisonment among the some 650 prisoners held aboard the convict hulk Leviathan in Portsmouth harbor (normally such prisoners did manual labor in guarded gangs ashore during the day).

(I don't know which of the above hulks was the Leviathan.)

Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

*5th day 29th of 7th M 1819 / Our meeting was a solid time to me
In the first Hannah Dennis appeard in a solid & to my feelings pertinent testimony. — In the last (Monthly) we had considerable buisness, & some of it of a weighty & important nature, which I thought was moved in with care & a good degree of circumspection.
—Uncle Peter & Aunt Wait, Anne Anthony & Jacob Mott dined with* us. —

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

 August 21, Saturday: At about 6AM service commenced in the chapel at Stafford, which, with the administration of the holy sacrament, occupied the time till near 8AM, when the tolling of the bell announced the approach of the horse-drawn hurdle conveying John Duffield, who was to be hanged (such a hurdle was usually fashioned from thin interwoven branches to which the prisoner was tied). When the horse reached the foot of the ladder of the town's portable gallows structure, Duffield stated with great composure, "I am going to Heaven." Ascending the platform with steady step, he stood quietly as the executioner adjusted the rope about his neck. He was allowed to spend some five minutes in fervent prayer before the signal was given and the drop fell. The Wolverhampton Chronicle would report that "On Saturday morning, about half-past eight o'clock, John Duffield underwent the awful sentence of the law at the front of the county gaol at Stafford, for counterfeiting, at Darlaston, the coin of this realm called a shilling, of which he was convicted (with Josiah Wilkes and Thos. Earp) at our late assizes." The news account informs us that the hanged counterfeiter had left seven children.

In Newport, Rhode Island, Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

7th day 21 of 8 M / Father Rodman attends Anne & Hannah today they Dined with us & had a sitting in the family & when Anne Carpenter came in & joined us....

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

 August 31, Tuesday: The revenue cutters USS Alabama and USS Louisiana, while sailing the Gulf off southern Florida, sighted and gave chase to the schooner Bravo. When they came within range there was a brief gunnery duel, and then the vessel was boarded and its crew surrendered. The vessel had been sailing without a letter of marque. It was Jean La Farges, a lieutenant of Jean Lafitte. We can presume that all these pirates would hang.

"Variations on Non più mesta accanto al fuoco" was performed by Nicolò Paganini, probably for the initial time, at the Teatro dei Fiorentini of Naples.

In Newport, Rhode Island, Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

*3rd day 31st of 8 M / This evening Sampson Sherman son of Job departed this life. I was called in & assisted in laying him out. he had entered his 16th Year - with him "The summer has past" & who will close with the Autumn, is known only to Him who giveth life & taketh it away at his Will. - May all that is alive within me bow in his presence in thankfulness for the many favors vouchsafed. -
In the Afternoon Attended the funeral of Robert Lawton which was large. -*

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1820

January 10, Monday: In the diary of Thomas Nuttall we find: “This evening we arrived near to the termination of the second Pine Bluffs, which continue along the river for nearly two miles. We passed through seven bends of the river; and came about 27 miles. The frost was now succeeded by mild and showery weather; and the bald eagles [Falco Leucocephalus] were already nestling, chusing the loftiest poplars for their eyries.”

In Lawrenceburg, Indiana, this had been planned as Palmer Warren’s wedding day but his fiancée (whose name is not of record) had renounced another suitor, Amasa Fuller, in favor of him. The jilted suitor came to the office of bridegroom-to-be Palmer Warren with a pair of dueling pistols, charged with four balls each, and confronted him with a note he was to sign to the effect that in the presence of the Almighty God, he renounced all pretensions to the young lady and acknowledged that he was a base liar and scoundrel. When the favored suitor declined to sign said note and refused to participate in a demanded duel of honor, the jilted suitor shot and killed him there in his office. Amasa Fuller would hang for the murder of Palmer Warren on August 14th and the result would be a ballad, “Fuller and Warren,” a variant of which has been recorded as follows:

Ye sons of Columbia, attention all I’ll pray,
And listen to a story I’m going to tell:
It happened here of late in an Indiana State,

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Of a hero who but a few could excel....

It seems clear why the name of the bride-to-be in question is not on the record! — how must that Hoosier lass have reacted to the contemporary singing of such a ballad?

6			1 1 0 3	1		1 1		1 1 0
8	2	2 3	2			2 2	0	0	2
	3 3			3 3					2 2

3	3	0	2	3
				3

 February 4, Friday: Lavinia Fisher of Charleston, South Carolina was hanged before a crowd of some 2,000.

 February 9, Wednesday: At St. Mary, Whitechapel, William Smith, age 24, stole two cows worth £36 from William Morris. On the testimony of William Morris, his cow boy James Martin, the man to whom William Smith sold the two cows Joseph Martin, and constable Francis Freeman, a Middlesex jury would find him guilty and Judge Baron Graham would sentence him to be hanged.

Moses Gerrish Farmer, who would develop the electric-striking apparatus for a fire alarm service that would be installed in Boston in 1851, and would invent an incandescent electric lamp in 1858/1859, was born in Boxcawen, New Hampshire to Colonel John Farmer and Sally Gerrish Farmer.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

February 17, Thursday: The US federal senate passed the Missouri Compromise – Maine was admitted as a separate state while Missouri was simultaneously admitted as a slave state, thus preserving the balance of power between the North and the South, while slavery was prohibited in the land area of the Louisiana Purchase north of latitude 36° 31°.

At the Old Bailey in London, five of the six trials on this day ended with a death sentence. One of the death sentences was handed down in the case of a 9-year-old, Charles Elliott, who had stolen six handkerchiefs, worth five shillings each, from Martha Blakeman's shop on Oxford Street on February 8th. (Since we have no record of a hanging, we can presume that this sentence would have later been commuted to transportation to Australia — the youngest person we know of who was actually hanged in Britain in the 19th Century was a John Bell in 1831 who at the age of 14 committed murder.)

Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

5th day 17th 1820 / The Walking exceedingly bad & our meeting was attended by but few women - R Mitchell came along & kindly took my H in his sleigh & a sufficient number got to the meeting house to Make a Preparative Meeting. - The men turned out with pretty good example. - In the first meeting we had a lively testimony from father Rodman. - & to me it was a season of favor & I believe the solemnity covered most minds present for which I desired to be thankful.

My time of late had been much occupied in buisness for the support of the body & yet I may thankfully add, I have at seasons a comfortable evidence of the continuance of divine regard & the extension of life & love in my heart - may I ever keep this object in view thro' all & over all

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

March 18, Saturday: Evaristo Pérez de Castro Brito replaced Joaquín José Melgarejo y Saurín, duque de San Fernando de Quiroga as First Secretary of State of Spain.

At the Norfolk Assizes, William Head was sentenced to hang for highway robbery. He and an accomplice had taken a silver watch, a handkerchief, and a great coat from another visitor to the Wymondham Fair. He would be held at Norwich Castle, his death sentence would be reprieved to transportation, and he would be taken from England aboard the Hebes destined for New South Wales.

AUSTRALIA

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

 May 25, Thursday: Waldo Emerson's 17th birthday.

Michael Powers, who had murdered Timothy Kennedy, was hanged on Boston Neck.

 Michael Powers, who had murdered Timothy Kennedy, had been hanged on the municipal gallows on Boston Neck on May 25th; however, on some other day during this year another hanging took place at Boston, this one (since the offence had amounted to piracy) out on the Admiralty mudflats.

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1820

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
12/04	Ann Heytrey	22	Warwick	Petty treason
12/08	Sarah Polgreen	37	Bodmin	Petty treason
16/08	Rebecca Warlock	36	Gloucester	Murder
05/12	Sarah Price	43	Newgate	Uttering

STATE MURDER

June 6, Tuesday: Queen Caroline traveled from Dover to London with ever increasing crowds along the way cheering her on. In London while she stayed at the house of Alderman Matthew Wood, supporting crowds would for two days surround the house.

The saddler Louis Pierre Louvel was sentenced to the guillotine for the assassination of Charles Ferdinand d'Artois, Duc de Berry.

HEADCHOPPING

June 7, Wednesday: Louis Pierre Louvel was guillotined for the assassination of Charles Ferdinand d'Artois, Duc de Berry.

HEADCHOPPING

Karl Theodor Christian Friedrich Follen had come under suspicion as an accomplice, and would flee to Switzerland (he would teach for awhile at the cantonal school at Coire and at the University of Basel while Prussian authorities continued to solicit Swiss authorities to deliver him unto their tender mercies, until both he and Charles Comte would be forced again to flee, in Follen's case to the United States of America).

August 4, Friday: At Stirling in Scotland a judge of the "Radical War" treason delivered himself of the remark "To you Andrew Hardie and John Baird I can hold out little or no hope of mercy" because "as you were the leaders, I am afraid that example must be given by you."

HANGING

Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

6th day proceeded to Providence & reached the School House about 10 O'clock, after landing the Young Women, I rode into town on a little buisness with Natl. Watson of Salem & returned to Moses Browns & dined where I found G Osborn & several other friends whom I loved, their company was very pleasant. — After dinner we went up to the School House & attended to the concerns that came before us in the capacity of School Committee, much weight was manifest among us & right concern for the welfare of the institution. — Ruth & I returned to Moses Browns & lodged. —next morning being 7th day we returned to the school House to attend to some unfinished buisness of yesterday, staid to dinner & dined with the Schollars after which we left them & rode home & got to Newport before 9 O'clock in the evening. —

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

August 14, Monday: 1st US eye hospital, the New York Eye Infirmary, opened in New-York City.

In Lawrenceburg, Indiana, the jilted suitor Amasa Fuller was hanged for the murder on January 10th of bridegroom-to-be Palmer Warren and the result would be a ballad, "Fuller and Warren," a variant of which has been recorded as follows:

Ye sons of Columbia, attention all I'll pray,
And listen to a story I'm going to tell:
It happened here of late in an Indiana State,
Of a hero who but a few could excel.

He was handsome, independent, he was comely and fair,
But a sweeter hero never yet was known;

STATE MURDER

But sorry for to say, instead of a wedding day,
Young Fuller he lies silent in his home.

Like Samson he courted the fairest of the fair,
He thought she would be his wedded wife;
But like Ella the fair, she did his heart unswear,
And robbed him of his honour and his life.

He gave to her a gold ring as a token of true love,
He thought her the image of a dove;
To get married then with speed they mutually agreed,
And he swore by all powers above.

When Fuller came to hear he was deprived of his dear,
He swore in his heart he would wed;
With his heart full of woe to young Warren he did go,
And smiling to young Warren he said:

“Young man, you know you’ve wronged me,
You gratify your cause by reporting that I’ve left a prudent wife;
Now acknowledge that you’ve wronged me or I will break the law,
For, Warren, I’ll deprive you of your life.”

Warren made reply, “Your request I do deny,
For my heart unto your darling is bound;
But furthermore I’ll say, this is our wedding day,
In spite of all the heroes in the town.”

Young Fuller in a passion of love and anger flew,
And this fair one began for to cry;
And with one fatal shot, he shot Warren on the spot,
And smiling said, “I’m ready for to die.”

Young Fuller was condemned by the honour of jury bold,
In the land of lorn alone for to die;
To die an inhuman death to hang upon the yard,
Like a highwayman upon the gallis high.

The time was drawing nigh when young Fuller he must die,
And smiling said, “I’ll bid you all adieu.”
Like an angel he did stand, for he was a handsome man,
And upon his coat he wore a rose of blue.

Ten thousand spectators they were all standing by,
And the guards dropping tears from their eyes,
Saying, “Cursed was she who caused this misery,
She ought in his place now to die.”

The smiling God of Love, looking down from above,
And the rope broke asunder where they stand;
Two doctors there to pay, commit murder on that day,

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

And hung him by the main string of the hand.

The first system of musical notation for 'State Murder' consists of a treble clef staff with a key signature of one flat (B-flat) and a 6/8 time signature. The melody is written in eighth and sixteenth notes. Below the staff is a guitar tablature with six strings. The first string has a '6' in the first measure, indicating a barre at the sixth fret. The second string has an '8' in the first measure, indicating an octave at the eighth fret. The tablature includes various fret numbers and string numbers (e.g., 2, 3, 0, 2, 3, 0, 2, 0, 2, 2) to guide the player.

The second system of musical notation for 'State Murder' continues the melody from the first system. It features a treble clef staff with a key signature of one flat and a 6/8 time signature. The melody is written in eighth and sixteenth notes. Below the staff is a guitar tablature with six strings. The first string has a '6' in the first measure, indicating a barre at the sixth fret. The second string has an '8' in the first measure, indicating an octave at the eighth fret. The tablature includes various fret numbers and string numbers (e.g., 2, 3, 0, 2, 3, 0, 2, 0, 2, 2) to guide the player.

August 30, Wednesday: A petition entitled “The Address to the Inhabitants of Great Britain and Ireland” had been in circulation since April 1st and a cavalry officer, Sir Richard Hussey Vivian, had been sent up from London to Scotland to take care of the situation. He assembled 2,000 soldiers and rounded up a number of persons suspected by others of possessing radical sympathies. One of those who had fallen into the trap of the provocateur-incited “Radical War” treason had been one James Wilson, who had been taken near his home in Strathaven 14 miles from Glasgow. Having been duly found guilty of “compassing to levy war against the king,” and having been duly sentenced to being hanged, drawn, and quartered for said treason, on this day Wilson was placed head down on a hurdle and drawn to Glasgow Green, where he faced a crowd of some 20,000 people. He remarked to his executioner “Did you ever see such a crowd, Thomas?” After the hanging and beheading the executioner left off and the corpse was neither drawn nor quartered.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

September 8, Friday: There having been a protest march in Scotland involving a march from Glasgow toward the Carron Ironworks for the purpose of the securing of weapons, and two of the leaders of said march, weavers, having been taken into custody, on this day in Stirling the march leaders Andrew Hardie and John Baird were hanged then beheaded for their "Radical War" treason before a crowd of some 2,000. Sheriff of Stirling Ranald MacDonald had stipulated that they would not be allowed to make political speeches from the platform, but had consented that they might speak upon the Holy Scripture. Baird made a brief speech ending in "Although this day we die an ignominious death by unjust laws our blood, which in a very few minutes shall flow on this scaffold, will cry to heaven for vengeance, and may it be the means of our afflicted Countrymen's speedy redemption." Hardie then commented that "our blood [being] shed on this scaffold ... for no other sin but seeking the legitimate rights of our ill used and down trodden beloved Countrymen," and the Sheriff interrupted his speech. He quickly concluded by asking those present to "go quietly home and read your Bibles, and remember the fate of Hardie and Baird." (This punishment for treason would be removed from the statute books in 1947.)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1821

→ The English law read: “Any person, who commits the crime of sodomy, either with a man, or with any animal, and is found guilty, will be put to death.” The sentence was always death of course, but until this date to obtain a conviction of bestiality the presence of semen in the animal had to be proven, and thus many of those charged were released. In order to increase the rate of conviction, the requirement was eased at this point in time so that it would no longer be necessary for the prosecution “to prove ejaculation, rather intercourse shall be deemed to have occurred if penetration has occurred.” If penetration could not be established but a witness testified to observing an “attempt” to penetrate the animal, the sentence would be 10 years imprisonment. The English law would be revised in 1861 to reduce the sentence of hanging to life imprisonment (still in effect).

→ April 13, Friday: John Horwood was hanged at the “New” Bristol Gaol, three days after his 18th birthday, for the murder of Eliza Balsum, an older girl who had spurned his advances. He had heaved a rock at her while she crossed a stream near Hanham Mill, fracturing her skull. He had commented while in jail, “Lord, thou knowest that I did not mean then to take away her life but merely to punish her: though I confess that I made up my mind, some time or other, to murder her.” His body would be taken to the Bristol Royal Infirmary and dissected by the surgeon Richard Smith. An account of his dissection and a transcript of his trial would be bound as a book covered with his skin — a grisly memento mori which in fact is still in existence.

THE MARKET FOR HUMAN BODY PARTS

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1821

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
10/03	Mary Clarke		Northampton	Murder of husband
14/03	Margaret Plunkett	29	Trim (County Meath)	Murder of husband
14/03	Francis Gilligan	18	Trim (County Meath)	Aiding Plunkett
31/03	Esther Waters		Leicester	Murder
13/08	Ann Barber	45	York Castle	Petty treason
27/11	Ann Norris		Newgate	Robbed brothel
07/12	Margaret Tindell	36	Montrose	Murder of husband

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

➡ November 8, Thursday: Samuel Green attacked Billy Williams, a black convict, with an iron bar in a shop in the yard of the Massachusetts State Prison in Charlestown, Massachusetts, causing fatal injuries, and would be hanged at the gallows on Boston Neck just outside the town gate and near the burying grounds.³⁵⁵

➡ November 8, Thursday, evening: Captain Jackson's brig Cobbesecontee had sailed that morning from Havana toward Boston. He had only proceeded about 4 miles from Moro Castle when brought to by a vessel with about 30 pirates. Captain Jackson had noticed their sloop at Regla the day before. These Cubans took the personal items of the captain and his mate, stripping them nearly naked. They broke a large broadsword across the captain's back and stabbed him through his thigh so that he almost bled to death. After they beat the mate, he was hanged under the maintop. From the cargo were obtained 3 bales of cochineal and 6 boxes of cigars. Captain Jackson would confirm a report brought by other American sailors who had been brought to grief in Havana, that some of the local whites were openly countenancing these acts of piracy against US citizens — as a gesture of retaliation against US interference with the Cuban slave trade.

INTERNATIONAL SLAVE TRADE

Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

5th day of 11 M / Our Meeting was small - a considerable portion of those who generally attend were absent at David Buffums where Sarah Sherman has lain very ill for some weeks & while the Meeting was sitting today She expired - She was a [-] lid [solid?, words obscured by binding crease] young woman & tho' all the forepart of her illness she was deprived of her mental powers, but a few days previous to her death she came to her understanding & expressed her reconciliation to the Solemn Change -

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

355. Another convict, Howard Trask, was also involved in this beating. He also, on September 16th while confined in the old Leverett Street Jail, would attempt to kill cellmates Francis Durgen and John Newman. Considered insane, he would not be executed.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

THE WEST INDIA PIRATES

CONTAINING ACCOUNTS OF THEIR ATROCITIES, MANNERS OF LIVING, &C., WITH PROCEEDINGS OF THE SQUADRON UNDER COMMODORE PORTER IN THOSE SEAS, THE VICTORY AND DEATH OF LIEUTENANT ALLEN, THE INTERESTING NARRATIVE OF CAPTAIN LINCOLN, &C.³⁵⁶

Those innumerable groups of islands, keys and sandbanks, known as the West-Indies, are peculiarly adapted from their locality and formation, to be a favorite resort for pirates; many of them are composed of coral rocks, on which a few cocoa trees raise their lofty heads; where there is sufficient earth for vegetation between the interstices of the rocks, stunted brushwood grows. But a chief peculiarity of some of the islands, and which renders them suitable to those who frequent them as pirates, are the numerous caves with which the rocks are perforated; some of them are above high-water mark, but the majority with the sea water flowing in and out of them, in some cases merely rushing in at high-water filling deep pools, which are detached from each other when the tide recedes, in others with a sufficient depth of water to allow a large boat to float in. It is hardly necessary to observe how convenient the higher and dry caves are as receptacles for articles which are intended to be concealed, until an opportunity occurs to dispose of them. The Bahamas, themselves are a singular group of isles, reefs and quays; consisting of several hundred in number, and were the chief resort of pirates in old times, but now they are all rooted from them; they are low and not elevated, and are more than 600 miles in extent, cut up into numerous intricate passages and channels, full of sunken rocks and coral reefs. They afforded a sure retreat to desperadoes. Other islands are full of mountain fastnesses, where all pursuit can be eluded. Many of the low shores are skirted, and the islands covered by the mangrove, a singular tree, shooting fresh roots as it grows, which, when the tree is at its full age, may be found six or eight feet from the ground, to which the shoots gradually tend in regular succession; the leaf is very thick and stiff and about eight inches long and nine wide, the interval between the roots offer secure hiding places for those who are suddenly pursued. Another circumstance assists the pirate when pursued. — As the islands belong to several different nations, when pursued from one island he can pass to that under the jurisdiction of another power. And as permission must be got by those in pursuit of him, from the authorities of the island to land and take him, he thus gains time to secrete himself. A tropical climate is suited to a roving life, and liquor as well as dissolute women being in great abundance, to gratify him during his hours of relaxation, makes this a congenial region for the lawless.

356. THE PIRATES OWN BOOK, OR AUTHENTIC NARRATIVES OF THE LIVES, EXPLOITS, AND EXECUTIONS OF THE MOST CELEBRATED SEA ROBBERS, by Charles Ellms (Portland: Published by Sanborn & Carter; Philadelphia: Thomas, Comperthwait, & Co., 1837. This would be republished in 1842 by A. and C.B. Edwards of New-York & Philadelphia, and in 1844 in Portland by Sanborn & Carter, and in 1855 by A. and C.B. Edwards of New-York, and in 1924 by Marine res. of Massachusetts, and in 1996 by Random House of New York.)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

The crews of pirate vessels in these seas are chiefly composed of Spaniards, Portuguese, French, Mulattoes, Negroes, and a few natives of other countries. The island of Cuba is the great nest of pirates at the present day, and at the Havana, piracy is as much tolerated as any other profession. As the piracies committed in these seas, during a single year, have amounted to more than fifty, we shall give only a few accounts of the most interesting.

In November 1821, the brig Cobbessecontee, Captain Jackson, sailed from Havana, on the morning of the 8th for Boston, and on the evening of the same day, about four miles from the Moro, was brought to by a piratical sloop containing about 30 men. A boat from her, with 10 men, came alongside, and soon after they got on board commenced plundering. They took nearly all the clothing from the captain and mate — all the cooking utensils and spare rigging — unrove part of the running rigging — cut the small cable — broke the compasses — cut the mast's coats to pieces — took from the captain his watch and four boxes cigars — and from the cargo three bales cochineal and six boxes cigars. They beat the mate unmercifully, and hung him up by the neck under the maintop. They also beat the captain severely — broke a large broad sword across his back, and ran a long knife through his thigh, so that he almost bled to death. Captain Jackson saw the sloop at Regla the day before.

Captain Jackson informs us, and we have also been informed by other persons from the Havana, that this system of piracy is openly countenanced by some of the inhabitants of that place — who say that it is a retaliation on the Americans for interfering against the Slave Trade.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

About this time the ship Liverpool Packet, Ricker, of Portsmouth, N.H., was boarded off Cape St. Antonio, Cuba, by two piratical schooners; two barges containing thirty or forty men, robbed the vessel of every thing movable, even of her flags, rigging, and a boat which happened to be afloat, having a boy in it, which belonged to the ship. They held a consultation whether they should murder the crew, as they had done before, or not – in the mean time taking the ship into anchoring ground. On bringing her to anchor, the crew saw a brig close alongside, burnt to the water's edge, and three dead bodies floating near her. The pirates said they had burnt the brig the day before, and murdered all the crew! – and intended doing the same with them. They said "look at the turtles (meaning the dead bodies) you will soon be the same." They said the vessel was a Baltimore brig, which they had robbed and burnt, and murdered the crew as before stated, of which they had little doubt. Captain Ricker was most shockingly bruised by them. The mate was hung till he was supposed to be dead, but came to, and is now alive. They told the captain that they belonged in Regla, and should kill them all to prevent discovery.

In 1822, the United States had several cruisers among the West-India islands, to keep the pirates in check. Much good was done but still many vessels were robbed and destroyed, together with their crews. This year the brave Lieutenant Allen fell by the hand of pirates; he was in the United States schooner Alligator, and receiving intelligence at Matanzas, that several vessels which had sailed from that port, had been taken by the pirates, and were then in the bay of Lejuapo. He hastened to their assistance. He arrived just in time to save five sail of vessels which he found in possession of a gang of pirates, 300 strong, established in the bay of Lejuapo, about 15 leagues east of this. He fell, pierced by two musket balls, in the van of a division of boats, attacking their principal vessel, a fine schooner of about eighty tons, with a long eighteen pounder on a pivot, and four smaller guns, with the bloody flag nailed to the mast. Himself, Captain Freeman of Marines, and twelve men, were in the boat, much in advance of his other boats, and even took possession of the schooner, after a desperate resistance, which nothing but a bravery almost too daring could have overcome. The pirates, all but one, escaped by taking to their boats and jumping overboard, before the Alligator's boat reached them. Two other schooners escaped by the use of their oars, the wind being light.

Captain Allen survived about four hours, during which his conversation evinced a composure and firmness of mind, and correctness of feeling, as honorable to his character, and more consoling to his friends, than even the dauntless bravery he before exhibited.

The surgeon of the Alligator in a letter to a friend, says, "He continued giving orders and conversing with Mr. Dale and the rest of us, until a few minutes before his death, with a degree of cheerfulness that was little to be expected from a man in his condition. He said he wished his relatives and his country to know that he had fought well, and added that he died in peace and good will towards all the world, and hoped for his reward in the next."

Lieutenant Allen had but few equals in the service. He was ardently devoted to the interest of his country, was brave, intelligent, and accomplished in his profession. He displayed, living and dying, a magnanimity that sheds lustre on his relatives, his friends, and his country.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

About this time Captain Lincoln fell into the hands of the pirates, and as his treatment shows the peculiar habits and practices of these wretches, we insert the very interesting narrative of the captain.

The schooner Exertion, Captain Lincoln, sailed from Boston, bound for Trinidad de Cuba, Nov. 13th, 1821, with the following crew; Joshua Bracket, mate; David Warren, cook; and Thomas Young, Francis De Suze, and George Reed, seamen.

The cargo consisted of flour, beef, pork, lard, butter, fish, beans, onions, potatoes, apples, hams, furniture, sugar box shooks, &c., invoiced at about eight thousand dollars. Nothing remarkable occurred during the passage, except much bad weather, until my capture, which was as follows: —

Monday, December 17th, 1821, commenced with fine breezes from the eastward. At daybreak saw some of the islands northward of Cape Cruz, called Keys — stood along northwest; every thing now seemed favorable for a happy termination of our voyage. At 3 o'clock, P.M., saw a sail coming round one of the Keys, into a channel called Boca de Cavolone by the chart, nearly in latitude 20° 55' north, longitude 79° 55' west, she made directly for us with all sails set, sweeps on both sides (the wind being light) and was soon near enough for us to discover about forty men on her deck, armed with muskets, blunderbusses, cutlasses, long knives, dirks, &c., two carronades, one a twelve, the other a six pounder; she was a schooner, wearing the Patriot flag (blue, white and blue) of the Republic of Mexico. I thought it not prudent to resist them, should they be pirates, with a crew of seven men, and only five muskets; accordingly ordered the arms and ammunition to be immediately stowed away in as secret a place as possible, and suffer her to speak us, hoping and believing that a republican flag indicated both honor and friendship from those who wore it, and which we might expect even from Spaniards. But how great was my astonishment, when the schooner having approached very near us, hailed in English, and ordered me to heave my boat out immediately and come on board of her with my papers. — Accordingly my boat was hove out, but filled before I could get into her. — I was then ordered to tack ship and lay by for the pirates' boat to board me; which was done by Bolidar, their first lieutenant, with six or eight Spaniards armed with as many of the before mentioned weapons as they could well sling about their bodies. They drove me into the boat, and two of them rowed me to their privateer (as they called their vessel), where I shook hands with their commander, Captain Jonnia, a Spaniard, who before looking at my papers, ordered Bolidar, his lieutenant, to follow the Mexican in, back of the Key they had left, which was done. At 6 o'clock, P.M., the Exertion was anchored in eleven feet water, near this vessel, and an island, which they called Twelve League Key (called by the chart Key Largo), about thirty or thirty-five leagues from Trinidad. After this strange conduct they began examining my papers by a Scotchman who went by the name of Nickola, their sailing master. — He spoke good English, had a countenance rather pleasing, although his beard and mustachios had a frightful appearance — his face, apparently full of anxiety, indicated something in my favor; he gave me my papers, saying "take good care of them, for

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

I am afraid you have fallen into bad hands." The pirates' boat was then sent to the Exertion with more men and arms; a part of them left on board her; the rest returning with three of my crew to their vessel; viz., Thomas Young, Thomas Goodall, and George Reed — they treated them with something to drink, and offered them equal shares with themselves, and some money, if they would enlist, but they could not prevail on them. I then requested permission to go on board my vessel which was granted, and further requested Nickola should go with me, but was refused by the captain, who vociferated in a harsh manner, "No, No, No." accompanied with a heavy stamp upon the deck. When I got on board, I was invited below by Bolidar, where I found they had emptied the case of liquors, and broken a cheese to pieces and crumbled it on the table and cabin floor; the pirates, elated with their prize (as they called it), had drank so much as to make them desperately abusive. I was permitted to lie down in my berth; but, reader, if you have ever been awakened by a gang of armed, desperadoes, who have taken possession of your habitation in the midnight hour, you can imagine my feelings. — Sleep was a stranger to me, and anxiety was my guest. Bolidar, however, pretended friendship, and flattered me with the prospect of being soon set at liberty. But I found him, as I suspected, a consummate hypocrite; indeed, his very looks indicated it. He was a stout and well built man, of a dark, swarthy complexion, with keen, ferocious eyes, huge whiskers, and beard under his chin and on his lips, four or five inches long; he was a Portuguese by birth, but had become a naturalized Frenchman — had a wife, if not children (as I was told) in France, and was well known there as commander of a first rate privateer. His appearance was truly terrific; he could talk some English, and had a most lion-like voice.

Tuesday, 18th. — Early this morning the captain of the pirates came on board the Exertion; took a look at the cabin stores, and cargo in the state rooms, and then ordered me back with him to his vessel, where he, with his crew, held a consultation for some time respecting the cargo. After which, the interpreter, Nickola, told me that "the captain had, or pretended to have, a commission under General Traspelascus, commander-in-chief of the republic of Mexico, authorizing him to take all cargoes whatever of provisions, bound to any royalist Spanish port — that my cargo being bound to an enemy's port, must be condemned; but that the vessel should be given up and be put into a fair channel for Trinidad, where I was bound." I requested him to examine the papers thoroughly, and perhaps he would be convinced to the contrary, and told him my cargo was all American property taken in at Boston, and consigned to an American gentleman, agent at Trinidad. But the captain would not take the trouble, but ordered both vessels under way immediately, and commenced beating up amongst the Keys through most of the day, the wind being very light. They now sent their boats on board the Exertion for stores, and commenced plundering her of bread, butter, lard, onions, potatoes, fish, beans, &c., took up some sugar box shocks that were on deck, and found the barrels of apples; selected the best of them and threw the rest overboard. They inquired for spirits, wine, cider, &c. and were told "they had already taken all that was on board." But not satisfied they proceeded to search the state rooms and forcastle, ripped up the floor of the later and found some boxes of bottled cider, which they carried to their vessel, gave three cheers, in an exulting manner to me, and then began drinking it with such freedom, that a violent quarrel arose between officers and men, which came very near ending in bloodshed. I was accused of falsehood, for saying they had got all the liquors that were on board, and I thought they had; the truth was, I never had any bill of lading of the cider, and consequently had no recollection of its being on board; yet it served them as an excuse for being insolent. In the evening peace was restored and they sung songs. I was suffered to go below for the night, and they placed a guard over me, stationed at the companion way.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Wednesday, 19th, commenced with moderate easterly winds, beating towards the northeast, the pirate's boats frequently going on board the Exertion for potatoes, fish, beans, butter, &c. which were used with great waste and extravagance. They gave me food and drink, but of bad quality, more particularly the victuals, which was wretchedly cooked. The place assigned me to eat was covered with dirt and vermin. It appeared that their great object was to hurt my feelings with threats and observations, and to make my situation as unpleasant as circumstances would admit. We came to anchor near a Key, called by them Brigantine, where myself and mate were permitted to go on shore, but were guarded by several armed pirates. I soon returned to the Mexican and my mate to the Exertion, with George Reed, one of my crew; the other two being kept on board the Mexican. In the course of this day I had considerable conversation with Nickola, who appeared well disposed towards me. He lamented most deeply his own situation, for he was one of those men, whose early good impressions were not entirely effaced, although confederated with guilt. He told me "those who had taken me were no better than pirates, and their end would be the halter; but," he added, with peculiar emotion, "I will never be hung as a pirate," showing me a bottle of laudanum which he had found in my medicine chest, saying, "If we are taken, that shall cheat the hangman, before we are condemned." I endeavored to get it from him, but did not succeed. I then asked him how he came to be in such company, as he appeared to be dissatisfied. He stated, that he was at New Orleans last summer, out of employment, and became acquainted with one Captain August Orgamar, a Frenchman, who had bought a small schooner of about fifteen tons, and was going down to the bay of Mexico to get a commission under General Traspelascus, in order to go a privateering under the patriot flag. Capt. Orgamar made him liberal offers respecting shares, and promised him a sailing master's berth, which he accepted and embarked on board the schooner, without sufficiently reflecting on the danger of such an undertaking. Soon after she sailed from Mexico, where they got a commission, and the vessel was called Mexican. They made up a complement of twenty men, and after rendering the General some little service, in transporting his troops to a place called ----- proceeded on a cruise; took some small prizes off Campeachy; afterwards came on the south coast of Cuba, where they took other small prizes, and the one which we were now on board of. By this time the crew were increased to about forty, nearly one half Spaniards, the others Frenchmen and Portuguese. Several of them had sailed out of ports in the United States with American protections; but, I confidently believe, none are natives, especially of the northern states. I was careful in examining the men, being desirous of knowing if any of my countrymen were among this wretched crew; but am satisfied there were none, and my Scotch friend concurred in the opinion. And now, with a new vessel, which was the prize of these plunderers, they sailed up Manganeil bay; previously, however, they fell in with an American schooner, from which they bought four barrels of beef, and paid in tobacco. At the Bay was an English brig belonging to Jamaica, owned by Mr. John Loudon of that place. On board of this vessel the Spanish part of the crew commenced their depredations as pirates, although Captain Orgamar and Nickola protested against it, and refused any participation; but they persisted, and like so many ferocious blood-hounds, boarded the brig, plundered the cabin, stores, furniture, captain's trunk, &c., took a hogshead of rum, one twelve pound carronade, some rigging and sails. One of them plundered the chest of a sailor, who made some resistance, so that the Spaniard took his cutlass, and beat and wounded him without mercy. Nickola asked him "why he did it?" the fellow answered, "I will let you know," and took up the cook's axe and gave him a cut on the head, which nearly deprived him of life. Then they ordered Captain Orgamar to leave his vessel, allowing him his trunk and turned him ashore, to seek for himself. Nickola begged them to dismiss him with his captain, but no, no, was the answer; for they had no complete navigator but him. After Captain Orgamar was gone, they put in his stead the present brave (or as I should call him cowardly) Captain Jonnia, who headed them in plundering the before mentioned brig, and made Bolidar their first lieutenant, and then proceeded down among those Keys or Islands, where I was captured. This is the amount of what my friend Nickola told me of their history.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Saturday, 22d. - Both vessels under way standing to the eastward, they ran the Exertion aground on a bar, but after throwing overboard most of her deck load of shocks, she floated off; a pilot was sent to her, and she was run into a narrow creek between two keys, where they moored her head and stern along side of the mangrove trees, set down her yards and topmasts, and covered her mast heads and shrouds with bushes to prevent her being seen by vessels which might pass that way. I was then suffered to go on board my own vessel, and found her in a very filthy condition; sails torn, rigging cut to pieces, and every thing in the cabin in waste and confusion. The swarms of moschetoës and sand-flies made it impossible to get any sleep or rest. The pirate's large boat was armed and manned under Bolidar, and sent off with letters to a merchant (as they called him) by the name of Dominico, residing in a town called Principe, on the main island of Cuba. I was told by one of them, who could speak English, that Principe was a very large and populous town, situated at the head of St. Maria, which was about twenty miles northeast from where we lay, and the Keys lying around us were called Cotton Keys. — The captain pressed into his service Francis de Suze, one of my crew, saying that he was one of his countrymen. Francis was very reluctant in going, and said to me, with tears in his eyes, "I shall do nothing but what I am obliged to do, and will not aid in the least to hurt you or the vessel; I am very sorry to leave you." He was immediately put on duty and Thomas Goodall sent back to the Exertion.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Sunday, 23d. — Early this morning a large number of the pirates came on board of the Exertion, threw out the long boat, broke open the hatches, and took out considerable of the cargo, in search of rum, gin, &c., still telling me "I had some and they would find it," uttering the most awful profaneness. In the afternoon their boat returned with a perough, having on board the captain, his first lieutenant and seven men of a patriot or piratical vessel that was chased ashore at Cape Cruz by a Spanish armed brig. These seven men made their escape in said boat, and after four days, found our pirates and joined them; the remainder of the crew being killed or taken prisoners.

Monday, 24th. — Their boat was manned and sent to the before-mentioned town. — I was informed by a line from Nickola, that the pirates had a man on board, a native of Principe, who, in the garb of a sailor, was a partner with Dominico, but I could not get sight of him. This lets us a little into the plans by which this atrocious system of piracy has been carried on. Merchants having partners on board of these pirates! thus pirates at sea and robbers on land are associated to destroy the peaceful trader. The willingness exhibited by the seven above-mentioned men, to join our gang of pirates, seems to look like a general understanding among them; and from there being merchants on shore so base as to encourage the plunder and vend the goods, I am persuaded there has been a systematic confederacy on the part of these unprincipled desperadoes, under cover of the patriot flag; and those on land are no better than those on the sea. If the governments to whom they belong know of the atrocities committed (and I have but little doubt they do) they deserve the execration of all mankind.

Thursday, 27th. — A gang of the pirates came and stripped our masts of the green bushes, saying, "she appeared more like a sail than trees" — took one barrel of bread and one of potatoes, using about one of each every day. I understood they were waiting for boats to take the cargo; for the principal merchant had gone to Trinidad.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Sunday, 30th. — The beginning of trouble! This day, which peculiarly reminds Christians of the high duties of compassion and benevolence, was never observed by these pirates. This, of course, we might expect, as they did not often know when the day came, and if they knew it, it was spent in gambling. The old saying among seamen, "no Sunday off soundings," was not thought of; and even this poor plea was not theirs, for they were on soundings and often at anchor. — Early this morning, the merchant, as they called him, came with a large boat for the cargo. I was immediately ordered into the boat with my crew, not allowed any breakfast, and carried about three miles to a small island out of sight of the Exertion, and left there by the side of a little pond of thick, muddy water, which proved to be very brackish, with nothing to eat but a few biscuits. One of the boat's men told us the merchant was afraid of being recognized, and when he had gone the boat would return for us; but we had great reason to apprehend they would deceive us, and therefore passed the day in the utmost anxiety. At night, however, the boats came and took us again on board the Exertion; when, to our surprise and astonishment, we found they had broken open the trunks and chests, and taken all our wearing apparel, not even leaving a shirt or pair of pantaloons, nor sparing a small miniature of my wife which was in my trunk. The little money I and my mate had, with some belonging to the owners, my mate had previously distributed about the cabin in three or four parcels, while I was on board the pirate, for we dare not keep it about us; one parcel in a butter pot they did not discover. — Amidst the hurry with which I was obliged to go to the before-mentioned island, I fortunately snatched by vessel's papers, and hid them in my bosom, which the reader will find was a happy circumstance for me. My writing desk, with papers, accounts, &c., all Mr. Lord's letters (the gentlemen to whom my cargo was consigned) and several others were taken and maliciously destroyed. My medicine chest, which I so much wanted, was kept for their own use. What their motive could be to take my papers I could not imagine, except they had hopes of finding bills of lading for some Spaniards, to clear them from piracy. Mr. Bracket had some notes and papers of consequence to him, which shared the same fate. My quadrant, charts, books and bedding were not yet taken, but I found it impossible to hide them, and they were soon gone from my sight.

Tuesday, January 1st, 1822 — A sad new-year's day to me. Before breakfast orders came for me to cut down the Exertion's railing and bulwarks on one side, for their vessel to heave out by, and clean her bottom. On my hesitating a little they observed with anger, "very well, captain, suppose you no do it quick, we do it for you." Directly afterwards another boat full of armed men came along side; they jumped on deck with swords drawn, and ordered all of us into her immediately; I stepped below, in hopes of getting something which would be of service to us; but the captain hallooed, "Go into the boat directly or I will fire upon you." Thus compelled to obey, we were carried, together with four Spanish prisoners, to a small, low island or key of sand in the shape of a half moon, and partly covered with mangrove trees; which was about one mile from and in sight of my vessel. There they left nine of us, with a little bread, flour, fish, lard, a little coffee and molasses; two or three kegs of water, which was brackish; an old sail for a covering, and a pot and some other articles no way fit to cook in. Leaving us these, which were much less than they appear in the enumeration, they pushed off, saying, "we will come to see you in a day or two." Selecting the best place, we spread the old sail for an awning; but no place was free from flies, moschetoos, snakes, the venomous skinned scorpion, and the more venomous santipee. Sometimes they were found crawling inside of our pantaloons, but fortunately no injury was received. This afternoon the pirates hove their vessel out by the Exertion and cleaned one side, using her paints, oil, &c. for that purpose. To see my vessel in that situation and to think of our prospects was a source of the deepest distress. At night we retired to our tent; but having nothing but the cold damp ground for a bed, and the heavy dew of night penetrating the old canvass – the situation of the island being fifty miles from the usual track of friendly vessels, and one hundred and thirty-five from Trinidad – seeing my owner's property so unjustly and wantonly destroyed – considering my condition, the hands at whose mercy I was, and deprived of all hopes, rendered sleep or rest a stranger to me.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Friday, 4th. – Commenced with light winds and hot sun, saw a boat coming from the Exertion, apparently loaded; she passed between two small Keys to northward, supposed to be bound for Cuba. At sunset a boat came and inquired if we wanted anything, but instead of adding to our provisions, took away our molasses, and pushed off. We found one of the Exertion's water casks, and several pieces of plank, which we carefully laid up, in hopes of getting enough to make a raft.

Saturday, 5th. – Pirates again in sight, coming from the eastward; they beat up along side their prize, and commenced loading. In the afternoon Nickola came to us, bringing with him two more prisoners, which they had taken in a small sail boat coming from Trinidad to Manganeil, one a Frenchman, the other a Scotchman, with two Spaniards, who remained on board the pirate, and who afterwards joined them. The back of one of these poor fellows was extremely sore, having just suffered a cruel beating from Bolidar, with the broad side of a cutlass. It appeared, that when the officer asked him "where their money was, and how much," he answered, "he was not certain but believed they had only two ounces of gold" – Bolidar furiously swore he said "ten," and not finding any more, gave him the beating. Nickola now related to me a singular fact; which was, that the Spanish part of the crew were determined to shoot him; that they tied him to the mast, and a man was appointed for the purpose; but Lion, a Frenchman, his particular friend, stepped up and told them, if they shot him they must shoot several more; some of the Spaniards sided with him, and he was released. Nickola told me, the reason for such treatment was, that he continually objected to their conduct towards me, and their opinion if he should escape, they would be discovered, as he declared he would take no prize money. While with us he gave me a letter written in great haste, which contains some particulars respecting the cargo; — as follows: —

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

January 4th, 1822.

Sir, — We arrived here this morning, and before we came to anchor, had five canoes alongside ready to take your cargo, part of which we had in; and as I heard you express a wish to know what they took out of her, to this moment, you may depend upon this account of Jamieson for quality and quantity; if I have the same opportunity you will have an account of the whole. The villain who bought your cargo is from the town of Principe, his name is Dominico, as to that it is all that I can learn; they have taken your charts aboard the schooner Mexican, and I suppose mean to keep them, as the other captain has agreed to act the same infamous part in the tragedy of his life. Your clothes are here on board, but do not let me flatter you that you will get them back; it may be so, and it may not. Perhaps in your old age, when you recline with ease in a corner of your cottage, you will have the goodness to drop a tear of pleasure to the memory of him, whose highest ambition should have been to subscribe himself, though devoted to the gallows, your friend,
Excuse haste. NICKOLA MONACRE.

Sunday, 6th. — The pirates were under way at sunrise, with a full load of the Exertion's cargo, going to Principe again to sell a second freight, which was done readily for cash. I afterwards heard that the flour only fetched five dollars per barrel, when it was worth at Trinidad thirteen; so that the villain who bought my cargo at Principe, made very large profits by it.

Tuesday, 8th. — Early this morning the pirates in sight again, with fore top sail and top gallant sail set; beat up along side of the Exertion and commenced loading; having, as I supposed, sold and discharged her last freight among some of the inhabitants of Cuba. They appeared to load in great haste; and the song, "O he oh," which echoed from one vessel to the other, was distinctly heard by us. How wounding was this to me! How different was this sound from what it would have been, had I been permitted to pass unmolested by these lawless plunderers, and been favored with a safe arrival at the port of my destination, where my cargo would have found an excellent sale. Then would the "O he oh," on its discharging, have been a delightful sound to me. In the afternoon she sailed with the perough in tow, both with a full load, having chairs, which was part of the cargo, slung at her quarters.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Monday, 14th. — They again hove in sight, and beat up as usual, along-side their prize. While passing our solitary island, they laughed at our misery, which was almost insupportable — looking upon us as though we had committed some heinous crime, and they had not sufficiently punished us; they hallooed to us, crying out "Captain, Captain," accompanied with obscene motions and words, with which I shall not blacken these pages — yet I heard no check upon such conduct, nor could I expect it among such a gang, who have no idea of subordination on board, except when in chase of vessels, and even then but very little. My resentment was excited at such a malicious outrage, and I felt a disposition to revenge myself, should fortune ever favor me with an opportunity. It was beyond human nature not to feel and express some indignation at such treatment. — Soon after, Bolidar, with five men, well armed, came to us; he having a blunderbuss, cutlass, a long knife and pair of pistols — but for what purpose did he come? He took me by the hand, saying, "Captain, me speak with you, walk this way." I obeyed, and when at some distance from my fellow prisoners, (his men following) he said, "the captain send me for your wash" I pretended not to understand what he meant, and replied, "I have no clothes, nor any soap to wash with — you have taken them all," for I had kept my watch about me, hoping they would not discover it. He demanded it again as before; and was answered, "I have nothing to wash;" this raised his anger, and lifting his blunderbuss, he roared out, "what the d — l you call him that make clock? give it me." I considered it imprudent to contend any longer, and submitted to his unlawful demand. As he was going off, he gave me a small bundle, in which was a pair of linen drawers, sent to me by Nickola, and also the Rev. Mr. Brooks' "Family Prayer Book." This gave me great satisfaction. Soon after, he returned with his captain, who had one arm slung up, yet with as many implements of war, as his diminutive wicked self could conveniently carry; he told me (through an interpreter who was his prisoner.) "that on his cruize he had fallen in with two Spanish privateers, and beat them off; but had three of his men killed, and himself wounded in the arm" — Bolidar turned to me and said, "it is a d — n lie" — which words proved to be correct, for his arm was not wounded, and when I saw him again, which was soon afterwards, he had forgotten to sling it up. He further told me, "after tomorrow you shall go with your vessel, and we will accompany you towards Trinidad." This gave me some new hopes, and why I could not tell. They then left us without rendering any assistance. — This night we got some rest.

Tuesday, 15th. The words "go after tomorrow," were used among our Spanish fellow prisoners, as though that happy tomorrow would never come — in what manner it came will soon be noticed.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Friday, 18th commenced with brighter prospects of liberty than ever. The pirates were employed in setting up our devoted schooner's shrouds, stays, &c. My condition now reminded me of the hungry man, chained in one corner of a room, while at another part was a table loaded with delicious food and fruits, the smell and sight of which he was continually to experience, but alas! his chains were never to be loosed that he might go and partake — at almost the same moment they were thus employed, the axe was applied with the greatest dexterity to both her masts and I saw them fall over the side! Here fell my hopes — I looked at my condition, and then thought of home. — Our Spanish fellow prisoners were so disappointed and alarmed that they recommended hiding ourselves, if possible, among the mangrove trees, believing, as they said, we should now certainly be put to death; or, what was worse, compelled to serve on board the Mexican as pirates. Little else it is true, seemed left for us; however, we kept a bright look out for them during the day, and at night "an anchor watch" as we called it, determined if we discovered their boats coming towards us, to adopt the plan of hiding, although starvation stared us in the face — yet preferred that to instant death. This night was passed in sufficient anxiety — I took the first watch.

Saturday, 19th. — The pirate's largest boat came for us — it being day-light, and supposing they could see us, determined to stand our ground and wait the result. They ordered us all into the boat, but left every thing else; they rowed towards the Exertion — I noticed a dejection of spirits in one of the pirates, and inquired of him where they were going to carry us? He shook his head and replied, "I do not know." I now had some hopes of visiting my vessel again — but the pirates made sail, ran down, took us in tow and stood out of the harbor. Bolidar afterwards took me, my mate and two of my men on board and gave us some coffee. On examination I found they had several additional light sails, made of the Exertion's. Almost every man, a pair of canvas trousers; and my colors cut up and made into belts to carry their money about them. My jolly boat was on deck, and I was informed, all my rigging was disposed of. Several of the pirates had on some of my clothes, and the captain one of my best shirts, a cleaner one, than I had ever seen him have on before. — He kept at a good distance from me, and forbid my friend Nickola's speaking to me. — I saw from the companion way in the captain's cabin my quadrant, spy glass and other things which belonged to us, and observed by the compass, that the course steered was about west by south, — distance nearly twenty miles, which brought them up with a cluster of islands called by some "Cayman Keys." Here they anchored and caught some fish, (one of which was named guard fish) of which we had a taste. I observed that my friend Mr. Bracket was somewhat dejected, and asked him in a low voice, what his opinion was with respects to our fate? He answered, "I cannot tell you, but it appears to me the worst is to come." I told him that I hoped not, but thought they would give us our small boat and liberate the prisoners. But mercy even in this shape was not left-for us. Soon after, saw the captain and officers whispering for some time in private conference. When over, their boat was manned under the command of Bolidar, and went to one of those Islands or Keys before mentioned. On their return, another conference took place — whether it was a jury upon our lives we could not tell. I did not think conscience could be entirely extinguished in the human breast, or that men could become fiends. In the afternoon, while we knew not the doom which had been fixed for us, the captain was engaged with several of his men in gambling, in hopes to get back some of the five hundred dollars, they said, he lost but a few nights before; which had made him unusually fractious. A little before sunset he ordered all the prisoners into the large boat, with a supply of provisions and water, and to be put on shore. While we were getting into her, one of my fellow prisoners, a Spaniard, attempted with tears in his eyes to speak to the captain, but was refused with the answer. "I'll have nothing to say to any prisoner, go into the boat." In the mean time Nickola said to me, "My friend, I will give you your book," (being Mr. Colman's Sermons,) "it is the only thing of yours that is in my possession; I dare not attempt any thing more." But the captain forbid his giving it to me, and I stepped into the boat — at that moment Nickola said in a low voice, "never mind, I may see you again before I die." The small boat was well armed and manned, and both set off together for the island, where they had agreed to leave us to perish! The scene to us was a funereal scene. There were no arms in the prisoners boat, and, of course, all attempts to relieve ourselves would have been throwing our lives away, as Bolidar was near us, well armed. We were rowed about two miles north-easterly from the pirates, to a small low island, lonely and desolate. We arrived about sunset; and for the support of us eleven prisoners, they only left a ten gallon keg of water, and perhaps a few quarts, in another small vessel, which was very poor; part of a barrel of flour, a small keg of lard, one ham and some salt fish; a small kettle and an old broken pot; an old sail for a covering, and a small mattress and blanket, which was thrown out as the boats hastened away. One of the prisoners happened to have a little coffee in his pocket, and these comprehended all our means of sustaining life, and for what length of time we knew not. We now felt the need of water, and our supply was comparatively nothing. A man may live nearly twice as long without food, as without water. Look at us now, my friends, left benighted on a little spot of sand in the midst of the ocean, far from the usual track of vessels, and every appearance of a violent thunder tempest, and a boisterous night. Judge of my feelings, and the circumstances which our band of sufferers now witnessed. Perhaps you can and have pitied us. I assure you, we were very wretched; and to paint the scene, is not within my power. When the boats were moving from the shore, on recovering myself a little, I asked Bolidar, "If he was going to leave us so?" – he answered, "no, only two days – we go for water and wood, then come back, take you." I requested him to give us bread and other stores, for they had plenty in the boat, and at least one hundred barrels of flour in the Mexican. "No, no, suppose to-morrow morning me come, me give you bread," and hurried off to the vessel. This was the last time I saw him. We then turned our attention upon finding a spot most convenient for our comfort, and soon discovered a little roof supported by stakes driven into the sand; it was thatched with leaves of the cocoa-nut tree, considerable part of which was torn or blown off. After spreading the old sail over this roof, we placed our little stock of provisions under it. Soon after came on a heavy shower of rain which penetrated the canvas, and made it nearly as uncomfortable inside, as it would have been out. We were not prepared to catch water, having nothing to put it in. Our next object was to get fire, and after gathering some of the driest fuel to be found, and having a small piece of cotton wick-yarn, with flint and steel, we kindled a fire, which was never afterwards suffered to be extinguished. The night was very dark, but we found a piece of old rope, which when well lighted served for a candle. On examining the ground under the roof, we found perhaps thousands of creeping insects, scorpions, lizards, crickets, &c. After scraping them out as well as we could, the most of us having nothing but the damp earth for a bed, laid ourselves down in hopes of some rest; but it being so wet, gave many of us severe colds, and one of the Spaniards was quite sick for several days.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Sunday, 20th. – As soon as day-light came on, we proceeded to take a view of our little island, and found it to measure only one acre, of coarse, white sand; about two feet, and in some spots perhaps three feet above the surface of the ocean. On the highest part were growing some bushes and small mangroves, (the dry part of which was our fuel) and the wild castor oil beans. We were greatly disappointed in not finding the latter suitable food; likewise some of the prickly pear bushes, which gave us only a few pears about the size of our small button pear; the outside has thorns, which if applied to the fingers or lips, will remain there, and cause a severe smarting similar to the nettle; the inside a spongy substance, full of juice and seeds, which are red and a little tartish – had they been there in abundance, we should not have suffered so much for water – but alas! even this substitute was not for us. On the northerly side of the island was a hollow, where the tide penetrated the sand, leaving stagnant water. We presumed, in hurricanes the island was nearly overflowed. According to the best calculations I could make, we were about thirty-five miles from any part of Cuba, one hundred from Trinidad and forty from the usual track of American vessels, or others which might pass that way. No vessel of any considerable size, can safely pass among these Keys (or "Queen's Gardens," as the Spaniards call them) being a large number extending from Cape Cruz to Trinidad, one hundred and fifty miles distance; and many more than the charts have laid down, most of them very low and some covered at high water, which makes it very dangerous for navigators without a skilful pilot. After taking this view of our condition, which was very gloomy, we began to suspect we were left on this desolate island by those merciless plunderers to perish. Of this I am now fully convinced; still we looked anxiously for the pirate's boat to come according to promise with more water and provisions, but looked in vain. We saw them soon after get under way with all sail set and run directly from us until out of our sight, and we never saw them again! One may partially imagine our feelings, but they cannot be put into words. Before they were entirely out of sight of us, we raised the white blanket upon a pole, waving it in the air, in hopes, that at two miles distance they would see it and be moved to pity. But pity in such monsters was not to be found. It was not their interest to save us from the lingering death, which we now saw before us. We tried to compose ourselves, trusting to God, who had witnessed our sufferings, would yet make use of some one, as the instrument of his mercy towards us. Our next care, now, was to try for water. We dug several holes in the sand and found it, but quite too salt for use. The tide penetrates probably through the island. We now came on short allowances for water. Having no means of securing what we had by lock and key, some one in the night would slyly drink, and it was soon gone. The next was to bake some bread, which we did by mixing flour with salt water and frying it in lard, allowing ourselves eight quite small pancakes to begin with. The ham was reserved for some more important occasion, and the salt fish was lost for want of fresh water. The remainder of this day was passed in the most serious conversation and reflection. At night, I read prayers from the "Prayer Book," before mentioned, which I most carefully concealed while last on board the pirates. This plan was pursued morning and evening, during our stay there. Then retired for rest and sleep, but realized little of either.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Monday, 21st. — In the morning we walked round the beach, in expectation of finding something useful. On our way picked up a paddle about three feet long, very similar to the Indian canoe paddle, except the handle, which was like that of a shovel, the top part being split off; we laid it by for the present. We likewise found some konchs and roasted them; they were pretty good shell fish, though rather tough. We discovered at low water, a bar or spit of sand extending north-easterly from us, about three miles distant, to a cluster of Keys, which were covered with mangrove trees, perhaps as high as our quince tree. My friend Mr. Bracket and George attempted to wade across, being at that time of tide only up to their armpits; but were pursued by a shark, and returned without success. The tide rises about four feet.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Tuesday, 22d. — We found several pieces of the palmetto or cabbage tree, and some pieces of boards, put them together in the form of a raft, and endeavored to cross, but that proved ineffectual. Being disappointed, we set down to reflect upon other means of relief, intending to do all in our power for safety while our strength continued. While setting here, the sun was so powerful and oppressive, reflecting its rays upon the sea, which was then calm, and the white sand which dazzled the eye, was so painful, that we retired under the awning; there the moschetoos and flies were so numerous, that good rest could not be found. We were, however, a little cheered, when, in scraping out the top of the ground to clear out, I may say, thousands of crickets and bugs, we found a hatchet, which was to us peculiarly serviceable. At night the strong north-easterly wind, which prevails there at all seasons, was so cold as to make it equally uncomfortable with the day. Thus day after day, our sufferings and apprehensions multiplying, we were very generally alarmed.

Thursday, 24th. — This morning, after taking a little coffee, made of the water which we thought least salt, and two or three of the little cakes, we felt somewhat refreshed, and concluded to make another visit to those Keys, in hopes of finding something more, which might make a raft for us to escape the pirates, and avoid perishing by thirst. Accordingly seven of us set off, waded across the bar and searched all the Keys thereabouts. On one we found a number of sugar-box shooks, two lashing plank and some pieces of old spars, which were a part of the Exertion's deck load, that was thrown overboard when she grounded on the bar, spoken of in the first part of the narrative. It seems they had drifted fifteen miles, and had accidentally lodged on these very Keys within our reach. Had the pirates known this, they would undoubtedly have placed us in another direction. They no doubt thought that they could not place us on a worse place. The wind at this time was blowing so strong on shore, as to prevent rafting our stuff round to our island, and we were obliged to haul it upon the beach for the present; then dug for water in the highest place, but found it as salt as ever, and then returned to our habitation. But hunger and thirst began to prey upon us, and our comforts were as few as our hopes.

Friday, 25th. — Again passed over to those Keys to windward in order to raft our stuff to our island, it being most convenient for building. But the surf on the beach was so very rough, that we were again compelled to postpone it. Our courage, however, did not fail where there was the slightest hopes of life. Returning without it, we found on our way an old top timber of some vessel; it had several spikes on it, which we afterwards found very serviceable. In the hollow of an old tree, we found two guarnas of small size, one male, the other female. Only one was caught. After taking off the skin, we judged it weighed a pound and a half. With some flour and lard, (the only things we had except salt water,) it made us a fine little mess. We thought it a rare dish, though a small one for eleven half starved persons. At the same time a small vessel hove in sight; we made a signal to her with the blanket tied to a pole and placed it on the highest tree — some took off their white clothes and waved them in the air, hoping they would come to us; should they be pirates, they could do no more than kill us, and perhaps would give us some water, for which we began to suffer most excessively; but, notwithstanding all our efforts, she took no notice of us.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Saturday, 26th. — This day commenced with moderate weather and smooth sea; at low tide found some cockles; boiled and eat them, but they were very painful to the stomach. David Warren had a fit of strangling, with swelling of the bowels; but soon recovered, and said, "something like salt rose in his throat and choked him." Most of us then set off for the Keys, where the plank and shooks were put together in a raft, which we with pieces of boards paddled over to our island; when we consulted the best plan, either to build a raft large enough for us all to go on, or a boat; but the shooks having three or four nails in each, and having a piece of large reed or bamboo, previously found, of which we made pins, we concluded to make a boat.

Sunday, 27 — Commenced our labor, for which I know we need offer no apology. We took the two planks, which were about fourteen feet long, and two and a half wide, and fixed them together for the bottom of the boat; then with moulds made of palmetto bark, cut timber and knees from mangrove trees which spread so much as to make the boat four feet wide at the top, placed them exactly the distance apart of an Havana sugar box. — Her stern was square and the bows tapered to a peak, making her form resemble a flat-iron. We proceeded thus far and returned to rest for the night — but Mr. Bracket was too unwell to get much sleep.

Monday, 28 — Went on with the work as fast as possible. Some of the Spaniards had long knives about them, which proved very useful in fitting timbers, and a gimblet of mine, accidentally found on board the pirate, enabled us to use the wooden pins. And now our spirits began to revive, though water, water, was continually in our minds. We now feared the pirates might possibly come, find out our plan and put us to death, (although before we had wished to see them, being so much in want of water.) Our labor was extremely burdensome, and the Spaniards considerably peevish — but they would often say to me "never mind captain, by and by, Americana or Spanyol catch them, me go and see 'um hung." We quitted work for the day, cooked some cakes but found it necessary to reduce the quantity again, however small before. We found some herbs on a windward Key, which the Spaniards called Spanish tea. — This when well boiled we found somewhat palatable, although the water was very salt. This herb resembles pennyroyal in look and taste, though not so pungent. In the evening when we were setting round the fire to keep off the mosquitoes, I observed David Warren's eyes shone like glass. The mate said to him – "David I think you will die before morning – I think you are struck with death now." I thought so too, and told him, "I thought it most likely we should all die here soon; but as some one of us might survive to carry the tidings to our friends, if you have any thing to say respecting your family, now is the time." – He then said, "I have a mother in Saco where I belong – she is a second time a widow – to-morrow if you can spare a scrap of paper and pencil I will write something." But no tomorrow came to him. – In the course of the night he had another spell of strangling, and soon after expired, without much pain and without a groan. He was about twenty-six years old. – How solemn was this scene to us! Here we beheld the ravages of death commenced upon us. More than one of us considered death a happy release. For myself I thought of my wife and children; and wished to live if God should so order it, though extreme thirst, hunger and exhaustion had well nigh prostrated my fondest hopes.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Tuesday, 29th. – Part of us recommenced labor on the boat, while myself and Mr. Bracket went and selected the highest clear spot of sand on the northern side of the island, where we dug Warren's grave, and boxed it up with shooks, thinking it would be the most suitable spot for the rest of us – whose turn would come next, we knew not. At about ten o'clock, A.M. conveyed the corpse to the grave, followed by us survivors – a scene, whose awful solemnity can never be painted. We stood around the grave, and there I read the funeral prayer from the Rev. Mr. Brooks's Family Prayer Book; and committed the body to the earth; covered it with some pieces of board and sand, and returned to our labor. One of the Spaniards, an old man, named Manuel, who was partial to me, and I to him, made a cross and placed it at the head of the grave saying, "Jesus Christ hath him now." Although I did not believe in any mysterious influence of this cross, yet I was perfectly willing it should stand there. The middle part of the day being very warm, our mouths parched with thirst, and our spirits so depressed, that we made but little progress during the remainder of this day, but in the evening were employed in picking oakum out of the bolt rope taken from the old sail.

Wednesday, 30th. – Returned to labor on the boat with as much vigor as our weak and debilitated state would admit, but it was a day of trial to us all; for the Spaniards and we Americans could not well understand each other's plans, and they being naturally petulant, would not work, nor listen with any patience for Joseph, our English fellow prisoner, to explain our views – they would sometimes undo what they had done, and in a few minutes replace it again; however before night we began to caulk her seams, by means of pieces of hard mangrove, made in form of a caulking-iron, and had the satisfaction of seeing her in a form something like a boat.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Thursday, 31st. — Went on with the work, some at caulking, others at battening the seams with strips of canvas, and pieces of pine nailed over, to keep the oakum in. Having found a suitable pole for a mast, the rest went about making a sail from the one we had used for a covering, also fitting oars of short pieces of boards, in form of a paddle, tied on a pole, we having a piece of fishing line brought by one of the prisoners. Thus, at three P.M. the boat was completed and put afloat. — We had all this time confidently hoped, that she would be sufficiently large and strong to carry us all — we made a trial and were disappointed! This was indeed a severe trial, and the emotions it called up were not easy to be suppressed. She proved leaky, for we had no carpenter's yard, or smith's shop to go to. — And now the question was, "who should go, and how many?" I found it necessary for six; four to row, one to steer and one to bale. Three of the Spaniards and the Frenchman claimed the right, as being best acquainted with the nearest inhabitants; likewise, they had when taken, two boats left at St. Maria, (about forty miles distant,) which they were confident of finding. They promised to return within two or three days for the rest of us — I thought it best to consent — Mr. Bracket it was agreed should go in my stead, because my papers must accompany me as a necessary protection, and my men apprehended danger if they were lost. Joseph Baxter (I think was his name) they wished should go, because he could speak both languages — leaving Manuel, George, Thomas and myself, to wait their return. Having thus made all arrangements, and putting up a keg of the least salt water, with a few pancakes of salt fish, they set off a little before sunset with our best wishes and prayers for their safety and return to our relief. — To launch off into the wide ocean, with strength almost exhausted, and in such a frail boat as this, you will say was very hazardous, and in truth it was; but what else was left to us? — Their intention was to touch at the Key where the Exertion was and if no boat was to be found there, to proceed to St. Maria, and if none there, to go to Trinidad and send us relief. — But alas! it was the last time I ever saw them! — Our suffering this day was most acute.

Tuesday, 5th. — About ten o'clock, A.M. discovered a boat drifting by on the southeastern side of the island about a mile distant. I deemed it a providential thing to us, and urged Thomas and George trying the raft for her. They reluctantly consented and set off, but it was nearly three P.M. when they came up with her — it was the same boat we had built! Where then was my friend Bracket and those who went with him? Every appearance was unfavorable. — I hoped that a good Providence had yet preserved him. — The two men who went for the boat, found it full of water, without oars, paddle, or sail; being in this condition, and about three miles to the leeward, the men found it impossible to tow her up, so left her, and were until eleven o'clock at night getting back with the raft. They were so exhausted, that had it not been nearly calm, they could never have returned.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Wednesday, 6th. — This morning was indeed the most gloomy I had ever experienced. — There appeared hardly a ray of hope that my friend Bracket could return, seeing the boat was lost. Our provisions nearly gone; our mouths parched extremely with thirst; our strength wasted; our spirits broken, and our hopes imprisoned within the circumference of this desolate island in the midst of an unfrequented ocean; all these things gave to the scene around us the hue of death. In the midst of this dreadful despondence, a sail hove in sight bearing the white flag! Our hopes were raised, of course — but no sooner raised than darkened, by hearing a gun fired. Here then was another gang of pirates. She soon, however, came near enough to anchor, and her boat pushed off towards us with three men in her. — Thinking it now no worse to die by sword than famine, I walked down immediately to meet them. I knew them not. — A moment before the boat touched the ground, a man leaped from her bows and caught me in his arms! It was Nickola! — saying, "Do you now believe Nickola is your friend? yes, said he, Jamieson will yet prove himself so." — No words can express my emotions at this moment. This was a friend indeed. The reason of my not recognizing them before, was that they had cut their beards and whiskers. Turning to my fellow-sufferers, Nickola asked — "Are these all that are left of you? where are the others?" — At this moment seeing David's grave — "are they dead then? Ah! I suspected it, I know what you were put here for." As soon as I could recover myself, I gave him an account of Mr. Bracket and the others. — "How unfortunate," he said, "they must be lost, or some pirates have taken them." — "But," he continued, "we have no time to lose; you had better embark immediately with us, and go where you please, we are at your service." The other two in the boat were Frenchmen, one named Lyon, the other Parrikete. They affectionately embraced each of us; then holding to my mouth the nose of a teakettle, filled with wine, said "Drink plenty, no hurt you." I drank as much as I judged prudent. They then gave it to my fellow sufferers — I experienced almost immediate relief, not feeling it in my head; they had also brought in the boat for us, a dish of salt beef and potatoes, of which we took a little. Then sent the boat on board for the other two men, being five in all; who came ashore, and rejoiced enough was I to see among them Thomas Young, one of my crew, who was detained on board the Mexican, but had escaped through Nickola's means; the other a Frenchman, named John Cadet. I now thought again and again, with troubled emotion, of my dear friend Bracket's fate. I took the last piece of paper I had, and wrote with pencil a few words, informing him (should he come there) that "I and the rest were safe; that I was not mistaken in the friend in whom I had placed so much confidence, that he had accomplished my highest expectations; and that I should go immediately to Trinidad, and requested him to go there also, and apply to Mr. Isaac W. Lord, my consignee, for assistance." I put the paper into a junk bottle, previously found on the beach, put in a stopper, and left it, together with what little flour remained, a keg of water brought from Nickola's vessel, and a few other things which I thought might be of service to him. We then repaired with our friends on board, where we were kindly treated. She was a sloop from Jamaica, of about twelve tons, with a cargo of rum and wine, bound to Trinidad. I asked "which way they intended to go?" They said "to Jamaica if agreeable to me." As I preferred Trinidad, I told them, "if they would give me the Exertion's boat which was along-side (beside their own) some water and provisions, we would take chance in her." - "For perhaps," said I, "you will fare better at Jamaica, than at Trinidad." After a few minutes consultation, they said "you are too much exhausted to row the distance of one hundred miles, therefore we will go and carry you - we consider ourselves at your service." I expressed a wish to take a look at the Exertion, possibly we might hear something of Mr. Bracket. Nickola said "very well," so got under way, and run for her, having a light westerly wind. He then related to me the manner of their desertion from the pirates; as nearly as I can recollect his own words, he said, "A few days since, the pirates took four small vessels, I believe Spaniards; they having but two officers for the two first, the third fell to me as prize master, and having an understanding with the three Frenchmen and Thomas, selected them for my crew, and went on board with orders to follow the Mexican; which I obeyed. The fourth, the pirates took out all but one man and bade him also follow their vessel. Now our schooner leaked so bad, that we left her and in her stead agreed to take this little sloop (which we are now in) together with the one man. The night being very dark we all agreed to desert the pirates - altered our course and touched at St. Maria, where we landed the one man - saw no boats there, could hear nothing from you, and agreed one and all at the risk of our lives to come and liberate you if you were alive; knowing, as we did, that you were put on this Key to perish. On our way we boarded the Exertion, thinking possibly you might have been there. On board her we found a sail and paddle. We took one of the pirate's boats which they had left along-side of her, which proves how we came by two boats. My friend, the circumstance I am now about to relate, will somewhat astonish you. When the pirate's boat with Bolidar was sent to the before mentioned Key, on the 19th of January, it was their intention to leave you prisoners there, where was nothing but salt water and mangroves, and no possibility of escape. This was the plan of Baltizar, their abandoned pilot; but Bolidar's heart failed him, and he objected to it; then, after a conference, Captain Jonnia ordered you to be put on the little island from whence we have now taken you. But after this was done, that night the French and Portuguese part of the Mexican's crew protested against it; so that Captain Jonnia to satisfy them, sent his large boat to take you and your fellow prisoners back again, taking care to select his confidential Spaniards for this errand. And you will believe me they set off from the Mexican, and after spending about as much time as would really have taken them to come to you, they returned, and reported they had been to your island, and landed, and that none of you were there, somebody having taken you off! This, all my companions here know to be true. — I knew it was impossible you could have been liberated, and therefore we determined among ourselves, that should an opportunity occur we would come and save your lives, as we now have." He then expressed, as he hitherto had done (and I believe with sincerity), his disgust with the bad company which he had been in, and looked forward with anxiety to the day when he might return to his native country. I advised him to get on board an American vessel, whenever an opportunity offered, and come to the United States; and on his arrival direct a letter to me; repeating my earnest desire to make some return for the disinterested friendship which he had shown toward me. With the Frenchman I had but little conversation, being unacquainted with the language.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Here ended Nickola's account. "And now" said the Frenchman, "our hearts be easy." Nickola observed he had left all and found us. I gave them my warmest tribute of gratitude, saying I looked upon them under God as the preservers of our lives, and promised them all the assistance which my situation might enable me to afford. — This brings me to,

Thursday evening, 7th, when, at eleven o'clock, we anchored at the creek's mouth, near the Exertion. I was anxious to board her; accordingly took with me Nickola, Thomas, George and two others, well armed, each with a musket and cutlass. I jumped on her deck, saw a fire in the camboose, but no person there: I called aloud Mr. Bracket's name several times, saying "it is Captain Lincoln, don't be afraid, but show yourself," but no answer was given. She had no masts, spars, rigging, furniture, provisions or any thing left, except her bowsprit, and a few barrels of salt provisions of her cargo. Her ceiling had holes cut in it, no doubt in their foolish search for money. I left her with peculiar emotions, such as I hope never again to experience; and returned to the little sloop where we remained till —

Friday, 8th — When I had disposition to visit the island on which we were first imprisoned. — Found nothing there — saw a boat among the mangroves, near the Exertion. Returned, and got under way immediately for Trinidad. In the night while under full sail, run aground on a sunken Key, having rocks above the water, resembling old stumps of trees; we, however, soon got off and anchored. Most of those Keys have similar rocks about them, which navigators must carefully guard against.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Monday, 11th – Got under way – saw a brig at anchor about five miles below the mouth of the harbor; we hoped to avoid her speaking us; but when we opened in sight of her, discovered a boat making towards us, with a number of armed men in her. This alarmed my friends, and as we did not see the brig's ensign hoisted, they declared the boat was a pirate, and looking through the spy-glass, they knew some of them to be the Mexican's men! This state of things was quite alarming. They said, "we will not be taken alive by them." Immediately the boat fired a musket; the ball passed through our mainsail. My friends insisted on beating them off: I endeavored to dissuade them, believing, as I did, that the brig was a Spanish man-of-war, who had sent her boat to ascertain who we were. I thought we had better heave to. Immediately another shot came. Then they insisted on fighting, and said "if I would not help them, I was no friend." I reluctantly acquiesced, and handed up the guns – commenced firing upon them and they upon us. We received several shot through the sails, but no one was hurt on either side. Our boats had been cast adrift to make us go the faster, and we gained upon them – continued firing until they turned from us, and went for our boats, which they took in tow for the brig. Soon after this, it became calm: then I saw that the brig had us in her power. – She manned and armed two more boats for us. We now concluded, since we had scarcely any ammunition, to surrender; and were towed down alongside the brig on board, and were asked by the captain, who could speak English, "what for you fire on the boat?" I told him "we thought her a pirate, and did not like to be taken by them again, having already suffered too much;" showing my papers. He said, "Captain Americana, never mind, go and take some dinner – which are your men?" I pointed them out to him, and he ordered them the liberty of the decks; but my friend Nickola and his three associates were immediately put in irons. They were, however, afterwards taken out of irons and examined; and I understood the Frenchmen agreed to enlist, as they judged it the surest way to better their condition. Whether Nickola enlisted, I do not know, but think that he did, as I understood that offer was made to him: I however endeavored to explain more distinctly to the captain, the benevolent efforts of these four men by whom my life had been saved, and used every argument in my power to procure their discharge. I also applied to the governor, and exerted myself with peculiar interest, dictated as I trust with heartfelt gratitude – and I ardently hope ere this, that Nickola is on his way to this country, where I may have an opportunity of convincing him that such an act of benevolence will not go unrewarded. Previous to my leaving Trinidad, I made all the arrangements in my power with my influential friends, and doubt not, that their laudable efforts will be accomplished. – The sloop's cargo was then taken on board the brig; after which the captain requested a certificate that I was politely treated by him, saying that his name was Captain Candama, of the privateer brig Prudentee of eighteen guns. This request I complied with. His first lieutenant told me he had sailed out of Boston, as commander for T.C. Amory, Esq. during the last war. In the course of the evening my friends were taken out of irons and examined separately, then put back again. The captain invited me to supper in his cabin, and a berth for the night, which was truly acceptable. The next morning after breakfast, I with my people were set on shore with the few things we had, with the promise of the Exertion's small boat in a day or two, — but it was never sent me — the reason, let the reader imagine. On landing at the wharf Casildar, we were immediately taken by soldiers to the guard house, which was a very filthy place; thinking I suppose, and even calling us, pirates. Soon some friends came to see me. Mr. Cotton, who resides there brought us in some soup. Mr. Isaac W. Lord, of Boston, my merchant, came with Captain Tate, who sent immediately to the governor; for I would not show my papers to any one else. He came about sunset, and after examining Manuel my Spanish fellow prisoner, and my papers, said to be, giving me the papers, "Captain, you are at liberty." I was kindly invited by Captain Matthew Rice, of schooner Galaxy, of Boston, to go on board his vessel, and live with him during my stay there. This generous offer I accepted, and was treated by him with the greatest hospitality; for I was hungered and he gave me meat, I was athirst and he gave me drink, I was naked and he clothed me, a stranger and he took me in. He likewise took Manuel and my three men for that night. Next day Mr. Lord rendered me all necessary assistance in making my protest. He had heard nothing from me until my arrival. I was greatly disappointed in not finding Mr. Bracket, and requested Mr. Lord to give him all needful aid if he should come there. To Captain Carnes, of the schooner Hannah, of Boston, I would tender my sincere thanks, for his kindness in giving me a passage to Boston, which I gladly accepted. To those gentlemen of Trinidad, and many captains of American vessels, who gave me sea clothing, &c., I offer my cordial gratitude.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

I am fully of the opinion that these ferocious pirates are linked in with many inhabitants of Cuba; and the government in many respects appears covertly to encourage them.

It is with heartfelt delight, that, since the above narrative was written, I have learned that Mr. Bracket and his companions are safe; he arrived at Port d'Esprit, about forty leagues east of Trinidad. A letter has been received from him, stating that he should proceed to Trinidad the first opportunity. — It appears that after reaching the wreck, they found a boat from the shore, taking on board some of the Exertion's cargo, in which they proceeded to the above place. Why it was not in his power to come to our relief will no doubt be satisfactorily disclosed when he may be so fortunate as once more to return to his native country and friends.

I felt great anxiety to learn what became of Jamieson, who, my readers will recollect, was detained on board the Spanish brig Prudentee near Trinidad. I heard nothing from him, until I believe eighteen months after I reached home, when I received a letter from him, from Montego Bay, Jamaica, informing me that he was then residing in that island. I immediately wrote to him, and invited him to come on to the United States. He accordingly came on passenger with Captain Wilson of Cohasset, and arrived in Boston, in August, 1824. Our meeting was very affecting. Trying scenes were brought up before us; scenes gone forever, through which we had passed together, where our acquaintance was formed, and since which time, we had never met. I beheld once more the preserver of my life; the instrument, under Providence, of restoring me to my home, my family, and my friends, and I regarded him with no ordinary emotion. My family were delighted to see him, and cordially united in giving him a warm reception. He told me that after we separated in Trinidad, he remained on board the Spanish brig. The commander asked him and his companions if they would enlist; the Frenchmen replied that they would, but he said nothing, being determined to make his escape, the very first opportunity which should present. The Spanish brig afterwards fell in with a Columbian Patriot, an armed brig of eighteen guns. Being of about equal force, they gave battle, and fought between three and four hours. Both parties were very much injured; and, without any considerable advantage on either side, both drew off to make repairs. The Spanish brig Prudentee, put into St. Jago de Cuba. Jamieson was wounded in the action, by a musket ball, through his arm, and was taken on shore, with the other wounded, and placed in the hospital of St. Jago. Here he remained for a considerable time, until he had nearly recovered, when he found an opportunity of escaping, and embarking for Jamaica. He arrived in safety at Kingston, and from there, travelled barefoot over the mountains, until very much exhausted, he reached Montego Bay, where he had friends, and where one of his brothers possessed some property. From this place, he afterwards wrote to me. He told me that before he came to Massachusetts, he saw the villainous pilot of the Mexican, the infamous Baltizar, with several other pirates, brought into Montego Bay, from whence they were to be conveyed to Kingston to be executed. Whether the others were part of the Mexican's crew, or not, I do not know. Baltizar was an old man, and as Jamieson said, it was a melancholy and heart-rending sight, to see him borne to execution with those gray hairs, which might have been venerable in virtuous old age, now a shame and reproach to this hoary villain, for he was full of years, and old in iniquity. When Jamieson received the letter which I wrote him, he immediately embarked with Captain Wilson, and came to Boston, as I have before observed.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

According to his own account he was of a very respectable family in Greenock, Scotland. His father when living was a rich cloth merchant, but both his father and mother had been dead many years. He was the youngest of thirteen children, and being, as he said, of a roving disposition, had always followed the seas. He had received a polite education, and was of a very gentlemanly deportment. He spoke several living languages, and was skilled in drawing and painting. He had travelled extensively in different countries, and acquired in consequence an excellent knowledge of their manners and customs. His varied information (for hardly any subject escaped him) rendered him a very entertaining companion. His observations on the character of different nations were very liberal; marking their various traits, their virtues and vices, with playful humorousness, quite free from bigotry, or narrow prejudice.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

I was in trade, between Boston and Philadelphia, at the time he came to Massachusetts, and he sailed with me several trips as my mate. He afterwards went to Cuba, and was subsequently engaged in the mackerel fishery, out of the port of Hingham, during the warm season, and in the winter frequently employed himself in teaching navigation to young men, for which he was eminently qualified. He remained with us, until his death, which took place in 1829. At this time he had been out at sea two or three days, when he was taken sick, and was carried into Cape Cod, where he died, on the first day of May, 1829, and there his remains lie buried. Peace be to his ashes! They rest in a strange land, far from his kindred and his native country.

Since his death I have met with Mr. Stewart, of Philadelphia, who was Commercial Agent in Trinidad at the time of my capture. He informed me that the piratical schooner Mexican, was afterwards chased by an English government vessel, from Jamaica, which was cruising in search of it. Being hotly pursued, the pirates deserted their vessel, and fled to the mangrove bushes, on an island similar to that on which they had placed me and my crew to die. The English surrounded them, and thus they were cut off from all hopes of escape. They remained there, I think fourteen days, when being almost entirely subdued by famine, eleven surrendered themselves, and were taken. The others probably perished among the mangroves. The few who were taken were carried by the government vessel into Trinidad. Mr. Stewart said that he saw them himself, and such miserable objects, that had life, he never before beheld. They were in a state of starvation; their beards had grown to a frightful length, their bodies, were covered with filth and vermin, and their countenances were hideous. From Trinidad they were taken to Kingston, Jamaica, and there hung on Friday, the 7th of February, 1823.

About a quarter of an hour before day dawn, the wretched culprits were taken from the jail, under a guard of soldiers from the 50th regiment, and the City Guard. On their arrival at the wherry wharf, the military retired, and the prisoners, with the Town Guard were put on board two wherries, in which they proceeded to Port Royal Point, the usual place of execution in similar cases. They were there met by a strong party of military, consisting of 50 men, under command of an officer. They formed themselves into a square round the place of execution, with the sheriff and his officers with the prisoners in the centre. The gallows was of considerable length, and contrived with a drop so as to prevent the unpleasant circumstances which frequently occur.

The unfortunate men had been in continual prayer from the time they were awakened out of a deep sleep till they arrived at that place, where they were to close their existence.

They all expressed their gratitude for the attention they had met with from the sheriff and the inferior officers. Many pressed the hands of the turnkey to their lips, others to their hearts and on their knees, prayed that God, Jesus Christ, and the Virgin Mary would bless him and the other jailors for their goodness. They all then fervently joined in prayer. To the astonishment of all, no clerical character, of any persuasion, was present. They repeatedly called out "Adonde esta el padre,"

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

(Where is the holy father).

Juan Hernandez called on all persons present to hear him – he was innocent; what they had said about his confessing himself guilty was untrue. He had admitted himself guilty, because he hoped for pardon; but that now he was to die, he called God, Jesus Christ, the Holy Ghost, the Virgin Mary, and the Saints, to witness that he spoke the truth – that he was no pirate, no murderer – he had been forced. The Lieutenant of the pirates was a wretch, who did not fear God, and had compelled him to act. Juan Gutierrez and Francisco de Sayas were loud in their protestations of innocence.

Manuel Lima said, for himself, he did not care; he felt for the old man (Miguel Jose). How could he be a pirate who could not help himself? If it were a Christian country, they would have pardoned him for his gray hairs. He was innocent – they had both been forced. Let none of his friends or relations ever venture to sea – he hoped his death would be a warning to them, that the innocent might suffer for the guilty. The language of this young man marked him a superior to the generality of his companions in misfortune. The seamen of the Whim stated that he was very kind to them when prisoners on board the piratical vessel. Just before he was turned off, he addressed the old man – “Adios viejo, para siempre adios.” – (Farewell, old man, forever farewell.)

Several of the prisoners cried out for mercy, pardon, pardon. Domingo Eucalla, the black man, then addressed them. “Do not look for mercy here, but pray to God; we are all brought here to die. This is not built for nothing; here we must end our lives. You know I am innocent, but I must die the same as you all. There is not any body here who can do us any good, so let us think only of God Almighty. We are not children but men, you know that all must die; and in a few years those who kill us must die too. When I was born, God set the way of my death; I do not blame any body. I was taken by the pirates and they made me help them; they would not let me be idle. I could not show that this was the truth, and therefore they have judged me by the people they have found me with. I am put to death unjustly, but I blame nobody. It was my misfortune. Come, let us pray. If we are innocent, so much the less we have to repent. I do not come here to accuse any one. Death must come one day or other; better to the innocent than guilty.” He then joined in prayer with the others. He seemed to be much revered by his fellow prisoners. He chose those prayers he thought most adapted to the occasion. Hundreds were witnesses to the manly firmness of this negro. Observing a bystander listening attentively to the complaints of one of his fellow wretches, he translated what had been said into English. With a steady pace, and a resolute and resigned countenance, he ascended the fatal scaffold. Observing the executioner unable to untie a knot on the collar of one of the prisoners, he with his teeth untied it. He then prayed most fervently till the drop fell.

Miguel Jose protested his innocence. – “No he robado, no he matado ninguno, muero inocente.” – (I have robbed no one, I have killed no one, I die innocent. I am an old man, but my family will feel my disgraceful death.)

Francisco Migul prayed devoutly, but inaudibly. – His soul seemed to have quitted the body before he was executed.

Breti Gullimillit called on all to witness his innocence; it was

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

of no use for him to say an untruth, for he was going before the face of God.

Augustus Hernandez repeatedly declared his innocence, requested that no one would say he had made a confession; he had none to make.

Juan Hernandez was rather obstinate when the execution pulled the cap over his eyes. He said, rather passionately – “Quita is de mis ojos.” – (Remove it from my eyes.) He then rubbed it up against one of the posts of the gallows.

Miguel Jose made the same complaint, and drew the covering from his eyes by rubbing his head against a fellow sufferer.

Pedro Nondre was loud in his ejaculations for mercy. He wept bitterly. He was covered with marks of deep wounds.

The whole of the ten included in the death warrant, having been placed on the scaffold, and the ropes suspended, the drop was let down. Nondre being an immense heavy man, broke the rope, and fell to the ground alive. Juan Hernandez struggled long. Lima was much convulsed. The old man Gullimillit, and Migul, were apparently dead before the drop fell. Eucalla (the black man) gave one convulsion, and all was over.

When Nondre recovered from the fall and saw his nine lifeless companions stretched in death, he gave an agonizing shriek; he wrung his hands, screamed “Favor, favor, me matan sin causa. O! buenos Christianos, me amparen, ampara me, ampara me, no hay Christiano en asta, tiara?” (Mercy, mercy, they kill me without cause. – Oh, good Christians, protect me. Oh, protect me. Is there no Christian in this land?)

He then lifted his eyes to Heaven, and prayed long and loud. Upon being again suspended, he was for a long period convulsed. He was an immense powerful man, and died hard.

A piratical station was taken in the Island of Cuba by the U.S. schooners of war, Greyhound and Beagle. They left Thompson’s Island June 7, 1823, under the command of Lieuts. Kearney and Newton, and cruised within the Key’s on the south side of Cuba, as far as Cape Cruz, touching at all the intermediate ports on the island, to intercept pirates. On the 21st of July, they came to anchor off Cape Cruz, and Lieut. Kearney went in his boat to reconnoitre the shore, when he was fired on by a party of pirates who were concealed among the bushes. A fire was also opened from several pieces of cannon erected on a hill a short distance off. The boat returned, and five or six others were manned from the vessels, and pushed off for the shore, but a very heavy cannonade being kept up by the pirates on the heights, as well as from the boats, were compelled to retreat. The two schooners were then warped in, when they discharged several broadsides, and covered the landing of the boats. After a short time the pirates retreated to a hill that was well fortified. A small hamlet, in which the pirates resided, was set fire to and destroyed. Three guns, one a four pounder, and two large swivels, with several pistols, cutlasses, and eight large boats, were captured. A cave, about 150 feet deep, was discovered, near where the houses were, and after considerable difficulty, a party of seamen got to the bottom, where was found an immense quantity of plunder, consisting of broadcloths, dry goods, female dresses, saddlery, &c. Many human bones were also in the cave, supposed to have been unfortunate persons who were taken and put to death. A great many of the articles were brought away, and the rest destroyed. About forty pirates escaped to the heights, but many were supposed to have been killed from the fire of the schooners, as well as from the men who landed. The bushes were so thick that it was impossible to go after them. Several other caves are in the neighborhood, in which it was conjectured they occasionally take shelter.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

In 1823, Commodore Porter commanded the United States squadron in these seas; much good was done in preventing new acts of piracy; but these wretches kept aloof and did not venture to sea as formerly, but some were taken.

Almost every day furnished accounts evincing the activity of Commodore Porter, and the officers and men under his command; but for a long time their industry and zeal was rather shown in the suppression of piracy than the punishment of it. At length, however, an opportunity offered for inflicting the latter, as detailed in the following letter, dated Matanzas, July 10, 1823.

"I have the pleasure of informing you of a brilliant achievement obtained against the pirates on the 5th inst. by two barges attached to Commodore Porter's squadron, the Gallinipper, Lieut. Watson, 18 men, and the Moscheto, Lieut. Inman, 10 men. The barges were returning from a cruise to windward; when they were near Jiguapa Bay, 13 leagues to windward of Matanzas, they entered it — it being a rendezvous for pirates. They immediately discovered a large schooner under way, which they supposed to be a Patriot privateer; and as their stores were nearly exhausted, they hoped to obtain some supplies from her. They therefore made sail in pursuit. When they were within cannon shot distance, she rounded to and fired her long gun, at the same time run up the bloody flag, directing her course towards the shore, and continuing to fire without effect. When she had got within a short distance of the shore, she came to, with springs on her cable, continuing to fire; and when the barges were within 30 yards, they fired their muskets without touching boat or man; our men gave three cheers, and prepared to board; the pirates, discovering their intention, jumped into the water, when the bargemen, calling on the name of 'Allen,' commenced a destructive slaughter, killing them in the water and as they landed. So exasperated were our men, that it was impossible for their officers to restrain them, and many were killed after orders were given to grant quarter. Twenty-seven dead were counted, some sunk, five taken prisoners by the bargemen, and eight taken by a party of Spaniards on shore. The officers calculated that from 30 to 35 were killed. The schooner mounted a long nine pounder on a pivot, and 4 four pounders, with every other necessary armament, and a crew of 50 to 60 men, and ought to have blown the barges to atoms. She was commanded by the notorious Diablero or Little Devil. This statement I have from Lieut. Watson himself, and it is certainly the most decisive operation that has been effected against those murderers, either by the English or American force."

"This affair occurred on the same spot where the brave Allen fell about one year since. The prize was sent to Thompson's Island."

A British sloop of war, about the same time, captured a pirate schooner off St. Domingo, with a crew of 60 men. She had 200,000 dollars in specie, and other valuable articles on board. The brig Vestal sent another pirate schooner to New-Providence.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

December: Vincent Benavides, the son of the gaoler of Quirihue in the district of Concepcion, Chile, having been judged guilty of multiple acts of fierce piracy, was dragged from the Topocalma prison in a pannier tied to the tail of a mule and hanged in the great square of this municipality on the west coast of South America, after which his head and hands were placed on display atop high poles:

STATE MURDERSTATE MURDER

THE BLOODY CAREER AND EXECUTION OF VINCENT BENAVIDES A PIRATE ON THE WEST COAST OF SOUTH AMERICA³⁵⁷

Vincent Benavides was the son of the gaoler of Quirihue in the district of Concepcion. He was a man of ferocious manners, and had been guilty of several murders. Upon the breaking out of the revolutionary war, he entered the patriot army as a private soldier; and was a serjeant of grenadiers at the time of the first Chilian revolution. He, however, deserted to the Spaniards, and was taken prisoner in their service, when they sustained, on the plains of Maypo, on the 5th of April, 1818, that defeat which decided their fortunes in that part of America, and secured the independence of Chili. Benavides, his brother, and some other traitors to the Chilian cause, were sentenced to death, and brought forth in the Plaza, or public square of Santiago, in order to be shot. Benavides, though terribly wounded by the discharge, was not killed; but he had the presence of mind to counterfeit death in so perfect a manner, that the imposture was not suspected. The bodies of the traitors were not buried, but dragged away to a distance, and there left to be devoured by the gallinazos or vultures. The serjeant who had the superintendence of this part of the ceremony, had a personal hatred to Benavides, on account of that person having murdered some of his relations; and, to gratify his revenge, he drew his sword, and gave the dead body, (as he thought,) a severe gash in the side, as they were dragging it along. The resolute Benavides had fortitude to bear this also, without flinching or even showing the least indication of life; and one cannot help regretting that so determined a power of endurance had not been turned to a better purpose.

357. THE PIRATES OWN BOOK, OR AUTHENTIC NARRATIVES OF THE LIVES, EXPLOITS, AND EXECUTIONS OF THE MOST CELEBRATED SEA ROBBERS, by Charles Ellms (Portland: Published by Sanborn & Carter; Philadelphia: Thomas, Comperthwait, & Co., 1837. This would be republished in 1842 by A. and C.B. Edwards of New-York & Philadelphia, and in 1844 in Portland by Sanborn & Carter, and in 1855 by A. and C.B. Edwards of New-York, and in 1924 by Marine res. of Massachusetts, and in 1996 by Random House of New York.)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Benavides lay like a dead man, in the heap of carcasses, until it became dark; and then, pierced with shot, and gashed by the sword as he was, he crawled to a neighboring cottage, the inhabitants of which received him with the greatest kindness, and attended him with the greatest care.

The daring ruffian, who knew the value of his own talents and courage, being aware that General San Martin was planning the expedition to Peru, a service in which there would be much of desperation and danger, sent word to the General that he was alive, and invited him to a secret conference at midnight, in the same Plaza in which it was believed Benavides had been shot. The signal agreed upon, was, that they should strike fire three times with their flints, as that was not likely to be answered by any but the proper party, and yet was not calculated to awaken suspicion.

San Martin, alone, and provided with a brace of pistols, met the desperado; and after a long conference, it was agreed that Benavides should, in the mean time, go out against the Araucan Indians; but that he should hold himself in readiness to proceed to Peru, when the expedition suited.

Having procured the requisite passports, he proceeded to Chili, where, having again diverted the Chilians, he succeeded in persuading the commander of the Spanish troops, that he had force sufficient to carry on the war against Chili; and the commander in consequence retired to Valdivia, and left Benavides commander of the whole frontier on the Biobio.

Having thus cleared the coast of the Spanish commander, he went over to the Araucans, or rather, he formed a band of armed robbers, who committed every cruelty, and were guilty of every perfidy in the south of Chili. Whereever Benavides came, his footsteps were marked with blood, and the old men, the women, and the children, were butchered lest they should give notice of his motions.

When he had rendered himself formidable by land, he resolved to be equally powerful upon the sea. He equipped a corsair, with instructions to capture the vessels of all nations; and as Araucan is directly opposite the island of Santa Maria, where vessels put in for refreshment, after having doubled Cape Horn, his situation was well adapted for his purpose. He was but too successful. The first of his prizes was the American ship Hero, which he took by surprise in the night; the second, was the Herculia, a brig belonging to the same country. While the unconscious crew were proceeding, as usual, to catch seals on this island, lying about three leagues from the main land of Arauca, an armed body of men rushed from the woods, and overpowering them, tied their hands behind them, and left them under a guard on the beach. These were no other than the pirates, who now took the Herculia's own boats, and going on board, surprised the captain and four of his crew, who had remained to take care of the brig; and having brought off the prisoners from the beach, threw them all into the hold, closing the hatches over them. They then tripped the vessel's anchor, and sailing over in triumph to Arauca, were received by Benavides, with a salute of musketry fired under the Spanish flag, which it was their chief's pleasure to hoist on that day. In the course of the next night, Benavides ordered the captain and his crew to be removed to a house on shore, at some distance from the town; then taking them out, one by one, he stripped and pillaged them of all they possessed, threatening them the whole time with drawn swords and loaded muskets. Next morning he paid the prisoners a visit and ordered them to the capital, called together the principal people of the town, and desired each to select one as a servant. The captain and four others not happening to please the fancy of any one, Benavides, after saying he would himself take charge of the captain, gave directions, on pain of instant death, that some one should hold themselves responsible for the other prisoners. Some days after this they were called together, and required to serve as soldiers in the pirates army; an order to which they consented, knowing well by what they had already seen, that the consequence of refusal would be fatal.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Benavides, though unquestionably a ferocious savage, was, nevertheless, a man of resource, full of activity, and of considerable energy of character. He converted the whale spears and harpoons into lances for his cavalry, and halberts for his sergeants; and out of the sails he made trowsers for half of his army; the carpenters he set to work making baggage carts and repairing his boats; the armourers he kept perpetually at work, mending muskets, and making pikes; managing in this way, to turn the skill of every one of his prisoners to some useful account. He treated the officers, too, not unkindly, allowed them to live in his house, and was very anxious on all occasions, to have their advice respecting the equipment of his troops.

Upon one occasion, when walking with the captain of the Herculia, he remarked, that his army was now almost complete in every respect, except in one essential particular, and it cut him, he said to the soul, to think of such a deficiency; he had no trumpets for his cavalry, and added, that it was utterly impossible to make the fellows believe themselves dragoons, unless they heard a blast in their ears at every turn; and neither men nor horses would ever do their duty properly, if not roused to it by the sound of a trumpet; in short he declared, some device must be hit upon to supply this equipment. The captain, willing to ingratiate himself with the pirate, after a little reflection, suggested to him, that trumpets might easily be made of copper sheets on the bottoms of the vessels he had taken. "Very true," cried the delighted chief, "how came I not to think of that before?" Instantly all hands were employed in ripping off the copper, and the armourers being set to work under his personal superintendence, the whole camp, before night, resounded with the warlike blasts of the cavalry.

The captain of the ship, who had given him the brilliant idea of the copper trumpets, had by these means, so far won upon his good will and confidence, as to be allowed a considerable range to walk on. He of course, was always looking out for some plan of escape, and at length an opportunity occurring, he, with the mate of the Ocean, and nine of his crew, seized two whale boats, imprudently left on the banks of the river, and rowed off. Before quitting the shore, they took the precaution of staving all the other boats, to prevent pursuit, and accordingly, though their escape was immediately discovered, they succeeded in getting so much the start of the people whom Benavides sent in pursuit of them, that they reached St. Mary's Island in safety. Here they caught several seals upon which they subsisted very miserably till they reached Valparaiso. It was in consequence of their report of Benavides proceedings made to Sir Thomas Hardy, the commander-in-chief, that he deemed it proper to send a ship to rescue if possible, the remaining unfortunate captives at Arauca.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Benavides having manned the Herculia, it suited the mate, (the captain and crew being detained as hostages,) to sail with the brig to Chili, and seek aid from the Spanish governor. The Herculia returned with a twenty-four pounder, two field-pieces, eleven Spanish officers, and twenty soldiers, together with the most flattering letters and congratulations to the worthy ally of his Most Catholic Majesty. Soon after this he captured the Perseverance, English whaler, and the American brig Ocean, bound for Lima, with several thousand stand of arms on board. The captain of the Herculia, with the mate of the Ocean, and several men, after suffering great hardships, landed at Valparaiso, and gave notice of the proceedings of Benavides; and in consequence, Sir Thomas Hardy directed Captain Hall to proceed to Arauca with the convoy, to set the captives free, if possible.

It was for the accomplishment of this service that Capt. Hall sailed from Valparaiso; and he called at Conception on his way, in order to glean information respecting the pirate. Here the Captain ascertained that Benavides was between two considerable bodies of Chilian force, on the Chilian side of the Biobio, and one of those bodies between him and the river.

Having to wait two days at Conception for information, Captain Hall occupied them in observing the place; the country he describes as green and fertile, and having none of the dry and desert character of the environs of Valparaiso. Abundance of vegetables, wood, and also coals, are found on the shores of the bay.

On the 12th of October, the captain heard of the defeat of Benavides, and his flight, alone, across the Biobio into the Araucan country; and also that two of the Americans whom he had taken with him had made their escape, and were on board the Chacabuco. As these were the only persons who could give Captain Hall information respecting the prisoners of whom he was in quest, he set out in search of the vessel, and after two days' search, found her at anchor near the island of Mocha. From thence he learned that the captain of the Ocean, with several English and American seamen had been left at Arauca, when Benavides went on his expedition, and he sailed for that place immediately.

He was too late, however; the Chilian forces had already made a successful attack, and the Indians had fled, setting fire to the town and the ships. The Indians, who were in league with the Chilians, were every way as wild as those who arrayed themselves under Benavides. Capt. Hall, upon his return to Conception, though dissuaded from it by the governor, visited the Indian encampment.

When the captain and his associates entered the courtyard, they observed a party seated on the ground, round a great tub of wine, who hailed their entrance with loud shouts, or rather yells, and boisterously demanded their business; to all appearance very little pleased with the interruption. The interpreter became alarmed, and wished them to retire; but this the captain thought imprudent, as each man had his long spear close at hand, resting against the eaves of the house. Had they attempted to escape they must have been taken, and possibly sacrificed, by these drunken savages. As their best chance seemed to lie in treating them without any show of distrust, they advanced to the circle with a good humored confidence, which appeased them considerably. One of the party rose and embraced them in the Indian fashion, which they had learned from the gentlemen who had been prisoners with Benavides. After this ceremony they roared out to them to sit down on the ground, and with the most boisterous hospitality, insisted on their drinking with them; a request which they cheerfully complied with. Their anger soon vanished, and was succeeded by mirth and satisfaction, which speedily became as outrageous as their displeasure had been at first. Seizing a favorable opportunity, Captain Hall stated his wish to have an interview with their chief, upon which a message was sent to him; but he did not think fit to show himself for a considerable time, during which they remained with the party round the tub, who continued swilling their wine like so many hogs. Their heads soon became affected, and their obstreperous mirth increasing every minute, the situation of the strangers became by no means agreeable.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

At length Peneleo's door opened, and the chief made his appearance; he did not condescend, however, to cross the threshold, but leaned against the door post to prevent falling, being by some degrees more drunk than any of his people. A more finished picture of a savage cannot be conceived. He was a tall, broad shouldered man; with a prodigiously large head, and a square-shaped bloated face, from which peeped out two very small eyes, partly hid by an immense superfluity of black, coarse, oily, straight hair, covering his cheeks, hanging over his shoulders, and rendering his head somewhat the shape and size of a bee-hive. Over his shoulders was thrown a poncho of coarse blanket stuff. He received them very gruffly, and appeared irritated and sulky at having been disturbed; he was still more offended when he learned that they wished to see his captive. They in vain endeavored to explain their real views; but he grunted out his answer in a tone and manner which showed them plainly that he neither did, nor wished to understand them.

Whilst in conversation with Peneleo, they stole an occasional glance at his apartment. By the side of the fire burning in the middle of the floor, was seated a young Indian woman, with long black hair reaching to the ground; this, they conceived, could be no other than one of the unfortunate persons they were in search of; and they were somewhat disappointed to observe, that the lady was neither in tears, nor apparently very miserable; they therefore came away impressed with the unsentimental idea, that the amiable Peneleo had already made some impression on her young heart.

Two Indians, who were not so drunk as the rest, followed them to the outside of the court, and told them that several foreigners had been taken by the Chilians in the battle near Chilian, and were now safe. The interpreter hinted to them that this was probably invented by these cunning people, on hearing their questions in the court; but he advised them, as a matter of policy, to give them each a piece of money, and to get away as far as they could.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Captain Hall returned to Concepcion on the 23d of October, reached Valparaiso on the 26th, and in two weeks thereafter, the men of whom he was in search, made their appearance.

The bloody career of Benavides now drew near to a close. The defeat on the Chilian side of the Biobio, and the burning of Arauca with the loss of his vessels, he never recovered. At length, in the end of December 1821, discovering the miserable state to which he was reduced, he entreated the Intendant of Concepcion, that he might be received on giving himself up along with his partisans. This generous chief accepted his offer, and informed the supreme government; but in the meantime Benavides embarked in a launch, at the mouth of the river Lebo, and fled, with the intention of joining a division of the enemy's army, which he supposed to be at some one of the ports on the south coast of Peru. It was indeed absurd to expect any good faith from such an intriguer; for in his letters at this time, he offered his services to Chili and promised fidelity, while his real intention was still to follow the enemy. He finally left the unhappy province of Concepcion, the theatre of so many miserable scenes, overwhelmed with the misery which he had caused, without ever recollecting that it was in that province that he had first drawn his breath.

His despair in the boat made his conduct insupportable to those who accompanied him, and they rejoiced when they were obliged to put into the harbor of Topocalma in search of water of which they had run short. He was now arrested by some patriotic individuals. From the notorious nature of his crimes, alone, even the most impartial stranger would have condemned him to the last punishment; but the supreme government wished to hear what he had to say for himself, and ordered him to be tried according to the laws. It appearing on his trial that he had placed himself beyond the laws of society, such punishment was awarded him as any one of his crimes deserved. As a pirate, he merited death, and as a destroyer of whole towns, it became necessary to put him to death in such a manner as might satisfy outraged humanity, and terrify others who should dare to imitate him. In pursuance of the sentence passed upon him, he was dragged from the prison in a pannier tied to the tail of a mule, and was hanged in the great square; his head and hands were afterwards cut off, in order to their being placed upon high poles, to point out the places of his horrid crimes, Santa Juona, Tarpellanca and Arauca.

December 20, Thursday: Michael Martin, who had robbed Major John Bray in Medford, was hanged at Boston's and Cambridge's Lechmere Point. (An accomplice known as "Captain Lightfoot" had been able to escape, and would reside for many years incognito in Brattleboro, Vermont, not dying until 1835.)

H. Heine (the "H" at this point still stood for "Harry" rather than "Heinrich") made his debut as a poet with GEDICHTE VON H. HEINE (Berlin: in der Maurerfchen Buchhandlung, 1822; this included one of his most famous poems "Zwei Grenadiere" which reflected his admiration for Napoléon Bonaparte).

Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

5th day 20th of 12th M / Our Meeting was a pretty solid one & silent - life seemed rather low in my own particular, but being favor'd with an evidence that favour was not withheld I desire to be thankful. -

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1822

February 24, Sunday: On this day a man colloquially known as “Bluebeard” was hanged for having burned ten of his wives. His last words were not “Hey, if you have to ask, you wouldn’t understand.”

Early in this year (and I suppose I might as well place this record here as elsewhere, since I do not have a precise date), Adin Ballou got married with Abigail Sayles. Abigail’s mother, a Universalist, lent him a copy of Elhanan Winchester’s DIALOGUES ON THE UNIVERSAL RESTORATION. This reading and debates with some Universalist neighbors challenged his assumptions about salvation. At a Universalist meeting in nearby Wrentham, Massachusetts that year, Adin, attending as a spectator, was introduced to his distant cousin Hosea Ballou 2d, the Universalist minister from Roxbury, Massachusetts, who encouraged him to seek fellowship with the Universalists. After a period of study and prayer, Adin would post a letter to his distant cousin announcing his conversion to Universalism. The Christian Connexion would excommunicate him and his father would disinherit him.

(Adin would not marry multiple times and would not be burning any wives, so his name would never become quite so much a household word as Bluebeard’s has become.)

Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

1st day 24th of 2 M / Our morning Meeting was pretty full, a solid [—] ured season — D Buffum was very lively in a short testimony Invitation “Come Brother come Sister let us go up to the mountain of the Lord to the House of the God of Jacob.”— Silent & pretty well attended in the Afternoon — This [—] ning finished & put a letter in the Office To Stephen Oliver of [—] em [?] requesting information respecting the difficulties that [—] it there

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

 March 7, Thursday: Gilbert Close and Samuel Clisby, who had robbed Ezra Haynes in Cambridge Street, were taken to Boston Neck near the new city burying grounds and hanged.³⁵⁸

Gioachino Rossini departed from Naples heading for Vienna, accompanied by Isabella Colbran and three male singers.

Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

5th day 7th of 3 M 1822 / Our Meeting was Silent but a Solid good one, & favoured with the springing up of life, & for this privilege I feel thankful, while friends in some places are suffering under the disturbances of a ranterous & disorganising Spirit. — We had the company of Considerable portion of young people some of whose countenances bespoke Solidity & reverence & were a Strength to their older brethren & sisters —

RHODE ISLAND

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

 March 29, Friday: The murderer Samuel Green received his sentence of death. Returned to his cell, he wrote a letter to his mother Mercy Q. Green, which he would enclose in a letter posted to Joseph Chapman of Meredith, New Hampshire.

Despite his confessing in writing to at least two murders in an account that would be published in this year in Boston as a book, his mother was to take whatever comfort she could from the fact that his conviction, of the 3d murder, had been wrongfully obtained on the basis of suborned perjury from other convicts:

Boston, March 29, 1822.

My Dear Mother,

In the solitary recess of a prison, I now sit down to write to you the last lines you are ever to receive from your unfortunate son. I will not attempt, for the first time, to inform you of my unhappy fate. When I left the peaceful asylum of my tender mother, I little thought that I was leaving it for the last time, never more to return. I entertained nothing but the hope, and even boasted a long and lasting felicity: but alas, the scene changed — I was taken for breaking into a store, for which I was sent to prison; and having laid there for three years and a half, I was taken out and falsely accused of murder, for which I was tried, and two prisoners for the sake of their liberty, swore false against me; and now my dear mother, in the utmost agony of grief and despair, I must inform you I am condemned to die,

358. Presumably the duly constituted authorities in Boston would have experienced no difficulty whatever in seeking out and retaining and remunerating the services of one or another Protestant reverend who was not so embarrassed by the death penalty as to be unwilling to mount the scaffold with the victim, and administer last rites.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

and most likely, before you receive this, I shall be no more: excuse me for not writing to you before: I did not intend to let you know of my unhappy fate, and I am afraid this letter will break your heart, and sometimes I am tempted not to send it; but I consider it my duty to write you this letter, and humbly ask your pardon for all past offences and the many tears I have caused you to shed: had I have taken your advice and staid at home, I might have still lived and been happy. I have seen the folly of my ways, but alas, not till too late.

O, most offended mother, could I now but have the satisfaction of falling on my knees at your feet and receiving your pardon, I could then die in peace; but that privilege will be denied me. I am now in irons and chained to the floor – I shall soon sink under the weight of my misfortunes. I was sent to prison the 3d of July, 1818, and have been in prison ever since. I am now in Boston gaol and shall be executed within thirty days – You must remember my love to my brothers and sisters, and to those who once called themselves my friends – bid them from me a long and eternal farewell, and then my dear mother try to forget that there ever was such a being as your poor unfortunate son.

Samuel Green.

THE TASK OF THE HISTORIAN IS TO CREATE HINDSIGHT WHILE
INTERCEPTING ANY ILLUSION OF FORESIGHT. NOTHING A HUMAN CAN SEE CAN EVER BE SEEN AS IF THROUGH THE EYE OF GOD.

April 23, Tuesday: Adelaide Amelia Louisa Theresa Caroline of Saxe-Coburg Meiningen gave birth to twin boys at Bushy Park, who immediately died.

Samuel Green set his signature to a 47-page manuscript of his life, that would be printed in Boston as LIFE OF SAMUEL GREEN, EXECUTED AT BOSTON, APRIL 25, 1822, FOR THE MURDER OF BILLY WILLIAMS, A FELLOW CONVICT WITH GREEN, IN THE STATE PRISON. WRITTEN BY HIMSELF. THE FACTS HERE NARRATED, WERE DRAWN UP BY GREEN, WHILE IN PRISON, AND SOLEMNLY DECLARED TO BE THE TRUTH, A FEW MOMENTS BEFORE HIS EXECUTION (Boston: Published by David Felt, No. 63, State Street, 1822).

I was born in the Town of Meredith, County of Strafford, and State of New Hampshire, of poor, but respectable parents. They endeavored to give me a good education, but to no purpose; for I always had an aversion to books, was lazy and negligent, and continually bent upon mischief. When five or six years of age, my mother sent me to a school, about a mile from the house,

State Murder

“Stack of the Artist of Kouroo” Project

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

giving me cake and cheese, in a handkerchief, for my dinner; but being too proud to carry it, I frequently threw it away, and fasted the whole day. At other times, I passed whole days in the fields, rather than go to school, for which I always received a severe flogging when detected, although my parents were too indulgent for my good. When at school, I was often in mischief, and punished for my folly; by such tricks as pinning the clothes of several girls together, to set the whole in an uproar, I got the ill will of the master, and learned nothing. This course continued until I was eight years old; when being so mischievous, my parents, rather than correct me, sent me to live with a Mr. L____, where I had not been long, before I was detected in stealing money from one of the girls, and was severely whipped. The oftener I was whipped, the worse I grew, and determined on revenge, by pulling up a bed of onions, and another of poppies, in the garden; in consequence, I was again whipped, to make me confess, as no person saw me; but I resolutely denied it to the last. Being still further bent on having satisfaction, I watched an opportunity, caught a small dog belonging to the family, and threw him into the well, which was fifty feet deep; the putrefaction soon rendered the water offensive and useless; this put my master to the expense of cleaning the well, and forced us to bring water half a mile; being suspected, the whole of this work was required of me, so that I had the worst of it. I lived here two years; when one day, being at work in the barn, pitching hay to the cattle, I saw an old sow seize a young lamb and tear it in pieces: as several lambs had been, before, destroyed in the same way, I became enraged, did not stop to reflect, but plunged the fork into the hog's belly, which soon killed her. I went into the house, and informed my master that the hog had killed another lamb; to which he replied in a passion, and with an oath, "why did you not kill her?" — I answered, I have sir;— but when he found that I really had killed her, instead of being glad, and saying I had done right, he gave me another severe whipping. This I thought I did not deserve — and was so vexed, that I ran away, and returned to my parents, who instead of sending me back, as I feared, procured me another place, in the family of Mr. D____, in Newhampton; here I behaved well, for one year. I was sent to school, but learned very little, being always in mischief, and minding nothing but play; day after day, played truant, and was as often whipped, which still made me worse. One day, I went to a blacksmith's, to buy a jew's harp — not finding him at home, I took one without leave. On my return, I was whipped for running away. The next day, my master was informed of the theft, and whipped me again, ordered me to return the jew's harp, and be back in an hour and a half, or he would repeat the whipping. I overstaid the time, and he was as good as his word, making me "pay dear for the whistle." This severity was so great, that I ran home; but instead of meeting with a welcome reception from my parents; they carried me back again, and I received another whipping from my master. I now determined to kill him; and the next day, when he had gone to mill, prepared the means. He had a workshop, standing four or five feet from the ground, a large stone made a step to the door, which opened outwards. Just before he came home, I placed a large stick of timber against the door, inside, and a broad axe on the top of it, that they might fall on him, when the door was opened; but for fear that it should fail of doing the business, I fixed the barn door in the same way, and put the pitchfork on the top, with the point downwards, so that I had great hopes of success. When he came home, on opening the shop door, the fall of the timber sprained his shoulder; at the barn door, the fork wounded his foot: thus he escaped from my traps, and was able to give me more severe drubbings. To be revenged, I one day, split the locks of the hoops on the end of a hogshead of cider, so that it burst; they were deceived, and I escaped suspicion. Being further bent on doing all the mischief I could, I found a man who would buy grain at half price, taking it at midnight, let down by a rope, from a chamber window. In this way I kept myself in money, and lightened my master's grain chest. I also took butter from the cellar, and sometimes a whole cheese. While here, I formed an acquaintance with A____, who was a person after my own heart; he was older than myself, and experienced in vice – we passed our evenings and Sundays together, often robbing the farmers of their honey and water melons; of the former, taking whole hives at a time. I now became so negligent, that my master placed no confidence in me. As I was small, he thought me the fittest person, when he was planting, to put the beans, &c. in the corn hills; but instead of doing it as directed, I threw them into a woodchuck's hole; therefore he seldom had beans and pumpkins of my planting. This was discovered, by the seeds growing from the hole, and brought on me severe punishment. I then ran away; but instead of going home, I went about seven miles, to the house of my uncle. In a short time, my mother came after me, and carried me back to my old master – he was unwilling to receive me; but out of respect to my mother, consented to try me one more, on condition that I would mend my ways. To this I agreed, and went to work, and behaved much better than I had done; but my evil genius would not suffer me to live in peace. An accident happened, which caused me the severest whipping I ever had. The contents of a keg of molasses was missing; the mistress of the house pretended that she found some of it in the drain, and I was accused of putting it there. Of this crime I was innocent; – but one day, when the old man and myself were in the woods, felling timber, he took from a large elm tree about twenty branches and swore he would make me own it, or wear them out upon me. Being determined to die, rather than own any thing of which I was not guilty, I was almost beaten to death, and carried the marks of the elm for a month. In revenge, I set fire to the house; luckily for him, it was discovered in time to save the house. The fire was kindled among some rags in the chamber, and passed for an accident – I was however, closely watched, and locked up every night.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

It might be supposed, that I should, before this time, have been driven from the house; but I was an uncommon smart boy, always gay and cheerful, and could do more work than my master, so that he always had a hope of reforming me; but this task can be performed only by hemp, and his labor was all in vain. In this manner I lived, till I was fourteen years old, when we parted. It might be supposed, that I should, before this time, have been driven from the house; but I was an uncommon smart boy, always gay and cheerful, and could do more work than my master, so that he always had a hope of reforming me; but this task can be performed only by hemp, and his labor was all in vain. In this manner I lived, till I was fourteen years old, and we parted.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

BETWEEN ANY TWO MOMENTS ARE AN INFINITE NUMBER OF MOMENTS, AND BETWEEN THESE OTHER MOMENTS LIKEWISE AN INFINITE NUMBER, THERE BEING NO ATOMIC MOMENT JUST AS THERE IS NO ATOMIC POINT ALONG A LINE. MOMENTS ARE THEREFORE FIGMENTS. THE PRESENT MOMENT IS A MOMENT AND AS SUCH IS A FIGMENT, A FLIGHT OF THE IMAGINATION TO WHICH NOTHING REAL CORRESPONDS. SINCE PAST MOMENTS HAVE PASSED OUT OF EXISTENCE AND FUTURE MOMENTS HAVE YET TO ARRIVE, WE NOTE THAT THE PRESENT MOMENT IS ALL THAT EVER EXISTS — AND YET THE PRESENT MOMENT BEING A MOMENT IS A FIGMENT TO WHICH NOTHING IN REALITY CORRESPONDS.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

 April 25, Thursday: For having killed Billy Williams in the yard of the Massachusetts State Prison, Samuel Green was hanged on the Boston Neck gallows tree.³⁵⁹

(no gallows now, just a traffic light)

The survivors of the initial settlement on swampy Sherbro Island arrived at Cape Mesurado and began to build a new American Colonization Society settlement. A white representative of the Society was governing the colony, although eventually there would arise objections to the authoritarianism of a white Methodist missionary, the Reverend Jehudi Ashmun, who would replace Dr. Ayres as the ACS governing representative.

Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

5th day 25th of 4th M / With my H rode to Portsmouth to attend our Moy [Monthly] Meeting, stoped at Uncle Thurstons. – In the first Meeting was favored a little – two female appearances in the Ministry

In the last Meeting tho' I laboured to get into the life & center down to the gift, yet it lay so low & my efforts was so paralised that I could not attain to what I desired & took but little share in the buisness Dined at Uncle Stantons – then rode Home –

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

 July 2, Tuesday: River boats began using the Erie Canal section from the Genesee River to Pittsford, with overland connection for several miles until the Irondequoit valley embankment could be completed in October.

As the free black man Denmark Vesey and 5 slaves who had been his aides were being hanged at Blake's Landing, Charleston, one of the condemned men, Peter Poyas, was overheard to be imploring the others —

“Do not open your lips! Die silent, as you shall see me do.”

359. Presumably the duly constituted authorities in Boston would have experienced no difficulty whatever in seeking out and retaining and remunerating the services of one or another Protestant reverend who was not so embarrassed by the death penalty as to be unwilling to mount the scaffold with the victim, and administer last rites.

HDT

WHAT?

INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

July 3, Wednesday: Charles Babbage published his proposal for a “difference engine” for the mechanical calculation of logarithms and trigonometric functions. Construction of an operational version would proceed under British Government sponsorship from 1823 to 1832 but the enormous geared device would not be completed.

The Charleston Courier noted recent global and local events:

WEDNESDAY MORNING, JULY 3, 1822.

The Treaty with France, published in this morning's Courier, is copied from the National Intelligencer of the 28th ult. in which paper it appears both in French and English — but as we have no accents amongst our types, it was impossible for us to give it correctly in the French language. In the French copy, the signature of M. HYDE DE NEUVILLE precedes that of Mr. ADAMS.

Execution. — DENMARK VESEY, (a free black man) ROLLA, BATTEAU, NED, PETER, and JESSE, (slaves) convicted of an attempt to raise an insurrection in this state, were executed, pursuant to sentence, yesterday morning, between the hours of 6 and 8 o'clock.

Officers of the Charleston Bible Society, for 1822-3:

Gen. C.C. PINCKNEY, President.

Rev. Dr. FURMAN, Senior Vice-President.

DENMARK VESEY

HANGING

After this conspiracy, since Vesey had purchased his manumission, South Carolina would extend its prohibition of the manumission of slaves, which had been a protective ordinance applied only to those who were too old, sick, or crippled to any longer care for themselves, effective immediately, into a categorical and total prohibition of any manumission.

SERVILE INSURRECTION

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

July 12, Friday: The food crisis in Ireland was continuing, although this famine was not turning out to be so severe as the ones of 1800/1801 and of 1816/1819. In Dublin, “Orangemen” (supporters of English rule) were as usual peaceably decorating the statue of their King William on College Green when the Catholic population began to riot against them.

POTATO

The Sydney, Australia Gazette posted an alert that Thomas Brooks off the transport Grenada, John Heyburn off the transport Minerva, and John Creardon off the transport Lord Sidmouth were unaccountably absent from their posts of obligation and presumably at large among the public using false documents.

Gullah Jack and others were hanged in Charleston, South Carolina for having assisted Denmark Vesey in his ill-fated conspiracy to create a servile insurrection (the total of those hanged was rising to 34).

It had come to be reward-yourself time. The economist David Ricardo, accompanied by his wife, two younger daughters, a couple of maidservants and a courier, departed from London on a 5-month broadening “Grand Tour of the Continent.” They would pass through Calais and Brussels into Holland, stay at the Hague and Amsterdam, journey up the Rhine River to Bâle and tour Switzerland, cross from Geneva into Italy for excursions to the Mer de Glace and the Great St Bernard, and go over the Simplon pass to the Italian Lakes, Milan, Venice, and Florence. On their return they would pass through Pisa, Genoa, and Turin on their way to Paris. The trip would be memorialized and it is clear that a good time had been had by all.

WALDEN: If I wished a boy to know something about the arts and sciences, for instance, I would not pursue the common course, which is merely to send him into the neighborhood of some professor, where any thing is professed and practised but the art of life; -to survey the world through a telescope or a microscope, and never with his natural eye; to study chemistry, and not learn how his bread is made, or mechanics, and not learn how it is earned; to discover new satellites to Neptune, and not detect the motes in his eyes, or to what vagabond he is a satellite himself; or to be devoured by the monsters that swarm all around him, while contemplating the monsters in a drop of vinegar. Which would have advanced the most at the end of a month, -the boy who had made his own jack-knife from the ore which he had dug and smelted, reading as much as would be necessary for this, -or the boy who had attended the lectures on metallurgy at the Institute in the mean while, and had received a Rodgers' penknife from his father? Which would be most likely to cut his fingers? -To my astonishment I was informed on leaving college that I had studied navigation! -why, if I had taken one turn down the harbor I should have known more about it. Even the poor student studies and is taught only political economy, while that economy of living which is synonymous with philosophy is not even sincerely professed in our colleges. The consequence is, that while he is reading Adam Smith, Ricardo, and Say, he runs his father in debt irretrievably.

PEOPLE OF WALDEN

ADAM SMITH

DAVID RICARDO

JEAN-BAPTISTE SAY

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

August 12, Monday: St David's College was founded by Thomas Burgess, Bishop of St David's (this has become the University of Wales at Lampeter).

At his estate in Kent, England, the Marquis of Londonderry, Castlereagh, Foreign Secretary to Lord Liverpool, used a sharp little penknife to off himself (he had for some time been showing signs of madness). Penknives, which were usually part of a desk set of writing implements, had a keen slender blade about an inch or two in length on a regular three or four inch handle. The closest comparison today would be to the little craft knives that you can buy at stationers' or art shops, such as "Xacto" — although in that era most such implements were fairly ornamental in design. The suicide would induce Mr. Canning to resign the governor-generalship of India to which he had been appointed (he would on September 16th accept the foreign secretaryship).

ENGLISH EVENTS OF 1822

SUICIDE

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING THE YEAR

Date	Name	Place of execution	Crime
25/03	Hannah Halley	Derby	Murder of child
16/08	Rachael Edwards	Monmouth	Murder of husband

August 10, Saturday: Gilbert Close and Samuel Clisby robbed Ezra Haynes in Cambridge Street (they would hang on the gallows on Boston Neck near the burying grounds).

Arthur Buckminster Fuller was born, a younger brother of Margaret Fuller.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

September 16, Monday: Charles S. Crocker, of Southern Pacific fame, was born.

Howard Trask, who had escaped hanging for murder by having been found insane, attempted to kill two of the other prisoners with him in Boston jail, and then escaped from the jail. Due to decrepit conditions at the jail that had been revealed by this escape, the prisoners would be taken to more secure accommodations on Lechmere Point — where an unsuccessful attempt would be made to force them to generate power by walking a treadmill wheel.

(Pictured above is one that was in operation not for the generation of power but simply for punishment, at the Brixton House of Correction in 1821.)

George Canning became the British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

2nd day 16th of 9th M 1822 / Attended the funeral of Rebecca Goddard - daughter of Thos Goddard - the gathering was large & to me it was a season of precious favour - Mary Morton & Hannah Dennis were engaged in lively & pertinent testimonys.

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1823

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1823

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
23/04	Mrs. ?? McKinnoy		Dublin	Murder
16/04	Mary McKinnon		Edinburgh	Murder
18/04	Catherine Kinrade	19	Castle Rushton (Isle of Man)	Accessory to Murder
26/07	Grace Griffin		Berwick	Murder of husband

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1824

In the border South, “Freddy,” age about 6, was being delivered by his grandmother Bet per her obligation, from Holm Hill Farm where he had been born to Senator Edward Lloyd’s plantation on the Wye River, the domicile of Aaron Anthony, his master. It was perhaps in this year that Frederick Douglass witnessed some young slave woman (later to be identified by him at various times before various audiences in various circumstances either as his aunt Hester or as his cousin Hetty or merely as some young apparently unrelated slave woman) being flogged by Anthony, who, in all probability he supposed, was his father, and who was enacting this punishment, in all probability, although he pretended it was due to the fact that she had been “absent when my master desired her presence,” for entirely libidinal reasons.³⁶⁰ Douglass noted that the master “would at times seem to take great pleasure in whipping a slave.” He also recorded that such whippings commonly occurred at dawn. In the particular case he described here, however, the first such incident that he

360. This material would, at the request of editors, be spared the readers of the English edition.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

HANGING

witnessed, the slave woman had been discovered in the company of a male slave from a neighboring plantation, and had been suspended from a joist in the kitchen. Douglass described how his father/master rolled up his sleeves before beginning to lash her. The child ran and hid in a closet not so much out of horror at the sight of the splattering gore, he said, as out of terror of being himself suspended and whipped, for as a child would see such things primally, “I expected it would be my turn next.”³⁶¹

The louder she screamed, the harder he whipped; and where the blood ran fastest, there he whipped longest. He would whip her to make her scream, and whip her to make her hush; and not until overcome by fatigue, would he cease to swing the blood-clotted cowskin. I remember the first time I ever witnessed this horrible exhibition. I was quite a child, but I well remember it. I never shall forget it whilst I remember any thing.

The little boy quickly learned to address this enemy of the defenseless as “Captain” Anthony,³⁶² a title which, I presume, he acquired by sailing a craft on the Chesapeake Bay.

The boy would be befriended by the 20-year-old Lucretia Anthony Auld, white daughter of Aaron Anthony and thus presumably his half-sister, who would give him food when he could not get enough to eat from the overseer who ran the kitchen, and would be chosen to be personal “companion” to 12-year-old Daniel Lloyd, Senator Edward Lloyd’s youngest white son and thus presumably his first cousin.

March: Waldo Emerson had recourse in his journal, in this year in which a prisoner would hang in Boston for murder, to the very available metaphor of hanging as a conventional vehicle for the expression of contempt or

361. In the some 6,000 extant collected slave narratives by women and men, there are many accounts of savage floggings and there are a number of accounts of more or less subtle seductions and more or less gross propositions, but there is not a single account of the rape of a slave, male or female, by a white person. Not only was the rape of a chattel slave by his or her white owner simply not possible under existing law in any state of the Union — it was not possible in American literature. One’s being forced to provide sex was subsumed under the form of consensual sex in the same manner as one’s being tortured to death was subsumed under the form of punishment for misconduct. (This is an interesting difference between ancient Roman slavery and American race slavery: in the Roman empire, although the law protected a slavemaster’s right to sexually use his slaves, it also permitted him to free and then marry one of his female slaves, but in the American context, although the law protected a slavemaster’s right to sexually use a slave, it forbade him to free her without prior permission, and categorically denied him any possibility of ever marrying her. The point here, however, is that consensual sex could not be spoken of, it was neither possible nor plausible to state that a slave had been sexually assaulted. Of course the same silences must certainly have obtained, in spades, in regard to child molestation, which we can imagine –realistically– must have been quite the sport in the American South. (Where did the aphorism “If she’s big enough, she’s old enough” come from?) Therefore we cannot presume that we are reading here a straightforward account of why the child Frederick ran and hid in the closet, for the adult Frederick would have had no way to communicate this to us, were part of what he was hiding from as a child his own sexual victimization by the white knight errant Aaron Anthony. We may notice that in Frederick Douglass’s narrative, the expression “I expected it would be my turn next” might refer to being lashed and might refer to being molested. We may note also in Douglass’s various accounts of this incident over the years, a curious shifting in his description of precisely who was the victim of the assault — his sister? his aunt? a relative? a young female slave? Douglass offered different connections at different periods before different audiences.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

annoyance toward China and things Chinese:

*The Celestial Empire — hang the Celestial Empire! I hate Peking.
I will not drink of the waters of the Yellow Sea.... I hate China. 'Tis a tawdry vase. Out upon China. Words! Words.*

Nowadays, of course, to express such a sentiment of contempt or annoyance, we would likely utilize instead of a piss metaphor, “drink the waters of the Yellow Sea,” a sexual metaphor that would be equally

362. The above footnote presumes that you are in a position to comprehend that, despite historic silences, the problem of child molestation, like the problems of rape and of drug addition, is not something that sprang sui generis into existence as of the 20th Century. The above note also presumes that you are in a position to comprehend, or in a position not to insist on miscomprehending, the fact that the Frederick Douglass narrative is a crafted text by a master of the language. That is, I suppose there to be a certain type of person who will insist on saying “But this Negro had no education, and, although his stuff might be cleaned up by a bunch of anonymous white people with educations, who were determined to make him look as good as a white writer for reasons of their own, there is no way that an ex-slave could have produced a text in which ambiguities signify anything more than incompetence in writing and perhaps in thinking.” To this straw-horse person I have imagined, I imagine I would reply “Being a slave was a very demanding and risky business. One could be lashed for the slightest appearance of insolence. To survive required not minimal linguistic skill, but total linguistic skill. One had to be in control of every nuance, never ever use the wrong word, never ever say anything that might conceivably be misconstrued. No ambiguous references!” And the most obvious sort of ambiguous reference would be the indefinite pronoun “it” in the sentence in question, “I expected it would be my turn next.” Douglass was trying to embed a message in his text, that his fears as a child were not limited to the obvious things that one was allowed to discuss in public, such as fears of torture, but were, realistically, considerably more broad than could be spoken.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

questionable, and exclaim “China — fuck China! I hate Beijing.”³⁶³

How different this is from the manner in which Thoreau would speak of the Celestial Empire:

WALDEN: I have always endeavored to acquire strict business habits; they are indispensable to every man. If your trade is with the Celestial Empire, then some small counting house on the coast, in some Salem harbor, will be fixture enough. You will export such articles as the country affords, purely native products, much ice and pine timber and a little granite, always in native bottoms. These will be good ventures. To oversee all the details yourself in person; to be at once pilot and captain, and owner and underwriter; to buy and sell and keep the accounts; to read every letter received, and write or read every letter sent; to superintend the discharge of imports night and day; to be upon many parts of the coast almost at the same time; -often the richest freight will be discharged upon a Jersey shore;- to be your own telegraph, unweariedly sweeping the horizon, speaking all passing vessels bound coastwise; to keep up a steady despatch of commodities, for the supply of such a distant and exorbitant market; to keep yourself informed of the state of the markets, prospects of war and peace every where, and anticipate the tendencies of trade and civilization, -taking advantage of the results of all exploring expeditions, using new passages and all improvements in navigation;- charts to be studied, the position of reefs and new lights and buoys to be ascertained, and ever, and ever, the logarithmic tables to be corrected, for by the error of some calculator the vessel often splits upon a rock that should have reached a friendly pier, -there is the untold fate of La Perouse;- universal science to be kept pace with, studying the lives of all great discoverers and navigators, great adventurers and merchants, from Hanno and the Phoenicians down to our day; in fine, account of stock to be taken from time to time, to know how you stand. It is a labor to task the faculties of a man, - such problems of profit and loss, of interest, of tare and tret, and gauging of all kinds in it, as demand a universal knowledge.

PEOPLE OF
WALDEN

JEAN-FRANÇOIS DE GALOUP

I offer, however, that it is worth taking into account, in this Emersonian usage of the expression “hang” to express contempt or annoyance, “hang the Celestial Empire,” that hanging is not only a practice of American state murder, but is also a practice of American household torture. For instance, in this same year of 1824 in which

363. Actually, my sister-in-law, who as a simultaneous translator used to have to fly CAAC into Beijing several times a year, used to be saying this constantly — Cantonese has a whole lot of very expressive swear words.

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

Emerson is sitting in his study in Concord employing that locution in his journal, farther south, at Holm Hill

STATE MURDER

Farm where he had been born to Lloyd Plantation on the Wye River, a six-year-old slave named Freddy (later to be better known under the name Frederick Douglass) is observing his young and pretty Aunt Hester being tortured by Aaron Anthony – the white owner who, apparently, was Freddy’s father– by being suspended from a joist in the kitchen and horse-whipped.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

The child notices how his father/owner rolls up his sleeves before beginning to lash his aunt. He runs and hides in a closet not so much out of horror at the sight of the splattering gore, he says, as out of terror of being himself suspended and whipped, for as a child would see such things primally, "I expected it would be my turn next" to be thus hung from the kitchen ceiling and lashed:

The louder she screamed, the harder he whipped; and where the blood ran fastest, there he whipped longest. He would whip her to make her scream, and whip her to make her hush; and not until overcome by fatigue, would he cease to swing the blood-clotted cowskin. I remember the first time I ever witnessed this horrible exhibition. I was quite a child, but I well remember it. I never shall forget it whilst I remember any thing.

March 19, Friday: William Allingham was born near Ballyshannon, County Donegal, Ireland, as a son of a bank manager.

Jose Antonio de Oliveira Leite de Barros, conde de Basto replaced Joaquim Pedro Gomes de Oliveira as Secretary of State (prime minister) of Portugal.

In New York, David How, a white farmer, was hanged for murder.

April 2, Friday: Having been unable to complete his speech on the tariff to the US House of Representatives on the previous day, on this day Daniel Webster completed that speech.

50,000 New-Yorkers, perhaps a 3d of the city's population, turned out to witness the hanging in an open field at what is now 2d Avenue and 13th Street in the East Village of white 45-year-old landlord John Johnson for having murdered a sailor who had rented a room from him, James Murray, by striking him on the head with the blunt side of a hatchet. Johnson had dragged the body out into Cuyler's Alley, near the present location of the New York Stock Exchange Stock Clearing Building downtown, but the body had been traced back to Johnson's boarding house. Charles H. Haswell's Reminiscences of New York by an Octogenarian would provide some detail on the scene:

James Murray, from Boston, on his way South put up at a sailors' boarding-house of a man named Johnson, who, ascertaining that the former had a bag containing several hundred dollars in specie, murdered him in his bed, and two days after dragged the body to Cuyler's Alley, leading from Water Street to the river between Coenties and Old slips, and left it there. He was soon after arrested... Johnson, who had been indicted for murder on the 4th of December preceding, was found guilty on the 17th of March, and as there were not any members of the legal profession in those days known as Tombs lawyers, vulgo Shysters, the verdict was accepted without appeal and he was hanged on the 2nd of April. The proceedings connected with his execution were so widely different from those of a later, and the present day, that a reference to them may be of interest. The culprit, dressed in white, trimmed with black, and seated on his coffin in an open wagon, was transported from the Bridewell (City Hall Park) through Broadway to an open field at the junction of Second Avenue and about Thirteenth Street, where his execution was witnessed by many thousands of persons; his body was then taken to the Hall of the Physicians and Surgeons in Barclay Street, where it was subjected to a number of experiments with galvanism.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

June 11, Friday: John Josias Conybeare died.

Maria Agata Szymanowska gave a performance in the Hanover Square rooms, London in the presence of members of the British royal family.

Gioachino Rossini's canzone Il pianto delle muse in morte di Lord Byron was performed for the initial time, in Almack's Assembly Rooms, London.

In New York a black seaman, Thomas Jones, was hanged for murder.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

August 16, Monday: Citoyen Lafayette, the “guest of the nation” arrived in New-York harbor for his triumphal geriatric tour of the young opponent of Britain which he and his France had helped to create after their Seven Years War with Britain,³⁶⁴ and to be the recipient of an outpouring of official gratitude and public enthusiasm. He brought with him his son George Washington Lafayette. By arrangement they disembarked at Castle Clinton in Castle Garden, where there was a public welcome ceremony. A memorial punchbowl crafted in honor of Lafayette’s visit was presumably fashioned at the time at the American Pottery Company of Jersey City, New Jersey.

Lafayette would travel through New England to Washington DC, and thence to Monticello for a visit with Thomas Jefferson.

Lafayette, nous sommes ici!

—General “Black Jack” Pershing, arriving with US troops in France at the very end of the WWI trench warfare.

Ester Loughbridge, who had murdered a sister-in-law, was hanged at Carrickfergus in England (she would be the sole Englishwoman to be executed, during the entire year).

December 22, Wednesday: Edward Everett orated at Plymouth, Massachusetts. This would be published by Cummings, Hilliard & Company at 134 Washington Street in Boston and we infer that this publication likely is the source for a declamation that 13-year-old David Henry Thoreau would perform at the Concord Academy in 1830.

EVERETT AT PLYMOUTH

Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

*4th day 22 of 12 M / Last evening I recd a long letter from my Ancient frd Moses Brown & this Afternoon one from my friend
Thomas Thompson of Liverpool. — There seem like a brook by the* 364. We should never fail to mention in these contexts that such policies and actions are not due to warm and fuzzy affection between nations, but are due rather to the usual calculated statecraft along the lines of “The enemies of my enemies are my friends.” Nations are not individuals and neither feel emotions in the manner in which individuals feel emotions nor endure loyalties in the manner in which individuals endure loyalties, and when we encourage ourselves to believe that such things are so, we are not submitting to an innocent penchant for the preposterous but are, rather, carefully coaching ourselves in the most calculated of self-manipulations.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

way - or refreshment in a dry season. -

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1825

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1825

Date	Name	Place of execution	Crime
11/03	Elaeonor Ryan	Limerick	Murder of husband
05/08	Hannah Read	Leicester	Petty treason of murder

 March 3, Thursday: Franz Schubert's song Die junge Nonne D.828 to words of Craigher de Jachelutta was performed for the initial time, in the Vienna home of the singer, Sophie Muller.

John Holland or Holloran, who had killed watchman Jonathan Houghton on December 12, 1825 on State Street, was hanged in Boston.

The Federal government gave support to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal.

US Representative Forsythe proposed that the federal House of Representatives restrict the possibility of other nations boarding and searching US commercial vessels in a search for slave cargo. His resolution was laid on the table — that is, it would be ignored.

"Resolved, That while this House anxiously desires that the Slave Trade should be, universally, denounced as Piracy, and, as such, should be detected and punished under the law of nations, it considers that it would be highly inexpedient to enter into engagements with any foreign power, by which all the merchant vessels of the United States would be exposed to the inconveniences of any regulation of search, from which any merchant vessels of that foreign power would be exempted." Resolution laid on the table. HOUSE JOURNAL, 18th Congress, 2d session, pages 308-9; Gales and Seaton, REGISTER OF DEBATES, I. 739.

INTERNATIONAL SLAVE TRADE

 June 17, Friday: At 2:00 PM in the Niagara Square of Buffalo, New York, Israel Thayer, Isaac Thayer, and Nelson Thayer, who had murdered a man who loaned them money, attired in white caps and shrouds, were

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

“launched into eternity” and then placed in three coffins before a crowd of some 20,000-30,000.

A decision was reached, that we would commemorate the Battle of Bunker Hill upon its 50th anniversary by implementation of Gridley Bryant’s project for a railway to bring the granite of a ledge in Milton a dozen miles to the top of Breed’s Hill. The granite of this Milton ledge was quite similar to the syenite which the ancient Egyptians had quarried at Aswan for their own high-culture creations. This 12-mile track would be the 1st direct ancestor of what is now, brag, by far the world’s most extensive and elaborate rail system.

At the 50th Anniversary celebration of the Battle of Bunker Hill, Elizabeth Palmer Peabody “Shook hands with La Fayette with the gloves on herewith enclosed —.” Anne Royall, seeking support to publish her first book, was in Boston, and attended the Marquis de Lafayette’s laying of the cornerstone (of course with the assistance of laborers) of the Bunker Hill monument. The speech in dedication was of course made by Daniel Webster. (“X” marks the spot, below. Why Bunker Hill rather than Breeds Hill where the revolutionary redoubt actually had been positioned? –a good reason would be because that was where nobody got murdered, but do we ever do anything like this for any good reason?)

The cornerstone of a Bunker Hill monument was laid. On this swing through Boston, Margaret Fuller, who had written longingly to the Marquis when she was fifteen years of age, finally got her opportunity to meet the man of her dreams. When the FrancoAmerican hero went back to Paris, he would sail with heavy trunks of dirt

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

not from Bunker Hill but from Breed's Hill — later to be used to top off his grave.

WALDEN: Every man is the lord of a realm beside which the earthly empire of the Czar is but a petty state, a hummock left by the ice. Yet some can be patriotic who have no self-respect, and sacrifice the greater to the less. They love the soil which makes their graves, but have no sympathy with the spirit which may still animate their clay. Patriotism is a maggot in their heads.

PEOPLE OF
WALDEN

LAFAYETTE

SAM PATCH

PEOPLE MENTIONED IN WALDEN

Due to insufficient funds and insufficient interest, this misplaced misbegotten Bunker Hill monument would stand uncompleted — until indiscriminate patriotism would overwhelm poor planning during the Year of Our Lord 1843.

As early as 1776, some steps were taken toward the commemoration of the battle of Bunker Hill and the fall of General Warren, who was buried upon the hill the day after the action. The Massachusetts Lodge of Masons, over which he presided, applied to the provisional government of Massachusetts, for permission to take up his remains and to bury them with the usual solemnities. The Council granted this request, on condition that it should be carried into effect in such a manner that the government of the Colony might have an opportunity to erect a monument to his memory. A funeral procession was had, and a Eulogy on General Warren was delivered by Perez Morton, but no measures were taken toward building a monument.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

A resolution was adopted by the Congress of the United States on the 8th of April, 1777, directing that monuments should be erected to the memory of General Warren, in Boston, and of General Mercer, at Fredericksburg; but this resolution has remained to the present time unexecuted.

On the 11th of November, 1794, a committee was appointed by King Solomon's Lodge, at Charlestown,³⁶⁵ to take measures for the erection of a monument to the memory of General Joseph Warren at the expense of the Lodge. This resolution was promptly carried into effect. The land for this purpose was presented to the Lodge by the Hon. James Russell, of Charlestown, and it was dedicated with appropriate ceremonies on the 2d of December, 1794. It was a wooden pillar of the Tuscan order, eighteen feet in height, raised on a pedestal eight feet square, and of an elevation of ten feet from the ground. The pillar was surmounted by a gilt urn. An appropriate inscription was placed on the south side of the pedestal.

In February, 1818, a committee of the legislature of Massachusetts was appointed to consider the expediency of building a monument of American marble of the memory of General Warren, but this proposal was not carried into effect.

As the half-century from the date of the battle drew toward a close, a stronger feeling of the duty of commemorating it began to be awakened in the community. Among those who from the first manifested the greatest interest in the subject, was the late William Tudor, Esq. He expressed the wish, in a letter still preserved, to see upon the battle-ground "the noblest monument in the world," and he was so ardent and persevering in urging the project, that it has been stated that he first conceived the idea of it. The steps taken in execution of the project, from the earliest private conferences among the gentlemen first engaged in it to its final completion, are accurately sketched by Mr. Richard Frothingham, Jr., in his valuable History of the Siege of Boston. All the material facts contained in this note are derived from his chapter on the Bunker Hill Monument. After giving an account of the organization of the society, the measures adopted for the collection of funds, and the deliberations on the form of the monument, Mr. Frothingham proceeds as follows:—

"It was at this stage of the enterprise that the directors proposed to lay the corner-stone of the monument, and ground was broken (June 7th) for this purpose. As a mark of respect to the liberality and patriotism of King Solomon's Lodge, they invited the Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts to perform the ceremony. They also invited General Lafayette to accompany the President of the 365. General Warren, at the time of his decease, was Grand Master of the Masonic Lodges in America.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Association, Hon. Daniel Webster, and assist in it. "This celebration was unequalled in magnificence by any thing of the kind that had been seen in New England. The morning proved propitious. The air was cool, the sky was clear, and timely showers the previous day had brightened the vesture of nature into its loveliest hue. Delighted thousands flocked into Boston to bear a part in the proceedings, or to witness the spectacle. At about ten o'clock a procession moved from the State House towards Bunker Hill. The military, in their fine uniforms, formed the van. About two hundred veterans of the Revolution, of whom forty were survivors of the battle, rode in barouches next to the escort. These venerable men, the relics of a past generation, with emaciated frames, tottering limbs, and trembling voices, constituted a touching spectacle. Some wore, as honorable decorations, their old fighting equipments, and some bore the scars of still more honorable wounds. Glistening eyes constituted their answer to the enthusiastic cheers of the grateful multitudes who lined their pathway and cheered their progress. To this patriot band succeeded the Bunker Hill Monument Association. Then the Masonic fraternity, in their splendid regalia, thousands in number. Then Lafayette, continually welcomed by tokens of love and gratitude, and the invited guests. Then a long array of societies, with their various badges and banners. It was a splendid procession, and of such length that the front nearly reached Charlestown Bridge ere the rear had left Boston Common. It proceeded to Breed's Hill, where the Grand Master of the Freemasons, the President of the Monument Association, and General Lafayette, performed the ceremony of laying the corner-stone, in the presence of a vast concourse of people."

The procession then moved to a spacious amphitheatre on the northern declivity of the hill, when the following address was delivered by Mr. Webster, in the presence of as great a multitude as was ever perhaps assembled within the sound of a human voice.³⁶⁶

Oration began:

This uncounted multitude before me and around me proves the feeling which the occasion has excited. These thousands of human faces, glowing with sympathy and joy, and from the impulses of a common gratitude turned reverently to heaven in this spacious temple of the firmament, proclaim that the day, the place, and the purpose of our assembling have made a deep impression on our hearts.

If, indeed, there be any thing in local association fit to affect the mind of man, we need not strive to repress the emotions which agitate us here. We are among the sepulchres of our fathers. We are on ground, distinguished by their valor, their constancy, and the shedding of their blood. We are here, not to fix an uncertain date in our annals, nor to draw into notice an obscure and unknown spot. If our humble purpose had never been conceived, if we ourselves had never been born, the 17th of June, 1775, would have been a day on which all subsequent history would have poured its light, and the eminence where we stand a point of attraction to the eyes of successive generations. But we are Americans. We live in what may be called the early age of this great continent; and we know that our posterity, through all time, are here to enjoy and suffer the allotments of humanity. We see before us a probable train of great events; we know that our own fortunes have been happily cast; and it is natural, therefore, that we should be moved by the contemplation of occurrences which have guided our destiny before many of us were born, and settled the condition in which we should pass that portion of our existence which God allows to men on earth.

366. Edwin P. Whipple's THE GREAT SPEECHES AND ORATIONS OF DANIEL WEBSTER WITH AN ESSAY ON DANIEL WEBSTER AS A MASTER OF ENGLISH STYLE (Boston: Little, Brown, 1879). Whipple derived this material from Octavius Brooks Frothingham's HISTORY OF THE SIEGE OF BOSTON.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

We do not read even of the discovery of this continent, without feeling something of a personal interest in the event; without being reminded how much it has affected our own fortunes and our own existence. It would be still more unnatural for us, therefore, than for others, to contemplate with unaffected minds that interesting, I may say that most touching and pathetic scene, when the great discoverer of America stood on the deck of his shattered bark, the shades of night falling on the sea, yet no man sleeping; tossed on the billows of an unknown ocean, yet the stronger billows of alternate hope and despair tossing his own troubled thoughts; extending forward his harassed frame, straining westward his anxious and eager eyes, till Heaven at last granted him a moment of rapture and ecstasy, in blessing his vision with the sight of the unknown world.

Nearer to our times, more closely connected with our fates, and therefore still more interesting to our feelings and affections, is the settlement of our own country by colonists from England. We cherish every memorial of these worthy ancestors; we celebrate their patience and fortitude; we admire their daring enterprise; we teach our children to venerate their piety; and we are justly proud of being descended from men who have set the world an example of founding civil institutions on the great and united principles of human freedom and human knowledge. To us, their children, the story of their labors and sufferings can never be without its interest. We shall not stand unmoved on the shore of Plymouth, while the sea continues to wash it; nor will our brethren in another early and ancient Colony forget the place of its first establishment, till their river shall cease to flow by it.³⁶⁷ No vigor of youth, no maturity of manhood, will lead the nation to forget the spots where its infancy was cradled and defended.

But the great event in the history of the continent, which we are now met here to commemorate, that prodigy of modern times, at once the wonder and the blessing of the world, is the American Revolution. In a day of extraordinary prosperity and happiness, of high national honor, distinction, and power, we are brought together, in this place, by our love of country, by our admiration of exalted character, by our gratitude for signal services and patriotic devotion.

The Society whose organ I am³⁶⁸ was formed for the purpose of 367. An interesting account of the voyage of the early emigrants to the Maryland Colony, and of its settlement, is given in the official report of Father White, written probably within the first month after the landing at St. Mary's. The original Latin manuscript is still preserved among the archives of the Jesuits at Rome. The "Ark" and the "Dove" are remembered with scarcely less interest by the descendants of the sister colony, than is the "Mayflower" in New England, which thirteen years earlier, at the same season of the year, bore thither the Pilgrim Fathers.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

rearing some honorable and durable monument to the memory of the early friends of American Independence. They have thought, that for this object no time could be more propitious than the present prosperous and peaceful period; that no place could claim preference over this memorable spot; and that no day could be more auspicious to the undertaking, than the anniversary of the battle which was here fought. The foundation of that monument we have now laid. With solemnities suited to the occasion, with prayers to Almighty God for his blessing, and in the midst of this cloud of witnesses, we have begun the work. We trust it will be prosecuted, and that, springing from a broad foundation, rising high in massive solidity and unadorned grandeur, it may remain as long as Heaven permits the works of man to last, a fit emblem, both of the events in memory of which it is raised, and of the gratitude of those who have reared it.

We know, indeed, that the record of illustrious actions is most safely deposited in the universal remembrance of mankind. We know, that if we could cause this structure to ascend, not only till it reached the skies, but till it pierced them, its broad surfaces could still contain but part of that which, in an age of knowledge, hath already been spread over the earth, and which history charges itself with making known to all future times. We know that no inscription on entablatures less broad than the earth itself can carry information of the events we commemorate where it has not already gone; and that no structure, which shall not outlive the duration of letters and knowledge among men, can prolong the memorial. But our object is, by this edifice, to show our own deep sense of the value and importance of the achievements of our ancestors; and, by presenting this work of gratitude to the eye, to keep alive similar sentiments, and to foster a constant regard for the principles of the Revolution. Human beings are composed, not of reason only, but of imagination also, and sentiment; and that is neither wasted nor misapplied which is appropriated to the purpose of giving right direction to sentiments, and opening proper springs of feeling in the heart. Let it not be supposed that our object is to perpetuate national hostility, or even to cherish a mere military spirit. It is higher, purer, nobler. We consecrate our work to the spirit of national independence, and we wish that the light of peace may rest upon it for ever. We rear a memorial of our conviction of that unmeasured benefit which has been conferred on our own land, and of the happy influences which have been produced, by the same events, on the general interests of mankind. We come, as Americans, to mark a spot which must for ever be dear to us and our posterity. We wish that whosoever, in all coming time, shall turn his eye hither, may behold that the place is not undistinguished where the first great battle of the Revolution was fought. We wish that this structure may proclaim the magnitude and importance of that event to every class and every age. We wish that infancy may learn the purpose of its erection from maternal lips, and that weary and withered age may behold it, and be solaced by the recollections which it suggests. We wish that labor may look up here, and be proud, in the midst of its toil. We wish that, in those days of disaster, which, as they come upon all nations, must be expected to come upon us also, desponding patriotism may turn its eyes hitherward, and be assured that the foundations of our national power are still strong. We wish that this column, rising towards heaven among the pointed spires of so many temples dedicated to God, may contribute also to produce, in all minds, a pious feeling of dependence and gratitude. We wish, finally, that the last object to the sight of him who leaves his native shore, and the first to gladden his who revisits it, may be something which shall remind him of the liberty and the glory of his country. Let it rise! let it rise, till it meet the sun in his coming; let the earliest light of the morning gild it, and parting day linger and play on its summit.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

We live in a most extraordinary age. Events so various and so important that they might crowd and distinguish centuries are, in our times, compressed within the compass of a single life. When has it happened that history has had so much to record, in the same term of years, as since the 17th of June, 1775? Our own Revolution, which, under other circumstances, might itself have been expected to occasion a war of half a century, has been achieved; twenty-four sovereign and independent States erected; and a general government established over them, so safe, so wise, so free, so practical, that we might well wonder its establishment should have been accomplished so soon, were it not for the greater wonder that it should have been established at all. Two or three millions of people have been augmented to twelve, the great forests of the West prostrated beneath the arm of successful industry, and the dwellers on the banks of the Ohio and the Mississippi become the fellow-citizens and neighbors of those who cultivate the hills of New England.³⁶⁹ We have a commerce, that leaves no sea unexplored; navies, which take no law from superior force; revenues, adequate to all the exigencies of government, almost without taxation; and peace with all nations, founded on equal rights and mutual respect. Europe, within the same period, has been agitated by a mighty revolution, which, while it has been felt in the individual condition and happiness of almost every man, has shaken to the centre her political fabric, and dashed against one another thrones which had stood tranquil for ages. On this, our continent, our own example has been followed, and colonies have sprung up to be nations.³⁷⁰ Unaccustomed sounds of liberty and free government have reached us from beyond the track of the sun; and at this moment the dominion of European power in this continent, from the place where we stand to the south pole, is annihilated for ever.

In the mean time, both in Europe and America, such has been the general progress of knowledge, such the improvement in legislation, in commerce, in the arts, in letters, and, above all, in liberal ideas and the general spirit of the age, that the whole world seems changed.

Yet, notwithstanding that this is but a faint abstract of the things which have happened since the day of the battle of Bunker Hill, we are but fifty years removed from it; and we now stand here to enjoy all the blessings of our own condition, and to look abroad on the brightened prospects of the world, while we still have among us some of those who were active agents in the scenes of 1775, and who are now here, from every quarter of New

369. That which was spoken of figuratively in 1825 has, in the lapse of a quarter of a century, by the introduction of railroads and telegraphic lines, become a reality. It is an interesting circumstance, that the first railroad on the Western Continent was constructed for the purpose of accelerating the erection of this monument.

370. See President Monroe's Message to Congress in 1823, and Mr. Webster's speech on the Panama Mission, in 1826.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

England, to visit once more, and under circumstances so affecting, I had almost said so overwhelming, this renowned theatre of their courage and patriotism.

VENERABLE MEN! you have come down to us from a former generation. Heaven has bounteously lengthened out your lives, that you might behold this joyous day. You are now where you stood fifty years ago, this very hour, with your brothers and your neighbors, shoulder to shoulder, in the strife for your country. Behold, how altered! The same heavens are indeed over your heads; the same ocean rolls at your feet; but all else how changed! You hear now no roar of hostile cannon, you see no mixed volumes of smoke and flame rising from burning Charlestown. The ground strewn with the dead and the dying; the impetuous charge; the steady and successful repulse; the loud call to repeated assault; the summoning of all that is manly to repeated resistance; a thousand bosoms freely and fearlessly bared in an instant to whatever of terror there may be in war and death;—all these you have witnessed, but you witness them no more. All is peace. The heights of yonder metropolis, its towers and roofs, which you then saw filled with wives and children and countrymen in distress and terror, and looking with unutterable emotions for the issue of the combat, have presented you to-day with the sight of its whole happy population, come out to welcome and greet you with a universal jubilee. Yonder proud ships, by a felicity of position appropriately lying at the foot of this mount, and seeming fondly to cling around it, are not means of annoyance to you, but your country's own means of distinction and defence.³⁷¹ All is peace; and God has granted you this sight of your country's happiness, ere you slumber in the grave. He has allowed you to behold and to partake the reward of your patriotic toils; and he has allowed us, your sons and countrymen, to meet you here, and in the name of the present generation, in the name of your country, in the name of liberty, to thank you!

But, alas! you are not all here! Time and the sword have thinned your ranks. Prescott, Putnam, Stark, Brooks, Read, Pomeroy, Bridge! our eyes seek for you in vain amid this broken band. You are gathered to your fathers, and live only to your country in her grateful remembrance and your own bright example. But let us not too much grieve, that you have met the common fate of men. You lived at least long enough to know that your work had been nobly and successfully accomplished. You lived to see your country's independence established, and to sheathe your swords from war. On the light of Liberty you saw arise the light of Peace, like "another morn, Risen on mid-noon";

371. It is necessary to inform those only who are unacquainted with the localities, that the United States Navy Yard at Charlestown, Massachusetts is situated at the base of Bunker Hill.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

and the sky on which you closed your eyes was cloudless. But ah! Him! the first great martyr in this great cause! Him! the premature victim of his own self-devoting heart! Him! the head of our civil councils, and the destined leader of our military bands, whom nothing brought hither but the unquenchable fire of his own spirit! Him! cut off by Providence in the hour of overwhelming anxiety and thick gloom; falling ere he saw the star of his country rise; pouring out his generous blood like water, before he knew whether it would fertilize a land of freedom or of bondage!—how shall I struggle with the emotions that stifle the utterance of thy name!³⁷² Our poor work may perish; but thine shall endure! This monument may moulder away; the solid ground it rests upon may sink down to a level with the sea; but thy memory shall not fail! Wheresoever among men a heart shall be found that beats to the transports of patriotism and liberty, its aspirations shall be to claim kindred with thy spirit!

But the scene amidst which we stand does not permit us to confine our thoughts or our sympathies to those fearless spirits who hazarded or lost their lives on this consecrated spot. We have the happiness to rejoice here in the presence of a most worthy representation of the survivors of the whole Revolutionary army. VETERANS! you are the remnant of many a well-fought field. You bring with you marks of honor from Trenton and Monmouth, from Yorktown, Camden, Bennington, and Saratoga. VETERANS OF HALF A CENTURY! when in your youthful days you put every thing at hazard in your country's cause, good as that cause was, and sanguine as youth is, still your fondest hopes did not stretch onward to an hour like this! At a period to which you could not reasonably have expected to arrive, at a moment of national prosperity such as you could never have foreseen, you are now met here to enjoy the fellowship of old soldiers, and to receive the overflowings of a universal gratitude.

But your agitated countenances and your heaving breasts inform me that even this is not an unmixed joy. I perceive that a tumult of contending feelings rushes upon you. The images of the dead, as well as the persons of the living, present themselves before you. The scene overwhelms you, and I turn from it. May the Father of all mercies smile upon your declining years, and bless them! And when you shall here have exchanged your embraces, when you shall once more have pressed the hands which have been so often extended to give succor in adversity, or grasped in the exultation of victory, then look abroad upon this lovely land which your young valor defended, and mark the happiness with which it is filled; yea, look abroad upon the whole earth, and see what a name you have contributed to give to your country, and what a praise you have added to freedom, and then rejoice in the sympathy and gratitude which beam upon your last days from the improved condition of mankind!

372. See the North American Review, Vol. XIII. p. 242.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

The occasion does not require of me any particular account of the battle of the 17th of June, 1775, nor any detailed narrative of the events which immediately preceded it. These are familiarly known to all. In the progress of the great and interesting controversy, Massachusetts and the town of Boston had become early and marked objects of the displeasure of the British Parliament. This had been manifested in the act for altering the government of the Province, and in that for shutting up the port of Boston. Nothing sheds more honor on our early history, and nothing better shows how little the feelings and sentiments of the Colonies were known or regarded in England, than the impression which these measures everywhere produced in America. It had been anticipated, that, while the Colonies in general would be terrified by the severity of the punishment inflicted on Massachusetts, the other sea-ports would be governed by a mere spirit of gain; and that, as Boston was now cut off from all commerce, the unexpected advantage which this blow on her was calculated to confer on other towns would be greedily enjoyed. How miserably such reasoners deceived themselves! How little they knew of the depth, and the strength, and the intenseness of that feeling of resistance to illegal acts of power, which possessed the whole American people! Everywhere the unworthy boon was rejected with scorn. The fortunate occasion was seized, everywhere, to show to the whole world that the Colonies were swayed by no local interest, no partial interest, no selfish interest. The temptation to profit by the punishment of Boston was strongest to our neighbors of Salem. Yet Salem was precisely the place where this miserable proffer was spurned, in a tone of the most lofty self-respect and the most indignant patriotism. "We are deeply affected," said its inhabitants, "with the sense of our public calamities; but the miseries that are now rapidly hastening on our brethren in the capital of the Province greatly excite our commiseration. By shutting up the port of Boston, some imagine that the course of trade might be turned hither and to our benefit; but we must be dead to every idea of justice, lost to all feelings of humanity, could we indulge a thought to seize on wealth and raise our fortunes on the ruin of our suffering neighbors." These noble sentiments were not confined to our immediate vicinity. In that day of general affection and brotherhood, the blow given to Boston smote on every patriotic heart from one end of the country to the other. Virginia and the Carolinas, as well as Connecticut and New Hampshire, felt and proclaimed the cause to be their own. The Continental Congress, then holding its first session in Philadelphia, expressed its sympathy for the suffering inhabitants of Boston, and addresses were received from all quarters, assuring them that the cause was a common one, and should be met by common efforts and common sacrifices. The Congress of Massachusetts responded to these assurances; and in an address to the Congress at Philadelphia, bearing the official signature, perhaps among the last, of the immortal Warren, notwithstanding the severity of its suffering and the magnitude of the dangers which threatened it, it was declared, that this Colony "is ready, at all times, to spend and to be spent in the cause of America."

But the hour drew nigh which was to put professions to the proof, and to determine whether the authors of these mutual pledges were ready to seal them in blood. The tidings of Lexington and Concord had no sooner spread, than it was universally felt that the time was at last come for action. A spirit pervaded all ranks, not transient, not boisterous, but deep, solemn, determined,

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

"totamque infusa per artus
Mens agitat molem, et magno se corpore miscet."

War, on their own soil and at their own doors, was, indeed, a strange work to the yeomanry of New England; but their consciences were convinced of its necessity, their country called them to it, and they did not withhold themselves from the perilous trial. The ordinary occupations of life were abandoned; the plough was staid in the unfinished furrow; wives gave up their husbands, and mothers gave up their sons, to the battles of a civil war. Death might come, in honor, on the field; it might come, in disgrace, on the scaffold. For either and for both they were prepared. The sentiment of Quincy was full in their hearts. "Blandishments," said that distinguished son of genius and patriotism, "will not fascinate us, nor will threats of a halter intimidate; for, under God, we are determined that, wheresoever, whensoever, or howsoever we shall be called to make our exit, we will die free men."

The 17th of June saw the four New England Colonies standing here, side by side, to triumph or to fall together; and there was with them from that moment to the end of the war, what I hope will remain with them for ever, one cause, one country, one heart. The battle of Bunker Hill was attended with the most important effects beyond its immediate results as a military engagement. It created at once a state of open, public war. There could now be no longer a question of proceeding against individuals, as guilty of treason or rebellion. That fearful crisis was past. The appeal lay to the sword, and the only question was, whether the spirit and the resources of the people would hold out, till the object should be accomplished. Nor were its general consequences confined to our own country. The previous proceedings of the Colonies, their appeals, resolutions, and addresses, had made their cause known to Europe. Without boasting, we may say, that in no age or country has the public cause been maintained with more force of argument, more power of illustration, or more of that persuasion which excited feeling and elevated principle can alone bestow, than the Revolutionary state papers exhibit. These papers will for ever deserve to be studied, not only for the spirit which they breathe, but for the ability with which they were written.

To this able vindication of their cause, the Colonies had now added a practical and severe proof of their own true devotion to it, and given evidence also of the power which they could bring to its support. All now saw, that, if America fell, she would not fall without a struggle. Men felt sympathy and regard, as well as surprise, when they beheld these infant states, remote, unknown, unaided, encounter the power of England, and, in the first considerable battle, leave more of their enemies dead on the field, in proportion to the number of combatants, than had been recently known to fall in the wars of Europe.

Information of these events, circulating throughout the world, at length reached the ears of one who now hears me.³⁷³ He has not

373. Among the earliest of the arrangements for the celebration of the 17th of June, 1825, was the invitation to General Lafayette to be present; and he had so timed his progress through the other States as to return to Massachusetts in season for the great occasion.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

forgotten the emotion which the fame of Bunker Hill, and the name of Warren, excited in his youthful breast.

SIR, we are assembled to commemorate the establishment of great public principles of liberty, and to do honor to the distinguished dead. The occasion is too severe for eulogy of the living. But, Sir, your interesting relation to this country, the peculiar circumstances which surround you and surround us, call on me to express the happiness which we derive from your presence and aid in this solemn commemoration.

Fortunate, fortunate man! with what measure of devotion will you not thank God for the circumstances of your extraordinary life! You are connected with both hemispheres and with two generations. Heaven saw fit to ordain, that the electric spark of liberty should be conducted, through you, from the New World to the Old; and we, who are now here to perform this duty of patriotism, have all of us long ago received it in charge from our fathers to cherish your name and your virtues. You will account it an instance of your good fortune, Sir, that you crossed the seas to visit us at a time which enables you to be present at this solemnity. You now behold the field, the renown of which reached you in the heart of France, and caused a thrill in your ardent bosom. You see the lines of the little redoubt thrown up by the incredible diligence of Prescott; defended, to the last extremity, by his lion-hearted valor; and within which the corner-stone of our monument has now taken its position. You see where Warren fell, and where Parker, Gardner, McCleary, Moore, and other early patriots, fell with him. Those who survived that day, and whose lives have been prolonged to the present hour, are now around you. Some of them you have known in the trying scenes of the war. Behold! they now stretch forth their feeble arms to embrace you. Behold! they raise their trembling voices to invoke the blessing of God on you and yours for ever.

Sir, you have assisted us in laying the foundation of this structure. You have heard us rehearse, with our feeble commendation, the names of departed patriots. Monuments and eulogy belong to the dead. We give them this day to Warren and his associates. On other occasions they have been given to your more immediate companions in arms, to Washington, to Greene, to Gates, to Sullivan, and to Lincoln. We have become reluctant to grant these, our highest and last honors, further. We would gladly hold them yet back from the little remnant of that immortal band. Serius in coelum redeas. Illustrious as are your merits, yet far, O very far distant be the day, when any inscription shall bear your name, or any tongue pronounce its eulogy!

The leading reflection to which this occasion seems to invite us, respects the great changes which have happened in the fifty years since the battle of Bunker Hill was fought. And it peculiarly marks the character of the present age, that, in looking at these changes, and in estimating their effect on our condition, we are obliged to consider, not what has been done in our own country only, but in others also. In these interesting times, while nations are making separate and individual advances in improvement, they make, too, a common progress; like vessels on a common tide, propelled by the gales at different rates, according to their several structure and management, but all moved forward by one mighty current, strong enough to bear onward whatever does not sink beneath it.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

A chief distinction of the present day is a community of opinions and knowledge amongst men in different nations, existing in a degree heretofore unknown. Knowledge has, in our time, triumphed, and is triumphing, over distance, over difference of languages, over diversity of habits, over prejudice, and over bigotry. The civilized and Christian world is fast learning the great lesson, that difference of nation does not imply necessary hostility, and that all contact need not be war. The whole world is becoming a common field for intellect to act in. Energy of mind, genius, power, wheresoever it exists, may speak out in any tongue, and the world will hear it. A great chord of sentiment and feeling runs through two continents, and vibrates over both. Every breeze wafts intelligence from country to country; every wave rolls it; all give it forth, and all in turn receive it. There is a vast commerce of ideas; there are marts and exchanges for intellectual discoveries, and a wonderful fellowship of those individual intelligences which make up the mind and opinion of the age. Mind is the great lever of all things; human thought is the process by which human ends are ultimately answered; and the diffusion of knowledge, so astonishing in the last half-century, has rendered innumerable minds, variously gifted by nature, competent to be competitors or fellow-workers on the theatre of intellectual operation.

From these causes important improvements have taken place in the personal condition of individuals. Generally speaking, mankind are not only better fed and better clothed, but they are able also to enjoy more leisure; they possess more refinement and more self-respect. A superior tone of education, manners, and habits prevails. This remark, most true in its application to our own country, is also partly true when applied elsewhere. It is proved by the vastly augmented consumption of those articles of manufacture and of commerce which contribute to the comforts and the decencies of life; an augmentation which has far outrun the progress of population. And while the unexampled and almost incredible use of machinery would seem to supply the place of labor, labor still finds its occupation and its reward; so wisely has Providence adjusted men's wants and desires to their condition and their capacity.

Any adequate survey, however, of the progress made during the last half-century in the polite and the mechanic arts, in machinery and manufactures, in commerce and agriculture, in letters and in science, would require volumes. I must abstain wholly from these subjects, and turn for a moment to the contemplation of what has been done on the great question of politics and government. This is the master topic of the age; and during the whole fifty years it has intensely occupied the thoughts of men. The nature of civil government, its ends and uses, have been canvassed and investigated; ancient opinions attacked and defended; new ideas recommended and resisted, by whatever power the mind of man could bring to the controversy. From the closet and the public halls the debate has been transferred to the field; and the world has been shaken by wars of unexampled magnitude, and the greatest variety of fortune. A day of peace has at length succeeded; and now that the strife has subsided, and the smoke cleared away, we may begin to see what has actually been done, permanently changing the state and condition of human society. And, without dwelling on particular circumstances, it is most apparent, that, from the before-mentioned causes of augmented knowledge and improved individual condition, a real, substantial, and important change has taken place, and is taking place, highly favorable, on the whole, to human liberty and human happiness.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

The great wheel of political revolution began to move in America. Here its rotation was guarded, regular, and safe. Transferred to the other continent, from unfortunate but natural causes, it received an irregular and violent impulse; it whirled along with a fearful celerity; till at length, like the chariot-wheels in the races of antiquity, it took fire from the rapidity of its own motion, and blazed onward, spreading conflagration and terror around.

We learn from the result of this experiment, how fortunate was our own condition, and how admirably the character of our people was calculated for setting the great example of popular governments. The possession of power did not turn the heads of the American people, for they had long been in the habit of exercising a great degree of self-control. Although the paramount authority of the parent state existed over them, yet a large field of legislation had always been open to our Colonial assemblies. They were accustomed to representative bodies and the forms of free government; they understood the doctrine of the division of power among different branches, and the necessity of checks on each. The character of our countrymen, moreover, was sober, moral, and religious; and there was little in the change to shock their feelings of justice and humanity, or even to disturb an honest prejudice. We had no domestic throne to overturn, no privileged orders to cast down, no violent changes of property to encounter. In the American Revolution, no man sought or wished for more than to defend and enjoy his own. None hoped for plunder or for spoil. Rapacity was unknown to it; the axe was not among the instruments of its accomplishment; and we all know that it could not have lived a single day under any well-founded imputation of possessing a tendency adverse to the Christian religion.

It need not surprise us, that, under circumstances less auspicious, political revolutions elsewhere, even when well intended, have terminated differently. It is, indeed, a great achievement, it is the master-work of the world, to establish governments entirely popular on lasting foundations; nor is it easy, indeed, to introduce the popular principle at all into governments to which it has been altogether a stranger. It cannot be doubted, however, that Europe has come out of the contest, in which she has been so long engaged, with greatly superior knowledge, and, in many respects, in a highly improved condition. Whatever benefit has been acquired is likely to be retained, for it consists mainly in the acquisition of more enlightened ideas. And although kingdoms and provinces may be wrested from the hands that hold them, in the same manner they were obtained; although ordinary and vulgar power may, in human affairs, be lost as it has been won; yet it is the glorious prerogative of the empire of knowledge, that what it gains it never loses. On the contrary, it increases by the multiple of its own power; all its ends become means; all its attainments, helps to new conquests. Its whole abundant harvest is but so much seed wheat, and nothing has limited, and nothing can limit, the amount of ultimate product.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Under the influence of this rapidly increasing knowledge, the people have begun, in all forms of government, to think and to reason, on affairs of state. Regarding government as an institution for the public good, they demand a knowledge of its operations, and a participation in its exercise. A call for the representative system, wherever it is not enjoyed, and where there is already intelligence enough to estimate its value, is perseveringly made. Where men may speak out, they demand it; where the bayonet is at their throats, they pray for it.

When Louis the Fourteenth said, "I am the state," he expressed the essence of the doctrine of unlimited power. By the rules of that system, the people are disconnected from the state; they are its subjects; it is their lord. These ideas, founded in the love of power, and long supported by the excess and the abuse of it, are yielding, in our age, to other opinions; and the civilized world seems at last to be proceeding to the conviction of that fundamental and manifest truth, that the powers of government are but a trust, and that they cannot be lawfully exercised but for the good of the community. As knowledge is more and more extended, this conviction becomes more and more general. Knowledge, in truth, is the great sun in the firmament. Life and power are scattered with all its beams. The prayer of the Grecian champion, when enveloped in unnatural clouds and darkness, is the appropriate political supplication for the people of every country not yet blessed with free institutions:—

"Dispel this cloud, the light of heaven restore, Give me TO SEE,—and Ajax asks no more."

We may hope that the growing influence of enlightened sentiment will promote the permanent peace of the world. Wars to maintain family alliances, to uphold or to cast down dynasties, and to regulate successions to thrones, which have occupied so much room in the history of modern times, if not less likely to happen at all, will be less likely to become general and involve many nations, as the great principle shall be more and more established, that the interest of the world is peace, and its first great statute, that every nation possesses the power of establishing a government for itself. But public opinion has attained also an influence over governments which do not admit the popular principle into their organization. A necessary respect for the judgment of the world operates, in some measure, as a control over the most unlimited forms of authority. It is owing, perhaps, to this truth, that the interesting struggle of the Greeks has been suffered to go on so long, without a direct interference, either to wrest that country from its present masters, or to execute the system of pacification by force, and, with united strength, lay the neck of Christian and civilized Greek at the foot of the barbarian Turk. Let us thank God that we live in an age when something has influence besides the bayonet, and when the sternest authority does not venture to encounter the scorching power of public reproach. Any attempt of the kind I have mentioned should be met by one universal burst of indignation; the air of the civilized world ought to be made too warm to be comfortably breathed by any one who would hazard it.

It is, indeed, a touching reflection, that, while, in the fulness of our country's happiness, we rear this monument to her honor, we look for instruction in our undertaking to a country which is now in fearful contest, not for works of art or memorials of glory, but for her own existence. Let her be assured, that she is not forgotten in the world; that her efforts are applauded, and that constant prayers ascend for her success. And let us cherish a confident hope for her final triumph. If the true spark of religious and civil liberty be kindled, it will burn. Human agency cannot extinguish it. Like the earth's central fire, it may be smothered for a time; the ocean may overwhelm it; mountains may press it down; but its inherent and unconquerable force will heave both the ocean and the land, and at some time or other, in some place or other, the volcano will break out and flame up to heaven.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Among the great events of the half-century, we must reckon, certainly, the revolution of South America; and we are not likely to overrate the importance of that revolution, either to the people of the country itself or to the rest of the world. The late Spanish colonies, now independent states, under circumstances less favorable, doubtless, than attended our own revolution, have yet successfully commenced their national existence. They have accomplished the great object of establishing their independence; they are known and acknowledged in the world; and although in regard to their systems of government, their sentiments on religious toleration, and their provisions for public instruction, they may have yet much to learn, it must be admitted that they have risen to the condition of settled and established states more rapidly than could have been reasonably anticipated. They already furnish an exhilarating example of the difference between free governments and despotic misrule. Their commerce, at this moment, creates a new activity in all the great marts of the world. They show themselves able, by an exchange of commodities, to bear a useful part in the intercourse of nations.

A new spirit of enterprise and industry begins to prevail; all the great interests of society receive a salutary impulse; and the progress of information not only testifies to an improved condition, but itself constitutes the highest and most essential improvement.

When the battle of Bunker Hill was fought, the existence of South America was scarcely felt in the civilized world. The thirteen little Colonies of North America habitually called themselves the "Continent." Borne down by colonial subjugation, monopoly, and bigotry, these vast regions of the South were hardly visible above the horizon. But in our day there has been, as it were, a new creation. The southern hemisphere emerges from the sea. Its lofty mountains begin to lift themselves into the light of heaven; its broad and fertile plains stretch out, in beauty, to the eye of civilized man, and at the mighty bidding of the voice of political liberty the waters of darkness retire.

And, now, let us indulge an honest exultation in the conviction of the benefit which the example of our country has produced, and is likely to produce, on human freedom and human happiness. Let us endeavor to comprehend in all its magnitude, and to feel in all its importance, the part assigned to us in the great drama of human affairs. We are placed at the head of the system of representative and popular governments. Thus far our example shows that such governments are compatible, not only with respectability and power, but with repose, with peace, with security of personal rights, with good laws, and a just administration.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

We are not propagandists. Wherever other systems are preferred, either as being thought better in themselves, or as better suited to existing condition, we leave the preference to be enjoyed. Our history hitherto proves, however, that the popular form is practicable, and that with wisdom and knowledge men may govern themselves; and the duty incumbent on us is, to preserve the consistency of this cheering example, and take care that nothing may weaken its authority with the world. If, in our case, the representative system ultimately fail, popular governments must be pronounced impossible. No combination of circumstances more favorable to the experiment can ever be expected to occur. The last hopes of mankind, therefore, rest with us; and if it should be proclaimed, that our example had become an argument against the experiment, the knell of popular liberty would be sounded throughout the earth.

These are excitements to duty; but they are not suggestions of doubt. Our history and our condition, all that is gone before us, and all that surrounds us, authorize the belief, that popular governments, though subject to occasional variations, in form perhaps not always for the better, may yet, in their general character, be as durable and permanent as other systems. We know, indeed, that in our country any other is impossible. The principle of free governments adheres to the American soil. It is bedded in it, immovable as its mountains.

And let the sacred obligations which have devolved on this generation, and on us, sink deep into our hearts. Those who established our liberty and our government are daily dropping from among us. The great trust now descends to new hands. Let us apply ourselves to that which is presented to us, as our appropriate object. We can win no laurels in a war for independence. Earlier and worthier hands have gathered them all. Nor are there places for us by the side of Solon, and Alfred, and other founders of states. Our fathers have filled them. But there remains to us a great duty of defence and preservation; and there is opened to us, also, a noble pursuit, to which the spirit of the times strongly invites us. Our proper business is improvement. Let our age be the age of improvement. In a day of peace, let us advance the arts of peace and the works of peace. Let us develop the resources of our land, call forth its powers, build up its institutions, promote all its great interests, and see whether we also, in our day and generation, may not perform something worthy to be remembered. Let us cultivate a true spirit of union and harmony. In pursuing the great objects which our condition points out to us, let us act under a settled conviction, and an habitual feeling, that these twenty-four States are one country. Let our conceptions be enlarged to the circle of our duties. Let us extend our ideas over the whole of the vast field in which we are called to act. Let our object be, OUR COUNTRY, OUR WHOLE COUNTRY, AND NOTHING BUT OUR COUNTRY. And, by the blessing of God, may that country itself become a vast and splendid monument, not of oppression and terror, but of Wisdom, of Peace, and of Liberty, upon which the world may gaze with admiration for ever!

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1826

In England, the custom of preaching a sermon in the prison chapel of the Newgate Prison/Old Bailey complex on the Sunday before the execution of a prisoner, and charging a shilling a head to see the condemned person seated next to his coffin to endure this sermon, was at this point being discontinued. Lord knows why.³⁷⁴

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1826

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
16/01	Mary Carn		Newgate	Murder
28/04	Joanna Lovett	30	Tralee	Murder of husband

 A prisoner was hanged for the crime of murder in Boston. This would be the last hanging in Beantown for single homicide, for a considerable stretch of time — Lord knows why.

FINAL EXECUTIONS

July 9, 1819	Rose Butler	final woman to be publicly hanged in New-York and buried in Potters' Field (Washington Square)
1826	name not on record	prisoner hanged for a single homicide in Boston
December 31, 1829	Thomas Maynard	hanging at Newgate in England for forgery

 February 1, Wednesday: String Quartet “Tod und das Madchen” D.810 by Franz Schubert was performed for the initial time, at the home of Josef Barth in Vienna.

The pirate Charles Colson was hanged in the jailyard on Leverett Street in Boston — but his partner in crime Charles Marchant had cheated the hangman by offing himself the day before.

In Providence, Rhode Island, Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

4th day — Attended Select Meeting, & Meeting for Sufferings, Dined at David Anthonys — took tea & lodged at Moses Browns. —

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

374. The first capital punishment enactments of which we have written record date to the legal code of King Hammurabi of Babylon, in the 18th Century BCE, which had specified the penalty of death for 25 distinct offenses. This had been carried forward in the 14th Century BCE in the Hittite code of laws, which also made use of capital punishment, and in the 7th Century BCE, in the legal code implemented by Draco of Athens, which had specified that the penalty was to be the same, capital punishment, for any crime regardless of what it was (this had been, of course, truly Draconian). In this century, the Roman Law of the Twelve Tablets also made use of capital punishment. Death might be by crucifixion, by burning alive, by being beaten to death, by drowning, or by impalement. In the 10th Century, the British code of laws had also made use of capital punishment, although the usual method of execution was hanging. The arrival of William the Bastard, become William the Conqueror, in the 11th Century, meant no capital punishment whatever of any of his British subjects, regardless of their crime, except in time of war. During the reign of King Henry VIII over England, however, we infer that as many as 72,000 people were executed. The common methods of execution in Henry's time were boiling, burning at the stake, hanging, beheading, and drawing and quartering. Treason was a capital offense — and the crime of trahison might extend even to whispering a jest about the monarch, or failing to raise one's glass during a toast, or having sex with a prince's nursemaid. For a non-Jew to marry a Jew was a capital offense. For an arrested person to refuse to confess to a crime meant that the penalty, if found guilty, regardless of the offense, was to be death. In subsequent centuries, the English lawmakers had continued to add to the list of crimes punishable by death. By the 1700s, 222 crimes were punishable by death in Britain, and this including stealing, the unauthorized cutting down of a tree, and pilfering from someone else's rabbit warren. Because they knew that a conviction meant an execution, where they did not consider the culprit's offense to be that serious many juries of Englishmen would issue a verdict of “not proven.” In response to this tendency, from 1823 to 1837 the lawmakers of England would be removing the penalty of death from more than 100 of the 222 crimes that had previously involved mandatory capital punishment.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

 July 13, Thursday: On the glacis of Peter-Paul Fortress in Russia, a gallows had hastily been erected. All the prisoners were herded into the square to witness the execution of their compatriots before, at 3AM on that misty morning, the condemned, five officers of the “Decembrists” who had been selected by Tsar Nicholas to set an example for the rest, were led out into the flickering light of the bonfires with notices hanging on their chests “Criminals — Regicides!” After their epaulets had been torn off and cast into the flames, and after they had been blessed by the Archpriest Myslovskii, and after the ropes had been put in place and the hoods had been placed over their heads, the command was given and the supports were pulled away from under the platform. Three of these former army officers slipped through their nooses and fell to the ground. One, named Muravey, lay there on the ground waiting for the noose to again be placed around his neck and shouted out the frustration which had brought about the revolt of the previous December:

My God! In this hopeless country they cannot even hang people properly!

You’ll notice that this guy Muravey, whoever he was, was no dummy. He knew that the best way to get attention for this his last piece of social commentary, a remark which would become legendary, was to accompany them, as the last words of a human being about to be judged by Our Maker, with what would be taken by the Archpriest in attendance, Myslovskii, and numerous others at this ceremonial occasion, as a blasphemy.

The Duke of Wellington, in St. Petersburg for the state funeral of Tsar Alexander I, was equally discouraged at the condition of all the Russias, but in his case the occasion of his discouragement was having to stand around and see and smell that due to the long delay during the arrests and trials of the Decembrists, the corpse of the old tsar had become unfrozen and was decomposing. —Yet as a proper diplomat he could not afford to be on record as having blasphemed.

My God! In this hopeless country they cannot even bury people properly!

Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

5th day 13 of 7 M / Our first meeting was silent & rather low - in the last which was our Select Meeting, life rose a little - In the Afternoon met with a committee from the Moy [Monthly] Meeting, which was a time of labour - The subject however was debated in love & resulted as well as could be expected

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

considering the diversity of sentiment that existed among us –

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

December 18, Monday: In Boston, the pirates Charles Marchant and Charles Colson were condemned to be hanged.

The Reverend Samuel Whitman died suddenly at the age of 75.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1827

A prisoner was hanged for the crimes of piracy and murder in Boston.

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1827

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
02/01	Amelia Roberts	30	Newgate	Robbery
26/03	Rachael Bradley	27	Lancaster Castle	Murder of child
11/04	Sarah Jones	26	Monmouth	Murder of child
16/06	Margaret Wishart		Forfar	Murder of sister
17/09	Mary Wittenbach	40	Newgate	Murder

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1828

➡ Formation, in England, of the Society for the Diffusion of Information on the Subject of Capital Punishment, led (of course) by Quakers.

Originally, in 1696, the solemn affirmation of Quakers in court had been accepted instead of an oath, which Quakers refused to take because it was contrary to Scripture and because it implied a specially stringent standard of truth-telling for witness testimony in court; however, in 1749 Quakers had been prohibited from testifying in such manner during criminal proceedings. At this point that 1749 restriction was lifted.

➡ March 22, Saturday: Jane Scott, a 22-year-old who had poisoned her parents, was so weak and in such a state of collapse as she was taken to be hanged at Lancaster Castle that they needed to tie her to a high chair (the chair they used that day is still on display at Lancaster Castle).

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

OTHER WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING THE YEAR

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
17/03	Mary Magrath	60	Dundalk	Murder
14/04	Catherine Walsh	24	Newgate	Murder of child
08/08	Elizabeth Commins	22	Bodmin	Murder of child
16/08	Ann Harris		Shrewsbury	Murder
22/10	Isabella Mc Menamy	22	Glasgow	Robbery & assault

April 14, Monday: Brigadier-General Alexander Walker resigned as the governor of St. Helena.

At Newgate prison in London a healthy 24-year-old woman, Catherine Walsh, was hanged because she had killed her 6-week-old infant. This would be a treasure for the Royal College of Surgeons — a fit young female body to dissect (they would make the most careful drawings, and these still exist).

OTHER WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1828

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
17/03	Mary Magrath	60	Dundalk	Murder
22/03	Jane Scott	22	Lancaster Castle	Murder
08/08	Elizabeth Commins	22	Bodmin	Murder of child
16/08	Ann Harris		Shrewsbury	Murder
22/10	Isabella Mc Menamy	22	Glasgow	Robbery & assault

Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

2nd day 14th of 4 M / Today we had a friendly call from Job Otis of New Bedford on his way to NYork. — our interview was pleasant & to me interesting. —

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

June 27, Friday: In Vienna, “Maestoso Sonata Sentimentale” was performed by Nicolò Paganini for the initial time.

In London, since 1540 the barbers and surgeons had been authorized to take, annually, the bodies of four felons for purposes of dissection. On this day a new law went into effect requiring that the body of anyone hanged for murder be given over for such dissection. Also, execution for a murder was to take place on the day following sentencing (this would be repealed on July 14, 1836).

On December 21, 1670 Sir John Coventry, K.B. and M.P., had had his nose slit on the street in London by Sir Thomas Sandys and other members of the royal guard. This mutilation had been provoked by remarks he had made about the private life of King Charles II, and was said to have been instigated by the duke of Monmouth. In consequence of this outrage, the Coventry Act had made such malicious wounding and maiming a capital offense. On this day, however, that Coventry Act was repealed.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

The rubric “petty treason” (by a subordinate against a superior other than the national monarch, such as a wife killing her husband, or a servant killing his or her master, or a clergyman killing his prelate) was eliminated by this new packet of laws, with such cases absorbed under the rubric “murder” (cases in which a servant forged his master’s seal, or had consensual sex with his master’s wife or daughter, would no longer either be prosecuted as petty treason, or as murder). From this day forward treason would no longer be distinguished as being “high,” or being “petty.”

August 11, Monday: William Corder was hanged at Bury St. Edmunds, England for the murder of Maria Marten at the Red Barn a year earlier.

Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

2nd day - After completing a little buisness that was necessary to attend to I got on board the Reformation Capt Pratt at [Providence] & came home to [Newport]-

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1829

➡ April 11, Saturday: According to an almanac of the period, “Unsuccessful attack upon a Russian position near Trato on the Danube, by the Turks.”

CHRONOLOGY OF EVENTS

➡ April 12, Sunday: Daniel-Francois-Esprit Auber was elected a member of the Institut, replacing Francois Joseph Gossec.

Alexander von Humboldt began a scientific expedition into uncharted regions of Siberia.

According to an almanac of the period, “Capitulation of the city of Guatemala, after a long siege and some hard fighting, to the army of St. Salvador under General Morazan.”

CHRONOLOGY OF EVENTS

➡ April 13, Monday: Nicholas Chopin wrote to Minister Stanislas Grabowski and the Board of Administration for funds to allow his gifted son Fryderyk Franciszek Chopin to study abroad. Although the Minister favored the request, the Board was reluctant to “squander public funds to encourage such artists.”

In England, a Roman Catholic Relief Bill passed the House of Lords. Catholics would be relieved from certain political disabilities under which they had labored for many years: they would be allowed to vote, to sit in Parliament, and to hold (almost) any military, civil, and corporate office.³⁷⁵

Esther Hibner, who had murdered a child, had such strength even at the age of 61 that they needed to get her into a straight jacket in order to take her to the gallows.

OTHER WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING THE YEAR

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
07/03	Jane Jameson		Newcastle	Matricide
22/07	Ann Chapman	28	Newgate	Attempted Murder
17/08	Kezia Westcombe	32	Exeter	Murder
19/08	Catherine Wright (Stewart)		Edinburgh	Murder (hanged with her husband)

375. A list of other categories of dissenters from the Church of England, excepting Papists and persons denying the Trinity, had been passed on May 24, 1689, and confirmed in 1711. The excepting of persons denying the Trinity had been repealed on July 21, 1813, leaving only the Papists to suffer these political disabilities.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

 December 28, Monday: Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

2nd day 28 of 12 M / A day of good experience, my mind being favourd with some sensible touches of religious sensibility - for which I desire to be thankful. -

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

 December 29, Tuesday: Giacomo Meyerbeer signed his 1st contract with the Paris Opera.

DYING DECLARATION OF NICHOLAS FERNANDEZ, WHO WITH NINE OTHERS WERE EXECUTED IN FRONT OF CADIZ HARBOUR, DECEMBER 29, 1829 FOR PIRACY AND MURDER ON THE HIGH SEAS. 1830

HANGING
PIRATES

 December 31, Thursday: The final hanging for the crime of forgery in England, of Thomas Maynard, at Newgate.³⁷⁶

FINAL EXECUTIONS
1826	name not on record	prisoner hanged for a single homicide in Boston
December 31, 1829	Thomas Maynard	hanging at Newgate in England for forgery
August 31, 1833	Charlotte Young (Long)	hanged at Gloucester for arson, the final English woman executed for anything other than murder

Enoch H. Pratt was born to Mercy Snow Pratt and the Reverend Enoch Pratt (Enoch H. would go to California).

376. The initial such hanging for forgery had taken place on June 4, 1732 and the preponderance of the executions had occurred in 1818, with 24 such hangings.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1830

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1830

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
22/03	Ellen Connell		Tralee	Murder of husband
25/03	Mary Kelly		Kilkenny	Murder of aunt
31/03	Jane Graham	49	Carrickfergus	Murder
31/03	Mary Murphy	50	Limerick	Conspiracy to murder
13/08	Bridget Brennan		Tralee	Murder of husband
24/08	Margaret Cleland		Downpatrick	Murder
08/10	Catherine Davidson (Humphries)		Aberdeen	Murder

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

January: Piracy was again punished by hanging, this time on the Rock of Gibraltar. (Gosh, what will it take to persuade these guys that they shouldn't be just offing people in cold blood?). The lumps and bumps on the head of Benito de Soto would be examined by phrenologists, to figure out how the guy had gone so wrong. (Wouldn't it be nice to be able to identify the pirates among us while they are still small children, so they can be hanged long before they have a chance to commit their first act of depredation?):

STATE MURDER

NO-ONE'S LIFE IS EVER NOT DRIVEN PRIMARILY BY HAPPENSTANCE

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

THE LIFE OF BENITO DE SOTO, PIRATE OF THE *MORNING STAR*³⁷⁷

The following narrative of the career of a desperate pirate who was executed in Gibraltar in the month of January, 1830, is one of two letters from the pen of the author of "the Military Sketch-Book." The writer says Benito de Soto

"had been a prisoner in the garrison for nineteen months, during which time the British Government spared neither the pains nor expense to establish a full train of evidence against him. The affair had caused the greatest excitement here, as well as at Cadiz, owing to the development of the atrocities which marked the character of this man, and the diabolical gang of which he was the leader. Nothing else is talked of; and a thousand horrors are added to his guilt, which, although he was guilty enough, he has no right to bear. The following is all the authentic information I could collect concerning him. I have drawn it from his trial, from the confession of his accomplices, from the keeper of his prison, and not a little from his own lips. It will be found more interesting than all the tales and sketches furnished in the 'Annuals,' magazines, and other vehicles of invention, from the simple fact — that it is truth and not fiction."

377. THE PIRATES OWN BOOK, OR AUTHENTIC NARRATIVES OF THE LIVES, EXPLOITS, AND EXECUTIONS OF THE MOST CELEBRATED SEA ROBBERS, by Charles Ellms (Portland: Published by Sanborn & Carter; Philadelphia: Thomas, Comperthwait, & Co., 1837. This would be republished in 1842 by A. and C.B. Edwards of New-York & Philadelphia, and in 1844 in Portland by Sanborn & Carter, and in 1855 by A. and C.B. Edwards of New-York, and in 1924 by Marine res. of Massachusetts, and in 1996 by Random House of New York.)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Benito de Soto was a native of a small village near Courná; he was bred a mariner, and was in the guiltless exercise of his calling at Buenos Ayres, in the year 1827. A vessel was there being fitted out for a voyage to the coast of Africa, for the smuggling of slaves; and as she required a strong crew, a great number of sailors were engaged, amongst whom was Soto. The Portuguese of South America have yet a privilege of dealing in slaves on a certain part of the African coast, but it was the intention of the captain of this vessel to exceed the limits of his trade, and to run farther down, so as to take his cargo of human beings from a part of the country which was proscribed, in the certainty of being there enabled to purchase slaves at a much lower rate than he could in the regular way; or, perhaps, to take away by force as many as he could stow away into his ship. He therefore required a considerable number of hands for the enterprise; and in such a traffic, it may be easily conceived, that the morals of the crew could not be a subject of much consideration with the employer. French, Spanish, Portuguese, and others, were entered on board, most of them renegadoes, and they set sail on their evil voyage, with every hope of infamous success.

Those who deal in evil carry along with them the springs of their own destruction, upon which they will tread, in spite of every caution, and their imagined security is but the brink of the pit into which they are to fall. It was so with the captain of this slave-ship. He arrived in Africa, took in a considerable number of slaves, and in order to complete his cargo, went on shore, leaving his mate in charge of the vessel. This mate was a bold, wicked, reckless and ungovernable spirit, and perceiving in Benito de Soto a mind congenial with his own, he fixed on him as a fit person to join in a design he had conceived, of running away with the vessel, and becoming a pirate. Accordingly the mate proposed his plan to Soto, who not only agreed to join in it, but declared that he himself had been contemplating a similar enterprise during the voyage. They both were at once of a mind, and they lost no time in maturing their plot.

Their first step was to break the matter to the other members of the crew. In this they proceeded cautiously, and succeeded so far as to gain over twenty-two of the whole, leaving eighteen who remained faithful to their trust. Every means were used to corrupt the well disposed; both persuasion and threats were resorted to, but without effect, and the leader of the conspiracy, the mate, began to despair of obtaining the desired object. Soto, however, was not so easily depressed. He at once decided on seizing the ship upon the strength of his party: and without consulting the mate, he collected all the arms of the vessel, called the conspirators together, put into each of their possession a cutlass and a brace of pistols, and arming himself in like manner, advanced at the head of the gang, drew his sword, and declared the mate to be the commander of the ship, and the men who joined him part owners. Still, those who had rejected the evil offer remained unmoved; on which Soto ordered out the boats, and pointing to the land, cried out, "There is the African coast; this is our ship – one or the other must be chosen by every man on board within five minutes."

This declaration, although it had the effect of preventing any resistance that might have been offered by the well disposed, to the taking of the vessel, did not change them from their purpose; they still refused to join in the robbery, and entered one by one into the boat, at the orders of Soto, and with but one pair of oars (all that was allowed to them) put off for the shore, from which they were then ten miles distant. Had the weather continued calm, as it was when the boat left the ship, she would have made the shore by dusk; but unhappily a strong gale of wind set in shortly after her departure, and she was seen by Soto and his gang struggling with the billows and approaching night, at such a distance from the land as she could not possibly accomplish while the gale lasted. All on board the ship agreed in opinion that the boat could not live, as they flew away from her at the rate of ten knots an hour, under close reefed topsails, leaving their unhappy messmates to their inevitable fate. Those of the pirates who were lately executed at Cadiz, declared that every soul in the boat perished.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

The drunken uproar which that night reigned in the pirate ship was in horrid unison with the raging elements around her; contention and quarrelling followed the brutal ebriety of the pirates; each evil spirit sought the mastery of the others, and Soto's, which was the fiend of all, began to grasp and grapple for its proper place – the head of such a diabolical community. The mate (now the chief) at once gave the reins to his ruffian tyranny; and the keen eye of Soto saw that he who had fawned with him the day before, would next day rule him with an iron rod. Prompt in his actions as he was penetrating in his judgment, he had no sooner conceived a jealousy of the leader than he determined to put him aside; and as his rival lay in his drunken sleep, Soto put a pistol to his head, and deliberately shot him. For this act he excused himself to the crew, by stating to them that it was in their protection he did the act; that their interest was the other's death; and concluded by declaring himself their leader, and promising a golden harvest to their future labors, provided they obeyed him. Soto succeeded to the height of his wishes, and was unanimously hailed by the crew as their captain.

On board the vessel, as I before stated, were a number of slaves, and these the pirates had well secured under hatches. They now turned their attention to those half starved, half suffocated creatures; – some were for throwing them overboard, while others, not less cruel, but more desirous of gain, proposed to take them to some port in one of those countries that deal in human beings, and there sell them. The latter recommendation was adopted, and Soto steered for the West Indies, where he received a good price for his slaves. One of those wretched creatures, a boy, he reserved as a servant for himself; and this boy was destined by Providence to be the witness of the punishment of those white men who tore away from their homes himself and his brethren. He alone will carry back to his country the truth of Heaven's retribution, and heal the wounded feelings of broken kindred with the recital of it.

The pirates now entered freely into their villainous pursuit, and plundered many vessels; amongst others was an American brig, the treatment of which forms the chef d'oeuvre of their atrocity. Having taken out of this brig all the valuables they could find, they hatched down all hands to the hold, except a black man, who was allowed to remain on deck for the special purpose of affording in his torture an amusing exhibition to

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Soto and his gang. They set fire to the brig, then lay to, to observe the progress of the flames; and as the miserable African bounded from rope to rope, now climbing to the mast head – now clinging to the shrouds – now leaping to one part of the vessel, and now to another, – their enjoyment seemed raised to its heighest pitch. At length the hatches opened to the devouring element, the tortured victim of their fiendish cruelty fell exhausted into the flames, and the horrid and revolting scene closed amidst the shouts of the miscreants who had caused it.

Of their other exploits, that which ranks next in turpitude, and which led to their overthrow, was the piracy of the Morning Star. They fell in with that vessel near the island Ascension, in the year 1828, as she was on her voyage from Ceylon to England. This vessel, besides a valuable cargo, had on board several passengers, consisting of a major and his wife, an assistant surgeon, two civilians, about five and twenty invalid soldiers, and three or four of their wives. As soon as Benito de Soto perceived the ship, which was at daylight on the 21st of February, he called up all hands, and prepared for attacking her; he was at the time steering on an opposite course to that of the Morning Star. On reconnoitring her, he at first supposed she was a French vessel; but Barbazan, one of his crew, who was himself a Frenchman, assured him the ship was British. "So much the better," exclaimed Soto, in English (for he could speak that language), "we shall find the more booty." He then ordered the sails to be squared, and ran before the wind in chase of his plunder, from which he was about two leagues distant.

The Defensor de Pedro, the name of the pirate ship, was a fast sailer, but owing to the press of canvas which the Morning Star hoisted soon after the pirate had commenced the chase, he did not come up with her so quickly as he had expected: the delay caused great uneasiness to Soto, which he manifested by muttering curses, and restlessness of manner. Sounds of savage satisfaction were to be heard from every mouth but his at the prospect; he alone expressed his anticipated pleasure by oaths, menaces, and mental inquietude. While Barbazan was employed in superintending the clearing of the decks, the arming and breakfasting of the men, he walked rapidly up and down, revolving in his mind the plan of the approaching attack, and when interrupted by any of the crew, he would run into a volley of imprecations. In one instance, he struck his black boy a violent blow with a telescope, because he asked him if he would have his morning cup of chocolate; as soon, however, as he set his studding sails, and perceived that he was gaining on the Morning Star, he became somewhat tranquil, began to eat heartily of cold beef, drank his chocolate at a draught, and coolly sat down on the deck to smoke a cigar.

In less than a quarter of an hour, the pirate had gained considerable on the other vessel. Soto now, without rising from where he sat, ordered a gun, with blank cartridge, to be fired, and the British colors to be hoisted: but finding this measure had not the effect of bringing the Morning Star to, he cried out, "Shot the long gun and give it her point blank." The order was obeyed, but the shot fell short of the intention, on which he jumped up and cursed the fellows for bunglers who had fired the gun. He then ordered them to load with canister shot, and took the match in his own hand. He did not, however, fire immediately, but waited until he was nearly abreast of his victim; then directing the aim himself, and ordering a man to stand by the flag to haul it down, fired with an air that showed he was sure of his mark. He then ran to haul up the Colombian colors, and having done so, cried out through the speaking trumpet, "Lower your boat down this moment, and let your captain come on board with his papers."

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

During this fearful chase the people on board the Morning Star were in the greatest alarm; but however their apprehensions might have been excited, that courage, which is so characteristic of a British sailor, never for a moment forsook the captain. He boldly carried on sail, and although one of the men fell from a wound, and the ravages of the shot were every where around him, he determined not to strike. But unhappily he had not a single gun on board, and no small arms that could render his courage availing. The tears of the women, and the prudent advice of the passengers overcoming his resolution, he permitted himself to be guided by the general opinion. One of the passengers volunteered himself to go on board the pirate, and a boat was lowered for the purpose. Both vessels now lay to within fifty yards of each other, and a strong hope arose in those on board the Morning Star, that the gentleman who had volunteered to go to the pirate, might, through his exertions, avert, at least, the worst of the dreaded calamity.

Some people here, in their quiet security, have made no scruple of declaring, that the commanding officer of the soldiers on board should not have so tamely yielded to the pirate, particularly as he had his wife along with him, and consequently a misfortune to dread, that might be thought even worse than death: but all who knew the true state of the circumstances, and reflect upon it, will allow that he adopted the only chance of escaping that, which was to be most feared by a husband. The long gun, which was on a pivot in the centre of the pirate ship, could in a few shots sink the Morning Star; and even had resistance been made to the pirates as they boarded her — had they been killed or made prisoners — the result would not be much better. It was evident that the Defensor de Pedro was the best sailer, consequently the Morning Star could not hope to escape; in fact, submission or total destruction was the only choice. The commanding officer, therefore, acted for the best when he recommended the former. There was some slight hope of escaping with life, and without personal abuse, by surrendering, but to contend must be inevitable death.

The gentleman who had gone in a boat to the pirate returned in a short time, exhibiting every proof of the ill treatment he had received from Soto and his crew. It appears that when the villains learned that he was not the captain, they fell upon and beat him, as well as the sailors along with him, in a most brutal manner, and with the most horrid imprecations told him, that if the captain did not instantly come, on his return to the vessel, they would blow the ship out of the water. This report as once decided the captain in the way he was to act. Without hesitation he stepped into the boat, taking with him his second mate, three soldiers and a sailor boy, and proceeded to the pirate. On going on board that vessel, along with the mate, Soto, who stood near the mainmast, with his drawn cutlass in his hand, desired him to approach, while the mate was ordered, by Barbazan, to go to the forecabin. Both these unfortunate individuals obeyed, and were instantly slaughtered.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Soto now ordered six picked men to descend into the boat, amongst whom was Barbazan. To him the leader addressed his orders, the last of which was, to take care to put all in the prize to death, and then sink her.

The six pirates, who proceeded to execute his savage demand, were all armed alike, – they each carried a brace of pistols, a cutlass and a long knife. Their dress was composed of a sort of coarse cotton chequered jacket and trowsers, shirts that were open at the collar, red woollen caps, and broad canvas waistbelts, in which were the pistols and the knives. They were all athletic men, and seemed such as might well be trusted with the sanguinary errand on which they were despatched. While the boat was conveying them, Soto held in his hand a cutlass, reddened with the blood of the murdered captain, and stood scowling on them with silence: while another ruffian, with a lighted match, stood by the long gun, ready to support the boarding, if necessary, with a shot that would sweep the deck. As the boarders approached the Morning Star, the terror of the females became excessive; they clung to their husbands in despair, who endeavored to allay their fears by their own vain hopes, assuring them that a quiet submission nothing more than the plunder of the vessel was to be apprehended. But a few minutes miserably undeceived them. The pirates rapidly mounted the side, and as they jumped on deck, commenced to cut right and left at all within their reach, uttering at the same time the most dreadful oaths. The females, screaming, hurried to hide themselves below as well as they were able, and the men fell or fled before the pirates, leaving them entire masters of the decks.

When the pirates had succeeded in effectually prostrating all the people on deck, they drove most of them below, and reserved the remainder to assist in their operations. Unless the circumstances be closely examined, it may be wondered how six men could have so easily overcome a crew of English seamen supported by about twenty soldiers with a major at their head: – but it will not appear so surprising, when it is considered that the sailors were altogether unarmed, the soldiers were worn out invalids, and more particularly, that the pirate carried a heavy long gun, ready to sink her victim at a shot. Major Logie was fully impressed with the folly of opposing so powerful and desperate an enemy, and therefore advised submission as the only course for the safety of those under his charge; presuming no doubt that something like humanity might be found in the breasts even of the worst of men. But alas! he was woefully deceived in his estimate of the villains' nature, and felt, when too late, that even death would have been preferable to the barbarous treatment he was forced to endure.

Beaten, bleeding, terrified, the men lay huddled together in the hold, while the pirates proceeded in their work of pillage and brutality. Every trunk was hauled forth, every portable article of value heaped for the plunder; money, plate, charts, nautical instruments, and seven parcels of valuable jewels, which formed part of the cargo; these were carried from below on the backs of those men whom the pirates selected to assist them, and for two hours they were thus employed, during which time Soto stood upon his own deck directing the operations; for the vessels were within a hundred yards of each other. The scene which took place in the cabin exhibited a licentious brutality. The sick officer,

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Mr. Gibson, was dragged from his berth; the clothes of the other passengers stripped from their backs, and the whole of the cabin passengers driven on deck, except the females, whom they locked up in the round-house on deck, and the steward, who was detained to serve the pirates with wine and eatables. This treatment, no doubt hastened the death of Gibson; the unfortunate gentleman did not long survive it. As the passengers were forced up the cabin ladder, the feelings of Major Logie, it may be imagined, were of the most heart-rending description. In vain did he entreat to be allowed to remain; he was hurried away from even the chance of protecting his defenceless wife, and battened down with the rest in the hold, there to be racked with the fearful apprehensions of their almost certain doom.

The labors of the robbers being now concluded, they sat down to regale themselves, preparatory to the chef d'oeuvre of their diabolical enterprise; and a more terrible group of demi-devils, the steward declares, could not be well imagined than commanded his attention at the cabin table. However, as he was a Frenchman, and naturally polite, he acquitted himself of the office of cup-bearer, if not as gracefully, at least as anxiously, as ever did Ganymede herself. Yet, notwithstanding this readiness to serve the visitors in their gastronomic desires, the poor steward felt ill-requited; he was twice frightened into an icicle, and twice thawed back into conscious horror, by the rudeness of those he entertained. In one instance, when he had filled out a sparkling glass for a ruffian, and believed he had quite won the heart of the drinker by the act, he found himself grasped roughly and tightly by the throat, and the point of a knife staring him in the face. It seems the fellow who thus seized him, had felt between his teeth a sharp bit of broken glass, and fancying that something had been put in the wine to poison him, he determined to prove his suspicions by making the steward swallow what remained in the bottle from which the liquor had been drawn, and thus unceremoniously prefaced his command; however, ready and implicit obedience averted further bad consequences. The other instance of the steward's jeopardy was this; when the repast was ended, one of the gentlemen coolly requested him to waive all delicacy, and point out the place in which the captain's money was concealed. He might as well have asked him to produce the philosopher's stone. However, pleading the truth was of no use; his determined requisitor seconded the demand by snapping a pistol at his breast; having missed fire, he recocked, and again presented; but the fatal weapon was struck aside by Barbazan, who reproved the rashness with a threat, and thus averted the steward's impending fate. It was then with feelings of satisfaction he heard himself ordered to go down to the hold, and in a moment he was bolted in among his fellow sufferers.

The ruffians indulged in the pleasures of the bottle for some time longer, and then having ordered down the females, treated them with even less humanity than characterized their conduct towards the others. The screams of the helpless females were heard in the hold by those who were unable to render them assistance, and agonizing, indeed, must those screams have been to their incarcerated hearers! How far the brutality of the pirates was carried in this stage of the horrid proceeding, we can only surmise; fortunately, their lives were spared, although, as it afterwards appeared, the orders of Soto were to butcher every being on board; and it is thought that these orders were not put into action, in consequence of the villains having wasted so much time in drinking, and otherwise indulging themselves; for it was not until the loud voice of their chief was heard to recall them, that they prepared to leave the ship; they therefore contented themselves with fastening the women within the cabin, heaping heavy lumber on the hatches of the hold, and boring holes in the planks of the vessel below the surface of the water, so that in destroying the unhappy people at one swoop, they might make up for the lost time. They then left the ship, sinking fast to her apparently certain fate.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

It may be reasonably supposed, bad as their conduct was towards the females, and pitiable as was the suffering it produced, that the lives of the whole left to perish were preserved through it; for the ship must have gone down if the women had been either taken out of her or murdered, and those in the hold inevitably have gone with her to the bottom. But by good fortune, the females succeeded in forcing their way out of the cabin, and became the means of liberating the men confined in the hold. When they came on deck, it was nearly dark, yet they could see the pirate ship at a considerable distance, with all her sails set and bearing away from them. They prudently waited, concealed from the possibility of being seen by the enemy, and when the night fell, they crept to the hatchway, and called out to the men below to endeavor to effect their liberation, informing them that the pirate was away and out of sight. They then united their efforts, and the lumber being removed, the hatches gave way to the force below, so that the released captives breathed of hope again. The delightful draught, however, was checked, when the ship was found to contain six feet of water! A momentary collapse took possession of all their newly excited expectations; cries and groans of despair burst forth, but the sailors' energy quickly returned, and was followed by that of the others; they set to work at the pumps, and by dint of labor succeeded in keeping the vessel afloat. Yet to direct her course was impossible; the pirates having completely disabled her, by cutting away her rigging and sawing the masts all the way through. The eye of Providence, however, was not averted from the hapless people, for they fell in with a vessel next day that relieved them from their distressing situation, and brought them to England in safety.

We will now return to Soto, and show how the hand of that Providence that secured his intended victims, fell upon himself and his wicked associates. Intoxicated with their infamous success, the night had far advanced before Soto learned that the people in the Morning Star, instead of being slaughtered, were only left to be drowned. The information excited his utmost rage. He reproached Barbazan, and those who had accompanied them in the boarding, with disobeying his orders, and declared that now there could be no security for their lives. Late as the hour was, and long as he had been steering away from the Morning Star, he determined to put back, in the hope of effectually preventing the escape of those in the devoted vessel, by seeing them destroyed before his eyes. Soto was a follower of the principle inculcated by the old maxim, "Dead men tell no tales;" and in pursuance of his doctrine, lost not a moment in putting about and running back. But it was too late; he could find no trace of the vessel, and so consoled himself with the belief that she was at the bottom of the sea, many fathoms below the ken and cognizance of Admiralty Courts.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Soto, thus satisfied, bent his course to Europe. On his voyage he fell in with a small brig, boarded, plundered, sunk her, and, that he might not again run the hazard of encountering living witnesses of his guilt, murdered the crew, with the exception of one individual, whom he took along with him, on account of his knowledge of the course to Corunna, whither he intended to proceed. But, faithful to his principles of self-protection, as soon as he had made full use of the unfortunate sailor, and found himself in sight of the destined port, he came up to him at the helm, which he held in his hand, "My friend," said he "is that the harbor of Corunna?" – "Yes," was the reply. "Then," rejoined Soto, "You have done your duty well, and I am obliged to you for your services." On the instant he drew a pistol and shot the man; then coolly flung his body overboard, took the helm himself, and steered into his native harbor as little concerned as if he had returned from an honest voyage. At this port he obtained papers in a false name, disposed of a great part of his booty, and after a short stay set out for Cadiz, where he expected a market for the remainder. He had a fair wind until he came within sight of the coast near that city. It was coming on dark and he lay to, expecting to go into his anchorage next morning, but the wind shifted to the westward, and suddenly began to blow a heavy gale; it was right on the land. He luffed his ship as close to the wind as possible, in order to clear a point that stretched outward, and beat off to windward, but his lee-way carried him towards the land, and he was caught when he least expected the trap. The gale increased – the night grew pitchy dark – the roaring breakers were on his lee-beam – the drifting vessel strikes, rebounds, and strikes again – the cry of horror rings through the flapping cordage, and despair is in the eyes of the demon-crew. Helpless they lie amid the wrath of the storm, and the darkened face of Heaven, for the first time, strikes terror on their guilty hearts. Death is before them, but not with a merciful quickness does he approach; hour after hour the frightful vision glares upon them, and at length disappears only to come upon them again in a more dreadful form. The tempest abates, and the sinners were spared for the time.

As the daylight broke they took to their boats, and abandoned the vessel to preserve their lives. But there was no repentance in the pirates; along with the night and the winds went the voice of conscience, and they thought no more of what had passed. They stood upon the beach gazing at the wreck, and the first thought of Soto, was to sell it, and purchase another vessel for the renewal of his atrocious pursuits. With the marked decision of his character, he proposed his intention to his followers, and received their full approbation. The plan was instantly arranged; they were to present themselves as honest, shipwrecked mariners to the authorities at Cadiz; Soto was to take upon himself the office of mate, or contra maestra, to an imaginary captain, and thus obtain their sanction in disposing of the vessel. In their assumed character, the whole proceeded to Cadiz, and presented themselves before the proper officers of the marine. Their story was listened to with sympathy, and for a few days every thing went on to their satisfaction. Soto had succeeded so well as to conclude the sale of the wreck with a broker, for the sum of one thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars; the contract was signed, but fortunately the money was not yet paid, when suspicion arose, from some inconsistencies in the pirates' account of themselves, and six of them were arrested by the authorities. Soto and one of his crew instantly disappeared from Cadiz, and succeeded in arriving at the neutral ground before Gibraltar, and six more made their escape to the Carraccas.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

None are permitted to enter the fortress of Gibraltar, without permission from the governor, or a passport. Soto and his companion, therefore, took up their quarters at a Posade on the neutral ground, and resided there in security for several days. The busy and daring mind of the former could not long remain inactive; he proposed to his companion to attempt to enter the garrison in disguise and by stealth, but could not prevail upon him to consent. He therefore resolved to go in alone; and his object in doing so was to procure a supply of money by a letter of credit which he brought with him from Cadiz. His companion, more wise than he, chose the safer course; he knew that the neutral ground was not much controllable by the laws either of the Spanish or the English, and although there was not much probability of being discovered, he resolved not to trust to chance in so great a stake as his life; and he proved to have been right in his judgment, for had he gone to Gibraltar, he would have shared the same fate of his chief. This man is the only one of the whole gang, who has not met with the punishment of his crimes, for he succeeded in effecting his escape on board some vessel. It is not even suspected to what country he is gone; but his description, no doubt, is registered. The steward of the Morning Star informed me, that he is a tall, stout man, with fair hair, and fresh complexion, of a mild and gentle countenance, but that he was one of the worst villains of the whole piratical crew. I believe he is stated to be a Frenchman. Soto secured his admission into the garrison by a false pass, and took up his residence at an inferior tavern in a narrow lane, which runs off the main street of Gibraltar, and is kept by a man of the name of Basso. The appearance of this house suits well with the associations of the worthy Benito's life. I have occasion to pass the door frequently at night, for our barrack, (the Casement,) is but a few yards from it. I never look at the place without feeling an involuntary sensation of horror – the smoky and dirty nooks – the distant groups of dark Spaniards, Moors, and Jews, their sallow countenances made yellow by the light of dim oil lamps – the unceiled rafters of the rooms above, seen through unshuttered windows and the consciousness of their having covered the atrocious Soto, combine this effect upon me. In this den the villain remained for a few weeks, and during this time seemed to enjoy himself as if he had never committed a murder. The story he told Basso of his circumstances was, that he had come to Gibraltar on his way to Cadiz from Malaga, and was merely awaiting the arrival of a friend. He dressed expensively – generally wore a white hat of the best English quality, silk stockings, white trousers, and blue frock coat. His whiskers were large and bushy, and his hair, which was very black, profuse, long and naturally curled, was much in the style of a London preacher of prophetic and anti-poetic notoriety. He was deeply browned with the sun, and had an air and gait expressive of his bold, enterprising, and desperate mind. Indeed, when I saw him in his cell and at his trial, although his frame was attenuated almost to a skeleton, the color of his face a pale yellow, his eyes sunken, and hair closely shorn; he still exhibited strong traces of what he had been, still retained his erect and fearless carriage, his quick, fiery, and malevolent eye, his hurried and concise speech, and his close and pertinent style of remark. He appeared to me such a man as would have made a hero in the ranks of his country, had circumstances placed him in the proper road to fame; but ignorance and poverty turned into the most ferocious robber, one who might have rendered service and been an honor to his sunken country. I should like to hear what the phrenologists say of his head; it appeared to me to be the most peculiar I had ever seen, and certainly, as far as the bump of destructiveness went, bore the theory fully out. It is rumored here that the skull has been sent to the savans of Edinburg; if this be the case, we shall no doubt be made acquainted with their sage opinions upon the subject, and great conquerors will receive a farther assurance of how much they resemble in their physical natures the greatest murderers.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

When I visited the pirate in the Moorish castle where he was confined, he was sitting in his cold, narrow, and miserable cell, upon a pallet of straw, eating his coarse meal from a tin plate. I thought him more an object of pity than vengeance; he looked so worn with disease, so crushed with suffering, yet so affable, frank, and kind in his address; for he happened to be in a communicative mood, a thing that was by no means common with him. He spoke of his long confinement, till I thought the tears were about to start from his eyes, and alluded to his approaching trial with satisfaction; but his predominant characteristic, ferocity, appeared in his small piercing black eyes before I left him, as he alluded to his keeper, the Provost, in such a way that made me suspect his desire for blood was not yet extinguished. When he appeared in court on his trial, his demeanor was quite altered; he seemed to me to have suddenly risen out of the wretch he was in his cell, to all the qualities I had heard of him; he stood erect and unembarrassed; he spoke with a strong voice, attended closely to the proceedings, occasionally examined the witnesses, and at the conclusion protested against the justice of his trial. He sometimes spoke to the guards around him, and sometimes affected an air of carelessness of his awful situation, which, however, did not sit easy upon him. Even here the leading trait of his mind broke forth; for when the interpreter commenced his office, the language which he made use of being pedantic and affected, Soto interrupted him thus, while a scowl sat upon his brow that terrified the man of words: "I don't understand you, man; speak Spanish like others, and I'll listen to you." When the dirk that belonged to Mr. Robertson, the trunk and clothes taken from Mr. Gibson, and the pocket book containing the ill-fated captain's handwriting were placed before him, and proved to have been found in his room, and when the maid servant of the tavern proved that she found the dirk under his pillow every morning on arranging his bed; and when he was confronted with his own black slave, between two wax lights, the countenance of the villain appeared in its true nature, not depressed nor sorrowful, but vivid and ferocious; and when the patient and dignified governor, Sir George Don, passed the just sentence of the law upon him, he looked daggers at his heart, and assumed a horrid silence, more eloquent than words.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

The criminal persisted up to the day before his execution in asserting his innocence, and inveighing against the injustice of his trial, but the certainty of his fate, and the awful voice of religion, at length subdued him. He made an unreserved confession of his guilt, and became truly penitent; gave up to the keeper the blade of a razor which he had secreted between the soles of his shoes for the acknowledged purpose of adding suicide to his crimes, and seemed to wish for the moment that was to send him before his Creator.

I witnessed his execution, and I believe there never was a more contrite man than he appeared to be; yet there were no drivelling fears upon him – he walked firmly at the tail of the fatal cart, gazing sometimes at his coffin, sometimes at the crucifix which he held in his hand. The symbol of divinity he frequently pressed to his lips, repeated the prayers spoken in his ear by the attendant clergyman, and seemed regardless of every thing but the world to come. The gallows was erected beside the water, and fronting the neutral ground. He mounted the cart as firmly as he had walked behind it, and held up his face to Heaven and the beating rain, calm, resigned, but unshaken; and finding the halter too high for his neck, he boldly stepped upon his coffin, and placed his head in the noose, then watching the first turn of the wheels, he murmured “adios todos,”³⁷⁸ and leaned forward to facilitate his fall.

The black slave of the pirate stood upon the battery trembling before his dying master to behold the awful termination of a series of events, the recital of which to his African countrymen, when he shall return to his home, will give them no doubt, a dreadful picture of European civilization. The black boy was acquitted at Cadiz, but the men who had fled to the Carraccas, as well as those arrested after the wreck, were convicted, executed, their limbs severed, and hung on tenter hooks, as a warning to all pirates.

September 29, Wednesday: John F. Knapp was hanged in Salem, for having murdered 82-year-old Joseph White on April 6th.

Horace Mann, Sr. got married with Charlotte Messer, daughter of Brown University's former president Asa Messer (resigned as president due to school unrest) who had just been a candidate for Governor of Rhode Island (unsuccessful).

Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

*4th day 29th of 9 M / Moy [Monthly] Meeting held in Town Wm almy was short in testimony encouraging the youth
The buisness was pretty well conducted - Elisha Bowen dined at the Institution the first time since we have been here -*

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

378. “Farewell, all.”

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1831

In California, Francisco Rubio, a Hispanic soldier, was put before a firing squad for murder-rape.

At the Royal College of Surgeons in London, in the course of this year, there were eleven dissections of the bodies of the hanged.

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1831

Date	Name	Place of execution	Crime
18/03	Margaret Mackesay	Limerick	Murder
05/08	Agnes Clarke	Downpatrick	Murder
06/08	Judith Butler	Clonmel	Murder
11/08	Mary Ann Higgins	Coventry	Murder
06/10	Mary Steel (Bryce)	Glasgow	Murder

April 22, Friday: The net yearly revenue of the British monarch was reduced from £1,080,000 to £510,000.

The pirates Charles Gibbs, born in Rhode Island in 1794, and Thomas J. Wansley, were hanged at Bellevue Prison of New-York.

[see next screen]

HDTWHAT?INDEXSTATE MURDER*STATE MURDER

THE LIFE OF CHARLES GIBBS.
CONTAINING AN ACCOUNT OF HIS ATROCITIES COMMITTED IN THE WEST INDIES³⁷⁹

This atrocious and cruel pirate, when very young became addicted to vices uncommon in youths of his age, and so far from the gentle reproof and friendly admonition, or the more severe chastisement of a fond parent, having its intended effect, it seemed to render him still worse, and to incline him to repay those whom he ought to have esteemed as his best friends and who had manifested so much regard for his welfare, with ingratitude and neglect. His infamous career and ignominious death on the gallows; brought down the "grey hairs of his parents in sorrow to the grave." The poignant affliction which the infamous crimes of children bring upon their relatives ought to be one of the most effective persuasions for them to refrain from vice. Charles Gibbs was born in the state of Rhode Island, in 1794; his parents and connexions were of the first respectability. When at school, he was very apt to learn, but so refractory and sulky, that neither the birch nor good counsel made any impression on him, and he was expelled from the school.

He was now made to labor on a farm; but having a great antipathy

379. THE PIRATES OWN BOOK, OR AUTHENTIC NARRATIVES OF THE LIVES, EXPLOITS, AND EXECUTIONS OF THE MOST CELEBRATED SEA ROBBERS, by Charles Ellms (Portland: Published by Sanborn & Carter; Philadelphia: Thomas, Comperthwait, & Co., 1837. This would be republished in 1842 by A. and C.B. Edwards of New-York & Philadelphia, and in 1844 in Portland by Sanborn & Carter, and in 1855 by A. and C.B. Edwards of New-York, and in 1924 by Marine res. of Massachusetts, and in 1996 by Random House of New York.)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

to work, when about fifteen years of age, feeling a great inclination to roam, and like too many unreflecting youths of that age, a great fondness for the sea, he in opposition to the friendly counsel of his parents, privately left them and entered on board the United States sloop-of-war, Hornet, and was in the action when she captured the British sloop-of-war Peacock, off the coast of Pernambuco. Upon the return of the Hornet to the United States, her brave commander, Capt. Lawrence, was promoted for his gallantry to the command of the unfortunate Chesapeake, and to which he was followed by young Gibbs, who took a very distinguished part in the engagement with the Shannon, which resulted in the death of Lawrence and the capture of the Chesapeake. Gibbs states that while on board the Chesapeake the crew previous to the action, were almost in a state of mutiny, growing out of the non payment of the prize money, and that the address of Capt. Lawrence was received by them with coldness and murmurs.

After the engagement, Gibbs became with the survivors of the crew a prisoner of war, and as such was confined in Dartmoor prison until exchanged.

After his exchange, he returned to Boston, where having determined to abandon the sea, he applied to his friends in Rhode Island, to assist him in commencing business; they accordingly lent him one thousand dollars as a capital to begin with. He opened a grocery in Ann Street, near what was then called the Tin Pot, a place full of abandoned women and dissolute fellows. As he dealt chiefly in liquor, and had a "License to retail Spirits," his drunkenery was thronged with customers. But he sold his groceries chiefly to loose girls who paid him in their coin, which, although it answered his purpose, would neither buy him goods or pay his rent, and he found his stock rapidly dwindling away without his receiving any cash to replenish it. By dissipation and inattention his new business proved unsuccessful to him. He resolved to abandon it and again try the sea for a subsistence. With a hundred dollars in his pocket, the remnant of his property, he embarked in the ship John, for Buenos Ayres, and his means being exhausted soon after his arrival there, he entered on board a Buenos Ayrean privateer and sailed on a cruise. A quarrel between the officers and crew in regard to the division of prize money, led eventually to a mutiny; and the mutineers gained the ascendancy, took possession of the vessel, landed the crew on the coast of Florida, and steered for the West Indies, with hearts resolved to make their fortunes at all hazards, and where in a short time, more than twenty vessels were captured by them and nearly Four Hundred Human Beings Murdered!

Havana was the resort of these pirates to dispose of their plunder; and Gibbs sauntered about this place with impunity and was acquainted in all the out of the way and bye places of that hot bed of pirates the Regla. He and his comrades even lodged in the very houses with many of the American officers who were sent out to take them. He was acquainted with many of the officers and was apprised of all their intended movements before they left the harbor. On one occasion, the American ship Caroline, was captured by two of their piratical vessels off Cape Antonio. They were busily engaged in landing the cargo, when the British sloop-of-war, Jearus, hove in sight and sent her barges to attack them. The pirates defended themselves for some time behind a small four gun battery which they had erected, but in the end were forced to abandon their own vessel and the prize and fly to the mountains for safety. The Jearus found here twelve vessels burnt to the water's edge, and it was satisfactorily ascertained that their crews, amounting to one hundred and fifty persons had been murdered. The crews, if it was thought not necessary otherways to dispose of them were sent adrift in their boats, and frequently without any thing on which they could subsist a single day; nor were all so fortunate thus to escape. "Dead men can tell no tales," was a common saying among them; and as soon as a ship's crew were taken, a short consultation was held; and if it was the opinion of a majority that it would be better to take life than to spare it, a single nod or wink from the captain was sufficient; regardless of age or sex, all entreaties for mercy were then made in vain; they possessed not the tender feelings, to be operated upon by the shrieks and expiring groans of the devoted victims! there was a strife among them, who with his own hands could despatch the greatest number, and in the shortest period of time.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Without any other motives than to gratify their hellish propensities (in their intoxicated moments), blood was not unfrequently and unnecessarily shed, and many widows and orphans probably made, when the lives of the unfortunate victims might have been spared, and without the most distant prospect of any evil consequences (as regarded themselves), resulting therefrom.

Gibbs states that sometime in the course of the year 1819, he left Havana and came to the United States, bringing with him about $30,000. He passed several weeks in the city of New York, and then went to Boston, whence he took passage for Liverpool in the ship Emerald. Before he sailed, however, he has squandered a large part of his money by dissipation and gambling. He remained in Liverpool a few months, and then returned to Boston. His residence in Liverpool at that time is satisfactorily ascertained from another source besides his own confession. A female now in New York was well acquainted with him there, where, she says, he lived like a gentleman, with apparently abundant means of support. In speaking of his acquaintance with this female he says, "I fell in with a woman, who I thought was all virtue, but she deceived me, and I am sorry to say that a heart that never felt abashed at scenes of carnage and blood, was made a child of for a time by her, and I gave way to dissipation to drown the torment. How often when the fumes of liquor have subsided, have I thought of my good and affectionate parents, and of their Godlike advice! But when the little monitor began to move within me, I immediately seized the cup to hide myself from myself, and drank until the sense of intoxication was renewed. My friends advised me to behave myself like a man, and promised me their assistance, but the demon still haunted me, and I spurned their advice."

In 1826, he revisited the United States, and hearing of the war between Brazil and the Republic of Buenos Ayres, sailed from Boston in the brig Hitty, of Portsmouth, with a determination, as he states, of trying his fortune in defence of a republican government. Upon his arrival he made himself known to Admiral Brown, and communicated his desire to join their navy. The admiral accompanied him to the Governor, and a Lieutenant's commission being given him, he joined a ship of 34 guns, called the 'Twenty Fifth of May.' "Here," says Gibbs, "I found Lieutenant Dodge, an old acquaintance, and a number of other persons with whom I had sailed. When the Governor gave me the commission he told me they wanted no cowards in their navy, to which I replied that I thought he would have no apprehension of my cowardice or skill when he became acquainted with me. He thanked me, and said he hoped he should not be deceived; upon which we drank to his health and to the success of the Republic. He then presented me with a sword, and told me to wear that as my companion through the doubtful struggle in which the republic was engaged. I told him I never would disgrace it, so long as I had a nerve in my arm. I remained on board the ship in the capacity of 5th Lieutenant, for about four months, during which time we had a number of skirmishes with the enemy. Having succeeded in gaining the confidence of Admiral Brown, he put me in command of a privateer schooner, mounting two long 24 pounders and 46 men. I sailed from Buenos Ayres, made two good cruises, and returned safely to port. I then bought one half of a new Baltimore schooner, and sailed again, but was captured seven days out, and carried into Rio Janeiro, where the Brazilians paid me my change. I remained there until peace took place, then returned to Buenos Ayres, and thence to New York. "After the lapse of about a year, which I passed in travelling from place to place, the war between France and Algiers attracted my attention. Knowing that the French commerce presented a fine opportunity for plunder, I determined to embark for Algiers and offer my services to the Dey. I accordingly took passage from New York, in the Sally Ann, belonging to Bath, landed at Barcelona, crossed to Port Mahon, and endeavored to make my way to Algiers. The vigilance of the French fleet prevented the accomplishment of my design, and I proceeded to Tunis. There finding it unsafe to attempt a journey to Algiers across the desert, I amused myself with contemplating the ruins of Carthage, and reviving my recollections of her war with the Romans. I afterwards took passage to Marseilles, and thence to Boston."

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

An instance of the most barbarous and cold blooded murder of which the wretched Gibbs gives an account in the course of his confessions, is that of an innocent and beautiful female of about 17 or 18 years of age! she was with her parents a passenger on board a Dutch ship, bound from Curracoa to Holland; there were a number of other passengers, male and female, on board, all of whom except the young lady above-mentioned were put to death; her unfortunate parents were inhumanly butchered before her eyes, and she was doomed to witness the agonies and to hear the expiring, heart-piercing groans of those whom she held most dear, and on whom she depended for protection! The life of their wretched daughter was spared for the most nefarious purposes — she was taken by the pirates to the west end of Cuba, where they had a rendezvous, with a small fort that mounted four guns — here she was confined about two months, and where, as has been said by the murderer Gibbs, "she received such treatment, the bare recollection of which causes me to shudder!" At the expiration of the two months she was taken by the pirates on board of one of their vessels, and among whom a consultation was soon after held, which resulted in the conclusion that it would be necessary for their own personal safety, to put her to death! and to her a fatal dose of poison was accordingly administered, which soon proved fatal! when her pure and immortal spirit took its flight to that God, whom, we believe, will avenge her wrongs! her lifeless body was then committed to the deep by two of the merciless wretches with as much unconcern, as if it had been that of the meanest brute! Gibbs persists in the declaration that in this horrid transaction he took no part, that such was his pity for this poor ill-fated female, that he interceded for her life so long as he could do it with safety to his own! Gibbs in his last visit to Boston remained there but a few days, when he took passage to New Orleans, and there entered as one of the crew on board the brig Vineyard; and for assisting in the murder of the unfortunate captain and mate of which, he was justly condemned, and the awful sentence of death passed upon him! The particulars of the bloody transaction (agreeable to the testimony of Dawes and Brownrigg, the two principal witnesses,) are as follows: The brig Vineyard, Capt. William Thornby, sailed from New Orleans about the 9th of November, for Philadelphia, with a cargo of 112 bales of cotton, 113 hhds. sugar, 54 casks of molasses and 54,000 dollars in specie. Besides the captain there were on board the brig, William Roberts, mate, six seamen shipped at New Orleans, and the cook. Robert Dawes, one of the crew, states on examination, that when, about five days out, he was told that there was money on board, Charles Gibbs, E. Church and the steward then determined to take possession of the brig. They asked James Talbot, another of the crew, to join them. He said no, as he did not believe there was money in the vessel. They concluded to kill the captain and mate, and if Talbot and John Brownrigg would not join them, to kill them also. The next night they talked of doing it, and got their clubs ready. Dawes dared not say a word, as they declared they would kill him if he did; as they did not agree about killing Talbot and Brownrigg, two shipmates, it was put off. They next concluded to kill the captain and mate on the night of November 22, but did not get ready; but, on the night of the 23d, between twelve and one o'clock, as Dawes was at the helm, saw the steward come up with a light and a knife in his hand; he dropt the light and seizing the pump break, struck the captain with it over the head or back of the neck; the captain was sent forward by the blow, and halloed, oh! and murder! once; he was then seized by Gibbs and the cook, one by the head and the other by the heels, and thrown overboard. Atwell and Church stood at the companion way, to strike down the mate when he should come up. As he came up and enquired what was the matter they struck him over the head – he ran back into the cabin, and Charles Gibbs followed him down; but as it was dark, he could not find him – Gibbs came on deck for the light, with which he returned. Dawes' light being taken from him, he could not see to steer, and he in consequence left the helm, to see what was going on below. Gibbs found the mate and seized him, while Atwell and Church came down and struck him with a pump break and a club; he was then dragged upon deck; they called for Dawes to come to them, and as he came up the mate seized his hand, and gave him a death gripe! three of them then hove him overboard, but which three Dawes does not know; the mate when cast overboard was not dead, but called after them twice while in the water! Dawes says he was so frightened that he hardly knew what to do. They then requested him to call Talbot, who was in the forecabin, saying his prayers; he came up and said it would be his turn next! but they gave him some grog, and told him not to be afraid, as they would not hurt him; if he was true to them, he should fare as well as they did. One of those who had been engaged in the bloody deed got drunk, and another became crazy!

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

After killing the captain and mate, they set about overhauling the vessel, and got up one keg of Mexican dollars. They then divided the captain's clothes, and money – about 40 dollars, and a gold watch. Dawes, Talbot and Brownrigg, (who were all innocent of the murder,) were obliged to do as they were commanded – the former, who was placed at the helm, was ordered to steer for Long Island. On the day following, they divided several kegs of the specie, amounting to five thousand dollars each – they made bags and sewed the money up. After this division, they divided the remainder of the money without counting it. On Sunday, when about 15 miles S.S.E. of Southampton Light, they got the boats out and put half the money in each – they then scuttled the vessel and set fire to it in the cabin, and took to the boats. Gibbs, after the murder, took charge of the vessel as captain. From the papers they learnt that the money belonged to Stephen Girard. With the boats they made the land about daylight. Dawes and his three companions were in the long boat; the others, with Atwell, were in the jolly boat – on coming to the bar the boats struck – in the long boat, they threw overboard a trunk of clothes and a great deal of money, in all about 5000 dollars – the jolly boat foundered; they saw the boat fill, and heard them cry out, and saw them clinging to the masts – they went ashore on Barron Island, and buried the money in the sand, but very lightly. Soon after they met with a gunner, whom they requested to conduct them where they could get some refreshments. They were by him conducted to Johnson's (the only man living on the island,) where they staid all night – Dawes went to bed at about 10 o'clock – Jack Brownrigg set up with Johnson, and in the morning told Dawes that he had told Johnson all about the murder. Johnson went in the morning with the steward for the clothes, which were left on the top of the place where they buried the money, but does not believe they took away the money.

The prisoners, (Gibbs and Wansley,) were brought to trial at the February term of the United States Court, holden in the city of New York; when the foregoing facts being satisfactorily proved, they were pronounced guilty, and on the 11th March last, the awful sentence of the law was passed upon them in the following affecting and impressive manner: – The Court opened at 11 o'clock, Judge Betts presiding. A few minutes after that hour, Mr. Hamilton, District Attorney, rose and said – May it please the Court, Thomas J. Wansley, the prisoner at the bar, having been tried by a jury of his country, and found guilty of the murder of Captain Thornby, I now move that the sentence of the Court be pronounced upon that verdict.

By the Court. Thomas J. Wansley, you have heard what has been said by the District Attorney – by the Grand Jury of the South District of New York, you have been arraigned for the wilful murder of Captain Thornby, of the brig Vineyard; you have been put upon your trial, and after a patient and impartial hearing, you have been found Guilty. The public prosecutor now moves for judgment on that verdict; have you any thing to say, why the sentence of the law should not be passed upon you?

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Thomas J. Wansley. I will say a few words, but it is perhaps of no use. I have often understood that there is a great deal of difference in respect of color, and I have seen it in this Court. Dawes and Brownrigg were as guilty as I am, and these witnesses have tried to fasten upon me greater guilt than is just, for their life has been given to them. You have taken the blacks from their own country, to bring them here to treat them ill. I have seen this. The witnesses, the jury, and the prosecuting Attorney consider me more guilty than Dawes, to condemn me – for otherwise the law must have punished him; he should have had the same verdict, for he was a perpetrator in the conspiracy. Notwithstanding my participating, they have sworn falsely for the purpose of taking my life; they would not even inform the Court, how I gave information of money being on board; they had the biggest part of the money, and have sworn falsely. I have said enough. I will say no more. By the Court. The Court will wait patiently and hear all you have to say; if you have any thing further to add, proceed.

Wansley then proceeded. In the first place, I was the first to ship on board the Vineyard at New Orleans, I knew nobody; I saw the money come on board. The judge that first examined me, did not take my deposition down correctly. When talking with the crew on board, said the brig was an old craft, and when we arrived at Philadelphia, we all agreed to leave her. It was mentioned to me that there was plenty of money on board. Henry Atwell said "let's have it." I knew no more of this for some days. Atwell came to me again and asked "what think you of taking the money." I thought it was a joke, and paid no attention to it. The next day he said they had determined to take the brig and money, and that they were the strongest party, and would murder the officers, and he that informed should suffer with them. I knew Church in Boston, and in a joke asked him how it was made up in the ship's company; his reply, that it was he and Dawes. There was no arms on board as was ascertained; the conspiracy was known to the whole company, and had I informed, my life would have been taken, and though I knew if I was found out my life would be taken by law, which is the same thing, so I did not inform. I have committed murder and I know I must die for it.

By the Court. If you wish to add any thing further you will still be heard.

Wansley. No sir, I believe I have said enough.

The District Attorney rose and moved for judgment on Gibbs, in the same manner as in the case of Wansley, and the Court having addressed Gibbs, in similar terms, concluded by asking what he had to say why the sentence of the law should not now be passed upon him.

Charles Gibbs said, I wish to state to the Court, how far I am guilty and how far I am innocent in this transaction. When I left New Orleans, I was a stranger to all on board, except Dawes and Church. It was off

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Tortugas that Atwell first told me there was money on board, and proposed to me to take possession of the brig. I refused at that time. The conspiracy was talked of for some days, and at last I agreed that I would join. Brownrigg, Dawes, Church, and the whole agreed that they would. A few days after, however, having thought of the affair, I mentioned to Atwell, what a dreadful thing it was to take a man's life, and commit piracy, and recommended him to "abolish," their plan. Atwell and Dawes remonstrated with me; I told Atwell that if ever he would speak of the subject again, I would break his nose. Had I kept to my resolution I would not have been brought here to receive my sentence. It was three days afterwards that the murder was committed. Brownrigg agreed to call up the captain from the cabin, and this man, (pointing to Wansley,) agreed to strike the first blow. The captain was struck and I suppose killed, and I lent a hand to throw him overboard. But for the murder of the mate, of which I have been found guilty, I am innocent — I had nothing to do with that. The mate was murdered by Dawes and Church; that I am innocent of this I commit my soul to that God who will judge all flesh — who will judge all murderers and false swearers, and the wicked who deprive the innocent of his right. I have nothing more to say.

By the Court. Thomas J. Wansley and Charles Gibbs, the Court has listened to you patiently and attentively; and although you have said something in your own behalf, yet the Court has heard nothing to affect the deepest and most painful duty that he who presides over a public tribunal has to perform.

You, Thomas J. Wansley, conceive that a different measure of justice has been meted out to you, because of your color. Look back upon your whole course of life; think of the laws under which you have lived, and you will find that to white or black, to free or bond, there is no ground for your allegations; that they are not supported by truth or justice. Admit that Brownrigg and Dawes have sworn falsely; admit that Dawes was concerned with you; admit that Brownrigg is not innocent; admit, in relation to both, that they are guilty, the whole evidence has proved beyond a doubt that you are guilty; and your own words admit that you were an active agent in perpetrating this horrid crime. Two fellow beings who confided in you, and in their perilous voyage called in your assistance, yet you, without reason or provocation, have maliciously taken their lives.

If, peradventure, there was the slightest foundation for a doubt of your guilt, in the mind of the Court, judgment would be arrested, but there is none; and it now remains to the Court to pronounce the most painful duty that devolves upon a civil magistrate. The Court is persuaded of your guilt; it can form no other opinion. Testimony has been heard before the Court and Jury — from that we must form our opinion. We must proceed upon testimony, ascertain facts by evidence of witnesses, on which we must inquire, judge and determine as to guilt or innocence, by that evidence alone. You have been found guilty. You now stand for the last time before an earthly tribunal, and by your own acknowledgments, the sentence of the law falls just on your heads. When men in ordinary cases come under the penalty of the law there is generally some palliative – something to warm the sympathy of the Court and Jury. Men may be led astray, and under the influence of passion have acted under some long smothered resentment, suddenly awakened by the force of circumstances, depriving him of reason, and then they may take the life of a fellow being. Killing, under that kind of excitement, might possibly awaken some sympathy, but that was not your case; you had no provocation. What offence had Thornby or Roberts committed against you? They entrusted themselves with you, as able and trustworthy citizens; confiding implicitly in you; no one act of theirs, after a full examination, appears to have been offensive to you; yet for the purpose of securing the money you coolly determined to take their lives – you slept and deliberated over the act; you were tempted on, and yielded; you entered into the conspiracy, with cool and determined calculation to deprive two human beings of their lives, and it was done.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

You, Charles Gibbs, have said that you are not guilty of the murder of Roberts; but were you not there, strongly instigating the murderers on, and without stretching out a hand to save him? – It is murder as much to stand by and encourage the deed, as to stab with a knife, strike with a hatchet, or shoot with a pistol. It is not only murder in law, but in your own feelings and in your own conscience. Notwithstanding all this, I cannot believe that your feelings are so callous, so wholly callous, that your own minds do not melt when you look back upon the unprovoked deeds of yourselves, and those confederated with you.

You are American citizens – this country affords means of instruction to all: your appearance and your remarks have added evidence that you are more than ordinarily intelligent; that your education has enabled you to participate in the advantages of information open to all classes. The Court will believe that when you were young you looked with strong aversion on the course of life of the wicked. In early life, in boyhood, when you heard of the conduct of men, who engaged in robbery – nay more, when you heard of cold blooded murder – how you must have shrunk from the recital. Yet now, after having participated in the advantages of education, after having arrived at full maturity, you stand here as robbers and murderers.

It is a perilous employment of life that you have followed; in this way of life the most enormous crimes that man can commit, are MURDER AND PIRACY. With what detestation would you in early life have looked upon the man who would have raised his hand against his officer, or have committed piracy! yet now you both stand here murderers and pirates, tried and found guilty – you Wansley of the murder of your Captain, and you, Gibbs, of the murder of your Mate. The evidence has convicted you of rising in mutiny against the master of the vessel, for that alone, the law is DEATH! – of murder and robbery on the high seas, for that crime, the law adjudges DEATH – of destroying the vessel and embezzling the cargo, even for scuttling and burning the vessel alone the law is DEATH; yet of all these the evidence has convicted you, and it only remains now for the Court to pass the sentence of the law. It is, that you, Thomas J. Wansley and Charles Gibbs be taken hence to the place of confinement, there to remain in close custody, that thence you be taken to the place of execution, and on the 22d April next, between the hours of 10 and 4 o'clock, you be both publicly hanged by the neck until you are DEAD – and that your bodies be given to the College of Physicians and Surgeons for dissection.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

The Court added, that the only thing discretionary with it, was the time of execution; it might have ordered that you should instantly have been taken from the stand to the scaffold, but the sentence has been deferred to as distant a period as prudent – six weeks. But this time has not been granted for the purpose of giving you any hope for pardon or commutation of the sentence; – just as sure as you live till the twenty-second of April, as surely you will suffer death – therefore indulge not a hope that this sentence will be changed!

The Court then spoke of the terror in all men of death! – how they cling to life whether in youth, manhood or old age. What an awful thing it is to die! how in the perils of the sea, when rocks or storms threaten the loss of the vessel, and the lives of all on board, how the crew will labor, night and day, in the hope of escaping shipwreck and death! alluded to the tumult, bustle and confusion of battle – yet even there the hero clings to life. The Court adverted not only to the certainty of their coming doom on earth, but to THINK OF HEREAFTER – that they should seriously think and reflect of their FUTURE STATE! that they would be assisted in their devotions no doubt, by many pious men.

When the Court closed, Charles Gibbs asked, if during his imprisonment, his friends would be permitted to see him. The Court answered that that lay with the Marshal, who then said that no difficulty would exist on that score. The remarks of the Prisoners were delivered in a strong, full-toned and unwavering voice, and they both seemed perfectly resigned to the fate which inevitably awaited them. While Judge Betts was delivering his address to them, Wansley was deeply affected and shed tears – but Gibbs gazed with a steady and unwavering eye, and no sign betrayed the least emotion of his heart. After his condemnation, and during his confinement, his frame became somewhat enfeebled, his face paler, and his eyes more sunken; but the air of his bold, enterprising and desperate mind still remained. In his narrow cell, he seemed more like an object of pity than vengeance – was affable and communicative, and when he smiled, exhibited so mild and gentle a countenance, that no one would take him to be a villain. His conversation was concise and pertinent, and his style of illustration quite original.

Gibbs was married in Buenos Ayres, where he has a child now living. His wife is dead. By a singular concurrence of circumstances, the woman with whom he became acquainted in

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Liverpool, and who is said at that time to have borne a decent character, was lodged in the same prison with himself. During his confinement he wrote her two letters – one of them is subjoined, to gratify the perhaps innocent curiosity which is naturally felt to know the peculiarities of a man's mind and feelings under such circumstances, and not for the purpose of intimating a belief that he was truly penitent. The reader will be surprised with the apparent readiness with which he made quotations from Scripture.

"BELLEVUE PRISON, March 20, 1831.

"It is with regret that I take my pen in hand to address you with these few lines, under the great embarrassment of my feelings placed within these gloomy walls, my body bound with chains, and under the awful sentence of death! It is enough to throw the strongest mind into gloomy prospects! but I find that Jesus Christ is sufficient to give consolation to the most despairing soul. For he saith, that he that cometh to me I will in no ways cast out. But it is impossible to describe unto you the horror of my feelings. My breast is like the tempestuous ocean, raging in its own shame, harrowing up the bottom of my soul! But I look forward to that serene calm when I shall sleep with Kings and Counsellors of the earth. There the wicked cease from troubling, and there the weary are at rest! – There the prisoners rest together – they hear not the voice of the oppressor; and I trust that there my breast will not be ruffled by the storm of sin – for the thing which I greatly feared has come upon me. I was not in safety, neither had I rest; yet trouble came. It is the Lord, let him do what seemeth to him good. When I saw you in Liverpool, and a peaceful calm wafted across both our breasts, and justice no claim upon us, little did I think to meet you in the gloomy walls of a strong prison, and the arm of justice stretched out with the sword of law, awaiting the appointed period to execute the dreadful sentence. I have had a fair prospect in the world, at last it budded, and brought forth the gallows. I am shortly to mount that scaffold, and to bid adieu to this world, and all that was ever dear to my breast. But I trust when my body is mounted on the gallows high, the heavens above will smile and pity me. I hope that you will reflect on your past, and fly to that Jesus who stands with open arms to receive you. Your character is lost, it is true. When the wicked turneth from the wickedness that they have committed, they shall save their soul alive.

"Let us imagine for a moment that we see the souls standing before the awful tribunal, and we hear its dreadful sentence, depart ye cursed into everlasting fire. Imagine you hear the awful lamentations of a soul in hell. It would be enough to melt your heart, if it was as hard as adamant. You would fall upon your knees and plead for God's mercy, as a famished person would for food, or as a dying criminal would for a pardon. We soon, very soon, must go the way whence we shall ne'er return. Our names will be struck off the records of the living, and enrolled in the vast catalogues of the dead.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

But may it ne'er be numbered with the damned. — I hope it will please God to set you at your liberty, and that you may see the sins and follies of your life past. I shall now close my letter with a few words which I hope you will receive as from a dying man; and I hope that every important truth of this letter may sink deep in your heart, and be a lesson to you through life.

"Rising griefs distress my soul,
And tears on tears successive roll —
For many an evil voice is near,
To chide my woes and mock my fear —
And silent memory weeps alone,
O'er hours of peace and gladness known.

"I still remain your sincere friend, CHARLES GIBBS."

In another letter which the wretched Gibbs wrote after his condemnation to one who had been his early friend, he writes as follows: — "Alas! it is now, and not until now, that I have become sensible of my wicked life, from my childhood, and the enormity of the crime, for which I must shortly suffer an ignominious death! — I would to God that I never had been born, or that I had died in my infancy! — the hour of reflection has indeed come, but come too late to prevent justice from cutting me off — my mind recoils with horror at the thoughts of the unnatural deeds of which I have been guilty! — my repose rather prevents than affords me relief, as my mind, while I slumber, is constantly disturbed by frightful dreams of my approaching awful dissolution!"

On Friday, April twenty-second, Gibbs and Wansley paid the penalty of their crimes. Both prisoners arrived at the gallows about twelve o'clock, accompanied by the marshal, his aids, and some twenty or thirty United States' marines. Two clergymen attended them to the fatal spot, where everything being in readiness, and the ropes adjusted about their necks, the Throne of Mercy was fervently addressed in their behalf. Wansley then prayed earnestly himself, and afterwards joined in singing a hymn. These exercises concluded, Gibbs addressed the spectators nearly as follows:

MY DEAR FRIENDS,

My crimes have been heinous — and although I am now about to suffer for the murder of Mr. Roberts, I solemnly declare my innocence of the transaction. It is true, I stood by and saw the fatal deed done, and stretched not forth my arm to save him; the technicalities of the law believe me guilty of the charge — but in the presence of my God — before whom I shall be in a few minutes — I declare I did not murder him.

I have made a full and frank confession to Mr. Hopson, which probably most of my hearers present have already read; and should any of the friends of those whom I have been accessory to, or engaged in the murder of, be now present, before my Maker I beg their forgiveness — it is the only boon I ask — and as I hope for pardon through the blood of Christ, surely this request will not be withheld by man, to a worm like myself, standing as I do, on the very verge of eternity! Another moment, and I cease to exist – and could I find in my bosom room to imagine that the spectators now assembled had forgiven me, the scaffold would have no terrors, nor could the precept which my much respected friend, the marshal of the district, is about to execute. Let me then, in this public manner, return my sincere thanks to him, for his kind and gentlemanly deportment during my confinement. He was to me like a father, and his humanity to a dying man I hope will be duly appreciated by an enlightened community.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

My first crime was piracy, for which my life would pay for forfeit on conviction; no punishment could be inflicted on me further than that, and therefore I had nothing to fear but detection, for had my offences been millions of times more aggravated than they are now, death must have satisfied all.

Gibbs having concluded, Wansley began. He said he might be called a pirate, a robber, and a murderer, and he was all of these, but he hoped and trusted God would, through Christ, wash away his aggravated crimes and offences, and not cast him entirely out. His feelings, he said, were so overpowered that he hardly knew how to address those about him, but he frankly admitted the justness of the sentence, and concluded by declaring that he had no hope of pardon except through the atoning blood of his Redeemer, and wished that his sad fate might teach others to shun the broad road to ruin, and travel in that of virtue, which would lead to honor and happiness in this world, and an immortal crown of glory in that to come.

He then shook hands with Gibbs, the officers, and clergymen – their caps were drawn over their faces, a handkerchief dropped by Gibbs as a signal to the executioner caused the cord to be severed, and in an instant they were suspended in air. Wansley folded his hands before him, soon died with very trifling struggles. Gibbs died hard; before he was run up, and did not again remove them, but after being near two minutes suspended, he raised his right hand and partially removed his cap, and in the course of another minute, raised the same hand to his mouth. His dress was a blue round-about jacket and trousers, with a foul anchor in white on his right arm. Wansley wore a white frock coat, trimmed with black, with trousers of the same color. After the bodies had remained on the gallows the usual time, they were taken down and given to the surgeons for dissection. Gibbs was rather below the middle stature, thick set and powerful. The form of Wansley was a perfect model of manly beauty.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

 July 1, Friday: Pirates Joseph Gadett and Thomas Colinett were hanged in the rear of Boston's Leverett Street jail.

Robert Schumann, writing in his diary, for the 1st time mentioned his other alter-ego and twin to Florestan, Eusebius.

Jose Antonio de Oliveira Leite de Barros, conde de Basto replaced Nuno Caetano Alvares Pereira de Melo, duque de Cadaval as Prime Minister of Portugal.

Dr. Samuel Guthrie created chloroform in his private chemistry laboratory in Sackett's Harbor, New York. Within a year, this chemical would be developed independently by the Frenchman Eugene Soubeiran and the German Justus von Leibig. Although none of them would consider using it as an anesthetic, the ether of chloroform would eventually be widely used in that manner — though today it has been replaced by less toxic substances.

The Geburtstagkantate Eilt herbei, des Hauses Glieder for chorus and piano by Otto Nicolai to words possibly by Gneinzus, was performed for the initial time for the birthday of Frau Landrathin Wilhelmine von Munchhausen.

 August 1, Monday: The entire capitalization of New York's Mohawk and Hudson Rail-Road was paid.

Lewis Cass resigned as governor of the Michigan Territory in order to serve as Secretary of War under President Andrew Jackson. He would be a central figure of the Jackson administration's Indian removal policy.

Approximate date of Abraham Lincoln's arrival in New Salem, Illinois, where he would work as a clerk in Denton Offut's village store, sleeping in the back.

John Amy Bird Bell, 14 years of age, was hanged at half-past eleven o'clock for having offed Richard F. Taylor, 13 years of age, the son of a poor tallow-chandler, in a wood by the road, for the sake of nine shillings he was carrying (the equivalent of an unskilled laborer's weekly wage). At his sentencing, when the judge with the black cloth atop his judicial wig directed that his corpse was to be given over to the surgeons of Rochester for practice in dissection, this young culprit had exhibited some dismay.

On March 4th, the victim lad had been sent to Aylesford to collect his father's weekly parish allowance.

On May 11th, his body was found in a ditch and a white horn-handled knife led the authorities to a nearby poorhouse and the Bell family, a father with two sons. The younger of the two brothers, James Bell, required by the constable to search through the pockets of the clothes upon the decayed corpse, confessed that his older brother, John Bell, had waylaid the victim in the wood, and that meanwhile he had kept watch. He said he had received a shilling sixpence as his share of the nine shillings. The older brother then pointed out to the constable the pond at which he had washed the blood off his hands on his way home. He also pointed and said: "That's where I killed the poor boy," and added "He is better off than I am now: do not you think he is, sir?" (Thoreau would write, in "Civil Disobedience," "... If a man who has no property refuses but once to earn nine shillings for the State, he is put in prison for a period unlimited by any law that I know, and..." That would not have been a reference to this Newgate case since it is in a context of honest earning rather than in a context of dishonest theft, although it may have been a reference to the "Tolpuddle Martyrs" who had held out in 1834-1836 for a week's wage of ten shillings.)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

September 9, Friday: Several of Nat Turner's lieutenants –Sam Francis, Nelson Williams, Yellow Davy Walker, and Hark– were hanged.

Alexis de Tocqueville and Gustave de Beaumont arrived in Boston after traversing much of the western wilderness, and the Canadian Great Lakes region. In the bundle of mail waiting for them were letters describing the volatile political situation in France and news of the death of de Tocqueville's beloved Abbe Leseur. The pair learned that their 18-month assignment might be truncated. Nevertheless, they would remain in Boston for three weeks, initially residing at the Marlboro Hotel on Washington Street but later for greater luxury, moving over to the Tremont Hotel.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

 November 5, Saturday: The Liberator.

Guy Fawkes Day: mini effigies of Catholic bishops were burnt.

Alexis de Tocqueville and Gustave de Beaumont visited Charles Carroll.

To attest to the authenticity of some 20 pages of text written by Thomas R. Gray on the basis of discussions with Nat Turner (America's Guy Fawkes) in the jail of the town of Jerusalem in Southampton County VA, these pages were read aloud in open court "at a Court of Oyer and Terminer Summoned and held for the County of Southampton on Saturday the 5th day of November 1831 for the trial of Nat, alias Nat Turner, a negro man slave late the property of Peterson Moore, charged with conspiring to rebel and make innsurrection—" before the prisoner was sentenced by a panel of six white slaveholders to be hanged by the neck until dead:

The prisoner Nat, alias Nat Turner, was set to the Bar in custody of the Jailer of the County— and William C Parker is by the Court assigned Counsel for the Prisoner in his defence— and Merewether Brodnax Attorney for the Commonwealth filed an Information against the prisoner, who upon his arraignment pleaded not guilty.— The Court after hearing the testimony and from all the circumstances of the case are unanimously of opinion that the prisoner is guilty in manner and form as in the Information against him is alledged, and it being demanded of him if anything for himself he had or knew to say why the Court to Judgement and execution against him of and upon the premises should not procede. he said he had nothing but what he had before said— Therefore it is considered by the Court that he be taken hence to the Jail from whence he was taken therein, to remain until Friday the 11th day of November instant, on which day between the hours of ten oClock in the forenoon and four oClock in the afternoon he is to be taken by the Sheriff to the usual place of execution and then and there be hanged by the neck until he be dead— And the Court valued the said slave Nat to the sum of three hundred and seventy five dollars—

Teste James Rochelle Cl

Along the way they had some nice things to say about the "confessions" written down by Thomas R. Gray,

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

evidently to help this to sell well:

We the undersigned, members of the court convened at Jerusalem, on Saturday, the fifth day of Nov., 1831, for the trial of Nat, alias Nat Turner a negro slave, late the property of Putnam Moore, deceased, do hereby certify that the confessions of Nat, to Thomas R. Gray, was [sic] read to him in our presence, and that furthermore, when called upon by the presiding Magistrate of the Court, to state if he had anything to say, why sentence of death should not be passed upon him, replied he had nothing further than he had communicated to Mr. Gray. Given under our hands and seals at Jerusalem, this 5th day of November, 1831.

Jeremiah Cobb, [seal]
Thomas Pretlow, [seal]
James W. Parker, [seal]
Carr Bowers, [seal]
Samuel B. Hines, [seal]
Orris A. Browne, [seal]

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Whereupon Gray issued his text as a pamphlet under the title THE CONFESSIONS OF NAT TURNER (following pages).

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

The Confessions of Nat Turner

Agreeable to his own appointment, on the evening he was committed to prison, with permission of the Jailer, I visited NAT on Tuesday the 1st November, when, without being questioned at all, he commenced his narrative in the following words:—

Sir,— You have asked me to give a history of the motives which induced me to undertake the late insurrection, as you call it — To do so I must go back to the days of my infancy, and even before I was born. I was thirty-one years of age the 2d of October last, and born the property of Benj. Turner, of this county. In my childhood a circumstance occurred which made an indelible impression on my mind, and laid the ground work of that enthusiasm, which has terminated so fatally to many both white and black, and for which I am about to atone at the gallows. It is here necessary to relate this circumstance — trifling as it may seem, it was the commencement of that belief which has grown with time, and even now, sir, in this dungeon, helpless and forsaken as I am, I cannot divest myself of. Being at play with other children, when three or four years old, I was telling them something, which my mother overhearing, said it had happened before I was born — I stuck to my story, however, and related some things which went in her opinion to confirm it — others being called on were greatly astonished, knowing that these things had happened, and caused them to say in my hearing, I surely would be a prophet, as the Lord had shewn me things that had happened before my birth. And my father and mother strengthened me in this my first impression, saying in my presence, I was intended for some great purpose, which they had always thought from certain marks on my head and breast [a prael {parcel?? -AEM} of excrescences which I believe are not at all uncommon, particularly among negroes, as I have seen several with the same. In this case he has either cut them off, or they have nearly disappeared] My grand mother, who was very religious, and to whom I was much attached — my master, who belonged to the church, and other religious persons who visited the house, and whom I often saw at prayers, noticing the singularity of my manners, I suppose, and my uncommon intelligence for a child, remarked I had too much sense to be raised — and if I was, I would never be of any service to any one — as a slave — To a mind like mine, restless, inquisitive and observant of every thing that was passing, it is easy to suppose that religion was the subject to which it would be directed, and although this subject principally occupied my thoughts, there was nothing that I saw or heard of to which my attention was not directed — The manner in which I learned to read and write, not only had great influence on my own mind, as I acquired it with the most perfect ease, so much so, that I have no recollection whatever of learning the alphabet — but to the astonishment of the family, one day, when a book was shewn me to keep me from crying, I began spelling the names of different objects — this was a source of wonder to all in the neighborhood, particularly the blacks — and this learning was constantly improved at all opportunities — when I got large enough to go to work, while employed, I was reflecting on many things that would present themselves to my imagination, and whenever an opportunity occurred of looking at a book, when the school children were getting their lessons, I would find many things that the fertility of my own imagination had depicted to me before; all my time, not devoted to my master's service, was spent either in prayer, or in making experiments in casting different things in moulds made of earth, in attempting to make paper, gunpowder, and many other experiments, that although I could not perfect, yet convinced me of its practicability if I had the means.¹

I was not addicted to stealing in my youth, nor have ever been — Yet such was the confidence of the negroes in the neighborhood, even at this early period of my life, in my superior judgment, that they would often carry me with them when they were going on any roguery, to plan for them. Growing up among them, with this confidence in my superior judgment, and when this, in their opinions, was perfected by Divine inspiration, from the circumstances already alluded to in my infancy, and which belief was ever afterwards zealously inculcated by the austerity of my life and manners, which became the subject of remark by white and black. — Having soon discovered to be great, I must appear so, and therefore studiously avoided mixing in society, and wrapped myself in mystery, devoting my time to fasting and prayer. By this time, having arrived to man's estate, and hearing the Scriptures commented on at meetings, I was struck with that particular passage which says: "Seek ye the kingdom of Heaven and all things shall be added unto you." I reflected much on this passage, and prayed daily for light on this subject — As I was praying one day at my plough, the spirit spoke to me, saying "Seek ye the kingdom of Heaven and all things shall be added unto you."

1. When questioned as to the manner of manufacturing those different articles, he was found well informed.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

The Commonwealth, vs. Nat Turner.

Charged with making insurrection, and plotting to take away the lives of divers free white persons, &c. on the 22d of August, 1831.

The court composed of —, having met for the trial of Nat Turner, the prisoner was brought in and arraigned, and upon his arraignment pleaded Not guilty; saying to his counsel, that he did not feel so.

On the part of the Commonwealth, Levi Waller was introduced, who being sworn, deposed as follows: (agreeably to Nat's own Confession.) Col. Trezvant¹ was then introduced, who being sworn, numerated Nat's Confession to him, as follows: (His Confession as given to Mr. Gray.) The prisoner introduced no evidence, and the case was submitted without argument to the court, who having found him guilty, Jeremiah Cobb, Esq. Chairman, pronounced the sentence of the court, in the following words: "Nat Turner! Stand up.

Have you any thing to say why sentence of death should not be pronounced against you?"

Answer. I have not. I have made a full confession to Mr. Gray, and I have nothing more to say.

"Attend then to the sentence of the Court. You have been arraigned and tried before this court, and convicted of one of the highest crimes in our criminal code. You have been convicted of plotting in cold blood, the indiscriminate destruction of men, of helpless women, and of infant children. The evidence before us leaves not a shadow of doubt, but that your hands were often imbrued in the blood of the innocent; and your own confession tells us that they were stained with the blood of a master; in your own language, "too indulgent." Could I stop here, your crime would be sufficiently aggravated. But the original contriver of a plan, deep and deadly, one that never can be effected, you managed so far to put it into execution, as to deprive us of many of our most valuable citizens; and this was done when they were asleep, and defenceless; under circumstances shocking to humanity. And while upon this part of the subject, I cannot but call your attention to the poor misguided wretches who have gone before you. They are not few in number — they were your bosom associates; and the blood of all cries aloud, and calls upon you, as the author of their misfortune. Yes! You forced them unprepared, from Time to Eternity. Borne down by this load of guilt, your only justification is, that you were led away by fanaticism. If this be true, from my soul I pity you; and while you have my sympathies, I am, nevertheless called upon to pass the sentence of the court. The time between this and your execution, will necessarily be very short; and your only hope must be in another world. The judgment of the court is, that you be taken hence to the jail from whence you came, thence to the place of execution, and on Friday next, between the hours of 10 A.M. and 2 P.M. be hung by the neck until you are dead! dead! dead! and may the Lord have mercy upon your soul."

A list of persons murdered in the Insurrection, on the 21st and 22d of August, 1831.

Joseph Travers and wife and three children,
Mrs. Elizabeth Turner,
Hartwell Prebles,
Sarah Newsome,
Mrs. P. Reese and son William,
Trajan Doyle,
Henry Bryant and wife and child, and wife's mother,
Mrs. Catherine Whitehead, son Richard and four daughters and grandchild, Salathiel Francis,
Nathaniel Francis' overseer and two children,
John T. Barrow,
George Vaughan,
Mrs. Levi Waller and ten children,
William Williams, wife and two boys,
Mrs. Caswell Worrell and child,
Mrs. Rebecca Vaughan,
Ann Eliza Vaughan, and son Arthur,
Mrs. John K. Williams and child,
Mrs. Jacob Williams and three children, and Edwin Drury
— amounting to fifty-five.

1. The committing Magistrate.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Question — What do you mean by the Spirit.

Answer The Spirit that spoke to the prophets in former day — and I was greatly astonished, and for two years prayed continually, whenever my duty would permit — and then again I had the same revelation, which fully confirmed me in the impression that I was ordained for some great purpose in the hands of the Almighty. Several years rolled round, in which many events occurred to strengthen me in this my belief. At this time I reverted in my mind to the remarks made of me in my childhood, and the things that had been shewn me — and as it had been said of me in my childhood by those by whom I had been taught to pray, both white and black, and in whom I had the greatest confidence, that I had too much sense to be raised, and if I was I would never be of any use to any one as a slave. Now finding I had arrived to man's estate, and was a slave, and these revelations being made known to me, I began to direct my attention to this great object, to fulfil the purpose for which, by this time, I felt assured I was intended— Knowing the influence I had obtained over the minds of my fellow servants, (not by the means of conjuring and such like tricks — for to them I always spoke of such things with contempt) but by the communion of the Spirit whose revelations I often communicated to them, and they believed and said my wisdom came from God. I now began to prepare them for my purpose, by telling them something was about to happen that would terminate in fulfilling the great promise that had been made to me — About this time I was placed under an overseer, from whom I ran away — and after remaining in the woods thirty days, I returned, to the astonishment of the negroes on the plantation, who thought I had made my escape to some other part of the country, as my father had done before. But the reason of my return was, that the Spirit appeared to me and said I had my wishes directed to the things of this world, and not to the kingdom of Heaven, and that I should return to the service of my earthly master — “For he who knoweth his Master's will, and doeth it not, shall be beaten with many stripes, and thus have I chastened you.” And the negroes found fault, and murmured against me, saying that if they had my sense they would not serve any master in the world. And about this time I had a vision — and I saw white spirits and black spirits engaged in battle, and the sun was darkened — the thunder rolled in the Heavens, and blood flowed in streams — and I heard a voice saying, “Such is your luck, such you are called to see, and let it come rough or smooth, you must surely bear it.” I now withdrew myself as much as my situation would permit, from the intercourse of my fellow servants, for the avowed purpose of serving the Spirit more fully — and it appeared to me, and reminded me of the things it had already shown me, and that it would then reveal to me the knowledge of the elements, the revolution of the planets, the operation of tides, and changes of the seasons. After this revelation in the year 1825, and the knowledge of the elements being made known to me, I sought more than ever to obtain true holiness before the great day of judgment should appear, and then I began to receive the true knowledge of faith. And from the first steps of righteousness until the last, was I made perfect; and the Holy Ghost was with me, and said “Behold me as I stand in the Heavens” — and I looked and saw the forms of men in different attitude — and there were lights in the sky to which the children of darkness gave other names than what they really were — for they were the lights of the Saviour's hands, stretched forth from east to west, even as they were extended on the cross on Calvary for the redemption of sinners. And I wondered greatly at these miracles, and prayed to be informed of a certainty of the meaning thereof — and shortly afterwards, while labouring in the field, I discovered drops of blood on the corn, as though it were dew from heaven — and I communicated it to many, both white and black, in the neighbourhood — and I then found on the leaves in the woods hieroglyphic characters and numbers, with the forms of men in different attitudes, portrayed in blood, and representing the figures I had seen before in the heavens. — And now the Holy Ghost had revealed itself to me, and made plain the miracles it had shown me — For as the blood of Christ had been shed on this earth, and had ascended to heaven for the salvation of sinners, and was now returning to earth again in the form of dew — and as the leaves on the trees bore the impression of the figures I had seen in the heavens, it was plain to me that the Saviour was about to lay down the yoke he had borne for the sins of men, and the great day of judgement was at hand. — About this time, I told these things to a white man, (Etheldred T. Brantley) on whom it had a wonderful effect — and he ceased from his wickedness, and was attacked immediately with a cutaneous eruption, and blood oozed from the pores of his skin, and after praying and fasting nine days, he was healed, and the Spirit appeared to me again, and said, as the Saviour had been baptised, so should we be also — and when the white people would not let us be baptised by the church, we went down into the water together, in the sight of many who reviled us, and were baptised by the Spirit.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

After this I rejoiced greatly, and gave thanks to God. And on the 12th of May, 1828, I heard a loud noise in the heavens, and the Spirit instantly appeared to me and said the Serpent was loosened, and Christ had laid down the yoke he had borne for the sins of men, and that I should take it on and fight against the Serpent, for the time was fast approaching, when the first should be last and the last should be first.

Question. Do you not find yourself mistaken now?

Answer. Was not Christ crucified? And by signs in the heavens that it would make known to me when I should commence the great work — and until the first sign appeared, I should conceal it from the knowledge of men — And on the appearance of the sign, (the eclipse of the sun last February) I should arise and prepare myself, and slay my enemies with their own weapons. And immediately on the sign appearing in the heavens, the seal was removed from my lips, and I communicated the great work laid out for me to do, to four in whom I had the greatest confidence, (Henry, Hark, Nelson and Sam) — It was intended by us to have begun the work of death on the 4th of July last — Many were the plans formed and rejected by us, and it affected my mind to such a degree, that I fell sick, and the time passed without our coming to any determination how to commence — Still forming new schemes and rejecting them, when the sign appeared again, which determined me not to wait longer.

Since the commencement of 1830, I had been living with Mr. Joseph Travis, who was to me a kind master, and placed the greatest confidence in me; in fact, I had no cause to complain of his treatment to me. On Saturday evening, the 20th of August, it was agreed between Henry, Hark and myself, to prepare a dinner the next day for the men we expected, and then to concert a plan, as we had not yet determined on any. Hark on the following morning brought a pig, and Henry brandy, and being joined by Sam, Nelson, Will and Jack, they prepared in the woods a dinner, where, about three o'clock, I joined them.

Question. Why were you so backward in joining them?

Answer. The same reason that had caused me not to mix with them for years before.

I saluted them on coming up, and asked Will how came he there; he answered, his life was worth no more than others, and his liberty as dear to him. I asked him if he thought to obtain it? He said he would, or lose his life. This was enough to put him in full confidence. Jack, I knew, was only a tool in the hands of Hark, it was quickly agreed we should commence at home (Mr. J. Travis') on that night, and until we had armed and equipped ourselves, and gathered sufficient force, neither age nor sex was to be spared, (which was invariably adhered to.) We remained at the feast until about two hours in the night, when we went to the house and found Austin; they all went to the cider press and drank, except myself. On returning to the house, Hark went to the door with an axe, for the purpose of breaking it open, as we knew we were strong enough to murder the family, if they were awaked by the noise; but reflecting that it might create an alarm in the neighborhood, we determined to enter the house secretly, and murder them whilst sleeping.

Hark got a ladder and set it against the chimney, on which I ascended, and hoisting a window, entered and came down stairs, unbarred the door, and removed the guns from their places. It was then observed that I must spill the first blood. On which armed with a hatchet, and accompanied by Will, I entered my master's chamber; it being dark, I could not give a death blow, the hatchet glanced from his head, he sprang from the bed and called his wife, it was his last word. Will laid him dead, with a blow of his axe, and Mrs. Travis shared the same fate, as she lay in bed. The murder of this family five in number, was the work of a moment, not one of them awoke; there was a little infant sleeping in a cradle, that was forgotten, until we had left the house and gone some distance, when Henry and Will returned and killed it; we got here, four guns that would shoot, and several old muskets, with a pound or two of powder.

We remained some time at the barn, where we paraded; I formed them in a line as soldiers, and after carrying them through all the manoeuvres I was master of, marched them off to Mr. Salathiel Francis', about six hundred yards distant. Sam and Will went to the door and knocked. Mr. Francis asked who was there, Sam replied it was him, and he had a letter for him, on which he got up and came to the door; they immediately seized him, and dragging him out a little from the door, he was dispatched by repeated blows on the head; there was no other white person in the family.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

We started from there for Mrs. Reese's, maintaining the most perfect silence on our march, where finding the door unlocked, we entered, and murdered Mrs. Reese in her bed, while sleeping; her son awoke, but it was only to sleep the sleep of death, he had only time to say who is that, and he was no more. From Mrs. Reese's we went to Mrs. Turner's, a mile distant, which we reached about sunrise, on Monday morning. Henry, Austin, and Sam, went to the still, where, finding Mr. Peebles, Austin shot him, and the rest of us went to the house; as we approached, the family discovered us, and shut the door. Vain hope! Will, with one stroke of his axe, opened it, and we entered and found Mrs. Turner and Mrs. Newsome in the middle of a room almost frightened to death. Will immediately killed Mrs. Turner, with one blow of his axe. I took Mrs. Newsome by the hand, and with the sword I had when I was apprehended, I struck her several blows over the head, but not being able to kill her, as the sword was dull. Will turning around and discovering it, dispatched her also. A general destruction of property and search for money and ammunition, always succeeded the murders.

By this time my company amounted to fifteen, and nine men mounted, who started for Mrs. Whitehead's, (the other six were to go through a by way to Mr. Bryant's, and rejoin us at Mrs. White head's,) as we approached the house we discovered Mr. Richard Whitehead standing in the cotton patch, near the lane fence; we called him over into the lane, and Will, the executioner, was near at hand, with his fatal axe, to send him to an untimely grave. As we pushed on to the house, I discovered some one run round the garden, and thinking it was some of the white family, I pursued them, but finding it was a servant girl belonging to the house, I returned to commence the work of death, but they whom I left, had not been idle; all the family were already murdered, but Mrs. Whitehead and her daughter Margaret. As I came round to the door I saw Will pulling Mrs. Whitehead out of the house, and at the step he nearly severed her head from her body, with his broad axe. Miss Margaret, when I discovered her, had concealed herself in the corner, formed by the projection of the cellar cap from the house; on my approach she fled, but was soon overtaken, and after repeated blows with a sword, I killed her by a blow on the head, with a fence rail. By this time, the six who had gone by Mr. Bryant's, rejoined us, and informed me they had done the work of death assigned them.

We again divided, part going to Mr. Richard Porter's, and from thence to Nathaniel Francis', the others to Mr. Howell Harris', and Mr. T. Doyle's. On my reaching Mr. Porter's, he had escaped with his family. I understood there, that the alarm had already spread, and I immediately returned to bring up those sent to Mr. Doyle's, and Mr. Howell Harris'; the party I left going on to Mr. Francis', having told them I would join them in that neighborhood. I met these sent to Mr. Doyle's and Mr. Harris' returning, having met Mr. Doyle on the road and killed him; and learning from some who joined them, that Mr. Harris was from home, I immediately pursued the course taken by the party gone on before; but knowing they would complete the work of death and pillage, at Mr. Francis' before I could get there, I went to Mr. Peter Edwards', expecting to find them there, but they had been here also. I then went to Mr. John T. Barrow's, they had been here and murdered him. I pursued on their track to Capt. Newit Harris', where I found the greater part mounted, and ready to start; the men now amounting to about forty, shouted and hurraed as I rode up, some were in the yard, loading their guns, others drinking. They said Captain Harris and his family had escaped, the property in the house they destroyed, robbing him of money and other valuables. I ordered them to mount and march instantly, this was about nine or ten o'clock, Monday morning.

I proceeded to Mr. Levi Waller's, two or three miles distant. I took my station in the rear, and as it was my object to carry terror and devastation wherever we went, I placed fifteen or twenty of the best armed and most to be relied on, in front, who generally approached the houses as fast as their horses could run; this was for two purposes, to prevent their escape and strike terror to the inhabitants — on this account I never got to the houses, after leaving Mrs. Whitehead's until the murders were committed, except in one case. I sometimes got in sight in time to see the work of death completed, viewed the mangled bodies as they lay, in silent satisfaction, and immediately started in quest of other victims — Having murdered Mrs. Waller and ten children, we started for Mr. William Williams' — having killed him and two little boys that were there; while engaged in this, Mrs. Williams fled and got some distance from the house, but she was pursued, overtaken, and compelled to get up behind one of the company, who brought her back, and after showing her the mangled body of her lifeless husband, she was told to get down and lay by his side, where she was shot dead.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

I then started for Mr. Jacob Williams', where the family were murdered — Here we found a young man named Drury, who had come on business with Mr. Williams — he was pursued, overtaken and shot. Mrs. Vaughan's was the next place we visited — and after murdering the family here, I determined on starting for Jerusalem — Our number amounted now to fifty or sixty, all mounted and armed with guns, axes, swords and clubs— On reaching Mr. James W. Parker's gate, immediately on the road leading to Jerusalem, and about three miles distant, it was proposed to me to call there, but I objected, as I knew he was gone to Jerusalem, and my object was to reach there as soon as possible; but some of the men having relations at Mr. Parker's it was agreed that they might call and get his people. I remained at the gate on the road, with seven or eight; the others going across the field to the house, about half a mile off. After waiting some time for them, I became impatient, and started to the house for them, and on our return we were met by a party of white men, who had pursued our blood-stained track, and who had fired on those at the gate, and dispersed them, which I knew nothing of, not having been at that time rejoined by any of them — Immediately on discovering the whites, I ordered my men to halt and form, as they appeared to be alarmed — The white men eighteen in number, approached us in about one hundred yards, when one of them fired, (this was against the positive orders of Captain Alexander P. Peete, who commanded, and who had directed the men to reserve their fire until within thirty paces.) And I discovered about half of them retreating, I then ordered my men to fire and rush on them; the few remaining stood their ground until we approached within fifty yards, when they fired and retreated. We pursued and overtook some of them who we thought we left dead; (they were not killed) after pursuing them about two hundred yards, and rising a little hill, I discovered they were met by another party, and had halted, and were re-loading their guns, (this was a small party from Jerusalem who knew the negroes were in the field, and had just tied their horses to await their return to the road, knowing that Mr. Parker and family were in Jerusalem, but knew nothing of the party that had gone in with Captain Peete; on hearing the firing they immediately rushed to the spot and arrived just in time to arrest the progress of these barbarous villains, and save the lives of their friends and fellow citizens.) Thinking that those who retreated first, and the party who fired on us at fifty or sixty yards distant, had all only fallen back to meet others with ammunition. As I saw them re-loading their guns, and more coming up than I saw at first, and several of my bravest men being wounded, the others became panic struck and squandered over the field; the white men pursued and fired on us several times. Hark had his horse shot under him, and I caught another for him as it was running by me; five or six of my men were wounded, but none left on the field; finding myself defeated here I instantly determined to go through a private way, and cross the Nottoway river at the Cypress Bridge, three miles below Jerusalem, and attack that place in the rear, as I expected they would look for me on the other road, and I had a great desire to get there to procure arms and ammunition. After going a short distance in this private way, accompanied by about twenty men, I overtook two or three who told me the others were dispersed in every direction. After trying in vain to collect a sufficient force to proceed to Jerusalem, I determined to return, as I was sure they would make back to their old neighborhood, where they would rejoin me, make new recruits, and come down again.

On my way back, I called at Mrs. Thomas's, Mrs. Spencer's, and several other places, the white families having fled, we found no more victims to gratify our thirst for blood, we stopped at Majr. Ridley's quarter for the night, and being joined by four of his men, with the recruits made since my defeat, we mustered now about forty strong. After placing out sentinels, I laid down to sleep, but was quickly roused by a great racket; starting up, I found some mounted, and others in great confusion; one of the sentinels having given the alarm that we were about to be attacked, I ordered some to ride round and reconnoiter, and on their return the others being more alarmed, not knowing who they were, fled in different ways, so that I was reduced to about twenty again; with this I determined to attempt to recruit, and proceed on to rally in the neighborhood, I had left. Dr. Blunt's was the nearest house, which we reached just before day; on riding up the yard, Hark fired a gun. We expected Dr. Blunt and his family were at Maj. Ridley's, as I knew there was a company of men there; the gun was fired to ascertain if any of the family were at home; we were immediately fired upon and retreated leaving several of my men. I do not know what became of them, as I never saw them afterwards.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Pursuing our course back, and coming in sight of Captain Harris's, where we had been the day before, we discovered a party of white men at the house, on which all deserted me but two, (Jacob and Nat,) we concealed ourselves in the woods until near night, when I sent them in search of Henry, Sam, Nelson and Hark, and directed them to rally all they could, at the place we had had our dinner the Sunday before, where they would find me, and I accordingly returned there as soon as it was dark, and remained until Wednesday evening, when discovering white men riding around the place as though they were looking for some one, and none of my men joining me, I concluded Jacob and Nat had been taken, and compelled to betray me.

On this I gave up all hope for the present; and on Thursday night, after having supplied myself with provisions from Mr. Travis's, I scratched a hole under a pile of fence rails in a field, where I concealed myself for six weeks, never leaving my hiding place but for a few minutes in the dead of night to get water, which was very near; thinking by this time I could venture out, I began to go about in the night and eaves drop the houses in the neighborhood; pursuing this course for about a fortnight and gathering little or no intelligence, afraid of speaking to any human being, and returning every morning to my cave before the dawn of day. I know not how long I might have led this life, if accident had not betrayed me, a dog in the neighborhood passing by my hiding place one night while I was out, was attracted by some meat I had in my cave, and crawled in and stole it, and was coming out just as I returned. A few nights after, two negroes having started to go hunting with the same dog, and passed that way, the dog came again to the place, and having just gone out to walk about, discovered me and barked, on which thinking myself discovered, I spoke to them to beg concealment. On making myself known, they fled from me. Knowing then they would betray me, I immediately left my hiding place, and was pursued almost incessantly until I was taken a fortnight afterwards by Mr. Benjamin Phipps, in a little hole I had dug out with my sword, for the purpose of concealment, under the top of a fallen tree. On Mr. Phipps discovering the place of my concealment, he cocked his gun and aimed at me. I requested him not to shoot, and I would give up, upon which he demanded my sword. I delivered it to him, and he brought me to prison. During the time I was pursued, I had many hair breadth escapes, which your time will not permit you to relate. I am here loaded with chains, and willing to suffer the fate that awaits me.

I here proceeded to make some inquiries of him, after assuring him of the certain death that awaited him, and that concealment would only bring destruction on the innocent as well as guilty, of his own color, if he knew of any extensive or concerted plan. His answer was, I do not. When I questioned him as to the insurrection in North Carolina happening about the same time, he denied any knowledge of it; and when I looked him in the face as though I would search his inmost thoughts, he replied, "I see sir; you doubt my word; but can you not think the same ideas, and strange appearances about this time in the heavens might prompt others, as well as myself, to this undertaking." I now had much conversation with and asked him many questions, having forborne to do so previously, except in the cases noted in parentheses; but during his statement, I had, unnoticed by him, taken notes as to some particular circumstances, and having the advantage of his statement before me in writing, on the evening of the third day that I had been with him, I began a cross examination, and found his statement corroborated by every circumstance coming within my own knowledge, or the confessions of others whom had been either killed or executed, and whom he had not seen or had any knowledge since 22d of August last, he expressed himself fully satisfied as to the impracticability of his attempt. It has been said he was ignorant and cowardly, and that his object was to murder and rob for the purpose of obtaining money to make his escape. It is notorious, that he was never known to have a dollar in his life; to swear an oath, or drink a drop of spirits. As to his ignorance, he certainly never had the advantages of education, but he can read and write (it was taught him by his parents), and for natural intelligence and quickness of apprehension, is surpassed by few men I have ever seen. — As to his being a coward, his reason as given for not resisting Mr. Phipps, shews the decision of his character. When he saw Mr. Phipps present his gun, he said he knew it was impossible for him to escape, as the woods were full of men; he therefore thought it was better to surrender, and trust to fortune for his escape. He is a complete fanatic, or plays his part most admirably. On other subjects he possesses an uncommon share of intelligence, with a mind capable of attaining any thing; but warped and perverted by the influence of early impressions. He is below the ordinary stature, though strong and active, having the true negro face, every feature of which is strongly marked.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

I shall not attempt to describe the effect of his narrative, as told and commented on by himself, in the condemned hole of the prison. The calm, deliberate composure with which he spoke of his late deeds and intentions, the expression of his fiend-like face when excited by enthusiasm, still bearing the stains of the blood of helpless innocence about him; clothed with rags and covered with chains; yet daring to raise his manacled hands to heaven, with a spirit soaring above the attributes of man; I looked on him and my blood curdled in my veins.

I will not shock the feelings of humanity, nor wound afresh the bosoms of the disconsolate sufferers in this unparalleled and inhuman massacre, by detailing the deeds of their fiend-like barbarity. There were two or three who were in the power of these wretches, had they known it, and who escaped in the most providential manner. There were two whom they thought they had left dead on the field at Mr. Parker's, but who were only stunned by the blows of their guns, as they did not take time to reload when they charged on them. The escape of a little girl who went to school at Mr. Waller's, and where the children were collecting for that purpose, excited general sympathy. As their teacher had not arrived, they were at play in the yard, and seeing the negroes approach, she ran up on a dirt chimney (such as are common to log houses), and remained there unnoticed during the massacre of the eleven that were killed at this place. She remained on her hiding place till just before the arrival of a party, who were in pursuit of the murderers, when she came down and fled to a swamp, where, a mere child as she was, with the horrors of the late scene before her, she lay concealed until the next day, when seeing a party go up to the house, she came up, and on being asked how she escaped, replied with the utmost simplicity, "The Lord helped her." She was taken up behind a gentleman of the party, and returned to the arms of her weeping mother.

Miss Whitehead concealed herself between the bed and the mat that supported it, while they murdered her sister in the same room, without discovering her. She was afterwards carried off, and concealed for protection by a slave of the family, who gave evidence against several of them on their trial. Mrs. Nathaniel Francis, while concealed in a closet heard their blows, and the shrieks of the victims of these ruthless savages; they then entered the closet where she was concealed, and went out without discovering her. While in this hiding place, she heard two of her women in a quarrel about the division of her clothes. Mr. John T. Baron, discovering them approaching his house, told his wife to make her escape, and scorning to fly, fell fighting on his own threshold. After firing his rifle, he discharged his gun at them, and then broke it over the villain who first approached him, but he was overpowered and slain. His bravery, however, saved from the hands of these monsters, his lovely and amiable wife, who will long lament a husband as deserving of her love. As directed by him, she attempted to escape through the garden, when she was caught and held by one of her servant girls, but another coming to her rescue, she fled to the woods, and concealed herself. Few indeed, were those who escaped their work of death. But fortunate for society, the hand of retributive justice has overtaken them; and not one that was known to be concerned has escaped.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

November 11, Friday: In the state of Virginia America's Guy Fawkes, Nathaniel Turner, who had just had his 31st birthday, and three other leaders of the recent slave revolt, were hanged by the neck until they were dead. May God have mercy on their souls.³⁸⁰

Also hanged, over a period of several months, had been or would be:

- Daniel the property of one Richard Porter,
- Stephen and Curtis the property of one Thomas Ridley,
- Hark the property of the estate of Joseph Travis,
- Nelson the property of one Jacob Williams,
- Davy the property of one Levi Waller,
- Dred and Sam the property of one Nathaniel Francis,
- Davy the property of one Elizabeth Turner,
- Joe the property of one John C. Turner,
- Nat the property of the estate of Edwin Turner,
- Sam the property of one Peter Edwards,
- Jack the property of the estate of William Reese,
- Lucy the property of the estate of John T. Barrow,
- Moses the property of the estate of Thomas Barrow, and
- Ben and Nathan the property of the estate of Benjamin Blunt,

(and may God have mercy on their souls.)

“Transported”³⁸¹ were:

- Frank, the property of one Solomon Parker,
- Isaac, the property of one George H. Charleton of Greenville,
- Moses, the property of the estate of Joseph Travis,
- Jim and Isaac, the property of one Samuel Champion,
- Jack and Andrew, the property of one Caty Whitehead,
- Hardy and Isham, the property of one Benjamin Edwards, and
- Nathan, Tom, and Davy, the property of one Nathaniel Francis.

In about this time period, an English visitor named Robinson incautiously mentioned, in the course of a private conversation in Petersburg, Virginia, that his personal attitude was that black human beings, like other human beings, were entitled to freedom. He was taken outside town and stripped, and “scourged almost to death.” (But that wouldn’t be the end of the matter, wouldn’t be the end of it at all.)

W.E. Burghardt Du Bois has attributed the notorious Southern penchant for violence to hegemony:

The white people of the South are essentially a fine kindly breed.... Perhaps their early and fatal mistake was that they refused long before the Civil War to allow the South differences of opinion.... Men act as they do in the South, they murder, they lynch, they insult, because they listen to but one side of a question.

380. Refer to Thomas R. Gray’s, and/or William Styron’s, THE CONFESSIONS OF NAT TURNER.

381. That is, chained together into a “coffle” and sold down the river, which we may presume to mean what they knew it meant, death by hard labor under the lash.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

November 14, Monday: Francis G. Pratt was born to Mercy Snow Pratt and the Reverend Enoch Pratt (Francis would die during 1833).

Eliphalet Porter Capen was born in South Boston.

James Kirk Paulding's play THE LION OF THE WEST was staged at the Park Theater in New-York, in a version thoroughly revised by Concord's playwright John Augustus Stone.

Ignace Joseph Pleyel died in Paris at the age of 74.

Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel died in Berlin at the age of 61, of the cholera. Contrary to what might have been anticipated history did not come to an end (except, we notice, for him).

The Norfolk Herald in reporting the hanging of Nat Turner added that "General Nat" (the white master Nathaniel Turner) had sold Nat Turner's body for dissection "and spent the money on ginger cakes." That surgeons dissected the corpse seems clear, for this would have been according to usual practice. It is alleged, however, that prior to dissection, they had skinned it, and that after dissection, the flesh was rendered for its grease. Turner's "curious skull" was said by the white people to have "resembled the head of a sheep" and to have been "at least three quarters of an inch thick." The skeleton, presumably inclusive of the skull, was said to have become the property of a Doctor Massenberg.

THE MARKET FOR HUMAN BODY PARTS

HISTORY'S NOT MADE OF WOULD. WHEN THE HISTORIAN REVEALS, FOR INSTANCE, THAT EVENTUALLY A SOUTHAMPTON SOUVENIR COLLECTOR WOULD BE CLAIMING TO POSSESS A COIN PURSE MADE FROM THE SKIN OF TURNER'S SCROTUM, S/HE DISCLOSES THAT WHAT IS BEING CRAFTED IS NOT REALITY BUT PREDESTINARIANISM. THE RULE OF REALITY IS THAT THE FUTURE HASN'T EVER HAPPENED, YET, AND AT THIS POINT THE SCROTUM IN QUESTION IS SIMPLY A SCROTUM,

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

A PIECE OF RAW SKIN, NOTHING MORE.

December 4, Sunday: In Providence, Rhode Island, Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

*1st day 4th of 12 M 1831 / Our morning meeting was silent & to me almost no meeting at all - I could not get my mind so centered as to be able to experience any life. -
In the Afternoon Wm Almy attended & It did seem as if the life thro' him reached me. - It was an uncommonly favoured season, he was large & impressive in Testimony & powerful & prevalent in supplication & in a manner I have seldom heard him before - Yesterday Samuel Gummere our teacher for the new department of this School arrived. - Dr. Tobey brought him up on a visit to the School but carried him back to town where he spends this Day.-*

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

December 5, Monday: At the seating of the 22d Congress, the Democrats remained in control with 25 seats in the Senate, versus 21 National Republicans, and with 141 seats in the House of Representatives, versus 58 National Republicans.

In London, two men Bishop and Williams were hanged who had been convicted of having imitated the crime of William Burke of Edinburgh, by "burking" an Italian boy. They admitted having also murdered several other persons in this manner.

In Providence, Rhode Island, Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

2nd day 5 of 12 M / Today Saml Gummere came up & has entered as one of our family. - but the School will not be opened for some time as the room is not quite finished by the Carpenters & the Scholars are not yet engaged -

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1832

 In England, the government decided to forbid hanging, as a punishment for the theft of livestock.

FAMOUS LASTS
1826	name not on record	prisoner hanged for a single homicide in Boston
1832	a new law	hanging discontinued in England as a punishment for theft of livestock
1832	a new law	no more dissections of the hanged , in England in public
December 1, 1842	US Navy Midshipman, Philip Spencer	son of Secretary of War John C. Spencer, who had schemed with others to turn his ship to piracy, hanged for mutiny

It had been the practice in London, since 1752, the bodies of the hanged becoming the property of the Royal College of Surgeons, to conduct the dissections of the hanged in public. This year marked the last such dissection to be conducted in public.³⁸²

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1832

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
09/01	Eliza Ross	38	Newgate	Murder
26/03	Mary Kellaway		Exeter	Murder of child
26/03	Sarah Smith	28	Leicester	Murder
08/06	Margaret Gunning		Clonmel	Murder

382. The last such public dissection, that is, until the dissection of Peter Meiss by Dr. Gunther von Hagens during November 2002.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1833

August 12, Monday: Captain Henry Nicholas Nicholls, a fine-looking man 50 years of age who had served his country in the Peninsular war, who had been convicted at Croyden “on the clearest evidence ... of the capital offense of Sodomy,” the offense referred to commonly as “buggery” and often recorded in court documents as “b-gg-y,” had been “perfectly calm and unmoved throughout his trial, and even when the sentence of death was passed upon him.” In the interim not a single member of his respectable family had visited him in prison, and he was hanged on this morning at Horse Monger Lane Prison in London. The Courier would report:

Captain Henry Nicholas Nicholls, who was one of the unnatural gang to which the late Captain Beauclerk belonged, (and which latter gentleman put an end to his existence), was convicted on the clearest evidence at Croydon, on Saturday last, of the capital offence of Sodomy; the prisoner was perfectly calm and unmoved throughout the trial, and even when sentence of death was passed upon him. In performing the duty of passing sentence of death upon the prisoner, Mr. Justice Park told him that it would be inconsistent with that duty if he held out the slightest hope that the law would not be allowed to take its severest course. At 9 o'clock in the morning the sentence was carried into effect. The culprit, who was fifty years of age, was a fine looking man, and had served in the Peninsular war. He was connected with a highly respectable family; but, since his apprehension not a single member of it visited him.

One is reminded that while George Gordon, Lord Byron had been enjoying the lads of the Ottoman lands, a friend back home had commented “that what you get for £5 we must risque our necks for; and are content to risque them.” Later on in this year an anonymous poem DON LEON would appear, written by some person familiar with details of Lord Byron’s involvement with homosexuality. The poem is now conjectured to have been authored by William Bankes, an antiquarian and collector who had likewise been taken under arrest in this year after having been discovered in a sexual relation with a guardsman:

Though law cries “hold!” yet passion onward draws;
But nature gave us passions, man gave laws,
Whence spring these inclinations, rank and strong?
And harming no one, wherefore call them wrong?

This DON LEON would be the 1st homosexual liberationist text to appear in the English language, and no copies of it have been preserved in its 1st edition.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

 August 31, Saturday: The Liberator.

The vessel Amphitrite, transporting 103 female convicts and 12 children, was wrecked off Boulogne, France and all perished except for 3 of its 16 crewmen.

Charlotte Young \(Long\) was hanged at Gloucester for arson, the final English woman to be executed for a crime other than murder (arson was considered a very serious matter because it involved not only destruction of property but also an inherent risk to life, and even today carries the possibility of what we are terming a “life sentence”).

FINAL EXECUTIONS
December 31, 1829	Thomas Maynard	hanging at Newgate in England for forgery
August 31, 1833	Charlotte Young (Long)	hanged at Gloucester for arson, the final English woman executed for anything other than murder
November 27, 1835	James (or John) Pratt and John Smith	final hangings in England for a sexual crime termed “ sodomy ”

OTHER WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING THE YEAR

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
30/03	Mary Hunter	47	York Castle	Arson
19/08	Elizabeth Heaffy		Cork	Murder

 December 2, Monday: The pirate Henry Joseph was hanged in Boston’s Leverett Street jailyard.

César Franck began harmony lessons with Joseph Daussoigne at the Royal Conservatory of Liege.

 December 27, Friday: Charles Brown, a man of color, was hanged at Providence, Rhode Island.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1834

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1834

Date	Name	Place of execution	Crime
17/02	Maria Canning	Dublin	Murder
19/03	Mary Holden	Lancaster Castle	Murder of child
19/03	Mary Smith	Stafford	Murder

 At Harvard College, Professor Cornelius Conway Felton became Eliot Professor of Greek Literature and had David Henry Thoreau as one of his pupils. Professor Felton was positioning an essay in the North American Review in defense the teaching and study of classical mythology, especially Greek mythology, which evidently was considered in need of a defense as it seemed to be encouraging lewdness. For Professor Felton, expurgation of the classic texts to delete titillating stuff did not represent a problem of suppression and censorship, but rather represented the correction of a problem of debasement and inauthenticity, because it was inconceivable that there could have been any actual “food for the passions” in originary authentic works of classicism, or, at least, in works of Greek classicism.

To the scholar we would say, then, expurgate your Horaces and your Ovids, till not an obscene thought shall stain their pages; and you may be sure that nothing will be lost in your enquiries respecting the classic religion.

No, for if you credit Professor Felton’s reconstruction of European history, these dead white men could never have been guilty of worshipping at “altars of indecency and wantonness.”

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

WALDEN: There are nowadays professors of philosophy, but not philosophers. Yet it is admirable to profess because it was once admirable to live. To be a philosopher is not merely to have subtle thoughts, nor even to found a school, but so to love wisdom as to live according to its dictates, a life of simplicity, independence, magnanimity, and trust. It is to solve some of the problems of life, not only theoretically, but practically. The success of great scholars and thinkers is commonly a courtier-like success, not kingly, not manly. They make shift to live merely by conformity, practically as their fathers did, and are in no sense the progenitors of a nobler race of men. But why do men degenerate ever? What makes families run out? What is the nature of the luxury which enervates and destroys nations? Are we sure that there is none of it in our own lives? The philosopher is in advance of his age even in the outward form of his life. He is not fed, sheltered clothed, warmed, like his contemporaries. How can a man be a philosopher and not maintain his vital heat by better methods than other men?

PEOPLE OF
WALDEN

CORNELIUS CONWAY FELTON

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Hanging being a piece of public theater, however, it was sometimes required of a condemned man in this modern decent society that he attire himself in his shroud (a long white linen or cotton garment with open back and long sleeves) prior to the placement of the hood and the noose. Local taverns would sometimes hire “watchers” to keep around-the-clock guard upon a condemned man, not to prevent his escape of course but to ensure that he would not cheat them of their profits from the alcohol-imbibing throng of men come to witness a hanging. No way would such an important participant in an expected ceremony be allowed to off himself in private in advance. When a condemned man was reprieved at the last moment, as indeed sometimes happened, this might incite the disappointed throng to riot, for although we have few records for such items as the shroud and the death watch, we know that this sort of riot is actually what did result from a reprieve in Pembroke MA in this year.³⁸³

The lenience of Harvard President Reverend John T. Kirkland had been succeeded by the strictness of President Josiah Quincy, Sr., the former mayor who was attempting to deal with student rebellion as he had once dealt with mobs attempting to tear down Boston’s whorehouses: by repression. Students at Harvard were rioting over living conditions and the entire Sophomore class was being not merely expelled but hauled before a court.

383. In this year Pennsylvania became the first state to move executions away from the public eye and carry them out only within prison enclosures.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Records of faculty meetings from this period show that in the shifting minority of professors who opposed and attempted to moderate Quincy's crackdowns, Professor Charles Follen was alone in constancy of opposition.³⁸⁴ Freshman David Henry Thoreau evidently made himself scarce during the tearing of shutters off windows and the building of bonfires in front of doorways and his only contribution to the rebellion was a comment he appears to have made in Dr. Beck's examination room –apparently sarcastically– “Our offense was rank.”³⁸⁵

(shutters awaiting the arrival of students)

One midnight during the great Harvard Rebellion Ebenezer Rockwood Hoar lay on his back in the belfry of Harvard Hall and sawed off the tongue of the bell that summoned the students to morning chapel. Fortunately he was not caught destroying property, or perhaps later he would not have been able to become Attorney

384. Professor Karl Follen's brother Paul Follen was at this point emigrating to the United States, and would settle in Missouri. We'll allow you three guesses as to what is about to happen to Professor Follen himself.

385. At Harvard at this time, the offense of “grouping” in Harvard Yard, that is, students assembling for some purpose not condoned by the faculty (such as, for instance, free speech), was grounds for being asked to “take up one’s connexions,” that is, grounds for permanent expulsion from college. (Such rules are of course not limited to the Harvard of the 19th Century: my own memories are of smelling tear gas on the steps of Widener Library as I came away from my carrel and found out that there had been a “Pogo Riot” in which the police had rioted and cleared the intersection in front of the student bookstore of passersby in 1960-1961, and then of being vomit gassed by U.S. Marine guards on the street outside our embassy in Tehran, Iran in 1978 for the offense of attempting to obtain entry thereto as a US citizen in an Iran in which soldiers were authorized to kill anyone “assembling” in any public place in a group larger than two persons.)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

General of the United States of America:

Of his college life little remains to say. In his Junior and Senior years he attracted the attention of Edward Tyrrell Channing, then the valued Professor of Rhetoric and Oratory, and received the highest marks for English Composition. He also won the second Bowdoin prize for an essay, and at the Exhibition in his Senior year had, as his part, the English oration, taking as his subject "Reverence." His part at Commencement when he graduated was an English oration on "The Christian Philosophy; its Political Application." Only fifty-two of his class received degrees at Commencement [80 had entered this class of 1835, and Richard Henry Dana, Jr. had been forced to drop out on account of his eyes], largely a result of the "Rebellion," but five more were allowed their Bachelor's degree years later. Rockwood Hoar was third scholar. The refined and attractive Harrison Gray Otis Blake of Worcester, later Thoreau's near friend, was chosen Orator by a large majority, but his modesty made him decline, and Charles C. Shackford, later a minister, and a professor at Cornell University, was then chosen. Blake, however, gave the Latin Salutatory. Benjamin Davis Winslow was the Poet. Hoar was chosen a member of the Class Committee.

WORCESTER

It need only be added to this, that the student who was first scholar in the Harvard College class of 1835, a class that included Ebenezer Rockwood Hoar, and who was chosen to replace H.G.O. Blake, who was that class's fourth scholar, as the class Orator, Charles Chauncy Shackford, after graduation went out to Concord and became a schoolteacher and romanced the local lasses, before going on to study law, and becoming a minister in 1841, and eventually becoming a professor at Cornell University. At Cornell, he would be their professor of rhetoric and literature, and, incidentally, would make himself one of the pioneers in the field now known as Comparative Literature.

COMPARATIVE LITERATURE

August 1, Friday: Slavery already being illegal in England and William Wilberforce having emancipated the slaves of the English Antilles, at this point the British parliament emancipated the 800,000 black slaves of Canada and of the British West Indies. In the beginning of this long process of emancipation, those under 6 years of age were freed, and all others were bound there as "apprentice laborers" to continue to serve their former owners at specified wages for the term of 5 to 7 years (later this would be reduced to 2 years) to be followed by their emancipation, a phase to be completed on August 1, 1838,  under conditions of the Abolition Act of August 28, 1833.  As a condition of their cooperation the white "owners" of these black and red “slaves” were to receive some £20,000,000 in compensation.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

WALDEN: I sometimes wonder that we can be so frivolous, I may almost say, as to attend to the gross but somewhat foreign form of servitude called Negro Slavery, there are so many keen and subtle masters that enslave both north and south. It is hard to have a southern overseer; it is worse to have a northern one; but worst of all when you are the slave-driver of yourself. Talk of a divinity in man! Look at the teamster on the highway, wending to market by day or night; does any divinity stir within him? His highest duty to fodder and water his horses! What is his destiny to him compared with the shipping interests? Does not he drive for Squire Make-a-stir? How godlike, how immortal, is he? See how he cowers and sneaks, how vaguely all the day he fears, not being immortal nor divine, but the slave and prisoner of his own opinion of himself, a fame won by his own deeds. Public opinion is a weak tyrant compared with our own private opinion. What a man thinks of himself, that it is which determines, or rather indicates, his fate. Self-emancipation even in the West Indian provinces of the fancy and imagination, -what Wilberforce is there to bring that about?

PEOPLE O
WALDEN

WILLIAM WILBERFORCE
JOSEPH ADDISON
“CATO, A TRAGEDY”

35,000 slaves became free in South Africa and South Africa was on its march to becoming what it is now, a haven of sweetness and light (of course, this simplified account leaves out some of the intermediate stages in the South African progress).

With a large population of Quakers who were staunchly anti-slavery, New Bedford, Massachusetts had become a stop on the Underground Railroad, helping blacks flee the oppression of the American Southern states, so it had acquired a reputation as a safe haven. There would be a few from the West Indies who would make their way there. These West Indians who would settle in the local area of course would remember this

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Emancipation Day and make it an annual event. Something for everyone, even for the white people: on this momentous day, also, England forbade hanging as punishment for “returning too soon from transportation!”

ABOLITIONISM

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1835

➡ Coining had ceased to be a capital crime in 1832. Forgery (particularly of bank notes and coins) also had carried the death penalty up to 1834 as had “uttering,” which was the crime of passing forgeries — e.g. counterfeit coins, bad banknotes, or fraudulent cheques. In this year England forbade hanging also as punishment for housebreaking and “bodily harm dangerous to life with the intent to murder.” Beginning in the mid-1830s in Massachusetts, New York, and Pennsylvania, authorities were beginning to consider that the crowds attending public hangings were sharing in the brutality of the condemned. Sheriffs gradually were beginning to enhance their personal standing among the influential people of the community which they served, by carrying out executions within their prison courtyards where they could allow as spectators only the privileged few to whom they would be willing to grant passes.

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1835

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
30/03	Lucinder Sly		Carlow	Murder
06/04	Ursula Lofthouse	26	York Castle	Murder
15/04	Mary Ann Burden (Burdock)		Bristol	Murder
03/08	Elizabeth Banks (McNiel)	54	Edinburgh	Murder
10/08	Francis Billing	46	Norwich	Murder
10/08	Catherine Frarey	40	Norwich	Murder

➡ February: The Boston attorney David Lee Child sent his wife Lydia Maria Child to Washington DC, to appeal to Attorney General Benjamin Butler and then to President Andrew Jackson on behalf of a prisoner, for a stay of execution. (Since the Spaniards aboard the pirate vessel Panda would be hanged in Boston in June, and since the master of that vessel would be pardoned by the President, and since David was in fact the defense attorney on that case, may we presume that Maria’s visit asking for a stay of execution had to do with these pirates?)

➡ March 10, Tuesday: For their April meeting, “The Institute of 1770” debating society determined that they would debate the issue “Ought capital punishment to be abolished?” The assigned debaters were to include David Henry Thoreau:

A lecture on “Sleep.” Debated: “Are temperance Societies as now conducted likely to produce more evil than good?” Question for the next evening’s debate is “Ought capital punishment to be abolished?” Debaters: Thoreau, Thomas, Russell and Richardson.

➡ April 21, Tuesday: At the meeting of the “Institute of 1770” student debating society, Edward Pinckney Williams took the affirmative on the issue “Ought capital punishment to be abolished?” Presumably David Henry Thoreau, although a lifelong foe of capital punishment, supplied the negative. We do not know which side was voted to have won the debate.

Debate with E.P. Williams in the affirmative.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

For the May meeting, Thoreau and others were to debate on the issue “Whether the spread of the Catholic religion endangers the freedom of our institutions.”

THE TASK OF THE HISTORIAN IS TO CREATE HINDSIGHT WHILE
INTERCEPTING ANY ILLUSION OF FORESIGHT. NOTHING A HUMAN CAN SEE CAN EVER BE SEEN AS IF THROUGH THE EYE OF GOD.

IN A BOOK THAT IS SUPPOSED TO BE ABOUT HISTORY, ISSUED BY RANDOM HOUSE IN 2016, I FIND THE PHRASE “LOOKED UPON FROM THE BIRD’S-EYE VIEW OF HISTORY,” ONLY A MERE STORYTELLER,
NEVER A HISTORIAN, COULD HAVE PENNED SUCH A PHRASE —
BECAUSE NO BIRD HAS EVER FLOWN OVER HISTORY.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

 June 11, Thursday: Pedro Gilbert, Manuel Costello, Monelle Bogga, Jose Bassello De Costa, and Angeloa Garcia, Spanish pirates from aboard the Panda, were hanged in the rear of the Leverett Street jail of Boston. Although the Reverend Henry C. Wright had faithfully attended the trials in Boston of the accused dozen pirates, on the day of execution of the 6 who had committed murder he was so alienated by the jeering, drunken mob of spectators that he had to walk away before the hangings began.³⁸⁶

(One of the convicted men, Don Bernardo de Soto, a native of Corunna, Spain and the mate and owner of the pirate vessel Panda, had been pardoned by President Andrew Jackson after a personal appeal from his lovely young wife, Donna Petrona Pereyra de Soto, and on consideration of his having while previously the captain of the brig Leon rescued 70 individuals on board the American ship Minerva during a voyage from Philadelphia to Havana.)

386. Beginning at about this point, in Massachusetts, New York, and Pennsylvania, the authorities were becoming uncomfortable and embarrassed at the enthusiasm with which the crowds attending public hangings were greeting the public humiliation of the condemned. Sheriffs gradually would be beginning to enhance their personal standing among the influential members of the communities which they served, by carrying out such executions within prison courtyards to which they could admit as spectators only the privileged few to whom they might be willing to grant passes.

During this year, also, England was beginning to proscribe the use of hanging as a punishment for housebreaking, forgery, and "bodily harm dangerous to life with the intent to murder."

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Andrew Jackson, President of the United States of America, to all to whom these presents shall come,

Greeting:

Whereas, at the October Term, 1834, of the Circuit Court of the United States, Bernardo de Soto was convicted of Piracy, and sentenced to be hung on the 11th day of March last from which sentence a respite was granted him for three months, bearing date the third day of March, 1835, also a subsequent one, dated on the fifth day of June, 1835, for sixty days. And whereas the said Bernardo de Soto has been represented as a fit subject for executive clemency –

Now therefore, I, Andrew Jackson, President of the United States of America, in consideration of the premises, divers good and sufficient causes me thereto moving, have pardoned, and hereby do pardon the said Bernardo de Soto, from and after the 11th August next, and direct that he be then discharged from confinement. In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name, and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed to these presents.

Done at the City of Washington the sixth day of July, AD. 1835, and of the independence of the United States and sixtieth.

Andrew Jackson.

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

August 10, Monday: At Niblo's Garden in New-York Phineas Taylor Barnum started to exhibit blind and paralyzed black slave Joyce Heth under the pretense that it had been she who had nursed our illustrious founding father George Washington.

BOTANIZING

Dr. Reuben Crandall was arrested after Harry King, a Georgetown, Virginia man, called on him in his office while he was unpacking some crates and boxes of stuff. The young man sighted "a pamphlet on anti-slavery lying on the table." There were several such papers lying around, which the botanist had been using to press his plant specimens. He asked if he might have one to read, and "Dr. Crandall told him he might." For this, Dr. Crandall would be held in the local lockup for almost 9 months awaiting trial for his life for the treason of incitement to servile insurrection (the same statute, written by Thomas Jefferson, under which Captain John Brown would be tried and hanged) — and while living under these conditions he would acquire the

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

“consumption,” or pulmonary tuberculosis, that would destroy him.

Francis Scott Key, the District of Columbia's DA, would attempt to persuade the judge to impose the death penalty upon Prudence Crandall's younger brother.

Dr. Crandall had been charged with promulgating a false doctrine that the black American had equal rights with the white, with casting reflections on the chivalry of the south, and with intent to cause unrest among Negroes.³⁸⁷ It was suggested that he had himself authored publications urging immediate emancipation of

387. THE TRIAL OF REUBEN CRANDALL, M.D., CHARGED WITH PUBLISHING AND CIRCULATING SEDITIOUS AND INCENDIARY PAPERS, &C. IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, WITH THE INTENT OF EXCITING SERVILE INSURRECTION . . . BY A MEMBER OF THE BAR. Washington DC, Printed for the Proprietors, 1836. (This 48-page pamphlet alleged that “The Trial of Crandall presents the first case of a man charged with endeavoring to excite insurrection among slaves and the free colored population that was ever brought before a judicial tribunal.”)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

slaves. Clearly this Un-American agitator deserved to be dead. A crowd of white Navy Yard workers therefore went to the Washington County Jail where he was being held, to agitate for his lynching, and along the way a free black tavernkeeper, Beverly Snow, made some sort of derogatory remark about their wives. The crowd began by thoroughly trashing Snow's tavern, and then over two days and three nights of rioting, it smashed the windows of Negro churches, the Negro school, and various homes.

Drastic legislation would follow this "Snow Riot" in the District of Columbia — legislation further restricting the rights of free Negroes to assemble.³⁸⁸

As part of the legal process, Dr. Crandall would be interrogated about his attitudes toward people of other races. There was a concern that he might share to some degree in the radical attitudes of his notorious elder sister Prudence. He assured his captors that "he would break up the school if he could, but his sister was a very obstinate girl." He informed them that he had another sister, younger, who was sharing in his older sister's attitudes, but that he had been hoping "that he could, in all events, get her away" from this bad influence.

 November 27, Friday: David Henry Thoreau's Harvard College essay on assignment "The ways in which a man's style may be said to offend against simplicity."

The final hangings in England for a sexual crime termed "sodomy" were of James \(or John\) Pratt and John Smith, whose sexual activity had been observed by their landlord and his wife through the keyhole in the door to their room.

FINAL EXECUTIONS
August 31, 1833	Charlotte Young (Long)	hanged at Gloucester for arson, the final English woman executed for anything other than murder
November 27, 1835	James (or John) Pratt and John Smith	final hangings in England for a sexual crime termed " sodomy "
December 1, 1842	US Navy Midshipman, Philip Spencer	son of Secretary of War John C. Spencer, who had schemed with others to turn his ship to piracy, hanged for mutiny

388. Provine, Dorothy Sproles. THE FREE NEGRO IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA 1800-1860. Thesis Louisiana State University Department of History, 1959, 1963

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1836

 Pierre-François Lacenaire, having been found guilty of murder, was condemned to be executed by decapitation. He agreed to take part in an experiment having to do with the nature of human consciousness. If, at the guillotine, after the chopping, he was able to do so, he would close one eye while holding the other open. —Although the head was carefully watched during the decapitation, no such signal became evident. (Henry Thoreau would write, in his journal in 1853, of “he who said he might give a sign if he were conscious after his head was cut off — but he gave no sign.” Thoreau might, however, have been referring not to this case but to that of Lavoisier.)

HEADCHOPPING

March 12, Saturday: Some men endeavor to live a constrained life, to subject their whole lives to their wills, as he who said he would give a sign if he were conscious after his head was cut off, — but he gave no sign.

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1836

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
09/04	Harriet Tarver	21	Gloucester	Murder
09/04	Betty Rowland		Liverpool	Murder
14/04	Sofia Edney	23	Ilchester	Murder of husband

 February 16, Tuesday: Verdicts were handed down in the attempted assassination during the previous July of King Louis-Philippe of France (three of the defendants were sentenced to the guillotine and one to 20 years imprisonment, while a 5th was acquitted).

HEADCHOPPING

 March 16, Wednesday: Andrew S. Hallidie, who would eventually would be inventing the cable car, was born. (At the moment of course this must have been the further thing from his mind.)

The two men who had set fire to Mr. Hammond’s Irish tenement in South Street Place, resulting in deaths by burning, Simeon L. Crockett and Stephen Russel, were hanged in the Boston jailyard.

 June 25, Saturday: The Liberator.

Just at the gate of the Tuileries palace, disabled 25-year-old former infantry officer Louis Alibaud discharged his cane gun at a carriage carrying King Louis-Philippe of France (the bullet lodged deep in an oaken beam above the monarch’s head and the assailant was immediately taken into custody — it made sense to this disabled young anarchist that he had the same right to the French monarch’s life as Brutus had had to the life of Julius Caesar).

STATE MURDER

June 25, Saturday: The Liberator.

Just at the gate of the Tuileries palace, disabled 25-year-old former infantry officer Louis Alibaud discharged his cane gun at a carriage carrying King Louis-Philippe of France (the bullet lodged deep in an oaken beam above the monarch's head and the assailant was immediately taken into custody — it made sense to this disabled young anarchist that he had the same right to the French monarch's life as Brutus had had to the life of Julius Caesar).

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1837

Contracts were let for construction of the Genesee Valley Canal.

The Chenango Canal went into operation.

The Chemung Canal connecting Binghamton with the Erie Canal at Utica was completed.

3,955 boats arrived in the lake harbor at Buffalo, New York during this year and 4,755 boats went through the Erie Canal.

At Rochester, New York, a wall was built along the Genesee River through downtown. Construction began on a new Erie Canal aqueduct over the Genesee River. A public market building was erected on Market Street (formerly Mason Street), which was then renamed Front Street. Wealthy St. Louis fur trader Henry Shaw built a house for his parents. Mayor Jonathan Child began building a home on South Washington Street. Senator

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

Daniel Webster spoke in the Court House square. The city's first murder occurred. Louis Seyle's fire engine manufacturing company at Brown's Race was destroyed by fire. After his store burned, Austin Steward relocated to Canandaigua, New York to begin, assisted by his daughter, a school for colored children, and there he began work on his TWENTY TWO YEARS A SLAVE AND FORTY YEARS A FREEMAN; EMBRACING A CORRESPONDENCE OF SEVERAL YEARS, WHILE PRESIDENT OF WILBERFORCE COLONY, LONDON, CANADA WEST.

Revival meetings were held. A Rochester resident, Sam Scott, began to attempt a reprise of the jumping career of Sam Patch.

(This Rochester man's show-biz career would come to an abrupt completion in London: while attempting to

STATE MURDER

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

perform a public stunt with a rope he accidentally hanged himself.)

HANGING

Crimes Punishable by Death in England:

Year	Number
1800	150
1837	10

August 7, Monday: Mary Cooney was hanged for murder in Limerick, England. In this year, she was the sole Englishwoman to be executed.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1838

➡ In an attempt to salvage capital punishment, some states allowed the death penalty to be avoided at the discretion of the judge. (By 1963 –with the exception of a small number of rarely committed crimes in a few jurisdictions– the US’s mandatory capital punishment laws would be eliminated.)

➡ January: The Rhode Island General Assembly’s Committee to Revise the Penal Code considered a “Report of the Committee On the Abolishment of Capital Punishments” which recommended that the state abolish capital punishment.

➡ April 12, Thursday: In Vienna, Franz Liszt played some of his music, and that of Czerny, at the home of piano maker Conrad Graf. Friedrich Wieck was there with his daughter Clara Wieck but were impressed. Liszt wrote to Marie d’Agoult that “She is a very simple person, entirely preoccupied with her art, but nobly and without childishness. She was flabbergasted when she heard me. Her compositions are truly most remarkable, especially for a woman. They have a hundred times more invention and real feeling than all the past and present fantasies of Thalberg.”

Henry Thoreau was written to by Josiah Quincy, Sr., President of Harvard College, in Cambridge. Thoreau was applying for a teaching position in Alexandria, Virginia which he would not get.

Sir.

The school is at Alexandria the students are said to be young men

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

well advanced in y^e knowledge of y^e Latin & Greek Classics — the requisitions are qualification & a person, who has had experience in schoolkeeping—

Salary $600 a year besides washing & Board duties to be entered on y^e 5th or 7th. of May.

If you choose to apply I will write as soon as I am informed of it — State to me your experience in schoolkeeping

Ys

Josiah Quincy

Cambridge

12. April 1838.

With a significant percentage of Canada's leadership in prison and with prison ships rotting on mud flats visible from American soil, the British began to hang rebel leaders and bury their bodies in unmarked graves. The total would be 10 executions and 58 transportations before they succeeded in stabilizing the situation.

After they succeeded in stabilizing the situation by this small number of dramatic executions and transportations of key figures, of course, the mass exile of ordinary suspect citizens began.

Escapes From Canada

TV "Quebec"

Hung Up in a Port

Friend Stephen Wanton Gould wrote in his journal:

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

5th day 12 of 4 M / Ruth Davis & Abigail Davis with Zeno Kelley & wife on their way to Philada. Yearly Meeting were at our Meeting today, both had good & acceptable testimonies - A friend was also at Meeting from Indiana by the name of Aaron White, he is brother to Daniel Tisdales wife & a very good looking man - he & the young man with him called this Afternoon & made a pleasant visit to us - he gave me much interesting information of friends in Indiana. -
Thomas B Gould went in the Steam Boat this Afternoon for Philada. to attend the Yearly Meeting there. -

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

 May 11, Friday: The Liberator.

A man in a smoking-room in Boston asked Nathaniel Hawthorne about the Canadian Rebellion, and was informed that all is finished except the hanging of the prisoners. Then we talk over the matter, and I tell him the fates of the principal men -some banished to New-South Wales, one hanged, others in prison- others, conspicuous at first, now almost forgotten.

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1838

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
May 5	Ann Wycherly	28	Stafford	Murder
May 21	Elizabeth Nicholson (Jeffrey)	36	Glasgow	Murder

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

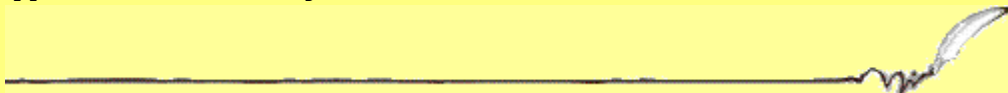

Waldo Emerson wrote in his journal:

Last night the moon rose behind four distinct pine-tree tops in the distant woods and the night at ten was so bright that I walked abroad. But the sublime light of night is unsatisfying, provoking; it astonishes but explains not. Its charm floats, dances, disappears, comes and goes, but palls in five minutes after you have left the house. Come out of your warm, angular house, resounding with few voices, into the chill, grand, instantaneous night, with such a Presence as a full moon in the clouds, and you are struck with poetic wonder. In the instant you leave far behind all human relations, wife, mother and child, and live only with the savages – water, air, light, carbon, lime, and granite. I think of Kuhleborn. I become a moist, cold element. "Nature grows over me." Frogs pipe; waters far off tinkle; dry leaves hiss; grass bends and rustles, and I have died out of the human world and come to feel a strange, cold, aqueous, terraqueous, aerial, ethereal sympathy and existence. I sow the sun and moon for seeds.

 September 13, Thursday-14, Friday: Waldo Emerson to his journal:

I went to New Bedford & Mr D. was in a frolicsome mood, & got up from supper in the evening, & said, "Come let us have some fun," & went about to tickle his wife & his sisters. I grew grave, &, do what I could, I felt that I looked like one appointed to be hanged.

HANGING
NEW BEDFORD MA

 December: During the last month of this year and the first month of the following year, the English would be hanging various Canadian rebels in London, in Kingston, and in Montréal.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Winter: Here is a view of the Cherokee “Trail of Tears” created by Robert Lindneux in 1942, in the Woolaroc Museum at Bartlesville, Oklahoma:

As an expression of US national government and state government racial policy, strolling Indians³⁸⁹ were herded by the US Cavalry under General Winfield Scott from their South Carolina and Georgia farms to what is now northeastern Oklahoma, so that white settlers could seize these farms. After a week of agonizing in his journal over whether it would be seemly for him, Waldo Emerson write a letter to the President, expressing himself as opposed to this policy. Of 18,000 Cherokees who began the enforced trek without provisions, 4,000 died of exposure and starvation along this trail. Others, attempting to hide out in caves in the mountains of their homeland, were hunted down. The disobedient were executed by firing squads under US Cavalry supervision, such execution squads being –as a matter of US strategy– made up exclusively of hired Cherokees. This was to become known as the Cherokee nation’s Trail of Tears. One of my great-great-great-grandfathers, Buff Sharpe, chucking this whole scene after his father had surrendered and had been executed by firing squad, relocated to the “Indian Territories” then being reconstituted in Indiana. At that time these territories were supposed to include only the part of Indiana below the “National Highway” that ran through Indianapolis and Terre Haute, because white intrusives had been playing a negotiation game of “half of yours for me and half for you” and then again “half of yours for me and half for you,” and all the northern half of the Indian Territories of Indiana had already been reclassified and white settlements there legitimated after the fact. Buff Sharpe sought, unsuccessfully, to legitimate himself by marrying, or cohabiting with, a white woman.³⁹⁰

TRAIL OF TEARS

389. Cf. Chapter I of WALDEN.

390. As an interesting little aside to our racist American culture, if you haven’t already realized this by reading the story I have told of the West Point graduate Captain Seth Eastman and his local or squaw wife Lucy “Stands Like a Spirit” Eastman at Fort Snelling and his local daughter Mary Nancy Eastman, it happens to be a real big deal whether it is a man of color marrying a white woman –which is terribly shameful for whites because this woman can only be some slut who has been forced to marry down due to unnatural sexual lusts or general unworthiness– or whether it is a white man consenting to shack up with a woman of color, which is not so terrible because whites can always regard this as an arrangement of convenience and its not so bad for a man to satisfy lusts as for a woman to have lusts (and he can walk away from his half-breed spawn later when he starts a “real” family). And thus it was that in my family a few years ago I caught my own sister, living near Washington DC, telling her children that one of our ancestors was an “Indian Princess”! She was really shaken up when I hollered at her for unconsciously rewriting our genealogy in her mind in such a manner as to make it more socially acceptable!

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1839

August 1, Thursday: Waldo Emerson reported that “Last night came to me a beautiful poem from Henry Thoreau, ‘Sympathy.’ The purest strain & the loftiest, I think, that has yet pealed from this unpoetic American forest.”

COMMENTARY:

[I am going to include several pages of commentary here, because the above was the poem that would become the controversial “To a Gentle Boy.”]

There’ve been Gay Pride parades in which posters of Henry Thoreau have been proudly carried. The evidence that he was gay was that he wrote a poem to one of his students, the little brother of the girl to whom he proposed marriage, and from the circumstance that after she turned him down he never did marry. Let us go into this in order to see that it is a simpleminded and as wrong as the idea of long standing, that Thoreau had no sense of humor. This is going to be a bit complicated, so pay attention. William Sewell [Willem Séwel Amsterdammer] published THE HISTORY OF THE RISE, INCREASE AND PROGRESS OF THE CHRISTIAN PEOPLE CALLED QUAKERS in English as a corrective to Gerard Croese’s HISTORY OF QUAKERISM. The records of the Salem library show that Nathaniel Hawthorne used their edition of this book for a week in 1828 and a month in 1829. The book recounted the activities of some of his ancestors, such as his great-great-great-grandfather William Hathorne (1607-1681) who sailed on the Arbella in 1630, settling in Dorchester in New England and then moving to Salem, who served at the rank of major in wars against the Americans, who became a magistrate and judge of the Puritans, and who had one Anne Coleman whipped out of the town of Salem for being a Quaker:

...naked from the waist upward, and bound to the tail of a cart, is dragged through the Main-street at the pace of a brisk walk, while the constable follows with a whip of knotted cords. A strong-armed fellow is that constable; and each time that he flourishes his lash in the air, you see a frown wrinkling and twisting his brow, and, at the same instant, a smile upon his lips. He loves his business, faithful officer that he is, and puts his soul into every stroke, zealous to fulfill the injunction of Major Hawthorne’s warrant, in the spirit and to the letter. There came down a stroke that has drawn blood! Ten such stripes are to be given in Salem, ten in Boston, and ten in Dedham; and, with those thirty stripes of blood upon her, she is to be driven into the forest.... Heaven grant that, as the rain of so many years has wept upon it, time after time, and washed it all away, so there may have been a dew of mercy, to cleanse this cruel blood-stain out of the record of the persecutor’s life!

And such as William’s son John Hathorne (1641-1717), a chip off the old block, a colonel in the Massachusetts militia and a deputy to the General Court in Boston who was a magistrate during the Salem witch episode which featured one person being tortured to death and 19 hanged. Hawthorne was much stimulated by the blood curse that Sarah Good had placed on her executioners, “God will give you Blood to drink.” His tale “The

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Gentle Boy” of 1831 made reference to this history.

Let us thank God for having given us such ancestors;
and let each successive generation thank him, not less fervently, for being one step further from them in the march of the ages.

This was Hawthorne in 1840, according to a portrait painter, Samuel Stillman Osgood:

“The Gentle Boy” was published anonymously in a gift annual of The Token magazine in 1831, and then republished under Hawthorne’s name as a part of TWICE-TOLD TALES in 1832 and 1837 after deletion of the detail that, in being attacked by a gang of vicious Puritan children, the gentle Quaker boy had been struck in “a tender part.” The book THE GENTLE BOY: A TWICE-TOLD TALE, when published in 1839, was dedicated to Sophia Amelia Peabody (to become Sophia Peabody Hawthorne), some of whose ancestors are also in Sewel’s history, and included a drawing by her. Printing was interrupted briefly to make the boy’s countenance more gentle in the engraved version of the drawing.

In 1842 Nathaniel and Sophia Peabody got married and moved to Concord, where Thoreau had just prepared for them a large garden. Although Hawthorne was vague on the spelling of Thoreau’s name, and his bride thought Thoreau repulsively ugly, Thoreau visited them several times in the Old Manse where Waldo Emerson had penned “Nature,” and for $7.⁰⁰ sold them the boat he and his brother had used on their famous trip – so that they could row out and pluck pond lilies. Although Thoreau read little fiction, he could not have been unaware of their newly republished “Gentle Boy” story, at least by its title.

With this background, we can now consider the gay speculation about the poem Thoreau wrote to his pupil Edmund Quincy Sewall, Jr., “Once there was a gentle boy.” Is this poem’s emphasis on the nonmasculine characteristics of a young boy to be interpreted as evidence of a homoerotic longing on Thoreau’s part, or, since the age of eleven is not the age of sexual maturity, interpreted as evidence of an incipient pederasty? No, because the poem’s use of “gentle boy” might well have been a deliberate tie-in to the Hawthorne story. We must ask, what might have been the motivation for calling this particular story to Edmund’s attention? There are several reasons having nothing to do with sexuality or with Thoreau’s personal needs. The nonviolent Quaker boy in the story is treated with utter viciousness by a gang of local Puritan children, and in particular by one boy whom he had nursed with kindness and attention during an illness. Was Edmund, a visitor in Concord, having trouble being accepted by some of the local children in Thoreau’s school? This historian William Sewell referred to by Hawthorne, was he one of Edmund’s ancestors?³⁹¹ Were some of the people described in that history Sewall ancestors, as some were Ha(w)thorne ancestors and some Peabody ancestors? If so, the Thoreau family would surely have been aware of it, since they had known intimately at least three generations of the Sewall family starting with Mrs. Joseph Ward, Cynthia Thoreau’s star boarder, the widow of a colonel in the American revolutionary army, the mother of Caroline Ward who in turn was the mother of Ellen Devereux Sewall and Edmund Quincy Sewall, Jr.

Hawthorne’s story is of a boy in an adoptive family, a “little quiet, lovely boy” who is heartsick for his parents.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

In the tale, in the face of the most extreme religious persecution of Friends by Puritans, the boy's birth mother had violated her "duties of the present life" by "fixing her attention wholly on" her future life: she left her child with this Puritan family to venture on a "mistaken errand" of "unbridled fanaticism." That is, after being whipped out of town by the Puritans, she followed a spirit leading to become a traveling Friend. At the end, the boy's mother returns to him.

Hawthorne's tale involves the hanging of an innocent person. Would this have been of interest to Edmund Quincy Sewall, Jr.? Yes, for a Sewall was involved in the hanging of the nineteen witches in Salem on September 22, 1692. This Samuel Sewall was a lifelong bigot (he once refused to sell a plot of land because the bidders wanted to build a church, and they were Protestants but not of his own denomination) but he was worse than a bigot: not only did he hang women for being in league with the devil, he helped condemn and hang one of his Harvard peers, the Reverend George Burrough –whom he had once heard preach on the Sermon on the Mount– for being in league with the devil. It was an interesting period, a period in which one could lose control of oneself and cry out during the Puritan service, and be suspected of having acquired a taint of Quakerism, and be placed in great personal danger. And that was an interesting day, August 16, 1692: an arresting officer for the court, one John Willard, was "cried out upon" for doubting the guilt of the accused, and was hanged beside the Reverend Burrough. We find this in Sewall's diary:

Mr. Burrough by his Speech, Prayer, protestation of his Innocence, did much move unthinking persons, which occasions their speaking hardly concerning his being executed.

A few years later, after some bad events in his family, Samuel suffered pangs of conscience: a public fast was declared for January 14, 1697 and he stood in Old South Church in Boston while the minister read a statement that the Sewall family had been cursed of God because of the trials, and that he took "the Blame and shame" upon himself. The twelve jurors were in attendance to acknowledge that they had "unwittingly and unwillingly" brought "upon ourselves and this people of the Lord the guilt of innocent blood."

This Puritan's son, the Reverend Joseph Sewall, was the father of Samuel Sewall, who was the father of Samuel Sewall, Jr., who was the father of the Reverend Edmund Quincy Sewall, Sr., who was of course Master Edmund Quincy Sewall, Jr.'s father. It is an interesting question, how a teacher can help a young man like this venture into his manhood, after the decency of manliness has been utterly destroyed as an option for him in such a manner, by the indecency of a male ancestor. I would suggest that teacher Thoreau's tactic – to emphasize to this lad Edmund the nominally feminine virtue of gentleness by providing him with a poem into which to grow – constitutes a legitimate and even profound maneuver on extremely difficult terrain. I would suggest, in addition, that those who seek to appropriate Thoreau by interpreting this "Once there was a gentle boy" poem as evidence of an unconscious erotic impulse are, in effect, debasing him. Debasing him not by accusing him of homosexuality – for it is not base to be gay – but by interpreting a complex and difficult situation in a manner that is merely simpleminded and doctrinaire. I want to emphasize the open-endedness of the questions involved: was Edmund, the new boy in town, having the sort of trouble with his peers that would have caused him to be in the situation of the gentle boy in the Hawthorne tale – ganged up against, beaten as a sissy? The American Antiquarian Society in Worcester has preserved pages of Edmund's Concord journal that may contain an answer. And what exactly was the perception of a blood guilt and an inherited shame

391. According to Patrick Hanks and Flavia Hodges's 1988 A DICTIONARY OF SURNAMES (Oxford UP), "Sewall" is a variant of "Sewell," which can be from the Old English "Sigeweald," meaning government by right of conquest, or "Sœweald" [œ with over it], meaning rule over the sea – an appropriate name for a family that included some wealthy shipbuilders in Maine! The same dictionary of surnames denies Thoreau's derivation of his name from Thor, the god of lightning, giving "Thoreau," "Thoret," "Thoré," and "Thorez" as variants of "Thorel," a nickname for a strong or violent individual (like Uncle "J.C." Charles Jones Dunbar!), from the Old French "t(h)or(el)" meaning bull. However, this dictionary allows that the name may also have originated in a diminutive of an aphetic short form of the given name "Maturin," or that it may be from a medieval given name which was an aphetic short form of various names such as "Victor" and "Salvador" ("Salvador" is equivalent to the Hebrew "Yehoshua"), or that it may be related to an Italian/Spanish nickname for a lusty person, or metonymic occupational name for a tender of bulls: "Toro!" (Now going to a bullfight in Spain and rooting for the bull, something I had the opportunity to do when I was a teenager, couldn't be the same for me.)

STATE MURDER

among the Sewels and Sewells and Seawells and Sewalls? We should be led by this story, not into considerations of eroticism among 19th-Century virgins (which would be a mere shallow –not demeaning, surely, but surely both appropriative and dismissive– sidetrack) but into a full consideration of how a compassionate and concerned teacher like Henry Thoreau can help a young male pupil grow to maturity even in a situation in which the option “manhood” has for this pupil been virtually eliminated – by the foul deed and foul mind of a Samuel Sewall, his blood ancestor.

We need to begin to take into account various of the cultural influences upon Thoreau which we have not previously been considering due to the fact that few people read the dead languages anymore. There's quite a body of ancient evidence to indicate that the poet Virgil may well have been by inclination a pederast, and the scholar S. Lilja confirms that Virgil's apparent sexual persona does inform a great deal of his poetry, including of course his AENEID. If one refers to John F. Makowski's "Nisus and Euryalus: a Platonic Relationship," in

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Classical Journal (1985) 1-15, and also to J. Griffin's LATIN POETS AND ROMAN LIFE, one finds that:

- In Virgil's autobiographical poetry of the Catalepton, poems 5 and 7, in which he sings of Sextus his cura curarum and of the boy aptly named Pothos, poems for the authenticity of which Buechler and Richmond indicate that there is now strong consensus, Thoreau could have read of a sexuality seems to have been grounded in life experience rather than merely to have been following in the literary convention we now term "posing as sodomites."
- In Donatus's life of Virgil, Thoreau could have read: "(sc. Vergilius) libidinis in pueros pronioris, quorum maxime dilexit Ceбетem et Alexandrum, quem secunda bucolicorum ecloga Alexim appellat, donatum sibi ab Asinio Pollione, utrumque non ineruditum, Ceбетem vero et poetam." Donatus goes on to say that Virgil, invited by a friend to partake of a heterosexual liaison, "verum pertinacissime recusasse."
- Apuleius Apologia 10 pretty much agrees with the picture presented to Thoreau by Donatus.
- By the time of Martial a joking tradition was in place that the Muse behind Virgil's prodigious poetic output was his Alexis, his love slave, given to him (note the divergence from Servius) by Maecenas rather than by Pollio. See epigrams 5.6, 6.68, 7.29, 8.56, 8.73 in which he attributes the sad state of contemporary poetry to the failure of patrons to provide poets with beautiful boys a la Maecenas and Virgil. This material was available to Thoreau.
- Juvenal echoes this tradition in Satire 7.69.
- In Philargyrius, Thoreau could have read: "Alexim dicunt Alexandrum, qui fuit servus Asinii Pollionis, quem Vergilius, rogatus ad prandium cum vidisset in ministerio omnium pulcherrimum, dilexit eumque dono accepit. Caesarem quidam acceperunt, formosum in operibus et gloria. alii puerum Caesaris, quem si laudasset, gratem rem Caesari fecisset. nam Vergilius dicitur in pueros habuisse amorem: nec enim turpiter eum diligebat. alii Corydona, Asinii Pollionis puerum adamatum a Vergilio ferunt, eumque a domino datum. ."
- What did Servius mean to say to Thoreau, and to us, when he offered that Virgil had not loved boys turpiter (disgracefully)? Possibly Servius meant that Virgil had been able to do so without loss of personal dignity (the courting of the beloved, whether woman or boy, could involve erotic service that was seen as beneath the dignity of a free man), the other that he did so without ever achieving, or perhaps even pursuing, physical consummation (which would have taken the form of sodomizing the lad if he was willing to submit, but Dover's GREEK HOMOSEXUALITY --which seems to be in large part valid for Roman society as well-- shows that nice boys were supposed to say no in thunder and that men who insisted upon using their penises might have to settle for intercrural satisfaction). We should probably take into account as well the poetry of a man who died in the same year as Virgil, Albius Tibullus, from whom Thoreau would quote (or would suppose he was quoting) in WALDEN. What is conventionally known as "Book 1" of Tibullus contains poems on his beloved Delia but also several on a beloved boy named Marathus (4, 8, 9); these can offer some insight into the process of courting a boy. Another possibility, of course, is simply that Virgil's love had nothing cruel or abusive about it, but perhaps the most plausible explanation for judging a liaison as turpis is the man's loss of dignity in becoming enslaved to the object of his desire, his loss of face. Two examples that come to mind from Virgil's own time are Anthony's passion for Cleopatra and Maecenas's scandalous affair with the ballet-dancer Bathyllus.

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Horsfall's COMPANION TO THE STUDY OF VIRGIL summarizes the "evidence" such as it is. Although he demonstrates that there is not one detail in the ancient LIVES OF VIRGIL that can be taken at face value, the persistent availability of such materials about the life of Virgil has been such as to make this a moot point. Whether true or false it has obviously had an influence, and may well have had an influence of some sort on Thoreau. Those scholars could all be found to have been mistaken, and yet we will still need to deal with the manner in which Virgil was being received during the first half of the 19th Century, and I am not certain that we have done that, and of course it is important, in dealing with a situation such as Thoreau's temporary involvement with the gentle young Sewall boy, that we most carefully do that. In none of these texts, nor in Servius, would Thoreau have been able to find any suggestion of a condemnation of what Virgil was projecting as being his proclivities.

DUNBAR FAMILY

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

William Sewell. THE HISTORY OF THE RISE, INCREASE AND PROGRESS, OF THE CHRISTIAN PEOPLE CALLED QUAKERS; WITH SEVERAL REMARKABLE OCCURRENCES INTERMIXED, WRITTEN ORIGINALLY IN LOW-DUTCH, AND ALSO TRANSLATED INTO ENGLISH, BY WILLIAM SEWEL. THE THIRD EDITION, CORRECTED. The title varies slightly from edition to edition (1722, 1725, 1728, 1774, 1776, 1811, 1844), for instance ...WITH SEVERAL REMARKABLE OCCURRENCES INTERMIXED, TO WHICH IS PREFIXED A BRIEF MEMOIR OF THE AUTHOR, COMPILED FROM VARIOUS SOURCES, and WRITTEN ORIGINALLY IN LOW DUTCH, AND TRANSLATED BY HIMSELF INTO ENGLISH, Baker & Crane, No. 158 Pearl-Street, New-York. The author's name was, according to Alexander Chalmers's GENERAL BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY of 1812-1817, Volume 27, page 361, a recognized variant of "Sewell": there was a Henry Sewall who spelled his name also as Sewell and Seawell, and there was a loyalist "Sewall" who changed the family name to "Sewell" in London in order to confuse the American authorities and better protect his children in America –and his American properties– after being proscribed. Among recorded immigrants, the "United States Index to Records of Aliens' Declarations" show a proportion of 1 Sewel, 11 Sewalls, and 30 Sewells. Henry Thoreau first encountered this book in this 1774 3d edition prepared and sold by Isaac Collins of Burlington, New-Jersey:

WM. SEWEL'S 3D ED., VOL. I

WM. SEWEL'S 3D ED., VOL. II

FIGURING OUT WHAT AMOUNTS TO A “HISTORICAL CONTEXT” IS WHAT THE CRAFT OF HISTORICIZING AMOUNTS TO, AND THIS NECESSITATES DISTINGUISHING BETWEEN THE SET OF EVENTS THAT MUST HAVE TAKEN PLACE BEFORE EVENT E COULD BECOME POSSIBLE, AND MOST CAREFULLY DISTINGUISHING THEM FROM ANOTHER SET OF EVENTS THAT COULD NOT POSSIBLY OCCUR UNTIL SUBSEQUENT TO EVENT E.

September 19, Thursday: The official “opening day” for the Albion Mines Railroad between Albion Coal Mines and New Glasgow, Nova Scotia (operations had begun during December 1838 using the Timothy Hackworth steam locomotives “Samson,” “Hercules,” and “John Buddle” imported from England).

The grand jury met in Hartford, Connecticut to deliberate upon The U.S. v. The Libelants, etc., of the Schooner Amistad. The crowds in the city had been swelled by the rumor that there was to be a mass hanging, and since, three of the black pirates having died after their capture, all of forty of them were still alive — such a mass hanging would definitely be something not to be missed.

LA AMISTAD

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1840

January 27, Monday: Charles Gounod arrived in Rome, for his Prix de Rome year.

January: No definition of poetry is adequate unless it be poetry itself. The most accurate analysis by the rarest wisdom is yet insufficient, and the poet will instantly prove it false by setting aside its requisitions.' It is indeed all that we do not know.

The poet does not need to see how meadows are something else than earth, grass, and water, but how, they are thus much. He does not need discover that potato blows are as beautiful as violets, as the farmer thinks, but only how good potato blows are.

The poem is drawn out from under the feet of the poet — his whole weight has rested on this ground. It has a logic more severe than the logician's.

HANGING

GALLOWS
HUMOR

You might as well think to go in pursuit of the rainbow, and embrace it on the next hill, as to embrace the whole of poetry even in thought. The best book is only an advertisement of it, such as is sometimes sewed in with its cover.

Its eccentric and unexplored orbit embraces the system.

January 27, Monday: What a tame life we are living! How little heroic it is! Let us devise never so perfect a system of living, and straightway the soul leaves it to shuffle along its own way alone. It is easy enough to establish a durable and harmonious routine; immediately all parts of nature consent to it. The sun-dial still points to the noon mark, and the sun rises and sets for it. The neighbors are never fatally obstinate when such a scheme is to be instituted; but forthwith all lend a hand, and ring the bell, and bring fuel and lights, and put by work and don their best garments, with an earnest conformity which matches the operations of nature. There is always a present and extant life which all combine to uphold, though its insufficiency is manifest enough. Still the sing-song goes on.

July 6, Monday: Charles Dickens attended the public hanging of Benjamin Courvoisier, a Swiss-born valet who had cut the throat of his master William Russell in Lord Russell's Mayfair home. This execution would be described by William Makepeace Thackeray in a Fraser's piece entitled, "Going to See a Man Hanged."

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1841

In England in this year, hanging was discontinued as a punishment for the abuse of children under 10 years of age.

During the previous two years no women or girls had been hanged in England. This was unprecedented. During this year, however, one Englishwoman would be hanged, Mary Ann McConkey, at Monaghan on May 1st, for the murder of her husband. Then, in the following year, there would again be no hangings of women in England.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1842

Visiting Harvard College and Boston town, Charles Dickens discovered this place to be chock full of sweetness and light:

There is no doubt that much of the intellectual refinement and superiority of Boston, is referable to the quiet influence of the University of Cambridge, which is within three or four miles of the city. The resident professors at that university are gentlemen of learning and varied attainments; and are, without one exception that I can call to mind, men who would shed a grace upon, and do honour to, any society in the civilised world. Many of the resident gentry in Boston and its neighbourhood, and I think I am not mistaken in adding, a large majority of those who are attached to the liberal professions there, have been educated at this same school. Whatever the defects of American universities may be, they disseminate no prejudices; rear no bigots; dig up the buried ashes of no old superstitions; never interpose between the people and their improvement; exclude no man because of his religious opinions; above all, in their whole course of study and instruction, recognise a world, and a broad one too, lying beyond the college walls.

It was a source of inexpressible pleasure to me to observe the almost imperceptible, but not less certain effect, wrought by this institution among the small community of Boston; and to note at every turn the humanising tastes and desires it has engendered; the affectionate friendships to which it has given rise; the amount of vanity and prejudice it has dispelled. The golden calf they worship at Boston is a pigmy compared with the giant effigies set up in other parts of that vast counting-house which lies beyond the Atlantic; and the almighty dollar sinks into something comparatively insignificant, amidst a whole Pantheon of better gods. Above all, I sincerely believe that the public institutions and charities of this capital of Massachusetts are as nearly perfect, as the most considerate wisdom, benevolence, and humanity, can make them. I never in my life was more affected by the contemplation of happiness, under circumstances of privation and bereavement, than in my visits to these establishments.

At Harvard, Doctor John White Webster was able to borrow $400 from his wealthy Boston friend Doctor George Parkman.³⁹²

WALDEN: [T]hat economy of living which is synonymous with philosophy is not even sincerely professed in our colleges.

392. Today's equivalent would be the price of, say, a new Toyota Avalon.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

January: During this month the printer Samuel Adams was murdered by John Caldwell Colt, sensationally involving the unwed mother of his child (in November this murderer would strike again, committing suicide by plunging a knife into his own heart in a cell of New-York's Tombs prison half an hour before being scheduled to be taken to his hanging). From Herman Melville's BARTLEBY THE SCRIVENER of 1853: "I was now in such a state of nervous resentment that I thought it but prudent to check myself at present from further demonstrations. Bartleby and I were alone. I remembered the tragedy of the unfortunate Adams and the still more unfortunate Colt in the solitary office of the latter; and how poor Colt, being dreadfully incensed by Adams, and imprudently permitting himself to get wildly excited, was at unawares hurled into his fatal act — an act which certainly no man could possibly deplore more than the actor himself. Often it had occurred to me in my ponderings upon the subject that had that altercation taken place in the public street, or at a private residence, it would not have terminated as it did. It was the circumstance of being alone in a solitary office, up stairs, of a building entirely unhallowed by humanizing domestic associations — an uncarpeted office, doubtless, of a dusty, haggard sort of appearance-this it must have been, which greatly helped to enhance the irritable desperation of the hapless Colt." (Melville would seem to refer to this also in the final scene of his PIERRE.)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

June 16, Thursday: At a Non-Resistance Meeting in Barnstable, Massachusetts, accompanied by William Lloyd Garrison, Frederick Douglass spoke.

The Natchez Free Trader gave an account of the execution on the 5th of that month of one Joseph, for murder.

The body was taken and chained to a tree immediately on the bank of the Mississippi, on what is called Union Point. The torches were lighted and placed in the pile. He watched unmoved the curling flame as it grew, until it began to entwine itself around and feed upon his body; then he sent forth cries of agony painful to the ear, begging some one to blow his brains out; at the same time surging with almost superhuman strength, until the staple with which the chain was fastened to the tree, not being well secured, drew out, and he leaped from the burning pile. At that moment the sharp ring of several rifles was heard, and the body of the negro fell a corpse to the ground. He was picked up by two or three, and again thrown into the fire and consumed.

RACE SLAVERY

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

In roughly this same timeframe the following reports and comments were also being made:

ANOTHER NEGRO BURNED. — We learn from the clerk of the Highlander, that, while wooding a short distance below the mouth of Red river, they were invited to stop a short time and see another negro burned.

— New Orleans Bulletin

We can assure the Bostonians, one and all, who have embarked in the nefarious scheme of abolishing slavery at the south, that lashes will hereafter be spared the backs of their emissaries. Let them send out their men to Louisiana; they will never return to tell their sufferings, but they shall expiate the crime of interfering in our domestic institutions by being BURNED AT THE STAKE.

— New Orleans True American

The cry of the whole south should be death, instant death, to the abolitionist, wherever he is caught.

— Augusta GA Chronicle

Let us declare through the public journals of our country, that the question of slavery is not and shall not be open for discussion: that the system is too deep-rooted among us, and must remain forever; that the very moment any private individual attempts to lecture us upon its evils and immorality, and the necessity of putting means in operation to secure us from them, in the same moment his tongue shall be cut out and cast upon the dunghill.

— Columbia SC Telescope

From the St. Louis Republican.

On Friday last the coroner held an inquest at the house of Judge Dunica, a few miles south of the city, over the body of a negro girl, about 8 years of age, belonging to Mr. Cordell. The body exhibited evidence of the most cruel whipping and beating we have ever heard of. The flesh on the back and limbs was beaten to a jelly — one shoulder-bone was laid bare — there were several cuts, apparently from a club, on the head — and around the neck was the indentation of a cord, by which it is supposed she had been confined to a tree. She had been hired by a man by the name of Tanner, residing in the neighborhood, and was sent home in this condition. After coming home, her constant request, until her death, was for bread, by which it would seem that she had been starved as well as unmercifully whipped. The jury returned a verdict that she came to her death by the blows inflicted by some persons unknown whilst she was in the employ of Mr. Tanner. Mrs. Tanner has been tried and acquitted.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

End of the year: William Wells Brown would report that “In the year 1842, I conveyed, from the first of May to the first of December, sixty-nine fugitives over Lake Erie to Canada.”

Aboard the USS Somers, for 6 months of a training cruise, its captain, Alexander Slidell, had been having its crew, largely composed of teenage boys undergoing naval indoctrination, lashed for various minor infractions with the cat-o-nine-tails. According to the record, a total of 2,265 lashes had been administered. Enough being enough, in this month an 18-year-old named Philip Spence, who perhaps supposed he could get away with it by being the scion of the US Secretary of War, made some comments to another sailor which were considered to be mutinous remarks. Whereupon the captain had him and two others hoisted by nooses into the rigging, to swing and strangle. This was the US Navy’s “first mutiny,” and would result in the formation of the U.S. Naval Academy.³⁹³

FINAL EXECUTIONS
November 27, 1835	James (or John) Pratt and John Smith	final hangings in England for a sexual crime termed “ sodomy ”
December 1, 1842	US Navy Midshipman, Philip Spencer	son of Secretary of War John C. Spencer, who had schemed with others to turn his ship to piracy, among others, was strangled for mutiny
February 14, 1844	John Gordon	hanged for murder of factory owner Amasa Sprague probably only because he was an Irish Catholic immigrant, in Rhode Island (no more such events would occur)

There would be a sensational trial, the “Somers” trial, at which a cousin of Herman Melville named Guert Gansevoort would be the presiding judge. In result, 3 navies would be sent to the yardarm to hang for mutiny. The trial and the punishment evidently would have a deep impact on the scribbling cousin and would influence his BILLY BUDD of the 1886-1891 period.

BILLY BUDD: ... that harassed frame of mind which in the year 1842 actuated the Commander of the U.S. brig-of-war Somers to resolve, under the so-called Articles of War, Articles modelled upon the English Mutiny Act, to resolve upon the execution at sea of a midshipman and two petty-officers as mutineers designing the seizure of the brig. Which resolution was carried out though in a time of peace and within not many days’ sail of home. An act vindicated by a naval court of inquiry subsequently convened ashore. History, and here cited without comment.

393. Take a look at the 55-minute documentary film “The Curse of the ‘Somers’” by George Belcher.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

December 9, Friday: The Liberator.

From an article by Nathaniel Peabody Rogers on the Hutchinson Family Singers, in the anti-slavery paper Herald of Freedom:

Oh! this Music is one of God's dearest gifts. I do wish men would make more of it. How humanizing it is -and how purifying -elevating and ennobling to the spirit! And how it has been prostituted and perverted! That accursed drum and fife, - how they have maddened mankind! And the deep bass boom of the cannon, chiming in, in the chorus of the battle -that trumpet, and wild, charging bugle, -how they set the military devil into a man, and make him into a soldier! Think of the Human Family, falling upon one another, at the inspiration of Music! How must God feel at it! To see those harp strings, He meant should be waked to a love bordering on divine, strung and swept to mortal hate and butchery. And the perversion is scarcely less, when music is profaned to the superstitious service of Sect, -its bloody-minded worship -its mercenary and bigot offerings. How horribly it echoes from the heartless and priest-led Meeting-House!

But it will all come right, by and bye. The world is out of tune now. But it will be tuned again, and all discord become harmony. When Slavery and War are abolished, and hanging and imprisoning, and all hatred and distrust - when the strife of humanity shall be, who will love most and help the readiest, when the tyrant steeple shall no longer tower, in sky-aspiring contempt of humanity's cowering dwellings about its base, when pulpits and priests and hangmen and generals - gibbets and jails, shall have vanished from the surface of the delivered earth, then shall be heard music here, where they used to stand. The hills shall then break forth into singing, and all the trees of the field clap their hands.

Henry Thoreau was written to by James Richardson, Jr. in Harvard Divinity School in Cambridge.

Friend Thoreau

I have been desirous of sending to some of my mystic brethren—some selections from certain writings of mine, that wrote themselves, when “I was in the spirit on the Lord’s Day”. Some of these are so utterly and entirely out of all my rational faculties, that I can’t put any meaning in them; others I read over, and learn a great deal from. This, I send you, seems to be a sort of Allegory— When you return it, will you be so kind as to tell me all that it means, as there are some parts of it I do not fully understand myself— I have a grateful remembrance of the moments I saw you in. Mr Emerson too I have less awe of, and more love for, than formerly His presence has always to me something infinite as well as divine about it. Mrs Emerson I am very desirous of knowing. Your family give my love to—

James Richardson jr December 9 D^y College Cam.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1843

Nicolas Roch, grandson of Antoine Roch, replaced François Desmores as beheader at Lons-le-Saulnier.

HEADCHOPPING

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1843

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
06/05	Betty Eccles	38	Liverpool	Murder of stepson (hanged alongside Wilmot Buckley)
05/08	Sarah Dazeley	24	Bedford	Murder of husband

December 31, Sunday: Many of the devotees of the Reverend William Miller expected Jesus to return at the end of 1843 (Festinger, Leon et al. WHEN PROPHECY FAILS. Minneapolis MN: U of Minnesota P, 1956, page 16).

MILLENNIALISM

The wealthiest citizen of Cranston, Rhode Island, Amasa Sprague of the A&W Sprague textile empire, was murdered. Refer to Charles and Tess Hoffmann's BROTHERLY LOVE: MURDER AND THE POLITICS OF PREJUDICE IN NINETEENTH-CENTURY RHODE ISLAND (Amherst MA: U of Massachusetts P, 1993).

You can read this book online at <http://www.questia.com/library/book/brotherly-love-murder-and-the-politics-of-prejudice-in-nineteenth-century-rhode-island-by-charles-tess-hoffmann.jsp>.

Brothers who had emigrated there from Ireland, Nicholas, John, and William Gordon, would be charged with this murder, although there was precious little evidence against them other than the fact that they were Catholics. Of the 3, Nicholas and William had the most airtight alibis, whereas John would be unable to produce evidence as to his whereabouts on the afternoon in question. It would be John Gordon, therefore, who would hang for the crime, on February 14th, 1844. The authors of this study attempt to make a case that the actual murderer was Mr. Sprague’s brother and business partner, William Sprague II, who had served as the governor of the state, and was currently one of its US senators, although actually there is less evidence against Senator Sprague than there is against one “Big Peter,” a mill laborer who had disappeared from the vicinity shortly after the afternoon of the crime.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

At the trial the judge ruled that the testimony of recent immigrants from Ireland was inherently of less credibility than the testimony of native-born American citizens. Later there would be sufficient doubt, that this conviction and hanging had been anything more than a rush to judgment, that this would be the last hanging permitted to take place on the soil of Rhode Island.

FAMOUS LASTS
December 1, 1842	US Navy Midshipman, Philip Spencer	son of Secretary of War John C. Spencer, who had schemed with others to turn his ship to piracy, hanged for mutiny
February 14, 1844	John Gordon	hanged for murder of factory owner Amasa Sprague probably only because he was an Irish Catholic immigrant, in Rhode Island (no more such events would occur)
June 3, 1844	Great Auk Pinguinus impennis	last breeding pair , on Eldey Island off Iceland

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1844

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1844

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
13/01	Sarah Westwood	42	Stafford	Murder of husband
02/08	Eliza Joyce	31	Lincoln Castle	Murder of child
07/08	Catherine Bryan		Rosscommon	Murder of husband
07/08	Bridget Lanigan		Rosscommon	Murder
28/12	Mary Galop	30	Chester	Murder of father

January: The Rhode Island General Assembly abolished capital punishment for all crimes other than murder and arson.

February 14, Wednesday: In Providence, John Gordon was hanged for the unexplained murder of Amasa Sprague. Because it was so entirely doubtful that John was guilty of anything at all (other than being a Catholic, and a recent immigrant from impoverished Ireland), this would become hopefully the very last hanging ever to take place above the soil of Rhode Island.

FINAL EXECUTIONS
December 1, 1842	US Navy Midshipman, Philip Spencer	son of Secretary of War John C. Spencer, who had schemed with others to turn his ship to piracy, among others, was strangled for mutiny
February 14, 1844	John Gordon	hanged for murder of factory owner Amasa Sprague probably only because he was an Irish Catholic immigrant, in Rhode Island (no more such events would occur)
August 30, 1850	John White Webster	last Harvard College professor to be hanged by the neck in Boston

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

March 17, Sunday: Frederick Douglass was lecturing in Neponset Village, Massachusetts.

At Boston's Amory Hall in the morning, Charles A. Dana lectured on "Association," then in the afternoon there was an open discussion on the topic "Ought capital punishment to be abolished?," and in the evening Dr. Joseph Rhodes Buchanan (1814-1899) lectured on "The Pursuit of Truth."

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1845

A ruffian named Ingood who specialized in rolling drunken sailors attained the distinction of being the 1st white man to be hanged in Hong Kong.

CHINA

London Yearly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends had a leading in regard to capital punishment:

This punishment fails to produce the effect of deterring others....
[I]t is even the means of hardening in sin many who witness public executions.

Meanwhile, the person being awarded the distinction of being the last to hang in Rhode Island was an Irish Catholic immigrant named John Gordon. Many believed at that time that this 20-year-old was simply a victim of local prejudice against the Irish — and the consensus now seems to be that indeed he was most likely innocent of the crime for which he was being hanged. (But who knows, maybe he had something else reprehensible on his conscience and was able to muse on that error as they placed the hood over his head — there's precious few of us who aren't guilty of something!)

COLDBLOODED MURDER

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1845

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
11/01	Mary Sheming	51	Bury St Edmunds	Murder of son
23/04	Sarah Freeman	28	Taunton	Murder of brother

March 12, Wednesday: The governor of Massachusetts commuted the sentence of execution by hanging of one Peter York, or having killed one James Norton on Richmond Street in Boston, to a sentence of life in prison.

Henry Thoreau wrote to The Liberator:

The Liberator
1845.

Concord, Mass. March 12,

Mr. Editor: — We have now, for the third winter, had our spirits refreshed, and our faith in the destiny of the commonwealth strengthened, by the presence and the eloquence of Wendell Phillips; and we wish to tender to him our thanks and our sympathy. The admission of this gentleman into the Lyceum has been strenuously opposed by a respectable portion of our fellow citizens, who themselves, we trust, whose descendants, at least, we know, will be as faithful conservers of the true order, whenever that shall be the order of the day, — and in each instance, the people have voted that they would hear him, by coming themselves and bringing their friends to the lecture room, and being very silent that they might hear. We saw some men and women, who had long ago come out, going in once more through the free and hospitable portals of the Lyceum; and many of our neighbors confessed, that they had had a “sound season” this once.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

It was the speaker’s aim to show what the State, and above all the Church, had to do, and now, alas! have done, with Texas and slavery, and how much, on the other hand, the individual should have to do with church and state. These were fair themes, and not mistimed; and his words were addressed to “fit audience, and not few.”

We must give Mr. Phillips the credit of being a clean, erect, and what was once called a consistent man. He at least is not responsible for slavery, nor for American Independence; for the hypocrisy and superstition of the Church, nor the timidity and selfishness of the State; nor for the indifference and willing ignorance of any. He stands so distinctly, so firmly, and so effectively, alone, and one honest man is so much more than a host, that we cannot but feel that he does himself injustice when he reminds us of “the American Society, which he represents.” It is rare that we have the pleasure of listening to so clear and orthodox a speaker, who obviously has so few cracks or flaws in his moral nature,— who, having words at his command in a remarkable degree, has much more than words, if these should fail, in his unquestionable earnestness and integrity,— and, aside from their admiration at his rhetoric, secures the genuine respect of his audience. He unconsciously tells his biography as he proceeds, and we see him early and earnestly deliberating on these subjects, and wisely and bravely, without counsel or consent of any, occupying a ground at first, from which the varying tides of public opinion cannot drive him.

No one could mistake the genuine modesty and truth with which he affirmed, when speaking of the framers of the Constitution,— “I am wiser than they,” which with him has improved these sixty years’ experience of its working; or the uncompromising consistency and frankness of the prayer which concluded, not like the Thanksgiving proclamations, with — “God save the Commonwealth of Massachusetts,” but — God dash it into a thousand pieces, till there shall not remain a fragment on which a man can stand, and dare not tell his name,— referring to the case of Frederick —; to our disgrace we know not what to call him, unless Scotland will lend us the spoils of one of her Douglasses, out of history or fiction, for a season, till we be hospitable and brave enough to hear his proper name, — a fugitive slave in one more sense than we; who has proved himself the possessor of a fair intellect, and has won a colorless reputation in these parts; and who, we trust, will be as superior to degradation from the sympathies of Freedom, as from the antipathies of slavery. When, said Mr. Phillips, he communicated to a New Bedford audience, the other day, his purpose of writing his life, and telling his name, and the name of his master, and the place he ran from, the murmur ran round the room, and was anxiously whispered by the sons of the Pilgrims, “He had better not!” and it was echoed under the shadow of Concord monument, “He had better not!”

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

We would fain express our appreciation of the freedom and steady wisdom, so rare in the reformer, with which he declared that he was not born to abolish slavery, but to do right. We have heard a few, a very few, good political speakers, who afforded us the pleasure of great intellectual power and acuteness, of soldier-like steadiness, and of a graceful and natural oratory; but in this man the audience might detect a sort of moral principle and integrity, which was more stable than their firmness, more discriminating than his own intellect, and more graceful than his rhetoric, which was not working for temporary or trivial ends. It is so rare and encouraging to listen to an orator, who is content with another alliance than with the popular party, or even with the sympathizing school of the martyrs, who can afford sometimes to be his own auditor if the mob stay away, and hears himself without reproof, that we feel ourselves in danger of slandering all mankind by affirming, that here is one, who is at the same time an eloquent speaker and a righteous man. Perhaps, on the whole, the most interesting fact elicited by these addresses, is the readiness of the people at large, of whatever sect or party, to entertain, with good will and hospitality, the most revolutionary and heretical opinions, when frankly and adequately, and in some sort cheerfully, expressed. Such clear and candid declaration of opinion served like an electuary to whet and clarify the intellect of all parties, and furnished each one with an additional argument for that right he asserted.

We consider Mr. Phillips one of the most conspicuous and efficient champions of a true Church and State now in the field, and would say to him, and such as are like him, “God speed you.” If you know of any champion in the ranks of his opponents, who has the valor and courtesy even of Paynim chivalry, if not the Christian graces and refinement of this knight, you will do us a service by directing him to these fields forthwith, where the lists are now open, and he shall be hospitably entertained. For as yet the red-cross knight has shown us only the gallant device upon his shield, and his admirable command of his steed, prancing and curveting in the empty lists; but we wait to see who, in the actual breaking of lances, will come tumbling upon the plain.

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

March 28, Friday: Texas, which had been created as a Republic in 1836, was annexed to the United States (or vice versa) and Mexico broke off relations with the USA.

On March 12th, Henry Thoreau had written a letter to the editor of The Liberator.

THE LIBERATOR

[DL. I.]

WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON AND ISAAC KNAPP, PUBLISHERS.

[NO

[BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS.]

OUR COUNTRY IS THE WORLD—OUR COUNTRYMEN ARE MANKIND.

[SATURDAY, APRIL 23,

The substance of it was that on March 11th, at the Lyceum in Concord, Wendell Phillips had presented the non-cooperation-with-government position. We now reprint this letter as it appeared in The Liberator, as an editorial: “Wendell Phillips Before the Concord Lyceum.” Thoreau was reporting that: “We must give Mr. Phillips the credit of being a clean, erect, and what was once called a consistent man. He at least is not responsible for slavery ... for the hypocrisy and superstition of the church, nor the timidity and selfishness of the state.... In this man the audience might detect a sort of moral principle and integrity.” He punned (rather tastelessly, it seems to us now) on Frederick Douglass’s “fair intellect,” and on his “colorless reputation.”

John Tawell had been born in 1784 as the 2d son of Thomas Tawell, who for a considerable number of years kept a general shop in the parish of Aldely, a village in Norfolk, about six miles from Beccles. As a teen he had been friends with a Quaker linen-draper, Joseph Hunton, who had ultimately been executed for forgery. He entered the service of a widow of the Religious Society of Friends who kept a general shop in the village of Pakefield, near Lowestoft, in Suffolk and began to attend meeting for worship and gradually assimilated himself, applying in London late in 1803 or early in 1804 to be recognized as a “convinced” Friend. Ultimately the Religious Society of Friends in London had recognized this slight and seemingly applicant, but then in 1806 while living in Whitechapel under the auspices of a Quaker, at the age of 22 he had seduced a servant-girl. They married. While working in a druggist’s shop, he was detected in the forgery of a £10 note on Smith’s Bank of Uxbridge and was in 1820 sentenced to hang (he was disowned by the Quakers but they persuaded the court to commute the sentence to transportation for 14 years). In Australia he initially labored on coal boats but then got a job in a convict hospital and became a clerk to Mr. Isaac Wood of the Sydney Academy. After three years he was pardoned, on the basis of his earlier experience, granted a license by the medical board to dispense drugs. He opened a small chemist shop, still attired in Quaker garb. He was granted a ticket of leave and began a prosperous business in Sydney. In 3 years he became an undoubted success by cornering the market in whalebone for combs and toothbrushes. In 1823 Tawell’s wife and their two sons John Junior and William were able to join him in Australia with their trip paid for by the Crown. His son William Tawell died in 1833. In 1837 he prepared a Quaker meetinghouse in Sydney, with a plaque

JOHN TAWELL — TO THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS

He made a public display of his temperance by pouring casks of gin and rum into the sea at Sydney Cove. After some 15 years as a chemist in Australia he returned to England somewhat wealthy. His wife became ill so he hired Sarah Lawrence to attend her. He began an affair with this nurse and she gave birth to his child, and then another. His wife and his remaining son John Tawell, Jr. died in 1838. In 1841 he remarried with a Quaker widow, Mrs. Sarah Cutforth, who had run a school in Clerkenwell (she would be disowned for this marriage with a man who had been disowned). Apparently the nurse Sarah Lawrence who had given birth to two of his children had been expecting that eventually he would marry her, but instead she was removed with her two children to a cottage in Salt Hill near Slough where she would be known as “Sarah Hart.” She secured a court order that he maintain her and the children and he was providing a weekly allowance of £1. Between 6PM and 7PM on January 1, 1845 a man in Quaker garb was observed departing from Sarah’s cottage hurriedly, leaving 30-year-old Sarah moaning on the floor. Two glasses were on the table, one empty and the other containing some porter. The man was followed and was observed to board a slow train for London. The telegraph apparatus in use at Slough was a model patented in 1837 by Fothergill Cooke and Charles Wheatstone (this was a complicated apparatus in which the wiggling of two needles would be interpreted to stand for a letter of the alphabet –or if preceded by a number signal, for a number– and for simplicity its code used G for J, K for Q, and S for Z). The stationmaster telegraphed at once to Paddington Station,

STATE MURDER

A MURDER HAS JUST BEEN COMMITTED AT SALT HILL AND THE SUSPECTED MURDERER WAS SEEN TO TAKE A FIRST CLASS TICKET TO LONDON BY THE TRAIN THAT LEFT SLOUGH AT 7 42 PM HE IS IN THE GARB OF A KWAKER WITH A GREAT COAT ON WHICH REACHES NEARLY DOWN TO HIS FEET HE IS IN THE LAST COMPARTMENT OF THE SECOND CLASS COMPARTMENT

TELEGRAPHY

The trial took place on March 12, 1845 at Aylesbury County Court under Judge Baron Parke. The defendant appeared in the attire of a Quaker and it was established that he had recently purchased from a chemist he knew in Bishopgate, London two bottles of Scheele’s Prussic Acid, a compound used for the treatment of varicose veins. Attorney for the defense Sir Fitzroy Kelly, a promoter of the Appeals Court and the Chief Baron of the Exchequer, had attempted to make a plausible case that since there had been a large barrel of apples in the house, the deceased might accidentally have poisoned herself by ingesting apple seeds or “pips” that do contain trace amounts of hydrogen cyanide (for this inventiveness the barrister would ever after be known as “Apple-pip Kelly”). Neither the judge nor the jury had credited such a defense and at the age of 61 Tawell had stood before the judge and for the 2d time in his life be sentenced to hang. On this day he was hanged at Aylesbury. An orderly crowd of two or three thousand persons, “chiefly agricultural labourers and a few mechanics,” watched at 8PM as the slight man strangled for some ten minutes at the end of the rope. The actual electromagnetic devices were on display at a shilling per viewer (they would be donated in 1876 and you can now view them in London’s Science Museum). Tawell’s English assets were forfeit to the Crown with the widow allowed to keep their Birkhampstead home. His estate in Sydney was likewise forfeit but there was argument as to how it should be disposed of, for it was discovered that the meetinghouse he had prepared for the Quakers that displayed his donation plaque had not been formally gifted. Eventually it would be purchased and transformed into a Jewish synagogue. Sarah Hart’s two children were placed in care. Telegraph wires would be described as “the cords that hung John Tawell.”

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Early May: Henry Thoreau hired a horse and pulled stumps in Waldo Emerson's 11-acre plot, for firewood as well as to clear it, and then plowed $2\frac{1}{2}$ acres to plant in Phaseolus vulgaris var. humilis common small navy pea bush white beans.³⁹⁴ This clearing of the exhausted farmland beyond the Concord Alms House and Poor Farm, which had been timbered some time before and had lain fallow for some 17 years partly restoring its fertility, was Thoreau's deal with Emerson by which he would be allowed to build a cabin for his occupancy in 394. Brad Dean has calculated that to plant 7 miles of rows, each row 15 rods in length, spaced 3 feet apart, the dimensions of the beanfield would have been 247.5 by 447 feet or 110,632.5 square feet, and that this amounts to 2.534 acres or slightly over a hectare.

These are beans that ripen prior to harvest and are threshed dry from the pods. Only the ripe seeds reach market. The main types are grown as follows: (1) the Pea or Navy which Henry was growing; (2) Medium type, which includes Pinto, Great Northern, Sutter, Pink Bayo, and Small Red or Mexican Red; (3) Kidney; and (4) Marrow. Seeds vary in size from about 1/3-inch long in Thoreau's pea or navy bean to 3/4-inch in the Kidney. All these plants are of bush type. They are usually cut or pulled when most pods are ripe, and then vines and pods are allowed to dry before threshing. This is a bean thought to have originated in Central America from southern Mexico to Guatemala and Honduras. Evidence of the common bean has been found in two widely separated places. Large seeded common beans were found at Callejon de Hualylas in Peru, and small seeded common beans were found in the Tehuacan Valley in Mexico, with both finds carbon-dating as earlier than 5,000 BCE. This crop is associated with the maize and squash culture which predominated in pre-Columbian tropical America. In our post-Columbian era this bean has come to be grown in all areas of the world.

However, that's only the literal bean, not the metaphorical or literary bean, and once upon a time in Europe, there had been a form of commercial counting in use very much like the abacus of the East, in which beans were used. In those days to "know how many beans make up five" was to be commercially numerate. —Sort of like today knowing how to count one's change. It might be suggested therefore that Thoreau's determination to know beans was a play upon this archaic usage in which not knowing one's beans amounted to innumeracy, and in addition a play upon the common accusation "You don't know beans about xxxxx!" It might also be suggested that this is scatological humor similar to Shakespeare's — the following is from his "Comedy of Errors":

A man may break a word with you sir; and words are but wind;
Ay, and break it in your face, so he break it not behind.

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Emerson's woodlot where it touched on Walden Pond. Thoreau then bought the shanty of a departing family of impoverished Irish immigrants, the James Collinses who were moving on at the completion of work on the railway, standing near the new tracks, for its materials, tore it apart, and hauled the recovered boards some rods along the hilltop and down to Walden Pond on a hand-cart of some sort, to dry in the sun:

A 19th-Century Irish shanty in the Merrimack Valley

TIMELINE OF WALDENTHE BEANFIELD

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

WALDEN: At length, in the beginning of May, with the help of some of my acquaintances, rather to improve so good an occasion for neighborliness than from any necessity, I set up the frame of my house. No man was ever more honored in the character of his raisers than I. They are destined, I trust, to assist at the raising of loftier structures one day. I began to occupy my house on the 4th of July, as soon as it was boarded and roofed, for the boards were carefully feather-edged and lapped, so that it was perfectly impervious to rain; but before boarding I laid the foundation of a chimney at one end, bringing two cartloads of stones up the hill from the pond in my arms. I built the chimney after my hoeing in the fall, before a fire became necessary for warmth, doing my cooking in the mean while out of doors on the ground, early in the morning; which mode I still think is in some respects more convenient and agreeable than the usual one. When it stormed before my bread was baked, I fixed a few boards over the fire, and sat under them to watch my loaf, and passed some pleasant hours in that way. In those days, when my hands were much employed, I read but little, but the least scraps of paper which lay on the ground, my holder, or tablecloth, afforded me as much entertainment, in fact answered the same purpose as the Iliad.

PEOPLE OF WALDEN

BRONSON ALCOTT

ELLERY CHANNING

WALDO EMERSON

EDMUND HOSMER

EDMUND HOSMER, JR

JOHN HOSMER

ANDREW HOSMER

JAMES BURRILL CURTIS

GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS

The “acquaintances” who participated in this rustic “raising”³⁹⁵ ceremony on the Walden Pond shore were:

- Bronson Alcott
- Ellery Channing
- Waldo Emerson
- Edmund Hosmer

395. “No man was ever more honored in the character of his raisers than I.” I would maintain that WALDEN is chock-full of references to the gallows, references that nowadays we don’t “get” simply because we no longer live in the sort of culture, in which public execution is an unchallenged holiday convention. For instance, I would maintain that this particular paragraph, apparently so innocent, includes an implicit reference to being hanged. While the raisers of a house frame are the friends and neighbors who push with poles and pull with ropes as a frame is being lifted from its temporary horizontal position to its permanent vertical position, the raisers of a person may by extension be the outraged citizens who are pulling on the rope that elevates a criminal by the neck toward the extending horizontal branch of a tree. This is not the sort of gallows humor which would have gone unnoticed in the first half of the 19th Century, not in America it wouldn’t. This is an implicit reference to Thoreau’s Huguenot ancestors of honored memory, who rather than tugging together upon the indecent public end of that hanging rope, in la belle France, had sometimes found themselves tugging alone upon the noose at the decent end. But there is more on this topic at:

GALLOWS
HUMOR

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

- Hosmer's sons Edmund Hosmer, Jr., John Hosmer, and Andrew Hosmer
- the brothers George William Curtis and James Burrill Curtis

Emerson of course resided in the Coolidge mansion just on the other side of the poorhouse farm (Gleason F7) and was the owner of the woodlot in which this shanty was being erected, and would be the owner of that shanty, and the Curtis brothers, having come from Brook Farm to Ponkawtasset Hill (Gleason D7) a year earlier, and the Alcotts, having only recently returned to Concord from their Fruitlands near Harvard, Massachusetts to reside near the Edmund Hosmer home on a road leading toward Lincoln (Gleason G9/66), were of course quite conveniently situated to come over to the pond for this neighborly little ceremony.

Index to the Text

Index to the Subtext

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

WALDEN: It was a singular experience that long acquaintance which I cultivated with beans, what with planting, and hoeing, and harvesting, and threshing, and picking over, and selling them, -the last was the hardest of all,- I might add eating, for I did taste. I was determined to know beans. When they were growing, I used to hoe from five o'clock in the morning till noon, and commonly spent the rest of the day about other affairs. Consider the intimate and curious acquaintance one makes with various kinds of weeds, -it will bear some iteration in the account, for there was no little iteration in the labor,- disturbing their delicate organizations so ruthlessly, and making such invidious distinctions with his hoe, levelling whole ranks of one species, and sedulously cultivating another. That's Roman wormwood, -that's pigweed, -that's sorrel, -that's piper-grass, -have at him, chop him up, turn his roots upward to the sun, don't let him have a fibre in the shade, if you do he'll turn himself t'other side up and be as green as a leek in two days. A long war, not with cranes, but with weeds, those Trojans who had sun and rain and dews on their side. Daily the beans saw me come to their rescue armed with a hoe, and thin the ranks of their enemies, filling up the trenches with weedy dead.

Many a lusty crest-waving Hector, that towered a whole foot above his crowding comrades, fell before my weapon and rolled in the dust.

Those summer days which some of my contemporaries devoted to the fine arts in Boston or Rome, and others to contemplation in India, and others to trade in London or New York, I thus, with the other farmers of New England, devoted to husbandry. Not that I wanted beans to eat, for I am by nature a Pythagorean, so as far as beans are concerned, whether they mean porridge or voting, and exchanged them for rice; but, perchance, as some must work in fields if only for the sake of tropes and expression, to serve a parable-maker one day. It was on the whole a rare amusement, which, continued too long, might have become a dissipation. Though I gave them no manure, and did not hoe them all once, I hoed them unusually well as far as I went, and was paid for it in the end, "there being in truth," as Evelyn says, "no compost or lætation whatsoever comparable to this continual motion, repastination, and turning of the mould with the spade." "The earth," he adds elsewhere, "especially if fresh, has a certain magnetism in it, by which it attracts the salt, power, or virtue (call it either) which gives it life, and is the logic of all the labor and stir we keep about it, to sustain us; all dungings and other sordid temperings being but the vicars succedaneous to this improvement." Moreover, this being one of those "worn-out and exhausted lay fields which enjoy their sabbath," had perchance, as Sir Kenelm Digby thinks likely, attracted "vital spirits" from the air. I harvested twelve bushels of beans.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

But to be more particular; for it is complained that Mr. Colman has reported chiefly the expensive experiments of gentlemen farmers; my outgoes were,-

For a hoe,	$0 54
Ploughing, harrowing, and furrowing, ...	7 50, Too much.
Beans for seed,	3 12 $\frac{1}{2}$
Potatoes “	1 33
Peas “	0 40
Turnip seed,	0 06
White line for crow fence,	0 02
Horse cultivator and boy three hours, ...	1 00
Horse and cart to get crop,	0 75

In all,\$14 72 $\frac{1}{2}$

My income was, (patrem familias vendacem, non emacem esse oportet,) from

Nine bushels and twelve quarts of beans sold,	$16 94
Five “ large potatoes,	2 50
Nine “ small “	2 25
Grass,	1 00
Stalks,	0 75

In all,$23 44

Leaving a pecuniary profit, as I have elsewhere said, of \$8 71 $\frac{1}{2}$.

This is the result of my experience in raising beans. Plant the common small white bush bean about the first of June, in rows three feet by eighteen inches apart, being careful to select fresh round and unmixed seed. First look out for worms, and supply vacancies by planting anew. Then look out for woodchucks, if it is an exposed place, for they will nibble off the earliest tender leaves almost clean as they go; and again, when the young tendrils make their appearance, they have notice of it, and will shear them off with both buds and young pods, sitting erect like a squirrel. but above all harvest as early as possible, if you would escape frosts and have a fair and saleable crop; you may save much loss by this means.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

This further experience also I gained. I said to myself, I will not plant beans and corn with so much industry another summer, but such seeds, if the seed is not lost, as sincerity, truth, simplicity, faith, innocence, and the like, and see if they will not grow in this soil, even with less toil and manurance, and sustain me, for surely it has not been exhausted for these crops. Alas! I said this to myself; but now another summer is gone, and another, and another, and I am obliged to say to you, Reader, that the seeds which I planted, if indeed they were the seeds of those virtues, were wormeaten or had lost their vitality, and so did not come up. Commonly men will only be brave as their fathers were brave, or timid. This generation is very sure to plant corn and beans each new year precisely as the Indians did centuries ago and taught the first settlers to do, as if there were a fate in it. I saw an old man the other day, to my astonishment, making the holes with a hoe for the seventieth time at least, and not for himself to lie down in! But why should not the New Englander try new adventures, and not lay so much stress on his grain, his potato and grass crop, and his orchards? -raise other crops than these? Why concern ourselves so much about our beans for seed, and not be concerned at all about a new generation of men? We should really be fed and cheered if when we met a man we were sure to see that some of the qualities which I have named, which we all prize more than those other productions, but which are for the most part broadcast and floating in the air, had taken root and grown in him. Here comes such a subtle and ineffable quality, for instance, as truth or justice, though the slightest amount or new variety of it, along the road. Our ambassadors should be instructed to send home such seeds as these, and Congress help to distribute them over all the land. We should never stand upon ceremony with sincerity.

We should never cheat and insult and banish one another by our meanness, if there were present the kernel of worth and friendliness. We should not meet thus in haste. Most men I do not meet at all, for they seem not to have time; they are busy about their beans. We would not deal with a man thus plodding ever, leaning on a hoe or a spade as a staff between his work, not as a mushroom, but partially risen out of the earth, something more than erect, like swallows alighted and walking on the ground.-

“And as he spake, his wings would now and then Spread, as he meant to fly, then close again,” so that we should suspect that we might be conversing with an angel. Bread may not always nourish us; but it always does us good, it even takes stiffness out of our joints, and makes us supple and buoyant, when we knew not what ailed us, to recognize any generosity in man or Nature, to share any unmixed and heroic joy.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Ancient poetry and mythology suggest, at least, that husbandry was once a sacred art; but it is pursued with irreverent haste and heedlessness by us, our object being to have large farms and large crops merely. We have no festival, nor procession, nor ceremony, not excepting our Cattle-shows and so called Thanksgivings, by which the farmer expresses a sense of the sacredness of his calling, or is reminded of its sacred origin. It is the premium and the feast which tempt him. He sacrifices not to Ceres and the Terrestrial Jove, but to the infernal Plutus rather. By avarice and selfishness, and a grovelling habit, from which none of us is free, of regarding the soil as property, or the means of acquiring property chiefly, the landscape is deformed, husbandry is degraded with us, and the farmer leads the meanest of lives.

He knows Nature but as a robber. Cato says that the profits of agriculture are particularly pious or just, (maximeque pius quæstus,) and according to Varro the old Romans "called the same earth Mother and Ceres, and thought that they who cultivated it led a pious and useful life, and that they alone were left of the race of King Saturn."

We are wont to forget that the sun looks on our cultivated fields and on the prairies and forests without distinction. They all reflect and absorb his rays alike, and the former make but a small part of the glorious picture which he beholds in his daily course. In his view the earth is all equally cultivated like a garden. Therefore we should receive the benefit of his light and heat with a corresponding trust and magnanimity. What though I value the seed of these beans, and harvest that in the fall of the year? This broad field which I have looked at so long looks not to me as the principal cultivator, but away from me to influences more genial to it, which water and make it green. These beans have results which are not harvested by me. Do they not grow for woodchucks partly? The ear of wheat, (in Latin spica," obsoletely specā, from spe, hope,) should not be the only hope of the husbandman; its kernel or grain (granum, from gerendo, bearing,) is not all that it bears. How, then, can our harvest fail? Shall I not rejoice also at the abundance of the weeds whose seeds are the granary of the birds? It matters little comparatively whether the fields fill the farmer's barns. The true husbandman will cease from anxiety, as the squirrels manifest no concern whether the woods will bear chestnuts this year or not, and finish his labor with every day, relinquishing all claim to the produce of his fields, and sacrificing in his mind not only his first but his last fruits also.

HDT

WHAT?

INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

July 3, Thursday: In Boston, Thomas Barrett was hanged for a multiple murder.

Frederick Douglass lectured in Westminster, Massachusetts.

In approximately this year John William Davis, who would eventually become governor of Rhode Island (1887/1888, 1890/1891), was a young man serving his apprenticeship.

It was the custom of the boss to give us a day off and a dollar for spending money Fourth of July and College Commencement days. Mr. Vanderbilt the elder was fighting for a share of the eastern travel, and at this Fourth of July his old boat Neptune was carrying passengers from Providence to New-York for twenty five cents each, deck-passage. The boat sailed from India Point near our lodging and when the boss gave me the dollar I started straight for the craft, paid my quarter and went on board. It was my first voyage down the bay and out upon the ocean by Point Judith and I did not miss much that could be seen by night. Arrived in the great city I got a breakfast of coffee and steak for a quarter and then started out down West St. across the Battery. The Battery proper then stood out in the harbor beyond the shore – then the Quincy Slip where there were acres of Canal boats, up Whitehall St. to Bowling Green where I first saw a fountain flowing from a pile of rough stones in the pool in the green. Water was belching in every direction. Then I went up

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Broadway to the Park where another fountain was showering a pool, and the City Hall was trimmed with flags. Thence I went up Broadway and across to North River side and so on and on all day long, stopping to inspect a company of Scottish Highlanders out in parade in tartans and philibegs until nightfall called me again to the Neptune. I supped on a sandwich and cup of coffee costing a New York shilling and had three bits left out of my dollar. I paid two for my passage and one for a mattress to lie upon, sleeping through the night and arriving home for breakfast went to work that morning. I have been to New York many times since then, supped and lodged at the Fifth Ave. and the Waldorf at the expense of the state but I never went at less personal cost or had greater enjoyment than on the memorable occasion related.

CELEBRATING OUR B-DAY

August 29, Friday: The governor of Massachusetts commuted the sentence of execution by hanging of the murderer Orin De Wolf, to life in prison in Charlestown.³⁹⁶

396. From the 1849 Physician's Report of the Massachusetts State Prison: "Orin De Wolf, a native of Vermont, aged 33 years, died August 19th, of cholera. He had been in prison four years. He was originally sentenced to death for the crime of murder; but came to the prison under a commutation of sentence to imprisonment for life."

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

October 27, Monday: Mrs. Mary Ann Bickford was murdered on Mount Vernon Avenue in Boston.

STATE MURDER

PRICE 12 1-2 CENTS.

HIGHLY INTERESTING WORK.

LIFE AND CORRESPONDENCE OF THE LATE MARIA A. BICKFORD.

The above portrait was drawn from a daguerreotype miniature, taken from the trunk of Mrs. B. by Coroner Pratt, on the morning of the murder, and engraved expressly for this work by Brown & Worcester, eminent artists of this city. The fac simile of the superb satin dress which she wore is executed with remarkable fidelity. This dress is reported to have cost $100, and was presented to her by Albert J. Tirrell.

BOSTON: FOR SALE AT THE PERIODICAL DEPOTS.

READ ABOUT THIS CASE

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Winter: We have an indication in Henry Thoreau's journal that in this season he was reading in the Reverend George Gilfillan's new GALLERY OF LITERARY PORTRAITS (Edinburgh: James Hogg).

EMINENT LITERARY MALES

Thoreau entered some thoughts about Waldo Emerson v. Bronson Alcott into his journal:

Emerson again is a critic poet philosopher –with talent not so conspicuous –not so adequate to his task – – Lives a far more intense life –seeks to realize a divine life –his affections and intellect equally developed. – has advanced farther and a new heaven opens to him– Love & Friendship –Religion –Poetry –The Holy are familiar to him The life of an Artist –more variegated –more observing –finer perception –not so robust –elastic –practical enough in his own field –faithful –a judge of men

There is no such general critic of men & things –no such trustworthy & faithful man.– More of the divine realized in him than in any.

A poetic-critic –reserving the unqualified nouns for the gods —

Alcott is a geometer –a visionary – – The Laplace of ethics– More intellect –less of the affections –sight beyond talents –a substratum of practical skill and knowledge unquestionable –but overlaid and concealed by a faith in the unseen and impracticable

Seeks to realize an entire life– A catholic observer –habitually takes in the farthest star & nebula –into his scheme.

Will be the last man to be disappointed as the ages revolve His attitude is one of greater faith & expectation than that of any man I know –with little to show –with undue share for a philosopher of the weaknesses of humanity.

The most hospitable intellect –embracing high & low –for children how much that means –for the insane and vagabond –for the poet and scholar. —

Emerson has special talents unequalled– The divine in man has had no more easy methodically distinct expression.

His personal influence upon young persons greater than any man's

In his world every man would be a poet– Love would reign– Beauty would take place– Man & nature would harmonize – —

When Alcotts day comes Laws unsuspected by most will take effect –the system will crystallize according to them –all scales and falsehood will slough-off. Every thing will be in its place.

His responsive “yes” and “no” and attentive alert “hah!”

Like a happy merchant in the crowd all on the alert and sympathetic nudging his friends –“hear that” listening to his favorite speaker –going for protection –impatiently attentive– “I say, at the same time we had a War with France. [Yes, your Highness said so, –and we admit it!]” all good –that which I didnt hear and that which I did –are means to it.

He not only makes him speak audibly but he makes all parties listen to him and gives us their comments – “groans” or “blushes” –or or “assent” –for this side or that –not a man speaking alone but with England sitting round.

The merchant listens restless with shake of his head –dumb (hum-m-m) and reiteration of his last words –

We have from time to time pleasant congratulations, when the speech grows dim and involved of any “little window in to his Highness” and intimations of a “Speech getting ready in his interior.”

with triumphant malicious appeal from time to time when there is a palpable hit to [My honorable friends?]

–Supplying his looks and attitudes and sound of his voice and even his unutterable and wrecked submerged thought.

even the moderns are made to hear and respond as they best can. “O Secretary of the Home Department, my right honorable friend!” must bethink himself of his duties

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

–when the speech lags or stumbles reassuring & encouraging his fellow auditors –hearing not for himself only but for all –in more silent soliloquy exclaiming “Poor Oliver, noble Oliver!”– “Look in that countenance of high Highness!”

“Courage, my brave one!”

Cromwell begins speaking only within sight of the beginning & stops short when the conclusion is visible.

And the sentence frequently “breaks down” in the middle and never get us again

Winter 1845/1846 before February 22d: Then in dark winter mornings in short winter afternoons the pack of hounds –threading all woods with hounding cry & yelp unable to resist the instinct of the chace –and note of hunting horn at intervals showing that man too is in the rear– And the woods ring again and yet no fox bursts forth onto the open level of the pond and no following pack after their actaeon.

But this small village –germ of something more –why did it fail while Concord grows apace– No natural advantages –no water privilege –only the Walden pond and Bristow’s spring privileges alas all unimproved by those men but to dilute their glass– Might not the basket making –broom mat-making corn parching –potters business have thrived here making the wilderness to blossom as the rose? Now all too late for commerce –this waste depopulated district has its rail road too. And transmitted the names of Bristows Catoes Hildas Zilphas to a remote and grateful posterity –

Again nature will try –with me for a first settler –and my house to be the oldest in the settlement.

The sterile soil would have been proof against any lowland degeneracy.

Farmers far and near call it the Paradise of beans

And here too on winter days while yet is cold January and snow and ice lie thick comes the prudent foreseeing land lord or housekeeper from the village to get ice –to cool his summer-drink –a grateful beverage if he should live, if time should endure so long– How few so wise so industrious to lay up treasures which neither rust nor melt –“to cool their summer drink” one day

And cart off the solid pond the element and air of fishes held fast with chain & stake like corded wood –all through winter air to wintery cellar.– to underlie the summer there. And cut and saw the cream of the pond –unroof the house of fishes.

And in early mornings come men with fishing reels and slender lunch –men of real faith and let down their fine lines & live minnows through the snowy field to hook the pickerel & perch.

With buried well stones & strawberries raspberries thimbleberries growing there –some pitchy pine or gnarled oak in the chimney nook or the sweet scented black birch where the hearth was.

Breeds –history must not yet tell the tragedies enacted there –let time intervene to assuage –and lend an azure tint to them.

There is something pathetic in the sedentary life of men who have travelled. They must naturally die when they leave the road.

From Gilfillan’s Sketches of Eminent Literary Men” I learn that Carlyle “was born at Ecclefechan, Anandale of parents who were “good farmer people” father of “strong native sense”

Father dead mother still lives.

“Intimate with Ed. Irving” from previous to his college life till the former’s death.

At college had to “support himself” partly by “private tuition, translations, for the bookseller” &c. – corresponded with Goethe till the latter’s death. –

Destined for the church. —

“Taught an academy in Dysart, at the same time that Irving was teaching in Kirkaldy” after marriage “resided partly at Comely Bank Edinburg; and for a year or two at Craigenputtock, a wild and solitary farm house in the upper part of Dumfriesshire” among barren heather-clad hills. here visited by our Countryman Emerson who passed one day with him. His conversation “coming to its climaxes, ever and anon, in long, deep, chest-shaking bursts of laughter”

“An amicable centre for men of the most opposite opinions”.

“Smoking his perpetual pipe”

“listened to as an oracle” ———

“come to see our Scholmaster, who had also been his”

The poet Stirling his only intimate acquaintance latterly in England.

{One leaf missing} up the soil –or that there is a “Brest Shipping” that now at length only after some years of this revolution there should be some falling off in the importation of sugar– I am strangely surprised– Perhaps I had thought they sweetened their coffee? their water? with Revolution still.

We want one or two chapters out of some English or German Almanac at least –headed “work for the month”–

Including Revolution work of course– Altitude of the sun” –“State of the Crops” “State of the markets” “Meteorological observations” “Attractive Industry” “Day labor” just to remind the reader that the French peasantry –did something beside go without breeches –burning chateaus, or getting ready knotted cords –embrace & throttle one another ie we want not only a back ground and a fore ground to a picture –but literally a ground [written in over the line and not canceled: an underground] under the feet also.³⁹⁷

An omission common to most epics –a want of epic integrity

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

What seems so fair and poetic in antiquity –almost fabulous –is realized too in Concord life– As poets and historians brought their work to the Grecian games –and genius wrestled there as well as strength of body –so have we seen works of kindred genius read at our Concord games –by their author in this our Concord Amphitheatre It is virtually repeated by all ages and nations.

Moles nesting in your cellar & nibbling every third potatoe –a whole rabbit warren only separated from you by the flooring– To be saluted when you stir in the dawn by the hasty departure of Monsieur –thump thump thump striking his head against the floor timbers

Squirrels & field mice that hold to a community of property in your stock of chestnuts.

The blue jays suffered few chestnuts to reach the ground –resorting to your single tree in flocks in the early morning, and picking them out of the burs –at a great advantage

The crop of blackberries small & vines not yet grown –ground nuts not dug.

One wonders how so much after all was expressed in the old way – –so much here depends upon the emphasis –tone –pronunciation –style & spirit of the reading –

No writer uses so profusely all the aids to intelligibility which the printers art affords –

You wonder how others had contrived to write so many pages without emphatic Italicised words –they are so expressive so natural & indispensable here.

As if none had ever used the demonstrative pronoun –demonstratively.

In another's sentences the thought though immortal is as it were embalmed and does not strike you –but here it is so freshly living –not purified by the ordeal of death –that it stirs in the very extremities –the smallest particles & pronouns are all alive with it– You must not say it –but it It is not simple it –your it –or mine, but it

His books are solid workmanlike –like all that England does –they tell of endless labor –done –well done and all the rubbish swept away –like this bright cutlery in the windows while the coak & ashes –turnings –filings borings dust –lie far away at Birmingham unheard of.

The words did not come at the command of grammar but –of an inexorable meaning not like the standing soldiers by vote of parliament –but any able bodied man pressed into the service It is no China war –but a revolution

This style is worth attending to as one of the most important features of the man that we at this distance know.

What are the men of N.E. about? I have travelled some in New England –especially in Concord –and I found that no enterprise was on foot which it would not disgrace a man to take part in. They seemed to be employed everywhere in shops and offices & fields– They seemed like the brahmans of the east to be doing penance in a thousand curious unheard of ways –their endurance surpassing anything I had ever seen or heard of –Simeon Stylites –Brahmen looking in the face of the sun –standing on one leg –dwelling at the roots of trees –nothing to it Any of the twelve labors of Hercules to be matched– The Nemaean Lion –Lernaean hydra –OEnoean stag –Erymanthian boar –Augean stables –Stymphalian birds –Cretan bull –Diomedes' mares –Amazonian girdle –monster Geryon –Hesperian apples –three headed Cerberus – Nothing at all in comparison –being only twelve and having an end– For I could never see that these men ever slew or captured any of their monsters –or finished any of their labors– They have no “friend Iolas to burn, with a hot iron, the root” of the Hydra's head.– for as soon as one head is beaten, two spring up.

Men labor under a mistake –they are laying up treasures which moth and rust will corrupt & thieves break through & steal– Northern slavery –or the slavery which includes the southern eastern western and all others.

It is hard to have a southern over-seer it is worse to have a northern one but worst of all when you are yourself the slave driver. Look at the lonely teamster on the highway –wending to market by day –or night –is he a son the the morning –with somewhat of divinity in him –fearless because immortal –going to receive his birth-right –greeting the sun as his fellow bounding with youthful gigantic strength over his mother earth– See how he cowers & sneaks –how vaguely indefinitely all the day he fears –not being immortal not divine– The slave and prisoner of his own opinion of himself –fame which he has earned by his own deeds –

Public opinion is a weak tyrant compared with private opinion– What I think of myself –that determines my fate.

I see young men my equals –who have inherited from their spiritual father a soul –broad fertile uncultivated –from their earthly father –a farm –with cattle and barns and farming tools –the implements of the picklock –& the counterfeiter– Better if they had been born in the open pasture and suckled by a wolf –or perhaps cradled in a manger –that they might have seen with clear eye what was the field they were called to labor in. The young man has got to live a man's life then in this world pushing all these things before him and get on as well as he can– how many a poor immortal soul I have met well nigh crushed and smothered –creeping slowly down the road of life –pushing before him a barn 75 –by 40 feet and 100 acres of land tillage –pasture woodlot– This dull opaque garment of the flesh is load enough –for the strongest spirit –but with such an earthly garment superadded –the spiritual life is soon ploughed into the soil with compost.

Its a fool's life as they will all find when they get to the end of it. The man that goes on accumulating property when the bare necessities of life are cared for is a fool –and knows better.

There is a stronger desire to be respectable to one's neighbors than to ones self –

However such distinctions as Poet Philosopher –Literary man –&c do not much assist our final estimate– We do not lay much stress on them –‘a man's a man for a' that– Any man who interests us much is all and more than these –

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

It is not simple dictionary it –

Talent at making books –solid workman-like graceful –which may be read.

Some Idyllic chapter or chapters are needed

In the French Revolution are (Mirabeau –king of men) –(Danton –Titan of the Revolution) –(Camille Desmoulins –poetic Editor) –(Roland –heroic woman) –(Dumouriez –first efficient general) –on the other side (Marat friend of the people) (Robespierre) (–Tinville Infernal judge) St. Just. &c &c

Nutting & Le Gros –by the wall side– The Stratten house & Barn where the orchard covered all the slope of Brister’s hill –now killed out by the pines –

Brister Freeman a handy negro –(slave once of Squire Cummings? and Fenda his hospitable pleasant wife) –large –round black –who told fortunes –

Zilpha’s little house where ‘she was spinning linen” Making the walden woods ring with her shrill singing –a loud shrill remarkable voice –when once she was away to town –set on fire by English soldiers on parole in the last war –and cat and dog and hens all burned up.

And Cato the Ginea negro –his house a little patch among the walnuts –who let the trees grow up till he should be old –& Richardson got them

Where Breeds house stood –tradition says a tavern once stood, the well the same and all a swamp between the woods & town & and road made on logs {Five leaves missing} It makes a dull man’s dreams

Bread I made pretty well for awhile while I remembered the rules –for I studied this art methodically –going clear back to the primitive days and first invention of the unleavened kind –and coming gradually down through that lucky accidental souring of the dough which taught men the leavening process –and all the various fermentations thereafter –till you get to “good sweet wholesome bread” the staff of life. I went on very well mixing ry & flour & Indian meal & potatoe with success till one morning I had forgotten the rules –and thereafter scalded the yeast –killed it out –and so after the lapse of a month was glad after all to learn that such palatable staff of life could be made out of the dead and scalt creature and risings that lay flat.

I have hardly met with the housewife who has gone so far into this mystery– For all the farmers wives pause at yeast –give this and they can make bread –it is the axiom of their argument –what it is –where it came from –in what era bestowed on man –is wrapped in mystery– It is preserved religiously like the vestal fire –and its virtue is not yet run out –some precious bottle full first brought over in the May Flower –did the business for America –and its Influence is still rising –swelling –spreading like Atlantic billows over the land– The soul of bread –the spiritus –occupying its cellular tissue.

The way to compare men is to compare their respective ideals– The actual man is too complex to deal with.

Carlyle is an earnest honest heroic worker as Literary man –and sympathising brother of his race.

Idealize a man and your notion takes distinctness at once.

Carlyle’s talent is perhaps quite equal to his genius –

Striving to live in reality –not a general critic –philosopher or poet –

Wordsworth with very feeble talent has not so great and admirable as persevering genius heroism –heroism –is his word –his thing.

He would realize a brave & adequate human life. & die hopefully at last. —

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1846

Michigan became the first state to abolish capital punishment, for all crimes except treason. Later, Rhode Island and Wisconsin would abolish the death penalty for all crimes. However, some states were making more crimes punishable by death, especially when the culprit was a slave. By the end of the century, the countries of Venezuela, Portugal, Netherlands, Costa Rica, Brazil, and Ecuador would have abolished the death penalty.

COLDBLOODED MURDER

Fall-Winter 1846-1847: ... Certain things are absolute necessities of life in some circles –the most helpless and diseased –in others certain other or fewer things –and in others fewer still –and still what the absolutely indispensable are has never been determined I know a robust and hearty mother who thinks that her son who died abroad –came to his end by living too low, as she had since learned that he drank only water– Men are not inclined to leave off hanging men –today –though they will be to-morrow. I heard of a family in Concord this winter which would have starved, if it had not been for potatoes –& tea & coffee. — ...

ESSENCE IS BLUR. SPECIFICITY,
THE OPPOSITE OF ESSENCE,
IS OF THE NATURE OF TRUTH.

William Thaddeus Harris graduated from Harvard College. He would study for the law, but would never practice.

The Harvard Class of 1846 funded a monument in the cemetery of Plymouth, Massachusetts, in memory of their tutor and proctor Robert Bartlett:

To Robert Bartlett, an alumnus of Harvard College, who obtained the highest place among his companions, by genius, by study and learning, always distinguished by every form of virtue, most devoted to religion, to truth and liberty, who sacredly discharged all the offices of life, the most excellent and dutiful son, the most deserving brother, the most faithful friend, for almost four years the learned, kind and careful instructor, hurried away by a hasty death; in consequence of distinguished kindness to themselves, the members of the class of 1846, the last who listened to his instruction, have erected this monument.

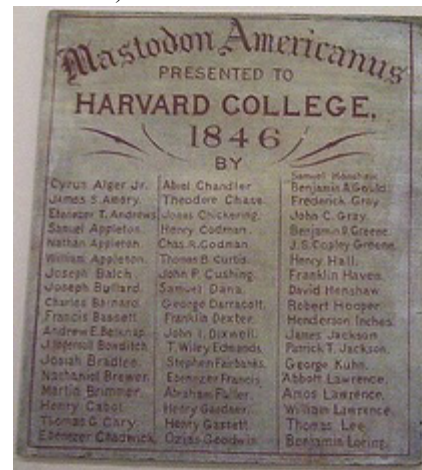

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

The rules of “rugby” football, which dated to William Webb Ellis’s famous act of 1823, were formalized.

SPORTS

Professor John White Webster had gotten enthused about a mastodon skeleton Mammot americanum that had been found in a New Jersey bog in 1844 and was available on the market for only $3,000, and jumped at the chance to acquire it for the Harvard Museum supposing that the officials of the college would be as enthusiastic as he was about these magnificently preserved bones and supposing that he could easily raise the funds to reimburse him for his grand procurement (but in this year he discovered that he had been quite mistaken, because some of the local folks whose names had been inscribed on the presentation plaques had failed to make good on their promises and had left him holding the bag for the balance of the debt).

Professor Webster would be undaunted by this residual obligation. He knew he would be able to turn to his richie-rich Boston acquaintance Doctor George Parkman, who although he was personally rather unpleasant was the sole owner of a whole potfull of downtown real estate, for a personal loan to cover the balance.

A new building for the Harvard Medical College was erected upon land belonging to Doctor Parkman down on the flats of the Charles River at the foot of North Grove Street near the Massachusetts Hospital on Allen Street (now Massachusetts General) and near the New Gaol at Foundry Wharf, all of this in the neighborhood of the tollhouse at the Boston approaches to the Cambridge Bridge:

(Don't go looking for this two-story brick building set on piers at the waterfront near Massachusetts General Hospital. It was long ago torn down.)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

January 4, Sunday: Ruth, an églogue biblique by César Franck to words of the Bible and Guillemin, was performed publicly for the initial time, at the Paris Conservatoire. The audience was lukewarm, the critics hostile.

January 5, Monday: The murderer Martha Browning, age 23, was hanged at Newgate Prison.

The electric telegraph was completed from Boston to Springfield, Massachusetts.

December 5, Saturday: The governor of Massachusetts commuted the sentence of execution by hanging of John Roach, to life in prison.

Kit Carson and Kearny's 100 dragoons arrived within 25 miles of San Diego, California, where they captured a Mexican courier who had been en route to Sonora, Mexico carrying letters to General Jose Castro, and in that manner learned that a Mexican revolt had retaken California from Commodore Stockton, and that all the coastal cities were back under Mexican control with the exception of San Diego, where Stockton was pinned down under siege. Kearny and his forces, reduced in number and exhausted from the trek from New Mexico, needed to decide whether to come out and confront the Mexican forces, or take their chances of survival in the desert. Approaching San Diego, Kearny sent a rancher, Edward Stokes, ahead to notify Commodore Stockton of their imminent arrival. He returned with 39 American soldiers and the military intelligence that several hundred Mexican dragoons under Capt. Andres Pico were camped at the indigenous village of San Pasqual, between Kearny and Stockton. Kearny decided to raid this Mexican encampment to capture fresh horses, and that night sent out a scouting party. This scouting party, however, caused a dog to bark at San Pasqual, putting Captain Pico's troops on the alert. Having been detected Kearny decided to go on the attack. In the ensuing battle 21 Americans were killed and many more were wounded by the long lances of the Mexican caballeros.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1847

In Brooklyn, a city renowned for its compassion –rather than pull the usual sack over a condemned person’s head before applying the hangman’s noose –officials experimented by first rendering the condemned unconscious through the use of sulfuric ether.³⁹⁸

HANGING

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1847

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
17/04	Catherine Foster	18	Bury St Edmunds	Murder of husband
30/07	Mary Ann Milner ^a		Lincoln Castle	Murder

a. She managed to hang herself in the waiting cell for the condemned, and subsequent to this a more careful watch would be instituted.

Clément Sanson was dismissed as the beheader of Frenchmen, and his assistant Louis Deibler took over this function.

HEADCHOPPING

398. Almost a century later, in our nation’s first experiment with cyanide gas for execution, we would attempt to administer the gas in the condemned man’s cell as he slept — and this attempt would fail.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Dr. Samuel Kneeland, Jr. received Harvard Medical College's Boylston Prize, of either $50 or a gold medal of that value at the recipient's option, for an essay "Hydrotherapy" in the American Journal of the Medical Sciences (Philadelphia, XIV, 75-108). He would spend two years in professional studies in Paris before beginning the practice of medicine in Boston. He published a translation of ANDRY'S DISEASES OF THE HEART. He would pass some time in Brazil, and also visit the Lake Superior copper region.

Doctor Oliver Wendell Holmes became Parkman Professor of Anatomy and Physiology at Harvard Medical College.³⁹⁹

Professor John White Webster succeeded in getting the $400 he had borrowed from Doctor George Parkman in 1842 brought forward into a loan of $2,432 funded by a syndicate of his Harvard College colleagues including Parkman. As security for this note he offered his collection of gemstones and geological specimens.

³⁹⁹. Dr. Holmes would hold this post for the next 40 years. He would become dean of the Harvard Medical School, a post he would hold until 1882.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

January 14, Wednesday: On the question of war taxes during the war on Mexico, William Wells Brown said that since the government would be taking the money by coercion, the individual taxpayer would not be blameworthy for the evil that would be done with the tax moneys. He would come to advocate that, if the government were to make a move to begin to conscript American blacks to fight in this war against Mexico, that seeing as how Mexico had outlawed slavery — that American blacks should, like the San Patricios, “fight against the United States.”

WAR ON MEXICO

Who were these “San Patricios”? — As Robert Ryal Miller’s SWORD AND SHAMROCK makes clear, many so-called San Patricios were Irish deserters from the US Army, most deserting because of ill treatment and from sympathy with the Mexicans as fellow Catholics. This would lead to some problems after the war in punishing the men. Those who had deserted from the army after declaration of the war upon Mexico would be hanged, but those who had deserted before the declaration of war would often merely be flogged and have their cheek branded with a “D.” (On the other hand, actually the bulk of the San Patricios were Mexican nationals, as this group included men of German, English, and Irish extraction who were living in Mexico.)

March/April: After much exchange of correspondence and much intercession by Horace Greeley, “Thomas Carlyle and his Works,” which had been submitted for paid publication before August 16, 1846,⁴⁰⁰ appeared as the leading article in Graham’s American Monthly Magazine 30, Issue #3, pages 145-52 and was completed in Issue #4, pages 238-245.⁴⁰¹

In the course of this essay Thoreau makes a critical remark about Sir Archibald Alison’s MODERN HISTORY OF EUROPE FROM THE FRENCH REVOLUTION TO THE FALL OF NAPOLEON:

One improvement we could suggest in this last, as indeed in most epics — that he should let in the sun oftener upon his picture. It does not often enough appear, but it is all revolution, the old way of human life turned simply bottom upward, so that when at length we are inadvertently reminded of the “Brest Shipping,” a St. Domingo colony, and that anybody thinks of owning plantations, and simply turning up the soil there, and that now at length, after some years of this revolution, there is a falling off in the importation of sugar, we feel a queer surprise. Had they not sweetened their water with revolution then? It would be well if there were several chapters headed “Work for the Month,” — Revolution-work inclusive, of course — “Altitude of the Sun,” “State of the Crops and Markets,” “Meteorological Observations,” “Attractive Industry,” “Day Labor,” etc., just to remind the reader that the French peasantry did something beside go without breeches, burn châteaux, get ready knotted cords, and embrace and throttle one another by turns. These things are sometimes hinted at, but they deserve a notice more in proportion to their importance. We want not only a background to the picture, but a ground under the feet also. We remark, too, occasionally, an unphilosophical

400. See early draft of this reference by Thoreau to hanging, written during Winter 1845-1846 before February 22d.

Thoreau would undertake much more correspondence before finally receiving payment from that magazine. In fact Thomas Carlyle would obtain a copy, in England, and would peruse it “with due entertainment and recognition,” before Thoreau would receive $50.⁰⁰ on May 17, 1848.

401. For the manner in which this gallows humor which had originated in the journal during the winter before February 22, 1846 would be inserted into the essay “Thomas Carlyle and His Works,” see:

GALLOWS HUMOR

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

habit, common enough elsewhere, in Alison's History of Modern Europe, for instance, of saying, undoubtedly with effect, that if a straw had not fallen this way or that, why then – but, of course, it is as easy in philosophy to make kingdoms rise and fall as straws.

READ THE FULL TEXT

"a ground under the feet also": This, like the previous knotted cords (garotte) and the previous throttling of one another by turns, is an obvious reference to hanging, since the important life support of which a hanging person has been deprived would be the ground underfoot.

April 17, Saturday: The governor of Massachusetts commuted the sentence of execution by hanging of Leander Thompson, to life in prison.

William Fallon and the Fourth Relief party reach the starvation camps in the High Sierras, finding only Louis Keseberg alive among the mutilated remains of his former companions.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

September 12, Sunday: Not all the refugees of the Irish Potato Famine had proved willing to put up with the constant abuse they encountered in the United States of America. Some of the recent immigrants who had needed to enlist as cannon fodder in the US Army in order to survive had decided to make common cause with the Mexicans after the US Army got into Mexico. The unit of the Mexican army that had been formed largely out of these “deserters” had become known as the “San Patricios” (St. Patrick’s) because their leader was an Irishman. Such volunteers had been specially hunted down by the US forces and on this day, simultaneous with the raising of the US flag above the captured castle nearby, the US Army hanged 30 of these prisoners of war.⁴⁰²

(In a ceremony on September 12, 1997, Mexico would honor these volunteers on the 150th anniversary of their execution.)

402. Contrary to myth, not all the prisoners of war hanged in a row by the US Army on this day were Irish. Also, this fails to qualify as the largest simultaneous execution in United States history, because on the day after Christmas in 1862 President Abraham Lincoln would have 38 native Americans simultaneously executed at a similar military ceremony in Mankato, Minnesota.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1848

In Boston, a white imbecile named Daniel H. Pierson who had murdered his wife and children was sentenced to be hanged.

COLDBLOODED MURDER

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1848

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
21/02	Harriet Parker	28	Newgate	Murder of daughter
14/08	Mary May	38	Chelmsford	Murder of brother

ESSENCES ARE FUZZY, GENERIC, CONCEPTUAL;
ARISTOTLE WAS RIGHT WHEN HE INSISTED THAT ALL TRUTH IS SPECIFIC AND PARTICULAR (AND WRONG WHEN HE CHARACTERIZED TRUTH AS A GENERALIZATION).

The 3d published history of Harvard College, by Samuel A. Eliot.

George Heywood, son of Concord's Dr. Abiel Heywood, graduated from Harvard.

The eminently successful debtor, Professor John White Webster, hit the Boston richie Robert Gould Shaw up for “a loan,” but Shaw evidently knew his man for his response was to offer to make this man a gift — of course an outright gift is something which a professional debtor is ever required to reject for it blows the essential cover story, that the professional debtor is actually a full-fledged participating member of society but needs a tiny temporary boost by his friends in order to get past some unexpected and unanticipatable difficulties. So Doctor Webster kept petitioning for a loan, and as part of this con job he made the mistake of mentioning that he could offer collateral — that as collateral for this new “loan” he could offer his wonderful collection of gemstones and geological specimens. Now, he actually couldn't, for this collection had already been designated as the collateral for the “loan” this Harvard professor had obtained in 1847 from a syndicate of his colleagues, a loan which he had of course not paid back. When Doctor George Parkman, one of the people from whom Professor Webster had already “borrowed” money, would find out about this new piece of double-dealing, it would be the straw that broke the camel’s back. He affected outright rage and began to harass and attempt to humiliate Professor Webster not only in front of his colleagues but also in front of his students, his wife and his daughters. There is much contemporary testimony to the very repetitive but very inventive, and very demeaning and very insulting remarks, which Dr. Parkman made about Professor Webster both to his face and behind his back. Clearly, Doctor Parkman, one of Boston’s delightful eccentrics with manifold personality problems, was playing the psychological game which as a slumlord he well knew how to play, the game which has aptly been titled “Now I’ve Got You, You Son Of A Bitch.”⁴⁰³

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

June 25, Sunday: In bloody street fighting, French government troops began to force the revolutionary workers from their strongholds. In Paris, Charles A. Dana arrived at the Gare St. Lazare railroad station at 5PM and made his way around blockades and guarded streets down the Champs-Élysées through the Place de la Concorde and across an unguarded bridge over the Seine to the Left Bank and into the eastern part of the municipality, just in time to witness the June Days fight and file a letter report with Horace Greeley of the Tribune. Unlike other reporters, Dana met and discoursed with actual socialists and dismissed the reports that they were demons as somewhat of an exaggeration. Greeley would find, however, that he could not appreciate his intrepid reporter’s observations. This simply wasn’t what he wanted to hear and wasn’t what he wanted the American public to be told. Dana would need to move on, eventually to become renowned as “Dana of the Sun.”

In Boston, the seaman Thomas Harding went on port liberty. At some point within the next few days he would visit and pay attention to a woman, Mary Ann Williams the wife of a seaman who was absent on a 2-year voyage, and he would present to her one silk handkerchief. As the Boston Post eventually would report, Mrs. Williams’s “invisible charms” were about to “cost Harding his life” — because, as it would turn out, there was another seaman not her husband, Washington Goode, a cook’s helper, who also was considering Mary Ann to be, during the lengthy absence of her husband, to be “his girl.” Does this sound deadly? Does this sound like a recipe for disaster? —Stay tuned.

NEVER READ AHEAD! TO APPRECIATE JUNE 25TH, 1848 AT ALL ONE MUST APPRECIATE IT AS A TODAY (THE FOLLOWING DAY, TOMORROW, IS BUT A PORTION OF THE UNREALIZED FUTURE AND IFFY AT BEST).

State Murder

“Stack of the Artist of Kouroo” Project

403. For elaboration of this, there’s only one place to start, and it is part two, titled “Death of a Harvard Man,” in:

■ Schama, Simon. DEAD CERTAINTIES (UNWARRANTED SPECULATIONS). New York: Knopf, 1991.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

June 28, Wednesday: There was a quarrel in Boston port between the two seamen Thomas Harding and Washington Goode in regard to a silk handkerchief Harding had given to Mary Ann Williams. Goode tore up the handkerchief in the presence of Harding.

On this day, also, the Dearborn Block in Federal Street in downtown Boston suddenly collapsed.

At a radical Whig meeting in Worcester protesting the nomination of General Zachary Taylor as the Whig candidate for President of the United States of America, Ebenezer Rockwood Hoar of Concord introduced the slogan "Free Soil, Free Speech, and Free Men" which would become the platform of the newly forming Republican Party before the Civil War, while Charles Sumner introduced the slogan "unhallowed union... between the lords of the lash and the lords of the loom":

[Sumner's Speech] Mr. President and Fellow-Citizens: —
At the close of a day crowded with exciting interest and full of best auguries, I feel that I can add little to what you have already heard. What can I say that shall enforce the great cause so successfully commended by my friend from Ohio [Mr. Giddings], and, lastly, by my friend [Mr. Adams] who has just spoken, with the voice of the American Revolution on his lips? One thing, at least, I can do: I can join them in renunciation of party relations, so plainly inconsistent with the support of Freedom. They have been Whigs; and I, too, have been a Whig, though "not an ultra Whig." I was a Whig because I thought this party represented the moral sentiments of the country, — that it was the party of Humanity. It has ceased to sustain this character. It represents no longer the moral sentiments of the country. It is not the party of Humanity. A party which renounces its sentiments must expect to be renounced. In the coming contest I wish it understood that I belong to the party of Freedom, — to that party which plants itself on the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States. The transactions in which we are now engaged recall an incident of French history. It was late in the night, at Versailles, that a courtier of Louis the Sixteenth, penetrating the bed-chamber of his master, and arousing him from slumber, communicated the intelligence, big with destiny, that the people of Paris, smarting under wrong and falsehood, had risen in their might, and, after a severe conflict with hireling troops, destroyed the Bastille. The unhappy monarch, turning upon his couch, said, "It is an insurrection." "No, Sire," answered the honest courtier, "it is a revolution." And such is our movement to-day. It is a Revolution, — not beginning with the destruction of a Bastille, but destined to end only with the overthrow of a tyranny differing little in hardship and audacity from that which sustained the Bastille of France, — I mean the Slave Power of our country. Do not start at this similitude. I intend no unkindness to slaveholders, many of whom are doubtless humane and honest. Such also was Louis the Sixteenth; and yet he sustained the Bastille, with the untold horrors of its dungeons, where human beings were thrust into companionship with toads and rats. By the Slave Power I understand that combination of persons, or, perhaps, of politicians, whose animating principle is the perpetuation and extension of Slavery, with the advancement of Slaveholders. That such a combination exists is apparent from our history. It shows itself in the mildest, and perhaps the least offensive form, in the undue proportion of offices held by Slaveholders under the National Constitution. It is still worse apparent in a succession of acts by which the National

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Government has been prostituted to Slavery. Mindful of the Missouri Compromise, with its sanction of Slavery, — mindful of the annexation of Texas, with its fraud and iniquity, — mindful also of the war against Mexico, in itself a great crime, where wives and sisters have been compelled to mourn sons, husbands, and brothers untimely slain, — as these things, dark, dismal, atrocious, rise before us, may we not brand their unquestionable source as a tyranny hateful as that which sustained the Bastille? The Slave Power is the criminal.

This combination is unknown to the Constitution; nay, it exists in defiance of that instrument, and of the recorded opinions uttered constantly by its founders. The Constitution was the crowning labor of the men who gave us the Declaration of Independence. It was established to perpetuate, in organic law, those rights which the Declaration had promulgated, and which the sword of Washington had secured. "We hold these truths to be self-evident: that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Such are the emphatic words which our country took upon its lips, as it first claimed its place among the nations of the earth. These were its baptismal vows. And the preamble of the Constitution renews them, when it declares its objects, among other things, to "establish justice, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." Mark: not to establish injustice, not to promote the welfare of a class, or of a few slaveholders, but the general welfare; not to foster the curse of slavery, but to secure the blessings of liberty. And the declared opinions of the fathers were all in harmony with these two charters. "I can only say," said Washington, "that there is not a man living who wishes more sincerely than I do to see a plan adopted for the abolition of slavery; but there is only one proper and effectual mode by which it can be accomplished, and that is by legislative authority; and this, as far as my suffrage will go, shall never be wanting."

^ Patrick Henry, while confessing that he was the master of slaves, said: "I will not, I cannot justify it. However culpable my conduct, I will so far pay my devoir to Virtue as to own the excellence and rectitude of her precepts, and lament my want of conformity to them. I believe a time will come, when an opportunity will be offered to abolish this lamentable evil." 1 And Franklin, as President of the earliest Abolition Society of the country, signed a petition to the first Congress, in which he declared himself "bound to use all justifiable endeavors to loosen the bands of slavery, and promote a general enjoyment of the blessings of freedom." ^ Thus the soldier, the orator, and the philosopher of the Revolution, all unite in homage to Freedom. Washington, wise in council and in battle, Patrick Henry, with tongue of flame, Franklin, with heaven-descended sagacity and humanity, all bear testimony to the times in which they lived, and the institutions they helped to establish.

It is plain that our Constitution was formed by lovers of Human Freedom, — that it was animated by their divine spirit, — that Slavery was regarded by them with aversion, so that, if covertly alluded to, it was not named in the instrument, — and that they all looked forward to an early day when this evil and shame would be obliterated from the land. Surely, then, it is right to say that the combination which seeks to perpetuate and extend

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Slavery is unknown to the Constitution, — that it exists in defiance of that instrument, and also of the recorded opinions uttered constantly by its founders.

Time would fail me to dwell on the perpetual influence, growing with time, which the Slave Power has exerted from the foundation of the government. In the earlier periods of our history it was moderate and reserved. The spirit of the founders still prevailed. But with the advance of years, and as these early champions passed from the scene, it became more audacious, aggressive, and tyrannical, till at last it obtained the control of the government, and caused it to be administered, not in the spirit of Freedom, but in the spirit of Slavery. Yes! the government of the United States is now (let it be said with shame), not, as at the beginning, a government merely permitting, while it regretted Slavery, but a government openly favoring and vindicating it, visiting also with its displeasure all who oppose it.

During late years the Slave Power has introduced a new test for office, which would have excluded Washington, Jefferson, and Franklin. It applies an arrogant and unrelenting ostracism to all who express themselves against Slavery. And now, in the madness of tyranny, it proposes to extend this curse over new soil not yet darkened by its presence. It seeks to make the flag of our country the carrier of Slavery into distant lands, — to scale the mountain fastnesses of Oregon, and descend with its prey upon the shores of the Pacific, — to cross the Rio Grande, and there, in broad territories, recently wrested from Mexico by robber hands, to plant a shameful institution which that republic has expressly abolished.

In the prosecution of its purposes, the Slave Power has obtained the control of both the great political parties. Their recent nominations were made to serve its interests, to secure its supremacy, and especially to promote the extension of Slavery. Whigs and Democrats, — I use the old names still, — professing to represent conflicting sentiments, concur in being representatives of the Slave Power. General Cass, after openly registering his adhesion to it, was recognized as the candidate of the Democrats. General Taylor, who owns slaves on a large scale, though observing a studious silence on Slavery, as on all other things, is not only a representative of the Slave Power, but an important constituent part of the Power itself.

I will not dwell upon the manner in which General Taylor was forced upon the late Whig party. This has been amply done by others. But you will pardon me, if I allude to the aid his nomination derived from a quarter of the country where it should have encountered inexorable opposition, — I refer to New England, and especially to Massachusetts. I speak only what is now too notorious, when I say that it was the secret influence which went forth from among ourselves that contributed powerfully to this consummation. Yes! it was brought about by an unhallowed union — conspiracy let it be called — between two remote sections: between the politicians of the Southwest and the politicians of the Northeast, — between the cotton-planters and fleshmongers of Louisiana and Mississippi and the cottonspinners and traffickers of New England, — between the lords of the lash and the lords of the loom.

And now the question occurs. What is the true line of duty with regard to these two candidates? Mr. Van Buren — and I honor him for his trumpet call to the North – sounded the true note, when he said he could not vote for either. Though nominated by opposite parties, they represent substantially the same interest. The election of either would be a triumph of the Slave Power, entailing upon the country the sin of extending Slavery. How, then, shall they be encountered? To my mind the way is plain. The lovers of Freedom, from both parties, and irrespective of aU party associations, must unite, and by a new combination, congenial to the Constitution, oppose both candidates. This win be the FREEDOM POWER, whose single object will be to resist the SLAVE POWER. We will put them face to face, and let them grapple. Who can doubt the result?

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

I hear the old political saw, that “we must take the least of two evils.” My friend from Ohio [Mr. Giddings] has already riddled this excuse, so that I might well leave it untouched; but I cannot forbear a brief observation. It is admitted, then, that Cass and Taylor both are evils. For myself, if two evils are presented to me, I will take neither. There are occasions of political difference, I admit, when it may become expedient to vote for a candidate who does not completely represent our sentiments. There are matters legitimately within the range of expediency and compromise. The Tariff and the Currency are of this character. If a candidate differs from me on these more or less, I may yet vote for him. But the question before the country is of another character. This will not admit of compromise. It is not within the domain of expediency. To be wrong on this is to be wholly wrong. It is not merely expedient for us to defend Freedom, when assailed, but our duty so to do, unreservedly, and careless of consequences. Who in this assembly would help to fasten a fetter upon Oregon or Mexico? Who that would not oppose every effort to do this thing? Nobody. Who is there, then, that can vote for either Taylor or Cass?

But it is said that we shall throw away our votes, and that our opposition will fail. Fail, Sir! No honest, earnest effort in a good cause can fail. It may not be crowned with the applause of men; it may not seem to touch the goal of immediate worldly success, which is the end and aim of so much in life. But it is not lost. It helps to strengthen the weak with new virtue, – to arm the irresolute with proper energy, – to animate all with devotion to duty, which in the end conquers all. Fail! Did the martyrs fail, when with precious blood they sowed the seed of the Church? Did the discomfited champions of Freedom fail, who have left those names in history that can never die? Did the three hundred Spartans fail, when, in the narrow pass, they did not fear to brave the innumerable Persian hosts, whose very arrows darkened the sun? Overborne by numbers, crushed to earth, they left an example greater far than any victory. And this is the least we can do. Our example will be the main-spring of triumph hereafter. It will not be the first time in history that the hosts of Slavery have outnumbered the champions of Freedom. But where is it written that Slavery finally prevailed?

Assurances here to-day show that we need not postpone success. It seems already at hand. The heart of Ohio beats responsive to the heart of Massachusetts, and all the Free States are animated with the vigorous breath of Freedom. Let us not waste time in vain speculations between two candidates. Both are bad. Both represent a principle we cannot sanction.

Whatever may be said to the contrary by politicians. Freedom is the only question now before the American people. The Bank is not alone an "obsolete idea."

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

All the ideas put forward in the controversies of party are now practically obsolete. Peace has come to remove the question of the Mexican "War. We are no longer obliged to consider if an unnecessary and unconstitutional war shall be maintained by supplies. There is no question with regard to the Sub-Treasury. This is now firmly established. Then comes the cause of Internal Improvements. This is not unimportant, but happily it is removed from the domain of party. The Chicago Convention for the express consideration of this subject was composed of various political opinions, and I understand that its recommendations are now sustained by opposite parties.

Of the past issues, that of the Tariff excites the most interest. This, it will be remembered, did not find a place in the early history of the country. Only in recent times has it occupied the attention of politicians, and been the occasion of vehement popular appeals. Regret is often expressed that it is the subject of party strife. It will be in the recollection of most persons that Mr. "Webster made a vigorous effort to remove it from the list of party questions. "What he was unable to do directly has been accomplished indirectly by the Mexican "War. The debt of millions now entailed upon the country renders it necessary to impose a tariff which will satisfy the demands of all. Of course the debt must be paid; nor should we lose time in paying it, nor postpone it to the next generation. The people are not ready to meet it by direct taxation, — though, for one, I should be well pleased to see such a corrective applied to war. It can be paid only through the agency of a tariff, which, for this purpose, if for no other, must be supported by all parties. The Tariff, then, like the others, is no longer a political issue. If not obsolete, it is at least in abeyance. These questions being out of the way, what remains for those who, in casting their votes, regard principles rather than men? It is clear that the only question of present practical interest arises from the usurpations of the Slave Power and the efforts to extend Slavery. This is the vital question at this time. It is the question of questions. It was lately said in the Convention of the New York Democracy at Utica (and I am glad to quote that most respectable body of men), that the movement in which we are now engaged is the most important since the American Revolution. Something more may be said. It is a continuance of the American devolution. It is an effort to carry into effect the principles of the Declaration of Independence, and to revive in the administration of our government the spirit of Washington, Franklin, and Jefferson, — to bring back the Constitution to the principles and practice of its early founders, — to the end that it shall promote Freedom, and not Slavery, and shall be administered in harmony with the spirit of Freedom, and not with the spirit of Slavery.

In the last will and testament of "Washington are emphatic words, which may be adopted as the motto for the present contest. After providing for the emancipation of his slaves, to take place on the death of his wife, he says, "And I do hereby expressly forbid the sale or transportation out of the said Commonwealth of any slave I may die possessed of, under any pretence whatsoever." So, at least, should the people of the United States expressly forbid the sale or transportation of any slave beyond their ancient borders, under any pretence whatsoever.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Returning to our forefathers for their principles, let us borrow also something of their courage and union. Let us summon to our sides the majestic forms of those civil heroes whose firmness in council was equalled only by the firmness of Washington in war. Let us again awake to the eloquence of the elder Adams, animating his associates in Congress to independence; let us listen anew to the sententious wisdom of Franklin; let us be enkindled, as were the men of other days, by the fervid devotion to Freedom which flamed from the heart of Jefferson.

Instructed even by our enemies, let us be taught by the Slave Power itself. The few slaveholders are always united. Hence their strength. Like sticks in a fagot, they cannot be broken. Thus far the friends of Freedom have been divided. Union, then, must be our watchword, — union among men of all parties. By such union we consolidate an opposition which must prevail.

Let me call upon you, then, men of all parties, Whigs and Democrats, or howsoever named, to come forward and join in a common cause. Let us all leave the old organizations, and come together. In the crisis before us, it becomes us to forget past differences, and those names which have been the signal of strife. Only remembering our duties, when the fire-bell rings at midnight, we ask not if it be Whigs or Democrats who join us to extinguish the flames; nor do we make any such inquiry in selecting our leader then. To the strongest arm and the most generous soul we defer at once. To him we commit the direction of the engine. His hand grasps the pipe to pour the water upon the raging conflagration. So must we do now. Our leader must be the man who is the ablest and surest representative of the principles to which we are pledged.

Let Massachusetts, nurse of the men and principles that made our earliest revolution, vow herself anew to her early faith. Let her once more elevate the torch which she first held aloft, or, if need be, pluck fresh coals from the living altars of France, proclaiming, "Liberty, Equality, Fraternity," — Liberty to the captive. Equality between master and slave, Fraternity with all men, — the whole comprehended in that sublime revelation of Christianity, the Brotherhood of Man.

In the contemplation of these great interests, the intrigues of party, the machinations of politicians, the combinations of office-seekers, all seem to pass from sight. Politics and morals, no longer divorced from each other, become one and inseparable in the holy wedlock of Christian sentiment. Such a union elevates politics, while it gives a new sphere to morals. Political discussions have a grandeur which they never before assumed. Released from topics which concern only the selfish squabble for gain, and are often independent of morals, they come home to the heart and conscience. A novel force passes into the contests of party, breathing into them the breath of a new life, — of Hope, Progress, Justice, Humanity.

From this demonstration to-day, and the acclaim wafted to us from the Free States, it is easy to see that the great cause of Liberty, to which we now dedicate ourselves, will sweep the heart-strings of the people. It will smite all the chords with a might to draw forth emotions such as no political struggle ever awakened before. It will move the young, the middle-aged, and the old. It will find a voice in the social circle, and mingle with the flame of the domestic hearth. It will touch the souls of mothers, wives, sisters, and daughters, until the sympathies of aU swell in one irresistible chorus of indignation against the deep damnation of lending new sanction to the enslavement of our brother man.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Come forward, then, men of all parties! let us range together. Come forth, all who thus far have kept aloof from parties! here is occasion for action. Men of Peace, come forth! All who in any way feel the wrong of Slavery, take your stand! Join us, lovers of Truth, of Justice, of Humanity! And let me call especially upon the young. You are the natural guardians of Freedom. In your firm resolves and generous souls she will find her surest protection. The young man who is not willing to serve in her cause, to suffer, if need be, in her behalf, gives little promise of those qualities which secure an honorable age.

“NARRATIVE HISTORY” AMOUNTS TO FABULATION, THE REAL STUFF BEING MERE CHRONOLOGY

June 29, Thursday: A notice of MURDER appeared in the Boston Daily Bee:

MURDER. At 11 o'clock last evening, in Richmond Street, a colored man was knocked down and stabbed in three places, in consequence of which he died immediately. The murderer, also a negro, was arrested in Southack Street at 3 o'clock this morning.

(Any trial would of course be a mere formality, since as we can see from the above press announcement, the white people already knew perfectly well that there had been a murder, and were perfectly well satisfied that they had already captured the person who had committed it.)

The German National Assembly created the post of Imperial Vice-Regent, and named Grand Duke Johann of Austria to the post.

Hector Berlioz's 2d London concert established his reputation with the London press. His orientale La captive for soprano and orchestra to words of Hugo was performed for the initial time, at this concert.

NOBODY COULD GUESS WHAT WOULD HAPPEN NEXT

State Murder

“Stack of the Artist of Kouroo” Project

State Murder

“Stack of the Artist of Kouroo” Project

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

July 3, Monday: Giuseppe Garibaldi offers his sword to King Carlo Alberto of Sardinia. The King refuses his help, fearing his radical views.

In the Danish West Indies (now the Virgin Islands), Governor General Peter von Scholten read out an Emancipation Proclamation.

Washington Goode, seaman, was indicted at 2 Richmond Street in Boston for the murder of Thomas Harding. There was excellent circumstantial evidence such as that one of the stab wounds on Harding's body was nine inches deep — and Goode, who had served under General Zachary Taylor through all the Florida War, had been captured with a knife in his possession the blade of which measured some ten or eleven inches!⁴⁰⁴

404. What damning evidence this would have been, if it could have been demonstrated that Goode's knife was the only one in the world with a blade longer than nine inches! —However, in all likelihood Garibaldi's sword also had a blade longer than nine inches.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1849

Jean-François Heindreicht succeeded Charles Andre Ferey as a beheader of Frenchmen.

HEADCHOPPING

June 19, Tuesday: Concord's courthouse was torched by a man who had been caught selling liquor without a license.

In the conflagration not only the courthouse (and its exhibit of the gallows upon which the convicted burglar Samuel Smith had been hung) was consumed, but also the nearby dwelling-house and stable of John Shepard Keyes.⁴⁰⁵

Returning from the Legislature and Cambridge to the law and Concord, I got ready for June Court and it was well underway, when an alarm of fire broke on the stillness of midnight. Our room in the ell was undergoing repairs and we were sleeping in the front chamber with the windows open, and the first cry of Fire Fire Court House on Fire, took me out of bed and down stairs seizing my pail of water I rushed out doors and not scaling the fence easily went to the front door of the Court House unlocked and opened it but the smoke was too thick to get far inside. Mother who had gone to the pump for water stepped out with her pail to the back door where the fire was kindled and blazing up and where if we had met we might have put it out. As it was we both returned to the house and began preparations to move our things out. The engines came but too late to do anything except

405. This Concord courthouse became the place of public display of the gallows upon which a local house burglar, Samuel Smith, was hung at the end of 1799 — until with this macabre and tasteless display of judicial power it was consumed in the flames of an arsonist in 1849. Here, since we do not have an image of the apparatus upon which the house burglar had been hanged, as a substitute macabre and tasteless display, is an image of the chair that Massachusetts used for its final electrocutions, at Charlestown in 1947, producing the deaths of Edward Gertson and Philip Bellino. The chair is not on display (tastes about this sort of think have obviously changed somewhat), but a photo was taken of it in a storage room at the state prison in Walpole in 1974.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

save other buildings. The neighbours rushed in and began clearing our house. I sent the baby Annie to the Goodnows, and locking our parlor door & telling Martha to sit there and keep every one out till I came, rallied a squad of the company boys and with their aid safely removed every article of our parlor furniture beyond the fires reach, without a scratch or mark except a nick in the marble top of the centre table. By this time the flames had mounted to the cupola of the Court House and made a splendid show. This two story lantern with its 16 large windows blazed fiercely the gilt eagle on top shone, scorched & quivering and fell with the crash of the roof to the ground At this critical time the water gave out, the engines had to be moved to the brook for a supply and our house caught from the intense heat of the fire and was burned up completely- Every thing of consequence was saved except our school books and some clothing in a forgotten closet, and the morning dawned hot and dry on a scene of desolation and ashes, with all our possessions lining the road & common Some amusing incidents were connected with the fire, Judge Hoar black and grimy with smoke heard our pig squealing in the barn cellar then in flames with lighted hay dropping, and going to its rescue, got an addition of dirt and manure lifting it in his arms over the wall, I never have forgotten the scene as I came to his help, and poor piggy freed with some burns ran wildly to Capt Barretts on the hill before he stopped as if knowing there was a friendly home. Old Nealy a big fat course lubberly fellow searching in the cellar for drinkables & finding in his thirst an earthen pitcher filled put it to his mouth and taking a long drink sputtered out 'Soft Soape By Gad' that made a shout of laughter from all who saw it, and this [word undeciphered] of soap and the cordwood were the only matters the insurance co disputed. The question of whether they were provisions was left out to Judge Hoar who after argument recommended 'splitting the difference' and both parties acquiesced. We took up our quarters at Emiline Barretts boarding house next door. Mother soon went to Waltham, Joe was at Cambridge and George in Boston, and we sweltered through that summer in a hot close chamber with our clothes in Shattucks store then given up from business by Henry who had run it out, our furniture in my office building and wherever else we could find a place for it. It was a sudden lively and entire change, and a new and strange experience to us. On the whole we fared more comfortably than we expected, and I do not recall any long absences from Concord that season by it. It changed my real estate operations materially I had taken in the division of Fathers property the office lot and the garden lot as my share of the real estate, and had planned a stone cottage on the garden site some year or two before.

J.S. KEYES AUTOBIOGRAPHY

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

In 1840 John Warner Barber had published a woodcut of Concord, engraved by the J. Downes of Worcester whom Henry Thoreau knew, in which you can see what that old wooden courthouse had looked like prior to this fire (on the left below), as well as what the old wooden Middlesex Hotel looked like with its sign and emblem:

IT IS NO COINCIDENCE THAT IT IS MORTALS WHO CONSUME OUR HISTORICAL ACCOUNTS, FOR WHAT WE ARE ATTEMPTING TO DO IS EVADE THE RESTRICTIONS OF THE HUMAN LIFESPAN. (IMMORTALS, WITH NOTHING TO LIVE FOR, TAKE NO HEED OF OUR STORIES.)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

In “Main-Street” in this year, Nathaniel Hawthorne offered something true:

“Let us thank God for having given us such ancestors;
and let each successive generation thank him, not less fervently, for being one step further from them in the march of ages.”

Charles Dickens’s semi-autobiographical DAVID COPPERFIELD began in monthly parts during May and would continue through November 1850:

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

He wrote letters to the Times of London during November, protesting public hangings. He wrote THE LIFE OF OUR LORD written for his children (this would lie unpublished until 1934). Toward the end of the year he began thinking again of putting out a weekly miscellany.

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

Readers of the next year's THE SCARLET LETTER will recognize a reference made by Hawthorne to "Wapping" as a reference to the wharf area of London which Dickens used as the setting for the final act of Martha Endell the soiled dove, committing herself to the garbage-laden Thames.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

THE SCARLET LETTER: Furthermore, on the left hand as you enter the front door, is a certain room or office, about fifteen feet square, and of a lofty height, with two of its arched windows commanding a view of the aforesaid dilapidated wharf, and the third looking across a narrow lane, and along a portion of Derby Street. All three give glimpses of the shops of grocers, block-makers, slop-sellers, and ship-chandlers, around the doors of which are generally to be seen, laughing and gossiping, clusters of old salts, and such other wharf-rats as haunt the Wapping of a seaport. The room itself is cobwebbed, and dingy with old paint; its floor is strewn with grey sand, in a fashion that has elsewhere fallen into long disuse; and it is easy to conclude, from the general slovenliness of the place, that this is a sanctuary into which womankind, with her tools of magic, the broom and mop, has very infrequent access. In the way of furniture, there is a stove with a voluminous funnel; an old pine desk with a three-legged stool beside it; two or three wooden-bottom chairs, exceedingly decrepit and infirm; and - not to forget the library - on some shelves, a score or two of volumes of the Acts of Congress, and a bulky Digest of the Revenue laws. A tin pipe ascends through the ceiling, and forms a medium of vocal communication with other parts of the edifice. And here, some six months ago - pacing from corner to corner, or lounging on the long-legged stool, with his elbow on the desk, and his eyes wandering up and down the columns of the morning newspaper - you might have recognised, honoured reader, the same individual who welcomed you into his cheery little study, where the sunshine glimmered so pleasantly through the willow branches on the western side of the Old Manse. But now, should you go thither to seek him, you would inquire in vain for the Locofoco Surveyor. The besom of reform hath swept him out of office, and a worthier successor wears his dignity and pockets his emoluments.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Readers of LITTLE WOMEN will recognize a reference by Louisa May Alcott to a “Mrs. Gummidge,” likewise, as a deferral to the overwhelming popularity of this overwhelmingly popular English novelization, “It’s a fast age, and I don’t know what we are coming to, ma’am. You are a mere infant, but you’ll go next, Jo, and we’ll be left lamenting,” said Laurie, shaking his head over the degeneracy of the times.

“Don’t be alarmed. I’m not one of the agreeable sort. Nobody will want me, and it’s a mercy, for there should always be one old maid in a family.”

“You won’t give any one a chance,” said Laurie, with a sidelong glance and a little more color than before in his sunburned face. “You won’t show the soft side of your character, and if a fellow gets a peep at it by accident and can’t help showing that he likes it, you treat him as Mrs. Gummidge did her sweetheart, throw cold water over him, and get so thorny no one dares touch or look at you.”

and a reference as well to Nurse Peggotty:

“As one of the children is older than yourself, you needn’t talk so like a grandma. I flatter myself I’m a ‘gentleman growed’ as Peggotty said of David, and when you see Amy, you’ll find her rather a precocious infant,” said Laurie, looking amused at her maternal air.

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1849

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
21/03	Jane Scully		Roscommon	Murder
20/04	Sarah Thomas	17	Bristol	Murder
09/08	Mary Ball	31	Coventry	Murder of husband
11/08	Catherine Dillon		Limerick	Murder
21/08	Mary Ann Geering	49	Lewes	Murder of husband
23/08	Rebecca Smith		Devizes	Murder of child
13/11	Maria Manning	28	Horsemonger Lane	Murder (hanged with her husband)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Not just every lady in Amherst was locking herself in her room, because in this year Louise “Shirley” Clappe of Amherst, Massachusetts went off to California with her husband, Dr. Fayette Clappe, to provide medical care to the miners at Rich Bar on the Feather River:

In the short space of twenty-four days, we have had murders, fearful accidents, bloody deaths, a mob, whippings, a hanging, an attempt at suicide, and a fatal duel.

“... and a fatal duel” — For a period in California dueling would be a major source of public entertainment and private grief.⁴⁰⁶ Dueling was regional, like the chewing of tobacco; it was associated with the South. However, an interesting exception is the association of dueling with the gold rush in California, because Southerners there played a dominant role. Although only 17% of the white population of California in 1850 had been born in a slave state, and although this might seem a relatively small %age of the population, among all the Northern states and territories this was second only to the Oregon Territory.⁴⁰⁷

“Charley” Parkhurst went to California and got a job driving for the California Stage Lines. At some point she would lose an eye after being kicked by one of her horses.

406. Secrest, William B. BLOOD AND HONOR (Fresno CA: Saga-West Publishing Company, 1970, pages 3ff)

407. REPORT OF THE SUPERINTENDENT OF THE CENSUS FOR DECEMBER 1, 1852 (Washington: Robert Armstrong, 1853, pages 16-19)

WHAT?

INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Early January: Early in this month, the trial of seaman Washington Goode began. Since this was a capital case, it was held before the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts. Since this was Massachusetts in the first half of the 19th Century, all twelve members of the jury were, of course, men and all twelve were, of course, white men. The murderer (we already knew he was the murderer, from reading the Boston newspapers) didn't have nearly as much money as O.J. Simpson — and so he came to be represented by an attorney, William Aspinwall, who had not previously defended any capital case. Aspinwall was assisted by Edward F. Hodges. After two days of testimony the Courier reported a general impression that the prisoner was going to be convicted because the evidence—though admittedly circumstantial—appeared to the white newsmen to be “very strong.” For instance, a witness had testified that from 50 feet away on that dark and stormy night, despite having been unable to obtain “any distinct view of his features,” by the technique “judging by his clothes” (dark pants, striped jacket), reported that they had a “strong belief” that it must in fact have been Goode whom they had seen running, after having heard a noise — that they supposed might well have been made by some sort of blow.⁴⁰⁸ The prosecutor, Samuel D. Parker, had pointed out the interesting parallels between this case and the play “Othello.” One of the interesting parallels which the prosecutor had noted was the involvement of a handkerchief. Hey, just like Shakespeare! Another of the interesting parallels pointed out by the prosecutor was the fact that this “Othello” character had been, like this murderer, a black man. (What more evidence might anyone demand?) District Attorney Parker orated:

There may have been some slight jealousy about a woman, but only on the prisoner's part; and in this case a mere trifle, a little paltry thing called a handkerchief, as also in the case of a much more celebrated colored man, the far-famed Othello, of Shakespeare, was the cause of a foul murder.

DA Parker quoted, from Shakespeare's play, a passage shortly prior to the murder of Desdemona:

By heaven I saw my handkerchief in his hand.
O perjured woman! thou dost stone my heart,
And mak'st me call what I intend to do
A murder, which I thought a sacrifice.
I saw the handkerchief.

408. We know that the jacket the assailant was wearing was striped, but apparently they did not interrogate the witness as to what color the stripes were, or how wide they were, or whether they ran vertically, diagonally, or horizontally. We therefore do not know whether the “striped jacket” which the suspect was wearing when he was captured actually was a match with this previously observed “striped jacket,” in the color of its stripes, or in the direction in which its stripes ran, or in the breadth of its stripes. We may presume that dark pants were not unusual attire but we are forced to presume, to preserve the honor of the justice system, that striped jackets must have been at that time in that locale a great rarity, so great a rarity indeed that in a municipality the size of Boston on a given night no more than one person could have been wearing such attire. Such lack of judicial interest in relevant details now seems outrageous. Also, after the trial another Boston bystander would come forward, and informed the public that he had seen the fatal blow — but had that night been of the impression that the assailant was a white man.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

January 4. Thursday: The Boston Daily Evening Traveller summarized the trial of the prisoner Washington Goode by saying that “though we believe no one now actually living” (an interesting phrase) “saw him strike the blow,” court testimony had made it very likely that they had found the right man — for instance, the blade of Goode’s knife had been demonstrated to be longer than the depth of the puncture wound. Also, from across the street on a dark and stormy night, a witness had observed the clothing worn by the attacker to resemble the clothing of the accused.⁴⁰⁹ At the conclusion of this dramatic “trial,” Chief Justice Lemuel Shaw put a good face on things by delivering a 3-hour speech to the 12 white⁴¹⁰ men of the jury of the defendant’s peers, and then this jury of the defendant’s peers put a good face on things by staying out for a full 35 minutes before bringing back the necessary verdict, that the black defendant was guilty as charged.

COLDBLOODED MURDER

409. The case of Professor John White Webster a few years later would be said to be a precedent-setting case for the finding of guilt on the basis of evidence that was exclusively circumstantial, but I have difficulty with that conceit because I simply cannot locate in this Washington Goode case any evidence that was other than of a circumstantial nature. It seems to me that the difference between the Washington Goode case and the John White Webster case was not at all any significant difference in the nature of the evidence, but merely an enormous difference in the social standing of the accused individual!

410. We can know with certitude that they were white not only because contemporary records say that they were white but also because we have a record that once during this period a black man had appeared in a Boston courtroom in response to a jury summons issued in his name — and the court had simply told him to go away, that of course there must have been some mistake!

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

January 15, Monday: In downtown Boston—where everything that happens of course happens for the greater glory of God— Chief Justice Lemuel Shaw lectured Washington Goode for an hour and a half on the habits of “intemperance” which he had had, the “ungodly” associates which he had had, the “dens of crime” which he had frequented, etc., informed him that having led such a life there was simply “no hope” that the governor of the state might reduce his sentence. The lecture probably was just what Seaman Goode needed. The judge then consigned him to be hanged by the neck, on May 25, Friday, 1849 (this seems to have been a traditional day upon which to conduct public hangings), until he was dead.⁴¹¹ The opponents of the death penalty, to wit, the Standing Committee of the Massachusetts Society for the Abolition of Capital Punishment, would have a little more than four months to mobilize public opinion to bring pressure to bear on Governor George Nixon Briggs:

Why Sir, even the boys, and they are worth saving, for we have nothing else to make men, and even Governors of, are now saying in our streets, “it is only a nigger.”

During those four months 24,440 signatures would be collected, petitioning the Governor Briggs to commute Seaman Goode’s sentence, from death by hanging to life in prison without any possibility of parole.

For instance, Friend Joseph Ricketson, Friend Daniel Ricketson’s brother who, if I mistake not, was a birthright Quaker in good standing with his Monthly Meeting, reported that:

I have exerted myself very much for the last month in behalf of Washington Goode; there were several petitions here and we obtained 746 signatures.

In addition to the 24,440 signatures mentioned, there was one petition, from Woburn, Massachusetts, bearing a total of nine signatures, which demanded that Governor Briggs remain steadfast in the plan of “exicution.”

An article would appear in the Boston Republican, pointing up the fact that in France the guillotine had been adopted, after consultation with medical men, as the least painful mode of execution, and that since the last hanging in Boston, “the Ether discovery has taken place.”

The question now arises, how shall the hanging be performed here in Boston.... Shall not the convict share also the advantage of this benign discovery? He is to be hanged by the neck. Shall not this be done with the least possible pain? If we follow the spirit of the law, there would seem to be no doubt that it must be done with the least possible pain. And it seems equally clear that it is within the discretion of the Sheriff, to permit any form of alleviating the pain, which is consistent with the one thing imposed upon him by the law; namely, the hanging of Goode, by the neck, until he is dead. We will not undertake to determine, whether Humanity does not require, that the convict, if he chooses, shall be allowed the benefit of ETHER. We content ourselves with saying that it is clearly within the discretion of the Sheriff to permit the pains of the convict to be thus alleviated.

411. In fact, Boston had not hanged anyone for simple homicide since 1826, almost a quarter of a century before, and there was another prisoner, Augustus Dutée, whose sentence to be hanged was being commuted during this period to life in prison — but then, we may presume that Augustus Dutée was a white man, not only because his sentence was commuted but also because the documents do not comment on his race as they would most assuredly have commented had he been anything other than white. In addition to Dutée, seven other murderers were then serving life in Massachusetts prison after having had their sentences to be hanged commuted by the state governor.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

The petition to commute the sentence of seaman Goode to life in prison without opportunity for parole that was being circulated and sponsored in Concord (either by Anna Maria Whiting, one of the town's leading abolitionists, or by Caroline Hoar, the wife of Rockwood Hoar) is still in existence and bears, on the men's side of the sheet, the signature of Henry Thoreau as second in that column. It bears, on the women's side of the sheet, the signature of his younger sister, Sophia Elizabeth Thoreau, as 5th in that column, followed in immediate succession by the signature of his mother, Cynthia Dunbar Thoreau, the signature of his elder sister, Helen Louisa Thoreau, the signature of his aunt Louisa Dunbar, and the signature of his Aunt Jane Thoreau. The signature of his father John Thoreau, Sr., however, appears nowhere on this petition. Why not? Thoreau's father was 62 years old at this point and still very actively engaged in his home business. Is one to suppose that he, quite alone in his home, wanted Seaman Goode to dance on air?

DUNBAR FAMILY

The full text of that petition, as it came to be circulated in the Prisoner's Friend, had been as follows:

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

WE, THE UNDERSIGNED, solemnly protest against the intended execution of Washington Goode, as a crime in which we would under no circumstances participate, which we would prevent, if possible, and in the guilt of which we will not, by the seeming assent of silence, suffer ourselves to be implicated.

We believe the execution of this man will involve all who are instrumental in it in the crime of murder – of the murder in cold blood of a helpless fellow being.

The arguments by which executions are generally defended are wholly wanted here. The prisoner is not one who in spite of good instruction and example, for purposes of avarice, revenge or lust, deliberately planned the murder of a fellow-being. The intended victim of law was a man of misfortune from birth, made by his social position, and still more by the color which God gave him, the victim of neglect, of oppression, of prejudice, of all the evils inflicted upon humanity by man. If in a paroxysm of drunken rage, he killed his opponent, (and this is the utmost alleged against him,) his case comes far short of premeditated murder.

But even this fact is extremely doubtful. It is supported only by the most suspicious testimony, and such as would not have weighed with any jury to touch the life of a white man. And since the trial, facts have come to light materially lessening the credibility of the evidence which led to conviction.

The glaring unfairness of his mode of trial is of itself sufficient ground for this protest. The maxim which gives to the accused a trial by his peers was essentially violated. In a community where sympathy with a colored man is a rare and unpopular sentiment, the prisoner should have been tried by a jury composed partly, at least, of his own race. This violation of the principles of equal justice demands our solemn protest.

We claim also that the petition of more than 20,000 of our fellow-citizens to have this man's life spared, demands respect. Such a number of voluntary petitioners, all upon one side, indicates the will of the sovereign people of the State, that the penalty should be commuted. Our respect for the right of the people to a voice and a just influence in the administration of public justice, also demands this solemn protest against the legal murder of Washington Goode.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

NO-ONE'S LIFE IS EVER NOT DRIVEN PRIMARILY BY HAPPENSTANCE

January 29, Monday: The governor of Massachusetts, George Nixon Briggs, commuted the sentence of execution by hanging of George Hunnewell, for having set fire to his home in Cambridge resulting in the death of his brother, to life in prison. Gosh, it makes you wonder — you don't suppose, maybe, that George Hunnewell was a white man?⁴¹²

The Boston Post, noting that the state governor had a quite unlimited power of pardon, would raise an obvious question after the execution of the black seaman Washington Goode:

We have always had doubts of the guilt of the culprit. Facts will come out, and then will the community see who was right and who was wrong. But guilty or innocent, what necessity was there for this execution? ... Here was an individual on the last night determined to take his own life. The State stepping in and contending with him who should take it! But we have said sufficient for the present. Petitions have been sent in, meetings have been held, remonstrances have been made. Concord, by the influence of one female, sent in four hundred names. Norton sent in several. But all had no weight with the Governor and his Council. The deed is done. The body now lies cold and quiet in its final resting place. Instead of "Died," we would have had "murdered" May 25th. It was a murder, a cool, deliberate

State Murder

"Stack of the Artist of Kouroo" Project

412. Well gosh, yeah, he must have been a white man — for in this case life only meant 20 years, and on the occasion of Fast Day, April 7, 1869 he would be allowed to exit the Massachusetts State Prison in Charlestown as a free citizen.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

murder. No other term will answer. ... He has the pardoning power. Why did he not exercise it? Why save Dutee and Wolf and York, and then hang Goode? These are serious questions. But we have done. We close by saying, from a repetition of such scenes, God save the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

February 16, Friday: Governor George Nixon Briggs of Massachusetts commuted the sentence of execution by hanging of Augustus Dutee –a French Canadian who had shot his paramour Ellen Oakes to death after she rejected his offer of marriage– to life in prison.

The Boston Post, noting that the state governor had a quite unlimited power of pardon, would raise an obvious question after the execution of the black seaman Washington Goode:

We have always had doubts of the guilt of the culprit. Facts will come out, and then will the community see who was right and who was wrong. But guilty or innocent, what necessity was there for this execution? ... Here was an individual on the last night determined to take his own life. The State stepping in and contending with him who should take it! But we have said sufficient for the present. Petitions have been sent in, meetings have been held, remonstrances have been made. Concord, by the influence of one female, sent in four hundred names. Norton sent in several. But all had no weight with the Governor and his Council. The deed is done. The body now lies cold and quiet in its final resting place. Instead of "Died," we would have had "murdered" May 25th. It was a murder, a cool, deliberate murder. No other term will answer. ... He has the pardoning power. Why did he not exercise it? Why save Dutee and Wolf and York, and then hang Goode? These are serious questions. But we have done. We close by saying, from a repetition of such scenes, God save the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

THE TASK OF THE HISTORIAN IS TO CREATE HINDSIGHT WHILE
INTERCEPTING ANY ILLUSION OF FORESIGHT. NOTHING A HUMAN CAN SEE CAN EVER BE SEEN AS IF THROUGH THE EYE OF GOD.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

March 4, Sunday: The Austrian Reichstag sitting at Kremsier (Kromeriz), Moravia was by imperial order dissolved. A new constitution for the Austrian Empire was sanctioned by the emperor, declaring it to be an indivisible monarchy with common administration. Istria was made a crown land.

Lewis Cass, defeated as the Democratic presidential candidate, returned to the US Senate.

President James Knox Polk's term ended on this day and, since his Veep had already resigned and Zachary Taylor was refusing to take the oath of office on the Sabbath, technically the President of the United States of America was the President Pro Tem of the Senate. David Rice Atchison wisely slept late this day, then hung around in his Senate office chamber, taking a long nap there. (That's greatly superior to the day that, Ronald Reagan having been capped, General Alexander Haig declared himself to be in command at the White House! The tombstone of this David Rice Atchison would read "President of the U.S. one day." — The tombstone of this General Alexander Haig should already read "In command at the White House one day.")

What the President-Elect did do on this day in Washington DC was turn out his war horse "Old Whitey" to pasture on the White House lawn. As soon as Monday arrived and he deigned to take the oath of office, he would be President of the United States of America and eat broccoli only if he wanted to, until July 9, 1850. Of course, with the change in the office of President of the United States from a Democrat a Whig, the jobs of all previous Democratic appointees, such as Nathaniel Hawthorne as the Surveyor of the Salem Custom House, became exceedingly insecure, for embroidered on the chest of Old Zach's inauguration suit in red letters was the motto "to the victor belong the spoils":⁴¹³

[SEE NEXT SCREEN]

LA GUILLOTINE
HEADCHOPPING

413. Never mind, for the friends of the Hawthornes, such as Henry Wadsworth Longfellow and James Russell Lowell, would take up a subscription for their support.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

THE SCARLET LETTER: A remarkable event of the third year of my Surveyorship - to adopt the tone of "P.P." - was the election of General Taylor to the Presidency. It is essential, in order to a complete estimate of the advantages of official life, to view the incumbent at the in-coming of a hostile administration. His position is then one of the most singularly irksome, and, in every contingency, disagreeable, that a wretched mortal can possibly occupy; with seldom an alternative of good on either hand, although what presents itself to him as the worst event may very probably be the best. But it is a strange experience, to a man of pride and sensibility, to know that his interests are within the control of individuals who neither love nor understand him, and by whom, since one or the other must needs happen, he would rather be injured than obliged. Strange, too, for one who has kept his calmness throughout the contest, to observe the bloodthirstiness that is developed in the hour of triumph, and to be conscious that he is himself among its objects! There are few uglier traits of human nature than this tendency -which I now witnessed in men no worse than their neighbours- to grow cruel, merely because they possessed the power of inflicting harm. If the guillotine, as applied to office-holders, were a literal fact, instead of one of the most apt of metaphors, it is my sincere belief that the active members of the victorious party were sufficiently excited to have chopped off all our heads, and have thanked Heaven for the opportunity! It appears to me -who have been a calm and curious observer, as well in victory as defeat- that this fierce and bitter spirit of malice and revenge has never distinguished the many triumphs of my own party as it now did that of the Whigs. The Democrats take the offices, as a general rule, because they need them, and because the practice of many years has made it the law of political warfare, which unless a different system be proclaimed, it was weakness and cowardice to murmur at. But the long habit of victory has made them generous. They know how to spare when they see occasion; and when they strike, the axe may be sharp indeed, but its edge is seldom poisoned with ill-will; nor is it their custom ignominiously to kick the head which they have just struck off.

In short, unpleasant as was my predicament, at best, I saw much reason to congratulate myself that I was on the losing side rather than the triumphant one. If, heretofore, I had been none of the warmest of partisans I began now, at this season of peril and adversity, to be pretty acutely sensible with which party my predilections lay; nor was it without something like regret and shame that, according to a reasonable calculation of chances, I saw my own prospect of retaining office to be better than those of my democratic brethren. But who can see an inch into futurity beyond his nose? My own head was the first that fell.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

May 24, Thursday: After hiding for 5 days in Magdala, Richard Wagner walked to Jena and the home of Professor Oskar Wolf.

That afternoon a reporter stopped by the Boston prison to ask black convict Washington Goode the usual journalistic questions, such as how does it feel to be waiting around to get hanged.

Q. How old are you?
 A. Don't know.
 Q. Is Washington Goode your real name?
 A. They call me so.
 Q. Have you a mother and sisters?
 A. Yes. In Pennsylvania.
 Q. Tell me truly now which you would prefer were it in your power, an execution or imprisonment for life?
 A. Imprisonment for life, for I am innocent and when that is found out, I could be liberated.
 Q. As the hour of execution is fixed, and you must suffer death, tell me now truly whether you are guilty or not?
 A. I am innocent. I never killed Harding.
 Q. What denomination do you belong to?
 A. I never belonged to any.
 Q. What made you say that you never told me that your cell was uncomfortable, and that you could not keep warm, except in bed?
 A. The jail is a miserable place, and at that time I could not keep warm.
 Here the jailer questioned him,
 Q. Did you ever want for anything?
 A. No. I have been well supplied, but then you know the jail is a miserable place. It will make, however, but little difference with me now. To-morrow I must die between eight and eleven.
 During our conversation, he expressed himself very strongly in regard to the publication of his disgraceful end. "I cannot bear," he said, "to have my name in the papers! What will they say when I am dead? Then, oh my mother and sisters!" He evidently showed that there was still a green spot left in his heart, a chord that might have been made to vibrate!
 We now took our final leave of the criminal, who grasped our hand firmly and bid us an everlasting farewell.

As the reporter was exiting he asked his escort for details about the construction of the gallows in the prison yard, but the official responded to his inquiry only with a question of his own, "What have you been writing so much in the papers for?"

The turnkey incidentally remarked to the reporter, that he expected this prisoner that night to attempt to do away with himself.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

LIFE IS LIVED FORWARD BUT UNDERSTOOD BACKWARD?
— NO, THAT’S GIVING TOO MUCH TO THE HISTORIAN’S STORIES.
LIFE ISN’T TO BE UNDERSTOOD EITHER FORWARD OR BACKWARD.

May 24, Thursday evening: Father Edward Thompson Taylor, chaplain at Boston’s Seamen’s Bethel, and a 2d Methodist pastor, the Reverend Mr. Dexter S. King, visited Washington Goode, to discuss with the imprisoned 29-year-old seaman the condition of his immortal soul.

May 24/25, Thursday night and Friday morning: Desperate, in Boston prison, Washington Goode slashed an artery with a shard of broken glass, and swallowed tobacco and tarred rope, but this was not to be the worst day of this seaman’s life. Prompt medical attention saved him from bleeding to death.

May 25, Friday: This was Waldo Emerson’s 46th birthday.

Thomas Greene Wiggins was born to the slaves Domingo “Mingo” Wiggins, a field slave, and Charity Greene of Columbus GA. Domingo and Charity’s slavemaster would suppose this blind sickly “pickaninny” to have no labor potential, and so, a couple of years later when he sold off the father and mother, it was possible for them to carry Tom along at no additional charge to the purchaser. Although Tom’s parents had married, the prevailing custom of the time was that married female slaves and their offspring were to be known the names of their owners — following slavery tradition, therefore, the infant was to grow up as Thomas Greene Bethune.

Austrian troops entered Florence and restored the power of Grand Duke Leopold of Tuscany. He would return on July 28th.

After 3 weeks of withstanding furious bombardment, Venetians abandoned Fort Malghera and retreated to Venice, blowing up a large part of the railroad bridge that was their sole connection to the mainland.

Leaving his wife in Jena, Richard Wagner departed the shelter of Franz Liszt and under an assumed name, headed for Paris by way of Switzerland.

Rolands Knappen, oder Das ersehnte Glück, a komische-romantische Zauberoper by Albert Lortzing to words of the composer and Düringer after Masäus, was performed for the initial time, in Leipzig Stadttheater. This was a great success.

It had been 13 years since the last execution in Boston and many had hoped there wouldn’t be any more. Due to such petitionary unrest, it was not considered advisable to attempt to hang Washington Goode on Boston

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Petitions in the Case of Washington Goode.

Amesbury,	43	Lawrence,	52
Acton,	22	Leicester,	146
Adams,	129	Lunenburg,	19
Ashburnham,	145	Lowell,	1205
Attleboro',	51	Leominster,	50
Abington,	356	Littleton,	110
Athol,	169	Lexington,	113
Ashby,	16	Mansfield,	214
Boston,	4936	Medway,	65
Boxboro',	90	Marshfield,	59
Bolton,	54	Marlboro',	235
Braintree,	36	Malden,	89
Boxford,	15	Marblehead,	114
Bradford,	25	Milford,	201
Blackstone,	93	Middleton,	45
Berlin,	76	Milton,	155
Bedford,	45	Northampton,	136
Barnstable,	254	Nantucket,	827
Bradford,	73	Newburyport,	199
Brookline,	304	Natick,	104
Cummington,	53	New Braintree,	41
Cambridgeport,	78	Needham,	148
Chelsea,	47	Newton,	155
Charlestown,	452	New Bedford,	776
Carroll,	33	N. Bridgewater,	129
Cochituate,	54	Pembroke,	282
Canton,	184	Pepperrell,	100
Cambridge,	150	Plymouth,	719
Concord,	51	Petersham,	91
Danvers,	227	Prescott,	78
Dedham,	82	Paxton,	79
Duxbury,	161	Roxbury,	42
Danvers,	227	Reading,	202
Dorchester,	132	Salem,	271
E. Bridgewater,	10	Sandwich,	46
Essex,	112	Salsbury,	44
Erving,	37	Springfield,	59
Easton,	230	Somerset,	34
Foxboro',	183	Sekonk,	57
Florida,	21	Sharon,	78
Falmouth,	66	Scituate,	318
Freetown,	50	Townsend,	17
Franklin,	124	Tyringham,	174
Fal' River,	381	Upton,	210
Fairhaven,	37	W. Bridgewater,	39
Frammingham,	30	Waltham,	202
Great Barrington,	42	Weymouth,	427
Gloucester,	430	Wareham,	40
Gardner,	96	West Cambridge,	116
Georgetown,	120	Warren,	113
Hatfield,	107	Webster,	76
Holliston,	66	Wrentham,	41
Heath,	48	Williamston,	35
Harvard,	152	Westfield,	170
Holden,	82	Woburn,	203
Hingham,	252	Westminster,	130
Hanson,	139	Watertown,	36
Halifax,	31	Walpole,	81
Kingston,	156	Worcester,	1627
Lynn,	1455	Yarmouth,	58
Lancaster,	60	Total,	24 440.

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Common so, in order to witness this man die, many were reduced to the indignity of perching upon the rooftops overlooking the city's jailyard.

The going price for a nice window view is reported to have been $20 or higher. The condemned man was so weak from loss of blood from his suicide attempt of the previous night that he needed to be carried to his gallows strapped to a chair. Evidently the warden had elected to ignore the plea of a local newspaper, that as had been done in Brooklyn a few years earlier, he offer the victim the option of the new discovery ether before dropping the trap of the scaffold. This was during a rainstorm, for we have a report that one of the packed spectators in the courtyard is reported to have cried out “Down with your umbrellas, and let’s see the bloody nigger swing!” The condemned man strapped in the chair, offered a cup of water, commented “This is the last Cochituate water that I shall ever drink.”

Famous Last Words:

"What school is more profitably instructive than the death-bed of the righteous, impressing the understanding with a convincing evidence, that they have not followed cunningly devised fables, but solid substantial truth."

— A COLLECTION OF MEMORIALS CONCERNING DIVERS DECEASED MINISTERS, Philadelphia, 1787

"The death bed scenes & observations even of the best & wisest afford but a sorry picture of our humanity. Some men endeavor to live a constrained life — to subject their whole lives to their will as he who said he might give a sign if he were conscious after his head was cut off — but he gave no sign Dwell as near as possible to the channel in which your life flows."

—Thoreau's JOURNAL, March 12, 1853

1836	James Madison	unsolicited comment	"I always talk better lying down."
1846	Benjamin Robert Haydon	final entry in 38-year journal before offing himself	"Stretch me no longer on this tough world. — Lear"
1848	John Quincy Adams	had just voted "no" on war on Mexico	"This is the last of earth. I am composed."
1849	Washington Goode	offered a cup of water before being hanged in Boston	"This is the last Cochituate water that I shall ever drink."
1849	Edgar Allan Poe	in bad shape in Baltimore	"Lord help my poor soul."
1850	John Caldwell Calhoun	unsolicited comment	"The South! The poor South! God knows what will become of her."
... other famous last words ...

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

The assembly sang a hymn, one that had been selected by Goode himself:

Soon shall I hear the solemn call,
(Prepared or not) to yield my breath ;
And this poor mortal frame must fall
A helpless prey to cruel death.

Then look, my soul, look forward now,
And anchor safe beyond the flood ;
Bow to the Savior's footstool, bow,
And get a life secure in God.

Before these fleeting hours are gone,
I'll bid this mortal world adieu ;
And to the Lord I'll now resign
My life, my breath, and spirit too.

Then welcome death, with all its force,
No more I'll fear the gaping grave ;
Jesus, my Lord, my last resource,
Will reach his arm my soul to save.

He will not hide his smiling face,
Nor leave me in that trying hour ;
I'll trust my soul upon his grace,
And cheerful leave this mortal shore.

At 9:50AM, local time, the trapdoor of the scaffold beneath the chair with the negro strapped into it was triggered and fell open with a thwack and –as the Boston Daily Bee reported– this black soul was “launched into the presence of the Supreme Being of us all.”

IT IS NO COINCIDENCE THAT IT IS MORTALS WHO CONSUME OUR HISTORICAL ACCOUNTS, FOR WHAT WE ARE ATTEMPTING TO DO IS EVADE THE RESTRICTIONS OF THE HUMAN LIFESPAN. (IMMORTALS, WITH NOTHING TO LIVE FOR, TAKE NO HEED OF OUR STORIES.)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

May 27, Sunday, 1849: Henri-Frédéric Amiel, who would be referred to as the “Swiss Thoreau,” wrote in his JOURNAL INTIME: “To be misunderstood even by those whom one loves is the cross and bitterness of life. It is the secret of that sad and melancholy smile on the lips of great men which so few understand; it is the cruelest trial reserved for self-devotion; it is what must have oftenest wrung the heart of the Son of man; and if God could suffer, it would be the wound we should be forever inflicting upon Him. He also — He above all — is the great misunderstood, the least comprehended. Alas! alas! never to tire, never to grow cold; to be patient, sympathetic, tender; to look for the budding flower and the opening heart; to hope always, like God; to love always — this is duty.”

Thomas Mayo Brewer got married with Sally R. Coffin, daughter of Mr. Stephen Coffin of Damariscotta, Maine. The couple would produce two children.

After two Boston churches attended by persons of color had declined to allow the funeral services for the hanged black seaman to be conducted on their premises, on this afternoon the body of Washington Goode was interred in a city tomb at the South Burying Ground. The Reverend Mr. Grimes, pastor of the 12th Baptist Society, presided. On the handsome coffin of black walnut, a silver plate bore the simple inscription “Washington Goode, Died, May 25, 1849, Aged 29 years.”

Margaret Fuller reported to the New-York Tribune from Rome “between the heaves of storm”:

Rome, May 27, 1849.

I have suspended writing in the expectation of some decisive event; but none such comes yet. The French, entangled in a web of falsehood, abashed by a defeat that Oudinot has vainly tried to gloss over, the expedition disowned by all honorable men at home, disappointed at Gaëta, not daring to go the length Papal infatuation demands, know not what to do. The Neapolitans have been decidedly driven back into their own borders, the last time in a most shameful rout, their king flying in front. We have heard for several days that the Austrians were advancing, but they come not. They also, it is probable, meet with unexpected embarrassments. They find that the sincere movement of the Italian people is very unlike that of troops commanded by princes and generals who never wished to conquer and were always waiting to betray. Then their troubles at home are constantly increasing, and, should the Russian intervention quell these to-day, it is only to raise a storm far more terrible to-morrow. The struggle is now fairly, thoroughly commenced between the principle of democracy and the old powers, no longer legitimate. That struggle may last fifty years, and the earth be watered with the blood and tears of more than one generation, but the result is sure. All Europe, including Great Britain, where the most bitter resistance of all will be made, is to be under republican government in the next century.

“God moves in a mysterious way.”

Every struggle made by the old tyrannies, all their Jesuitical deceptions, their rapacity, their imprisonments and executions of the most generous men, only sow more dragon’s teeth; the crop shoots up daily more and more plenteous.

When I first arrived in Italy, the vast majority of this people had no wish beyond limited monarchies, constitutional governments. They still respected the famous names of the nobility; they despised the priests, but were still fondly attached to the dogmas and ritual of the Roman Catholic Church. It required King Bomba, the triple treachery of Charles Albert, Pius IX., and the “illustrious Gioberti,” the naturally kind-hearted, but, from the necessity of his position, cowardly and false Leopold of Tuscany, the vagabond "serene" meannesses of Parma and Modena, the "fatherly" Radetzsky, and, finally, the imbecile Louis Bonaparte, "would-be Emperor of France," to convince this people that no transition is possible between the old and the new. The work is done; the revolution in Italy is now radical, nor can it stop till Italy becomes independent and united as a republic. Protestant she already is, and though the memory of saints and martyrs may continue to be revered, the ideal of woman to be adored under the name of Mary, yet Christ will now begin to be a little thought of; his idea has always been kept carefully out of sight under the old régime; all the worship being for the Madonna and saints, who were to be well paid for interceding for sinners; – an example which might make men cease to be such, was no way coveted. Now the New Testament has been translated into Italian; copies are already dispersed far and wide; men calling themselves Christians will no longer be left entirely ignorant of the precepts and life of Jesus.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

The people of Rome have burnt the Cardinals' carriages. They took the confessionals out of the churches, and made mock confessions in the piazzas, the scope of which was, "I have sinned, father, so and so." "Well, my son, how much will you pay to the Church for absolution?" Afterward the people thought of burning the confessionals, or using them for barricades; but at the request of the Triumvirate they desisted, and even put them back into the churches. But it was from no reaction of feeling that they stopped short, only from respect for the government. The "Tartuffe" of Molière has been translated into Italian, and was last night performed with great applause at the Valle. Can all this be forgotten? Never! Should guns and bayonets replace the Pope on the throne, he will find its foundations, once deep as modern civilization, now so undermined that it falls with the least awkward movement.

But I cannot believe he will be replaced there. France alone could consummate that crime, – that, for her, most cruel, most infamous treason. The elections in France will decide. In three or four days we shall know whether the French nation at large be guilty or no, – whether it be the will of the nation to aid or strive to ruin a government founded on precisely the same basis as their own.

I do not dare to trust that people. The peasant is yet very ignorant. The suffering workman is frightened as he thinks of the punishments that ensued on the insurrections of May and June. The man of property is full of horror at the brotherly scope of Socialism. The aristocrat dreams of the guillotine always when he hears men speak of the people. The influence of the Jesuits is still immense in France. Both in France and England the grossest falsehoods have been circulated with unwearied diligence about the state of things in Italy. An amusing specimen of what is still done in this line I find just now in a foreign journal, where it says there are red flags on all the houses of Rome; meaning to imply that the Romans are athirst for blood. Now, the fact is, that these flags are put up at the entrance of those streets where there is no barricade, as a signal to coachmen and horsemen that they can pass freely. There is one on the house where I am, in which is no person but myself, who thirsts for peace, and the Padrone, who thirsts for money.

Meanwhile the French troops are encamped at a little distance from Rome. Some attempts at fair and equal treaty when their desire to occupy Rome was firmly resisted, Oudinot describes in his despatches as a readiness for submission. Having tried in vain to gain this point, he has sent to France for fresh orders. These will be decided by the turn the election takes. Meanwhile the French troops are much exposed to the Roman force where they are. Should the Austrians come up, what will they do? Will they shamelessly fraternize with the French, after pretending and proclaiming that they came here as a check upon their aggressions? Will they oppose them in defence of Rome, with which they are at war?

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Ah! the way of falsehood, the way of treachery, – how dark, how full of pitfalls and traps! Heaven defend from it all who are not yet engaged therein!

War near at hand seems to me even more dreadful than I had fancied it. True, it tries men's souls, lays bare selfishness in undeniable deformity. Here it has produced much fruit of noble sentiment, noble act; but still it breeds vice too, drunkenness, mental dissipation, tears asunder the tenderest ties, lavishes the productions of Earth, for which her starving poor stretch out their hands in vain, in the most unprofitable manner. And the ruin that ensues, how terrible! Let those who have ever passed happy days in Rome grieve to hear that the beautiful plantations of Villa Borghese – that chief delight and refreshment of citizens, foreigners, and little children – are laid low, as far as the obelisk. The fountain, singing alone amid the fallen groves, cannot be seen and heard without tears; it seems like some innocent infant calling and crowing amid dead bodies on a field which battle has strewn with the bodies of those who once cherished it. The plantations of Villa Salvage on the Tiber, also, the beautiful trees on the way from St. John Lateran to La Maria Maggiore, the trees of the Forum, are fallen. Rome is shorn of the locks which lent grace to her venerable brow. She looks desolate, profaned. I feel what I never expected to, – as if I might by and by be willing to leave Rome.

Then I have, for the first time, seen what wounded men suffer. The night of the 30th of April I passed in the hospital, and saw the terrible agonies of those dying or who needed amputation, felt their mental pains and longing for the loved ones who were away; for many of these were Lombards, who had come from the field of Novarra to fight with a fairer chance, – many were students of the University, who had enlisted and thrown themselves into the front of the engagement. The impudent falsehoods of the French general's despatches are incredible. The French were never decoyed on in any way. They were received with every possible mark of hostility. They were defeated in open field, the Garibaldi legion rushing out to meet them; and though they suffered much from the walls, they sustained themselves nowhere. They never put up a white flag till they wished to surrender. The vanity that strives to cover over these facts is unworthy of men. The only excuse for the imprudent conduct of the expedition is that they were deceived, not by the Romans here, but by the priests of Gaëta, leading them to expect action in their favor within the walls. These priests themselves were deluded by their hopes and old habits of mind. The troops did not fight well, and General Oudinot abandoned his wounded without proper care. All this says nothing against French valor, proved by ages of glory, beyond the doubt of their worst foes.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

They were demoralized because they fought in so bad a cause, and there was no sincere ardor or clear hope in any breast. But to return to the hospitals: these were put in order, and have been kept so, by the Princess Belgioioso. The princess was born of one of the noblest families of the Milanese, a descendant of the great Trivalzio, and inherited a large fortune. Very early she compromised it in liberal movements, and, on their failure, was obliged to fly to Paris, where for a time she maintained herself by writing, and I think by painting also. A princess so placed naturally excited great interest, and she drew around her a little court of celebrated men. After recovering her fortune, she still lived in Paris, distinguished for her talents and munificence, both toward literary men and her exiled countrymen. Later, on her estate, called Locate, between Pavia and Milan, she had made experiments in the Socialist direction with fine judgment and success. Association for education, for labor, for transaction of household affairs, had been carried on for several years; she had spared no devotion of time and money to this object, loved, and was much beloved by, those objects of her care, and said she hoped to die there. All is now despoiled and broken up, though it may be hoped that some seeds of peaceful reform have been sown which will spring to light when least expected. The princess returned to Italy in 1847-8, full of hope in Pius IX and Charles Albert. She showed her usual energy and truly princely heart, sustaining, at her own expense, a company of soldiers and a journal up to the last sad betrayal of Milan, August 6th. These days undeceived all the people, but few of the noblesse; she was one of the few with mind strong enough to understand the lesson, and is now warmly interested in the republican movement. From Milan she went to France, but, finding it impossible to effect anything serious there in behalf of Italy, returned, and has been in Rome about two months. Since leaving Milan she receives no income, her possessions being in the grasp of Radetzky, and cannot know when, if ever, she will again. But as she worked so largely and well with money, so can she without. She published an invitation to the Roman women to make lint and bandages, and offer their services to the wounded; she put the hospitals in order; in the central one, Trinita de Pellegrini, once the abode where the pilgrims were received during holy week, and where foreigners were entertained by seeing their feet washed by the noble dames and dignitaries of Rome, she has remained day and night since the 30th of April, when the wounded were first there. Some money she procured at first by going through Rome, accompanied by two other ladies veiled, to beg it. Afterward the voluntary contributions were generous; among the rest, I am proud to say, the Americans in Rome gave $250, of which a handsome portion came from Mr. Brown, the Consul.

I value this mark of sympathy more because of the irritation and surprise occasioned here by the position of Mr. Cass, the Envoy. It is most unfortunate that we should have an envoy here for the first time, just to offend and disappoint the Romans. When all the other ambassadors are at Gaëta, ours is in Rome, as if by his presence to discountenance the republican government, which he does not recognize. Mr. Cass, it seems, is required by his instructions not to recognize the government till sure it can be sustained. Now it seems to me that the only dignified ground for our government, the only legitimate ground for any republican government, is to recognize for any nation the government chosen by itself. The suffrage had been correct here, and the proportion of votes to the whole population was much larger, it was said by Americans here, than it is in our own country at the time of contested elections. It had elected an Assembly; that Assembly had appointed, to meet the exigencies of this time, the Triumvirate. If any misrepresentations have induced America to believe, as France affects to have believed, that so large a vote could have been obtained by moral intimidation, the present unanimity of the population in resisting such immense odds, and the enthusiasm of their every expression in favor of the present government, puts the matter beyond a doubt. The Roman people claims once more to have a national existence. It declines further serfdom to an ecclesiastical court. It claims liberty of conscience, of action, and of thought. Should it fall from its present position, it will not be from, internal dissent, but from foreign oppression.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Since this is the case, surely our country, if no other, is bound to recognize the present government so long as it can sustain itself. This position is that to which we have a right: being such, it is no matter how it is viewed by others. But I dare assert it is the only respectable one for our country, in the eyes of the Emperor of Russia himself.

The first, best occasion is past, when Mr. Cass might, had he been empowered to act as Mr. Rush did in France, have morally strengthened the staggering republic, which would have found sympathy where alone it is of permanent value, on the basis of principle. Had it been in vain, what then? America would have acted honorably; as to our being compromised thereby with the Papal government, that fear is idle. Pope and Cardinals have great hopes from America; the giant influence there is kept up with the greatest care; the number of Catholic writers in the United States, too, carefully counted. Had our republican government acknowledged this republican government, the Papal Camarilla would have respected us more, but not loved us less; for have we not the loaves and fishes to give, as well as the precious souls to be saved? Ah! here, indeed, America might go straightforward with all needful impunity. Bishop Hughes himself need not be anxious. That first, best occasion has passed, and the unrecognized, unrecognized Envoy has given offence, and not comfort, by a presence that seemed constantly to say, I do not think you can sustain yourselves. It has wounded both the heart and the pride of Rome. Some of the lowest people have asked me, "Is it not true that your country had a war to become free?" "Yes." "Then why do they not feel for us?"

Yet even now it is not too late. If America would only hail triumphant, though she could not sustain injured Rome, that would be something. "Can you suppose Rome will triumph," you say, "without money, and against so potent a league of foes?" I am not sure, but I hope, for I believe something in the heart of a people when fairly awakened. I have also a lurking confidence in what our fathers spoke of so constantly, a providential order of things, by which brute force and selfish enterprise are sometimes set at naught by aid which seems to descend from a higher sphere. Even old pagans believed in that, you know; and I was born in America, Christianized by the Puritans, — America, freed by eight years' patient suffering, poverty, and struggle, — America, so cheered in dark days by one spark of sympathy from a foreign shore, — America, first “recognized” by Lafayette. I saw him when traversing our country, then great, rich, and free. Millions of men who owed in part their happiness to what, no doubt, was once sneered at as romantic sympathy, threw garlands in his path. It is natural that I should have some faith.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Send, dear America! to thy ambassadors a talisman precious beyond all that boasted gold of California. Let it loose his tongue to cry, “Long live the Republic, and may God bless the cause of the people, the brotherhood of nations and of men, — equality of rights for all.” Viva America!

Hail to my country! May she live a free, a glorious, a loving life, and not perish, like the old dominions, from, the leprosy of selfishness.

Evening.

I am alone in the ghostly silence of a great house, not long since full of gay faces and echoing with gay voices, now deserted by every one but me, — for almost all foreigners are gone now, driven by force either of the summer heats or the foe. I hear all the Spaniards are going now, — that twenty-one have taken passports to-day; why that is, I do not know.

I shall not go till the last moment; my only fear is of France. I cannot think in any case there would be found men willing to damn themselves to latest posterity by bombarding Rome. Other cities they may treat thus, careless of destroying the innocent and helpless, the babe and old grandsire who cannot war against them. But Rome, precious inheritance of mankind, — will they run the risk of marring her shrined treasures? Would they dare do it? Two of the balls that struck St. Peter’s have been sent to Pius IX. by his children, who find themselves so much less “beloved” than were the Austrians.

These two days, days of solemn festivity in the calends of the Church, have been duly kept, and the population looks cheerful as it swarms through the streets. The order of Rome, thronged as it is with troops, is amazing. I go from one end to the other, and amid the poorest and most barbarous of the population, (barbarously ignorant, I mean,) alone and on foot. My friends send out their little children alone with their nurses. The amount of crime is almost nothing to what it was. The Roman, no longer pent in ignorance and crouching beneath espionage, no longer stabs in the dark. His energies have true vent; his better feelings are roused; he has thrown aside the stiletto. The power here is indeed miraculous, since no doubt still lurk within the walls many who are eager to incite brawls, if only to give an excuse for slander.

To-day I suppose twelve thousand Austrians marched into Florence. The Florentines have humbled and disgraced themselves in vain. They recalled the Grand Duke to ward off the entrance of the Austrians, but in vain went the deputation to Gaëta — in an American steamer! Leopold was afraid to come till his dear cousins of Austria had put everything in perfect order; then the Austrians entered to take Leghorn, but the Florentines still kept on imploring them not to come there; Florence was as subdued, as good as possible, already: — they have had the answer they deserved. Now they crown their work by giving over Guerazzi and Petracchi to be tried by an Austrian court-martial. Truly the cup of shame brims over.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

I have been out on the balcony to look over the city. All sleeps with that peculiar air of serene majesty known to this city only; – this city that has grown, not out of the necessities of commerce nor the luxuries of wealth, but first out of heroism, then out of faith. Swelling domes, roofs softly tinted with yellow moss! what deep meaning, what deep repose, in your faintly seen outline!

The young moon climbs among clouds, – the clouds of a departing thunderstorm. Tender, smiling moon! can it be that thy full orb may look down on a smoking, smouldering Rome, and see her best blood run along the stones, without one nation in the world to defend, one to aid, – scarce one to cry out a tardy “Shame”? We will wait, whisper the nations, and see if they can bear it. Rack them well to see if they are brave. If they can do without us, we will help them. Is it thus ye would be served in your turn? Beware!

ARTHUR FULLER’S BOOK

THE FUTURE IS MOST READILY PREDICTED IN RETROSPECT

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

June 11, Monday: The three kings of the Dreikönigsbund (Prussia, Saxony, Hanover) called on all German states to participate in elections for a German parliament to ratify the Unionsverfassung announced on May 28th.

According to pages 82-83 of Larry J. Reynolds's influence study EUROPEAN REVOLUTIONS AND THE AMERICAN LITERARY RENAISSANCE (New Haven CT: Yale UP, 1988), there are excellent reasons why the alternate title for Nathaniel Hawthorne's new novel THE SCARLET LETTER was THE POSTHUMOUS PAPERS OF A DECAPITATED SURVEYOR:

Predictably, the American press drew careless comparisons between the European revolutions and the American political scene. When Zachary Taylor began his series of political appointments in the spring and summer of 1849, they were reported in the Democratic papers as terrorist acts, as symbolic beheadings of Democratic party members. Some seven times in May and June, for example, the Boston Post printed, in conjunction with the announcement of a political appointment and removal, a small drawing presumably of General Taylor standing beside a guillotine, puffing a cigar, surrounded by heads (presumably of Democrats) at his feet. One of these drawings appeared on June 11th, and on the following day, a letter to the editor appeared objecting to Hawthorne's removal from the Salem Custom House. "This is one of the most heartless acts of this heartless administration," the anonymous writer declared. "The head of the poet and the scholar is stricken off to gratify and reward some greedy partizan!... There stands, at the guillotine, besides the headless trunk of a pure minded, faithful and well deserving officer, sacrificed to the worst of party proscription, Gen. Zachary Taylor, now President." As Arlin Turner has pointed out, this letter was probably a source of Hawthorne's beheading metaphor; however, behind the reference were two years of revolutionary events in Europe, two years of revolutionary rhetoric and imagery.

HEADCHOPPING

Actually, the entire issue over Nathaniel's dismissal as Surveyor of the Salem Custom House was an issue of classification. Was Hawthorne to be considered as a "political," or as a "non-political," employee? The Whigs who dismissed him were alleging that since he had been writing political articles for the Democrats, and since they believed that he had been discriminating against Whig employees in favor of Democratic employees in matters of salary at the Custom House, and since he had they believed then been requiring these Democrat employees to contribute a portion of their inflated salaries to the support of the party — he had in effect made himself into a political employee and could have no complaint in being treated as one.⁴¹⁴

414. I'm not saying they were right, but I am saying that they had an argument which it has become quite impossible for us now to evaluate on its merits.

Writers who are known to have supplemented their authorial income by serving in addition as revenue agents: the Reverend Orestes Augustus Brownson, Robert Burns, Geoffrey Chaucer, Hawthorne, and Herman Melville. (Not to mention, according to MATTHEW 9:9, the author of the gospel according to Matthew.)

HDT

WHAT?

INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

THE WHOLE THING WAS STUPID BECAUSE SALEM WAS ALREADY WELL ON ITS WAY TO BEING NO PORT AT ALL HAVING ALREADY HAD ITS LUNCH EATEN BY THE BUSTLING PORT OF BOSTON

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

June 12, Tuesday: In accounting for the reasons why the new novel THE SCARLET LETTER would appear bearing an alternate title THE POSTHUMOUS PAPERS OF A DECAPITATED SURVEYOR: The Boston Post had been printing, in conjunction with each announcement of a political dismissal of a Democrat and appointment of a Taylor supporter, a small woodblock presumably depicting President Zachary Taylor puffing on a cigar with his hand on the pull-rope of a guillotine, while a pile of Democratic heads accumulates at his feet. One such drawing had appeared in the previous issue and today an anonymous letter to the editor objected to Nathaniel Hawthorne's removal as Surveyor of the Salem Custom House as "one of the most heartless acts of this heartless administration."⁴¹⁵

A PORT THAT IS NO LONGER A PORT NO LONGER NEEDS A CUSTOM HOUSE HOW UNFAIR TO OUR BUSY WRITERS!

The letter glossed the event as a poet and scholar being decapitated in order to gratify and reward some greedy partizan. "There stands, at the guillotine, besides the headless trunk of a pure minded, faithful and well deserving officer, sacrificed to the worst of party proscription, Gen. Zachary Taylor, now President." —We are given to imagine, somehow, that a headless torso is standing next to the President of the United States of America, or, more likely, that an incoherently enraged letterwriter has made implicit reference to the woodblock in that previous day's issue.

HEADCHOPPING

(This letter is so poorly written that I can hardly believe that Hawthorne himself might have submitted it.);

October 2, Sunday: In his journal Thoreau began to construct the Tom-Hyde-the-tinker-standing-on-the-gallows parable that appears on page 327-8 of the "Conclusion" chapter of WALDEN, which he would add to his ms

415. In regard to the Custom House of his introduction, Hawthorne alleged to his friend Horatio Bridge that there had been "the greatest uproar that had happened here since witch times."

William Lee (1771-1851) had been the permanent inspector of the Custom House and the model for "the father of the custom house" of the narrative.

STATE MURDER

in Draft F.

STATE MURDER

WALDEN: Say what you have to say, not what you ought. Any truth is better than make-believe. Tom Hyde, the tinker, standing on the gallows, was asked if he had any thing to say. "Tell the tailors," said he, "to remember to make a knot in their thread before they take the first stitch." His companion's prayer is forgotten.

PEOPLE O
WALDEN

TOM HYDE

This initial rendition of the parable is slightly more elaborate, in that after Tom's ghastly stab at gallows humor he goes on to add some blubbery and tendentious pseudo-poetry, suggesting that the people who are killing him are making a mistake which is going to inconvenience them, which they are going to have to recognize in the future, but are only going to recognize after it has become too late for them to do anything about it — because in actuality, if they would only realize it, Tom Hyde, the tinker who should have "gone tinkering about his life to improve it" but failed to do so, would be worth more to them alive than he would be worth to them dead:

Tom Hyde's dying speech When Tom standing on the gallows was asked if he had anything to say—
He said—Tell the tailors to remember & make a knot in their thread before they take the first stitch. also
You Boston folks & Roxbury people
Will want Tom Hyde to mend your kettle

We note the ghastly little word "also" here. Tom inserts "also" because he is well aware that the moment he pauses is the moment the employee who is holding the cord will yank on it, opening the latch that snaps the trap, that allows him to drop straight down, and his neck to snap — and he doesn't want this employee to make a mistake and yank on the cord at some mere hem in this little departing sermon of his.

YOUR GARDEN-VARIETY ACADEMIC HISTORIAN INVITES YOU TO CLIMB
ABOARD A HOVERING TIME MACHINE TO SKIM IN METATIME BACK
ACROSS THE GEOLOGY OF OUR PAST TIMESLICES, WHILE OFFERING UP
A GARDEN VARIETY OF COGENT ASSESSMENTS OF OUR PROGRESSION.
WHAT A LOAD OF CRAP! YOU SHOULD REFUSE THIS HELICOPTERISH
OVERVIEW OF THE HISTORICAL PAST, FOR IN THE REAL WORLD THINGS
HAPPEN ONLY AS THEY HAPPEN. WHAT THIS SORT WRITES AMOUNTS,
LIKE MERE "SCIENCE FICTION," MERELY TO "HISTORY FICTION":
IT'S NOT WORTH YOUR ATTENTION.

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

After October 15, Saturday, 1849: Why should we be related as mortals merely—as limited to one state of existence— Our lives are immortal our transmigrations are infinite—the virtue that we are livs ever—the vice dieth ever— Shall I exhibit to my friend a human narrowness. To what purpose mythology? The petty tragedy or comedy of our human life—we can sit spectators of it—let it pass. I would meet my friend not in the light or shadow of our human life alone—but as daimons We should not be less tender & human sympathizing for this because we should meet intimately as essences

I should consider this friend of mine is a Great fellow—my knowledge of him, our intercourse, is not to be limited to a few of Natures revolutions, a few paltry summers and winters—no! no! we are Great fellows—we shall be a long time together I do not despair of knowing him better— Ours is a tragedy of more than 5 acts—this is not the fifth act in our tragedy no, no! blow high, blow low, I will come upon my feet—& holding my friend by the hand. The undertaker will have a dusty time that undertakes to bury me— I go with the party of the gods: What falsehoods men do tell—they say that life's a fallacy— They are benighted—they are ineffectual men who walk in the valley of the shadow of Death. I am not agoing to be a man merely—

I will be Hari—

Not a little snivelling, hugging, hoping protempore loving exaggerating— A friendship which will survive despair & the grave thereafter and laugh at such sweet pains as a man hangs himsef for—

What sort of fruit comes of living as if you were a going to die? Live rather as if you were coming to life. How can the end of living be death? The end of living is life. Living is an active transitive state to life—

Life in the green state.

This seems strange and remote—yet step into the cars, & in six hours you may stand on those four planks—and see the Cape Thorfin & Gosnold saw.

The women may sit at their doors & see where their their husbands & sons are catching mackerel 20 miles off upon the sea.— in their ocean house with the white sails. The Cape is to them a sort of store ship laden with supplies, a safer & larger craft on which the women & children & old men take passage,—the village sees where its able bodied men are all ploughing the ocean together

From the northernmost village in Truro the women & girls may sit at their doors & sees their husbands & brothers ploughing the sea twenty miles off, and harvesting their mackerel, with hundreds of white harvest wagons—just as in the country the farmers' wives may sometimes see their husbands working in a distant field,—but the sound of no dinner horn can reach them there.— far beyond the sound of the dinner-horn

HANGING

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

November 3, Saturday: Ebenezer and Abijah Learned, brothers with prior grand larceny convictions living in a mansion overlooking the sea, were arrested and charged with the theft from the safe in Provincetown. Only $200.⁰⁰ of the $20,000.⁰⁰ was recovered from their possession (more research would be necessary, to verify that these brothers were convicted as charged and to discover what sort of prison terms they served).

In England, Herman Melville paid half a crown for permission to stand on an adjacent roof, in order to witness the hanging of a married couple, Maria and George Manning, who had conspired to murder a friend. How titillating this must have been for these spectators! Then he had breakfast and went to the zoo.

(Charles Dickens also attended this interesting hanging — though not in the company of Melville.)

WHAT I'M WRITING IS TRUE BUT NEVER MIND
YOU CAN ALWAYS LIE TO YOURSELF

November 19, Monday: Doctor George Parkman, whose personal fortune amounted to some half a million dollars (that'd be some fifty million, in today's currency) went to Professor John White Webster's office to see if he couldn't humiliate him some more.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

November 23, Friday afternoon: Doctor George Parkman had called at the clock shop of William Bond and Son to pay part of a bill, and had promised to return in the afternoon but did not do so.

This was the shop which was producing the cash flow which was enabling the Bonds to run the Harvard Observatory without any salaries. When it later turned out to be his friend and colleague Professor John White Webster the chemistry professor of the medical college who was arrested for the murder of Doctor Parkman, however, William Cranch Bond was defensive and incredulous:

We who are intimately acquainted with Doctor Webster cannot harbor a suspicion of the kind for an instant.

Doctor Parkman was then seen at the Massachusetts Hospital on Allen Street (now Massachusetts General), and that was the last recorded sighting. From the later bill of indictment, we learn that one account of what happened that Friday afternoon at the Harvard Medical College was that “John White Webster with a certain knife which he then and there in his right hand had held, the said George Parkman then and there feloniously willfully and of his malice aforethought did strike, beat and kick upon the head, breast, back and belly, sides and other parts of him, the said George Parkman and then and there feloniously willfully and with malice aforethought did cast and throw the said George Parkman down unto and upon the floor with great force and violence there giving unto the said George Parkman then and there as well as by the beating, stabbing, striking and kicking of him several mortal wounds and bruises in and upon the head, breast, belly and other sides of the body ... of which said mortal strokes, wounds and bruises he the said George Parkman then and there instantly died.” From the “confession” which the Unitarian minister, the Reverend George Putnam said that Professor John White Webster had made to him in his jail cell after being condemned to death by hanging, we learn that another account of what happened that Friday afternoon at the Harvard Medical College was that Doctor Parkman was waving a copy of the letter of recommendation which he had originally prepared to help Doctor Webster obtain an appointment on the Harvard faculty many years before, and had said to Doctor Webster “I got you into your position and now I will get you out of it.” Whereupon Doctor Webster became enraged and fearful and, grabbing up a stump of grapevine from the stovewood, whacked Doctor George Parkman once solidly along the side of the head, killing him instantly.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

HDT

WHAT?

INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

November 25, Sunday morning: Handbills were out, asking for information on the whereabouts of the missing Doctor George Parkman.

Professor John White Webster was burning more and more body parts in the assay oven, but burning something as wet as a human body sure takes a heck of a lot of firewood, doesn't it? At the trial, there would be expert testimony from another Boston medico, who had had problems when he attempted to burn the body of "a pirate" after dissecting it — for one thing, his neighbors had been complaining about the smell of burning flesh that was permeating the neighborhood.

According to BIRTHS, MARRIAGES AND DEATHS OF THE TOWN OF CONCORD, MASSACHUSETTS (Groton, 1894), Charles Bartlett of Concord & Nancy Fuller of Groton filed an intention to marry.

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

November 28, Wednesday: The handbills posted all over the place were causing the nickname for the slumlord Doctor George Parkman, “The Pedestrian” (because he had never seen the need to indulge himself with the ownership of a horse and buggy), to become a cant term for “cheapskate” or “tinhorn” in Boston. A revised flyer was therefore put out, by fellow rich Bostonian Robert Gould Shaw, speculating that the Doctor had been done in and asking for any events which had attracted suspicion. Of course, it was going to be hard to figure out, which of all the very many people who had had reason to detest the deceased had been the one actually to have volunteered to have done this dirty deed.

Professor John White Webster still had a long way to go, in burning up the pieces of Doctor Parkman's corpse. Human bodies are alarmingly difficult to dispose of.

STATE MURDER

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

November 29, Thursday: The struggling family of Professor John White Webster spent their Thanksgiving holiday in the relief of knowing that their financial troubles were for the time being behind them, the immensely wealthy family of Doctor George Parkman spent their Thanksgiving holiday in fretting about what might have become of their husband and father –the slumlord whom so many people hated– and the swamp-yankee family of Ephraim Littlefield, the janitor of the Harvard Medical College, spent their Thanksgiving holiday feasting upon the big bird that had been so unexpectedly (and so unprecedentedly) presented to them by the suddenly-overly-generous Professor Webster.

Portrait of Ephraim Littlefield.

Here Professor Webster presents the suspicious turkey to the Littlefields (a reenactment).

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

The Littlefield family, as portrayed on an “The American Experience” television program

STATE MURDER

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

November 30, Friday: After Boston police detective Derastus Clapp had inspected Professor John White Webster's laboratory at the Harvard Medical College without discovering anything, the building's janitor Ephraim Littlefield had taken matters into his own hands and chiseled his way through five courses of bricks to the point at which he was able to stick his head and arm, and a light, into the cavity under the building and sight a human pelvis and other body parts on the mud flats of the Charles River beneath Professor Webster's privy hole.⁴¹⁶ pelvis

I took the crowbar and knocked the bigness of the hole right through. There are five courses of brick in the wall. I managed to get in ... and to get the light and my head into the hole, and then ... I held my light forward, and the first thing I saw was the pelvis of a man and two parts of a leg.

416. Littlefield would eventually be able to collect the $3,000 reward offered by the Parkman family, and retire.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Suspecting these body parts to be those of Doctor George Parkman, Detective Clapp took a coach, with two other officers for backup, to the Webster home in Cambridge. Stopping the coach away from the residence, Clapp proceeded alone to encounter the professor on his porch as he was saying farewell to a visitor. The detective requested that the professor accompany him to his laboratory to perform a second search. Webster went back inside for his hat and coat but then, as he approached the coach and sighted the other officers, claimed to have forgotten his keys. The officers deterred his effort to return to the house by telling him that “it was of no consequence” since they would be able to get in. The coach proceeded over Craigie’s Bridge where the police had been searching the waters earlier, and the conversation turned to the search efforts for the missing doctor. Professor Webster commented that he had last seen Dr. Parkman the week prior at the college, and that the doctor had departed alive. Noticing when the coach turned onto Brighton Street, he became agitated and said “The driver is going the wrong way.” Detective Clapp said that the driver was “probably green” and would get back on course. As they stopped in front of the jail, Professor Webster asked “What does this all mean?” The police escorted him inside the building before informing him that he was being confined on a charge of murder.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

December 1, Saturday: A less-than-lifesize statue of Aristides the Sophist, author of SACRED TALES (HIEROI LOGOI), was unveiled in Louisburg Square on top of Boston's Beacon Hill. (What was this, some parlor ornament that some Boston richie was trying to find a decent way to dispose of?)

In front of Harvard Medical College, the medical school of Harvard College, a surly mob of people had assembled who well knew that the students therein had been paying graverobbers (termed humorously "resurrectionists" at the time) to keep them supplied them with the fresh corpses of their relatives, for use in dissection.

DIGGING UP THE DEAD

Inside, the scorched torso and one of the thighs of Doctor George Parkman were being discovered at the bottom of an old tea chest packed full of chemical equipment. None of these downtown denizens gave a damn for Doctor Parkman the slumlord — but what an excellent opportunity this was to agitate to prevent the medical students and faculty from stealing and defiling any more bodies of poor people!

Since his obtaining enough money to retire from business in 1841, Ebenezer Elliott had been living quietly at Great Houghton, near Barnsley. On this day after long illness and depression, he died at the age of 68. The body would be placed in Darfield churchyard.

John Greenleaf Whittier would write a poem about him:

Elliott

Hands off! thou tithe-fat plunderer! play
No trick of priestcraft here!
Back, puny lordling! darest thou lay
A hand on Elliott's bier?
Alive, your rank and pomp, as dust,
Beneath his feet he trod:
He knew the locust swarm that cursed
The harvest-fields of God.

On these pale lips, the smothered thought
Which England's millions feel,
A fierce and fearful splendour caught,
As from his forge the steel.
Strong-armed as Thor, — and a shower of fire
His smitten anvil flung;
God's curse, Earth's wrong, dumb Hunger's ire,
He gave them all a tongue!

STATE MURDER

Then let the poor man's horny hands
Bear up the mighty dead,
And labour's swart and stalwart bands,
Behind as mourners tread.
Leave cant and craft their baptized bounds,
Leave rank its minister floor;
Give England's green and daisied grounds
The poet of the poor!

Lay down upon his Sheaf's green verge
That brave old heart of oak,
With fitting dirge from sounding forge,
And pall of furnace smoke!
Where whirls the stone its dizzy rounds,
And axe and sledge are swung,
And, timing to their stormy sounds,
His stormy lays are sung.

There let the peasant's step be heard,
The grinder chant his rhyme;
Nor patron's praise nor dainty word
Befits the man or time.
No soft lament nor dreamer's sigh
For him whose words were bread, —
The Runic rhyme and spell whereby
The foodless poor were fed!

Pile up thy tombs of rank and pride,
O England, as thou wilt!
With pomp to nameless worth denied,
Emblazon titled guilt!
No part or lot in these we claim;
But, o'er the sounding wave,
A common right to Elliott's name,
A freehold in his grave!

Thomas Carlyle's OCCASIONAL DISCOURSE ON THE NEGRO QUESTION (the essay which would in 1853 be reissued under the title initially planned, OCCASIONAL DISCOURSE ON THE NIGGER QUESTION) appeared in Fraser's Magazine. The author would be outraged at the outrage expressed by his readers.

Even more of a "Teutomaniac" than the history professor Thomas Arnold, Carlyle asserted that "if the Black gentleman is born to be a servant, and, in fact, is useful in God's creation only as a servant, then let him hire not by the month, but by a very much longer term."⁴¹⁷

417. You know, actually, what this sort of "humor" reminds me of? I once sighted a photograph of a Southern lynching, in which the dead man's black feet are protruding into the frame of the photograph from above, while all the white guys and their wives and children are clustering around to have their group portrait made. And from the big toe of the hanged man is hanging a piece of this Thomas Carlylish humor in the form of one of those funny little hotel room signs that you put on your outside doorknob, proclaiming something on the order of "Please do not disturb my slumbers."

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

According to Simon Heffer's MORAL DESPERADO: A LIFE OF THOMAS CARLYLE (London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1995), pages 276-7:

It is the form and tone, rather than the actual message, that did most of the damage. Carlyle constructs a brilliant parody of an Exeter Hall meeting, with an unnamed speaker spelling out unpalatable truths to an audience driven deeper and deeper into shock. Philanthropy in general he parodies as "the Universal Abolition of Pain Association," which is at risk of turning into a "Sluggard and Scoundrel Protection Society." Carlyle did not feel he was attacking the blacks; his targets were the liberals who were destroying them. This was not, though, how his audience saw it.

He was so open to interpretation because of the callous, heartless and brutally sarcastic language he used. He talks of the emancipated blacks being like the Irish, with a land of plenty they are refusing to exploit, because no one is there to guide them to the greater happiness that exists beyond eating pumpkins. The essay is also an attack on the "dismal science" of economics; the blacks were not more constructively employed because it was in no one's economic interest to do so, just as it was not in Ireland.... He cannot envision the black man being born for any other purpose than to serve; and while he may abhor slavery, he wonders whether being bound for life to a master in other circumstances is not the most humane and appropriate way to deal with the "emancipated," and ease them into civilization. To apply the principles of laissez-faire to them was, he argued, cruel, as they had no means to survive on their own. Again (and the allegorical is never far away), all this was true of Ireland, as he saw it.

His strictures about what actually constitutes slavery cannot be easily dismissed, and reflect directly his Irish experiences. "You cannot abolish slavery by act of parliament," he claims, "but can only abolish the name of it, which is very little!"

I encounter these materials myself with mixed feelings, since it is my suspicion that Carlyle may well have been correct in his assertion that a society cannot eliminate a scourge such as human chattel bondage that has grown from the bottom up, by any techniques which proceed merely from the top down. In fact here in the USA, when we would enact the XIIIth Amendment to our federal Constitution in 1865 in the indicated top-down manner, we would not abolish slavery so much as abolish the name of it, exactly as specified here by Carlyle.

For in fact the amendment initially ratified by $\frac{2}{3}$ ds of our state legislatures, including by now ratification even by the sovereign state of Mississippi, does not define precisely what might constitute a "slave," or "slavery," or "enslavement," nor does it proscribe whatever these entities might in some manner eventually be decided to be, but instead it merely extends to the federal congress the authority to enact legislation defining and proscribing these undefined entities, and criminalizing and punishing a certain range of abusive conduct, thus effectively forbidding the other two arms of our federal government, the executive arm and the judicial arm, forever from proscribing or punishing these undefined entities — and indeed, subsequent to this amendment, much as we hate to contemplate this, our federal government has never ever enacted any such proscription, and there has never been any such punishment. In fact in our nation slavery is as unassailable during this Year of Our Lord 2010 as it had been, say, in the year 1810. What a field day of sarcasm a 20th-Century Carlyle would have with us!

STATE MURDER

Documentation of the international slave trade, per W.E. Burghardt Du Bois: “Report of the Secretary of the Navy.” –HOUSE EXECUTIVE DOCUMENT, 31 Cong. 1 sess. III. pt. 1, No. 5, pt. 1, pp. 427-8.

STATE MURDER

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

December 14, Friday: Boston Coroner Jabez Pratt declared that the remains found in the tea chest at Harvard Medical College, and in the assay oven, and in the basement, were indeed those of the megamillionaire Doctor George Parkman rather than the remains of one or another of the poor stiffes who were being stolen from their graves and cut up in the course of the continuing educational work going on at the college (one way to tell was the absence of any of the preserving chemicals normally used on dissection cadavers).

Dr. Parkman's dental prosthesis, in a cast of his jawbone

Professor Jeffries Wyman, an anatomist of Harvard Medical College, testified that he had found no duplicates among the bones in the furnace, indicating that these bones had come from a single human corpse.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Waldo Emerson to his JOURNAL:

Every day shows a new thing to veteran walkers. Yesterday reflections of trees in the ice; snowflakes, perfect rowels, on the ice; beautiful groups of icicles all along the eastern shore of Flint's Pond, in which, especially where encrusting the bough of a tree, you have the union of the most flowing with the most solidly fixed. Ellery all the way squandering his jewels as if they were icicles, sometimes not comprehended by me, sometimes not heard. How many days can Methusalem go abroad & see somewhat new? When will he have counted the changes of the kaleidoscope?

ELLERY CHANNING

December 18, Tuesday: Henry Thoreau was written to by Dr. Samuel Cabot in Boston about the American goshawk that Jacob B. Farmer, one of Thoreau's Concord friends, had shot, that Thoreau was forwarding to the Boston Society of Natural History.

PROCEEDINGS, FOR 1849

{No MS — printed copy FL, 1894}

[December 18, 1849]

"It was first described by Wilson; lately Audubon has identified it with the European goshawk, thereby committing a very flagrant blunder. It is usually a very rare species with us. The European bird is used in hawking; and doubtless ours would be equally game. If Mr. Farmer skins him now, he will have to take second cut; for his skin is already off and stuffed, —his remains dissected, measured, and deposited in alcohol."

Thoreau on Normative Science

The governor of Massachusetts commuted the sentence of execution by hanging of Milton W. Streeter, to life in prison.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

The rooms of the BOSTON SOCIETY OF NATURAL HISTORY are in the brick building adjoining the Boston Theatre, in Mason Street. They are nine in number. One of them is occupied by the librarian, and each of the others by objects of interest in the different departments of natural history. All who desire have free access to the cabinet every Wednesday; and strangers in the city, who cannot conveniently visit it on that day, can obtain admission at any time by application to an officer of the society. The main room, which is entered from the first floor, contains skeletons of different animals from all parts of the world, from that of the huge mastodon to slender bones of the sprightly squirrel. In an anteroom cases filled with rare specimens of geology and mineralogy. Around the main room is a light iron balcony, giving access to the glass cases, which are likewise filled with things strange and wonderful from all parts of the known world. Here are skulls and mummies, and serpents, fossil remains and foot marks of those huge animals that walked, or birds that flew, before Adam arose from kindred earth. Ascending to the next story, we enter a room nearly filled with every variety of birds, from the albatross to the minute hummingbird, while in the centre are long cases filled with eggs of the different species, and many kinds of nests. One of the anterooms is filled with shells, seemingly in endless variety, specimens of moss, sponges, corals, and aquatic plants enliven the collection with their singular beauty. Another anteroom is filled with fishes. In yet another room various members of the serpent family are present. Here we may see the enormous boa, the fairy green snake, the agile black snake, the famed hooded snake of India, and the poisonous copper head of our own country. Here, also, is the fascinating rattlesnake, and such numbers of the creeping race that a crawling feeling comes over us, and we quit the room with a feeling of relief.

Many strangers leave the city without seeing the splendid cabinet of this society, and many residents are even aware of its existence. But whether resident or stranger, the visitor will be well repaid for the expenditure of time.

The library belonging to the Massachusetts Society of Natural History contains several thousand volumes and a number of valuable manuscripts. The society holds monthly meetings, and several of their proceedings have been published. The institution now owns the building which was formerly occupied by the Massachusetts Medical College; but the building has been remodelled, to adapt it to its present purposes. The whole estate cost about thirty thousand dollars, which was obtained by subscription from the liberal citizens of Boston.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1850

February 7, Thursday: Henry Youle Hind got married with Katherine Cameron (August 5, 1820-1909) in York Mills, Toronto, Canada (between 1851 and 1862 the couple would produce seven children).

The governor of Massachusetts commuted the sentence of execution by hanging of William E. Knowlston, to life in prison.

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1850

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
31/01	Margaret Lennox		Glasgow	Murder
11/04	Catherine Moore		Maryborough	Murder of husband
13/04	Mary Reeder	20	Cambridge	Murder of sister (hanged alongside Elias Lucas)
27/07	Briget Keogh		Ennis	Murder

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

March 16, Saturday: An issue of Chambers' Edinburgh Journal:

CHAMBERS' EDINBURGH JOURNAL

ISSUE OF MARCH 16

Waldo Emerson delivered "The Superlative in Literature, Manners, and Races."

According to page 79 of Larry J. Reynolds's influence study EUROPEAN REVOLUTIONS AND THE AMERICAN LITERARY RENAISSANCE (New Haven CT: Yale UP, 1988), there are distinct markings of sexist politics to be discerned within the novel published on this day by Ticknor and Fields, by Nathaniel Hawthorne, THE SCARLET LETTER; OR, THE POSTHUMOUS PAPERS OF A DECAPITATED SURVEYOR.⁴¹⁸ theabsorbingcontemplationofthescarletletterthestoryentitled“THESCARLET LETTER”taleof“TheScarletLetter”thescarletletterandeventoucheditwithher fingerthewearerofthescarletlettertakethescarletletteroffthescarletletterthre waluridwearerofthescarletletterfingeronthescarletletterthescarletletterflam ingonherbreastthescarletletteronherbreastornamentthescarletletterwhichitwas herdoomtowearthescarletletterthescarletletterthescarletletteronHester’sbos omgazemightneveroncebefixeduponthescarletlettertouchedthescarletletterthe scarletletterthescarletletterendowedwithlifethescarletletterthewomanofthe scarletletterthelikenessofthescarletletterthescarletletterthewearerofthesca rletletterherchildandthescarletletterlinesofthescarletletterthatdecoratedthem aternalbosomthescarletletteronherbosomthescarletletteronherbreastherfingeron thescarletletterlookuponthescarletletterasthetokenthescarletletterThesca rletletterhadnotdoneitsofficeThescarletletterburnedonHesterPrynne’sbosom“Th avelefttheetothescarletletter”Iwhomthescarletletterhasdisciplinedtotruthunder thetortureofthescarletletterasforthescarletletter“Mother”saidshe“whatdoesthe scarletlettermean?”investigationsaboutthescarletletterthescarletletterHema deastepnigheranddiscoveredthescarletletterthescarletletterthescarletletterT hescarletletterwasherpassportthescarletletterthescarletletteragainthescarl etletterbrought“Lookyourlastonthescarletletteranditswearer!”thescarletletter thescarletletterenvelopeditfatedwearer“Thymotherisyonderwomanwiththesca rletletter”hadoftenheardofthescarletletterthescarletletterinthemarketplaceHe againextendedhishandtothewomanofthescarletletterLothescarletletterthesca rletletterthemiddaysunshineonthescarletletterwearerofthescarletletterThesto ryofthescarletlettergrewintoalegendrecluseofthescarletlettertheabsorbi

HEADCHOPPING

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Near the end of THE SCARLET LETTER, Hawthorne in a summary tells us about Hester's eventual change of heart, about how she at last forsook radicalism and recognized that the woman who would lead the reform movements of the future and establish women's rights must be less "stained with sin," less "bowed down with shame" than she. This woman must be "lofty, pure, and beautiful, and wise, moreover, not through dusky grief, but the ethereal medium of joy." More than one reader has correctly surmised that this ending to the novel constitutes a veiled complement to Hawthorne's little Dove, Sophia Peabody Hawthorne, and a veiled criticism of Margaret Fuller – radical, advocate of women's rights, and subject of gossip because of her child and questionable marriage. Hawthorne's ambivalent feelings toward Fuller indeed informed this and other parts of the novel, and although a number of women have been discussed as models for Hester, including Anne Hutchinson, Ebe Hawthorne, and Elizabeth Palmer Peabody, Fuller seems to have served in this capacity most provokingly. As Francis E. Kearns has pointed out, a number of parallels exist between Fuller and Hester: both had the problem of facing a Puritan society encumbered by a child of questionable legitimacy; both were concerned with social reform and the role of woman in society; both functioned as counselor and comforter to women; and both had children entitled to use the armorial seals of a non-English noble family. A more important parallel, which Kearns does not mention, is that for Hawthorne both women were linked to the figures of Liberty and Eve, that is, to the ideas of revolution and temptation, which lie at the heart of the novel.

For certain sure the benevolent Boston presence of George Stillman Hillard and the benign influence of Waldo Emerson, among other notables, had been immortalized in Hawthorne's preamble "The Custom-House":

THE SCARLET LETTER: Such were some of the people with whom I now found myself connected. I took it in good part, at the hands of Providence, that I was thrown into a position so little akin to my past habits; and set myself seriously to gather from it whatever profit was to be had. After my fellowship of toil and impracticable schemes with the dreamy brethren of Brook Farm; after living for three years within the subtle influence of an intellect like Emerson's; after those wild, free days on the Assabeth, indulging fantastic speculations, beside our fire of fallen boughs, with Ellery Channing; after talking with Thoreau about pine-trees and Indian relics in his hermitage at Walden; after growing fastidious by sympathy with the classic refinement of Hillard's culture; after becoming imbued with poetic sentiment at Longfellow's hearthstone – it was time, at length, that I should exercise other faculties of my nature, and nourish myself with food for which I had hitherto had little appetite. Even the old Inspector was desirable, as a change of diet, to a man who had known Alcott. I looked upon it as an evidence, in some measure, of a system naturally well balanced, and lacking no essential part of a thorough organization, that, with such associates to remember, I could mingle at once with men of altogether different qualities, and never murmur at the change.

BROOK FARM

WALDO EMERSON

ELLERY CHANNING

LONGFELLOW

BRONSON ALCOTT

HENRY THOREAU

418. A claim of copyright has been made for THE SCARLET LETTER in 1962, for FANSHAWE and THE BLITHEDALE ROMANCE in 1964, for THE HOUSE OF SEVEN GABLES in 1965, and for THE MARBLE FAUN in 1968, by Ohio State UP. (We presume that those ostensibly appropriative and global copyright claims could actually have covered not more than whatever value was added to the works by that press at that time, such as their reformatting and pagination and suchlike.)

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

[INSERT COMMENTARY ABOUT DECAPITATION HERE]

This “psychological bondage” book offered its appreciative audience a heroine who learns, finally, after much anguish, that as a woman her best game plan is to accept the cards society has dealt her, suffer passively, endure numbly, and wait, wait and hope for a better day, and that anything else she might try always makes her lot less bearable. To be silent and no bother, and maintain sexual purity, that constitutes female courage. Had slaves formed a reading market in that era, the author could easily have authored a companion volume about a black man who learns, finally, after much anguish, that as a slave his best game plan is to accept the cards society has dealt him, suffer passively, endure numbly, and wait, wait and hope for a better day, and that anything else he might try always makes his lot less bearable. To be silent and no bother, and polish shoes, that constitutes slave courage. Then, of course, the author could have created a grand synthesis, in a tale of a female slave who learns, finally, that her role as female and her role as slave quite reinforce one another.... To use a 19th-Century phrase, “women and Negroes.” Do you get the idea I actively dislike this romance? No, I actively dislike the mentality of its author Hawthorne. The best thing I have seen on this subject was written by Jean Fagan Yellin:

Where Hiram Powers had distanced an enchained white woman in space and called her a Greek Slave, Nathaniel Hawthorne distanced an enchained white woman in time and called her Hester Prynne.

Clearly, anyone who is bonded to (or in bondage to — it’s much the same, isn’t it?) such a person has a tough row to hoe (you note I cast this suggestion in the present tense — it’s still the case). In particular Sophia Peabody Hawthorne, who had witnessed slavery while living for an extended period in her youth on a sugar plantation in Cuba, had a tough attitudinal row to hoe, being married to such an author-tarian. Sophia could have hardly become an active abolitionist like her sisters Mary and Elizabeth Palmer Peabody. Her solution? —Sophia went for denial, and refused to give credence to various unsettling reports such as that some slave

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

women had to strip to the buff on the auction block (“which I am sure is an exaggeration for I have read of these auctions often and even the worst facts are never so bad as absolute nudity”).

Then she also capable of ignoring the BOOK OF JOB in her BIBLE long enough to suppose that a good and benevolent God providentially “makes up to every being the measure of happiness which he loses thro’ the instrumentality of others” — so that it really is of no consequence how we treat each other. And then she could attempt to “lose myself in other subjects of thought,” embracing a sophisticated version of the Emersonian trick of resignation. She makes herself sound like a Minnesotan!⁴¹⁹

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Such were some of the people with whom I now found myself connected. I took it in good part, at the hands of Providence, that I was thrown into a position so little akin to my past habits; and set myself seriously to gather from it whatever profit was to be had. After my fellowship of toil and impracticable schemes with the dreamy brethren of Brook Farm; after living for three years within the subtle influence of an intellect like Waldo Emerson's; after those wild, free days on the Assabeth, indulging fantastic speculations, beside our fire of fallen boughs, with Ellery Channing; after talking with Henry Thoreau about pine-trees and Indian relics in his hermitage at Walden; after growing fastidious by sympathy with the classic refinement of George Stillman Hillard's culture; after becoming imbued with poetic sentiment at Henry Wadsworth Longfellow's hearthstone - it was time, at length, that I should exercise other faculties of my nature, and nourish myself with food for which I had hitherto had little appetite. Even the old Inspector was desirable, as a change of diet, to a man who had known Bronson Alcott. I looked upon it as an evidence, in some measure, of a system naturally well balanced, and lacking no essential part of a thorough organization, that, with such associates to remember, I could mingle at once with men of altogether different qualities, and never murmur at the change.

As of mid-century, with the publication of Nathaniel Hawthorne's THE SCARLET LETTER, it is clear that the 419. We may well note that although Henry Thoreau would have a copy of Hawthorne's THE SCARLET LETTER in his personal library, he would cross out the reference to that item — indicating that the volume was no longer present (we infer that either the volume was lost, or given away).

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

figure of Uncle Sam had become a fixture of our American imagination:

THE SCARLET LETTER: In my native town of Salem, at the head of what, half a century ago, in the days of old King Derby, was a bustling wharf - but which is now burdened with decayed wooden warehouses, and exhibits few or no symptoms of commercial life; except, perhaps, a bark or brig, half-way down its melancholy length, discharging hides; or, nearer at hand, a Nova Scotia schooner, pitching out her cargo of firewood - at the head, I say, of this dilapidated wharf, which the tide often overflows, and along which, at the base and in the rear of the row of buildings, the track of many languid years is seen in a border of unthrifty grass - here, with a view from its front windows adown this not very enlivening prospect, and thence across the harbour, stands a spacious edifice of brick. From the loftiest point of its roof, during precisely three and a half hours of each forenoon, floats or droops, in breeze or calm, the banner of the republic; but with the thirteen stripes turned vertically, instead of horizontally, and thus indicating that a civil, and not a military, post of Uncle Sam's government, is here established. Its front is ornamented with a portico of half-a-dozen wooden pillars, supporting a balcony, beneath which a flight of wide granite steps descends towards the street. Over the entrance hovers an enormous specimen of the American eagle, with outspread wings, a shield before her breast, and, if I recollect aright, a bunch of intermingled thunderbolts and barbed arrows in each claw. With the customary infirmity of temper that characterizes this unhappy fowl, she appears by the fierceness of her beak and eye, and the general truculency of her attitude, to threaten mischief to the inoffensive community; and especially to warn all citizens careful of their safety against intruding on the premises which she overshadows with her wings. Nevertheless, vixenly as she looks, many people are seeking at this very moment to shelter themselves under the wing of the federal eagle; imagining, I presume, that her bosom has all the softness and snugness of an eiderdown pillow. But she has no great tenderness even in her best of moods, and, sooner or later - oftener soon than late - is apt to fling off her nestlings with a scratch of her claw, a dab of her beak, or a rankling wound from her barbed arrows.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

March 19, Tuesday: In Boston, the trial in re the Commonwealth of Massachusetts v. John White Webster began:

Massachusetts Attorney General John H. Clifford would be assisted in this prosecution by the Boston attorney George Bemis, hired by the Parkman family for $1,500. This case would be one of the first to use forensic and circumstantial evidence to prove a defendant's guilt. It would be argued that the accused couldn't fairly be convicted on circumstantial evidence alone, since circumstantial evidence could not possibly remove every reasonable doubt. Up to that point the standard in murder cases had been proof "to an absolute certainty," rather than proof "beyond a reasonable doubt," that the dead body was indeed that of the victim. It would also be pointed out that others besides Professor Webster, such as the janitor, had had access to that laboratory. Judge Lemuel Shaw would issue a legal opinion that would become a basis for a subsequent appeal of the guilty verdict, that "It would be injurious to the best interests of society to have it so ordered that circumstantial proof cannot avail. If it were necessary always to have positive evidence, how many of the acts committed in the community ... would go entirely unpunished?" The attorney George Bemis would act not only as second chair for the prosecution but also as court reporter, eventually offering his notes as the official transcript of the case. He would heavily edit and "slant" this record to demonstrate the correctness of the prosecution case. At the time Boston was a city of 120,000 souls, and there would be all of 60,000 spectators at this trial, many from out of town. How were all these tourists to be accommodated in an era before television cameras and microphones could be set up in a popular courtroom? Tickets were issued, and those waiting in line were divided into groups which would exactly fill the public gallery of the building. Then every ten minutes the constables would clear the public galleries and allow the next group of spectators to file in and take their seats, for their ten minutes of someone else's fame. The lawyers and judges quickly got used to the noise of this every-ten-minute shuffle.

March 20, Wednesday: In re the Commonwealth of Massachusetts v. John White Webster.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

March 21, Thursday: Robert and Clara Schumann performed in a concert with Jenny Lind in Altona.

From the Salem Register: "Hawthorne seeks to vent his spite ... by small sneers at Salem, and by vilifying some of his former associates, to a degree of which we should have supposed any gentleman ... incapable.... The most venomous, malignant, and unaccountable assault is made upon a venerable gentleman, whose chief crime seems to be that he loves a good dinner."

NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE

The chemist Charles T. Jackson, Mrs. Lidian Emerson's brother the ether controversialist, testified for the prosecution in re the Commonwealth of Massachusetts v. John White Webster that no traces of the normal embalming preservatives had been found in the remains of Doctor George Parkman. He also commented that he noticed that the 6-inch Bowie knife which the professor had habitually kept on his desk had seemed to have been recently cleaned.

WALDEN: The village appeared to me a great news room; and on one side, to support it, as once at Redding & Company's on State Street, they kept nuts and raisins, or salt and meal and other groceries. Some have such a vast appetite for the former commodity, that is, the news, and such sound digestive organs that they can sit forever in public avenues without stirring, and let it simmer and whisper through them like the Etesian winds, or as if inhaling ether, it only producing numbness and insensibility to pain, -otherwise it would often be painful to hear,- without affecting the consciousness. I hardly ever failed, which I rambled through the village, to see a row of such worthies, either sitting on a ladder sunning themselves, with their bodies inclined forward and their eyes glancing along the line this way and that, from time to time, with a voluptuous expression, or else leaning against a barn with their hands in their pockets, like caryatides, as if to prop it up. They, being commonly out of doors, heard whatever was in the wind. These are the coarsest mills, in which all gossip is first rudely digested or cracked up before it is emptied into finer and more delicate hoppers within doors.

In the middle of the testimony there was a ruckus, for a portion of the Tremont House had gone up in flames and fire brigades were rushing to the rescue.⁴²⁰

WILLIAM THOMAS GREEN MORTON

March 22, Friday: In re the Commonwealth of Massachusetts v. John White Webster.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

March 23, Saturday: In re the Commonwealth of Massachusetts v. John White Webster.

An issue of Chambers' Edinburgh Journal:

CHAMBERS' EDINBURGH JOURNAL

ISSUE OF MARCH 23

420. The Redding & Company that is mentioned in the above snippet from WALDEN; OR, LIFE IN THE WOODS was a periodical depot at 8 State Street in downtown Boston. They served the “easy reading” end of the market. The company had begun as a newspaper depot in the 1830s, became a periodical depot in the 1840s, and by the 1850s was a book publisher and seller as well as a tea merchant. George W. Redding (1824-1892) had started as a newsboy, then became a New-York newspaper distributor, then the proprietor of a periodical depot and a publisher of pamphlets such as “Easy Nat; or, Boston Bars and Boston Boys” (1844). Here is the sort of advice it offered to aspiring authors: “You see, our readers want everything condensed, rapid, dramatic. Take any ordinary novel, and cut it down one-half, and it’ll be twice as good as it was before.” Thoreau mentions that they didn’t merely sell magazines and dime novels and tea, but also, sold a few snack items such as nuts and raisins and a few bulk items such as salt and meal. They were really going after the extreme low end of the readership market, “the end with the munchies.” They were certainly never going to offer to sell anyone a book such as WALDEN, although they might well offer the “Readers’ Digest” version (yes, there is such), or one or another of those many-Thoreau-snippets-out-of-context market opportunities that one or another clown seems to be forever generating!

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

March 27, Wednesday: The defense began to present its case in re the Commonwealth of Massachusetts v. John White Webster. Perhaps it is not entirely surprising that, since the chemist Charles T. Jackson had testified for the prosecution, the anesthesia dentist William Thomas Green Morton would testify for the defense. The two men were professional enemies locked in combat for the great prestige of having been the first to recognize the value of anesthesia during protracted surgery. Doctor Morton suggested that the dental remains which had been discovered in the assay oven could have come from just about any poor stiff who had been cut up in the medical school as a dissection cadaver. Many men's mouths, in his observation, had exactly Doctor George Parkman's condition of teeth and dental appliances. The panel of judges found this testimony to be not entirely convincing and would say so, as the dentist who had prepared Parkman's partial plate had already testified in great detail as to all the various characteristics by which he was quite certain that this was the scorched remains of the plate which he had only recently taken the greatest of pains to create and fit for this specific deceased.

STATE MURDER

DENTISTRY

March 28, Thursday: The defense continued its case in re the Commonwealth of Massachusetts v. John White Webster.

March 29, Friday: The defense spent only part of the day completing its case in re the Commonwealth of Massachusetts v. John White Webster.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

March 30, Saturday: An issue of Chambers' Edinburgh Journal:

CHAMBERS' EDINBURGH JOURNAL

ISSUE OF MARCH 30

Nathaniel Hawthorne prepared a brief new preface for the 2nd edition of his THE SCARLET LETTER:

Much to the author's surprise, and (if he may say so without additional offense) considerably to his amusement, he finds that his sketch of official life, introductory to THE SCARLET LETTER, has created an unprecedented excitement in the respectable community immediately around him. It could hardly have been more violent, indeed, had he burned down the Custom-House, and quenched its last smoking ember in the blood of a certain venerable personage, against whom he is supposed to cherish a peculiar malevolence [the Reverend Charles W. Upham of Salem, characterized by Senator Charles Sumner as "that smooth, smiling, oily man of God"]. As the public disapprobation would weigh very heavily on him, were he conscious of deserving it, the author begs leave to say, that he has carefully read over the introductory pages, with a purpose to alter or expunge whatever might be found amiss, and to make the best reparation in his power for the atrocities of which he has been adjudged guilty. But it appears to him, that the only remarkable features of the sketch are its frank and genuine good-humor, and the general accuracy with which he has conveyed his sincere impressions of the characters therein described. As to enmity, or ill-feeling of any kind, personal or political, he utterly disclaims such motives. The sketch might, perhaps, have been wholly omitted, without loss to the public, or detriment to the book; but, having undertaken to write it, he conceives that it could not have been done in a better or a kindlier spirit, nor, so far as his abilities availed, with a livelier effect of truth. The author is constrained, therefore, to republish his introductory sketch without the change of a word.

Concluding arguments of counsel in the case of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts v. John White Webster. The defense was still insisting that it hadn't been the Professor but somebody else who had murdered the Doctor, that it might for instance have been the janitor who had keys to the rooms of the building and being a mere cleanup man was obviously a person of low character, but that if the Professor had been the one to do the deed, the deed would have had to have been manslaughter committed in a fit of passion rather than cold-blooded murder for profit, and anyway, this defendant was such a jolly family man and of such exemplary character. At 5PM the defendant asked leave to address the courtroom, and made the complaint that his attorneys in their superior wisdom had neglected to present to the court the hundreds of pages of evidence and argument which he had prepared while waiting in his jail cell. He pointed out, utterly irrelevantly, that shortly after the time at which he was alleged to have committed the murder, he had purchased a copy of Alexander von Humboldt's COSMOS and was studying this new volume over a mutton-chop supper in a restaurant in Cambridge, and he could prove this. For in fact when he paid his bill and departed from the restaurant, he forgot and left his new copy of COSMOS behind, and the keeper of the public house could so testify, and this was not the conduct of a man who had just committed a murder. The jury was charged and retired before 8PM. Boston went to its supper, and boys hired at $0.⁵⁰ per hour stood in the street outside, ready to run bearing the news of the verdict, and to shout it in the various districts and hotels and taverns of the city. In the jury's chambers, a verdict was reached in 40 minutes but the jury then spent two hours in silent prayer. At 10:30PM the jury returned to the courtroom with their verdict, "Guilty." The accused was then heard to exclaim:

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Take me away from this place so that I may not be looked on any longer.

The Illustrated London News published a new, and inaccurate, depiction of the Great Lisbon Earthquake of November 1, 1755:

April 1, Monday: Charles Gounod signed his 1st contract to produce an opera, with librettist Emile Augier and Nestor Roqueplan, director of the Paris Opéra. This would be Sapho.

In the case in re the Commonwealth of Massachusetts v. John White Webster, a jury of his peers having found him guilty of the crime of murder in the first degree, the convicted man was sentenced to be hanged by the neck at a time and a place to be approved by the authorities, until he be dead.

President Jared Sparks of Harvard College, and Professor Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, would visit the prisoner in his cell in the Leverett Street lockup (since demolished).

John C. Hays was elected Sheriff of San Francisco, California.

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

May 4, Saturday: Professor John White Webster's lawyers submitted a petition for a writ of error against Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court Chief Justice Lemuel Shaw, because of his allegedly faulty instructions to the jury:

Nathaniel Hawthorne paid his first visit to the Boston Athenæum, as the guest of a paying member. He might not be willing himself to become a paying member rather than a moocher, but he certainly recognized quality when he saw it:

The library is in a noble hall, and looks splendidly with its vista of alcoves.

An issue of Chambers' Edinburgh Journal:

CHAMBERS' EDINBURGH JOURNAL

ISSUE OF MAY 4

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

June 12, Wednesday: Professor John White Webster's lawyers had submitted a petition for a writ of error against Judge Lemuel Shaw because of his faulty instructions to the jury. On this day the hearing was held before a panel of five judges one of whom was Shaw, and the writ denied. Webster would appeal to Governor George N. Briggs for a pardon, asserting his entire innocence. He had been convicted on evidence which was wholly circumstantial. Unfortunately for him, the black man Washington Goode had just been hanged in Boston for murder entirely on the basis of such circumstantial evidence. Thus, the Governor could not pardon Webster without seeming to allow different standards of evidence to accused white men. The Fall River Weekly News would express this matter most succinctly: "If any delays, misgivings or symptoms of mercy are manifested, the gibbeted body of Washington Goode will be paraded before the mind's eye of his Excellency. If he relents in this case, though the entire population of the State petition for a remission of sentence, Governor Briggs will forfeit all claim to public respect as a high minded, honorable and impartial chief magistrate. He can do one of two things and retain his character as a man and a public servant: resign his office, or let the law take its course." The governor signed the death warrant. Webster, therefore, in a last-ditch effort to avoid the gallows, would make a retreating confession. He had indeed struck the victim. However, he had only struck him once. Also, he was only defending himself as he had been provoked into doing this! His act had not been premeditated or malicious. He had been pushed into this by Doctor Parkman, who had become so inordinately aggressive to collect the money he was owed. The creditor had been "gesticulating in the most violent and menacing manner." He had even been threatening to seize the professor's mineral cabinet, despite the fact that the professor had put this asset up as security to cover not only this loan, but another separate loan to another man. What could Professor Webster do under such extenuating circumstances but seize "whatever thing was handiest—it was a stick of wood— and [deal] him an instantaneous blow with all the force that passion could give it. It was on the side of his head, and there was nothing to break the force of the blow. He fell instantly upon the pavement. There was no second blow. He did not move." (Of course, such an exculpatory confession would get the man exactly nowhere, for it did nothing to restore the torn social fabric. For a suitable restoration of the torn social fabric, we will need to wait until after this hanging, when the victim's widow would be listed as the 1st contributor to a fund created for the murderer's impoverished widow and daughters.)

BETWEEN ANY TWO MOMENTS ARE AN INFINITE NUMBER OF MOMENTS, AND BETWEEN THESE OTHER MOMENTS LIKEWISE AN INFINITE NUMBER, THERE BEING NO ATOMIC MOMENT JUST AS THERE IS NO ATOMIC POINT ALONG A LINE. MOMENTS ARE THEREFORE FIGMENTS. THE PRESENT MOMENT IS A MOMENT AND AS SUCH IS A FIGMENT, A FLIGHT OF THE IMAGINATION TO WHICH NOTHING REAL CORRESPONDS. SINCE PAST MOMENTS HAVE PASSED OUT OF EXISTENCE AND FUTURE MOMENTS HAVE YET TO ARRIVE, WE NOTE THAT THE PRESENT MOMENT IS ALL THAT EVER EXISTS — AND YET THE PRESENT MOMENT BEING A MOMENT IS A FIGMENT TO WHICH NOTHING IN REALITY CORRESPONDS.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

June 13, Thursday: According to one account I have seen, on this day Henry Thoreau surveyed the Bedford Road for the town of Concord.

According to another account –and I do not know whether this might not be an alternative description of the same job– on this day Thoreau was making a survey of the courthouse (Town House) and adjacent lots and starting to help widen the road from Main Street to the New Hill Burying Ground (the first section of the present Sleepy Hollow Cemetery), and from Monument Street to that same spot.

View Henry Thoreau's personal working drafts of his surveys courtesy of AT&T and the Concord Free Public Library:

http://www.concordlibrary.org/scollect/Thoreau_Surveys/Thoreau_Surveys.htm

(The official copy of this survey of course had become the property of the person or persons who had hired this Concord town surveyor to do their surveying work during the 19th Century. Such materials have yet to be recovered.)

View this particular personal working draft of a survey in fine detail:

http://www.concordlibrary.org/scollect/Thoreau_Surveys/7d.htm

This Sleepy Hollow had begun as “Deacon [Reuben] Brown’s pretty pasture, circled with a ridge of oaks and pines ... reached only by a lane.” It had been Concord’s hanging grounds, back when Concord was the main court center for Middlesex County: for instance, it was where Concord had hanged the burglar Samuel Smith at the turn of the century. It had also been used for group picnics, such as the one in 1840 while “Hard Cider Clubs” were keeping the big political ball a-rolling through Concord streets with cries of “Tippecanoe and Tyler too!” According to George Bradford Bartlett’s 1880 CONCORD GUIDE BOOK, it had been awarded this name due to the presence there of a natural “amphitheatre,” the deeper of two Dunge Holes there, that had long been so known.

July 2, Tuesday: The minister of the Unitarian church in Roxbury, Massachusetts, the Reverend George Putnam, D.D. brought appeal before the Governor’s Council on Pardons, saying that Professor John White Webster had confessed his remorse to him in his jail cell for the unpremeditated act of passion which he had committed on the afternoon of November 23, 1849.  He said that Doctor Webster had informed him that what had actually happened was that he had invited Doctor George Parkman there not to kill him but to arrange to pay off the debt, but that Parkman had been entirely unreasonable about this and had been waving a copy of the letter of recommendation which he had originally prepared to help Doctor Webster obtain his appointment on the Harvard College faculty many years before, and had said to the Professor “I got you into your position and now I will get you out of it.” And that with this Professor Webster had become enraged and fearful and, grabbing up a stump of grapevine from the stovewood, had whacked Parkman once solidly along the side of the head, killing him instantly. For the good of Professor Webster’s soul, therefore, he ought not to be hanged by the neck in Boston until he be dead.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

July 19, Friday: At 3:30AM, holding course with close-reefed sails, the Elizabeth struck a Fire Island sandbar.

The ship's lifeboats were soon smashed. As it grew lighter figures could be made out on the beach but these humans didn't seem to be doing anything by way of a rescue, only waiting and watching. In fact these were not rescuers but resident scavengers waiting for their storm booty. At noon the first mate, in command of the Elizabeth since its skipper had died of the small pox, picked himself out a likely plank and jumped overboard. His instructions to those he left behind: "Save yourselves!" There was only one life preserver, which would by tradition have gone to Margaret Fuller, but as they all waited aboard the vessel and saw that it was breaking up in the surge, she offered that life preserver to a crewman who was volunteering to take his chances going overboard to summon aid (wreck #18 below):

TIMELINE OF SHIPWRECKS

The toddler had been slung into a canvas bag around the neck of a sailor. A Tribune reporter reached the beach at about 11AM. At about noon the Fire Island Lighthouse lifeboat and rescue howitzer arrived but, despite the fact that the ship was only a few hundred yards out into the breakers, rescue attempts were made difficult by wind and waves that were building into a hurricane. The lifeboat would never be launched. At about 3PM, with perhaps a thousand people on the beach at that point watching (half of whom were looting as cases of goods washed ashore), the ship began to come apart as pieces of its marble cargo broke through the hull. Some of the people aboard made it ashore by clinging to pieces of wreckage. When a sailor attempted to get the toddler ashore, the attempt failed and the tiny body would be submerged for about twenty minutes before being located and carried still warm out of the waves (the body would be placed in a chest donated by one of the sailors). Just before leaping overboard the cook heard Fuller, in her white nightgown, say "I see nothing but death before me." When the ship broke up all who had not made it to shore were drowned (of the total of 22 aboard, a total of 10 including the baby could not be gotten across the surf to shore). Ossoli was seen to reach up from the water and attempt to grab a piece of rigging before disappearing beneath the waves.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

The bodies of Giovanni and Margaret were not immediately recovered. When Ellery Channing reached that beach, some people who were still standing around informed him that they would have made a rescue attempt had they known someone “important” was on board.⁴²¹ The reporter took some letters found on the beach in a box back to New-York and dried them and turned them over to Horace Greeley. Nathaniel Hawthorne had not met Giovanni Angelo but commented, according to his son’s NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE AND HIS WIFE, A

421. Four editions of the ENCYCLOPÆDIA BRITANNICA held that their drownings occurred on July 16th and this error would not get corrected until 1974 — which would be hardly worth mentioning were it not such a graphic illustration of the general lack of value we place on a pushy woman’s contribution to our clownish society.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

BIOGRAPHY, that

Providence was, after all, kind in putting her and her clownish husband and their child on board that fated ship.

Yeah, and a kind Providence put those clownish variola scarifications on the fated child's face!

Behind this term "Providence" mobilized by Hawthorne we can see lurking the notion that this was an unquestionably murderous, yet unquestionably kind, act of God. His deity was merely disposing of a female who had gotten out of her place, sort of like crushing an ant that had wandered onto the author's dinnerplate. God as the sanitary police for the Old Boys Network. The schadenfreudian remarks Nathaniel made from time to time about the Ossolis may have had less to do with his generally livid gender chauvinism, and less to do with the two of them as a couple, or with the two of them as particular individuals, than with Hawthorne's special ambivalence toward the twisted sister with whom he had had those starry-night walks while his wife was inconvenienced, or his general misanthropy toward any woman who would do such an unwomanly thing as to write:

I wish they were forbidden to write on pain of having their faces deeply scarified with an oyster-shell.

Dear reader, do you agree with Nathaniel that fortune was kind to Margaret and her family? Do you, perhaps,

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

harbor a hope that fortune will smile on you and on your family as it did not smile on her and her family? Do you suspect, as so many scholars studying this period have suspected, that Margaret perhaps harbored some sort of a death wish, and that it was this death wish which prevented her from leaping overboard into the breakers and attempting to make it to the shore that was only a few yards away? Remember, if you will, that Margaret had a spinal deformity, which very likely was some part of the cause of part of pretty boy Nathaniel's hostility toward her and which very likely was the entire cause of his hostility toward her husband –what kind of clown could it be, who could marry a deformed woman, and have sex with her and produce a child?– and remember, also, if you will, that Margaret herself had long before been forced to abandon any suspicion she might have had in her earlier years, of the basic fairness of life. We were born to be mutilated, she commented, and, she might have added, we were born also, to be mocked:

I have no belief in beautiful lives; we were born to be mutilated: Life is basically unjust.

Several days after the USS Elizabeth had disintegrated, when all that lay in the breakers were some rough blocks of Italian marble and some hull timbers half buried in the sand, a sea captain named James Wick would show up at the offices of the New-York Herald Tribune on Manhattan Island with a packing crate containing the corpses of a man and a woman. Greeley was informed that these were the bodies of the “Italian count” Ossoli and Greeley's war correspondent Margaret Fuller. He “refused to have anything to do with them,” according to Tribune reporter Felix Dominy.

The horses rattled the empty chariots, longing for their noble drivers.
But they on the ground lay, dearer to the vultures than to their wives.

So Captain Wick and his mate, to get rid of the bodies of Greeley's war correspondent and her clownish husband without getting themselves into trouble, would bury this packing crate at night on Coney Island without marking the spot.⁴²² We are reminded of something Henry Thoreau would jot down in his journal some nine months subsequent to this event, between April 19 and April 22, 1851, and something he would write into CAPE COD, and we are led to wonder whether Thoreau had in some manner come to suspect that his “friend” Greeley had something to do with the fact that it was these bodies in particular that had not been recovered from the wreck of the USS Elizabeth. For Thoreau did make an uncharacteristically bitter remark during this period, a remark about the moral character of editors in this country, a group of whom Greeley was arguably the single one who was the best known personally by Thoreau:

... probably no country was ever ruled by so mean a class of tyrants as are the editors of the periodical press in this country.

Later in this day, in Boston, an appeal brought on behalf of Professor John White Webster by the minister of the Unitarian church in Roxbury, Massachusetts, the Reverend George Putnam, D.D., failed to move the Governor's Council on Pardons. Murder being contrary to the law of God, with one dissenting vote they recommended to the Governor of the commonwealth that he murder this murderer.

July 26, Saturday: In Boston, Daniel H. Pierson was hanged for murder.

422. A letter from Felix Dominy's son, that is among the Fuller papers at Harvard, attests to this incident and is described in Chevigny, Bell Gale. THE WOMAN AND THE MYTH: MARGARET FULLER'S LIFE AND WRITINGS. Old Westbury NY: The Feminist Press, 1976.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

August 29, Friday: The wife and children of Professor John White Webster visited him for the last time in his cell. The professor knew, but his family was prevented from knowing, that the ceremony had been set for the next morning.

The “Yellow House, reformed”:⁴²³ Having completed the extensive renovations to the property they had purchased at 73 Main Street in Concord, the Thoreau family moved into its Yellow House. The family would live in this residence, now the “Thoreau/Alcott” house, for the remainder of Henry Thoreau’s life, with him occupying the finished attic room.⁴²⁴

423. “Reformed” here means that the ceilings had been raised and extensive modifications had been made.

424. Did this Thoreau home have a lawn? America’s obsession with outdoor living spaces in the vicinity of their homes would not begin until after the Civil War, with sports such as lawn croquet catching on in the leisured middle class. In all likelihood, the lot on which the Thoreau boardinghouse stood inside this pretty fence in the 1850s consisted of swept dirt and sand kept bare — except of course for the family’s large garden.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

August 30, Saturday morning: In the morning John White Webster was hanged in public at #5 Leverett Street on Leverett Square in Boston for the murder of George Parkman. It took about 4 minutes. In deference to the social standing of the culprit, there had not been a prior public announcement of the date or the place of the execution. The Reverend George Putnam, D.D. immediately departed for Cambridge to inform the family. That evening a lady and her two children visiting from New-York would come to the family home in Cambridge in the hope that she would be able to see the corpse of the murderer, but fortunately these ghoulish tourists would be intercepted by the maid and the widow and the daughters did not come to know of it. To fool the crowds which were assembling, and in addition to prevent the body from being exhumed, it would be interred in secret that night at the lowbrow cemetery on Copp's Hill — rather than in the expected venue at toney Mount Auburn Cemetery.⁴²⁵

FINAL EXECUTIONS
February 14, 1844	John Gordon	hanged for murder of factory owner Amasa Sprague probably only because he was an Irish Catholic immigrant, in Rhode Island (no more such events would occur)
August 30, 1850	John White Webster	last Harvard College professor to be hanged by the neck in Boston
July 28, 1854	William B. Sheppard	last public open-air hanging in San Francisco attended by a huge crowd, at the Presidio before a crowd of not less than 10,000

On this day Henry Thoreau was also concerned with cemeteries, for at the request of John Shepard Keyes, he was surveying two sides of the Concord West Burying Ground by running the lines of the old Hurd place, the so-called Block House now on Lowell Road, and the line of the river bank further east on Main Street.⁴²⁶ The purpose of this activity, probably, was to determine where to position the iron fence from the old courthouse around the burial ground. According to the Town Report, Thoreau received $1.⁰⁰ for this on March 1, 1851.

View Thoreau's personal working drafts of his surveys courtesy of AT&T and the Concord Free Public Library:

http://www.concordlibrary.org/scollect/Thoreau_surveys/Thoreau_surveys.htm

(The official copy of this survey of course had become the property of the person or persons who had hired this Concord town surveyor to do their surveying work during the 19th Century. Such materials have yet to be recovered.)

425. Due to this unpleasantness, Harvard College has created a special endowment for the relief of desperate professors. The widow Harriet Frederica Hickling Webster, who would only live for a few additional years, would take the four daughters back to the Azores. There, one of the four, Sarah Hickling Webster, would marry Samuel Wyllys Dabney (1826-1893), who would from 1872 to 1892 be the US consul to the Azores.

426. We can gather that it was sometime prior to this date, that this former Concord Academy classmate had become an selectman of Concord.

STATE MURDER

Aug 31st Tall Ambrosia

Among the signs of Autumn I perceive
The Roman Wormwood (called by learned men
Ambrosia elatior, food for gods,—
For to impartial science the humblest weed
Is as immortal as the proudest flower—)
Sprinkles its yellow dust over my shoes
As I cross the now neglected garden
We trample under foot the food of Gods
& spill their nectar in each drop of dew—
My honest shoes thus powdered country-fide
Fast friends that never stray far from my coach
Bearing many a mile the marks of their adventure
At the post-house disgrace the Gallic gloss
Of those well dressed ones who no morning dew
Nor Roman wormwood ever have been through Who never walk but are transported rather
For what old crime of theirs I do not gather

The grey blueberry bushes venerable as oaks why is not their fruit poisonous? Bilberry called Vaccinium corymbosum some say amoenum & or Blue Bilberry & Vaccinium disomorphum MX—Black Bilberry. Its fruit hangs on into September but loses its wild & sprightly taste.

'Tis very fit the ambrosia of the gods
Should be a weed on earth. their nectar
The morning dew with which we wet our shoes
For the gods are simple folks and we should pine upon their humble fare

The purple flowers of the humble Trichostema mingled with the worm wood. smelling like it
And the spring-scented—dandelion scented primrose Yellow primrose
The swamp pink Azalea viscosa—its now withered pistils standing out.
The odoriferous sassafras with its delicate green stem its three-lobed leaf—tempting the traveller to bruise it it sheds so rare a perfume on him equal to all the spices of the east. Then its rare tasting root bark—like nothing else which I used to dig— The first navigators freighted their ships with it and deemed it worth its weight in gold.
The alder-leaved Clethra (Clethra alnifolia sweet smelling queen of the swamp—its long white racemes.
We are most apt to remember & cherish the flowers which appear earliest in the spring— I look with equal affection on those which are the latest to bloom in the fall
The choke Berry Pyrus arbutifolia
The beautiful white waxen berries of the cornel—either cornus alba or Paniculata white berried or Panicked—beautiful both when full of fruit & when its cymes are naked delicate red cymes or stems of berries. spreading its little fairy fingers to the skies its little palms. Fairy palms they might be called.
One of the Viburnums Lentago—or pyrifolium or—Nudum—with its poisonous looking fruit in cymes first—greenish white then red then purple or all at once.
The imp eyed red velvety looking berry of the swamps
The spotted Polygonum Polygonum Persicaria seen in low lands amid the potatoes now wild Princes feather?
Slight flower that does not forget to grace the Autumn
The Late Whortleberry (Dangle-berry) that ripens now that other huckleberries and blueberries are shrivelled and spoiling

November 23, Saturday: The governor of Massachusetts commuted the sentence of execution by hanging of William Bullman, to life in prison.

An issue of Chambers' Edinburgh Journal:

CHAMBERS' EDINBURGH JOURNAL

ISSUE OF NOVEMBER 23

Nov 23 Today it has been finger cold.

Unexpectedly I found ice by the side of the brooks this afternoon nearly an inch thick. Prudent people get in their barrels of apples today. The difference of the temperature of various localities is greater than is supposed.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

If I was surprised to find ice on the sides of the brooks –I was much more surprised to find quite a pond in the woods containing an acre or more quite frozen over so that I walked across it.

It was in a cold corner where a pine wood excluded the sun. In the larger ponds & the river of course there is no ice yet. It is a shallow weedy pond. I lay down on the ice and looked through at the bottom– The plants appeared to grow more uprightly than on the dry land, being sustained & protected by the water. Cadis worms were everywhere crawling about in their handsome quiver like sheaths or cases

The wild apples though they are more mellow & edible have for some time lost their beauty, as well as the leaves, and now too they are beginning to freeze. The apple season is well nigh over. Such however as are frozen while sound are not unpleasant to eat when the spring sun thaws them.

I find it to be the height of wisdom not to endeavor to over-see myself –and live of life of prudence and common sense –but to see over & above myself –entertain sublime conjectures to make myself the thoroughfare of thrilling thoughts –live all that can be lived. The man who is dissatisfied with himself –what can he not do?

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1851

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1851

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
25/03	Sarah Chesham	42	Chelmsford	Murder
10/05	Catherine Connelly	70 ^a	Cork	Murder
19/08	Mary Cage	40	Ipswich	Murder of husband

a. This set an age record, of sorts.

It seems to be during this timeframe that the Reverend Adin Ballou authored the following material in opposition to capital punishment, referring regretfully to the recent hangings of Washington Goode, Daniel H. Pierson,⁴²⁷ and John White Webster:

Capital Punishment: Reasons For Immediate Abolition

What is Capital Punishment?

It is the infliction of Death on a human being who has been convicted of murder or some other crime, and who is a helpless prisoner in the hands of the public authorities. It is commonly executed by hanging, beheading, shooting, &c.; in our country almost always by hanging.

Who Inflict the Death Penalty?

All the people in the State or Nation who do not unequivocally protest against it. This is emphatically true in our Commonwealth of Massachusetts. Reader, whether voter or non-voter, male or female, adult or youth, thou art either for Capital Punishment or against it. Thou art not a neutral in the case. When one of thy fellow creatures is put to death on the gallows by public authority, with thy approbation or with thy consent, consider the deed as thine own. Nay, if thou lettest it be done without thy solemn protest against it, the deed is virtually thine own. Wince not at this. Know thy responsibility before God in this matter. Unless thou hast cleared the skirts of thy garments by some public, unequivocal and uncompromising testimony against Capital Punishment, thou art the man or the woman who inflicts it. Thou and thy fellows took the life of Washington Goode, Daniel H. Pierson, and John W. Webster. Say not "the Sheriff did it - the Governor ordered it - the Court decreed it - the law requires it." All true: but in whose name and by whose authority does the Sheriff, the Governor, the Court, the law hang a man? Who made the law, the Court, the Governor and the Sheriff? Answer: the people - the sovereign people. They do all these things. Who are the people? Answer: the voters, together with all who help to form that public opinion which governs voters, legislators and rulers. Whatever 427. In 1848 they had hanged Pierson, a white imbecile of Boston, after he killed his wife and children.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

public opinion unequivocally demands should be done, is done. Voters, legislators and rulers see that it is done. They see that hanging is done. Why? Because public opinion demands it. And who form public opinion? All men, women and children who think and speak. Public opinion is nothing but the confluence of private opinions; like a mighty river made up of many small streams, rivulets or springs. Reader, remember that thou art one of these streams, rivulets or springs. Thy opinion is for or against Capital Punishment. So if not against it, thou art for it. If for it, thy private opinion is a part of that great river of public opinion which says to voters, legislators and rulers, "Keep on hanging murderers." Therefore thou art one of the executioners of Capital Punishment, acting through thy agents. The deed is really thine. If it be glorious, then glory on. But if it be abhorrent and abominable, hold back thy hand from thy guilty brother's life. Protest against the custom, the law, the public opinion. Let thy testimony be unequivocal, uncompromising and incessant against it, till the death penalty be utterly abolished.

Capital Punishment is Anti-Christian

Noah, Moses, and the ancients generally sanctioned it; but Christ prohibits it. The Old Testament, he knew, contained many sayings which authorized the taking of blood for blood, "life for life, eye for eye," &c. But he took care that the New Testament should record all imperative testimony against thus resisting evil with evil. Referring directly to that whole class of Old Testament sayings which sanction the taking of "life for life," our Lord says: "But I say unto you that ye resist not evil" - that is, by inflicting evil on the evil-doer, as you have heretofore done under the authority of these Noachic and Mosaic sayings. Away with all hatred and vindictiveness. Oppose evil only with good - only by doing what is best both for the injurious and the injured parties. "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you," &c. that ye may be the children of your father in heaven, who always acts on this divine principle toward the unthankful and evil. On the same ground he enjoined the duty of always cherishing the spirit of forgiveness. "When ye pray, say ... Forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors." "For if ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses." Is it forgiving an offender to take blood for blood, life for life, eye for eye? Is this forgiving as we would have God forgive us? Wilt thou hang thy son's murderer by the neck till he be "dead, dead, dead," and then pray God to forgive thine offences as thou hast his! And after this wilt thou still presume to call Jesus Christ thy Lord, and thyself a Christian! Of all such Christ demandeth, "Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say?" As Jesus taught, so taught his apostles. Hear Paul: "Recompense to no man evil for evil"; "avenge not yourselves"; "be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good." "See that none render evil for evil unto any man." So Peter, John and all the apostles. Hanging the evil doer is recompensing "evil for evil." It is man avenging himself by "rendering evil for evil." It is a vain attempt to overcome evil with evil. Therefore it is utterly anti-Christian. Christ never gave countenance to Capital Punishment, or to the taking of human life for any cause. He exemplified what he taught. He was once called on to adjudge a woman to death for adultery, according to the law of Moses. Did he sanction Capital Punishment? No; but he required those who would have stoned the criminal to death, to be sure first that they themselves were without sin. They felt the rebuke and fled. The woman still remained to receive death, if at all, from his sinless hands. But forbearing to harm her, guilty though she was, he said, "Go and sin no more." Jesus was no patron either of crime or of Capital Punishment. When James and John would have called fire down from heaven upon the unaccommodating Samaritans, "even as Elias did," he turned and rebuked them, saying, "Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of. For the Son of Man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them." So then Christians, following out their Lord's mission in his divine spirit, are not to destroy men's lives, but to save them - even though Noah, Moses and Elias be officiously quoted to the contrary. When will this genuine Christianity come to be understood and exemplified throughout nominal Christendom? In that day will Capital Punishment, as well as War, be denounced and renounced as utterly anti-Christian. Reader, do not attempt to parry the force of the foregoing demonstration by any special pleading. Do not say, as some have, "Christ had no reference to public judicial proceedings; capital punishment, &c., when he gave forth those strong prohibitory precepts against resisting evil with evil; he only referred to petty revenge between individuals in common life," &c. This is groundless assumption, and contrary to the obvious meaning of Christ's language. "Ye have heard that it hath been said, an eye for an eye," &c. Where? By whom? See Gen. 9:6, Ex. 21:22-25, Lev. 24:17-20, Deut. 19:16-21. Examine those passages, and thou wilt see that "life for life, eye for eye," &c. were to be taken by public judicial authority. Can we, then, suppose Christ did not forbid legal and judicial resistance of evil with evil, but merely ordinary individual retaliations? No; he forbade all those sayings had authorized; that is, both individual and governmental takings of "life for life, eye for eye," &c. This is too plain to be caviled upon. Neither let the reader say, as some have, Christ did not refer to those sayings of Noah, Moses, &c. but only to certain glosses on them made by some of the Jewish Rabbis. Show us any rabbinical glosses stronger than the original Scripture sayings in the Pentateuch. There are none. It is sheer assumption to plead all such abatement of Christ's obvious meaning. Nor let anyone rise up and say, as some have said, "You make Christ to condemn Moses, and the New Testament to destroy the Old. Thus you pervert the Word of God." Strange notion! Is not Christ superior to Moses, and the New Testament to the Old? Who doubts this? The Jew may, but not the Christian. He who places Jesus Christ below Moses, or no higher than Moses, or the New Testament below the Old, or no higher than the Old, is anti-Christian, whatever else he may be. This is a settled point. But it does not follow that Christ condemns Moses, or that the New Testament destroys the Old. The less and the greater may mutually corroborate each other. Moses wrote of the Christ, and commanded that when he came, the people should hear him "in all things." Therefore said Jesus to the Jews, "Had ye believed Moses, ye would have believed me; for he wrote of me." Moses was a faithful servant, but Christ is the Son of God. He who respects Moses as a servant, will surely respect Christ as the Son of God. And he who, under pretence of reverencing Moses, takes "life for life," regardless of Christ's solemn injunction to "resist not evil with evil," insults both of them. He tramples under foot his acknowledged Lord, and impudently says to Moses, "I will not obey thy command, to hear Christ in all things. I will hear him in nothing that differs from thy old law of "life for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth." That law suits my own instincts exactly, and I will not allow it to be superseded, even by Jesus Christ!" Would Moses feel honored by such an adherent? No; he would rebuke the self-willed zealot, and say, "No man honors me who does not honor the Son of God more." If the patriarchs and prophets of the Old Testament, who all predicted a more glorious dispensation of divine truth and righteousness to come, could be summoned to give judgment, they would unanimously concur with Paul in his testimony: "If that which was done away was glorious, much more that which remaineth is glorious." Instead of subordinating the New Testament to the Old, or lowering down its sublime law, of resisting evil only with good, to the ancient maxims, they would exalt Jesus Christ and his precepts above all, as the true light and life of men. Alas! that anyone should so poorly appreciate either the Old or the New Testament, as to imagine that he can truly honor the former without implicitly obeying the latter as God's revised statutes. The former had a glory which was designed to be superseded by the superior glory of the latter, even as the moon and the stars of night fade away in the radiance of the sun. Does the sun destroy the moon and stars, because he outshines them? No more does the New Testament destroy the Old by superseding its imperfect institutions with diviner ones. The position is impregnable. Capital Punishment, however sanctioned by Noah, Moses and the ancients, is anti-Christian. It ought therefore to be immediately abolished in all professedly Christian States. He who upholds it fights against Jesus Christ.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Capital Punishment is Unnecessary

There is no excuse for hanging a murderer, on the ground that he is outraging the public peace, and endangering the lives of his fellow-creatures. He is a helpless prisoner; completely in the power of the government, and there he can be kept in safe custody - in a custody which will prevent his injuring others, or being injured by others. What more does the public good require? What more does his own good require? What more does any reasonable, humane, upright man desire? Who is it that clamors for his life - that cries out to have this powerless, pinioned man thrust into eternity from a gallows? O spirit of vindictive cruelty, we know thee all through the dark ages! Thou art thyself a murderer from the beginning. Be thou exorcised from all well-meaning souls. Thou hast often transformed thyself into an angel of light, and seated thyself in the high places of Christianity; but thou shalt be cast down into the pit, whence thou camest. Thou deprecatest and revengest murder, but art forever predisposing mankind to commit it. We know thee; "Get thee behind us, Satan." Capital Punishment is not necessary in order to prevent the criminal's escaping his due recompense. God has not left rewards and punishments to the uncertainty and imperfection of human government. He himself will render to every man according to his deeds. No sinner can escape the divine judgment. No murderer can by any possibility evade a just retribution. He may all mere human punishments, but none of the divine. Who but an atheist doubts this great truth? Then let no man say, "The murderer must be hung, or he will go unpunished." Not so. His going unpunished is an impossibility. Keep him, then, unharmed, where he can harm no one, and let him be made better if possible. Leave him to be punished by the only authority that is competent to do it without error. Why not? Avenger of blood, thou art dismissed. Thy mission is fulfilled. To whom will the putting to death of the criminal do any good? It will preserve no one's life, that could not just as surely be preserved by the judicious confinement of the convict. It will not help God's administration of justice. It will not restore the murdered person to life. It will give no comfort to the murdered one's surviving friends, unless they are depraved enough to find comfort in retaliation. It will do the murderer himself no good. If he be unprepared to die, it will precipitate him into the spirit world against all the dictates of religion; and if he have become a penitent - a regenerate man, forgiven of God - man ought to be both ashamed and afraid to be less merciful. It will do the righteous, the well-disposed and tender-hearted, no good. They are grieved and disgusted by such State tragedies. It will do the wicked, the depraved, the hard-hearted, no good. They love such spectacles, crowd eagerly around them, display all the hateful traits of devils incarnate, and go away ripe for violence and bloodshed. Hence our State authorities will not allow them free access to the place of execution, giving tickets of admission only to a few select witnesses, or respectable amateurs of this kind of tragedy. This is proof positive, if proof were wanting, that the hanging of murderers works no good to the wicked. If it did, the more they should see of it the better. Away with a punishment which is as unnecessary as it is anti-Christian.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

This Punishment is Irreparable

Man can take away life; but he cannot restore it. Many have been put to death for crimes which seemed to have been conclusively proved against them, who were afterwards ascertained beyond doubt, to be innocent. Then their judges and executioners would have given worlds for the power to reverse the fatal sentence - to repair the dreadful error. But there was no remedy - no reparation. What presumption is it in ignorant, fallible mortals, themselves daily beggars for Divine mercy, to crush the life out of their guilty fellows; to thrust them from the land of the living into the unknown world of spirits! It is the prerogative of the Most High to kill; for He knoweth when and how to take life, and is able, moreover, to restore it at pleasure. Not so man. In his pride and rashness he kills, and there his power ends. He may stare at the ruin he has wrought; he may deplore it; but he cannot repair it. Alas! for the accusers, the jurors, the judges, the executioners, and their abettors, who presume to quench the flame of human life. The guilt of their victims is no justification of their presumption. Vengeance belongeth unto God alone, who ever judgeth righteously, and can do no wrong. Let man content himself with imposing uninjurious restraint on the outrageous and dangerous. Then if he err in judgment, or in methods of treatment, he can correct his errors, repair his incidental wrongs, and prove himself to be, what he ever ought to be the overcomer of evil with good. Read the following extracts, and see how liable human tribunals are to put to death the innocent.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

A few years ago, a poor German came to New York and took lodgings, where he was allowed to do his cooking in the same room with the family. The husband and wife lived in a perpetual quarrel. One day, the German came into the kitchen, with a clasp-knife and a pan of potatoes, and began to pare them for his dinner. The quarrelsome couple were in a more violent altercation than usual, but he sat with his back towards them, and, being ignorant of their language, felt in no danger of being involved in their disputes. But the woman, with a sudden and unexpected movement, snatched the knife from his hand, and plunged it into her husband's heart. She had sufficient presence of mind to rush into the street, and scream murder. The poor foreigner, in the meanwhile, seeing the wounded man reel, sprang forward to catch him in his arms, and drew out the knife. People from the street crowded in, and found him with the dying man in his arms, the knife in his hand, and blood upon his clothes. The wicked woman swore, in the most positive terms, that he had been fighting with her husband, and had stabbed him with a knife he always carried. The unfortunate German knew too little English to understand her accusation, or to tell his own story. He was dragged off to prison, and the true state of the case was made known through an interpreter; but it was not believed. Circumstantial evidence was exceedingly strong against the accused, and the real criminal swore that she saw him commit the murder. He was executed, notwithstanding the most persevering efforts of his lawyer, John Anthon, Esq., whose convictions of the man's innocence were so painfully strong, that, from that day to this, he has refused to have, any connection with a capital case. Some years after this tragic event, the woman died, and on her deathbed confessed her agency in the diabolical transaction; but her poor victim could receive no benefit from this tardy repentance. Society had wantonly thrown away its power to atone for the grievous wrong.

- Mrs. Child

A young lady, belonging to a genteel and very proud family in Missouri, was beloved by a young man named Burton; but, unfortunately, her affections were fixed on another, less worthy. He left her with a tarnished reputation. She was by nature energetic and high-spirited; her family were proud, and she lived in the midst of a society which considered revenge a virtue, and named it honor. Misled by this false popular sentiment, and her own excited feelings, she resolved to repay her lover's treachery with death. But she kept her secret so well that no one suspected her purpose, though she purchased pistols, and practiced with them daily. Mr. Burton gave evidence of his strong attachment by renewing his attentions when the world looked most coldly on her. His generous kindness won her bleeding heart, but the softening influence of love did not lead her to forego the dreadful purpose she had formed. She watched for a favorable opportunity, and shot her betrayer when no one was near to witness the horrible deed. Some little incident excited the suspicion of Burton, and he induced her to confess to him the whole transaction. It was obvious enough that suspicion would naturally fasten upon him, the well-known lover of her who had been so deeply injured. He was arrested; but succeeded in persuading her that he was in no danger. Circumstantial evidence was fearfully against him, and he soon saw that his chance was doubtful; but with affectionate magnanimity he concealed this from her. He was convicted and condemned. A short time before the execution, he endeavored to cut his throat; but his life was saved for the cruel purpose of taking it away according to the cold-blooded barbarism of the law. Pale and wounded, he was hoisted to the gallows, before the gaze of a Christian community. The guilty cause of all this was almost frantic when she found that he had thus sacrificed himself to save her. She immediately published the whole history of her wrongs and her revenge. Her keen sense of wounded honor was in accordance with public sentiment; her wrongs excited indignation and compassion, and the knowledge that an innocent and magnanimous man had been so brutally treated, excited a general revulsion of popular feeling. No one wished for another victim, and she was left unpunished, save by the dreadful records of her memory.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

- Mrs. Child

Hold! all ye vindictives that would take "life for life." It is impious, cold-hearted presumption in man to do this awful deed! It is anti-Christian, unnecessary, irreparable, abhorrent! We challenge a refutation of these reasons for abolishing the death penalty. They are unanswerable. Let the abomination cease.

THE FALLACY OF MOMENTISM: THIS STARRY UNIVERSE DOES NOT CONSIST OF A SEQUENCE OF MOMENTS. THAT IS A FIGMENT, ONE WE HAVE RECOURSE TO IN ORDER TO PRIVILEGE TIME OVER CHANGE, A PRIVILEGING THAT MAKES CHANGE SEEM UNREAL, DERIVATIVE, A MERE APPEARANCE. IN FACT IT IS CHANGE AND ONLY CHANGE WHICH WE EXPERIENCE AS REALITY, TIME BEING BY WAY OF RADICAL CONTRAST UNEXPERIENCED — A MERE INTELLECTUAL CONSTRUCT. THERE EXISTS NO SUCH THING AS A MOMENT. NO INSTANT HAS EVER FOR AN INSTANT EXISTED.

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

January 31, Friday: The San Francisco Orphan's Asylum, 1st in California, was founded.

In upstate New York, Reuben A. Dunbar was hanged.

Samuel H. Hammond had been the prosecutor at his murder trial, and had obtained the conviction on the basis of evidence that was largely circumstantial. Dunbar, age 20, had killed his relatives Stephen V. Lester, age 8, and David L. Lester, age 10, in the town of Westerlo on the night of September 28, 1850. The bodies, found in the woods, had been interred at the Wickham Farm Burying Ground, Dunbar Hollow, Dormansville, New York. After conviction Dunbar had explained that since an uncle had died and he was newly married with a baby expected shortly, he had been after their inheritance.

REUBEN A. DUNBAR

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

"I look upon Phrenology as the guide of Philosophy, and the handmaid of Christianity; whoever disseminates true Phrenology, is a public benefactor."
— Horace Mann, Sr.

THE MOST FOUL AND UNPARALLELED MURDER IN THE ANNALS OF CRIME LIFE AND CONFESSION OF REUBEN A. DUNBAR, CONVICTED AND EXECUTED FOR THE MURDER OF STEPHEN V. AND DAVID L. LESTER (AGED 8 AND 10 YEARS,) IN WESTERLY, ALBANY COUNTY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1850. (Published by John D. Parsons. Weed, Parsons & Co., Printers). The pamphlet included illustrations of the murders.

Hammond, S.H. THE CLOSING ARGUMENT IN THE CASE OF THE PEOPLE VS. REUBEN DUNBAR, MURDER; TRIED AT THE LATE NOVEMBER TERM OF THE COURT OF OYER AND TERMINER FOR ALBANY COUNTY (Albany: J. Munsell).

June: Hinton Rowan Helper, ever a believer in "lawn order," participated in a California-frontier lynch mob that hanged two men who were by popular acclamation being suspected of having robbed a third man. "Such proceedings as these," he would comment, "produced order throughout the state."

June 11, Wednesday: In San Francisco, California, John Jenkins had been "arrested" by a group of citizens who had caught him in the act of stealing a safe and had turned him over to a newly formed Committee of Vigilance. In the span of about 6 hours this Committee of Vigilance "tried" him, condemned him, and tightened a noose about his neck.

Henry Thoreau continued reading in Charles Darwin's journal of his voyage around the world aboard HMS Beagle:

VOYAGE OF THE BEAGLE I

VOYAGE OF THE BEAGLE II

When Darwin left England for his round-the-world voyage in 1831, he carried with him a departure gift: Volume I of Lyell's PRINCIPLES, published in its first edition the previous year. Before reaching the Cape Verde Islands, he had already been swept into Lyell's orbit. Thrilled, he preordered copies of Volumes II and III for pickup in ports of call as they were published. So influential was Lyell's thinking during the voyage that Darwin dedicated his JOURNAL OF RESEARCHES to him with this comment: "The chief part of whatever scientific merit this journal and the other works of the author may possess, have been derived from studying the well-known and admirable PRINCIPLES OF GEOLOGY." This dedication may have jumped out at Thoreau when he read it in 1851, because he, himself, had been smitten by Lyell's great book in 1840, eleven years earlier.

June 11, Wednesday: Last night—a beautiful summer night not too warm moon not quite full⁴²⁸—after 2 or 3 rainy days. Walked to Fair Haven by RR returning by Potter's pasture & Sudbury Road. I feared at first that there would be too much white light—like the pale remains of day light—and not a yellow gloomy dreamier light—that it would be like a candle light by day but when I got away from the town & deeper into the night, it was better. I hear whipporwills & see a few fire flies in the meadow 428. The moon would be full on the night of the 12th.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

I saw by the shadows cast by the inequalities of the clayey sand-bank in the Deep Cut, that it was necessary to see objects by moon light—as well as sunlight—to get a complete notion of them— This bank had looked much more flat by day when the light was stronger, but now the heavy shadows revealed its prominences. The prominences are light made more remarkable by the dark shadows which they cast.

When I rose out of the deep Cut into the old Pigeon place field, I rose into a warmer stratum of air it being lighter. It told of the day, of sunny noon tide hours, an air in which work had been done—which men had breathed. It still remembered the sunny banks—of the laborer wiping his brow—of the bee humming amid flowers—the hum of insects Here is a puff of warmer air which has taken its station on the hills which has come up from the sultry plains of noon

I hear the nighthawks uttering their squeaking notes high in the air now at nine o'clock PM—and occasionally what I do not remember to have heard so late—their booming note. It sounds more as if under a cope than by day—the sound is not so fugacious going off to be lost amid the spheres but is echoed hollowly to earth—making the low roof of heaven vibrate— a sound is more confused & dissipated by day.

The whipporwill suggests how wide asunder the woods & the town— Its note is very rarely heard by those who live on the street, and then it is thought to be of ill omen—only the dwellers on the outskirts of the village—hear it occasionally— It sometimes comes into their yards— But go into the woods in a warm night at this season— & it is the prevailing sound— I hear now 5 or 6 at once— It is no more of ill omen therefore here than the night & the moonlight are. It is a bird not only of the woods but of the night side of the woods. New beings have usurped the air we breathe—rounding nature filling her crevices with sound— To sleep where you may hear the whipporwill in your dreams.

I hear from this upland from which I see Wachusett by day—a wagon crossing one of the bridges— I have no doubt that in some places to-night I could hear every carriage which crossed a bridge over the river within the limits of concord—for in such an hour & atmosphere the sense of hearing is wonderfully assisted & asserts a new dignity—& become the Hearalls of the story— The late traveller cannot drive his horse across the distant bridge but this still & resonant atmosphere tells the tale to my ear. Circumstances are very favorable to the transmission of such a sound— In the first place planks so placed & struck like a bell swung near the earth emit a very resonant & penetrating sound—add that the bell is in this instance hung over water, and that the night air, not only on account of its stillness, but perhaps on account of its density—is more favorable to the transmission of sound. If the whole town were a raised planked floor—what a din there would be!

I hear some whipporwills on hills—others in thick wooded vales—which ring hollow & cavernous—like an apartment or cellar with their note.— as when I hear the working of some artisan from within an apartment.

I now descend round the corner of the grain field—through the pitch-pine wood in to a lower field, more inclosed by woods—& find my self in a colder damp & misty atmosphere, with much dew on the grass— I seem to be nearer to the origin of things— There is something creative & primal in the cool mist—this dewy mist does not fail to suggest music to me—unaccountably—fertility the origin of things— An atmosphere which has forgotten the sun—where the ancient principle of moisture prevails.

The woodland paths are never seen to such advantage as in a moonlight night so embowered—still opening before you almost against expectation as you walk—you are so completely in the woods & yet your feet meet no obstacles. It is as if it were not a path but an open winding passage through the bushes which your feet find.

Now I go by the spring and when I have risen to the same level as before find myself in the warm stratum again—The woods are about as destitute of inhabitants at night as the streets in both there will be some night walkers—

Their are but few wild creatures to seek their prey. The greater part of its inhabitants have retired to rest.

Ah that life that I have known! How hard it is to remember what is most memorable! We remember how we itched, not how our hearts beat. I can sometimes recall to mind the quality the immortality of my youthful life—but in memory is the only relation to it.

The very cows have now left their pastures & are driven home to their yards—I meet no creature in the fields. I hear the night singing bird breaking out as in his dreams, made so from the first for some mysterious reason.⁴²⁹

Our spiritual side takes a more distinct form like our shadow which we see accompanying us

I do not know but I feel less vigor at night—my legs will not carry me so far—as if the night were less favorable to muscular exertion—weakened us somewhat as darkness turns plants pale—but perhaps my experience is to be referred to being already exhausted by the day and I have never tried the experiment fairly. It was so hot summer before last that the Irish laborers on the RR worked by night instead of day for a while—several of them having been killed by the heat & cold water. I do not know but they did as much work as ever by day. Yet methinks nature would not smile on such labors.

Only the Hunter's & Harvest moons are famous—but I think that each full moon deserves to be & has its own character well marked.— One might be called the midsummer night moon

The wind & water are still awake at night you are sure to hear what wind there is stirring. The wind blows—the river flows without resting— There lies Fair Haven lake undistinguishable from fallen sky.

The pines seem forever foreign; at least to the civilized man—not only their aspect but their scent—and their turpentine.

So still & moderate is the night—no scream is heard whether of fear or joy—no great comedy nor tragedy is being enacted. The chirping of crickets is the most universal if not the loudest sound.

There is no French revolution in Nature.— no excess— She is warmer or colder by a degree or two.

429. This appears to be Thoreau's first mention of the mysterious night warbler.

HDT

WHAT?

INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

THE MOST FOUL AND UNPARALLELED MURDER
IN THE ANNALS OF CRIME.

LIFE AND CONFESSION
OF
REUBEN A. DUNBAR,
CONVICTED AND EXECUTED

FOR THE MURDER

OF
STEPHEN V. AND DAVID L. LESTER,
(Aged 8 and 10 Years.)
IN WESTERLO, ALBANY COUNTY,
September 28, 1850.

Second Edition.

PUBLISHED BY JOHN D. PARSONS.
WEED, PARSONS & Co., PRINTERS.
1851.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

By night no flowers –at least no variety of colors– The pinks are no longer pink –they only shine faintly reflecting more light Instead of flowers under foot stars over head.⁴³⁰

My shadow has the distinctness of a 2nd person –a certain black companion bordering on the imp –and I ask “Who is this?” Which I see dodging behind me as I am about to sit down on a rock

No one to my knowledge has observed the minute differences in the seasons– Hardly two nights are alike– The rocks do not feel warm tonight for the air is warmest –nor does the sand particularly. A Book of the seasons – each page of which should be written in its own season & out of doors or in its own locality wherever it may be– When you get into the road though far from the town & feel the sand under your feet –it is as if you had reached your own gravel-walk –you no longer hear the whipporwill nor regard your shadow –for here you expect a fellow traveller– You catch yourself walking merely The road leads your steps & thoughts alike to the town–

You see only the path & your thoughts wander from the objects which are presented to your senses– You are no longer in place.

In Charles Darwins Voyage of a Naturalist round the World –commenced in 1831– He gave to Ehrenberg some of an impalpably fine dust which filled the air at sea near the Cape de Verd Islands & he found it to consist in great part of “infusoria with siliceous shields, and of the siliceous tissue of plants” –found in this 67 dif organic forms.– The infusoria with 2 exceptions inhabitants of fresh water. Vessels have even run on shore owing to the obscurity. Is seen a thousand miles from Africa– Darwin found particles of stone above a thousandth of an inch square.

Speaking of St. Paul’s Rocks Lat 58’ N Long. 29° 15’ W– “Not a a single plant, not even a lichen, grows on this islet; yet it is inhabited by several insects & spiders. The following list completes, I believe, the terrestrial fauna: a fly (Olfersia) living on the booby, and a tick which must have come here as a parasite on the birds; a small brown moth, belonging to a genus that feeds on feathers; a beetle (Quedius), and a woodlouse from beneath the dung; and lastly numerous spiders, which I suppose prey on these small attendants and scavengers of the waterfowl. The often-repeated description of the stately palm and other noble tropical plants, then birds, and lastly man, taking possession of the coral islets as soon as formed, in the Pacific, is probably not quite correct; I fear it destroys the poetry of this story, that feather & dirt-feeding and parasitic insects and spiders should be the first inhabitants of newly formed oceanic land.”

At Bahia or San Salvador Brazil took shelter under a tree “so thick that it would never have been penetrated by common English rain” but not so there.

of A partridge [Ruffed Grouse Bonasa umbellus?] near the mouth of the Plata– “A man on horse back, by riding round & round in a circle, or rather in a spire, so as to approach closer each time, may knock on the head as many as he pleases.”– refers to Hearne’s Journey, p.383 for “In Arctic North America the Indians catch the Varying Hare by walking spirally round & round it, when on its form: the middle of the day is reckoned the best time, when the sun is high, and the shadow of the hunter not very long”

In the same place

“General Rosas is also a perfect horseman –an accomplishment of no small consequence in a country where an

430. William M. White’s version of the journal entry is:

*So still and moderate is the night!
No scream is heard, whether of fear or joy.
No great comedy nor tragedy is being enacted.
The chirping of crickets is the most universal,
If not the loudest, sound.
There is no French Revolution in Nature,
No excess.
She is warmer or colder by a degree or two.*

*By night no flowers,
At least no variety of colors.
The pinks are no longer pink;
They only shine faintly,
Reflecting more light.
Instead of flowers underfoot,
Stars overhead.*

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

assembled army elected its general by the following trial: A troop of unbroken horses being driven into a corral, were let out through a gateway, above which was a cross-bar: it was agreed whoever should drop from the bar on one of these wild animals, as it rushed out, and should be able, without saddle or bridle, not only to ride it, but also to bring it back to the door of the corral, should be their general. The person who succeeded was accordingly elected, and doubtless made a general fit for such an army. This extraordinary feat has also been performed by Rosas."

Speaks of the Gaucho sharpening his knife on the back of the armadillo before he kills him.

Alcide d'Orbigny –from 1825 to 33 in S. Am. now (1846) publishing the results on a scale which places him 2d to Humboldt among S. Am. travellers.

Hail in Buenos Ayres as large as small apples –killed 13 deer beside ostriches –which last also it blinded. –&c &c Dr Malcomson told him of hail in India in 1831 which "much injured the cattle" Stones flat one ten inches in circumference. passed through windows making round holes.

A difference in the country about Monte Video & somewhere else attributed to the manuring & grazing of the cattle. refers to Atwater as saying that the same thing is observed in the prairies of N. America "where coarse grass, between five and six feet high, when grazed by cattle, changes into common pasture land" V Atwater's words in Sill. N. A. Journ. V. 1. p 117

I would like to read Azara's Voyage Speaks of the fennel & the cardoon (Cynara cardunculus) introduced from Europe, now very common in those parts of S. America. The latter occurs now on both sides the Cordillera, across the Continent. In Banda Oriental alone "very many (probably several hundred) square miles are covered by one mass of these prickly plants, and are impenetrable by man or beast. Over the undulating plains, where these great beds occur, nothing else can now live. – I doubt whether any case is on record of an invasion on so grand a scale of one plant over the aborigines."

Horses first landed at the La Plata in 1535 Now these, with cattle & sheep have altered the whole aspect of the country vegetation &c.– "The wild pig in some parts probably replaces the peccari; packs of wild dogs may be heard howling on the wooded banks of the less frequented streams; and the common cat, altered into a large and fierce animal, inhabits rocky hills."

At sea eye being 6 ft above level horizon is $2\frac{4}{5}$ miles dist. "In like manner, the more level the plain, the more nearly does the horizon approach within these narrow limits; and this, in my opinion, entirely destroys that grandeur which one would have imagined that a vast level plain would have possessed."

Darwin found a tooth of a native horse contemporary with the mastodon –on the Pampas of Buenos Ayres – though he says there is good evidence against any horse living in America at the time of Columbus– He speaks of their remains being common in N America. Owen has found Darwin's tooth similar to one Lyell brought from the U States –but unlike any other fossil or living & named this American horse equus curvidens –from a slight but peculiar curvature in it.

The great table land of Southern Mexico makes the division between N & S America with ref. to the migration of animals

Quotes Capt. Owen's Surveying voyage for saying that at the town of Benguela on the west coast of Africa in a time of great drought a number of elephants entered in a body to possess themselves of the wells, after a desperate conflict & the loss of one man the inhabitants –3000 –drove them off. During a great drought in India says Dr Malcomson, "a hare drank out of a vessel held by the adjutant of the regiment."

The Guanacos wild llama –& other animals of this genus –have the habit of dropping their dung from day to day in the same heap– The Peruvian Indians use it for fuel and are thus aided in collecting it.

Rowing up a stream which takes its rise in a mountain you meet at last with pebbles which have been washed down from it when many miles distant. I love to think of this kind of introduction to it.

The only quadruped native to the Falkland Islands is a large wolf-like fox. As far as he is aware, "there is no other instance in any part of the world of so small a mass of broken land, distant from a continent, possessing so large an aboriginal quadruped peculiar to itself."

In the Falkland Isles where other fuel is scarce they frequently cook their beef with the bones from which the meat has been scraped

Also They have "a green little bush about the size of common heath, which has the useful property of burning while fresh & green."

Saw a cormorant play with its fishy prey as a cat with a mouse, 8 times let it go & dive after it again.

Seminal propagation produces a more original individual than that by buds layers & grafts.

Some inhabitants of Tierra del Fuego having got some putrid whale's blubber in time of famine "an old man cut off thin slices and muttering over them, broiled them for a minute, and distributed them to the famished party, who during this time preserved a profound silence." This was the only evidence of any religious worship among them. It suggests that even the animals may have something divine in them & akin to revelation. Some inspiration, allying them to man as to God.

"Nor is it easy to teach them our superiority except by striking a fatal blow. Like wild beasts they do not appear to compare numbers; for each individual, if attacked, instead of retiring, will endeavor to dash your brains out with a stone, as certainly as a tiger under similar circumstances would tear you."

"We were well clothed, and though sitting close to the fire, were far from too warm; yet these naked savages, though further off, were observed, to our great surprise, to be streaming with perspiration at undergoing such a roasting."

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Ehrenberg examined some of the white paint with which the Fuegians daub themselves –and found it to be composed of infusoria, including 14 polygastrica, and 4 phytolitharia, inhabitants of fresh water –all old & known forms!!

Again of the Fuegians “Simple circumstances –such as the beauty of scarlet cloth or blue beads, the absence of women, our care in washing ourselves –excited their admiration far more than any grand or complicated object, such as our ship. Bougainville has well remarked concerning these people, that they treat the “chef-d’oeuvres de l’industrie humaine, comme ils traitent les loix de la nature, et ses phénomènes.”

He was informed of a tribe of foot-Indians now changing into horse-Indians –apparently in Patagonia.

“With the exception of a few berries, chiefly of a dwarf arbutus, the natives (i.e. of T. del-Fuego) eat no Vegetable food besides this fungus.” [Cyttaria Darwinii] the “only country where a cryptogamic plant affords a staple article of food.”

No reptiles in T. del Fuego nor in Falkland Islands.

Describes a species of kelp there –Macrocystis pyrifera– “I know few things more surprising than to see this plant growing and flourishing amidst those great breakers of the Western Ocean, which no mass of rock, let it be ever so hard, can long resist. – – A few [stems] taken together are sufficiently strong to support the weight of the large loose stones to which, in the inland channels, they grow attached; and yet some of these stones were so heavy that when drawn to the surface, they could scarcely be lifted into a boat by one person.” Capt. Cook thought that some of it grew to the length of 360 ft “The beds of this sea-weed even when not of great breadth,” says D. “make excellent natural floating breakwaters. It is quite curious to see, in an exposed harbor, how soon the waves from the open sea, as they travel through the straggling stems, sink in height, and pass into smooth water.”

Number of living creatures of all orders whose existence seems to depend on the kelp –a volume might be written on them. If a forest were destroyed anywhere so many species would not perish as if this weed were – & with the fish would go many birds & larger marine animals, and hence the Fuegian himself perchance.

Tree-ferns in Van Diemen’s Land (Lat 45°) 6 feet in circ.

Missionaries encountered icebergs in Patagonia in lat. corresponding to the Lake of Geneva, in a season corresponding to June in Europe. In Europe –the most southern glacier which comes down to the sea is on coast of Norway lat 67° 20° or 1230 nearer the pole.

erratic boulders not observed in the inter tropical parts of the world.– due to ice-bergs or glaciers.

Under Soil perpetually frozen in N. A. in 56° at 3 feet in Siberia in 62° at 12 to 15 ft

In an excursion from Valparaiso to the base of the Andes– “We unsaddled our horses near the spring and prepared to pass the night. The evening was fine, and the atmosphere so clear, that the masts of the vessels at anchor in the bay of Valparaiso, although no less than 26 geographical miles distant, could be distinguished clearly as little black streaks.”

Anson had been surprised at the distance at which his vessels were discovered from the coast without knowing the reason –the great height of the land and the transparency of the air.

Floating islands from 4 to 6 ft thick in lake Tagua-tagua in central Chile –blown about.

June 12, Thursday: Victor Hugo was fined and imprisoned for writing against capital punishment.

June 12, Thursday: Listen to music religiously as if it were the last strain you might hear.

There would be this advantage in travelling in your own country even in your own neighborhood, that you would be so thoroughly prepared to understand what you saw– You would make fewer traveller’s mistakes. Is not he hospitable who entertains thoughts?

July 7, Monday: Henry Thoreau went with Sexton Anthony Wright to view the universe through Perez Blood’s telescope. Just for the fun of it, I will illustrate this with a depiction, prepared in this very year by H. Dassel, which is not of Thoreau peering through Blood’s telescope but of the astronomer Maria Mitchell, peering presumably through her father’s telescope on the roof of his bank at the comet she had discovered (see following screen).

July 7, Monday: The intimations of the night are divine methinks. men might meet in the morning & report the news of the night.– What divine suggestions have been made to them I find that I carry with me into the day often some such hint derived from the gods Such impulses to purity –to heroism –to literary effort even as are never day-born.

One of those morning’s which usher in no day –but rather an endless morning –a protracted auroral season –for

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

clouds prolong the twilight the livelong day—
And now that there is an interregnum in the blossoming of the flowers so is there in the singing of the birds—
The golden robin is rarely heard —& the bobolink &c.

I rejoice when in a dream I have loved virtue & nobleness.

Where is Grecian History? It is when in the morning I recall the intimations of the night.

The moon is now more than half full.⁴³¹ When I come through the village at 10 o'clock this cold night —cold as in May —the heavy shadows of the elms covering the ground with their rich tracery impress me as if men had got so much more than they had bargained for —not only trees to stand in the air, but to check the ground with their shadows— At night they lie along the earth. They tower —they arch —they droop over the streets like chandeliers of darkness. In my walk the other afternoon I saw the sun shining into the depths of a thick pine wood, checkering the ground like moonlight —and illuminating the lichen-covered bark of a large white-pine, from which it was reflected Through the surrounding thicket as from another sun—; This was so deep in the woods that you would have said no sun could penetrate thither.

I have been tonight with Anthony Wright to look through Perez Bloods Telescope a 2nd time.⁴³² A dozen of his Bloods neighbors were swept along in the stream of our curiosity. One who lived half a mile this side said that Blood had been down that way within a day or two with his terrestrial or day glass looking into the eastern horizon the hills of Billerica Burlington —and Woburn— I was amused to see what sort of respect this man with a telescope had obtained from his neighbors —something akin to that which savages award to civilized men — though in this case the interval between the parties was very slight. Mr Blood with his scull cap on his short figure —his north European figure made me think of Tycho Brahe— He did not invite us into his house this cool evening —men nor women— Nor did he ever before to my knowledge

I am still contented to see the stars with my naked eye Mr Wright asked him what his instrument cost He answered — “Well, that is something I don't like to tell. (stuttering or hesitating in his speech a little, as usual) It is a very proper question however” — “Yes,” said I, “and you think that you have given a very proper answer.”

Returning my companion Wright the sexton told me how dusty he found it digging a grave that afternoon for one who had been a pupil of mine —for two feet he said, notwithstanding the rain, he found the soil as dry as ashes.

With a certain wariness, but not without a slight shudder at the danger oftentimes, I perceive how near I had come to admitting into my mind the details of some trivial affair, as a case at court— And I am astonished to observe how willing men are to lumber their minds with such rubbish —to permit idle rumors tales incidents even of an insignificant kind —to intrude upon what should be the sacred ground of the thoughts Shall the temple of our thought be a public arena where the most trivial affair of the market & the gossip of the teatable is discussed —a dusty noisy trivial place —or shall it be a quarter of heaven itself —a place consecrated to the service of the gods —a hypaethral temple. I find it so difficult to dispose of the few facts which to me are significant that I hesitate to burden my mind with the most insignificant which only a divine mind could illustrate. Such is for the most part the news —in newspapers & conversation. It is important to preserve the mind's chastity in this respect Think of admitting the details of a single case at the criminal court into the mind —to stalk profanely through its very sanctum sanctorum for an hour —aye for many hours— —to make a very bar-room of your mind's inmost apartment —as if for a moment the dust of the street had occupied you —aye the very street itself with all its travel passed through your very mind of minds —your thoughts shrine —with all its filth & bustle [possibly “hustle”]— Would it not be an intellectual suicide? By all manner of boards & traps threatening the extreme penalty of the divine law excluding trespassers from these grounds it behoves us to preserve the purity & sanctity of the mind. It is so hard to forget what it is worse than useless to remember. If I am to be a channel or thorough [thoroughfare] —I prefer that it be of the mountain springs —& not the town sewers— The Parnassian streams There is inspiration —the divine gossip which comes to the ear of the attentive mind —from the Courts of Heaven —there is the profane & stale revelation of the barroom & the police Court. The same ear is fitted to receive both communications —only the character of the individual determines to which source chiefly it shall be open & to which closed. I believe that the mind can be profaned by the habit of attending to trivial things so that all our thoughts shall be tinged with triviality. They shall be dusty as stones in the street— Our very minds shall be paved and macadamized as it were —its foundation broken into fragments for the wheels of travel to roll over. If we have thus desecrated ourselves the remedy will be by circumspection —& wariness by our aspiration & devotion to consecrate ourselves —to make a fane of the mind. I think that we should treat ourselves as innocent & ingenuous [ingenuous] children whose guardians we are —be careful what objects & what subjects we thrust on its attention⁴³³

Even the facts of science may dust the mind by their dryness —unless they are in a sense effaced each morning or rather rendered fertile by the dews of fresh & living truth. Every thought that passes through the mind helps to wear & tear it & to deepen the ruts which as in the streets of Pompeii evince how much it has been used. How many things there are concerning which we might well deliberate whether we had better know them. Routine —conventional manners &c &c —how insensibly and undue attention to these dissipates & impoverishes the mind —robs it of its simplicity & strength emasculates it. Knowledge doe[s] not cone [come] to us by details but by lieferungs from the gods. What else is it to wash & purify ourselves? Conventionalities are as bad as

431. The moon would have been half full on the 4th.

432. I don't know when the first time was.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

impurities. Only thought which is expressed by the mind in repose as it wer[e] lying on its back & contemplating the heaven's —is adequately & fully expressed— What are side long —transient passing half views? The writer expressing his thought —must be as well seated as the astronomer contemplating the heavens —he must not occupy a constrained position. The facts the experience we are well poised upon —! Which secures our whole attention!⁴³⁴

The senses of children are unprofaned their whole body is one sense —they take a physical pleasure in riding on a rail —they love to teter —so does the unviolated —the unsophisticated mind derive an inexpressable pleasure from the simplest exercise of thoughts.

I can express adequately only the thought which I love to express.— All the faculties in repose but the one you are using —the whole energy concentrated in that.

Be ever so little distracted —your thoughts so little confused— Your engagements so few —your attention so free your existence so mundane —that in all places & in all hours you can hear the sound of crickets in those seasons when they are to be heard. It is a mark of serenity & health of mind when a person hears this sound much —in streets of cities as well as in fields. Some ears never hear this sound —are called deaf. Is it not because they have so long attended to other sounds?

July 11, Friday: In San Francisco, California, James Stuart had been “arrested” on July 2d by a group of citizens who had turned over to a Committee of Vigilance. They hanged him on this day.

Henry Thoreau, walking at night with Ellery Channing, became concerned that Ellery seemed incapable of grasping the fact that Nature has a darker side:

433. Henry Thoreau would use some of the material from this day in regard to his “we should live in eternity rather than in time” theme, in his early lecture “WHAT SHALL IT PROFIT”:

[Paragraph 81] If we have thus desecrated ourselves,—as who has not?—the remedy will be by wariness and circumspection, by devotion and aspiration to reconsecrate ourselves—and make once more a fane of the mind. We should treat our minds—that is, ourselves—as innocent and ingenuous children, whose guardians we are, and be careful what objects and what subjects we thrust on their attention. Read not the Times.¹ Read the Eternities.² Even the facts of science may dust the mind by their dryness, unless they are in a sense effaced each morning, or rather rendered fertile by the dews of fresh and living truth. Knowledge does not come to us by details, but in flashes of light from heaven. Yes, every thought that passes through the mind helps to wear and tear it, and to deepen the ruts, which, as in the streets of Pompeii, evince how much it has been used. How many things there are concerning which we might well deliberate whether we had better know them—had better let their peddling carts be driven even at the slowest trot or walk—over that bridge of glorious span by which we trust to pass at last from the furthest brink of time to the nearest shore of eternity. Conventionalities are as bad as impurities. By an undue attention to routine, manners, and so forth,³ the mind is insensibly dissipated and impoverished—robbed of its simplicity and strength and, in short, emasculated.

1.“The Times” was presumably the London [Times.]

2.I [Bradley P. Dean] emend the essay copy-text by omitting ‘Conventionalities are at length as bad as impurities.’, which appears after this sentence in the essay but which appears without the words ‘at length’ as the penultimate sentence of this paragraph in the extant reading-draft manuscript.

3.I [Bradley P. Dean] emend the manuscript copy-text by expanding ‘&c’ to ‘and so forth’.

The poet W.H. Auden has in 1962 brought forward a snippet from this day’s entry as:

THE VIKING BOOK OF APHORISMS, A PERSONAL SELECTION BY W.H. AUDEN...

Pg	Topic	Aphorism Selected by Auden out of Thoreau
353	Reason and Thought	We should treat our minds as innocent and ingenious children whose guardians we are — be careful what objects and what subjects we thrust on their attention.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

July 11, Friday: At 7¹/₄ PM with W.E.C. go forth to see the moon the glimpses of the moon— We think she is not quite full— we can detect a little flatness on the eastern side.⁴³⁵ Shall we wear thick coats? The day has been warm enough, but how cool will the night be? It is not sultry as the last night. As a general rule, it is best to wear your thickest coat even in a July night. Which way shall we walk? North west—that we may see the moon returning— But on that side the river prevents our walking in the fields—and on other accounts that direction is not so attractive. We go toward Bear Garden Hill.⁴³⁶ The sun is setting. The meadow sweet has bloomed. These dry hills & pastures are the places to walk by moon light— The moon is silvery still—not yet inaugurated. The tree tops are seen against the amber west— Methinks I see the outlines of one spruce among them—distinguishable afar. My thoughts expand & flourish most on this barren hill where in the twilight I see the moss spreading in rings & prevailing over the short thin grass carpeting the earth—adding a few inches of green to its circle annually while it dies within.

As we round the sandy promontory we try the sand & rocks with our hands—the sand is cool on the surface but warmer a few inches beneath—though the contrast is not so great as it was in May. The larger rocks are

434. Thoreau would later use this comment pertaining to his “different drummer” theme, in his early lecture “WHAT SHALL IT PROFIT”:

[Paragraph 79] Not without a slight shudder at the danger, I often perceive how near I had come to admitting into my mind the details of some trivial affair,—the news of the street; and I am astonished to observe how willing men are to lumber their minds with such rubbish,—to permit idle rumors and incidents of the most insignificant kind to intrude on ground which should be sacred to thought. Shall the mind be a public arena, where the affairs of the street and the gossip of the tea-table chiefly are discussed? Or shall it be a quarter of heaven itself,—an hypæthral temple, consecrated to the service of the gods?¹ I find it so difficult to dispose of the few facts which to me are significant, that I hesitate to burden my attention with those which are insignificant, which only a divine mind could illustrate. Such is, for the most part, the news in newspapers and conversations. It is important to preserve the mind’s chastity in this respect. Think of admitting the details of a single case of the criminal court into our thoughts, to stalk profanely through their very sanctum sanctorum for an hour, ay, for many hours! to make a very bar-room of the mind’s inmost apartment, as if for so long the dust of the street had occupied us,—the very street itself, with all its travel, its bustle, and filth had passed through our thoughts’ shrine! Would it not be an intellectual and moral suicide?

[Paragraph 80] By all kinds of traps and sign-boards, threatening the extreme penalty of the divine law, exclude such trespassers from the only ground which can be sacred to you. It is so hard to forget what it is worse than useless to remember! If I am to be a thoroughfare, I prefer that it be of the mountain-brooks, the Parnassian streams, and not the town-sewers. There is inspiration, that gossip which comes to the ear of the attentive mind from the courts of heaven. There is the profane and stale revelation of the bar-room and the police court. The same ear is fitted to receive both communications. Only the character of the hearer determines to which it shall be open, and to which closed. I believe that the mind can be permanently profaned by the habit of attending to trivial things, so that all our thoughts shall be tinged with triviality. Our very intellect shall be macadamized, as it were,—its foundation broken into fragments for the wheels of travel to roll over; and if you would know what will make the most durable pavement, surpassing rolled stones—spruce blocks—and asphaltum—you have only to look into some of our minds which have been subjected to this treatment so long.

1. Compare I Corinthians 3:16.

DIFFERENT DRUMMER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

perceptibly warm. I pluck the blossom of the milk-weed in the twilight & find how sweet it smells. The white blossoms of the Jersey tea dot the hill side—with the yarrow everywhere. Some woods are black as clouds—if we knew not they were green by day, they would appear blacker still. When we sit we hear the mosquitoes hum. The woodland paths are not the same by night as by day—if they are a little grown up the eye cannot find them—but must give the reins to the feet as the traveller to his horse—so we went through the aspens at the base of the cliffs—their round leaves reflecting the lingering twilight on the one side the waxing moon light on the other—always the path was unexpectedly open.

Now we are getting into moon light. We see it reflected from particular stumps in the depths of the darkest woods, and from the stems of trees, as if it selected what to shine on.— a silvery light. It is a light of course which we have had all day but which we have not appreciated— And proves how remarkable a lesser light can be when a greater has departed. Here simply & naturally the moon presides— 'Tis true she was eclipsed by the sun—but now she acquires an almost equal respect & worship by reflecting & representing him—with some new quality perchance added to his light—showing how original the disciple may be—who still in mid-day is seen though pale & cloud-like beside his master. Such is a worthy disciple— In his masters presence he still is seen & preserves a distinct existence—& in his absence he reflects & represents him—not without adding some new quality to his light—not servile & never rival— As the master withdraws himself the disciple who was a pale cloud before begins to emit a silvery light—acquiring at last a tinge of golden as the darkness deepens, but not enough to scorch the seeds which have been planted or to dry up the fertilising dews which are falling.

BAKER FARM

Passing now near Well meadow head toward Bakers orchard— The sweet fern & Indigo weed fill the path up to ones middle wetting us with dews so high The leaves are shining & flowing— We wade through the luxuriant vegetation seeing no bottom— Looking back toward the cliffs some dead trees in the horizon high on the rocks make a wild New Hampshire prospect. There is the faintest possible mist over the pond holes, where the frogs are eructating—like the falling of huge drops—the bursting of mephitic air bubbles rising from the bottom—a sort of blubbing Such conversation as I have heard between men.— a belching conversation expressing a sympathy of stomachs & abdomens. The peculiar appearance of the Indigo weed, its misty massiveness is striking. In Baker's Orchard the thick grass looks like a sea of mowing in this weird moonlight—a bottomless sea of grass— our feet must be imaginative—must know the earth in imagination only as well as our heads. We sit on the fence, & where it is broken & interrupted the fallen & slanting rails are lost in the grass (really thin & wiry) as in water. We ever see our tracks a long way behind, where we have brushed off the dew. The clouds are peculiarly wispy wispy tonight some what like fine flames—not massed and dark nor downy—not thick but slight thin wisps of mist—

BAKER FARM

I hear the sound of Heywood's brook falling into Fair Haven Pond—inexpressibly refreshing to my senses—it seems to flow through my very bones.— I hear it with insatiable thirst— It allays some sandy heat in me— It affects my circulations—methinks my arteries have sympathy with it What is it I hear but the pure water falls within me in the circulation of my blood—the streams that fall into my heart?— what mists do I ever see but such as hang over—& rise from my blood— The sound of this gurgling water—running thus by night as by day—falls on all my dashes—fills all my buckets—overflows my float boards—turns all the machinery of my nature makes me a flume—a sluice way to the springs of nature— Thus I am washed thus I drink—& quench my thirst. Where the streams fall into the lake if they are only a few inches more elevated all walkers may hear—

BAKER FARM

On the high path through Bakers wood I see or rather feel the Tephrosia— Now we come out into the open pasture. And under those woods of elm & button wood where still no light is seen—repose a family of human beings By night there is less to distinguish this locality from the woods & meadows we have threaded.

We might go very near to Farm houses covered with ornamental trees & standing on a high road, thinking that were in the most retired woods & fields still. Having yielded to sleep man is a less obtrusive inhabitant of nature. Now having reached the dry pastures again—we are surrounded by a flood of moon light— The dim cart path over the wood curves gracefully through the Pitch-pines, ever to some more fairy-like spot. The rails in the fences shine like silver— We know not whether we are sitting on the ruins of a wall—or the materials which are to compose a new one. I see half-a mile off a phosphorescent arc on the hill side where Bartlett's cliff reflects the moon light. Going by the shanty I smell the excrements of its inhabitants which I had never smelt before.

And now at half past 10 o'clock I hear the cockrils crow in Hubbard's barns.— and morning is already anticipated. It is the feathered wakeful thought in us that anticipates the following day. This sound is wonderfully exhilarating at all times. These birds are worth far more to me for their crowing & cackling—than for their drumsticks & eggs. How singular the connexion of the hen with man, that she leaves her eggs in his barns always—she is a domestic fowl though still a little shyish of him— I cannot looking at the whole as an experiment still and wondering that in each case it succeeds. There is no doubt at last but hens may be kept – they will put their eggs in your barn – by a tacit agreement – They will not wander far from your yard.

435. Actually, this was the night of the full moon. At 7PM there was no flatness whatever on the eastern side:

436. In recent years Bear Garden Hill has been proposed for a condo complex, to accompany the office development that had been proposed for Brister's Hill (but which has since been defeated).

STATE MURDER

JAMES BAKER

July 19, Saturday: It was being reported in the gazettes that in England a determined effort was being made to convert everyone to Mormonism.

Mormonism — The Sheffield Independent states that the Mormons have determined on a great and systematic attempt to convert England to Mormonism. They are at this moment adding to their churches, by adult baptism, 400 disciples every month. So confident are they, that they propose to hold a great Mormon Conference in London in the month of June.

On November 20th, 1850, because he had been determinedly living beyond his means, Count Hippolyte Visart de Bocarmé had needed to invite his well-to-do one-legged young brother-in-law Gustave Fougnyes to dinner at his château of Bury, Belgium and poison him (previously, using a false name, the count had consulted a professor of chemistry and had conducted experiments on cats and ducks to verify that the sort of alkaloids present in Nicotiana tabacum would indeed induce death, and had prepared two wine bottles containing concentrated nicotine). On this day the count was taken to the guillotine in one of the squares of Mons – the blade, at the convicted man's request, having been freshly sharpened – and his head was neatly taken off.

To the displeasure of the Belgian audience of thousands, Lydie Victoire Josèphe Fougnyes, countess of Bocarmé, who had been a full participant in the murder and subsequent destruction of evidence, had been presumed to have been under duress (one may doubt that she even attended at the event of the demise of her husband).

HEADCHOPPING

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

July 19, Saturday: Here I am 34 years old, and yet my life is almost wholly unexpanded. How much is in the germ! There is such an interval between my ideal and the actual in many instances that I may say I am unborn. There is the instinct for society –but no society. Life is not long enough for one success. Within another 34 years that miracle can hardly take place. Methinks my seasons revolve more slowly than those of nature, I am differently timed. I am –contented. This rapid revolution of nature even of nature in me –why should it hurry me. Let a man step to the music which he hears however measured. Is it important that I should mature as soon as an apple tree? Ye, as soon as an oak?⁴³⁷ May not my life in nature, in proportion as it is supernatural, be only the spring & infantile portion of my spirit's life shall I turn my spring to summer? May I not sacrifice a hasty & petty completeness here –to entireness there? If my curve is large –why bend it to a smaller circle? My spirits unfolding observes not the pace of nature. The society which I was made for is not here, shall I then substitute for the anticipation of that this poor reality. I would have the unmixed expectation of that than this reality.

DIFFERENT DRUMMER

If life is a waiting –so be it. I will not be shipwrecked on a vain reality. What were any reality which I can substitute. Shall I with pains erect a heaven of blue glass over myself though when it is done I shall be sure to gaze still on the true etherial heaven –far above as if the former were not –that still distant sky oer arching that blue expressive eye of heaven. I am enamored of the blue eyed arch of heaven

I did not make this demand for a more thorough sympathy. This is not my idiosyncrasy or disease. He that made the demand will answer the demand.

My blood flows as slowly as the waves of my native Musketaquid –yet they reach the ocean sooner perchance than those of the Nashua.

Already the golden-rod is budded, but I can make no haste for that.

July 19, Saturday: 2 Pm The weather is warm & dry –& many leaves curl. There is a threatening cloud in the SW. The farmers dare not spread their hay. It remains cocked in the fields. As you walk in the woods now a days the flies striking against your hat sound like rain drops. The stump or root fences on the Corner road remind me of fossil remains of mastodons &c exhumed and bleached in sun & rain. To day I met with the first orange flower of autumn– What means this doubly torrid –this Bengal tint– Yellow took sun enough –but this is the fruit of a dogday sun. The year has but just produced it. Here is the Canada thistle in bloom visited by butterflies & bees The butterflies have swarmed within these few days especially about the milkweed's. The swamp pink still fills the air with its perfume in swamps & by the causeways –though it is far gone. The wild rose still scatters its petals over the leaves of neighboring plants. The wild morning glory or bind-weed with its delicate red & white blossoms– I remember it ever as a goblet full of purest morning air & sparkling with 437. William M. White's version is:

*Methinks my seasons revolve more slowly
Than those of nature;
I am differently timed.
I am contented.*

*This rapid revolution of nature,
Even of nature in me,
Why should it hurry me?*

*Let a man step to the music which he hears,
However measured.
Is it important that I should mature
As soon as an apple tree?
Aye, as soon as an oak?*

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

dew. showing the dew point –winding round itself for want of other support– It grows by the Hubbard bridge causeway near the Angelica. The cherry birds [Cedar Waxwing Bombycilla cedrorum] are making their seringo sound as they flit past. They soon find out the locality of the cherry trees. And beyond the bridge there is a golden rod partially blossomed. Yesterday it was spring & to-morrow it will be autumn– Where is the summer then? First came the St Johns wort & now the golden rod to admonish us. I hear too a cricket amid these stones under the blackberry vines –singing as in the fall. Ripe blackberries are multiplying. I see the red-spotted berries of the small solomons seal in my path. I notice in the decayed end of an oak post that the silver grain is not decayed –but remains sound in thin flakes alternating with the decayed portions, & giving the whole a honey-combed look.– Such an object supramundane –as even a swallow may descend to light on –a dry mullein stalk for instance – – I see that hens too follow the cows feeding near the house like the cowtroopial [Brown-headed Cowbird Molothrus ater] –& for the same object. They cannot so well scare up insects for themselves. This is the dog the cowbird uses to start its insect game

I see yellow butterflies in pairs pursuing each other –a rod or two into the air & now as he had bethought himself of the danger of being devoured by a passing birds he descends with a zig zag flight to the earth & the other follows. The black huckleberries are now so thick among the green ones that they no longer incur suspicion of being worm eaten. When formerly I was looking about to see what I could do for a living –some sad experience in conforming to the wishes of friends being fresh in my mind to tax my ingenuity –I thought often & seriously of picking huckleberries –that surely I could do, and its small profits might suffice. So little capital it required –so little distraction from my wonted thoughts I foolishly thought– While my acquaintances went unhesitatingly into trade or the professions I thought of this occupation as most like theirs. ranging the hills all summer to pick the berries which came in my way which I might carelessly dispose of –so to keep the flocks of king Admetus– My greatest skill has been to want but little. I also dreammed that I might gather the wild herbs –or carry evergreens to such villagers as love to be reminded of the woods & so find my living got. But I have since learned that trade curses everything it handles. & though you trade in messages from heaven –the whole curse of trade attaches to the business.

The wind rises more & more The river & the pond are blacker than the threatening cloud in the south– The thunder mutters in the distance– The surface of the water is slightly rippled– Where the pads grow is a light green border– The woods roar. Small white clouds are hurrying across the dark blue ground of the storm – which rests on all the woods of the South horizon But still no rain now for some hours as if the clouds were dissipated as fast as they reached this atmosphere.

The barberry's fruit hangs yellowish green– What pretty covers the thick bush makes so large & wide & drooping. The Fringilla juncorum⁴³⁸ sings still in spite of the coming tempest which perchance only threatens The wood chuck is a good native of the soils. The distant hills side & the grain fields & pastures are spotted yellow or white with his recent burrows –and the small mounds remain for many years Here where the clover has lately been cut, see what a yellow mound is brought to light!

Heavily hangs the Common Yellow lily Lilium Canadense in the meadows– In the thick alder copses by the causeway side I find the Lysimachia hybrida. Here is the Lactuca Sanguinea with its runcinate leaves –tall-stem & pale crimson ray. And that green stemmed one higher than my head resembled the last in its leaves –is perchance the “tall lettuce or Fire weed. Can that fine white flowered meadow plant with the leaf be a Thalictrum?

BARBERRY

438. Thoreau could not have intended here the bird then known as Fringilla or F. linaria (Common Redpoll Carduelis flammea), for this record is for the month of July and that bird winters in Concord and summers in the far north. He must have intended the bird then known as juncorum (Field Sparrow Spizella pusilla). So, can anyone explain why he wrote Fringilla juncorum, other than as a mere slip of the pen?

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

August 16, Saturday: Some of López's filibusters having been captured at sea, they had been taken to Havana, and on this day the last 51 members of the regiment (excepting Narciso López himself) were executed by firing squad.

August 16, Saturday: Agrimonia Eupatoria small flowered (yellow) plant with hispid fruit 2 or 3 feet high turnpike at Tuttle's peatmead. Hemp –Cannabis sativa said by Gray to have been introduced not named by Bigelow –is it not a native?

BIGELOW

It is true man can and does live by preying on other animals, but this is a miserable way of sustaining himself –and he will be regarded as a benefactor of his race –along with Prometheus & Christ –who shall teach men to live on a more innocent & wholesome diet. Is it not already acknowledged to be a reproach that man is a carnivorous animal?

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

August 24, Sunday: The Australian immigrants Samuel Whittaker and Robert McKenzie, members of a criminal organization known as the “Sydney Ducks,” were “rescued from the authorities” of the county jail of San Francisco, California by a citizens’ “Vigilance Committee” while Sheriff John C. “Jack” Hays was observing a bullfight (most likely “wittingly or unwittingly” lured away), and were lynched before an audience of 15,000 citizens at 3PM. A lithograph was promptly circulated, showing the men hanging from block and tackle at the ends of commercial buildings on a dock, with Telegraph Hill notable in the background.

Australian immigrants, in general, would flee from the settlement.

August 24, Sunday: Mollugo verticillata, carpet weed, flat, whorl-leaved weed in gardens with small white flowers— Portulaca oleracea Purslane with its yellow blossoms — Chelone Glabra. I have seen the small mulleins as big as a ninepence in the fields for a day or two. [The word “mulleins” is queried in pencil.]

The weather is warmer again after a week or more of cool days— There is greater average warmth — but not such intolerable heat as in July— The nights especially are more equally warm now even when the day has been comparatively rather cool. There are few days now — fewer than in July, when you cannot lie at your length on the grass— You have now forgotten winter & its fashions & have learned new summer fashions. Your life may be out of doors now mainly.

Rattlesnake grass is ripe. The pods of the Asclepias pulchra stand up pointedly like slender vases — on a salver — an open salver truly!

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

—Those of the Asclepias Syriaca hang down. The interregnum in the blossoming of flowers being well over Many small flowers blossom now in the low grounds having just reached their summer— It is now dry enough— & they feel the heat their tenderness required. The Autumnal flowers Golden rods — Asters & Johnswort though they have made demonstrations have not yet commenced to reign. The tansy is already getting stale it is perhaps the first conspicuous yellow flower that passes from the stage— [Channing, page 215]

In Hubbard's swamp where the blue berries — Dangle berries & especially the Pyrus or chokeberries were so abundant last summer — there is now perhaps not one (unless a blueberry) to to be found. Where the chokeberries held on all last winter — the black & the red.

The Common skull-cap Scutellaria Galericulata quite a handsome & middling large blue flower— Lobelia pallida still— Pointed Cleavers or Clivers Galium asprellum.

Is that the naked Viburnum so common with its white —red —then purple berries? —in Hubbards meadow. [Yes.] Did I find the Dwarf Tree Primrose in Hubbard's meadow today? Stachys aspera Hedge Nettle or Woundwort a rather handsome purplish flower—

The Capsules of the Iris versicolor or blue flag are now ready for humming. Elder berries are ripe.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1852

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1852

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
16/03	Elizabeth Pinchard	51	Northampton	Murder
10/04	Sarah French	27	Lewes	Murder of husband

January 23, Friday: The case of John Gordon, hanged for the murder of Amasa Sprague, had been being discussed in Rhode Island for seven years. Had he been guilty of a crime, or had he been the innocent Catholic/Irish impoverished immigrant victim of a rush to judgment and a judicial murder?

The Orléans family (the former ruling house) was banned from France by President Louis-Napoléon Bonaparte.

January 23, Friday: The snow is so deep & the cold so intense that the crows [American Crow Corvus brachyrhynchos] are compelled to be very bold in seeking their food – and come very near the houses in the village. One is now walking about & pecking the dung in the street in front of Frank Munroe's. They remind me as they sail along over the street of the turkey buzzards of the south & perhaps many hard winters in succession would make them as tame.

There is a vegetable life as well as a spiritual & animal life in us – for the hair & nails continue to grow after the anima has left the body & the spiritual & animal life it is dead. There is also probably an inorganic mineral life.

The surface of the snow on the 20th was not yet disturbed or rippled even by the wind.

P.m. Deep Cut going to Fair Haven Hill No music from the telegraph harp on the causeway – where the wind is strong but in the cut this cold day I hear memorable strains. What must the birds & beasts think where it passes through woods – who heard only the squeaking of the trees before? I should think that these strains would get into their music at last. Will not the mocking bird be heard one day inserting this strain in his medley? It intoxicates me. Orpheus is still alive – All poetry and mythology revive – The spirits of all bards sweep the strings. I hear the clearest silver lyre-like tones – Tertian tones. I think of Menander & the rest – It is the most glorious music I ever heard. All those bards revive & flourish again in that half-hour in the deep-cut. The breeze came through an oak still wearing its dry leaves The very fine clear tones seemed to come from the very core & pith of the telegraph pole. I know not but it is my own chords that tremble so divinely. There are barytones – & high sharp tones &c Some come sweeping seemingly from further along the wire. The latent music of the earth had found here a vent. Music AEolian – There were 2 strings in fact one each side

AEOLIAN HARP

I do not know but this will make me read the Greek poets. Thus as ever the finest uses of things are the accidental. Mr Morse did not invent this music.

I see where the squirrels have torn the pine-cones in pieces for the sake of to come at their seeds. And in some cases the mice? have nibbled the buds of the pitch pines where the plums have been bent down by the snow.

The Blue Hills of Milton are now White.

Lindley in Loudon dismisses the winter berries by saying “The species are low shrubs of little beauty.”

There are some whose ears help me so that my things have a rare significance when I read to them. It is almost too good a hearing – so that for the time I regard my own writing from too favorable a point of view.

Just before sunset there were few clouds or specks to be seen in the western sky – but the sun gets down lower, and many dark clouds are made visible – their sides toward us being darkened. In the bright light they were but floating feathers of vapor – now they swell into dark evening clouds.

It is a fair sunset with many purplish fishes in the horizon – pinkish & golden with bright edges – like a school of purplish whales they sail or float down from the north – Or like leopards skins they hang in the west. – If the sun goes behind a cloud – it is still reflected from the least haziness or vapor in that part of the sky – the air is so clear – and the after glow is remarkably long – And now the blaze is put out – and only a few glowing clouds like the flickering light of the fire skirt the west. And now only the brands and embers mixed with smoke make an Indian red along the horizon. And the new moon⁴³⁹ & the evening star together preside over the twilight scene.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

VENUS

The thermometer was at 21° this morning

Some botanical names have originated in a mere blunder. Thus the Cytharexylum melanocardium of the West Ind. "called by the French fidele, from its faithfulness or durability in building," the English have corrupted into fiddle-wood & so the genus goes. It is unfit for musical instruments – Lindley

February 1, Sunday: John White died after a brief illness, at the age of 64.

Mr. White's preparatory studies were carried on at the seminary in Exeter, and he entered Harvard College at the age of thirteen. He graduated in 1805, and with a good reputation as a student. He was then a tutor in Bowdoin College for a short period. His theological studies were begun under the instruction of the Rev. Joseph Chickering, of Woburn, and were concluded under Dr. Ware in Cambridge. At this period, he held some connection with the college, probably as a tutor. "There I first saw him," says Dr. Lamson, "and I remembered well the same look, —grave, sincere, respectful, and full of self-respect,— which he never ceased to wear; and I know how greatly he was esteemed by acquaintances and friends." ...During the ministry of Mr. White, the parish became Unitarian; but it became so without any special agitation, and probably without controversy or bitterness of any kind. His preaching was practical, and not theological; and it was calculated to teach men how to live rather than how to settle disputed points in religion. People of all shades of belief heard his preaching, and all alike were edified by it. He drove no one away by what he said, because he said nothing at which any one could take offense. He was devout, trusting, possessed of the true spirit of a living faith; and he made religion real and helpful to those who heard him. His aim was to develop a pure and holy living, in the gospel manner and purpose. He was not an aggressive Unitarian, sought no controversies with those of other religious professions, and had no desire to promote the interests of a sect. His Unitarianism was that of the first generation of its professed advocates in this country, who wished to return to the pure and simple teachings of Jesus, and who wished to get rid of all theology that was in opposition to the ten commandments, the Sermon on the Mount, a pure trust in God and a future life, and who found in Jesus a Master to whom they gave the truest reverence. They took the Bible as their creed, and they gave it a generous and a loving interpretation.

Henri-Frédéric Amiel, who would be referred to as the "Swiss Thoreau," wrote in his JOURNAL INTIME: "Passed the afternoon in reading the Monologues of Schleiermacher. This little book made an impression on me almost as deep as it did twelve years ago, when I read it for the first time. It replunged me into the inner world, to which I return with joy whenever I may have forsaken it. I was able besides, to measure my progress since then by the transparency of all the thoughts to me, and by the freedom with which I entered into and judged the point of view.

It is great, powerful, profound, but there is still pride in it, and even selfishness. For the center of the universe is still the self, the great Ich of Fichte. The tameless liberty, the divine dignity of the individual spirit, expanding till it admits neither any limit nor anything foreign to itself, and conscious of a strength instinct with creative force, such is the point of view of the Monologues.

The inner life in its enfranchisement from time, in its double end, the realization of the species and of the individuality, in its proud dominion over all hostile circumstances, in its prophetic certainty of the future, in its immortal youth, such is their theme. Through them we are enabled to enter into a life of monumental 439. January 21st and 22nd had been the nights of no moon.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

interest, wholly original and beyond the influence of anything exterior, an astonishing example of the autonomy of the ego, an imposing type of character, Zeno and Fichte in one. But still the motive power of this life is not religious; it is rather moral and philosophic. I see in it not so much a magnificent model to imitate as a precious subject of study. This ideal of a liberty, absolute, indefeasible, inviolable, respecting itself above all, disdaining the visible and the universe, and developing itself after its own laws alone, is also the ideal of Emerson, the stoic of a young America. According to it, man finds his joy in himself, and, safe in the inaccessible sanctuary, of his personal consciousness, becomes almost a god.

He is himself principle, motive, and end of his own destiny; he is himself, and that is enough for him. This superb triumph of life is not far from being a sort of impiety, or at least a displacement of adoration. By the mere fact that it does away with humility, such a superhuman point of view becomes dangerous; it is the very temptation to which the first man succumbed, that of becoming his own master by becoming like unto the Elohim. Here then the heroism of the philosopher approaches temerity, and the Monologues are therefore open to three reproaches: Ontologically, the position of man in the spiritual universe is wrongly indicated; the individual soul, not being unique and not springing from itself, can it be conceived without God?

Psychologically, the force of spontaneity in the ego is allowed a dominion too exclusive of any other. As a fact, it is not everything in man. Morally, evil is scarcely named, and conflict, the condition of true peace, is left out of count. So that the peace described in the Monologues is neither a conquest by man nor a grace from heaven; it is rather a stroke of good fortune."

February 1, Sunday: When I hear that a Friend on whom I relied has spoken of me not with cold words perhaps but even with a cold and indifferent tone to another, ah! what treachery I feel it to be! the sum of all crimes against humanity. My friend may cherish a thousand suspicions against me—and they may but represent his faith and expectations—till he cherishes them so heartlessly that he can speak of them.

If I have not succeeded in my friendships it was because I demanded more of them—& did not put up with what I could get—and I got no more partly because I gave so little.

I must be dumb to those who, I have not faith, appreciate my actions, not knowing the springs of them.

While we preach obedience to human laws & to that portion of the divine laws set forth in the New Testament—The natural laws of genius of love & friendship we do not preach nor insist upon. How many a seeming heartlessness is to be explained by the very abundance of the heart. How much of seeming recklessness even selfishness is to be explained by obedience to this code of the divine laws. It is evident that as buyers & sellers—we obey a very different law from what we do as lovers & Friends. The Hindoo is not to be tried in all things by the Christian standard, nor the Christian by the Hindoo. How much fidelity to law of a kind not commonly recognized—how much magnanimity even may be thrown away on mankind! Is like pearls cast before swine! The hero obeys his own law—the Christian—his—the lover & friend theirs— They are to some extent different codes. What incessant tragedy between men where one silently obeys the code of Friendship—the other the code of Philanthropy—in their dealings with one another. As our constitutions our geniuses are different—so are our standards, and we are amenable to different codes. My neighbor asks me in vain to be good as he is good. I must be good as I am made to be good, Whether I am heathen or christian. Every man's laws are hard enough to obey. The christian falls as far short of obeying the heathen's moral law as the heathen does. One of little faith looks for his rewards & punishments to the next world—& despairing of this world behaves accordingly in it—another thinks the present a worthy occasion & arena—sacrifices to it and expects to hear sympathizing voices. The man who believes in another world and not in this is wont to put me off with christianity— The present moment in which we talk is of a little less value to him than the next world— So we are said to hope in proportion as we do not realize. It is all hope deferred. But one grain of realization—of instant life—on which we stand is equivalent to acres of the leaf of hope hammered out—to gild our prospect— The former so qualifies the vision that it gilds all that we look upon with the splendor of truth.⁴⁴⁰ We must meet the hero on heroic grounds.— Some tribes inhabit the Mts. Some dwell on the plain. We discourage one another. We obey different laws.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Is not the midnight like central africa to most? Are we not tempted to explore it—to penetrate to the shores of its Lake Tchad—to discover the sources of its Nile perchance in the Mts of the moon? Who knows what fertility what beauty in the animal & vegetable kingdom are there to be found. What primeval simplicity & reflexion of the truth among its dusky inhabitants. We illuminate only the first hours of the night. The light behind the face of the clock on the state house in Philadelphia extinguished at 11 o'clock Pm with punctuality—to save oil. Those hours are resigned to a few watchmen in the cities. watching for the disgrace of humanity— Shall we never have watchmen in the country of another sort—watching for the glory of God.

In the Mts of the moon—in the Central Africa of the night— There is where all Niles hide their heads. The expeditions up the niles extend but to the Cataracts past the ruins of Thebes— —or perchance to the mouth of the White Nile— —but it is the Black Nile that concerns us. Of some of the great rivers—like the Nile & the Orinoco? men still only conjecture the sources.

Shall we ask the watch-men—the city police to tell us of the night—what its signs of gladness are—?! Are these the questions we shall put to the watchmen? Who then shall we put them to.? Or is there none who can answer them?

Each thing is attracted to each—& running to coalesce. like drops of water The fingers incline to be webbed— & run together. When I hold mine up to the light & bring them near together—such are the laws of light that just before they touch—a web appears to grow on them & unite them— So of objects seen through imperfections in glass.

It depends upon how a man has spent his day—whether he has any right to be in his bed. So spend some hours that you may have a right to sleep in the sunshine.

My friends! My friends! it does not cheer me to see them. They but express their want of faith in me or in mankind—their coldest cruellest thought comes clothed in polite & easy spoken words at last. I am silent to their invitations—because I do not feel invited.— & we have no reasons to give for what we do not do. One says love me out of this mire— The other says come out of it & be lovely. One speaks with scorn of the scorners.

In the winter the botanist can study lichens

The recent rush to California & the attitude of its philosophers & prophets in relation to it—appears to me to reflect the greatest disgrace on mankind. That so many are ready to get their living by the lottery of gold digging without contributing any value to society—and that the great majority who stay at home justify them in this both by precept and example— It matches the infatuation of the Hindoos who have cast themselves under the car of Juggernaut. I know of no more startling development of the morality of trade and all the modes of getting a living that the rush to California affords. Of what significance the Philosophy—or poetry or religion of a world that will rush to the lottery of California gold digging on the receipt of the first news—to live by luck to get the means of commanding the labor of others less lucky, ie. of slaveholding—without contributing any value to society—and that is called enterprise and the devil is only a little more enterprising. The philosophy & Poetry & religion of such a mankind are not worth the dust of a puff-ball The hog that roots his own living would be ashamed of such company. If I could command the wealth of all the worlds by lifting my finger I would not pay so mean a price for it. It makes God to be a moneyed gentleman who scatters a handful of pennies in order to

440. Henry Thoreau would combine with an entry made on February 9, 1852 to form the following paragraph of his early lecture “WHAT SHALL IT PROFIT”:

[Paragraph 43] God gave the righteous man a certificate entitling him to food and raiment,¹ but the unrighteous man found a facsimile of the same in God's coffers, and appropriated it, and obtained food and raiment like the former. It is one of the most extensive systems of counterfeiting that the world has seen. I did not know that mankind were suffering for want of gold. I have seen a little of it. I know that it is very malleable, but not so malleable as wit. A grain of gold will gild a great surface, but not so much as a grain of wisdom.

1. An allusion to MATTHEW 6:25.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

HANGING

see mankind scramble for them. Going to California. It is only 3000 miles nearer to Hell. I will resign my life sooner than live by luck. The World's raffle. A subsistence in the domains of nature a thing to be raffled for! No wonder that they gamble there. I never heard that they did anything else there. What a comment what a satire on our institutions! The conclusion will be that mankind will hang itself upon a tree. And have all the precepts in all the bibles taught men only this—and is the last and most admirable invention of the Yankee race—only an improved muckrake?—patented too! If one came hither to sell lottery tickets—bringing satisfactory credentials—and the prizes were seats in heaven—this world would buy them with a rush.⁴⁴¹

Did god direct us so to get our living digging where we never planted, and he would perchance reward us with lumps of gold! It is a text oh! for the Jonahs of this generation—and yet the pulpits are as silent as immortal Greece—silent—some of them, because the preacher is gone to California himself. The gold of California is a touch-stone which has betrayed the rottenness the baseness of mankind. Satan showed mankind the kingdom of California and they entered into a compact with him at once—

God gave a man a certificate of righteousness which secured him food & raiment—but the rest were discontented & envied him. But at last news came that one had discovered a depository of like certificates intended also for the righteous in times to come— and a cry went up from all lands and sinners rushed thither from all parts & appropriated them.

God gave the righteous man a certificate entitling him to food & raiment but the unrighteous man found a facsimile in God's coffers, and appropriated it and obtained food & raiment like the former.

There are some things which God may afford to smile at—man can-not.

February 11, Wednesday: The Rhode Island General Assembly abolished capital punishment even for such crimes as murder and arson. (In 1872, the General Assembly would re-enact the penalty of death by hanging, for a murder committed while under sentence of life imprisonment.)

READ EDWARD FIELD TEXT

In California, Candelario Valencia laid claim to lands at the Mission Dolores.

February 11: When the thermometer is down to 20° in the morning, as last month, I think of the poor dogs who have no masters.

If a poor dog has no master, every body will throw a billet of wood at him. it never rains but it pours
It now rains—a drizzling rain mixed with mist—which ever and anon fills the air to the height of 15 or 20 feet—
It makes what they call an old fashioned mill-privelege in the streets—i.e. I suppose a privelege on a small stream good only for a part of the year.

Perhaps the best evidence of an amelioration of the climate—at least that the snows are less deep than formerly—is the snow-shoes which still lie about in so many garrets—now useless—though the population of this town has not essentially increased for 75 years past—and the travelling within the limits of the town accordingly not much facilitated. No man ever uses them now—yet the old men used them in their youth.

I have lived some 30 odd years on this planet and I have yet to hear the first syllable of valuable or even earnest advice from my seniors. They have told me nothing and probably can tell me nothing to the purpose. There is life—an experiment untried by me—& it does not avail me that you have tried it. If I have any valuable experience I am sure to reflect that this my mentors said nothing about. What were mysteries to the child, remain mysteries to the old man

It is a mistake to suppose that in a country where rail roads & steamboats the printing press and the church and the usual evidences of what is called civilization exists the condition of a very large body of the inhabitants cannot be as degraded as that of savages. Savages have their high & their low estate—& so have civilized nations. To know this I should not need to look further than the shanties which everywhere line our rail roads—that last improvement in civilization. But I will refer you to Ire Land, which is marked as one of the white or enlightened spots on the map— Yet I have no doubt that that nations rulers are as wise as the averaged of civilized rulers.

DOG

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

July 30, Friday: Jefferson Davis's wife Varina gave birth to a son whom they would name Samuel Emory Davis.

Nathaniel Hawthorne learned of the death of his younger sister in the burning and sinking of the steamer Henry Clay. In George Templeton Strong's New York diary we find some interesting applications of

441. Thoreau would copy this into "WHAT SHALL IT PROFIT" as:

[Paragraph 42] The rush to California, for instance, and the attitude, not merely of merchants, but of philosophers and prophets, so called, in relation to it, reflect the greatest disgrace on mankind. That so many are ready to live by luck, and so get the means of commanding the labor of others less lucky, without contributing any value to society! And that is called enterprise! I know of no more startling development of the immorality of trade, and all the common modes of getting a living. The philosophy and poetry and religion of such a mankind are not worth the dust of a puff-ball. The hog that gets his living by rooting, stirring up the soil so, would be ashamed of such company. If I could command the wealth of all the worlds by lifting my finger, I would not pay such a price for it. I would not buy a ticket in a lottery even if the prize were a seat in heaven.¹ It makes God to be a moneyed gentleman who scatters a handful of pennies in order to see mankind scramble for them. The world's raffle! A subsistence in the domains of Nature a thing to be raffled for! What a comment, what a satire on our institutions! The conclusion will be, that mankind will hang itself upon a tree.² And have all the precepts in all the Bibles taught men only this? and is the last and most admirable invention of the human race only an improved muck-rake?³ Is this the ground on which Orientals and Occidentals meet? Did God direct us so to get our living, digging where we never planted,—and He would, perchance, reward us with lumps of gold?⁴ And yet the pulpits are silent—silent, some of them, because the preacher is gone to California.⁵ Satan, from one of his elevations, showed mankind the kingdom of California, and instead of the cry, "Get thee behind me, Satan,"⁶ they shouted, "Go ahead!"⁷ and he had to exert himself to get there first.

1. Bradley P. Dean has emended the essay copy-text by substituting this sentence for the sentence 'Even Mahomet knew that God did not make this world in jest.' His justification is the Nantucket Inquirer summary which is the source for this sentence, plus a similar sentence "If one came hither to sell lottery tickets, bringing satisfactory credentials, and the prizes were seats in heaven, this world would buy them with a rush" in the journal source of this paragraph.

2. An allusion to the report in MATTHEW 27:3-5 that after betraying Jesus, Judas hanged himself.

3. In John Bunyan's THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS, a man disregards an offer to trade his muck-rake for a celestial crown.

4. An allusion to GALATIANS 6:7.

5. This and the following sentence were reconstructed from the following passages:

Journal: It is a text, oh! for the Jonahs of this generation, and yet the pulpits are as silent as immortal Greece, silent, some of them, because the preacher is gone to California himself.... Satan, from one of his elevations, showed mankind the kingdom of California, and they entered into a compact with him at once. Nantucket Inquirer: Why are the pulpits silent? Silent, because some of their preachers even are gone to California. Satan in one of his revelations [sic] showed mankind California, when instead of the cry "Get thee behind me, Satan," they shouted "Go ahead," and he had to exert himself to get there.

Boston Banner of Light: Satan, from one of his elevations, showed mankind the kingdom of California, and they shouted "Go ahead!" and he had to exert himself to get there first—but he did.

Unidentified newspaper clipping in Alcott's journal: And yet pulpits are silent—some of them because the preacher had gone to California. Satan took them up into a high mountain and showed them the kingdom of California. Did they say "Get thee behind me, Satan!" No; but "Go ahead," and Satan had to hurry to get there first.

6. Thoreau alludes to LUKE 4:5-7 in this sentence and quotes from LUKE 4:8.

7. "Go ahead" was a phrase often used during the 1850s to express the progress-at-any-cost mentality of many Americans. In her review of WALDEN in the Westminster Review, for example, George Eliot described the book as "a bit of pure American life (not the 'go-ahead' species, but its opposite pole)" (65 [January 1856]: 302).

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

imagery obtained from the contemporary institution of capital punishment by hanging:

Went up by railroad last night. The funeral took place this morning, attended by nearly every one on the Point; a melancholy business it was. I shall never forget poor Bailey's figure, and look of apathy – almost of stupor; and the three little boys clinging round him and crying, unnoticed; the still sunlight on the cemetery, the burial service, the multitude of sad faces, the two coffins with which we all felt that all the life and hope and heart of one man were sinking into the earth to wither into dust. And all this and so much beside, that the Henry Clay might beat the Armenia. It is time that this drowning and burning to death of babies and young girls and old men to gratify the vanity of steamboat captains were stopped. I would thank God for the privilege of pulling the cap over the eyes of the captain and owners of this boat, and feel as I completed my hangman's office that I had not lived utterly in vain.... The scene at the wreck yesterday morning was hideous: near thirty bodies exposed along the shore – many children among them. And some enterprising undertakers from Yonkers and New York had sent up their stock of coffins on speculation. "Looking for deceased friend, sir?" "Buying a coffin, sir?" "Only five dollars, sir, and warranted." Public feeling is very strong now. But it will die out within the week. These scoundrels will never be punished, not even indicted. Damn them! No, I retract that, for God knows we all stand in need of something less than the rigor of justice. But a thousand years or so of fire and brimstone after hanging in this world, would be a moderate award of retribution....

July 30, Friday: The fore part of this month was the warmest weather we have had; the last part sloping toward autumn has reflected some of its coolness, for we are very forward to anticipate the fall. Perhaps I may say the spring culminated with the commencement of haying –& the summer side of the year in mid July.

3 1/2 Pm to Flints Pond

How long is it since I heard a veery? Do they go or become silent when the goldfinch heralds the autumn? Do not all flowers that blossom after mid. July remind us of the fall? After midsummer we have a belated feeling as if we had all been idlers –& are forward to see in each sight –& hear in each sound some presage of the fall. –just as in mid. age man anticipates the end of life.

Tansy is a prevalent flower now –dog's bane still common– Night hawks squeak & fly low over Thrush alley at 4 Pm. A small purple orchis Platanthera psychodes –quite small –so that I perceive what I called by this name before must have been the fimbriata. The sand cherry is a handsome fruit but not very palatable. Hedeoma pulegioides pennyroyal is out of bloom ap for some time –in the ruts of an old path through a copse. Lobelia dortmanna water L. ap. for some time. A small kind of potamogeton which I have not examined before –most like the P. hybridum but with a cylindrical spike. The ripple marks on the east shore of Flints are nearly parallel firm ridges in the white sand one inch or more apart– They are very distinctly felt by the naked feet of the wader. What are those remarkable spherical masses of fine grass or fibres looking like the nests of water mice –washing toward the shore at the bottom amid the weeds–? quite numerous over a long shore. I thought they must be nests of mice till I found some solid. The clethra alnifolia is just beginning –(as the swamp pink shows its last white petals–) but August will have its beauty. It is important as one of the later flowers. High-blackberries ripe ap – for a day or two That succulent plant by Tuttle's sluice appears to be Sedum telephium –Garden Orpine or live for ever –called also house leek –since it will grow if only one end is tucked under a shingle.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

What a gem is a bird's egg especially a blue or a green one –when you see one broken or whole in the woods– ! I noticed a small blue egg this afternoon washed up by Flint's Pond & half buried by White sand –& and as it lay there alternately wet & dry no color could be fairer –no gem could have a more advantageous or favorable setting. Probably it was shaken out of some nest which overhung the water. I frequently meet with broken egg shells where a crow perchance or some other thief has been marauding. And is not that shell something very precious that houses that winged life?– Caught in a thunder shower –when S of Flints Pond –came back by C. Smith's road. Stood under thick trees. I care not how hard it rains if it does not rain more than 15 minutes– I can shelter myself effectually in the woods. It is a grand sound that of the rain on the leaves of the forest 1/4 of a mile distant approaching.– But I got wet through after all being caught where there were no trees.

December 10, Friday: 10,000 citizens turned out to watch Jose Forni (AKA Jose Forner y Brugada) get hanged from a gallows that had been erected on the slope of Russian Hill. He had confessed to the stabbing murder of Jose Rodriguez and the confession had been printed on a lettersheet for sale by Bonestell & Williston, Clay Street, San Francisco along with a drawing of Forni sitting in his cell. Sheriff John C. Hays, who officiated at this hanging, “cut the rope which held up the ‘drop’” (this wouldn't be the 1st hanging in San Francisco, but it would be something to watch because it would be the 1st legal one).

HANGING

CALIFORNIA

[THOREAU MADE NO ENTRY IN HIS JOURNAL FOR DECEMBER 10th]

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1853

Nicolas Roch, grandson of Antoine Roch and the guillotinish at Lons-le-Saulnier, succeeded Henri Ganier as head-chopper at Amiens.

HEADCHOPPING

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1853

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
29/04	Honora Stackpole		Ennis	Murder
29/04	Bridget Stackpole		Ennis	Murder
11/08	Helen Blackwood	30	Glasgow	Murder

May 6, Friday: The railroad drawbridge outside South Norwalk, Connecticut had been raised to allow the passage of the steamboat Pacific. A red ball the size of a basketball (not invented yet) had been raised to the top of a signal mast alongside the tracks, to warn approaching trains that the Norwalk River drawbridge was up. The speed limit posted on these tracks was 10 miles per hour. A passenger train approached the Norwalk River at a high rate of speed, disregarding the speed limit, its engineer being the Edward Tucker who had survived the New York & New Haven's first wreck in 1849,⁴⁴² and when Tucker belatedly saw the red ball at the top of the mast he yelled out for his brakemen to apply the brakes (railroad safety brakes had been invented by Elisha Graves Otis in 1845), and leaped from the locomotive without closing the throttle of the engine. His jump broke his leg. The brakemen, seeing their engineer leaping out of the locomotive, followed almost instantly by the fireman, also jumped instead of applying the brakes. The train took a nose-dive off the end of the tracks, shattering against the stone bridge abutments on the other side of the drawbridge and dropping into the water. Of the passengers, 46 were killed and 25 injured. This being America, a mob immediately assembled but was distracted from its purpose by an argument, hopefully staged, about whether to hang Tucker with his broken leg from the signal mast or, hanging being too fine a fate for him, to simply put him out of his misery by shooting him, and meanwhile Tucker was blubbering that the bridge attendant must have raised the red ball after the accident to save his own hide, and this combination of argumentation and blubbering and blaming delayed the mob from its amusement until the authorities could come to Tucker's rescue. The engineer had survived yet another crash.⁴⁴³

TIMELINE OF ACCIDENTS

442. For general background, please refer to Robert B. Shaw's A HISTORY OF RAILROAD ACCIDENTS, SAFETY PRECAUTIONS, AND OPERATING PRACTICES (2d edition, N.p.: Vail-Ballou Press, 1978).

443. Was Edward Tucker fired for his misconduct? No, because he had already lost his job with the railroad on account of his injury. This was the United States of America, land of liberty, and Tucker was a free man, which meant that his destiny was his own. In that day and age anyone injured in the workplace for any reason was automatically out of work — because an injured worker can't continue to do work and therefore had no claim to receive any more pay. In the American South, this was one of the arguments for slavery: that being someone's slave meant that someone had some responsibility toward one, and cared whether one lived or died.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

During this year and the following one, Draft F of Henry Thoreau's WALDEN ms:

WALDEN: Ah, the pickerel of Walden! when I see them lying on the ice, or in the well which the fisherman cuts in the ice, making a little hole to admit the water, ^{^golden and emerald} I am always surprised by their rare beauty, as if they were fabulous fishes—~~fresh water dolphins dauphins eldest sons of Walden,~~ they are so foreign to the streets, even to the woods, foreign as Arabia to our Concord life. They possess a ^{^quite} dazzling and transcendent beauty which separates them ~~far~~ ^{^by a wide interval} from the cadaverous cod and haddock ~~at least two days old~~ whose fame is trumpeted in our streets. ~~handsome artlovers [ILLEGIBLE] & gems—they~~ ^{^They} are not green like the pines, nor gray like the stones nor blue like ^{^the} sky; but they have, to my ~~eye~~ ^{^eyes}, if possible, yet rarer colors, like ^{^flowers} and precious stones, as if they were the pearls, ~~of this great shell—~~ ^{^some} ~~solid opied &~~ ^{^the} animalized nuclei or crystals of the Walden water. They, of course, are ~~composed of Walden wholly~~ ^{^Walden all over} and all through; are ^{^themselves small} Waldens in the animal kingdom, ^{^Waldenses} ~~perhaps dolphins~~ ~~—dauphins eldest sons of Walden, for~~ ~~whose behalf this whole world is but a dauphin edition to study—~~ It is surprising that ~~these fishes~~ ^{^fish} ^{^they} are caught here, —that in this deep and capacious spring, far beneath the rattling teams and chaises and tinkling sleighs that travel the Walden road, this great gold and emerald fish swims. I never chanced to see its kind in any market; it would be the cynosure of all eyes there. ^{^Easily}, with a few convulsive quirks, they give up their ~~diluted~~ ^{^watery} ghosts, like a mortal translated before his time to the ~~subtile~~ ^{^thin} air of heaven.

“like a mortal translated before his time to the thin air of heaven”: This is a reference not only to hanging, but to the hanging of the Huguenot saints in France after revocation of the Edict of Nantes, while the members of Thoreau's family, the intermarried Thoreaus and Guillets, were fleeing to the relative safety offered by the Isle of Jersey in the English Channel.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

The pickerel of Walden Pond was of course a small pike, and the pike is named of course for its pointy head. Per FACTS ON FILE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF WORD AND PHRASE ORIGINS, this is the fish that lifted its head from the water to observe the Crucifixion — and it bears images of the cross, three nails, and a sword. You will remember that on page 40 of A WEEK ON THE CONCORD AND MERRIMACK RIVERS, Thoreau imagines that his soul is “bright invisible green.” These great gold and emerald Waldenses are the ghosts of Thoreau’s Huguenot ancestors, translated before their time, by the believers of France, to the thin air of heaven. Hanged! I show, on the next page, an old illustration of Anne du Bourg dancing on air, and a 20th Century painting by N.C. Wyeth titled “Fishing Through the Ice,” and what I suggest is that the one is quite as apt an illustration of this passage from WALDEN; OR, LIFE IN THE WOODS as the other.

No, more than that. I suggest that the painter Wyeth had no clue what Thoreau was talking about in this passage. He was trapped in the pikeresque, and might as well have been drawing Norman-Rockwellish kitsch covers for the Saturday Evening Post. But WALDEN; OR, LIFE IN THE WOODS is a book of pending issues, a book in which Brahmins hang suspended over flames on page 4, in which we hang conspirators from the tough rafters of the trees on page 208, in which still-living heads hang on either side of a warrior like ghastly trophies on page 231, in which a man thinks to hang himself because he belongs to the race of pygmies on page 326, in which a man stands on the gallows on page 327 and says “Tell the tailors to remember to make a knot in their thread before they take the first stitch” —although his companion’s prayer is forgotten,— and in which on page 330 our author chooses not to hang by the beam of the scale and try to weigh less.

GALLOWS HUMOR

You may well wonder how I am going to make a connection between these two illustrations, of Anne du Bourg dancing on air and of a pickerel dancing on air, other than by offering that the pickerel, being a fish, evokes that old graphitum of primitive Christianity scratched into the walls of the catacombs of Rome.

ιχθϋς = “fish”

ι = Jesus
 χ = Christ θ = God’s υ = Son
 ς = Savior

But the pickerel connection, once it is made, will be obvious to you, for Thoreau speaks of them as “Waldenses” and that word is only from the Medieval Latin Valdenses via the French Vaudois and the Italian Valdese. The followers of that “Peter Waldo” or “Pierre Vaudès” —who, in AD1170, in his thirtieth year, hired two priests to translate the Bible into common French, and then accepted the invitation of Luke 18:23 to sell all he had and give the proceeds to the poor— were medieval convinced persons who strived, until they were suppressed by Christians, to live in the manner of life portrayed in the Gospels. At his point of greatest acceptability, Waldo was confirmed in his vow of poverty by Pope Alexander III, although this dangerous man was most pointedly not granted permission to teach or preach about his convictions. His teaching was banned by Pope Lucius III in the bull Ad Abolendam issued at the Synod of Verona in AD1184. Innocent VIII declared in AD1487 that when a Christian kills one of the Waldenses —followers of the way of Waldo— he inherit his property if any. Those who embraced this discipline were variously termed Pauperes or “poor ones” (the entire subject of the first chapter of WALDEN; OR, LIFE IN THE WOODS), Picards or “those who read the Bible for themselves” (thus Thoreau’s “pickerel” metaphor), Waldenses (to get this reference into his text, Thoreau pretends that “Waldenses” is merely a plural form for “Walden” like the more obvious “Waldens,” whereas “Waldenses” is a collective term), Vaudois and Valdese or “those who live in the valleys,” and finally “Huguenots” or people who have made a covenant, people who have “sought individual perfection apart from the Roman Church, rejected the official clergy, abstained from oaths and the use of force, and attempted in general to reintroduce primitive Christian fellowship and apostolic simplicity of living.”⁴⁴⁴

444. Reaman, G. Elmore. THE TRAIL OF THE HUGUENOTS IN EUROPE, THE UNITED STATES, SOUTH AFRICA AND CANADA. Baltimore: Genealogical Publishing Company, 1966, page 21.

STATE MURDERSTATE MURDER

Anne du Bourg said, in the presence of Henry II, in regard to his execution of a primitive Christian, that it was no small thing to condemn those who, amidst the flames, invoked the name of Jesus Christ.

The penalty for saying this to the king was the usual penalty accorded to heretics in France in the late 1550s: suspension over a fire by a rope, and dipping in and out of the flames until death.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Pickerel dancing on air;
N.C. Wyeth fishing for meaning through the ice of his own incomprehension

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1854

American pugilism appeared in California during the mid-1850s (well-known pugilists such as Chris Lilly, John Morrissey, and Yankee Sullivan made the tour). For extra drama, John Morrissey had his seconds threaten his competition with pistols and clubs.

It was not unheard of, in California, for the noose of a man being hanged to come untied. That happened spectacularly in this year in El Dorado County, when both nooses of two men being hanged together, James Logan and William Lipsey, came untied during the drop, necessitating a “do over.”

Chinese miners waved homemade spears and swords at one another in Trinity County, California. While reputed killers had been hired by both sides in this mining dispute, the only actual casualties were drunken American and European spectators who shot or stabbed one another while attempting to collect or avoid paying side bets (so the first killing to be clearly attributed to North American Chinese would not be in this year, but would only arrive during November 1857 with the robbery and murder of the bank clerk M.V.B. Griswold).

In China, meanwhile, a 2d child was born to the Reverend Issachar J. Roberts 罗孝全 and Mrs. Virginia Young Roberts.

The Growth of the White Community in Shanghai

1844	50
1846	134
1848	159
1849	175
1850	210
1851	265
1854	250
1860	569
1865	5,129 (due to foreign troops fighting the Taipings)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Elizabeth A. Parkhill Gloucester and the Reverend James Newton Gloucester gave up their 2d-hand clothing store on 7th Avenue in New-York.

Victor Hugo, in exile on the island of Guernsey, assisted in the campaign against the hanging by the English government of a local man guilty of murder. After the execution he attempted to transform this agitation into a general campaign for the abolition of capital punishment by the British.

COLDBLOODED MURDER

He produced at this time what would later be repurposed and would be transformed by its new context into the single most famous and graphic European image to appear in the wake of the raid by American abolitionists upon the US arsenal at Harpers Ferry. In this engraving, in an indistinct scene of gloom, a human figure hangs from a gallows. Shafts of light are, however, falling on the figure on the gallows, from one side of the heavens.

It would be in late 1859 or early 1860 that Hugo would be moved to repurpose this bleak illustration to indicate the figure as being John Brown on his American gallows, and he would be able to do so simply by inscribing beneath it the words:

*Pro Christo-Sicut Christus, John Brown, — Charleston.
Designed by Victor Hugo.*

April 4, Tuesday: A week after declaration of war, Mikhail Ivanovich Glinka left Paris for Russia.

The 2d Regiment of Dragoons under Lieutenant Colonel Philip St. George Cooke defeated the Jicarilla Apaches at the canyon of Ojo Caliente.

The police raided a fandango house on Pacific Street between Stockton Street and Dupont Street in San Francisco, and arrested 11 men and 14 women under this municipality's new anti-prostitution ordinance (evidently these people were suspected of having been up to no good).

CALIFORNIA

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

Joseph Tussaud returned to London with a head-chopping machine that he had procured from Clément Sanson. This “guillotine” was to become a part of Madame Tussaud’s Waxworks.

HEADCHOPPING

Henry Thoreau spent all day surveying an Acton woodlot belonging to Abel Hosmer near the railroad and the road to Stow, Jessie Willis, George Wright, Joel Conant, (?) Adams, Asa Parker and the area just west of the Damon Mill land.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

View Henry Thoreau's personal working drafts of his surveys courtesy of AT&T and the Concord Free Public Library:

http://www.concordlibrary.org/scollect/Thoreau_Surveys/Thoreau_Surveys.htm

(The official copy of this survey of course had become the property of the person or persons who had hired this Concord town surveyor to do their surveying work during the 19th Century. Such materials have yet to be recovered.)

View this particular personal working draft of a survey in fine detail:

http://www.concordlibrary.org/scollect/Thoreau_Surveys/58a.htm

An article by John Russell Bartlett appeared in the New York Herald, on pages 5 and 6, entitled "The Aboriginal Semi-civilization of the Great California Basin, with a Refutation of the popular theory of the Northern Origin of the Aztecs of Mexico," on the migration of Aztecs and the distribution of Native Americans in the Great Basin region, from which Thoreau would copy into his eighth Indian Notebook.

American and English ships began to land forces at Shanghai to protect American interests during Chinese civil strife. This would continue until June 17th.

US MILITARY INTERVENTIONS

May 27, Saturday: In the afternoon Henry Thoreau went to Saw Mill Brook.

In London, the Athenaeum reported that although Thoreau was a graduate of Harvard College and therefore qualified as a minister, instead he had chosen to manufacture pencils and had moved into a hut on the shore of a pond in order to live in a primitive manner and write. The article described WEEK as "a curious mixture of dull and prolix dissertation, with some of the most faithful and animated descriptions of external nature which has [sic??] ever appeared."

In Worcester, Bronson Alcott succeeded in persuading the Reverend Thomas Wentworth Higginson to take charge of the Boston vigilantes, and the two took the train into Boston. Martin Stowell of Worcester came also. When they reached Boston, however, they found that the Committee was unable to agree upon a plan of action, and it appears that the Reverend took matters into his own hands. He went out and purchased a dozen axes with which to attack the door of the courthouse. That night, at the mass rally at Faneuil Hall at which the committee intended to instigate the sort of howling mob which would be needed in order to cover their purposive activity and distract the guards, the committee members slipped out early and took up their positions at the courthouse and waited for the mob to be marshaled. When Martin Stowell gave the signal, a black man ran to the west door and hammered it open with a 12-foot beam and leaped inside, with the Reverend Higginson close behind him. The people who managed to get inside the courthouse were immediately, however, repulsed by a group of policemen with clubs. The Reverend Higginson was badly beaten on the head and face, and one of the policemen was killed either by knife or gunshot to the midriff. The police began arresting individual rioters, and the mob began to pull back, but the Reverend Higginson, and a lawyer named Seth Webb who had been one of his classmates in college, held firm. Then they were joined by Alcott, came in hand, who walked right up to the door of the courthouse and looked in. A shot was fired inside the building, or was not fired (although some claimed this, Alcott himself never made any mention of having heard such a sound), as Alcott turned around and came back away from the courthouse.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

A little-known fact is that Newport, Rhode Island businessman George Thomas Downing was one of those involved in this attack on the Boston courthouse.

One of the onlookers to these events, who would take no part in them but would suffer in his home town for having so much as been present, was Moncure Daniel Conway. Word that he had been present would circulate in Virginia, so that when he attempted to return to visit his father and mother, a crowd of young men would confront him and order him to leave the town immediately or suffer the consequences.

The Boston mayor, Dr. Jerome Van Crowninshield Smith, a local-politics weathervane, issued the following declaration:

Under the excitement that now pervades the city, you are respectfully requested to cooperate with the Municipal authorities in the maintenance of peace and good order. The law must be obeyed, let the consequences be what they may.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Of course, just as the courthouse officials could agree with peace with quiet, the abolitionists could agree with peace with justice. —They could agree that the ideal of peace and good order was utterly incompatible with kidnapping, and with human enslavement. They could agree that the higher law, which was the law of righteousness, and the law of nature and of God, must be obeyed — whatever the consequences.

RESISTING THE FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW

HIGHER LAW

A jury, meeting in the building in which Anthony Burns was being held and judged, rendered a verdict of guilty at 10:15 PM — James Wilson was to hang.

Because there had been an alert that Peter Dunbar's⁴⁴⁵ truckmen were planning to attack the home of Wendell Phillips, Phillips being elsewhere but his family being in the home, Bronson Alcott, Henry Kemp, Francis Jackson, and the Reverend Samuel Joseph May each armed themselves with a pistol, to sit out the night in the Phillips parlor. They would sit out this night with their pistols in their laps, however, without incident.

Because there were fears that the slavemaster, Mr. Charles Francis Suttle, and his attorney at law, William Brent, might be attacked at their lodgings on the 1st floor of the Revere House, an honor guard of southern students was recruited from Harvard College.⁴⁴⁶ Suttle and Brent then relocated to a room in the hotel's garret, for greater security inside their cordon of armed students.

Knowing that during the attack on the courthouse he had discharged his pistol toward Watson Freeman but that Freeman had been unharmed, Lewis Hayden considered it entirely possible that it had been his bullet that had 445. What relation would this Peter Dunbar, a member of the management team at the Customs House on the waterfront, and his son Peter Dunbar, Jr., the captain of the guard at the courthouse guarding Anthony Burns, have been to Concord's Cynthia Dunbar Thoreau?

446. Moncure Daniel Conway, as a Harvard student from the South, was recruited to take part in this armed guard at the hotel. The two visitors to Boston were not unknown to him, but rather, they were close neighbors or distant relatives. Nevertheless, he declined to get involved in the affair.

STATE MURDER

struck the deputy James Batchelder in the major vein of his leg, causing him to bleed out and promptly killing him. Therefore in the evening some activist friends got Hayden into a carriage and conveyed him to the home of Dr. Henry Ingersoll Bowditch in Brookline. (In that period, no-one would have imagined that a person of color could have been permitted to ride inside such a horse-and-carriage. Thus, drawing the carriage's window curtains was in and of itself adequate to provide complete concealment.) Hayden was met at his destination by a group of black men resolved to prevent the re-enslavement of Burns.

The Reverend Higginson in a note to his wife in Worcester, written in haste from a home in Boston in which he had sought refuge after the attempted rescue of Anthony Burns: “There has been an attempt at rescue, and failed. I am not hurt, except for a scratch on the face which will probably prevent me from doing anything more about it, lest I be recognized.”

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Our national birthday, Tuesday the 4th of July: This was Nathaniel Hawthorne's 50th birthday.

Rowland Hussey Macy (1822-1919) had gotten started in retail in 1851 with a dry goods store in downtown Haverhill. Macy's policy from the very first was "His goods are bought for cash, and will be sold for the same, at a small advance." On this date Macy's 1st parade marched down the main drag of the little New England village. It was too hot and only about a hundred people viewed his celebration. In 1858 Macy would sell this store and, with the financial backing of Caleb Dustin Hunking of Haverhill, relocate the retail business to easier pickings in New-York. (So, have you heard of the New York Macy's department store? –Have you shopped there?)

When the mayor of Wilmington, Delaware jailed City Council member Joshua S. Valentine for setting off firecrackers, he was mobbed by a group of indignant citizens.

CELEBRATING OUR B-DAY

Henry Thoreau went at "8 A.M. – To Framingham."

At this abolitionist picnic celebrating our nation's birthday and the Declaration of Independence and the successful completion of the 1st Great American Disunion, attended by some 600, a man the Standard described as "a sort of literary recluse," name of Henry David Thoreau, declared for dissolution of the federal union.

Thoreau was a secessionist — he believed that New Englanders should secede from the federal union of the United States of America, as the necessary step in disentangling themselves from the US national sin of race slavery.

THE 2D GREAT AMERICAN DISUNION

Sojourner Truth was another of the speakers, although we do not know whether she spoke before or after Thoreau (the newspaper reporter who was present failed entirely to notice that Sojourner took part), nor

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

whether he sat on the platform beside her. Stephen Symonds Foster and Abby Kelley Foster were present (Abby probably brought her daughter Alla to the pic nic, for it was always a family affair, with swings for the children, boating on a nearby pond, and a convenient refreshment stand since the day would be quite hot,

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

and confined her remarks to an appeal for funds), and Lucy Stone, as were Wendell Phillips, Charles Lenox

Remond, and William Lloyd Garrison.⁴⁴⁷

When the meeting in the shady amphitheater was called to order at 10:45AM by Charles Jackson Francis, the first order of business had to be election of officials for the day. Garrison became the event's president and

STATE MURDER

Francis Jackson of Boston, William Whiting of Concord, Effingham L. Capron of Worcester, Dora M. Taft of Framingham, Charles Lenox Remond of Salem, John Pierpont of Medford, Charles F. Hovey of Gloucester, Jonathan Buffum of Lynn, Asa Cutler of Connecticut, and Andrew T. Foss of New Hampshire its vice presidents. The Reverend Samuel J. May, Jr., of Leicester, William H. Fish of Milford, and R.F. Wallcut of Boston became its secretaries. Abby Kelley Foster, Ebenezer D. Draper, Lewis Ford, Mrs. Olds of Ohio, Lucy Stone, and Nathaniel B. Spooner would constitute its Finance Committee. Garrison then read from Scripture, the assembly sang an Anti-Slavery hymn, and Dr. Henry O. Stone issued the Welcome.

STATE MURDER

447. There was an active agent of the Underground railroad on that platform, we may note, and it was not the gregarious Truth but the “sort of literary recluse” Thoreau. That is, please allow me to state the following in regard to the existence of eyewitness testimony, that the Thoreau home in Concord was in the period prior to the Civil War a waystation on the Underground Railway: we might reappraise Thoreau’s relationship with Sojourner Truth, of whom it has been asserted by Ebony Magazine that she was a “Leader of the Underground Railroad Movement” (February 1987), by asking whether there is any comparable eyewitness testimony, that Truth ever was involved in that risky and illegal activity? Her biographer refers to her as a “loose cannon,” not the sort of close-mouthed person who could be relied upon as a participant in a quite secret and quite illegal and quite dangerous endeavor, and considers also that no such evidence has ever been produced. The Thoreaus, in contrast, not only were never regarded as loose in this manner, but were, we know, regarded as utterly reliable — and in the case of the Thoreau family home the evidence for total involvement exists and is quite conclusive.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

I will quote a couple of paragraphs about the course of the meeting from the Foster biography, AHEAD OF HER TIME:

Heading the finance committee, Abby made her usual appeal for funds, Stephen called on the friends of liberty to resist the Fugitive Slave Law, "each one with such weapons as he thought right and proper," and Wendell Phillips, Sojourner Truth, and Lucy Stone held the audience in thrall with their "soul-eloquence." After an hour's break for refreshments Henry Thoreau castigated Massachusetts for being in the service of the Slaveholders and demanded that the state leave the Union. "I have lived for the last month -and I think that every man in Massachusetts capable of the sentiment of patriotism must have had a similar experience- with the sense of having suffered a vast and indefinite loss. I did not know what ailed me. At last it occurred to me that what I had lost was a country."

Thoreau's speech is still reprinted, but William Lloyd Garrison provided the most dramatic moment of that balmy July day. Placing a lighted candle on the lectern, he picked up a copy of the Fugitive Slave Law and touched it to the flame. As it burned, he intoned a familiar phrase: "And let all the people say Amen." As the shouts of "Amen" echoed, he burned the U.S. commissioner's decision in the Burns case. Then he held a copy of the United States Constitution to the candle, proclaiming, "So perish all compromises with tyranny." As it burned to ashes, he repeated, "And let all the people say Amen." While the audience responded with a tremendous shout of "Amen," he stood before them with arms extended, as if in blessing. No one who was present ever forgot the scene; it was the high point of unity among the Garrisonian abolitionists.

This biography of Abby Kelley, with its suggestion that Thoreau's speech, which it condenses to three sentences, must have been significant because it is "still reprinted," overlooks the fact that Thoreau had not been granted an opportunity to read his entire lecture. A contemporary comment on the speech was more accurate:

Henry Thoreau, of Concord, read portions of a racy and ably written address, the whole of which will be published in The Liberator.

That is, Thoreau delivered a 4th-of-July oration at Framingham, Massachusetts on "SLAVERY IN MASSACHUSETTS", criticizing the governor and the chief justice of Massachusetts who were in the audience.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

–But, he was not allowed the opportunity to read his entire essay.

The whole military force of the State is at the service of a Mr. Suttle, a slaveholder from Virginia, to enable him to catch a man whom he calls his property; but not a soldier is offered to save a citizen of Massachusetts from being kidnapped! Is this what all these soldiers, all this training has been for these seventy-nine years past? Have they been trained merely to rob Mexico, and carry back fugitive slaves to their masters? These very nights, I heard the sound of a drum in our streets. There were men training still; and for what? I could with an effort pardon the cockerels of Concord for crowing still, for they, perchance, had not been beaten that morning; but I could not excuse this rub-a-dub of the "trainers." The slave was carried back by exactly such as these, i.e., by the soldier, of whom the best you can say in this connection is that he is a fool made conspicuous by a painted coat.

Note that on paper, at least, if not verbally as well, he made a reference to martyrdom by hanging: "I would side with the light, and let the dark earth roll from under me, calling my mother and my brother to follow." In other words, let us New Englanders secede from the federal union of the United States of America, as the necessary step in our clearing ourselves of this US national sin of race slavery.

Here is another account of the actual speech, as opposed to what was printed later, from one who was there in the audience standing before that platform draped in mourning black:

He began with the simple words, "You have my sympathy; it is all I have to give you, but you may find it important to you." It was impossible to associate egotism with Thoreau; we all felt that the time and trouble he had taken at that crisis to proclaim his sympathy with the "Disunionists" was indeed important. He was there a representative of Concord, of science and letters, which could not quietly pursue their tasks while slavery was trampling down the rights of mankind. Alluding to the Boston commissioner who had surrendered Anthony Burns, Edward G. Loring, Thoreau said, "The fugitive's case was already decided by God, –not Edward G. God, but simple God." This was said with such serene unconsciousness of anything shocking in it that we were but mildly startled.

– AUTOBIOGRAPHY, MEMORIES, AND EXPERIENCES OF MONCURE DANIEL CONWAY (Boston MA: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.), Volume I,
pages 184–5.
[Moncure Daniel Conway]

DISUNION

ANTHONY BURNS

EDWARD GREELEY LORING

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

At the end of the morning meeting Thoreau was on the platform while Garrison, the featured speaker, burned the federal Constitution on a pewter plate as a “covenant with death” because it countenanced the return of runaway slaves to their owners — Margaret Fuller’s grandfather Timothy Fuller Sr., who had refused to consent to that document when it was originally promulgated because of its ridiculous mincing about slavery, would have been proud of him! Thoreau’s inflammatory oratory was less inflammatory than addresses made on that occasion by Garrison, Wendell Phillips, and Charles Lenox Remond, for their speeches drew comments but Thoreau’s did not.

On our nation’s birthday the platform had been draped in black crepe as a symbol of mourning, as at a state funeral, and carried the insignia of the State of Virginia, which stood as the destination of Anthony Burns, and this insignia of the State of Virginia was decorated with — with, in magnificent irony, ribbons of triumph! Above the platform flew the flags of Kansas and Nebraska, emblematic of the detested new Kansas/Nebraska Act. As the background of all this, the flag of the United States of America was hung, but it was upside down, the symbol of distress, and it also was bordered in black, the symbol of death.

I think no great public calamity, not the death of Daniel Webster, not the death of Charles Sumner, not the loss of great battles during the War, brought such a sense of gloom over the whole State as the surrender of Anthony Burns.

Garrison placed a lighted candle on the lectern, and touched a corner of the Fugitive Slave Law to the flame. As it burned, he orated “And let all the people say Amen” and the crowd shouted “Amen!” Then he touched a corner of the US commissioner’s decision in the Burns case to the candle flame. Then he touched a corner of a copy of the federal Constitution to the candle flame, and orated “So perish all compromises with tyranny.” As the paper was reduced to ashes, he orated “And let all the people say Amen” and stood with his arms extended as if in blessing.

William Lloyd Garrison \(in 1865\)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Moncure Daniel Conway's comment, later, about the moment when Garrison set the match to the constitution, and the few scattered boos and hisses were drowned out by the thunderous "Amen" of the crowd, was:

That day I distinctly recognized that the antislavery cause was a religion.

In the afternoon Moncure Daniel Conway spoke, as a Virginian aristocrat, a child of position and privilege. Look at me! It was his 1st antislavery attempt at identity politics grandstanding. Leaning on the concept, he insisted that the force of public opinion in his home state was so insane and so hotheaded that every white man with a conscience, "or even the first throbbings of a conscience," was a slave to this general proslavery public posture. He offered that to resist this Southern certitude, each Northerner would need to "abolish slavery in his heart."⁴⁴⁸

AUTOBIOGRAPHY

VOLUME II

(So, you see, the white man has been self-enslaved: the problem is not so much that slavery harms the black man as that slavery harms the white man, shudder.)

Then Wendell Phillips spoke.

448. We may note how different this was from the Reverend Theodore Parker's "kill the Negro in us."

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

We know that Sojourner Truth spoke from that mourning-draped platform after a white man from Virginia had described his being thrown in jail there on account of his antislavery convictions, because in her speech she commented on this: how helpful it was for white people to obtain some experience of oppression. She warned that “God would yet execute his judgments upon the white people for their oppression and cruelty.” She asked why it was that white people hated black people so. She said that the white people owed the colored race a debt so huge that they would never be able to pay it back — but would have to repent so as to have this debt forgiven them. Nell Painter has characterized this message as “severe and anguished,” and has commented that despite the cheers and applause, “Her audiences preferred not to grapple with all she had to say.” Her humor must have been such, Painter infers, as to allow her white listeners to exempt themselves from this very general denunciation:

They did not hear wrath against whites, but against the advocates of slavery. It is understandable, no doubt, that Truth’s audiences, who wanted so much to love this old black woman who had been a slave, found it difficult to fathom the depths of her bitterness.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Carleton Mabee's BLACK FREEDOM

Americans at large often held the abolitionists responsible for the war. They argued that the abolitionists' long agitation, strident as it often was, had antagonized the South into secession, thus beginning the war, and that the abolitionists' insistence that the war should not end until all slavery had been abolished kept the war going. In 1863 the widely read New York Herald made the charge devastatingly personal. It specified that by being responsible for the war, each abolitionist had in effect already killed one man and permanently disabled four others. ... While William Lloyd Garrison preferred voluntary emancipation, during the war he came to look with tolerance on the abolition of slavery by military necessity, saying that from seeming evil good may come. Similarly, the Garrisonian-Quaker editor, Oliver Johnson, while also preferring voluntary emancipation, pointed out that no reform ever triumphed except through mixed motives. But the Garrisonian lecturer Pillsbury was contemptuous of such attitudes. Freeing the slaves by military necessity would be of no benefit to the slave, he said in 1862, and the next year when the Emancipation Proclamation was already being put into effect, he said that freeing the slaves by military necessity could not create permanent peace. Parker Pillsbury won considerable support for his view from abolitionist meetings and from abolitionist leaders as well. Veteran Liberator writer Edwin Percy Whipple insisted that "true welfare" could come to the American people "only through a willing promotion of justice and freedom." Henry C. Wright repeatedly said that only ideas, not bullets, could permanently settle the question of slavery. The recent Garrisonian convert, the young orator Ezra Heywood, pointed out that a government that could abolish slavery as a military necessity had no antislavery principles and could therefore re-establish slavery if circumstances required it. The Virginia aristocrat-turned-abolitionist, Moncure Daniel Conway, had misgivings that if emancipation did not come before it became a fierce necessity, it would not reflect true benevolence and hence could not produce true peace. The Philadelphia wool merchant, Quaker Alfred H. Love, asked, "Can so sublime a virtue as ... freedom ... be the offspring of so corrupt a parentage as war?" The long-time abolitionist Abby Kelley Foster—the speak-inner and Underground Railroader—predicted flatly, if the slave is freed only out of consideration for the safety of the Union, "the hate of the colored race will still continue, and the poison of that wickedness will destroy us as a nation." Amid the searing impact of the war—the burning fields, the mangled bodies, the blood-splattered hills and fields—a few abolitionists had not forgotten their fundamental belief that to achieve humanitarian reform, particularly if it was to be thorough and permanent reform, the methods used to achieve it must be consistent with the nature of the reform. ... What abolitionists often chose to brush aside was that after the war most blacks would still be living in the South, among the same Confederates whom they were now trying to kill.

CHANGE IS ETERNITY, STASIS A FIGMENT

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

July 28, Friday: Charles Henry Branscomb, a lawyer from Holyoke, Massachusetts serving as a general agent for the Emigrant Aid Society in the Kansas Territory, traveled up the Kansas River as far as Fort Riley with a pioneer party of 30 persons to select a location for an antislavery town. He and Dr. Charles Robinson of Fitchburg would agree on the site of Lawrence.

THE 2D GREAT AMERICAN DISUNION

William B. Sheppard, who had hoped to get married with his boss Henry C. Day’s daughter, had, when his employer had refused to consent, stabbed him to death. On this day Sheriff William Gorham officiated over the hanging of the murderer on “Government Reserve property” near the Presidio in San Francisco, before a crowd of 10,000 citizens. The body of the executed man would hang for an hour before Sheriff Gorham would permit it to be cut down.

FINAL EXECUTIONS
August 30, 1850	John White Webster	last Harvard College professor to be hanged by the neck in Boston
July 28, 1854	William B. Sheppard	last public open-air hanging in San Francisco , at the Presidio before a crowd of not less than 10,000
July 25, 1857	John Lewis	hanged outside the municipal prison of Cardiff before a crowd of 12,000, the final public hanging in Wales

Also, in San Francisco on this day, California Freemasons adopted a constitution and installed officers.

A pre-publication announcement of WALDEN; OR, LIFE IN THE WOODS titled “Life in the Woods. Former Inhabitants” appeared on the 4th page of the Boston Daily Evening Traveller, in columns 1 and 2.

EXTRACT FROM MR. THOREAU’S “WALDEN.” (In press, by Ticknor & Fields.)

[Reprints “Former Inhabitants; and Winter Visitors,” pages 256.1-264.3.]

TIMELINE OF WALDEN

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1855

In Boston, having completed the portion of his sentence that required one year spent at hard labor, James Wilson was taken from prison and hanged by the neck until he was dead.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

In California, a milestone of sorts was occurring: the first white tourists were arriving at Yosemite Valley.

Most of the time a condemned man in California would be allowed to make a short statement before his hanging. Sometimes he would sing a song. However, in this year Jose Sebade invited a harpist onto the gallows structure so he could “dance his way out of the world.” Since California had become a state in the United States of America, in 1851, hangings had been carried out at the local level, by the sheriff of each county. This practice would continue until 1890, and during these 4 decades, there would be a total of more than 230 executions in the various California counties. Virtually all of these executions would be by hanging, but the executions varied greatly from county to county. A condemned man was sometimes allowed to be so drunk that he needed to be carried to the gallows. Most hangings were of a single prisoner but on some occasions 2 or 3 would be hung side by side.

John Adams had been contributing to the extinction of the grizzly bear, by capturing them for zoos, displays, and bear-baiting events reminiscent of 17th-Century London. At this point a grizzly managed to rip up his scalp and leave a permanent depression about the size of a silver dollar in his skull. The scalp it was possible to reattach, but the bone injury would be permanent. Then while wrestling with General Fremont, a grizzly he had retained for his own display, the injury would be re-opened and this time brain tissue would be exposed.

STATE MURDER

You're going to need to keep your hat on, guy:

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

January 12, Friday: Felipe Alvitre was hanged in Los Angeles, California.

Calvin Carver Damon died of consumption in Concord, Massachusetts at the age of 50.

Dorcas Honorable Esop, last of the Nantucket native Americans, died. She had been born in 1776.

FAMOUS LASTS
July 28, 1854	William B. Sheppard	last public open-air hanging in San Francisco attended by a huge crowd, at the Presidio before a crowd of not less than 10,000
January 12, 1855	Dorcas Honorable Esop	last of the Nantucket native Americans
March 8, 1862	Captain Nathaniel Gordon	had been smuggling fresh slaves into the USA, hanged for this (classified as piracy)

January 12: Perhaps what moves us in winter is some reminiscence of far-off summer. How we leap by the side of the open brooks! What beauty in the running brooks! What life! What society! The cold is merely superficial; it is summer still at the core, far, far within. It is in the cawing of the crow [American Crow  Corvus Brachyrhynchos], the crowing of the cock, the warmth of the sun on our backs. I hear faintly the cawing of a crow far, far away, echoing from some unseen wood-side, as if deadened by the spring-like vapor which the sun is drawing from the ground. It mingles with the slight murmur of the village, the sound of children at play, as one stream empties gently into another, and the wild and tame are one. What a delicious sound! It is not merely crow calling to crow, for it speaks to me too. I am part of one great creature with him; if he has voice, I have ears. I can hear what he calls, and have engaged not to shoot nor stone him if he will caw to me each spring. On the other hand, it may be, is the sound of children at school saying their a, b, ab's, on the other, far in the wood-fringed horizon, the cawing of crows from their blessed eternal vacation, out at their long recess, children who have got dismissed! While the vaporous incense goes up from all fields of the spring, —if it were spring. Ah, bless the Lord, O my soul! bless him for wildness, for crows that will not alight within gunshot! and bless him for hens, too, that croak and cackle in the yard! (VII, 112-3)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

GOD IN CONCORD by Jane Langton © 1992

Viking Penguin

Penguin Books USA Inc.

66

*Ah, bless the Lord, O my soul! bless him for wildness, for crows that will not alight within gunshot!
Journal, January 12, 1855*

It was mid-autumn in Concord. Sugar maples flamed along Walden Street. The swam maples had already lost their

ISBN 0-670-84260-5 — PS3562.A515G58

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1856

Public hangings in San Francisco, California had become a spectator sport. Sheriff David Scannell therefore moved the executions to a gallows in the enclosed yard of the county jail on Broadway Avenue. Several hundred spectators, mostly public officials, the press and civic leaders, were invited. There were still opportunities to gawk, however, as citizens could congregate on Telegraph Hill and on nearby rooftops behind the jailyard. As many as 1,000 would gather in the street in front of the jail, despite the fact that they would be able to see nothing except perhaps the body being removed.

Due to increase in the Episcopal population, California became a diocese in its own right and the Reverend William Ingraham Kip was elected as its Episcopal Bishop.

Pierre Pellier, who has recently immigrated from France, introduced the Agen plum. This would become the basis for a large prune industry in the Santa Clara Valley.

"The only lesson of history is that there are no lessons of history."

— A.J.P. Taylor

April: It would appear that Miss Mary Moody Emerson was back in Concord again at this point, settled by Elizabeth Sherman Hoar in the "Deacon Brown" house — for we date this remark in Waldo Emerson's journal to approximately this month:

Monochord. Mary Moody Emerson cannot sympathize with children. I know several persons whose world is only large enough for one person, and each of them, though he were to be the last man, would, like the executioner in Hood's poem, guillotine the last but one. 'Tis A's [Alcott's] misfortune, & T's [Thoreau's].

HEADCHOPPING

The biographer Phyllis Cole would explain the meeting between Waldo's petite Aunt Mary and Henry Thoreau as follows:

Back in Concord a year and a half later, Mary gave Thoreau the attention across generations that she had no way of giving Dickinson. Once more he recorded the event in his journal. "Talking with Miss Mary Emerson this evening, she said, 'It was not the fashion to be so original when I was young.' She is readier to take my view -look through my eyes for the time- than any young person that I know in this town." Mary endorsed his high valuing of simplicity, even at the expense of his own mother. Holding court at the "Deacon Brown" house the same year, she shut her eyes while conversing with her old friend Cynthia Thoreau in protest against the long yellow ribbons on her cap. "I did not wish to look upon those ribbons of yours," she explained, "so unsuitable at your time of life and to a person of your serious character." Perhaps others in the room challenged her to defend the more "original" oddities of her own apparel.

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

EMILY DICKINSONCYNTHIA DUNBAR THOREAU

May 22, Thursday: Lola Montez and her manager Frank Folland (previously known as Augustus Noël Follin) sailed from Australia for San Francisco, California.

In San Francisco, California, Charles Cora was hanged by a Committee of Vigilance for the murder of Federal Marshal William Richardson. Cora perhaps shot Richardson because Richardson had insulted Cora's lover, or perhaps fired in self-defense. James P. Casey, a member of the Board of Supervisors, was hanged by a Committee of Vigilance for having murdered James King of William, editor of The Daily Evening Bulletin, because he had exposed Casey's criminal record.

The news from Kansas:

THE 2D GREAT AMERICAN DISUNION

STATE MURDER

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

May 30, Friday: For having stabbed Joseph Brooks, a shipmate, to death on January 18th, 1856, Nicholas Graham was hanged in the yard of the county jail on Broadway Avenue in San Francisco. Graham admitted the stabbing but had offered a defense of drunkenness. The execution was conducted by Sheriff of San Francisco, California David Scannell in the presence of about 100 witnesses.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

August 9, Saturday: In England, Thomas Hardy attended the execution of Elizabeth “Martha” Brown at Dorchester.

After she had discovered her husband in bed with another woman he had struck her with a whip, whereupon she had bludgeoned him with the kitchen wood-axe. This was an interesting escalation of domestic hostilities that Hardy could use as material for TESS OF THE D'URBERVILLES!

“Summer Stories,” a condescending Brit notice of WALDEN; OR, LIFE IN THE WOODS, appeared on page 760

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

of London's The Leader.

Here we have a very agreeable series of natural and social studies, fresh in manner and style, with many entertaining anecdotes, and sketches of forest life in America. It is excellent, as a picture of young-settlement manners.

(Isn't this the sort of review of WALDEN that one might expect, from the sort of people who need to attend a hanging in order to acquire fresh ideas? Phew!)

TIMELINE OF WALDEN

August 9. Saturday. Notwithstanding the very copious rain, with lightning, on the night of August 5th and the deluge which fell yesterday, raising the river still higher, it rained again and again with very vivid lightning, more copiously than ever, last night, and without long intervals all this day. Few, if any, can remember such a succession of thunder-storms merged into one long thunderstorm, lasting almost continuously (the storm does) two nights and two days. We are surprised to see that it can lighten just as vividly, thunder just as loud, rain just as copiously at last as at first.

P.M. — Up Assabet.

The river is raised about two feet! My boat is nearly even full, though under the willows. The water stands nearly a foot over the highest part of the large flat rock by Island. There is more current. The pads are drowned; hardly one to be seen afloat; the utmost length of their tethers does not permit them to come within a foot or ten inches of the surface. They lay smoothly on the top before, with considerable spare coil beneath; now they strain in vain toward the surface. All the Bidens Beckii is drowned too, and will be delayed, if not exterminated for this year. The water is cool to the bather after so much rain.

The notes of the wood pewee and warbling vireo are more prominent of late, and of the goldfinch twittering over. Does the last always titter his twitter when ascending? These are already feeding on the thistle seeds.

Again I am surprised to see the Apocynum cannabinum close to the rock at the Island, several plants, apparently not more than ten days out; say July 25th, including the ones I saw before. The flowers of this are white, with divisions of the corolla erect or nearly so, corolla not one eighth of an inch wide, calyx-segments lanceolate, pointed, as long as the tube of the corolla. I now notice that all the branches are about equally upright, and hence the upper ones are much more upright than the upper ones of the A. androsæmifolium. The plant is inclined to be taller and narrower than that, perhaps because it grows by water. The leaves are more oblong or lanceolate and pointed, the downiness and petioles about the same with that of the common; in this case, none heart-shaped. The one found the 5th was between this and the common, a rose-streaked one, in fact colored like the common; this, a white one with still longer calyx-segments and no heart-shaped leaves. This is rather smooth. Say, then, for that of the 5th and this, they are varieties of the A. cannabinum.⁴⁴⁹

I scare up a couple of wood ducks separately, undoubtedly birds bred and dispersed about here. The rise of the river attracts them.

What I have called Aster corymbosus out a day, above Hemlocks. It has eight to twelve white rays, smaller than those of the macrophyllus, and a dull-red stem commonly. It differs from Gray's corymbosus in the achenia being apparently not slender, not opening in July, and there being no need of distinguishing it from A. macrophyllus; from his cordifolius in the rays not being numerous, nor the paniced heads very numerous (sometimes pretty numerous), and the rays not pale-blue. Perhaps I must call it A. cordifolius, yet the lower and principal petioles are naked (Gray makes them so commonly!), not at all winged, though the upper are. Found one individual at Miles Swamp whose lower petioles were winged. Its petioles (the lower) are only sometimes winged here. The flowers of A. macrophyllus are white with a very slight bluish tinge, in a coarse flat-topped corymb. Flowers nine to ten eighths of an inch in diameter. A. cordifolius flowers six eighths of an inch [in] diameter.

449. At Astor Library, New York, Nov. 8th, 1856, in Richardson's Flora Boreali, etc., the leaves of Apocynum cannabinum in the plate are an inch or more beyond the flowers, and not hearted! Of the A. hypericifolium, the lower leaves are decidedly hearted, and the flowers are about terminal.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1857

January 19, Monday: At the Place de la Roquette in Paris, the head of one M. Provost proved to be easy to remove:

HEADCHOPPING

William T. Sherrard, appointed as sheriff in the Kansas Territory, seriously threatened and menaced Governor John White Geary for having refused to sign his appointment.

THE 2D GREAT AMERICAN DISUNION

January 19. A snow-storm with very high wind all last night and to-day. Though not much snow falls (perhaps seven or eight inches), it is exceedingly drifted, so that the first train gets down about noon and none gets up till about 6 P. M.! There is no vehicle passing the house before 2 P. M.! A fine dry snow, intolerable to face.

July 25, Saturday: On this day John Lewis was hanged outside the municipal prison of Cardiff, Wales — his wife Mrs. Gwen Lewis had been found dead in a stairwell after her employer, the solicitor John Morgan, had allowed her money to purchase food, and the court inferred that her husband had shoved her down because he wanted this money in order to purchase alcohol (this would be the final public hanging in Wales).

FINAL EXECUTIONS

July 28, 1854	William B. Sheppard	last public open-air hanging in San Francisco , at the Presidio before a crowd of not less than 10,000
July 25, 1857	John Lewis	hanged outside the municipal prison of Cardiff before a crowd of 12,000, the final public hanging in Wales
August 10, 1858	James Seale or Searle	Thomas Hardy watched last execution in Dorset in Dorchester, and final public execution in England

At Vandoeuvres, Professor Henri-Frédéric Amiel, who would be referred to as the “Swiss Thoreau,” wrote in his JOURNAL INTIME: “At ten o’clock this evening, under a starlit sky, a group of rustics under the windows of the salon employed themselves in shouting disagreeable songs. Why is it that this tuneless shrieking of false notes and scoffing words delights these people? Why is it that this ostentatious parade of ugliness, this jarring vulgarity and grimacing is their way of finding expression and expansion in the great solitary and tranquil night?

Why? Because of a sad and secret instinct. Because of the need they have of realizing themselves as individuals, of asserting themselves exclusively, egotistically, idolatrously — opposing the self in them to everything else, placing it in harsh contrast with the nature which enwraps us, with the poetry which raises us above ourselves, with the harmony which binds us to others, with the adoration which carries us toward God. No, no, no! Myself only, and that is enough! Myself by negation, by ugliness, by grimace and irony! Myself, in my caprice, in my independence, in my irresponsible sovereignty; myself, set free by laughter, free as the demons are, and exulting in my freedom; I, master of myself, invincible and self-sufficient, living for this one time yet by and for myself! This is what seems to me at the bottom of this merry-making. One hears in it an echo of Satan, the temptation to make self the center of all things, to be like an Elohim, the worst and last revolt of man. It means also, perhaps, some rapid perception of what is absolute in personality, some rough exaltation of the subject, the individual, who thus claims, by abasing them, the rights of subjective existence. If so, it is the caricature of our most precious privilege, the parody of our apotheosis, a vulgarizing of our highest greatness. Shout away, then, drunkards! Your ignoble concert, with all its repulsive vulgarity, still reveals to us, without knowing it, something of the majesty of life and the sovereign power of the soul.”

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

July 25, Saturday. Very early this morning we heard the note of the wood thrush, on awaking, though this was a poor singer. I was glad to find that this prince of singers was so common in the wilderness... The shores of this lake are rocky, rarely sandy, and we saw no good places for moose to come out on, i.e. no meadows. What P. called Cancomgomoc Mountain, with a double top, was seen north over the lake in mid-forenoon. Approaching the shore, we scared up some young dippers with the old bird. Like the shecorways, they ran over the water very fast. Landing on the east side, four or five miles north of Kinco, I noticed roses (R. nitida) in bloom, and, as usual, an abundance of rue (Thalictrum Cornuti) along the shore. The wood there was arbor-vitæ, spruce, fir, white pine, etc. The ground and rotting trunks, as usual, covered with mosses, some strange kinds, — various wild feather and leaf-like mosses, of rank growth, that were new or rare to me, — and an abundance of Clintonia borealis....

The Indian started off first with the canoe and was soon out of sight, going much faster than an ordinary walk. We could see him a mile or more ahead, when his canoe against the sky on the height of land between Moosehead and the Penobscot was all that was to be seen about him....

Here, among others, were the Aster Radula, just in bloom; large-flowered bellwort (Uvularia grandiflora), in fruit. The great purple orchis (Platanthera fimbriata), very splendid and perfect ones close to the rails. I was surprised to see it in bloom so late. Vaccinium Canadense; Dalibarda repens, still in bloom; Pyrola secunda, out of bloom; Oxalis Acetosella, still occasionally in flower; Labrador tea (Ledum latifolium), out of bloom; Kalmia glauca, etc., etc., close to the track.

A cousin of mine and his son met with a large male moose on this carry two years ago, standing within a few rods of them, and at first mistook him for an ox. They both fired at him, but to no purpose.

As we were returning over the track where I had passed but a few moments before, we started a partridge [Ruffed Grouse  Bonasa umbellus (Partridge)] with her young partly from beneath the wooden rails. While the young hastened away, she sat within seven feet of us and plumed herself, perfectly fearless, without making a noise or ruffling her feathers as they do in our neighborhood, and I thought it would be a good opportunity to observe whether she flew as quietly as other birds when not alarmed. We observed her till we were tired, and when we compelled her to get out of our way, though she took to wing as easily as if we had not been there and went only two or three rods, into a tree, she flew with a considerable whirl, as if this were unavoidable in a rapid motion of the wings....

Here was a canoe on the stocks, in an earlier stage of its manufacture than I had seen before, and I noticed it particularly. The St. Francis Indian was paring down the long cedar strips, or lining, with his crooked knife.

As near as I could see, and understand him and Polis, they first lay the bark flat on the ground, outside up, and two of the top rails, the inside and thickest ones, already connected with cross-bars, upon it, in order to get the form; and, with logs and rocks to keep the bark in place, they bend up the birch, cutting down slits in the edges from within three feet of the ends and perpendicularly on all sides about the rails, making a square corner at the ground; and a row of stakes three feet high is then driven into the ground all around, to hold the bark up in its place. They next lift the frame, i.e. two rails connected by cross-bars, to the proper height, and sew the bark strongly to the rails with spruce roots every six inches, the thread passing around the rail and also through the ends of the crossbars, and sew on strips of bark to protect the sides in the middle. The canoe is as yet carried out square down  at the ends (not ) , and is perfectly flat on the bottom.

(This canoe had advanced thus far.)

Then, as near as I could learn, they shape the ends (?), put in all the lining of long thin strips, so shaped and shaved as just to fit, and fill up the bark, pressing it out and shaping the canoe. Then they put in the ribs and put on the outer or thinnest rail over the edge of the bark....

Our path up the bank here led by a large dead white pine, in whose trunk near the ground were great square-cornered holes made by the woodpeckers, probably the red-headed. They were seven or eight inches long by four wide and reached to the heart of the tree through an inch or more of sound wood, and looked like great mortise-holes whose corners had been somewhat worn and rounded by a loose tenon. The tree for some distance was quite honeycombed by them. It suggested woodpeckers on a larger scale than ours, as were the trees and the forest.'...

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Returning, we found the tree cranberry in one place still in bloom. The stream here ran very swiftly and was hard to paddle against.

September 11, Friday: At Mountain Meadows in what is now southwestern Utah, during the Utah War between Mormons and the United States government over non-Mormon settlement of Utah, Mormons and allied native tribes killed 120 emigrants bound from Arkansas for California across the transverse ranges of the high desert.

This had been a wagon train of rather wealthy farming families, the Baker/Fancher party, perhaps the wealthiest such group ever, and at first seemed to have been intercepted by a warrior band of Paiute native Americans. However, the attackers had been surprisingly heavily armed with rifles and pistols and had an unusual abundance of shot and powder, rather than being equipped as was ordinarily the case with mere bows and arrows plus an occasional decrepit firearm with minuscule quantities of lead and gunpowder! These wealthy travelers had even been sporting personal jewelry, and had brought with them 1,000 head of longhorns, the first such to be seen in the vicinity of the Great Salt Lake. They had made themselves a most tempting target. After a 4-day standoff the people of the wagon train had agreed to a truce and to a surrender of their arms. This had turned out to be a ploy and, after being disarmed, on this day the Baker/Fancher party was attacked at close range with clubs, knives, and guns at point-blank range. In less than five minutes 120 of them lay dead. There were 17 under the age of eight (the age of innocence in the Mormon religion) and these were spared for adoption into Mormon families. As the bodies of their parents were being stripped of clothing and jewelry the children watched some of these attackers wipe off their paint, revealing themselves as white men. (The members of the Paiute tribe who had participated would soon disband and aggregate themselves to other tribal groups to evade detection and punishment for their participation. In December, Brigham Young would cynically invoice the United States federal government for $3,527.⁴³ for “articles furnished sundry bands of Indians near Mountain Meadows” by Salt Lake City merchant Levi Stewart in a distribution that Lee and Dimick Huntington, certified “on honor” that they had personally witnessed –171 pairs of pants, 135 shirts, 39½ pounds of gunpowder, 109 pounds of lead, 14,000 firing caps, steers, clothing, and butcher knives—that had in fact been mere spoils gathered up after the slaughter.) It is probable that this action had been directly ordered by Young himself, who had sent his adopted son John D. Lee to create an incident that would point out to the US government that Utah was not part of its national domain. Over the following years the children, adopted by local Mormon families, would see various items of their relatives’ clothing and various pieces of their relatives’ jewelry being worn by Mormons. (Finally the children would be repatriated to surviving relatives, and John D. Lee would be executed by firing squad. Geoffrey Ward would term this massacre “the most hideous example of the human cost exacted by religious fanaticism in American history until 9/11.”)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Commander William Lewis Herndon had been in charge of the mail steamboat that had come to bear the name SS Central America for a total of 18 voyages. On the 19th, one that had begun at the port of Colón, Panama on September 3d, at 9AM, beginning the 2d day of enduring an Atlantic hurricane, the old vessel sprang multiple leaks. Passengers would assist the crew in bailing, to no avail.

September 11, Friday. Up railroad and to Clamshell.
Solidago puberula apparently in prime, with the S. stricta, near gerardia oaks. Red choke-berry ripe; how long? On the east edge of Dennis Swamp, where I saw the strange warbler once.
 To my surprise I find, by the black oaks at the sandhole east of Clamshell, the Solidago rigida, apparently in prime or a little past. The heads and rays were so large I thought at first it must be a hieracium. The rays are from ten to fourteen, and three to three and a half fortieths of an inch wide. The middle leaves are clasping by a heart-shaped base. The heads are seven fortieths of an inch wide and seventeen fortieths long, in recurved panicles, —these. Eaton says truly, “Scales of the calyx round-obtuse, nerved, membranous at the edges.” My old S. stricta (early form) must be S. arylata var. juncea. It is now done.⁴⁵⁰

October 4, Sunday: At the site of the battle with mutineers that had taken place two days earlier in India, in the Chatra portion of the Hazaribagh district of North Chotanagpur. The British forces hanged Jai Mangal Pandey and Nadir Ali Khan, junior native officers called subedars (something like lieutenants or sergeants major, but lacking authority over any British soldier), and presumably heaving their corpses onto the pile in the well. An inscription now recognizes these leaders.

At one point during his seasons at Walden Pond, Henry Thoreau had been rather seriously injured while coming home from some day work, building a woodshed for a farmer who lived out the Lexington Road. My guess is that this was something that would have happened subsequent to the June 12, 1846 frost that ruined his cash crop for that growing season. In his journal here, he reminisced about this:

October 4, Sunday: A.M. —By boat to Conantum.
 River fallen again. Barberrying and graping. Many of the grapes shrivelled and killed by frost now, and the leaves mostly fallen. The yellow leaves of the white willow thickly strew the bottom of my boat. Willows, elms, etc., shed their oldest leaves first, even like pines.⁴⁵¹ The recent and green ones are seen mottling a yellowish ground, especially in the willow; and, in the case of the willow, at least, these green ones wither and fall for the most part without turning yellow at all.
 The button-bushes are generally greenish-yellow now; only the highest and most exposed points brown and crisp in some places. The black willow, rising above them, is crisped yellowish-brown, so that the general aspect of the river's brim now is a modest or sober ripe yellowish-brown, —generally no bright colors. When I scare up a bittern from amid the weeds, I say it is the color of that bird's breast, —or body generally, for the darker part of its wings correspond to the sere pickerel-weed. Now that the pontederia is brown, the humble, weedy green of the shore is burweed, polygonum, wool-grass, and, in some places, rushes. Such is the river's border ordinarily, —either these weeds mingled with the sere and dark-brown pontederia or a convex raised rim of button-bushes, two to four feet high by a rod wide, through [which] the black willows rise one to a dozen feet higher. Here and there, to be sure, are the purple-leaved Cornus sericea, yellowish sweet-gale, reddish rose bushes, etc., etc.
 Alders are still a fresh green. The grape leaves are generally crisp and curled, having a very light-colored appearance, but where it is protected by other foliage it is still a dense canopy of greenish-yellow shields. From the midst of these yellowing button-bushes, etc., I hear from time to time a half-warbled strain from some young sparrow who thinks it is spring.
 Scared up from the low shore at the bend, on the south side, opposite Clamshell, a flock of seventy-five or one hundred of what appeared solitary tattlers (??), that went off with a rippling note, wheeled, and alighted there again.⁴⁵²
 Now again, when other trees prove so fickle, the steadfast evergreenness of the pines is appreciated. Bright-tinted flaming scarlet or yellow maples amid pines show various segments of bright cones embosomed in green.

450. The 5th edition of Professor Eaton's A MANUAL OF BOTANY FOR THE NORTHERN STATES, published in 1829, was what was available to Henry Thoreau in the library of Waldo Emerson.

AMOS EATON'S BOTANY

451. Altered in pencil so as to read, “These willows shed,” etc.
 452. Henry Haynes next year thought they might be “Black-backs.”

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

At Potter's Swamp, where they are all maples, it adds to the beauty of the maple swamp at this season that it is not seen as a simple mass of color, but, different trees being of different tints, –green, yellow, scarlet, crimson, and different shades of each, –the outline of each tree is distinct to where one laps on to another. Yet a painter would hardly venture to make them thus distinct a quarter of a mile off.⁴⁵³

Hear a catbird and chewink, both faint.

Fever-bush has begun to yellow. Some nightshade leaves are a very dark purple.

See a grackle on the shore, so near I see the light mark about the eye.

While I lived in the woods I did various jobs about the town, –some fence-building, painting, gardening, carpentering, etc., etc. One day a man came from the east edge of the town and said that he wanted to get me to brick up a fireplace, etc., etc., for him. I told him that I was not a mason, but he knew that I had built my own house entirely and would not take no for an answer. So I went.

It was three miles off, and I walked back and forth each day, arriving early and working as late as if I were living there. The man was gone away most of the time, but had left some sand dug up in his cow-yard for me to make mortar with. I bricked up a fireplace, papered a chamber, but my principal work was whitewashing ceilings. Some were so dirty that many coats would not conceal the dirt. In the kitchen I finally resorted to yellow-wash to cover the dirt. I took my meals there, sitting down with my employer (when he got home) and his hired men. I remember the awful condition of the sink, at which I washed one day, and when I came to look at what was called the towel I passed it by and wiped my hands on the air, and thereafter I resorted to the pump. I worked there hard three days, charging only a dollar a day.

About the same time I also contracted to build a wood-shed of no mean size, for, I think, exactly six dollars, and cleared about half of it by a close calculation and swift working. The tenant wanted me to throw in a gutter and latch, but I carried off the board that was left and gave him no latch but a button. It stands yet, –behind the Kettle house. I broke up Johnny Kettle's old "trow," in which he kneaded his bread, for material. Going home with what nails were left in a flower bucket on my arm, in a rain, I was about getting into a hay-rigging, when my umbrella frightened the horse, and he kicked at me over the fills, smashed the bucket on my arm, and stretched me on my back; but while I lay on my back, his leg being caught over the shaft, I got up, to see him sprawling on the other side. This accident, the sudden bending of my body backwards, sprained my stomach so that I did not get quite strong there for several years, but had to give up some fence-building and other work which I had undertaken from time to time. I built the common slat fence for $1.50 per rod, or worked for $1.00 per day. I built six fences.

TIMELINE OF ACCIDENTS

Minott and Rice are apt to tell me the same story many times over. Minott told me the other day again of his peach tree. John Richardson was going by with a basket full of peach-stones. What are you going to do with them?" asked M. He said he was going to plant. "Well, give me two or three of them, and I'll try too." So he raised one fine tree, which bore first-rate rare-ripes as big as an apple, but after bearing once or twice something got into it and the tree died. They're short-lived things.

GEORGE MINOTT

November 5, Thursday: Henry Thoreau worked on his natural history material.

Ross/Adams
commentary

November 5, Thursday: P.M. –To the Dam Meadows.

But little corn is left in the field now, and that looks rather black. There is an abundance of cat-tail in the Dam Meadows.

Returning, talked with Minott. He told me how he and Harry Hooper used to go to Howard's meadow (Heywood's, by the railroad) when it was flowed and kill fishes through the ice. They would cut a long stick and go carefully over the ice when it was only a couple of inches thick, and when they saw a fish, strike the ice smartly, cracking it in all directions, right over him, and when he turned his belly, being stunned, would cut him out quickly before he came to. These were little fishes which he called "prods." He did n't know much more about them. They were somewhat like a small pout, but had different heads. They got so many once that he told Harry to cut a stick and string them and they'd give them to Zilpha as they went by. He has caught pickerel in the brook there which weighed two or three pounds.

GEORGE MINOTT

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

HANGING

He went to Bateman's Pond once in the winter to catch minnows with a net through the ice, but did n't get any. He went –rode– with Oliver Williams first into Acton and then round to this pond on this errand.

Minott was rather timid. One day early in-the winter he had been over to Fair Haven Hill after a fox with John Wyman, but they did n't get him. The pond was frozen about two inches thick, but you could easily see the water through the ice, and when they came back, Wyman said he was going straight across because it was nearer, but Minott objected. But Wyman told him to follow; it was safe enough. Minott followed half a dozen rods and then decided that he would n't risk it and went back; he'd go ten miles round sooner than cross. "But," said Minott, "the fellow kept on and I'll be hanged if he did n't get safe across."

The pitch pines generally have lost their leaves now, and the larches are fast falling. The elms have been bare some time.

Sometimes I would rather get a transient glimpse or side view of a thing than stand fronting to it, –as those polypodies. The object I caught a glimpse of as I went by haunts my thoughts a long time, is infinitely suggestive, and I do not care to front it and scrutinize it, for I know that the thing that really concerns me is not there, but in my relation to that. That is a mere reflecting surface. It is not the polypody in my pitcher or herbarium, or which I may possibly persuade to grow on a bank in my yard, or which is described in botanies, that interests me, but the one that I pass by in my walks a little distance off, when in the right mood. Its influence is sporadic, wafted through the air to me. Do you imagine its fruit to stick to the back of the leaf all winter? At this season polypody is in the air.⁴⁵⁴

It is worth the while to walk in swamps now, to bathe your eyes with greenness. The terminal shield fern is the handsomest and glossiest green.

Start up a snipe feeding in a wet part of the Dam Meadows.

I think that the man of science makes this mistake, and the mass of mankind along with him: that you should coolly give your chief attention to the phenomenon which excites you as something independent on you, and not as it is related to you. The important fact is its effect on me. He thinks that I have no business to see anything else but just what he defines the rainbow to be, but I care not whether my vision of truth is a waking thought or dream remembered, whether it is seen in the light or in the dark. It is the subject of the vision, the truth alone, that concerns me. The philosopher for whom rainbows, etc., can be explained away never saw them. With regard to such objects, I find that it is not they themselves (with which the men of science deal) that concern me; the point of interest is somewhere between me and them (i. e. the objects)....

And where does your Eastern stuff go to?⁴⁵⁵ Whose houses does it build? It has built Bangor, and what is the precise value of Bangor, omitting the lumber on its wharves? Western stuff is good enough for me. I think that this craving a better material than we deserve, and wasting what we get, is the secret of bankruptcy. And what is it, after all, but lumber? I do not wish to see any more poor men in rich houses. I would rather see one rich man in a poor house. No more cripples on stilts....

For a man to pride himself on this kind of wealth, as if it enriched him, is as ridiculous as if one struggling in the ocean with a bag of gold on his back should gasp out, "I am worth a hundred thousand dollars!"

I see his ineffectual struggles just as plainly, and what it is that sinks him.

454.Channing, p. 103.

455.Refers, of course, to the lumbering operations of the Maine woods.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1858

May 19, Wednesday: On this morning some 30 Missourian white men led by Captain Charles A. Hamilton arrived at a “Blooming Grove” trading post in Linn County in the southern portion of the Kansas Territory. When they set out on the road back toward Missouri, they intercepted along the way 11 unarmed free-state men. It appears that most of these Kansas men had been Hamilton’s neighbors while he had been living in the vicinity, and none had been taking any part in any of the fighting (they evidently had no intimation, therefore, that their former neighbor meant them any particular harm). However, when his column came to a defile surrounded by mounds near the Marais du Cygne of the French voyageurs, they herded their prisoners into line against one side of this defile and formed themselves into another line along the other side.

“BLEEDING KANSAS”

Patrick Ross, B.L. Reed, William A. Stillwell, Asa and William Hairgrove, Austin and Amos Hall, William Colpetzer, M. Robinson, Asa Snyder, and John F. Campbell were drawn up in line. Hamilton himself fired the initial shot. John F. Campbell, William Colpetzer, Patrick Ross, William A. Stillwell, and M. Robinson were killed by the volley and 5 others were wounded (while one person was able to fall in the pile unharmed and escape injury). Captain Hamilton ordered his firing squad to dismount and finish the job with pistols, but it is clear they did not. (John Brown, arriving at the scene toward the end of June, would construct a 2-story flat-roofed log fortification some 220 yards south of the site of the massacre, at a place where water from a spring could seep into a pit at its southwest corner. Friend John Greenleaf Whittier would write a poem, “Le Marais du Cygne” that would appear in the September 1858 issue of The Atlantic Monthly. Although William Griffith of Bates County, Missouri would be arrested during Spring 1863 and hanged on October 30, 1863 for participation in this day’s events, Hamilton himself would be able to return to Georgia and would be able to there survive until 1880.)

<http://www.kshs.org/places/marais/history.htm>

Le Marais du Cygne, by John Greenleaf Whittier.

A BLUSH as of roses
Where rose never grew!
Great drops on the bunch-grass,
But not of the dew!
A taint in the sweet air
For wild bees to shun!
A stain that shall never
Bleach out in the sun!

Back, steed of the prairies!
Sweet song-bird, fly back!
Wheel hither, bald vulture!
Gray wolf, call thy pack!
The foul human vultures
Have feasted and fled;
The wolves of the Border
Have crept from the dead.

From the hearths of their cabins,
The fields of their corn,
Unwarned and unweaponed,
The victims were torn, —
By the whirlwind of murder
Swooped up and swept on
To the low, reedy fen-lands,
The Marsh of the Swan.

With a vain plea for mercy
No stout knee was crooked;
In the mouths of the rifles

STATE MURDER

Right manly they looked.
How paled the May sunshine,
O Marais du Cygne!
On death for the strong life,
On red grass for green!

In the homes of their rearing,
Yet warm with their lives,
Ye wait the dead only,
Poor children and wives!
Put out the red forge-fire,
The smith shall not come;
Unyoke the brown oxen,
The ploughman lies dumb.

Wind slow from the Swan's Marsh,
O dreary death-train,
With pressed lips as bloodless
As lips of the slain!
Kiss down the young eyelids,
Smooth down the gray hairs;
Let tears quench the curses
That burn through your prayers.

Strong man of the prairies,
Mourn bitter and wild!
Wail, desolate woman!
Weep, fatherless child!
But the grain of God springs up
From ashes beneath,
And the crown of his harvest
Is life out of death.

Not in vain on the dial
The shade moves along,
To point the great contrasts
Of right and of wrong:
Free homes and free altars,
Free prairie and flood, —
The reeds of the Swan's Marsh,
Whose bloom is of blood!

On the lintels of Kansas
That blood shall not dry;
Henceforth the Bad Angel
Shall harmless go by;
Henceforth to the sunset,
Unchecked on her way,
Shall Liberty follow
The march of the day.

THE 2D GREAT AMERICAN DISUNION

June 25, Friday: James McGee was hanged on the same gallows on which Washington Goode and John White Webster had been hung, for having stabbed to death Deputy Warden Galen C. Walker in the Massachusetts State Prison on December 15, 1856.

For what would be known as the four Treaties of Tientsin, the Chinese negotiators were not allowed to dispute a single word of the prepared English text, involving 56 articles. Privileges for the Russians and for the Americans were included along with the privileges for the British and the French. From this point Westerners would import and sell their opium at will.

DOPERS

FIGURING OUT WHAT AMOUNTS TO A “HISTORICAL CONTEXT” IS WHAT

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

THE CRAFT OF HISTORICIZING AMOUNTS TO, AND THIS NECESSITATES DISTINGUISHING BETWEEN THE SET OF EVENTS THAT MUST HAVE TAKEN PLACE BEFORE EVENT E COULD BECOME POSSIBLE, AND MOST CAREFULLY DISTINGUISHING THEM FROM ANOTHER SET OF EVENTS
THAT COULD NOT POSSIBLY OCCUR UNTIL SUBSEQUENT TO EVENT E.

August 6, Friday: The USS Constellation arrived at the Boston Navy Yard: “Hove up the anchor and stood up to the Navy Yard in tow of steam tugs. Ship in charge of pilot. Secured ship to the wharf. At 2:30 transferred to the receiving ship “Ohio” the Seamen, Ord. Sea., Landsmen and boys: Sent the Marines to the Marine Barracks and remainder of crew ashore on liberty.”

August 6, 1858: P.M. –Walk to Boulder Field.

The broom is quite out of bloom; probably a week or ten days. It is almost ripe, indeed. I should like to see how rapidly it spreads. The dense roundish masses, side by side, are three or four feet over and fifteen inches high. They have grown from near the ground this year. The whole clump is now about eighteen feet from north to south by twelve wide. Within a foot or two of its edge, I detect many slender little plants springing up in the grass, only three inches high, but, on digging, am surprised to find that they are two years old. They have large roots, running down straight as well as branching, much stouter than the part above ground. Thus it appears to spread slowly by the seed falling from its edge, for I detected no runners. It is associated there with indigo, which is still abundantly in bloom.

I then looked for the little groves of barberries which some two months ago I saw in the cow-dung thereabouts, but to my surprise I found some only in one spot after a long search. They appear to have generally died, perhaps dried up. These few were some two inches high; the roots yet longer, having penetrated to the soil beneath. Thus, no doubt, some of those barberry clumps are formed; but I noticed many more small barberry plants standing single, most commonly protected by a rock.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

BARBERRY

Cut a couple of those low scrub apple bushes, and found that those a foot high and as wide as high, being clipped by the cows, as a hedge with shears, were about twelve years old, but quite sound and thrifty.

If our sluggish river, choked with potamogeton, might seem to have the slow-flying bittern for its peculiar genius, it has also the sprightly and aerial kingbird [Eastern Kingbird █ Tyrannus tyrannus] to twitter over and lift our thoughts to clouds as white as its own breast.

Emerson is gone to the Adirondack country with a hunting party. Eddy says he has carried a double-barrelled gun, one side for shot, the other for ball, for Lowell killed a bear there last year. But the story on the Mill-Dam is that he has taken a gun which throws shot from one end and ball from the other!

I think that I speak impartially when I say that I have never met with a stream so suitable for boating and botanizing as the Concord, and fortunately nobody knows it. I know of reaches which a single country seat would spoil beyond remedy, but there has not been any important change here since I can remember. The willows slumber along its shore, piled in light but low masses, even like the cumuli clouds above. We pass haymakers in every meadow, who may think that we are idlers. But Nature takes care that every nook and crevice is explored by some one. While they look after the open meadows, we farm the tract between the river's brinks and behold the shores from that side. We, too, are harvesting an annual crop with our eyes, and think you Nature is not glad to display her beauty to us?

Early in the day we see the dewdrops thickly sprinkled over the broad leaves of the potamogeton. These cover the stream so densely in some places that a web-footed bird can almost walk across on them.

Nowadays we hear the squealiny notes of young hawks. The kingfisher is seen hovering steadily over one spot, or hurrying away with a small fish in his mouth, sounding his alarum nevertheless. The note of the wood pewee is now more prominent, while birds generally are silent.

This is pure summer; no signs of fall in this, though I have seen some maples, as above the Assabet Spring, already prematurely reddening, owing to the water, and for some time the Cornus sericea has looked brownish red.

Every board and chip cast into the river is soon occupied by one or more turtles of various sizes. The sternotherus oftenest climbs up the black willows, even three or more feet.

I hear of pickers ordered out of the huckleberry-fields, and I see stakes set up with written notices forbidding any to pick there. Some let their fields, or allow so much for the picking. Sic transit gloria ruris. We are not grateful enough that we have lived part of our lives before these evil days came. What becomes of the true value of country life? What if you must go to market for it? Shall things come to such a pass that the butcher commonly brings round huckleberries in his cart? It is as if the hangman were to perform the marriage ceremony, or were to preside at the communion table. Such is the inevitable tendency of our civilization, —to reduce huckleberries to a level with beef-steak. The butcher's item on the door is now "calf's head and huckleberries." I suspect that the inhabitants of England and of the Continent of Europe have thus lost their natural rights with the increase of population and of monopolies. The wild fruits of the earth disappear before civilization, or are only to be found in large markets. The whole country becomes, as it were, a town or beaten common, — & the fruits left are a few hips & haws.

HANGING

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

August 10, Tuesday: Thomas Hardy viewed, through a telescope from a distant hill, the final public execution in England, that of James Seale or Searle, which took place in Dorset in Dorchester and would be the final hanging of any kind in that town.⁴⁵⁶

FINAL EXECUTIONS
July 25, 1857	John Lewis	hanged outside the municipal prison of Cardiff before a crowd of 12,000, the final public hanging in Wales
August 10, 1858	James Seale or Searle	Thomas Hardy watched last execution in Dorset in Dorchester, and final public execution in England
March 8, 1862	Captain Nathaniel Gordon	had been smuggling fresh slaves into the USA, hanged for this (classified as piracy)

August 10: P.M. – To yew, etc.

It is cloudy and misty dog-day weather, with a good deal of wind, and thickening to occasional rain this afternoon. This rustling wind is agreeable, reminding me, by its unusual sound, of other and ruder seasons. The most of a storm you can get now is rather exhilarating. The grass and bushes are quite wet, and the pickers are driven from the berry-field. The rabbit’s-foot clover is very wet to walk through, holding so much water. The fine grass falls over from each side into the middle of the woodland paths and wets me through knee-high. I see many tobacco-pipes, now perhaps in their prime, if not a little late, and hear of pine-sap. The Indian pipe, though coming with the fungi and suggesting, no doubt, a close relation to them,— a sort of connecting link between flowers and fungi,— is a very interesting flower, and will bear a close inspection when fresh. The whole plant has a sweetish1 earthy odor, though Gray says it is inodorous. I see them now on the leafy floor of this oak wood, in families of twelve to thirty sisters of various heights, —from two to eight inches,— as close together as they can stand, the youngest standing close up to the others, all with faces yet modestly turned downwards under their long hoods. Here is a family of about twenty-five within a diameter of little more than two inches, lifting the dry leaves for half their height in a cylinder about them. They generally appear bursting up through the dry leaves, which, elevated around, may serve to prop them. Springing up in the shade with so little color,

456. James Seale or Searle, for slashing the throat of Sarah Ann Guppy or Griffy with a cheese knife and setting the house on fire.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

they look the more fragile and delicate. They have very delicate pinkish half-naked stems with a few semitransparent crystalline-white scales for leaves, and from the sinuses at the base of the petals without (when their heads are drooping) more or less dark purple is reflected, like the purple of the arteries seen on a nude body. They appear not to flower only when upright. Gray says they are upright in fruit. They soon become black-specked, even before flowering.

Am surprised to find the yew with ripe fruit (how long?), – though there is a little still small and green, – where I had not detected fertile flowers. It fruits very sparingly, the berries growing singly here and there, on last year's wood, and hence four to six inches below the extremities of the upturned twigs. It is the most surprising berry that we have: first, since it is borne by an evergreen, hemlock-like bush with which we do not associate a soft and bright-colored berry, and hence its deep scarlet contrasts the more strangely with the pure, dark evergreen needles; and secondly, because of its form, so like art, and which could be easily imitated in wax, a very thick scarlet cup or mortar with a dark-purple (?) bead set at the bottom. My neighbors are not prepared to believe that such a berry grows in Concord.

I notice several of the hylodes hopping through the woods like wood frogs, far from water, this mizzling [day]. They are probably common in the woods, but not noticed, on account of their size, or not distinguished from the wood frog. I also saw a young wood frog, with the dark line through the eye, no bigger than the others. One hylodes which I bring home has a perfect cross on its back, – except one arm of it.

The wood thrush's was a peculiarly woodland nest, made solely of such materials as that unfrequented grove afforded, the refuse of the wood or shore of the pond. There was no horsehair, no twine nor paper nor other relics of art in it.

October 7, Thursday: Frederick Douglass prepared resolutions for a public meeting on capital punishment held at Rochester, New York, that included various Quakers among its attendees, and Susan B. Anthony. In effect, his argument was:

Murder is no cure for murder.

Resolved, That life is the great primary and most precious and comprehensive of all human rights– that whether it be coupled with virtue, honour, or happiness, or with sin, disgrace and misery, the continued possession of it is rightfully not a matter of violation; that it is neither deliberately nor voluntarily destroyed, either by individual separately, or combined in what is called Government; that it is a right derived solely and directly from God –the source of all goodness and the centre of all authority– and is most manifestly designed by Him to be held, esteemed, and revered among men as the most sacred, solemn and inviolable of all his gifts to man.

Resolved, That the love of man as manifested in his actions to his fellows, whether in his public or private relations, has very been the surest test of the presence of God in the soul; that the degree in which the sacredness of human life has been exemplified in all ages of the world, has been the truest index of the measure of human progress; that in proportion as the tale of barbarism has receded, a higher regard has been manifested for the God-given right to life, its inviolability has been strengthened in proportion to the development of the intellect and moral sentiments, and that conscience, reason, and revelation unite their testimony against the continuance of a custom, barbarous in its origin, antichristian in its continuance, vindictive in its character, and demoralizing in its tendencies.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Resolved, That any settled custom, precept, example or law, the observance of which necessarily tends to cheapen human life, or in any measure serves to diminish and weaken man's respect for it, is a custom, precept, example, and law utterly inconsistent with the law of eternal goodness written on the constitution of man by his Maker, and is diametrically opposed to the safety, welfare and happiness of mankind; and that however ancient and honorable such laws and customs may be in the eyes of prejudice, superstition and bigotry, they ought to be discountenanced, abolished and supplanted by a higher civilization and a holier and more merciful Christianity.

Resolved, That in the opinion of this meeting, when a criminal is firmly secured in the iron grasp of the government, and on that account can no longer endanger the peace and safety of society; that when he is wasted and emaciated by heavy chains and horrid thoughts, and long confinement in a gloomy cell - when, as it is often the case, he is completely transformed, both in temper and spirit- the execution of the death penalty on such an one is an act of cold blooded and barbarous enormity, and is as cowardly as it is cruel, and that instead of repressing and preventing the horrid crime of murder, it really serves by shocking and blunting the finer and better feelings of human nature, to undermine respect for human life, and leads directly to the perpetration of the crime which it would extinguish.

Resolved, That the time to advance opinions and principles is when those opinions and principles are upon trial, and threatened with outrage; and that while we have respectfully remained silent till the ends of justice have been served in fixing the guilt of the criminal, we now come in the sacred office of humanity and benevolence, to appeal for mercy at the hands of his Excellency, Governor King, on behalf of young Ira Stout, and to ask that his punishment shall be commuted from being capitally executed to imprisonment for life.

Resolved, That punishment as such, is a form of revenge, wreaking upon the criminal the pain he has inflicted on another, wrong in principle and pernicious in practice; arises out of the lowest propensities of human nature, and is opposed to the highest civilization: that it has no sanction in the spirit and teachings of Christ, which everywhere abound in loving kindness and forgiveness.

Resolved, That rather than visit the crime upon the head of the criminal, thus descending to his level, we ought to place him in a position to develop his higher nature; and instead of descending to a spirit of revenge, and degrading ourselves on one hand, and the criminal on the other, we should urge a thorough reform in our criminal laws - basing them on the truly Christian principle of love and good will towards men, and to reject forever the cold blooded and barbarous principle of retaliation.

Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing resolutions and the proceedings of this meeting, be transmitted to his Excellency, Governor King, as an expression of the sense of this meeting, and that the same be subscribed by the Chairman and Secretary thereof.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

December 10, Friday: Henry F.N. Meuse (AKA Charles Douse) had stabbed Peter Becker to death on June 4th, 1858 while robbing him of $100. Deputy Sheriff of San Francisco, California John Ellis read the death warrant as the prisoner stood on the trap door in the Broadway County jailyard. “The culprit was neatly dressed in a white shirt, brown pants, black frock coat, black satin vest and black cravat.” The body was allowed to hang for 30 minutes before being cut down.

At the funeral of Barzillai Frost, the Reverend Convers Francis “offered a very fervent prayer.”

At 7:30 AM Henry Thoreau and Thomas Cholmondeley left Friend Daniel Ricketson’s for the Tarkiln Hill train station. Thoreau went to the Boston Society of Natural History⁴⁵⁷ and charged out Edward Jesse’s GLEANINGS IN NATURAL HISTORY, SECOND SERIES (he would make entries in his 2d Commonplace Book)⁴⁵⁸

JESSE’S GLEANINGS

and Zadock Thompson’s HISTORY OF VERMONT (1842),⁴⁵⁹

THOMPSON’S HISTORY I

THOMPSON’S HISTORY II

THOMPSON’S HISTORY III

and evidently Cholmondeley stayed in Boston or departed for the Southern states on his way ostensibly to the West Indies (at any rate, Cholmondeley was gone before the end of the year at the outside).

[THOREAU MADE NO ENTRY IN HIS JOURNAL FOR DECEMBER 10th]

457. These would be the proceedings, for this year, of the Society:

PROCEEDINGS, FOR 1858

458. Edward Jesse. GLEANINGS IN NATURAL HISTORY, WITH LOCAL RECOLLECTIONS... TO WHICH ARE ADDED MAXIMS AND HINTS FOR AN ANGLER. London, 1832.

Edward Jesse. GLEANINGS IN NATURAL HISTORY, SECOND SERIES. TO WHICH ARE ADDED SOME EXTRACTS FROM THE UNPUBLISHED MSS. OF... MR. WHITE OF SELBORNE. London, 1834.

Edward Jesse. GLEANINGS IN NATURAL HISTORY, THIRD AND LAST SERIES. TO WHICH ARE ADDED NOTICES OF SOME OF THE ROYAL PARKS AND RESIDENCES. London, 1835.

(Since many American publishers consider Thoreau to fall within their category “nature writer” — some have considered him the creator of this category in America, others derogate him as one of it poorest exemplars because he fails to focus on the pleasantries they vend. It may be useful, therefore, to contrast Thoreau with a well-published “nature writer” of his own period such as this Edward Jesse, Esquire — why don’t you struggle to detect some similarities with the life or writings of HDT?)

459. For the associated 1842 map of Vermont, see:

THOMPSON’S 1842 MAP

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1859

During this year the Illinois legislature chose Stephen A. Douglas for the federal Senate over Abraham Lincoln, by a vote of 54 to 46 — but this was not because the Illinois legislature was experiencing any distress at Lincoln's racism.

There was a report from Arkansas that 3 white men there had been hanged when they had been found to have in their possession literature by the troublesome antislavery racist Hinton Rowan Helper. In London, in this year, the US Minister was approached by a representative of Her Majesty's government, on behalf of a visiting white Englishman who had been caught distributing Helperite materials in Virginia. The US Minister refused to intercede on behalf of Her Majesty's government in the internal criminal affairs of the State of Virginia.

THE 2D GREAT AMERICAN DISUNION

(Get this, just as it wasn't enough to be a white man in the southern states of the United States of America, it also wasn't enough to be a racist — being the wrong kind of white racist could get one into really big trouble in the fastest way.)

William Still started a press campaign to end racial discrimination on Philadelphia's railroad cars. After John Brown and his insurrection at Harpers Ferry failed, Still would shelter some of his men and help them escape capture.

January 14, Friday: According to the diary of Phebe Townley Dod in Cedar Grove, New Jersey, her relative Albert, who had procured a ticket, reported to her that on Wednesday morning James McMahon, condemned for killing his sister-in-law, had been hung in the presence of some 150 spectators. Albert reported — and this made Phebe feel faint — that the man had “met his fate apparently very fearlessly, said nothing, neither raised his eyes, only beat his heart continuously with a cross which he held in his hand. After he was raised in the air, he beat it twice and then his hand dropped and the cross fell to the floor.”

When Hans von Bülow conducted Die Ideale by Franz Liszt at the Berlin Singakademie, there were hisses during the conclusion. The conductor left, then returned and announced “I request that the hissers leave the hall, since it was not customary to hiss here.” Silence filled the hall as he completed the concert.

January 14. The fog-frosts and the fog continue, though considerable of the frostwork has fallen. This forenoon I walk up the Assabet to see it. The hemlocks are perhaps a richer sight than any tree,—such Christmas trees, thus sugared, as were never seen. On [sic] side you see more or less greenness, but when you stand due north they are unexpectedly white and rich, so beautifully still, and when you look under them you see some great rock, or rocks, all hoary with the same, and a finer frost on the very fine dead hemlock twigs there and on hanging roots and twigs, quite like the cobwebs in a grist-mill covered with meal,—and it implies a stillness like that; or it is like the lightest down glued on. The birch, from its outline and its numerous twigs, is also one of the prettiest trees in this dress.

The fog turns to a fine rain at noon, and in the evening and night it produces a glaze, which this morning,—

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

June 10, Friday: John Brown was at Westport, Connecticut.

Pyotr Illyich Tchaikovsky graduated from the School of Jurisprudence at St. Petersburg, Russia.

William Morris (AKA "Tipperary Bill") was hanged in the Broadway jailyard in San Francisco, California for having gunned down Richard K. Doak in a bar on November 19th, 1858.

C.F. Bernard wrote to Charles Wesley Slack to request the distribution of a report. He praised the 28th Congregational Society and the Reverend Theodore Parker, and sent well wishes.

Henry Thoreau surveyed on College Road below Annursnack Hill near the Acton town line, for Daniel Brooks Clark, and was informed that the road had received that name due to "a house so called once standing on it":

He also surveyed 16 acres near Prescott Barrett's house on Barrett's Mill Road west of Spencer Brook. Thoreau remarked that the whole area had belonged to Peter Temple in 1811, and part was sold to Jonathan Hildreth and part to Stephen Barrett. The List of Bills in the FIELD NOTES shows a bill for $2.⁵⁰ for this date.

http://www.concordlibrary.org/scollect/Thoreau_surveys/4.htm

June 10, Friday: Surveying for D. B. Clark on "College Road," so called in Peter Temple's deed in 1811. Clark thought from a house so called once standing on it. Cut a line, and after measured it, in a thick wood, which passed within two feet of a blue jay's nest which was about four feet up a birch, beneath the leafy branches and quite exposed. The bird sat perfectly still with its head up and bill open upon its pretty large young, not moving in the least, while we drove a stake close by, within three feet, and cut and measured, being about there twenty minutes at least.

STATE MURDER

October 16, Sunday-October 18, Tuesday: Henry Thoreau was working on his natural history materials.

STATE MURDER

ROSS/ADAMS COMMENTARY

The raid by the John Brown forces on the federal arsenal at Harpers Ferry, Virginia involved 5 persons of color and 13 whites. Of the persons of color, 2 were killed during the raid, John Anderson Copeland, Jr. and Shields Green were captured and would be hanged and one managed to escape. That is to say, back from the West, Captain Brown committed the treason of attempting to free men and women from their rightful masters by seizing the weapons at the federal arsenal, and of course the owners of these men and women, who had a perfect right to resist being deprived of the use of their property, of course resisted being deprived, and therefore of course there were deaths during his raid upon this locale where the government to which he owed loyalty was manufacturing its weapons of slaughter. Although Brown did not effectively free the slaves of the sovereign state of Virginia –except of course that he freed those who listened to him and took up pikes and were gunned down– he was able effectively to sacrifice the lives of other people to his own enthusiasms. That has to count as a personal “win” of sorts! For instance, the 1st to be killed by the raiders at Harpers Ferry was

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

Hayward Shepard, a free black who happened to be in harm's way because he was serving as the baggage handler between the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad terminal and the Winchester & Harpers Ferry Railroad Terminal (the old man failed to respond appropriately to the raiders' orders). There were 21 fighters with Brown in the raid, and of these 10 were killed outright, 5 were captured for trial and would be hanged, and 7 escaped, of which 2 would later be captured and tried and hanged. Although the US government did effectively save the contents of their arsenal from these bold insurrectionaries, shortly thereafter the weapons of the arsenal would be seized by the insurrectionary Governor Wise of Virginia, who had as perfect a right to them as anyone, and he would distribute these weapons to Confederate troops.

STATE MURDER

NOTE: There was every reason to believe that if Governor Wise of Virginia could get his hands on [Frederick

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Douglass, the black leader would hang alongside the white leader.

Douglass was at the moment in Philadelphia. The telegraph operator there would seek out Douglass and warn him, so that he would have three full hours in which to effect his escape — before the telegram ordering his arrest needed to be handed over to the local sheriff. Douglass, in fleeing went first to familiar haunts, the Hoboken, New Jersey lodgings of Ottile Assing, and only from there to Rochester and then to Ontario, and England. On the dock in Rochester, embarking for Ontario, William Parker would press into Douglass's hand what was purported to be the pistol dropped by Gorsuch  when he had been shot dead in Christiana (actually, it seems that the man had been unarmed with anything more deadly than a curiously foolish moral courage).]

This sort of situation has been described many times, and you will forgive me if I here repeat one of the early descriptions of this sort of situation:

More weapons, more murder.

—Lao Tzu

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Harpers Ferry from Brown's overlook in Maryland

Brown's Sharps carbine, his "Henry Ward Beecher's Bible," was captured with him after the Harpers Ferry skirmish, along with that famous George Washington sword he had just stolen from

← George Washington's sword
(in the famous Leutze painting).

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

a plantation, and to which he had as much right as its current owner (or, for that matter, its original owner).

After they would take Captain John Brown's Sharps rifle away from him at Harpers Ferry, they would allow this little boy to pose with it. Grow up, son, and be a Christian like us: kill people, own slaves.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Although Charles Plummer Tidd opposed the attack on Harpers Ferry, he nevertheless took part both in the raid on the planter Washington's home and on the federal arsenal itself. He and John Brown's son Owen Brown escaped, and made their way on foot toward the northwestern part of Pennsylvania.

(Tidd would visit Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Canada and take part in the planning for the rescue of Aaron D. Stevens and Albert Hazlett while the Mason Commission of the Congress was presuming that he had been killed in the fighting at the arsenal.)

Owen Brown was 35 at the time of the Harpers Ferry raid. He escaped on foot toward the northwestern part of Pennsylvania. It was due largely to his psychological grit, and physical endurance despite a withered arm, that the little group of survivors of which he was the leader did reach safety. He and Charles Plummer Tidd would find work and safety under assumed names, on an oil well crew in Crawford County, Pennsylvania. After the civil war he would grow grapes for some time in Ohio in association with two of his brothers, before migrating to California. He would be the only one of the 5 escaped raiders not to participate in the civil war, and would be the last of the raiders when he died on January 8th, 1889 near Pasadena at his mountain home "Brown's Peak." He never married. A marble monument now marks his mountain grave.

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

Perhaps this white corpse is meant to be Oliver Brown, usefully lying dead in the foreground of a contemporary news illustration? (This wouldn't have been a depiction of Dangerfield Newby, also shot down at the bridge, since he was a very tall man with a splendid physique and since his mulatto body was abused by the attackers, who among other things snipped off its ears as trophies before they herded some hogs to root on it.)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

John E. Cook was sent out by Captain Brown to collect weapons, and instead climbed into a tree and observed the fight.

When John Brown sent his son Watson Brown out to negotiate, he was gunned down by the citizens of Harpers Ferry.

(He would manage to crawl back to the shelter of the engine house and live on, groaning, his head cradled in Edwin Coppoc's lap, for a considerable period. He would expire on October 18, 1859. His widow Isabella M. Thompson Brown would remarry with his brother Salmon Brown.)

John Henry Kagi became trapped along with John Anderson Copeland, Jr. and Lewis Sheridan Leary in the armory called Hall's Rifle Works. When the three men made a run for it, heading down to the Shenandoah

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

River, they came under a crossfire and Kagi was the first killed, his body being left to float in the river.

A monument would be erected by the citizens of Oberlin, Ohio in honor of their three free citizens of color who had died in the raid or been hanged, John Anderson Copeland, Jr., Lewis Sheridan Leary, and Shields Green (the 8-foot marble monument would be moved to Vine Street Park in 1971).

Captain John Brown sent William Thompson out from the engine house to negotiate under flag of truce, and the mob of citizens placed him under arrest, took him to the local hotel barroom, discussed what to do, dragged him into the street, executed him by shooting him in the head, and dumped his body into the Potomac River.⁴⁶⁰ Thompson's brother Dauphin Adolphus Thompson also was killed during the raid.

Dauphin

William

460. An interesting fact about this case is that it just about got a young lady into serious trouble. According to a letter of explanation she would provide to the local paper, Miss C.C. Fouke was the daughter of the tavernkeeper at Harpers Ferry, operating at the local hotel. The story had gone around, after the fact, that on the 2d day of the raid in her father's saloon in the hotel she had thrown her body in front of this Brown conspirator William Thompson while the mob was debating whether or not to off him. Rather than be classed with Pocahontas or with Florence Nightingale, Miss Fouke attempted to explain the rationale for her conduct to the public at large. She had indeed thrown her body between the mob and the captive, she freely confessed, but she had done so, she needed to point out, "without touching him," and she insisted also that her action was not motivated by any concern that this man was about to be shot in the head, but rather because her sister-in-law was resting in the next room and should not be disturbed as she was ailing — and/or out of a conviction that the man before being offed should be tried by a court of law.

HDT

WHAT?

INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

HDT

WHAT?

INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Jeremiah Goldsmith Anderson was pinned against the wall by a bayonet-thrust of one of the Marines.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

“One of the prisoners described Anderson as turning completely over against the wall in his dying agony. He lived a short time, stretched on the brick walk without, where he was subjected to savage brutalities, being kicked in body and face, while one brute of an armed farmer spat a huge quid of tobacco from his vile jaws into the mouth of the dying man, which he first forced open.” (You see, these people were incorrectly perceiving him to be not a white man but a light mulatto. When opportunistic medical students would go to transport his remains to their college in Winchester, Virginia for use as a dissection specimen, their treatment of this “light mulatto” corpse was so casual as to be recorded by a bystander: “In order to take him away handily they procured a barrel and tried to pack him into it. Head foremost, they rammed him in, but they could not bend his legs so as to get them into the barrel with the rest of the body. In their endeavor to accomplish this feat, they strained so hard that the man’s bones or sinews fairly cracked.”)

In the engine house at Harpers Ferry, Edwin Coppoc surrendered with Captain John Brown.

(He would be tried by a jury of his white male peers immediately after the conclusion of the trial of Captain Brown. He would be sentenced to death on November 2, 1859. From prison before his hanging, he would write to his adoptive mother, of a nonresistant-abolitionist Quaker farm family, that he was

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

"sorry to say that I was ever induced to raise a gun."

He would be hung with John E. Cook on December 16, 1859. The body would be buried in Winona after a funeral attended by the entire town. Later the body would be reburied in Salem OH.)

You will remember that in July 1854,  when Moncure Daniel Conway graduated from Harvard Theological School and was ordained, his classmate William H. Leeman had not graduated with him. This fellow had drunk some illicit alcohol Conway had smuggled onto campus and then refilled Conway's illicit bottles with water, and so student Conway had turned him in to the college administration. Leeman had been refused graduation on grounds of moral turpitude, and warned not to make any attempt to preach. At this point he reappears, or his mutilated body reappears — salvaged from the waters after being used for target practice, and thrown into the common pit on the bank of the Shenandoah River upstream from Harpers Ferry.⁴⁶¹

461. See pages 87-8 and 240-1 of d'Entremont, where this account of Leeman was put together for the first time.

STATE MURDER

Barclay Coppoc escaped from Harpers Ferry.

“We were together eight days before [John E. Cook and Albert Hazlett were] captured, which was near Chambersburg, and the next night Meriam [Francis Jackson Meriam] left us and went to Shippensburg, and there took cars for Philadelphia. After that there were but three of us left [John Brown’s son Owen Brown, Barclay Coppoc, and Charles Plummer Tidd], and we kept together, until we got to Centre County, Pennsylvania, where we bought a box and packed up all heavy luggage, such as rifles, blankets, etc., and after being together three or four weeks we separated and I went on through with the box to Ohio on the cars.” (Osborn Perry Anderson, Barclay Coppoc, and Francis Jackson Meriam would travel separately to safe exile in the area of St. Catharines, Canada. Barclay Coppoc would go from there to Iowa, with Virginia agents in close pursuit. He would be back in Kansas in 1860, helping to run off some Missouri slaves, and would nearly lose his life in a 2d undertaking of this kind. On July 24, 1861 he would become a 1st Lieutenant in Colonel Montgomery’s regiment, the 3d Kansas Infantry. Eventually he would be killed by the fall of a train into the Platte river from a trestle forty feet high, the supports of which had been burned away by Confederates.)

Francis Jackson Meriam was not killed or captured in the raid on Harpers Ferry because he had been left at the

STATE MURDER

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

Kennedy farmhouse, in one of his fits of despair.

He was a great drag on the other escapees as they hiked through the woods as he needed to stop and rest every mile or so.

To the great relief of the others, Meriam boarded a train in the town of Shippensburg heading for Philadelphia. Eventually Thoreau would put him on a train headed for Canada.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Oliver Brown, the youngest of John Brown's sons to reach adulthood, had been shot dead at the age of 20 while serving as a sentinel at the river bridge.

His and 9 other corpses left by the Provisional Army were "subjected to every indignity that a wild and madly excited people could heap upon them." A horrified reporter could only rationalize: "It may be thought that there was cruelty and barbarity in this; but the public mind had been frenzied by the outrages of these men, who, being outlaws, were regarded as food for carrion birds, and not as human creatures." The corpses the Provisional Army needed burial but Harpers Ferry residents refused to allow their cemetery to be used for these who had sought to create servile insurrection. Two men, hired for $5 from the public purse to dispose of the corpses, heaved the bodies into the bed of a common wagon –witnesses recalled the welter of sprawling limbs– and carted them over the bridge to the opposite bank of the Shenandoah River, where a burial site was selected on the bank half a mile above the town. Without any ceremony the corpses were dumped into a shallow common pit.

By a week after the execution of John Brown, our nation would be teetering on the edge of civil war. The disruption, however, was not directly related to John Brown's raid upon the federal arsenal at Harpers Ferry, but had to do instead with Helperism and its attitude of antislavery racism. The struggle was over the Speakership in the new US House of Representatives. Neither of the primary parties had the requisite 119 votes to win this position, and so a decision would be reachable only after there had been some considerable defection on one side or the other, from party discipline. The Republicans had proposed Representative John Sherman for this important position, and the Democrats were countering that no one who had endorsed Helperism, a concoction of recommended murder and treason, could possibly be considered for such a vital and influential role. If Representative Sherman got the job, the Southern states would be forced to withdraw their representatives from the halls of the US federal government. In endorsing Hinton Rowan Helper's book during the spring of this year, the South's attitude was, Sherman had endorsed treason and murder.

By the 2d day of the debate over the speakership, a linkage was being suggested between Helper's ideas and John Brown's actions. The illegality of the actions was coming to be considered to have been a direct expression of this strange belief system, according to which there was a "higher law" to which humans owed their primary obedience. The idea that there was a law higher than human law was considered an utterly presumptuous and iniquitous doctrine.

October 16. Sunday. P.M.– Paddle to Puffer's and thence walk to Ledum Swamp and Conant's Wood. A cold, clear, Novemberish day. The wind goes down and we do not sail. The button-bushes are just bare, and the black willows partly so, and the mikania all fairly gray now. I see the button-bush balls reflected on each side, and each wool-grass head and recurved withered sedge or rush is also doubled by the reflection. The Scirpus lacustris is generally brown, the Juncus militaris greener. It is rather too cool to sit still in the boat unless in a sunny and sheltered place. I have not been on the river for some time, and it is the more novel to me this cool day.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

When I get to Willow Bay I see the new musquash-houses erected, conspicuous on the now nearly leafless shores. To me this is an important and suggestive sight, as, perchance, in some countries new haystacks in the yards; as to the Esquimaux the erection of winter houses. I remember this phenomenon annually for thirty years. A more constant phenomenon here than the new haystacks in the yard, for they were erected here probably before man dwelt here and may still be erected here when man has departed. For thirty years I have annually observed, about this time or earlier, the freshly erected winter lodges of the musquash along the riverside, reminding us that, if we have no gypsies, we have a more indigenous race of furry, quadrupedal men maintaining their ground in our midst still. This may not be an annual phenomenon to you. It may not be in the Greenwich almanac or ephemeris, but it has an important place in my Kalendar. So surely as the sun appears to be in Libra or Scorpio, I see the conical winter lodges of the musquash rising above the withered pontederia and flags. There will be some reference to it, by way of parable or otherwise, in my New Testament. Surely, it is a defect in our Bible that it is not truly ours, but a Hebrew Bible. The most pertinent illustrations for us are to be drawn, not from Egypt or Babylonia, but from New England.

Talk about learning our letters and being literate! Why, the roots of letters are things. Natural objects and phenomena are the original symbols or types which express our thoughts and feelings, and yet American scholars, having little or no root in the soil, commonly strive with all their might to confine themselves to the imported symbols alone. All the true growth and experience, the living speech, they would fain reject as "Americanisms." It is the old error, which the church, the state, the school ever commit, choosing darkness rather than light, holding fast to the old and to tradition. A more intimate knowledge, a deeper experience, will surely originate a word. When I really know that our river pursues a serpentine course to the Merrimack, shall I continue to describe it by referring to some other river no older than itself which is like it, and call it a meander? It is no more meandering than the Meander is musketaquidding. As well sing of the nightingale here as the Meander. What if there were a tariff on words, on language, for the encouragement of home manufactures? Have we not the genius to coin our own? Let the schoolmaster distinguish the true from the counterfeit.

They go on publishing the "chronological cycles" and "movable festivals of the Church" and the like from mere habit, but how insignificant are these compared with the annual phenomena of your life, which fall within your experience! The signs of the zodiac are not nearly of that significance to me that the sight of a dead sucker in the spring is. That is the occasion for an immoveable festival in my church. Another kind of Lent then begins in my thoughts than you wot of. I am satisfied then to live on fish alone for a season.

Men attach a false importance to celestial phenomena as compared with terrestrial, as if it were more respectable and elevating to watch your neighbors than to mind your own affairs. The nodes of the stars are not the knots we have to untie. The phenomena of our year are one thing, those of the almanac another. For October, for instance, instead of making the sun enter the sign of the scorpion, I would much sooner make him enter a musquash-house. Astronomy is a fashionable study, patronized by princes, but not fungi. "Royal Astronomer." The snapping turtle, too, must find a place among the constellations, though it may have to supplant some doubtful characters already there. If there is no place for him overhead, he can serve us bravely underneath,

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

supporting the earth.

This clear, cold, Novemberish light is inspiring. Some twigs which are bare and weeds begin to glitter with hoary light. The very edge or outline of a tawny or russet hill has this hoary light on it. Your thoughts sparkle like the water surface and the downy twigs. From the shore you look back at the silver-plated river.

Every rain exposes new arrowheads. We stop at Clamshell and dabble for a moment in the relics of a departed race.

Where we landed in front of Puffer's, found a jug which the haymakers had left in the bushes. Hid our boat there in a clump of willows, and though the ends stuck out, being a pale green and whitish, they were not visible or distinguishable at a little distance.

Passed through the sandy potato-field at Witherell's cellar-hole. Potatoes not dug; looking late and neglected now; the very vines almost vanished on some sandier hills.

When we emerged from the pleasant footpath through the birches into Witherell Glade, looking along it toward the westering sun, the glittering white tufts of the Andropogon scoparius, lit up by the sun, were affectingly fair and cheering to behold. It was already a cheerful Novemberish scene. A narrow glade stretching east and west between a dense birch wood, now half bare, and a ruddy oak wood on the upper side, a ground covered with tawny stubble and fine withered grass and cistuses. Looking westward along it, your eye fell on these lit tufts of andropogon [Vide Nov. 8th.], their glowing half raised a foot or more above the ground, a lighter and more brilliant whiteness than the downiest cloud presents (though seen on one side they are grayish) [Vide (by chance) same date, or October 16th, 1858].

Even the lespedezas stand like frost-covered wands, and now hoary goldenrods and some bright-red blackberry vines amid the tawny grass are in harmony with the rest; and if you sharpen and rightly intend your eye you see the gleaming lines of gossamer (stretching from stubble to stubble over the whole surface) which you are breaking. How cheerful these cold but bright white waving tufts! They reflect all the sun's light without a particle of his heat, or yellow rays. A thousand such tufts now catch up the sun and send to us its light but not heat. His heat is being steadily withdrawn from us. Light without heat is getting to be the prevailing phenomenon of the day now. We economize all the warmth we get now.

The frost of the 11th, which stiffened the ground, made new havoc with vegetation, as I perceive. Many plants have ceased to bloom, no doubt. Many Diplopappus linariifolius are gone to seed, and yellowish globes. Such are the stages in the year's decline. The flowers are at the mercy of the frosts. Places where ercethites grows, more or less bare, in sprout-lands, look quite black and white (black withered leaves and white down) and wintry.

At Ledum Swamp, feeling to find the Vaccinium Oxycoccus berries, I am struck with the coldness of the wet sphagnum, as if I put my hands into a moss in Labrador, – a sort of winter lingering the summer through there. To my surprise, now at 3.30 P.M., some of the sphagnum in the shade is still stiff with frost, and when I break it I see the glistening spiculae. This is the most startling evidence of winter as yet. For only on the morning of the 11th was there any stiffening of the ground elsewhere. Also in the high sedgy sprout-land south of this swamp, I see hoary or frost-like patches of sedge amid the rest, where all is dry; as if in such places (the lowest) the frost had completely bleached the grass so that it now looks like frost. I think that that is the case.

It is remarkable how, when a wood has been cut (perhaps where the soil was light) and frosts for a long while prevent a new wood from springing up there, that fine sedge (Carex Pennsylvanica?) will densely cover the ground amid the stumps and dead sprouts. It is the most hardy and native of grasses there. This is the grass of the sprout-lands and woods. It wants only the sun and a reasonably dry soil. Then there are the grasses and sedges of the meadows, but the cultivated fields and the pastures are commonly clothed with introduced grasses. The nesaea is all withered, also the woodwardia The ledum and Andromeda Polifolia leaves have fallen. The Kalmia glauca is still falling. The spruce, also, has fallen.

The ledum smells like a bee, – that peculiar scent they have. C., too, perceives it.

See a hairy woodpecker on a burnt pitch pine. He distinctly rests on his tail constantly. With what vigor he taps and bores the bark, making it fly far and wide, and then darts off with a sharp whistle!

I remark how still it is to-day, really Sabbath-like. This day, at least, we do not hear the rattle of cars nor the whistle. I cannot realize that the country was often as still as this twenty years ago.

Returning, the river is perfectly still and smooth. The broad, shallow water on each side, bathing the withered grass, looks as if it were ready to put on its veil of ice at any moment. It seems positively to invite the access of frost. I seem to hear already the creaking, shivering sound of ice there, broken by the undulations my boat makes. So near are we to winter. Then, nearer home, I hear two or three song sparrows on the button-bushes sing as in spring, – that memorable tinkle, – as if it would be last as it was first.

The few blackish leaves of pontederia rising above the water now resemble ducks at a distance, and so help to conceal them now that they are returning.

The weeds are dressed in their frost jackets, naked down to their close-fitting downy or flannel shirts. Like athletes they challenge the winter, these bare twigs. This cold refines and condenses us. Our spirits are strong, like that pint of cider in the middle of a frozen barrel.

The cool, placid, silver-plated waters at even coolly await the frost. The musquash is steadily adding to his winter lodge. There is no need of supposing a peculiar instinct telling him how high to build his cabin. He has had a longer experience in this river-valley than we. Evergreens, I should say, fall early, both the coniferous and the broad-leaved.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

That election-cake fungus which is still growing (as for some months) appears to be a Boletus.

I love to get out of cultivated fields where I walk on an imported sod, on English grass, and walk in the fine sedge of woodland hollows, on an American sward. In the former case my thoughts are heavy and lumpish, as if I fed on turnips. In the other I nibble groundnuts.

Your hands begin to be cool, rowing, now. At many a place in sprout-lands, where the sedge is peculiarly flat and white or hoary, I put down my hand to feel if there is frost on it. It must be the trace of frost. Since the frost of the 11th, the grass and stubble has received another coat of tawny.

That andropogon bright feathery top may be put with the clematis seed and tail. Only this cold, clear sky can light them up thus.

The farmer begins to calculate how much longer he can safely leave his potatoes out.

Each ball of the button-bush reflected in the silvery water by the riverside appears to me as distinct and important as a star in the heavens viewed through "optic glass." This, too, deserves its Kepler and Galileo.

As nature generally, on the advent of frost, puts on a russet and tawny dress, so is not man clad more in harmony with nature in the fall in a tawny suit or the different hues of Vermont gray? I would fain see him glitter like a sweet-fern twig between me and the sun.

A few green yellow lily pads lie on the surface waiting to be frozen in. All the Lycopodium complanatum I see to-day has shed its pollen.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

October 22, Saturday: Ludwig (Louis) Spohr died after a short illness, in Kassel, at the age of 75.

After Moroccans attacked unfinished fortifications at Ceuta in August, Spain declared war on Morocco.

The breakaway city of Buenos Aires was defeated by Argentinian troops and forced to rejoin the nation.

The Lunatic Asylum West of the Alleghany Mountains opened for patients in Weston, Virginia. This facility would wind up in West Virginia due to the Civil War and be renamed the West Virginia Hospital for the Insane. It would later be known as Weston State Hospital and then as Weston Hospital.⁴⁶²

PSYCHOLOGY

The Reverend Samuel Joseph May sailed from England for the United States.

Franklin Benjamin Sanborn wrote from his Canadian hideout to his co-conspirator of the Secret "Six" conspiracy, the Reverend Theodore Parker, in exile in Rome: "Our old friend struck his blow in such a way, —either by his own folly or the direction of Providence,— that it has recoiled, and ruined him, and perhaps those who were his friends.... The poor old man fought like a hero, and will die like one, —by the rope, it is

462. Street, W.R. A CHRONOLOGY OF NOTEWORTHY EVENTS IN AMERICAN PSYCHOLOGY. Washington DC: American Psychological Association, 1994

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

most likely. Two of his sons were shot by his side, and three-fourths of his men. There has been nothing so much in the 'high Roman fashion' seen in this country for many a year. Now he lies in a Virginia jail, tormented with questions, wounded, and waiting his trial for murder and treason.... What course the government will pursue remains to be seen; but most likely they will follow up the matter as closely as possible; and we shall have plenty of treason-trials, and bloody threats, and some bloodshed. All this will weaken the Slave Power; and the good of the tragedy will outweigh the evil, no doubt."

Henry Thoreau developed his thoughts on Captain John Brown, positing a future in which just as the American society was doing away with dueling or fighting one another with pistols, in course of time it might be possible also to do away with fighting one another with lawyers — "Such improvements are not altogether unheard of."

October 22: P.M.—To Cliffs and Fair Haven.

I am surprised to find in the field behind the top of the Cliffs a little vetch still perfectly fresh and blooming, where Wheeler had grain a year or two since, with numerous little plump pods four or five eighths of an inch long and commonly four roundish seeds to each. It must be, I think, Gray's Vicia tetrasperma, though he makes that have white flowers (apparently same as Bigelow's V. pusilla, also made to have white flowers, but Dewey calls them "bluish white"), while these are purple. Otherwise it corresponds.

A marsh hawk sails over Fair Haven Hill. In the wood-path below the Cliffs I see perfectly fresh and fair Viola pedata flowers, as in the spring, though but few together. No flower by its second blooming more perfectly brings back the spring to us.

In my blustering walk over the Mason and Hunt pastures yesterday, I saw much of the withered indigo-weed which was broken off and blowing about, and the seeds in its numerous black pods rattling like the rattlepod though not nearly so loud.

The very surface of the earth itself has been rapidly imbrowned of late, like the acorns in their cups, in consequence of cold and frost; and the evergreens and few deciduous plants which are slow to wither, like Jersey tea, are more and more distinct.

F. hyemalis quite common for a week past.

One would say that the modern Christian was a man who had consented to say all the prayers in their liturgy, provided you would let him go straight to bed and sleep quietly afterward. All his prayers begin with "Now I lay me down to sleep." He has consented to perform certain old-established charities, too, after a fashion, but he doesn't wish to hear of any new-fangled ones; he doesn't want to have any codicils added to the contract, to fit it to the present time,—unexpected demands made on him, after he has said his prayers. He shows the whites of his eyes on the Sabbath and the blacks all the rest of the week.

It was evidently far from being a wild and desperate and insane attempt. It was a well-matured plan.

The very fact that he had no rabble or troop of hirelings about him would alone distinguish him from ordinary heroes. His company was small indeed, because few could be found worthy to pass muster. He would have no rowdy or swaggerer, no profane swearer, for, as he said, he always found these men to fail at last. He would have only men of principle, and they are few. When it was observed that if he had had a chaplain his would have been a perfect Cromwellian company, he said that he would have had a chaplain if he could [HAVE] found one who could perform that service suitably.

Each one who there laid down his life for the poor and oppressed was thus a picked man, culled out of many thousands, if not millions; a man of principle, of rare courage, and of devoted humanity; ready to lay down their lives any moment for the weak and enslaved. It may be doubted if there were any more their equals in all the land, for their leader scoured the land far and wide, seeking to swell his troop. These alone stood forward, prepared to step between the oppressor and the oppressed. Surely they were the very best men you could select to be hung. That was the greatest compliment this country could pay them. They were ripe for the gallows.

I regard this event as a touchstone designed to bring out with glaring distinctness the character of this government.

A man of Spartan habits, who at sixty has scruples about his diet at your table, must eat sparingly and fare hard, as becomes a soldier, he says, and one who is ever fitting himself for difficult enterprises.

A man of rare common sense and directness of speech, as of action; a Transcendentalist above all, a man of ideals and principles,—that was what distinguished him. Of unwavering purposes, not to be dissuaded but by an experience and wisdom greater than his own. Not yielding to a whim or transient impulse, but carrying out the purpose of a life.

He did not go to the college called Harvard; he was not fed on the pap that is there furnished. As he phrased it, "I know no more of grammar than one of your calves." But he went to the great university of the West, where he sedulously pursued the study of Liberty, for which he had early betrayed a fondness, and, having taken many degrees, he finally commenced the practice of Humanity, as you all know.

I see now that it was necessary that the bravest and humanest man in all the country should be hung. Perhaps he saw it himself. If any leniency were shown him, any compromise made with him, any treating with him at all, by the government, he might be suspected.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

We needed to be thus assisted to see our government by the light of history. It needed to see itself. Compare the platform of any or all of the political parties, which deem themselves sane, with the platform on which he lay and uttered these things!!

I foresee the time when the painter will paint that scene, the poet will sing it, the historian record it, and, with the Landing of the Pilgrims and the Declaration of Independence, it will be the ornament of some future national gallery, when the present form of slavery shall be no more. We shall then be at liberty to weep for John Brown. Then and not till then we will take our revenge.

I rejoice that I live in this age, that I was his contemporary.

When I consider the spectacle of himself, and his six sons, and his son-in-law, enlisted for this fight, proceeding coolly, reverently, humanely to work, while almost all America stood ranked on the other side, I say again that it affects me as a sublime spectacle. For months if not years, sleeping and waking upon it, summering and wintering the thought, without expecting any reward but a good conscience and the gratitude of those made free. If he had had any journal advocating "his cause," it would have been fatal to his efficiency,—any "organ," as the phrase is, monotonously and wearisomely playing that same old tune, and then passing round the hat. If he had acted in any way so as to gain the respect or toleration of the government, he might have been suspected. It was the fact that the tyrant must give place to him, or he to the tyrant, that distinguished him from all other reformers that I know.

For once the Sharp's rifle and the revolver were employed in a righteous cause. The tools were in the hands of one who could use them. I know that the mass of my neighbors think that the only righteous use that can be made of them is to fight duels with them when we are insulted by other nations, or hunt Indians, or shoot fugitive slaves with them.

Talk of political parties and their platforms! he could not have any platform but that of the Harper's Ferry engine-house.

I am aware that I anticipate a little,—that he was still, at the last accounts, alive in the hands of his foes; but that being the case, I find myself most naturally thinking and speaking of him as physically dead.

The same indignation that cleared the temple once will clear it again. The question is not about the weapon, but the spirit in which you use it. No man has appeared in America as yet who loved his fellowman so well and treated him so tenderly. He lived for him; he took up his life and he laid it down for him.

Though you may not approve of his methods or his principles, cease to call names, to cry mad dog. The method is nothing; the spirit is all in all. It is the deed, the devotion, the soul of the man. For you this is at present a question of magnanimity. If the schoolboy, forgetting himself, rushed to the rescue of his drowning playmate, what though he knock down somebody on his way, what though he does not go to the same church with you, or his father belong to the same political party! Would you not like to claim kindred with him in this, though in no other thing he is like, or likely, to you?

Heroes have fought well on their stumps when their legs were shot off, but I never heard of any good done by a government that had no heart, or at least had not brains of a high order.

This is not the time to hear what Tom, Dick, or Harry is doing, or in such a case would have done. We shall have time enough to find that out in, if we do not know it already. We ask you to the extent of your ability to appreciate this man and his deed, in spite of the difference between you and him. Who cares whether he belonged to your clique, or party, or sect, or not?

A man does a brave and humane deed, and at once, on all sides, we hear people and parties declaring: "I didn't do it, nor countenance him to do it, in any conceivable way. It can't fairly be inferred from my past career." Now, I am not interested to hear you define your position. I don't know that I ever was, or ever shall be. I am not now, at any rate. I think [IT] is mere egotism, and impertinent.

On the whole my respect for my fellow-men, except as one may outweigh a million, is not being increased these days. I have noticed the cold-blooded way in which newspaper-writers and men generally speak of this event, as if an ordinary malefactor, though one of unusual pluck,—as the Governor of Virginia says, using the language of the cockpit, "the gamest man he ever saw,"—had been caught and were about to be hung. He was not dreaming of his foes when the Governor thought he looked so brave.

Think of him,—of his rare qualities!—such a man as it takes ages to make, and ages to understand; no mock hero, not the representative of any party. A man such as the sun may never rise upon again in this benighted land, to whose making went the costliest material, the finest adamant, the purest gold; sent to be the redeemer of those in captivity;—and the only use to which you can put him, after mature deliberation, is to hang him at the end of a rope. I need not describe him. He has stood where I now stand; you have all seen him. You who pretend to care for Christ crucified, consider what you are about to do to him who offered himself to be the savior of four millions of men!

I wish to correct the tone and some of the statements of the newspapers respecting the life and character and last action of John Brown. The newspapers seem to ignore, or perhaps they are really ignorant of, the fact that there are at least as many as one or two individuals to a town throughout the North who think much as I do about him and his enterprise. I do not hesitate to assert that they are an important and growing party.

I speak for the slave when I say that I prefer the philanthropy of John Brown to that philanthropy which neither shoots me nor liberates me.

Talk of failure and throwing his life away! he is not dead yet in any sense, and if he were dead he would still live. Were the battles of Black Jack and Ossawatimie and many encounters of less note useless and a failure? I think that it was he more than any other who made Kansas as free as she is, who taught the slaveholder that it was not safe for him to carry his slaves thither. None of the political parties have ever accomplished anything of the sort. It was he who taught Missouri that it was not profitable to hold slaves in that neighborhood. Was it a failure to deliver from bondage thirteen human beings and walk off with them by broad daylight, for weeks if not months, at a leisurely pace, through one State after another, for half the length of the North, conspicuous to all parties, with a price set upon his head, going into a court-room on his way and telling what he had done? To face singly in his work of righteousness the whole power of this unrighteous government, and successfully too! Who has gained the most ground within five years,—Brown or the Slave Power?

HANGING

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

And this, not because the government was lenient, but because none of its menials dared to touch him. They counted the cost and concluded that a thousand dollars was not enough.

There are a few—there are more than you suppose—who cannot help thinking of that man now in the clutches of the enraged slaveholder.

He is one of that class of whom we hear a great deal, but, for the most part, see nothing at all,—the Puritans. It is in vain to kill him. He died lately in the time of Cromwell, but he reappeared here. Why should he not? Some of the Puritan stock are said to have come over and settled in New England. They were a class that did something else than celebrate their forefathers' day and eat parched corn in remembrance of their ancestors. They were neither Democrats nor Republicans. They were men of simple habits, straightforward, prayerful; not thinking much of rulers who did not fear God, not making many compromises, or seeking after available candidates.

He is of the same age with the century. He is what is called a thin and wiry-looking man, being composed of nerves instead of flesh, some five feet nine or ten inches high, with a sharp eye, and the last time he was hereabouts wore a long white beard; with a very soldier-like bearing.

I understand his grandfather was an officer in the Revolution; that he himself was born in Connecticut, but early went to Ohio with his father. His father was a contractor who furnished beef to the army there in the last war, and young Brown, accompanying his father to the camp and assisting him in his employment, saw considerable of military life,—more perhaps than he would if he had been a soldier, for he was sometimes present at the councils of the officers. He saw enough, at any rate, to disgust him with war and excite in him a great abhorrence of it; so much so that, though he was offered some petty office in the army, he not only refused it, but also refused to train when he was warned, and was fined for it. He was then about eighteen. He said that few persons had any conception of the cost, even the pecuniary cost, of firing a single bullet in war. Above all, he learned by experience how armies were collected, supplied, and maintained in the field for a length of time,—a work which required at least as much experience and skill as to lead them in battle. And he then resolved that he would never have anything to do with war, unless it were a war for liberty. I should say that he was an old-fashioned man in his respect for the Constitution and the Declaration of Independence, and his faith in the permanence of this Union. Slavery he saw to be wholly opposed to all of these, and he was its determined foe.

When the troubles first broke out in Kansas, he sent several of his sons thither to strengthen the party of the Free State men, fitting them out with such weapons as he had, telling them if the troubles should increase, and there should be need of him, he should follow, to assist them with his hand and counsel. It was not long before he felt it to be his duty to give the Free State men of Kansas, who had no leader of experience, the benefit of what experience he had had.

At a time when scarcely a man from the Free States was able to reach Kansas by any direct route, at least without having his arms taken from him, he, carrying what imperfect firelocks and other weapons he could collect, openly drove an ox-cart through Missouri, with his surveyor's compass exposed in it, and, passing for a simple surveyor, who by his very profession must be neutral, he met with no resistance and in the course of his leisurely journey became thoroughly acquainted with the plans of the Border Ruffians. For some time after his arrival he pursued, before he was known, similar tactics. When, for instance, he saw a knot of the Ruffians on the prairie, discussing, of course, the single topic that then occupied their minds, he would take his compass and one of his sons, and perhaps proceed to run an imaginary line which passed through the very spot on which that conclave had assembled, and then of course he would have some talk with them, learn their news and their plans, and when he had heard all they had to impart, he would resume his surveying, and run on his line till he was out of sight. This is enough to show that his plans were not crazily laid.

For a good part of his life he was a surveyor, part of the time, I think, in Illinois. At one time he was engaged in wool-growing, and went to Europe once as the agent of some wool-growers; and there too he carried his common sense with him. I have been told, for instance, that he made such a remark as this,—that he saw why the soil of England was so rich and that of Germany (or a part of it at least) so exhausted, and he thought of writing to some of the crowned heads about it. It was because in England the peasantry lived on the soil which they cultivated, while in Germany they were gathered into villages at night. It would be worth the while to have collected all the remarks of such a traveller.

Of course, he is not so foolish as to ask or expect any favors from the government, nor probably will his friends for him.

No wonder it struck the politicians and preachers generally very forcibly that either he was insane or they, and they, being the painters, or judges, this time, decided, naturally enough, that it must be he. Such, however, as far as I learn, has not been nor is likely to be the decision of those who have recently stood face to face to him and who are now about to hang him. They have not condescended to such insult. The slaveholders and the slaves who have really dealt with him are not likely sincerely to question his sanity, but rather political or religious parties, who stand further off from a living man.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

I almost fear to hear of his deliverance, doubting if a prolonged life, if any life, can do as much good as his death. No doubt many of you have seen the little manuscript book which he carried about him, during the Kansas troubles,—his “orderly book,” as I think he called it,—containing the names of his small company, a score at most, and half of them his own family, and the rules which bound them together,—a contract which many of them have sealed with their blood. There was one rule, as I remember, which prohibited prophane swearing in his camp. I believe that he never was able to find more than a score or so of recruits whom he would accept, and only ten or a dozen in whom he had perfect faith.

Perhaps anxious politicians may prove that only seventeen white men and five negroes were concerned in this enterprise, but the anxiety to prove this might suggest to themselves that all is not told. Why do they still dodge the truth? Do they not realize why they are so anxious? It is because of a dim consciousness of the fact, which they do not distinctly face, that at least five millions of the inhabitants of the United States who were not pining to attempt, would have rejoiced if it had succeeded. They at most only criticise the tactics.

He said that if any man offered himself to be a soldier under him who was forward to tell what he could or would do if he could only get sight of the enemy, he had but little confidence in him.

One writer says, I know not with what motive, that it is a fact “illustrative of Brown’s insanity, that he has charts of nearly all the great battle-fields of Europe.” I fear that his collection is not to be compared for completeness with that which this government possesses, however his sanity may be compared with its, though it did not make them itself, but there are two or three fields in Kansas of which he did not need to make any chart.

At any rate, I do not think it is sane to spend one’s whole life talking or writing about this matter, and I have not done so. A man may have other affairs to attend to.

The murderer always knows that he is justly punished; but when a government takes the life of a man without the consent of his conscience, it is an audacious government, and is taking a step toward its own dissolution. Is it not possible that an individual may be right and a government wrong? Are laws to be enforced simply because they were made, and declared by any number of men to be good, when they are not good? Is there any necessity for a man’s being a tool to perform a deed of which he disapproves? Is it the intention of lawmakers that good men shall be hung ever? Are judges to interpret the law according to the letter, and not the spirit? Who is it whose safety requires that Captain Brown be hung? Is it indispensable to any Northern man? If you do not wish it, say so distinctly. What right have you to enter into a compact with yourself (even) that you will do thus or so, against your better nature? Is it for you to make up your mind,—to form any resolution whatever,—and not accept the convictions that are forced upon you, and which even pass your understanding?

Any man knows when he is justified, and not all the wits in the world can enlighten him on that point.

I do not believe in lawyers,—in that mode of defending or attacking a man,—because you descend to meet the judge on his own ground, and, in cases of the highest importance, it is of no consequence whether a man breaks a human law or not. Let lawyers decide trivial cases. If they were interpreters of the everlasting laws which rightfully bind man, that would be another thing.

Just as we are doing away with duelling or fighting one another with pistols. I think that we may in course of time do away with fighting one another with lawyers. Such improvements are not altogether unheard of. A counterfeiting law-factory, standing half in a slave land and half in a free! What kind of laws for freemen can you expect from that? Substantial justice!! There’s nothing substantial about it, but the Judge’s salary and the lawyer’s fee.

The thought of that man’s position and probable fate is spoiling many a man’s day here at the North for other thinking. We do not think of buying any crape this time.

It seems that one of his abettors had lived there for years, and Brown took all his measures deliberately. The country was mountainous, and it was given out that they were concerned in mining operations, and to play this part required very little invention on his part, such had been his previous pursuits and habits. Having been a surveyor, he would not make a strange figure in the fields and woods; this, too, would account [FOR] quantities of spades and pickaxes, and strangers from time to time visiting and conferring with him in a somewhat mysterious manner.

I have no respect for the judgment of any man who can read the report of that conversation and still call the principal insane. It has the ring of a saner sanity than an ordinary discipline and habits of life, than an ordinary organization, secures. Take any sentence of it,—“Any questions that I can honorably answer, I will; not otherwise. So far as I am myself concerned, I have told everything truthfully. I value my word, sir.”

He never overstated anything, but spoke within bounds. I remember particularly how, in his speech here, he referred to what his family had suffered in Kansas, never giving the least vent to his pent-up fire. It was a volcano with an ordinary chimney-flue. Also, referring to the deeds of certain Border Ruffians, he said, rapidly paring away his speech, like an experienced soldier keeping a reserve of force and meaning, “They had a perfect right to be hung.”

I would fain do my best to correct, etc., little as I know of him.

But I believe, without having any outward evidence, that many have already silently retracted their words.

They (Allen and Stark) may have possessed some of his love of liberty, indignation, and courage to face their country’s foes, but they had not the rare qualities—the peculiar courage and self-reliance—which could enable them to face their country itself, and all mankind, in behalf of the oppressed.

He could give you information on various subjects, for he had travelled widely and observed closely. He said that the Indians with whom he dealt in Kansas were perhaps the richest people in a pecuniary sense on the earth. The money that this government annually paid them gave so much to each member of the community. They were, moreover, more intelligent than the mass of the Border Ruffians, or that class of the inhabitants of Missouri.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Much of the time of late years he has had to skulk in the swamps of Kansas with a price set upon his head, suffering from sickness and poverty and exposure, befriended only by Indians and [A] few white men. When surprise was expressed that he was not taken, he accounted for it by saying that it was perfectly well understood that he would not be taken alive. He would even show himself openly in towns which were half composed of Border Ruffians, and transact some business, without delaying long, and yet nobody attempted to arrest [HIM], because, as he said, a small party did not like to undertake it, and a large one could not be got together in season. I thought the same of his speech which I heard some years ago,—that he was not in the least a rhetorician, was not talking to Buncombe or his constituents anywhere, who had no need to invent anything, but to tell the simple truth and communicate his resolution. Therefore he appeared incomparably strong, and eloquence in Congress or elsewhere was at a discount. It was like the speeches of Cromwell compared with those of an ordinary king. They have tried a long time; they have hung a good many, but never found the right one before.

Dispersing the sentiments of humanity! As if they were ever found unaccompanied by its deeds! as if you could disperse them as easily as water with a watering-pot and they were good only to lay the dust with!

A few ministers are doing their duty in New York. This use of the word “insane” has got to be a mere trope. Newspaper-editors talk as if it were impossible that a man could be “divinely appointed” in these days to do any work whatever, as if vows and religion were out of date as connected with any man’s daily work, and as if a man’s death were a failure and his continued life, be it of whatever character, were a success. They argue that it is a proof of his insanity that he thought he was appointed to do this work which he did,—that he did not suspect himself for a moment!

If they do not mean this, then they do not speak the truth and say what they mean. They are simply at their old tricks still.

He said truly that the reason why such greatly superior numbers quailed before him with a handful of men only was, as some of his prisoners stated, that the former lacked a cause,—a kind of armor which he and his party never lacked. He said that when the time arrived, few men were found willing to lay down their lives in defense of what they knew to be wrong. They did not like that this should be their last act in this world.

As if the agent to abolish slavery could only be somebody “appointed” by the President or some political party. All this—his insanity (monomania, says one), etc.—made him to be “dreaded by the Missourians as a supernatural being.” Sure enough, a hero in the midst of us cowards is always so dreaded. He is just that thing. He shows himself superior to nature. He has a spark of divinity in him.

“Unless above himself he can Erect himself, how poor a thing is man!”

I have read all the newspapers I could get within a week, and I do not remember in them a single expression of sympathy for these men.

Most of them decided not to print the full report of Brown’s words in the armory “to the exclusion of other matter.” Why, they have matterated, and there is no safety for them but in excluding the dead part and giving place to the living and healthy. But I object not so much to what they have not done as to what they have done. He was by descent and birth a New England farmer, a man of great common sense, deliberate and practical as that class, and tenfold more so. He was like the best of those who stood at our bridge once, on Lexington Common, and on Bunker Hill, only he was firmer and higher-principled than any that I chance to have heard of as there. It was no Abolition lecturer that converted him.

A Western paper says, to account for his escape from so many perils, that he was concealed under a “rural exterior,” as if in that prairie land a hero should by good rights wear a citizen’s dress only. It would appear from published letters that the women of the land are where the men should be. What sort of violence is that which is encouraged not by soldiers but by citizens, not so much by laymen as by ministers of the Gospel, not so much by the fighting sects as by Quakers, and not so much by Quaker men as Quaker women? The enemy may well “quake” at the thought of it. Is not that a righteous war where the best are thus opposed to the worst?

Governor Wise speaks far more justly and admiringly of him than any Northern editor that I have heard of. “They are themselves mistaken who take him to be a madman. . . . He is cool, collected, and indomitable, and it is but just to him to say that he was humane to his prisoners. . . . And he inspired me with great trust in his integrity as a man of truth. He is a fanatic, vain and garrulous (!), but firm, truthful, and intelligent. His men, too, who survive, are like him. . . . Colonel Washington says that he was the coolest and firmest man he ever saw in defying danger and death. With one son dead by his side, and another shot through, he felt the pulse of his dying son with one hand, and held his rifle with the other, and commanded his men with the utmost composure, encouraging them to be firm, and to sell their lives as dear as they could. Of the three white prisoners, Brown, Stevens, and Coppoc, it was hard to say which was the most firm.” There is another man with whom the South and a good part of the North heartily sympathize. His name is Walker.

I subscribed a trifle when he was here three years ago, I had so much confidence in the man,—that he would do right,—but it would seem that he had not confidence enough in me, nor in anybody else that I know, to communicate his plans to us.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

I do not wish to kill or to be killed, but I can foresee circumstances in which both of these things would be by me unavoidable. In extremities I could even be killed.

This event advertises me that there is such a fact as death,—the possibility of a man's dying. It seems as if no man had ever died in America; for in order to die you must first have lived. I don't believe in the hearses and palls and funerals that they have had. There was no death in the case, because there had been no life; they merely rotted or sloughed off, pretty much as they had rotted or sloughed along. No temple's veil was rent, only a hole dug somewhere. The best of them fairly ran down like a clock. I hear a good many pretend that they are going to die; or that they have died, for aught I know. Nonsense! I'll defy them to do it. They haven't got life enough in them. They deliquesce like fungi, and keep a hundred eulogists mopping the spot where they left off. Only half a dozen or so have died since the world began. Memento mori! they don't understand that sublime sentence which some worthy got sculptured on his gravestone once. They've understood it in a grovelling and snivelling sense. They've wholly forgotten how to die. Be sure you die. Finish your work. Know when to leave off. Men make a needless ado about taking lives,—capital punishment. Where is there any life to take? You don't know what it means to let the dead bury the dead.

Beauty stands veiled the while, and music is a screeching lie.

These men, in teaching us how to die, have at the same time taught us how to live. If this man's acts and words do not create a revival, it will be the severest possible satire on the acts and words of those who are said to have effected such things.

Do you ever think you have died, or are going to die, sir? No! there is no hope of you, sir. You haven't got your lesson yet. You've got to stay after school.

It is the best news that America has ever heard.

Franklin,—Washington,—they were let off without dying; these were merely missing one day.

It has already quickened the public pulse of the North; it has infused more, and more generous, blood into her veins and heart than any number of years of what is called commercial and political prosperity could. How many a man who was lately contemplating suicide has now something to live for!

Mr. Giddings says of them that "their sad fate will occupy a brief page in the history of our nation." Does he think that the history of the Republican Party—hitherto, for it may be re-created by his death—will be in the proportion of a sentence to that page?

When I reflect to what a cause this man devoted himself, and how religiously, and then reflect to what cause his judges and all who condemn him so angrily and fluently devote themselves, I see that they are as far apart as the heavens and earth are asunder. The amount of it is our "leading men" are a harmless kind of folk, and they know well enough that they were not divinely appointed, but elected by the votes of their party.

The most sensible of the apparently editorial articles on this event that I have met with is in the Wheeling Intelligence. Vide Supplement to Journal, October 29th.

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

October 30, Sunday: Franz Liszt was admitted to the Austrian nobility as “Franz, Ritter von Liszt.” On the same day, in Weimar, his setting of the 137th Psalm for alto, violin, and keyboard was performed for the initial time.

The trial of John Brown concluded, with a finding of guilt. The separate trials of the others indicted, John Anderson Copeland, Jr., Edwin Coppoc, Shields Green, and Aaron D. Stevens, would begin, and would come to their conclusions, shortly.

Green

Copeland

Haslitt

Henry Thoreau notified Concord town officials that he would speak that evening on “The character of John Brown, now in the clutches of the slaveholder.”

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

KILLED OR WOUNDED BY THE INSURGENTS AT HARPERS FERRY

Heywood Shepherd	black railroad porter	Killed
Fontaine Beckham	white railroad agent and mayor of Harpers Ferry	Killed
G.W. Turner	white resident of Jefferson County VA	Killed
Thomas Boerly	white resident of Harpers Ferry	Killed
Quinn	white U. S. Marine private	Killed
Rupert	white U. S. Marine private	Wounded
Murphy	white resident in vicinity of Harpers Ferry	Wounded
Young	white resident in vicinity of Harpers Ferry	Wounded
Richardson	white resident in vicinity of Harpers Ferry	Wounded
Hammond	white resident in vicinity of Harpers Ferry	Wounded
McCabe	white resident in vicinity of Harpers Ferry	Wounded
Dorsey	white resident in vicinity of Harpers Ferry	Wounded
Hooper	white resident in vicinity of Harpers Ferry	Wounded
Woollet	white resident in vicinity of Harpers Ferry	Wounded

That evening, Thoreau delivered “A PLEA FOR CAPTAIN JOHN BROWN” in the vestry of the First Parish Meetinghouse in Concord. Emerson was present, and would report to Charles Wesley Slack in Boston that “He read it with great force & effect, & though the audience was of widely different parties, it was heard without a murmur of dissent.” In regard to Thoreau’s impassioned oration, this is what I have to offer. Take it for granite, Thoreau always knows what he is saying. Speaking not only of John Brown’s sharp tongue but also of his carbine bought and paid for, one of the things Henry said on the evening of October 30, 1859 was

The tools were in the hands of one who could use them.

This is now on page 133 of REFORM PAPERS. But what I need to get you to understand is that it means

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

exactly what it means, not what you maybe thought it would mean were it you who had said it. The thing I need you to notice is that Thoreau's remark is an implicit reference to Miguel de Cervantes's

En manos eftâ el pandero que le fabra bien tañer, refpondio Sancho Pança.

This is an aphorism from Part II, Chapter 22 of EL INGENIOSO HIDALGO DON QUIJOTE DE LA MANCHA. In current Spanish: En manos está el pandero que le sabrán bien tañer, or “In hands is the drum that it they know well to beat” or, rather, “The drum is in the hands of one who well knows how to thump it.” Thus Thoreau's remark about the rat-a-tat-tat of Brown's sharp tongue and Christian carbine is also an implicit reference to the most-quoted passage in WALDEN by far, the passage in which an obscure metaphor is drawn apparently on the basis of the drummer-boy rat-a-tat-tatting away on Concord common during the annual militia training!

What is happening in that passage of Cervantes's book is that Sancho Panza was lowering Don Quijote into the Montecinos cave by a rope. And he was using this old Spanish proverb to say don't worry, I know how to handle this rope, I won't let you fall. He was practicality incarnate, all means and no end, while Don Quijote was impracticality ensouled, on his way to make his central attempt to define the relationship between reality and illusion, all end and no means.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

We may well ask ourselves in what way a reference to Don Quijote might be seen as appropriate in this context of Thoreau's defense of Brown. I can think of several right off.

1st, many scholars would insist to us that a study of the work of Cervantes is central to any consideration of the manner in which our representations of the world can, and cannot, modify the contexts in which our lives are embedded. That Sharps rifle was supposed to be the lever by which Brown was rearranging reality, but in actuality in that world of men at arms such a stick was of influence primarily as a symbol, while Brown's primary lever for rearranging the reality of American race relations was –as Thoreau was emphasizing– his sharp tongue. Holding that Sharps rifle in his hand only served to draw attention to that tongue of his, attention that his sharp tongue deserved. We can say Thoreau's problem essentially was, in the case of Brown, that he had decided he could not be satisfied with reality. Refusing to repeat the gestures that custom, tradition, and instinct make so easy, Thoreau was insisting on the coming into being of our myth of equality and fraternity.

After they would take Captain John Brown's Sharps rifle away from him at Harpers Ferry, they would allow this little boy to pose with it. Grow up, son, and be a Christian like us: kill people, own slaves.

2d, Don Quijote was un hombre exageradamente grave y serio o puntilloso, and this is a fine and accurate description not only of Concord's own knight of the woebegone countenance, Bronson Alcott, but also of John Brown. If Alcott could be said to have been a Quijote whose favorite reading was the New Testament, Brown was a Quijote whose favorite reading was the Old. Don Quijote said

These saints and knights were of the same profession as myself, which is the calling of arms. Only there is this difference between them and me, that they were saints, and fought with divine weapons, and I am a sinner and fight with human ones.

3d, there is the problem of the ridiculous mismatch of means and objectives about which Brown commented in his note on the morning of his hanging. Brown wanted a world of justice and peace and dignity so he set about enthusiastically to kill us until we got his idea, which is a fine way to get someone's attention but is inherently self-defeating.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

4th, in associating Brown with Don Quijote, Thoreau was making an implicit reference to the freeing of slaves as a knightly suspension of the ethical — for Don Quijote’s pity, compassion, and love came to outweigh the rigor of justice in that knight’s liberating of the galley slaves, and in the declaration he made to the guards of the slaves, and in his comments to Sancho and the priest. He said

It is not right that honorable men should be executioners of others.

Finally, this “tool” aphorism extracted from the episode in which Don Quijote descended on a rope into the cave of Montecinos is central to the story’s process of sanchificación of the knight’s spirituality and quijotización of the squire’s carnality. By virtue of their shared adventures, the righteously indignant northern white American and the desperately indignant southern white American needed to figure out a way to rid themselves of a society based on shackles: they needed to sanchify and quijotize each other. That’d be preferred to our northern Quijotes and southern Panzas using their efficient tools to kill each other standing in rows, which was otherwise the obvious prospect. When Don Quijote emerged from the cave of Montecinos he said to Sancho Panza

Everything that offers some difficulty seems impossible to you.

But he added

Time will pass.

In this writing I will not only attempt to salvage Thoreau’s talk about Christian carbines and sharp tongues by linking it (via its implicit referent in Cervantes’s rub-a-dub-dub text about the foolishness of desperate acts of chivalry) to its implicit referent in Thoreau’s rat-a-tat-tat text about the foolishness of a life of quiet desperation.

I will also demonstrate that this sound metaphor of Thoreau’s —the distant different drummer— is, itself, an implicit reference to a Quaker non-violent metaphor of the inner light in common usage among members of the Religious Society of Friends, particularly those of the liberal faction including Friend Elias Hicks and his student Friend Lucretia Mott, and that such a metaphor cannot be bent —as it is commonly now bent by the unspirited— to sponsor the path of violence. Thoreau left himself an escape hatch and, in his appeal for sympathy for Captain Brown after that man’s desperate attempt to set free the despairing slaves of America, neither explicitly nor implicitly sanctioned any of John Brown’s violent means. I would maintain that Thoreau’s deportment and his words subsequent to the ill-advised Harpers Ferry raid in 1859 were precisely parallel to Friend Lucretia's deportment and her words after the ill-advised "Christiana Riot" in 1851.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Thoreau said in public, in regard to American slavery, that he did not wish to kill nor to be killed, but could foresee circumstances in which both these things would be by him unavoidable (REFORM PAPERS 133). Playing to his audience, our author elided the vast difference between killing and dying precisely as Richardson elided Charles Baudelaire. It was only in Thoreau's private notes during his lifetime—to his Journal that is, and although as he says there was no lock on the door of his cabin there was in fact a lock on the desk in which he kept his Journal— that he was able to say plainly that when he said “both these things” he meant precisely “both these things,” not one and, if he turned out to be a lucky and competent killer, not the other, that if it came to the sacrificing of others to his own principles, this would necessarily involve his own simultaneous self-sacrifice for his principles, that he meant he might decide to not be alive rather than continue to be alive in a world that also included slavery.⁴⁶³ Now, Søren Aabye Kierkegaard pointed out in a writing

463. There is a phrase “noble army of Martyrs” in the BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER that came into use in 1549 that may explain Thoreau's remark about becoming willing to kill, or to die, to end enslavement. The phrase may have come into the BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER from the TE DEUM, quite a bit older.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

that, although it dates to the same year of 1859, was unavailable to Thoreau,⁴⁶⁴ that

Assuming then that a person is the victim of an illusion, and that in order to communicate the truth to him the first task, rightly understood, is to remove the illusion — if I do not begin by deceiving him, I must begin with direct communication. But direct communication presupposes that the receiver's ability to receive is undisturbed. But here such is not the case; an illusion stands in the way. That is to say, one must first of all use the caustic fluid. But this caustic means is negativity, and negativity understood in relation to the communication of the truth is precisely the same as deception. What then does it mean "to deceive"? It means that one does not begin directly with the matter one wants to communicate, but begins by accepting the other man's illusion as good money.

I am not saying Thoreau was wrong to elide in this way in that place at that time, for he was doing his level best to communicate with a bunch of people who were getting ready to line up and shoot each other down in windrows, and also I was not there and also I have great respect for his judgment, but I am saying that if there was a time for this sort of elision, it is now past. If not then, at least now, we should face the issue squarely. But unfortunately, as I said, the issue is not being faced squarely. For instance, on the night of July 10th in the Center Galleria of Worcester, an actor employed by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, David Barto, sponsored in part by the Massachusetts Department of Environmental Management, re-enacted Thoreau's lecture.

Worcester's Mechanics Hall where the lecture was originally delivered was under restoration, but every effort was made for verisimilitude and Barto was able to lean on the wooden lectern that Thoreau had used on November 3, 1859 at Mechanics Hall. My impression is that Barto makes a Thoreau who is entirely too belligerent, for instance humorously threatening to beat children with his walking stick should they ask questions at the wrong times, humorously inviting one fellow to join him outside for a fight after the talk should he fail to follow Thoreau's rules, etc. Therefore, in the question and answer period, I raised my hand

464. Søren Aabye Kierkegaard. THE POINT OF VIEW FOR MY WORK AS AN AUTHOR. NY: Harper & Row, 1962, pages 25-6.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

and posed the following question to Barto in his rôle as Thoreau:

I have heard you, and am troubled, troubled by what would seem to be a studied ambiguity on an issue of the greatest relevance. Tell me, in the dark of the night when you could not sleep, and you scratched these lines frantically across scraps of paper with your pencil - can you recollect that frame of mind?- what was your intention? If it came to kill or be killed, for those are two very different things, if it came to the taking of the life of another for liberty, or giving your own for liberty -for these are two very different things- if it came to continuing your life but as a murderer- if it came to the point of doing evil so that good will come- what, sir, was your secret intention as you scratched out your draft of this speech? Is it your intention to teach us, by your life, how and when to die or how and when to kill?

In response Barto feigned anger and told me I had no right to inquire as to his private musings. He was unable or unwilling to address the question as posed. Need I mention that this might have got him in trouble with his employer, an agency which also employs a number of armed men in blue and a number of armed men in green, and instructs these armed employees in the fine art of when and how to kill in the name of their employer?

“A PLEA FOR CAPTAIN JOHN BROWN”

This topic of elision is an interesting topic for those of us who find this sort of topic interesting. While Thoreau was delivering his “A PLEA FOR CAPTAIN JOHN BROWN” at the Concord Town Hall, the Reverend Henry Ward Beecher was delivering a sermon in his Plymouth Church in Brooklyn. Later on he would revise this sermon for publication, so we can credit it with some seriousness of preparation, and yet in the sermon he was portraying the raid on Harpers Ferry as having been perpetrated by 17 white men who had gone South without any black sponsorship or involvement and, in their whiteness, had created a race panic: “Seventeen white men surrounded two thousand, and held them in duress.”

A black newspaper would need to comment upon this elision, as of course it had been the noticing of men of mixed race among the members of that invading party which had set off the pronounced race panic: “Mr. Beecher must have read the papers, must have read that there were twenty-two invaders, seventeen white and five black. Why does he omit all mention of the latter? Were they not men?”⁴⁶⁵

We note that in this speech Thoreau made use of the political term of art “Buncombe.”⁴⁶⁶

465. It is very clear from several other things that the Reverend Henry Ward Beecher had written, that had he been forced to respond to this “Were they not men?” rhetorical question, he would easily have responded that indeed they were men — inasmuch as they were all of mixed race rather than being in that “low animal condition” (his category, his words) of pure blackness.

466. Buncombe is a county in western North Carolina; the representative from that district in Congress had a reputation for blathering on the public record and through the newspapers simply because he thought his constituents in Buncombe County would thereby think he was really some hot potato of a Congressman. “Buncombe” came to mean blowing hot air to little purpose beyond self-aggrandizement, an expression that showed up even in Thomas Carlyle’s LATTER DAY PAMPHLETS because Waldo Emerson had deployed this Americanism when he and Carlyle met: “A Parliament speaking through reporters to Buncombe and the twenty-seven millions, mostly fools.”

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

November 8, Tuesday: Alyeksandr Borodin left St. Petersburg to travel abroad as a delegate of the Academy of Physicians and gain experience for the position that had recently been offered to him, of Adjunct-Professor of Chemistry.

In the evening in Boston, Waldo Emerson his lecture “Courage” before a large crowd at the Music Hall in Boston, averring that John Brown was that new saint than whom none purer or more brave was ever led by love of men into conflict and death, -the new saint awaiting his martyrdom, and who, if he shall suffer, will make the gallows glorious like the cross.

(But when he would publish this lecture as an essay, he would reconsider and remove this remark.)

The Springfield, Massachusetts Republican editorialized, punning on the Thoreau family name and its usual pronunciation, that “This Thoreau seems to be a thorough fanatic — why don’t [sic] he imitate Brown and do good by rushing to the gallows?”

Louisa May Alcott wrote to Alfred Whitman that she was “full of admiration for old Brown’s courage and pity for his probable end.” She reported that Concord folks were “boiling over with excitement” because “many of our people (anti-slavery I mean) are concerned in it. We have a daily stampede for papers, and a nightly indignation meeting over the wickedness of our country, and the cowardice of the human race. I’m afraid mother will die of spontaneous combustion if things are not set right soon.”

November 8: A pleasant day.
P. M.—To Nut Meadow and Fair Haven Hill.
I hear a small z-ing cricket.

Coombs says that quite a little flock of pigeons [Passenger Pigeon  Ectopistes migratorius] bred here last summer. He found one nest in a small white pine near his pigeon-stand (where he baited them in the summer), so low he could put his hand in it (!?). I saw, while talking with him, a trout playing about in the open roadside watering-place, on the Jimmy Miles road (i.e. in Nut Meadow Brook), which was apparently fifteen inches long; not lurking under the bank but openly swimming up and down in midstream.

How richly and exuberantly downy are many goldenrod and aster heads now, their seed just on the point of falling or being blown away, before they are in the least weather-beaten! They are now puffed up to their utmost, clean and light. [Vide back, October 16th.]

The tufts of purplish withered andropogon in Witherell Glade are still as fair as ever, soft and trembling and bending from the wind; of a very light mouse-color seen from the side of the sun, and as delicate as the most fragile ornaments of a lady’s bonnet; but looking toward the sun they are a brilliant white, each polished hair (of the pappus?) reflecting the November sun without its heats, not in the least yellowish or brown like the goldenrods and asters.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

December 2, Friday: The spirit of John Brown, allegedly, to Governor Henry A. Wise:

First Hevan Dec 2

Friend Wise

I got here this Morning at 11 1/2 o'clock Set Peter was at the Door. he said welcom John Brown you are the first man that come here from Virginia in 20 years and I am afraid you will Be the last excep Cook and his friends

Youres &ca

John Brown

P.S. Write soon and send your letter By Cook as that will Be the Last canse you ever will get

J.B

The Reverend Henry Highland Garnet announced at a service in New-York's Shiloh Church that henceforward "the Second day of December will be called Martyr's Day."

"There can be no redemption of sin without the shedding of blood."

We may now allow ourselves to notice what for a long time has not been awarded an adequate commentary, that for this commemorative service which coincided with the hanging of John Brown for treason, Henry Thoreau, Waldo Emerson, and the other "speakers" delivered nothing of their own thoughts. (A local lad named Frank Pierce would later have occasion to recall that he had helped his dad move some sort of heavy musical instrument, a piano or organ, into the hall for this occasion: ) The speakers merely took the podium in their turn to read entirely innocuous stuff out of Andrew Marvell, and out of Sir Walter Raleigh, and out of Tacitus. Why were they doing this upon such an occasion? It must have been like drinking Polynesian Double Mai-Tais at a wake. Well, one reason might have been that enflamed Concord townspeople were

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

nearby, counting down the minutes as the traitor rode atop his own coffin out to the hanging ground, until the traitor would swing at the stroke of noon — and as he swung, igniting a hanging effigy of the traitor. These local patriots did not want their world turned upside down, but instead, they wanted that all respect and consideration continue to be accorded to worthy people. They were not ready to begin to accord respect and consideration also to unworthy people, such as coloreds, and criminals. Such patriots constituted an obvious and unpredictable, although local and temporary, hazard. We have the testimony of one participant in this classics-reading, however, that something else, a more permanent and extensive threat, was on the minds of the participants and their audience. What if, as a result of this meeting, they were arrested by officials of the federal government and charged with high treason? In a trial, they would need to be able to defend themselves in some manner, and this would enable to defend themselves on the grounds that actually this meeting had been for the simple and straightforward and entirely innocuous purpose of reading of the classic authors. Not a word had they spoken about this traitor Brown who, coincidentally, was being hanged in another state at that hour. Well, does this make you think less of Henry David Thoreau, that such considerations would have been borne in mind under the uncertainties of the moment? How would you yourself have conducted yourself in the face of such uncertainties? You will please to note that there was all the difference in the world between defending Brown in public while he was merely an accused citizen before a court-martial panel of military officers,

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

before he had been found to have committed the capital crime of treason, of having attempted by force and violence to overthrow the government of the United States of America, and defending him in public after that finding of guilt. It may well be that, in critical times, with martial law a very real possibility, one who attempts to give aid and comfort to treason is himself a traitor, and may well anticipate being treated as one.

While people have begun hanging people, who can be sure where this spate of hanging is going to stop?

Friday, December 2, 1859, broke clear and summerlike over a nation solemn and awed by the grim business taking place in Virginia. Southerners put up a facade of business-as-usual, but in the free states church bells tolled morning, noon, and night from Cape Cod to Kansas. In Concord, Thoreau argued with the narrow-minded selectmen who refused to endorse the ringing and threatened to fire off the town's minute guns as a countermeasure, but in Albany the council authorized a one-hundred-gun salute in tribute to Brown and in Syracuse the great fire bell in City Hall rang mournfully all through the day.

The above, from page 500 of Mayer's ALL ON FIRE makes it sound as if Thoreau was threatening to fire off Concord's minute-guns because narrow-minded selectmen were refusing permission to knell the 1st Parish bell. No. What Thoreau recorded was that local opponents to the commemoration service threatened that if mourners knelled the 1st Parish bell in honor of John Brown's passing, they would fire off the town's minute-guns in celebration of the traitor's execution.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Upon expecting that the federal captive John Brown had probably been put to death in Charlestown, Virginia, Friend Daniel Ricketson mused on how his sympathy for Brown's determined endeavor related to the qualms he had as to episodically violent manner in which Brown had conducted himself in response to the constant violence that was the institution of slavery:

To-day at 12 M. John Brown was probably executed at Charlestown, Va., for a noble but apparently ineffectual attempt to emancipate slaves. My sympathy for the brave and self-sacrificing old man has been deeply aroused. His sufferings are now probably all over, and his body rests in peace, the bloody requisitions of the law having been satisfied.... Feeling sad at the mournful close of poor John Brown's life, now I trust with his Father and his God beyond the reach of the tyrant slaveholder. Cloudy this afternoon, and all nature affected with a general gloom, as it were at the loss of the brave old philanthropic hero now lying dead and cold in the hands of his enemies and the enemies of humanity.

John Brown cannot die; his body may perish, but that which was the most himself, his noble, self-sacrificing spirit, will survive, and that object to which he so heartily devoted himself and for which he has died, will be hastened to its accomplishment by his cruel and untimely death, untimely so far as the means used to effect it on the part of his tyrannical captors.

The Reverend Samuel Joseph May organized a crowd to gather at the Syracuse NY city hall to do honor to him who had honored in “spirit and letter the great holy doctrine of the Declaration of Independence.”

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

The reverend termed the action “ill-advised,” condemned its violence, and then repeated the sentiment of John Brown’s closing speech at his trial — that had he acted on behalf of the rich and well-born, the government would be glorifying him rather than killing him, and that therefore the true reason why the courts martial panel was condemning him to death had nothing to do with the nature of his actions in and of themselves, and had everything to do with the fact that he had performed these actions on behalf of the humble people of this world.⁴⁶⁷ When the appointed time arrived for the federal government to kill its captive, the minister intoned “The day has come, it is slavery or liberty, compromises are at an end,” and the sexton tolled the bell of the city hall 63 times.

Upon the request of Franklin Benjamin Sanborn, Thoreau borrowed Emerson’s covered wagon and mare and delivered a distressed young man at sunrise past the railroad depot in Concord to the railroad depot next down the line, in South Acton. No questions asked or answered, Thoreau simply did as his friends needed. The young man sat in the back seat and talked continuously, insisted that his driver was Mr. Emerson, and at one point attempted to dismount and walk back to Concord. The “Mr. Lockwood” whom Thoreau escorted was Francis Jackson Meriam, a young manic-depressive with but one good eye, one of the culprits of the Harpers Ferry fiasco, the last-recruited agent of the Secret “Six”, and it is an open question what would have happened to Thoreau, had anyone seen through “Mr. Lockwood’s” assumed identity and had Henry been captured while assisting such an escaping “traitor.”

(Meriam had been in Boston coming from Canada, and finally had been induced by friends to head back toward the vicinity of St. Catharines, Canada; he eventually would settle in Illinois and marry with Minerva Caldwell of Galena, Illinois and obtain a position as a captain in the 3rd South Carolina Colored Infantry. Erratic and unbalanced, he would often urge wild schemes upon his superiors, and sometimes attempt them. In an engagement under General Grant he would be severely wounded in the leg. In 1865 he would die suddenly in New-York.)

Then Thoreau drove back to Concord from South Acton, returned the wagon, and delivered “The Martyrdom of John Brown” at Concord Town Hall. This was the noon of Brown’s hanging and other residents of Concord, 467. Which, of course, was an excellent point, and one which needed to be made.

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

down the street, were hanging Brown in effigy.

While the condemned man was being hanged, the Reverend Adin Ballou stayed at home and wrote an editorial asking “Are Non-Resistants for Murder?” He had not been much impressed with Brown’s reliance upon pikes, or reliance on the readings of the “Beecher’s Bible” (Sharps rifle, ten “verses” per minute).

NON-RESISTANCE

After they would take Captain John Brown’s Sharps rifle away from him at Harpers Ferry, they would allow this little boy to pose with it. Grow up, son, and be a Christian like us: kill people, own slaves.

Down South, just before noon, as Brown was being taken from his cell to sit on his own coffin in a wagon and ride away in the midst of the troops, a guard handed him a slip of paper and a quarter, requesting an autograph.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Brown wrote hurriedly on the slip of paper:⁴⁶⁸

Charlestown, Va. 2^d December, 1852.
 I John Brown am now quite certain that the crimes of this guilty, land; will never be purged away; but with Blood. I had as I now think; vainly flattered myself that without very much bloodshed; it might be done

We may notice in passing that what John Brown was repeating here was the idea of the Reverend Henry Highland Garnet, that Brown had himself caused to be published and distributed. In a speech to a national black convention in 1843, the Reverend Garnet had declared that without the shedding of blood.”

“There can be no redemption of sin

We understand how such a speech, determinedly ignoring (à la Robert D. Richardson, Jr.) the vast difference between shedding one’s own blood in the furtherance of one’s agenda and shedding the blood of another, could fit right into a desperate man’s desperate agenda — for Brown had printed and distributed this speech.

Be sure you grok the logic here:

The logic is not “A black minister said it and therefore we should pay attention.”

The logic is: “They should die for their sins and set us free; therefore by becoming murderers we will set ourselves free.”

Also, on December 2nd, several hundred medical students from Virginia marched through the streets of Philadelphia, with red ribbons on their coats, shouting out how many niggers they owned.

468. He handed the man back his quarter.

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

As John Brown was being led down the corridor in the prison, he kissed the warder John Avis's young son.⁴⁶⁹

Currier & Ives would record this as the kissing of a black baby:

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

469. The warder's family, a white family named Avis, lived at the front of the prison. This, plus the fact that Brown had spoken of how desirable it would be to have black people in attendance during his hanging, evidently led to the disgusting and inflammatory and utterly unfounded and unwarranted report in the popular newspapers, that the child he had kissed was black.

John Brown of Ossawatimie spake on his dying day:
'I will not have to shrive my soul a priest in Slavery's pay;
But let some poor slave-mother whom I have striven to free,
With her children, from the gallows-stair put up a prayer for me!'
John Brown of Ossawatimie, they led him out to die;
And lo! a poor slave-mother with her little child pressed nigh:
Then the bold, blue eye grew tender, and the old harsh face grew mild,
As he stooped between the jeering ranks and kissed the negro's child!
The shadows of his stormy life that moment fell apart,
And they who blamed the bloody hand forgave the loving heart;
That kiss from all its guilty means redeemed the good intent,
And round the grisly fighter's hair the martyr's aureole bent!
Perish with him the folly that seeks through evil good!
Long live the generous purpose unstained with human blood!
Not the raid of midnight terror, but the thought which underlies;
Not the borderer's pride of daring, but the Christian's sacrifice.
Nevermore may yon Blue Ridges the Northern rifle hear,
Nor see the light of blazing homes flash on the negro's spear;
But let the free-winged angel Truth their guarded passes scale,
To teach that right is more than might, and justice more than mail!
So vainly shall Virginia set her battle in array;
In vain her trampling squadrons knead the winter snow with clay!
She may strike the pouncing eagle, but she dares not harm the dove;
And every gate she bars to Hate shall open wide to Love!

— Friend John Greenleaf Whittier

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

It was high noon on 2 Dec 1859 and time for the military ceremony.
If anyone did, John Brown had a perfect right to dance:
After giving the lives of a number of other people for what he believed, he had somewhat belatedly gotten the idea of sacrifice that Angelina Grimké had tried to explain in 1835:

It is my deep, solemn, deliberate conviction that this is a cause worth dying for.... YES! LET IT COME — let us suffer, rather than insurrections should arise.

—and offered his own life rather than somebody else's life for what he believed.
Then the death roll of the drums of Robert E. Lee's marching band, snares loosened, purposefully drowned out John Brown's last words from the high scaffold in the stubble field as the black hood was placed over his head.
(This particular prisoner was not going to address the conscience of the nation from this particular pulpit: no famous last words, if you please sir.)

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

In 1884, Thomas Hovenden would prepare a painting depicting the famous falsehood, what supposedly had taken place at the door of the Charlestown jail while John Brown was being led to his execution, and would do at least as good a job of it as Currier & Ives had done at the time.

At least this Thomas Hovenden, by following the imagination of the Currier & Ives Sketcher, would get the backdrop for his sentimental picture reasonably accurate, for this would be the Charlestown jail as it would appear in the year 1900:

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Assorted companies of horse soldiers went into formation about the wagon as three infantry companies were ordered to hold their regular files. A total of 1,500 troops had been amassed to take up formation in the stubble field around the scaffold. "I had no idea Governor Wise considered my execution so important," John Brown commented as he was seating himself atop his coffin in the wagon drawn by a team of white horses, in loose-fitting clothes, carpet slippers, and a hat. One of the Governor's sons was there to be a voyeur, as was a

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

militiaman from Company F of Richmond, John Wilkes Booth.⁴⁷⁰ Virginia Military Institute cadets were in formation behind the scaffold with the commander they called Stonewall Jackson. It was noon and time for the execution when Brown commented “This is a beautiful country — I never before had the pleasure of seeing

470. John Wilkes Booth would lie to his sister, and then to the general public, alleging that he had rushed to Harpers Ferry to aid in suppressing the raiders. The truth was that he had merely ventured from the Richmond, Virginia stage to Charlestown, as a voyeur.

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

it.”

STATE MURDER

He dropped his hat to the ground as the hood and then the noose were lowered over his head. “I can’t see, gentlemen,” he commented, “you must lead me.” When the sheriff asked him if he would like to have some kind of private signal just before the drop, he responded “It does not matter to me — I only want that everyone should not keep me waiting so long.” Then a hatchet was used to chop through the rope that was holding the

HDT

WHAT?

INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

trap door of the platform shut.

A READY RECKONER FOR HANGMEN.

RULE.—Take the weight of the Client in Stones and look down the column of weights until you reach the figures nearest to 24 cwt., and the figure in the left-hand column will be the Drop. See page 167 of this Handbook.

Distance falling in feet. Zero.	8 Stone	9 Stone	10 Stone	11 Stone	12 Stone	13 Stone	14 Stone	15 Stone	16 Stone	17 Stone	18 Stone	19 Stone
	cwt. qr. lb.	cwt. qr. lb.	cwt. qr. lb.	cwt. qr. lb.	cwt. qr. lb.	cwt. qr. lb.	cwt. qr. lb.	cwt. qr. lb.	cwt. qr. lb.	cwt. qr. lb.	cwt. qr. lb.	cwt. qr. lb.
1 ft.	8 0 0	9 0 0	10 0 0	11 0 0	12 0 0	13 0 0	14 0 0	15 0 0	16 0 0	17 0 0	18 0 0	19 0 0
2 ft.	15 2 15	16 2 15	17 2 15	18 2 15	19 2 15	20 2 15	21 2 15	22 2 15	23 2 15	24 2 15	25 2 15	26 2 15
3 ft.	13 3 16	15 2 15	17 1 14	19 0 12	20 3 11	22 2 9	24 1 8	26 0 7	27 3 5	29 2 4	31 1 2	33 0 1
4 ft.	16 0 0	18 0 0	20 0 0	22 0 0	24 0 0	26 0 0	28 0 0	30 0 0	32 0 0	34 0 0	36 0 0	38 0 0
5 ft.	17 2 11	19 3 5	22 0 0	24 0 22	26 1 16	28 2 11	30 3 5	33 0 0	35 0 22	37 0 16	39 2 11	41 3 5
6 ft.	19 2 11	22 0 5	24 2 0	26 3 22	29 0 16	31 3 11	34 1 5	36 3 0	39 0 22	41 2 16	44 0 11	46 2 5
7 ft.	21 0 22	23 3 11	26 2 0	29 0 16	31 3 5	34 1 22	37 0 11	39 3 0	42 1 16	45 0 5	47 2 22	50 1 11
8 ft.	22 2 22	25 2 4	28 1 14	31 0 23	34 0 5	36 3 15	39 2 25	42 2 7	45 1 16	48 0 26	51 0 8	53 3 18
9 ft.	24 0 11	27 0 12	30 0 14	33 0 23	36 0 16	39 0 18	42 0 19	45 0 21	48 0 22	51 0 23	54 0 25	57 0 26
10 ft.	25 1 5	28 1 23	31 2 14	34 3 4	37 3 22	41 0 12	44 1 2	47 1 21	50 2 11	53 3 1	56 3 19	60 0 9

"Dislocation of the neck is the ideal aimed at ..."
— British Medical Journal, 1817

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

This sad material would even, within this same year, become subject matter for a play by Kate Lucy Edwards, "Ossawatimie Brown, or, The Insurrection at Harpers' Ferry," at the Bowery Theater in New-York:⁴⁷¹ Eventually, certified hairs from Brown's head, or, who knows, from his beard, would be being

OSAWATOMIE

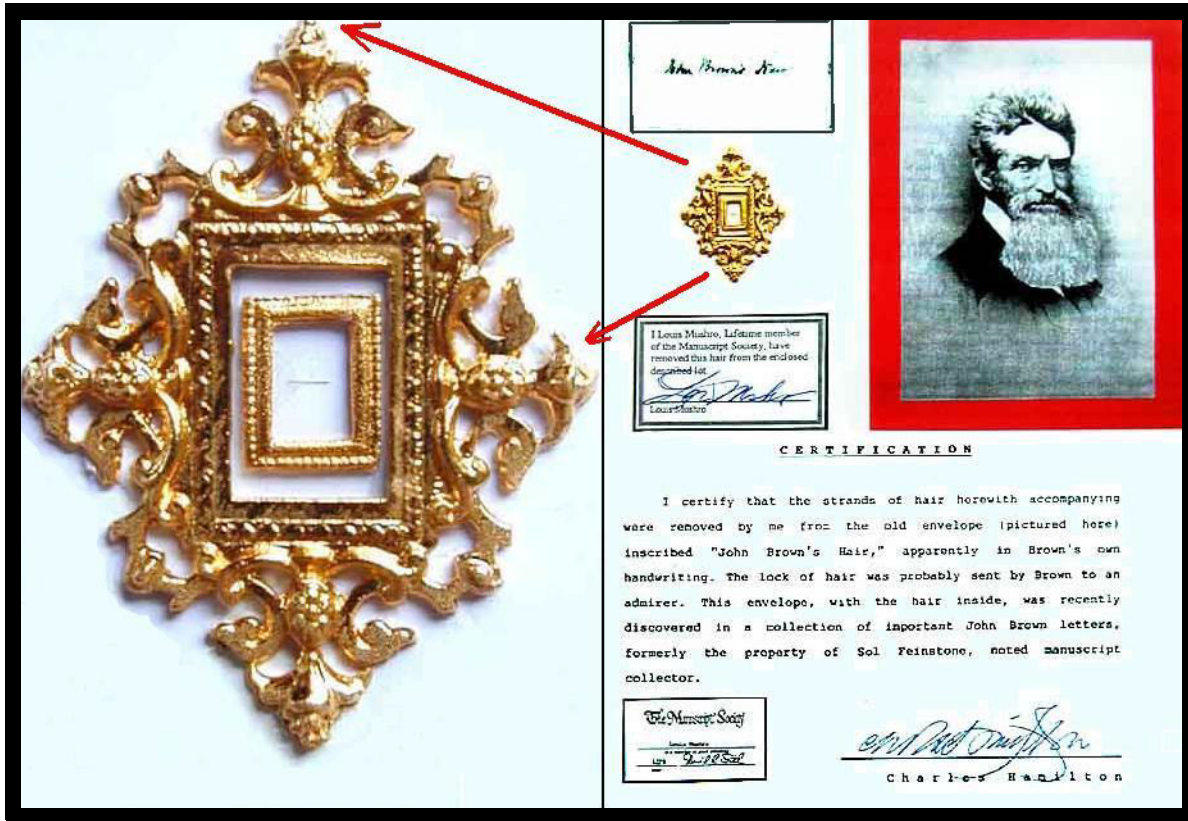

471. This 3-act play would be published in the Kansas Historical Quarterly in February 1937, complete not only with the original script, but also with the cast of characters with their entrances and exits, and descriptions of their costumes.

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

chopped into pieces and offered for sale on Ebay:

There would also be an anonymous journalistic publication, reprinted here in full, bearing the title THE LIFE, TRIAL AND EXECUTION OF CAPTAIN JOHN BROWN KNOWN AS "OLD BROWN OF OSSAWATOMIE," WITH A FULL ACCOUNT OF THE ATTEMPTED INSURRECTION AT HARPER'S FERRY. COMPILED FROM OFFICIAL AND AUTHENTIC SOURCES. INCLUDING COOKE'S CONFESSION, AND ALL THE INCIDENTS OF THE EXECUTION, printed in New-York by the Robert M. De Witt firm of 161 & 162 Nassau Street:

READ ME

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

THE LIFE, TRIAL AND EXECUTION
OF
CAPTAIN JOHN BROWN
KNOWN AS “OLD BROWN OF OSSAWATOMIE,”
WITH A FULL ACCOUNT OF THE ATTEMPTED INSURRECTION AT HARPER’S FERRY.

COMPILED FROM OFFICIAL AND AUTHENTIC SOURCES.

INCLUDING COOKE’S CONFESSION, AND ALL THE INCIDENTS OF
THE EXECUTION.

NEW YORK.
ROBERT M. DE WITT, PUBLISHER.

161 & 162 NASSAU STREET.

READ ME

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

December 3, Saturday: Tuscany, Parma, Piacenza, Modena, and Reggio formed The United Provinces of Central Italy.

Harpers Ferry residents George Mauzy and Mary Mauzy wrote again to their daughter Eugenia Mauzy Burton and son-in-law James H. Burton, who were then living in England (Burton had been a machinist, foreman, and Acting Master Armorer at the Harpers Ferry Armory between 1844-1854):

To Mr. & Mrs. James H. Burton

December 3, 1859

My dear Children:

Well the great agony is over. "Old Osawatomie Brown" was executed yesterday at noon - his wife came here the day before, & paid him a short visit, after which she returned here under an escort, where she and her company remained until the body came down from Charlestown, in the evening, after which she took charge of it and went home.

This has been one of the most remarkable circumstances that ever occurred in this country, this old fanatic made no confession whatever, nor concession that he was wrong, but contended that he was right in everything he done, that he done great service to God, would not let a minister of any denomination come near or say anything to him, but what else could be expected from him, or anyone else who are imbued with "Freeloveism, Socialism, Spiritualism," and all the other isms that were ever devised by man or devil.

There is an immense concourse of military at Charlestown, not less than 2000 men are quartered there, the Courthouse, all the churches & all the Lawyers offices are occupied. We have upwards of 300 regulars & 75 or 80 Montgomery Guards. These men were all sent here by the Sec. of War & Gov. Wise to prevent a rescue of Brown & his party by northern infidels and fanatics: of which they boasted loudly, but their courage must have oozed out of their finger ends, as none made their appearance. We are keeping nightly watch, all are vigilant, partys of 10 men out every night, quite a number of incendiary fires have taken place in this vicinity & County, such as grain stacks, barns & other out-buildings. -George Mauzy

HDT

WHAT?

INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

John Brown Statue dedicated May 9, 1935 at John Brown Memorial State Park located at Quenemo, Kansas

THE 2D GREAT AMERICAN DISUNION

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Upon learning that John Brown had indeed been executed, Friend Daniel Ricketson continued his musing in his journal:

HANGING

Learned that John Brown was hanged in Charlestown, Virginia, yesterday, between 11 and 12 A.M., – a martyr to the cause of the oppressed slave, – meeting death with the dignity and composure of a Christian martyr, as he undoubtedly was, although I do not think he took the wisest or best way to effect his noble object, – that of liberating the slaves of this professed republic. Peace to his memory. Good men will bless his name, and his memory will be venerated by the wise and good.

His death must prove the destruction of the blood-cemented union of this nation.

Mark this record, whosoever may at some future day read this page. I would make this record with due humility, and with a tender solicitude for the best interests of my countrymen. I wish not the blood of the tyrant, but that he may become abashed and conscience-stricken before God. My soul truly yearneth for peace and prosperity to all mankind, but cruelty and slavery must cease.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Mary Ann Day Brown would be granted the corpse of her hanged husband, but not those of her two sons.

The widow Brown would continue to bear the year of Jubilee as best she could.

The Reverend Thomas Wentworth Higginson would visit her and then write A VISIT TO JOHN BROWN'S HOUSEHOLD IN 1859, and Edmund Wilson has commented, in regard to this (page 247), that Higginson interviewed the "widow in her bleak little Adirondack farm with a piety that could not have been more reverent if Mrs. Brown had been the widow of Emerson."

On this morning Francis Jackson Meriam had come out from Boston to Concord on the train, and made an appearance on the doorstep of Secret "Six" conspirator Franklin Benjamin Sanborn. Sanborn wondered whether the man was being activated by a "wish for suicide," and sicked his inconvenient fugitive on his friend Henry Thoreau under the name "Mr. Lockwood." They got Waldo Emerson to rent a horse and covered wagon so Thoreau could drop him off at the train station in South Acton in the morning, where he would be less likely to be noticed as he boarded the train (toward Boston, although Sanborn was presuming toward Canada). Thoreau referred to Meriam in his journal as "X" and noted: "Rode with a man this forenoon who said that if he did not clean his teeth when he got up, it made him sick all the rest of the day, but he found by late

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

experience that when he had not cleaned his teeth for several days they cleaned themselves. I assured him that such was the general rule, —that when from any cause we were prevented from doing what we had commonly thought indispensable for us to do, things cleaned or took care of themselves. X was betrayed by his eyes, which had a glaring film over them and no serene depth into which you could look. Inquired particularly the way to Emerson's and the distance, and when I told him, said he knew it as well as if he saw it. Wished to turn and proceed to his house. Told me one or two things which he asked me not to tell S. Said, "I know I am insane," — and I knew it too. Also called it "nervous excitement." At length, when I made a certain remark, he said, "I don't know but you are Emerson; are you? You look somewhat like him." He said as much two or three times, and added once, "But then Emerson would n't lie." Finally put his questions to me, of Fate, etc., etc., as if I were Emerson. Getting to the woods, I remarked upon them, and he mentioned my name, but never to the end suspected who his companion was. Then "proceeded to business," — "since the time was short," — and put to me the questions he was going to put to Emerson. His insanity exhibited itself chiefly by his incessant excited talk, scarcely allowing me to interrupt him, but once or twice apologizing for his behavior. What he said was for the most part connected and sensible enough." Francis Jackson Meriam made it safely to Boston without being identified and arrested, and would be hid out for several days in the home of his namesake grandfather on Hollis Street, the Garrisonian abolitionist and Boston historian Francis Jackson.

December 3: Suddenly quite cold, and freezes in the house.

Rode with a man this forenoon who said that if he did not clean his teeth when he got up, it made him sick all the rest of the day, but he had found by late experience that when he had not cleaned his teeth for several days they cleaned themselves. I assured him that such was the general rule,—that when from any cause we were prevented from doing what we had commonly thought indispensable for us to do, things cleaned or took care of themselves.

X was betrayed by his eyes, which had a glaring film over them and no serene depth into which you could look. Inquired particularly the way to Emerson's and the distance, and when I told him, said he knew it as well as if he saw it. Wished to turn and proceed to his house. Told me one or two things which he asked me not to tell S. [SANBORN]. Said, "I know I am insane,"—and I knew it too. Also called it "nervous excitement." At length, when I made a certain remark, he said, "I don't know but you are Emerson; are you? You look somewhat like him." He said as much two or three times, and added once, "But then Emerson wouldn't lie." Finally put his questions to me, of Fate, etc., etc., as if I were Emerson. Getting to the woods, I remarked upon them, and he mentioned my name, but never to the end suspected who his companion was. Then "proceeded to business," — "since the time was short,"— and put to me the questions he was going to put to Emerson. His insanity exhibited itself chiefly by his incessant excited talk, scarcely allowing me to interrupt him, but once or twice apologizing for his behavior. What he said was for the most part connected and sensible enough.

When I hear of John Brown and his wife weeping at length, it is as if the rocks sweated.

According to the Elwood Free Press for this date, this had been candidate Abraham Lincoln's speech at Elwood in "Bleeding Kansas," a speech that must have been delivered on or about November 30th:

Mr. Lincoln was received with great enthusiasm. He stated the reasons why he was unable to make a speech this evening. He could only say a few words to us who had come out to meet him the first time he had placed his foot upon the soil of Kansas. Mr. Lincoln said that it was possible that we had local questions in regard to Railroads, Land Grants and internal improvements which were matters of deeper interest to us than the questions arising out of national politics, but of these local interests he knew nothing and should say nothing. We had, however, just adopted a State Constitution, and it was probable, that, under that Constitution, we should soon cease our Territorial existence, and come forward to take our place in the brotherhood of States, and act our parts as a member of the confederation. Kansas would be Free, but the same questions we had had here in regard to Freedom or Slavery would arise in regard to other Territories and we should have to take our part in deciding them. People often ask, "why make such a fuss about a few niggers?" I answer the question by asking what will you do to dispose of this question? The Slaves constitute one seventh of our entire population. Wherever there is an element of this magnitude in a government it will be talked about. The general feeling in regard to Slavery had changed entirely since the early days of the Republic. You may examine the debates under the Confederation, in the Convention that framed the Constitution and in the first session of Congress and you will not find a single man saying that Slavery is a good thing. They all believed it was an evil. They made the Northwest Territory –the only Territory then belonging to the government– forever free. They prohibited the African Slave trade. Having thus prevented its extension and cut off the supply, the Fathers of the Republic believed Slavery must soon disappear. There are only three clauses in the Constitution which refer to Slavery, and in neither of them is the word Slave or Slavery mentioned. The word is not used in the clause prohibiting the African Slave trade; it is not used in the clause which makes Slaves a basis of representation; it is not used in the clause requiring the return of fugitive Slaves. And yet in all the debates in the Convention the question was discussed and Slaves and Slavery talked about. Now why was this word kept out of that instrument and so carefully kept out that a European, be he ever so intelligent, if not familiar with our institutions, might read the Constitution over and over again and never learn that Slavery existed in the United States. The reason is this. The Framers of the Organic Law believed that the Constitution would outlast Slavery and they did not want a word there to tell future generations that Slavery had ever been legalized in America. Your Territory has had a marked history – no other Territory has ever had such a history. There had been strife and bloodshed here, both parties had been guilty of outrages; he had his opinions as to the relative guilt of the parties, but he would not say who had been most to blame. One fact was certain – there had been loss of life, destruction of property; our material interests had been retarded. Was this desirable? There is a peaceful way of settling these questions – the way adopted by government until a recent period. The bloody code has grown out of the new policy in regard to the government of Territories. Mr. Lincoln in conclusion adverted briefly to the Harpers Ferry Affair.⁴⁷² He believed the attack of Brown wrong for two reasons. It was a violation of law and it was, as all such attacks must be, futile as far as any effect it might have on the extinction of a great evil. We have a means provided for the expression of our belief in regard to Slavery – it is through the ballot box – the peaceful method provided by the Constitution. John Brown has shown great courage, rare unselfishness, as even Gov. [Henry A. Wise of Virginia] testifies. But no man, North or South, can approve of violence or crime. Mr. Lincoln closed his brief speech by wishing all to go out to the election on Tuesday and to vote as became the Freemen of Kansas.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

On this evening candidate Abraham Lincoln was speaking in Stockton Hall at Leavenworth, Kansas. This is how his speech would be reported in the newspaper:

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: You are, as yet, the people of a Territory; but you probably soon will be the people of 472. October 16-18, 1859. This is apparently Abraham Lincoln's 1st reference to John Brown, whose execution scheduled for December 2, 1859, undoubtedly placed him in the forefront of conversational topics among his former friends and enemies in Kansas.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

a State of the Union. Then you will be in possession of new privileges, and new duties will be upon you. You will have to bear a part in all that pertains to the administration of the National Government. That government, from the beginning, has had, has now, and must continue to have a policy in relation to domestic slavery. It cannot, if it would, be without a policy upon that subject. And that policy must, of necessity, take one of two directions. It must deal with the institution as being wrong or as not being wrong.

Mr. Lincoln then stated, somewhat in detail, the early action of the General Government upon the question – in relation to the foreign slave trade, the basis of Federal representation, and the prohibition of slavery in the Federal territories; the Fugitive Slave clause in the Constitution, and insisted that, plainly that early policy, was based on the idea of slavery being wrong; and tolerating it so far, and only so far, as the necessity of its actual presence required.

He then took up the policy of the Kansas-Nebraska act, which he argued was based on opposite ideas – that is, the idea that slavery is not wrong. He said:

You, the people of Kansas, furnish the example of the first application of this new policy. At the end of about five years, after having almost continual struggles, fire and bloodshed, over this very question, and after having framed several State Constitutions, you have, at last, secured a Free State Constitution, under which you will probably be admitted into the Union. You have, at last, at the end of all this difficulty, attained what we, in the old North-western Territory, attained without any difficulty at all. Compare, or rather contrast, the actual working of this new policy with that of the old, and say whether, after all, the old way – the way adopted by Washington and his compeers – was not the better way.

Mr. Lincoln argued that the new policy had proven false to all its promises – that its promise to the Nation was to speedily end the slavery agitation, which it had not done, but directly the contrary – that its promises to the people of the Territories was to give them greater control of their own affairs than the people of former Territories had had; while, by the actual experiment, they had had less control of their own affairs, and had been more bedeviled by outside interference than the people of any other Territory ever had.

He insisted that it was deceitful in its expressed wish to confer additional privileges upon the people; else it would have conferred upon them the privilege of choosing their own officers. That if there be any just reason why all the privileges of a State should not be conferred on the people of a Territory at once, it only could be the smallness of numbers; and that if while their number was small, they were fit to do some things, and unfit to do others, it could only be because those they were unfit to do, were the larger and more important things – that, in this case, the allowing the people of Kansas to plant their soil with slavery, and not allowing them to choose their own Governor, could only be justified on the idea that the planting a new State with slavery was a very small matter, and the election of Governor a very much greater matter. "Now," said he, "compare these two matters and decide which is really the greater. You have already had, I think, five Governors, and yet, although their doings, in their respective days, were of some little interest to you, it is doubtful whether you now, even remember the names of half of them. They are gone (all but the last) without leaving a trace upon your soil, or having done a single act which can, in the least degree, help or hurt you, in all the indefinite future before you. This is the size of the Governor question. Now, how is it with the slavery question? If your first settlers had so far decided in favor of slavery, as to have got five thousand slaves planted on your soil, you could, by no moral possibility, have adopted a Free State Constitution. Their owners would be influential voters among you as good men as the rest of you, and, by their greater wealth, and consequent, greater capacity, to assist the more needy, perhaps the most influential among you. You could not wish to destroy, or injuriously interfere with their property. You would not know what to do with the slaves after you had made them free. You would not wish to keep them as underlings; nor yet to elevate them to social and political equality. You could not send them away. The slave States would not let you send them there; and the free States would not let you send them there. All the rest of your property would not pay for sending them to Liberia. In one word, you could not have made a free State, if the first half of your own numbers had got five thousand slaves fixed upon the soil. You could have disposed of, not merely five, but five hundred Governors easier. There they would have stuck, in spite of you, to plague you and your children, and your children's children, indefinitely. Which is the greater, this, or the Governor question? Which could the more safely be intrusted to the first few people who settle a Territory? Is it that which, at most, can be but temporary and brief in its effects? or that which being done by the first few, can scarcely ever be undone by the succeeding many?"

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

He insisted that, little as was Popular Sovereignty at first, the Dred Scott decision, which is indorsed by the author of Popular Sovereignty, has reduced it to still smaller proportions, if it has not entirely crushed it out. That, in fact, all it lacks of being crushed out entirely by that decision, is the lawyer's technical distinction between decision and dictum. That the Court has already said a Territorial government cannot exclude slavery; but because they did not say it in a case where a Territorial government had tried to exclude slavery, the lawyers hold that saying of the Court to be dictum and not decision. "But," said Mr. Lincoln, "is it not certain that the Court will make a decision of it, the first time a Territorial government tries to exclude slavery?"

Mr. Lincoln argued that the doctrine of Popular Sovereignty, carried out, renews the African Slave Trade. Said he: "Who can show that one people have a better right to carry slaves to where they have never been, than another people have to buy slaves wherever they please, even in Africa?"

He also argued that the advocates of Popular Sovereignty, by their efforts to brutalize the negro in the public mind — denying him any share in the Declaration of Independence, and comparing him to the crocodile — were beyond what avowed pro-slavery men ever do, and really did as much, or more than they, toward making the institution national and perpetual.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

He said many of the Popular Sovereignty advocates were "as much opposed to slavery as any one;" but that they could never find any proper time or place to oppose it. In their view, it must not be opposed in politics, because that is agitation; nor in the pulpit, because it is not religion; nor in the Free States, because it is not there; nor in the Slave States, because it is there. These gentlemen, however, are never offended by hearing Slavery supported in any of these places. Still, they are "as much opposed to Slavery as anybody." One would suppose that it would exactly suit them if the people of the Slave States would themselves adopt emancipation; but when Frank Blair tried this last year, in Missouri, and was beaten, every one of them threw up his hat and shouted "Hurrah for the Democracy!"

Mr. Lincoln argued that those who thought Slavery right ought to unite on a policy which should deal with it as being right; that they should go for a revival of the Slave Trade; for carrying the institution everywhere, into Free States as well as Territories; and for a surrender of fugitive slaves in Canada, or war with Great Britain. Said he, "all shades of Democracy, popular sovereign as well as the rest, are fully agreed that slaves are property, and only property. If Canada now had as many horses as she has slaves belonging to Americans, I should think it just cause of war if she did not surrender them on demand.

"On the other hand, all those who believe slavery is wrong should unite on a policy, dealing with it as a wrong. They should be deluded into no deceitful contrivances, pretending indifference, but really working for that to which they are opposed." He urged this at considerable length.

He then took up some of the objections to Republicans. They were accused of being sectional. He denied it. What was the proof? "Why, that they have no existence, get no votes in the South. But that depends on the South, and not on us. It is their volition, not ours; and if there be fault in it, it is primarily theirs, and remains so, unless they show that we repeal them by some wrong principle. If they attempt this, they will find us holding no principle, other than those held and acted upon by the men who gave us the government under which we live. They will find that the charge of sectionalism will not stop at us, but will extend to the very men who gave us the liberty we enjoy. But if the mere fact that we get no votes in the slave states makes us sectional, whenever we shall get votes in those states, we shall cease to be sectional; and we are sure to get votes, and a good many of them too, in these states next year.

You claim that you are conservative; and we are not. We deny it. What is conservatism? Preserving the old against the new. And yet you are conservative in struggling for the new, and we are destructive in trying to maintain the old. Possibly you mean you are conservative in trying to maintain the existing institution of slavery. Very well; we are not trying to destroy it. The peace of society, and the structure of our government both require that we should let it alone, and we insist on letting it alone. If I might advise my Republican friends here, I would say to them, leave your Missouri neighbors alone. Have nothing whatever to do with their slaves. Have nothing whatever to do with the white people, save in a friendly way. Drop past differences, and so conduct yourselves that if you cannot be at peace with them, the fault shall be wholly theirs.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

You say we have made the question more prominent than heretofore. We deny it. It is more prominent; but we did not make it so. Despite of us, you would have a change of policy; we resist the change, and in the struggle, the greater prominence is given to the question. Who is responsible for that, you or we? If you would have the question reduced to its old proportions go back to the old policy. That will effect it.

But you are for the Union; and you greatly fear the success of the Republicans would destroy the Union. Why? Do the Republicans declare against the Union? Nothing like it. Your own statement of it is, that if the Black Republicans elect a President, you won't stand it. You will break up the Union. That will be your act, not ours. To justify it, you must show that our policy gives you just cause for such desperate action. Can you do that? When you attempt it, you will find that our policy is exactly the policy of the men who made the Union. Nothing more and nothing less. Do you really think you are justified to break up the government rather than have it administered by Washington, and other good and great men who made it, and first administered it? If you do you are very unreasonable; and more reasonable men cannot and will not submit to you. While you elect [the] President, we submit, neither breaking nor attempting to break up the Union. If we shall constitutionally elect a President, it will be our duty to see that you submit. Old John Brown has just been executed for treason against a state. We cannot object, even though he agreed with us in thinking slavery wrong. That cannot excuse violence, bloodshed, and treason. It could avail him nothing that he might think himself right. So, if constitutionally we elect a President, and therefore you undertake to destroy the Union, it will be our duty to deal with you as old John Brown has been dealt with. We shall try to do our duty. We hope and believe that in no section will a majority so act as to render such extreme measures necessary.

Mr. Lincoln closed by an appeal to all —opponents as well as friends— to think soberly and maturely, and never fail to cast their vote, insisting that it was not a privilege only, but a duty to do so.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

December 8, Thursday: Boston had for some 30 years been intimately entangled with the financial affairs of the South. The shipping interests had been making money by moving the cotton produced by slaves, and the manufacturing interests had been making money by spinning it into cloth. Thus as soon as John Brown was safely dead (his last words had been “I am ready at any time — do not keep me waiting....”), there was created a political organization at Faneuil Hall, euphemistically named the Constitutional Union Party, which would commonly be known by the more accurate designator “Cotton Whigs.” These folks would do everything possible to suck up on a suspicious South.

Burial of the corpse of John Brown at North Elba, New York, with a note from Henry Thoreau (now lost) read last of all at the graveside. “The face was hardly changed, and wore its usual expression.” Although I have a note asserting that Brown had requested that the Reverend William Henry Furness officiate at his funeral, I cannot find corroboration that the Reverend was present, or traveled to New York. A choir of black neighbors sang the old man’s favorite hymn:

Blow Ye the Trumpet Blow,
The gladly solemn sound,
Let all the nations know,
To earth’s remotest bound,
The year of Jubilee has come.

Additional corpses had been unearthed and scrutinized at Harpers Ferry, and the corpse of the son Oliver Brown had been separated out to be handed over to Mrs. Mary Ann Day Brown per the letter of petition she had sent to Virginia Governor Henry A. Wise. Alfred Barbour, Superintendent of the United States Armory, made his report: “Upon examination, the body of one of Mrs. Brown’s sons was recognized among the disinterred invaders. The bodies of them all have been again buried properly on the right bank of the Shenandoah in the County of Jefferson, Virginia.” This time they packed the remaining corpses tightly into a couple of “store boxes.” Francis Yates, Overseer of the Poor for Jefferson County, submitted a bill for $55, pointing out that because “these men were killed on the property of the United States, whilst they had forcible possession of said property ... the Government, and not the Overseers ... should pay the expenses of interment.”

The widow continued to bear the year of Jubilee as best she could. The Reverend Thomas Wentworth Higginson would visit her and then write A VISIT TO JOHN BROWN’S HOUSEHOLD IN 1859, and Edmund Wilson has famously commented in regard to this (page 247), that Higginson interviewed the “widow in her bleak little Adirondack farm with a piety that could not have been more reverent if Mrs. Brown had been the widow of Emerson.”

Thomas De Quincey died in Edinburgh. His body would be interred beside that of Margaret in St Cuthbert’s Churchyard.

ATTITUDES ON DE QUINCEY

December 8. Here is a better glaze than we have yet had, for it snowed and rained in the night. I go to Pleasant Meadow, — or rather toward the sun, for the glaze shows best so. The wind has risen and the trees are stiffly waving with a brattling sound. The birches, seen half a mile off toward the sun, are the purest dazzling white of any tree, probably because their stems are not seen at all. It is only those seen at a particular angle between us and the sun that appear thus.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Day before yesterday the ice which had fallen from the twigs covered the snow beneath in oblong pieces one or two inches long, which C. well called lemon-drops.

When a noble deed is done, who is likely to appreciate it? They who are noble themselves. I am not surprised that certain of my neighbors speak of John Brown as an ordinary felon. Who are they? They have much flesh, or at least much coarseness of some kind. They are not ethereal natures, or the dark qualities predominate in them, or they have much office. Several of them are decidedly pachydermatous. How can a man behold the light who has no answering inward light? They are true to their sight, but when they look this way they see nothing, they are blind. For the children of the light to contend with them is as if there should be a contest between eagles and owls. Show me a man who feels bitterly toward John Brown, and then let me hear what noble verse he can repeat.

Certain persons disgraced themselves by hanging Brown in effigy in this town on the 2d. I was glad to know that the only four whose names I heard mentioned in connection with it had not been long resident here, and had done nothing to secure the respect of the town.

It is not every man who can be a Christian, whatever education you give him. It is a matter of constitution and temperament. I have known many a man who pretended to be a Christian, in whom it was ridiculous, for he had no genius for it.

The expression "a liberal education" originally meant one worthy of freemen. Such is education simply in a true and broad sense. But education ordinarily so called—the learning of trades and professions which is designed to enable men to earn their living, or to fit them for a particular station in life—is servile.

Two hundred years ago is about as great an antiquity as we can comprehend or often have to deal with. It is nearly as good as two thousand to our imaginations. It carries us back to the days of aborigines and the Pilgrims; beyond the limits of oral testimony, to history which begins already to be enamelled with a gloss of fable, and we do not quite believe what we read; to a strange style of writing and spelling and of expression; to those ancestors whose names we do not know, and to whom we are related only as we are to the race generally. It is the age of our very oldest houses and cultivated trees. Nor is New England very peculiar in this. In England also, a house two hundred years old, especially if it be a wooden one, is pointed out as an interesting relic of the past. When we read the history of the world, centuries look cheap to us and we find that we had doubted if the hundred years preceding the life of Herodotus seemed as great an antiquity to him as a hundred years does to us. We are inclined to think of all Romans who lived within five hundred years B.C. as contemporaries to each other. Yet Time moved at the same deliberate pace then as now. Pliny the Elder, who died in the 79th year of the Christian era, speaking of the paper made of papyrus which was then used, —how carefully it was made,—says, just as we might say, as if it were something remarkable: "There are, thus, ancient memorials in the handwriting of Caius and Tiberius Gracchus, almost two hundred years old, which I have seen in the possession of Pomponius Secundus the poet, a very illustrious citizen. As for the handwriting of Cicero, Augustus, and Virgil, we very often meet with it still." This too, according to Pliny, was the age of the oldest wines. "In one year the quality of all kinds of wine was peculiarly good. In the consulship of Lucius Opimius, when Caius Gracchus, disturbing the people with seditions, was killed, there was that bright and serene weather (ea caeli temperies fulsit) which they call a cooking (of the grape) by the heat of the sun. This was in the year of the city 634. And some of those wines have lasted to this day, almost two hundred years, now reduced to the appearance of candied honey (in speciem redacta mellis asperi)." [Bohn's translation says, "have assumed the consistency of honey with a rough taste!!"]

How is it that what is actually present and transpiring is commonly perceived by the common sense and understanding only, is bare and bald, without halo or the blue enamel of intervening air? But let it be past or to come, and it is at once idealized. As the man dead is spiritualized, so the fact remembered is idealized. It is a deed ripe and with the bloom on it. It is not simply the understanding now, but the imagination, that takes cognizance of it. The imagination requires a long range. It is the faculty of the poet to see present things as if, in this sense, also past and future, as if distant or universally significant. We do not know poets, heroes, and saints for our contemporaries, but we locate them in some far-off vale, and, the greater and better, the further off we [ARE] accustomed to consider them. We believe in spirits, we believe in beauty, but not now and here. They have their abode in the remote past or in the future.

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

December 16, Friday: Henry Thoreau checked out, from Harvard Library, the 2d volume of a 5-volume set prepared 1818-1821 (THEOPHRASTI ERESII QUAE SUPERSUNT OPERA: ET EXCERPTA LIBRORUM by Theophrastus of Eresus (circa 372-circa 287BCE), JOHANN GOTTLOB SCHNEIDER, HEINRICH FRIEDRICH LINK. Lipsiae: Sumtibus Frid. Christ. Guil. Vogelii) of ΘΕΟΠΗΡΑΣΤΥΣ ΕΡΕΣΙΩΝ ΤΑ ΣΟΟΛΟΜΕΝΑ.

THEOPHRASTUS

He also checked out the two volumes of Aristotle's HISTOIRE DES ANIMAUX D'ARISTOTE in Greek and in the

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

French translation by M. Camus (Paris: Chez la veuve Desaint, 1783).

HISTOIRE DES ANIMAUX I

HISTOIRE DES ANIMAUX II

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

While at the Harvard Library, Thoreau read from but did not check out John Gerard's 1597 botanical resource, THE HERBALL OR GENERALL HISTORIE OF PLANTES:

GREAT HERBALL OF 1597

INTERNET COMMENTARY

December 16, 1859: A.M.—To Cambridge, where I read in Gerard's Herbal. [Vide extracts from preface made in October 1859.] His admirable though quaint descriptions are, to my mind, greatly superior to the modern more scientific ones. He describes not according to rule but to his natural delight in the plants. He brings them vividly before you, as one who has seen and delighted in them. It is almost as good as to see the plants themselves. It suggests that we cannot too often get rid of the barren assumption that is in our science. His leaves are leaves; his flowers, flowers; his fruit, fruit. They are green and colored and fragrant. It is a man's knowledge added to a child's delight. Modern botanical descriptions approach ever nearer to the dryness of an algebraic formula, as if $c + y$ were = to a love-letter. It is the keen joy and discrimination of the child who has just seen a flower for the first time and comes running in with it to its friends. How much better to describe your object in fresh English words rather than in these conventional Latinisms! He has really seen, and smelt, and tasted, and reports his sensations.

Bought a book at Little & Brown's, paying a nine-pence more on a volume than it was offered me for elsewhere. The customer thus pays for the more elegant style of the store.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

The Select Committee on the Invasion of Harpers Ferry created by Democratic Senator James Murray Mason of Virginia held its first meeting in regard to the John Brown affair and its Secret "Six" conspiracy. The committee would be in existence for 6 months before delivering its final report and would summon, in all, 32 witnesses.

Edwin Coppoc and John E. Cook were hanged in Charlestown, Virginia.⁴⁷³ Edwin's body would be buried in Winona after a funeral attended by the entire town. Later his body would be reburied in Salem, Ohio.

(Edwin had written from the prison to his adoptive mother, of a nonresistant-abolitionist Quaker farm family, 473. I have been advised that according to THE QUAKERS OF IOWA by Louis Thomas Jones, a scholarly work published under the auspices of the State Historical Iowa at Iowa City, Iowa in 1914 (I haven't myself actually seen this book), prior to their deaths the Coppoc brothers were disowned by the Red Cedar Monthly Meeting of Friends in the West Branch/Springdale area.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

that he was

"sorry to say that I was ever induced to raise a gun."

Edwin's brother Barclay Coppoc was still eluding capture.)

John E. Cook had made a full confession of his activities with the raiders and at the last moment had sought to save his neck by representing that he had been deceived through false promises, but this had not saved him, nor had the fact that his brother-in-law A.P. Willard was Governor of Indiana.

When it came the turn of John Anderson Copeland, Jr. to be hanged, too short a drop was used. He strangled slowly.

Just before being taken from his cell to the execution field that morning, he had completed a last letter to his family:

*Charlestown Jail, Va.,
Dec. 16, '59*

Dear Father, Mother, Brothers Henry, William and Freddy, and Sisters Sarah and Mary:

*The last Sabbath with me on earth has passed away. The last Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday that I shall ever see on this earth have now passed by God's glorious sun, which he has placed in the heavens to illuminate this earth- whose refulgent beams are watched for by this poor invalid, to enter & make as it were in heaven of the room in which he is confined-
I have seen declining behind the western mountains for the last time. Last night for the last time, I beheld the soft bright moon as it rose, casting its mellow light into my felons cell, dissipating the darkness and filling it with that soft pleasant light which causes such thrills of joy to all those in like circumstance with myself. This morning for the last time, I beheld the glorious sun of yesterday rising in the far-off East, away off in the country where our Lord Jesus Christ first proclaimed salvation to man, and now as he rises higher and his bright light takes the place of the pale, soft moonlight, I will take my pen, for the last time, to write you who are bound to me by those strong ties (yea, the strongest that God ever instituted,) the ties of blood and relationship. I am well, both*

STATE MURDERSTATE MURDER

*in body and in mind. And now, dear ones, if it were not that I know your hearts will be filled with sorrow at my fate, I could pass from this earth without a regret. Why should you sorrow? Why should your hearts be racked with grief? Have I not everything to gain and nothing to lose by the change? I fully believe that not only myself but also all three of my poor comrades who are to ascend the same scaffold- (a scaffold already made sacred to the cause of freedom, by the death of that great champion of human freedom, Capt. JOHN BROWN) are prepared to meet our God. I am only leaving a world filled with sorrow and woe to enter one in which there is but one lasting day of happiness and bliss. I feel that God in his mercy has spoken peace to my soul, and that all my numerous sins are now forgiven me. Dear parents, brothers and sisters, it is true that I am now in a few hours to start on a journey from which no traveler returns. Yes, long before this reaches you, I shall as I sincerely hope, have met our brother and sister who have for years been worshiping God around his throne - singing praises to him, and thanking him that he gave his Son to die that they might have eternal life. I pray daily and hourly that I may be fitted to have my home with them, and that you, one and all, may prepare your souls to meet your God, that so, in the end, though we meet no more on earth, we shall meet in Heaven, where we shall not be parted by the demands of the cruel and unjust monster Slavery. But think not that I am complaining, for I feel reconciled to meet my fate. I pray God that his will be done; not mine. Let me tell you that it is not the mere act of having to meet death, which I should regret, (if I should express regret I mean,) but that such an unjust institution should exist as the one which demands my life; and not my life only, but the lives of those to whom my life bears but the relative value of zero to the infinite. I beg of you one and all that you will not grieve about me, but that you will thank God that he spared me time to make my peace with Him. And now, dear ones, attach no blame to anyone for my coming here for not any person but myself is to blame. I have no antipathy against anyone, I have freed my mind of all hard feelings against every living being, and I ask all who have any thing against me to do the same. And now dear parents, Brothers and sisters, I must bid you to serve your God and meet me in heaven. I must with a few words, close my correspondence with those who are the most near and dear to me: but I hope, in the end, we may again commune, never to cease. Dear ones, he who writes this will, in a few hours, be in this world no longer. Yes, these fingers which hold the pen with which this is written will, before to-day's sun has reached his meridian have laid it aside forever, and this poor soul have taken its flight to meet its God. And now dear ones I must bid you that last, long, sad farewell. Good-day, Father, Mother, Henry, William, and Freddy, Sarah and Mary, serve your God and meet me in heaven.
Your Son and Brother to eternity,
John A. Copeland.*

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Is it that Aaron D. Stevens, and 10 of Captain Brown's black supporters, having been duly found guilty of treason and murder by a jury of their white male peers, were hanged on this date?

Or is it that the other surrendered survivors of the raid on Harpers Ferry, John Anderson Copeland, Jr., Shields Green, and Aaron D. Stevens, having been duly found guilty of treason and murder by a jury of their white male peers, were hanged on this date?⁴⁷⁴

A monument would be erected by the citizens of Oberlin, Ohio in honor of their 3 free citizens of color who had died in the raid or been hanged, Shields Green, John Anderson Copeland, Jr., and Lewis Sheridan Leary (the 8-foot marble monument would be moved to Vine Street Park in 1971).

WHAT I'M WRITING IS TRUE BUT NEVER MIND

474. In THE CAPTURE AND EXECUTION OF JOHN BROWN: A TALE OF MARTYRDOM, BY ELIJAH AVEY, EYE WITNESS, WITH THIRTY ILLUSTRATIONS, dated 1906, we have on page 45 an assertion that the white men John E. Cook and Edwin Coppoc, and then the black men John Anderson Copeland, Jr. and Shields Green, were hanged on December 16th, 1859. The reference says that, the gallows being not large enough, the 2 black men Copeland and Green were forced to stand and watch the 2 white men Cook and Coppoc being hanged before themselves ascending the scaffold. But I have from another reference this assertion that it was one surrendered surviving white man, Aaron D. Stevens, who was hanged on the 16th along with 10 black supporters of Captain John Brown, and that Cook actually would be among the last hanged. Which account would be correct — and why is there such a glaring discrepancy between these various accounts?

The book SECRET SIX treats each retreating admission of each of the co-conspirators in treason as if it were holy writ. No attempt has been made to discern, behind this haze of post-facto explanations and justifications, what the brags of these participants might have been had their plot been successful in initiating the race war they contemplated and had this race war been completed, as it would certainly have been completed, by a historic genocide against black Americans. (Joel Silbey has contended, in "The Civil War Synthesis in American History," that postbellum American historians have been misconstruing antebellum American politics by viewing them in conjunction with our knowledge of the bloodbath that followed. It is only after the fact that we can "know" that the US Civil War amounted to a sectional dispute, North versus South. We avoid learning that before the fact, it was undecided whether this conflict was going to shape up as a race conflict, a class conflict, or a sectional conflict. We avoid knowing that the raid on Harpers Ferry might have resulted in a race war, in which peoples of color would be exterminated in order to create an all-white America, or might have resulted in a class war, in which the laboring classes might have first destroyed the plantation owners' equity by killing their slaves, and then gone on to purge the nation of the white plantation owners themselves, with their privileged-class endowments.) Also, according to the endmatter, the SECRET SIX study had obtained its material on Frederick Douglass basically from McFeely's FREDERICK DOUGLASS of 1991, and its material on Thoreau from Sanborn's HENRY DAVID THOREAU of 1917, neither of which were the last word on the subject when the book was prepared. In addition, this work provides no reference whatever for the Emerson life: evidently he was simply presumed not to be of even marginal pertinence. There is no consideration to be found anywhere in this volume of the comparison event: the other American struggle for freedom, the one which had taken place in Haiti under General Toussaint Louverture.

For these reasons, the study is, fundamentally, incompetent. It is as if O.J. Simpson and his Dream Team had been allowed to control what would appear in our social history texts. Or, it is as if the White House staff had been allowed to define once and for all the extent of President Richard Milhouse Nixon's involvement in the Watergate break-in, with, after their initial defensive testimony, after their establishment of the official consensus "truth," all explanations accepted at their putative face value — with no further questioning tolerated.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

YOU CAN ALWAYS LIE TO YOURSELF

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1860

Use of the guillotine ceased in the Papal States near Rome, and in the kingdoms of Piedmont and Bourbon Naples. (You don't suppose, do you, that they might have come, after due reflection, to think of this sort of activity as somewhat inconsistent with the spirit of Jesus Christ?)

HEADCHOPPING

September 21, Friday: British and French troops defeated the Chinese at Palikao.

Arthur Schopenhauer died in Frankfurt-am-Main at the age of 72.

James Whitford was hanged in the jailyard in San Francisco, California for having shot Edward Sheridan on February 1, 1860 over a pay dispute.

September 21, Friday: Hard rain last night. About one and seven eighths inches fallen since yesterday morning, and river rising again. See, at Reynolds's, Hungarian millet raised by Everett. It is smaller and more purple than what is commonly raised here.

P.M.— To Easterbrooks Country.

The fever-bush berries have begun some time,—say one week; are not yet in prime. Taste almost exactly like lemon-peel. But few bushes bear any.

The bayberries are perhaps ripe, but not so light a gray and so rough, or wrinkled, as they will be.

The pods of the broom are nearly half of them open. I perceive that one, just ready to open, opens with a slight spring on being touched, and the pods at once twist and curl a little. I suspect that such seeds as these, which the winds do not transport, will turn out to be more sought after by birds, etc., and so transported by them than those lighter ones which are furnished with a pappus and are accordingly transported by the wind; i. e., that those which the wind takes are less generally the food of birds and quadrupeds than the heavier and wingless seeds.

Muhlenbergia Mexicana by wall between E. Hosmer and Simon Brown, some time. Some large thorn bushes quite bare.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1861

Dr. John Aitken Carlyle edited the posthumous THE HISTORY OF SCOTTISH POETRY of his friend Dr. David Irving (1778-1860), adding notes and appending a brief glossary of the Scots words that appeared in the volume.

In California, Tuolumne County authorities conducted a group hanging of 4 Chinese men.

The English law which had mandated that “Any person, who commits the crime of sodomy, either with a man, or with any animal, and is found guilty, will be put to death” was eased in this year to replace the sentence of death for bestiality with a sentence to life imprisonment which is still in effect, and to replace the sentence of hanging for anal intercourse with a sentence of ten years to life for sodomitical acts. England would continue, for the time being, to have the most stringent laws against homosexual acts of any of the European countries.

England had had an extraordinary run of good luck in regard to female criminals. For the fifth year in a row, a great new record, it would need to hang no women or girls.

(In this “Criminal Law Consolidation Act,” England was also abandoning hanging as punishment for arson of dwelling-houses, and, after the execution of Martin Doyle in Chester in this year for attempting to commit murder, it would be abandoning hanging as punishment for attempted murder.)

According to Jeffrey Weeks’s COMING OUT: HOMOSEXUAL POLITICS IN BRITAIN FROM THE NINETEENTH CENTURY TO THE PRESENT (revised edition, Quartet Books 1990), this easing applied in Wales as well as England, but did not as yet apply in Scotland:

Pages 11-12: Before 1885 the only legislation which directly affected homosexual acts was that referring to sodomy or buggery.... The 1533 Act of Henry VIII, which first brought sodomy within the scope of statute law, superseding ecclesiastical law, adopted the same criterion as the Church: all acts of sodomy were equally condemned as being “against nature,” whether between man and woman, man and beast, or man and man. The penalty for the “Abominable Vice of Buggery” was death. The keynote Act, re-enacted in 1563, was the basis for all homosexual convictions up to 1885.

Page 13: As part of his consolidation of the English criminal law, Sir Robert Peel actually tightened up the law on sodomy in 1826. The need to prove emission of seed as well as penetration was removed, and the death penalty re-enacted. This was particularly striking at a period when the death penalty was abolished for over a hundred other crimes.... When Lord John Russell attempted to removed “unnatural offences” from the list of capital crimes in 1841, he was forced to withdraw through lack of parliamentary support.

Pages 13-15: The death penalty for buggery, tacitly abandoned after 1836, was finally abolished in England and Wales in 1861 (in Scotland in 1889) to be replaced by penal servitude of between ten years and life. It was to remain thus for homosexual activities until 1967. But this was a prelude not to a liberalization of the law but to a tightening of its grip. By section 11 (the “Labouchere Amendment”) of the 1885 Criminal Law Amendment Act, all male homosexual acts short of buggery, whether committed in public or private, were made illegal.... And thirteen years later, the Vagrancy Act of 1898 clamped down on homosexual "soliciting." These two enactments represented a singular hardening of the legal situation and were a crucial factor in the determination of modern attitudes.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

June 4, Tuesday: African American John Clarkson was hanged in the jailyard in San Francisco, California for having cut the throat of his estranged lover, Caroline F. Park, with a razor on December 1st, 1860.

June 17, Monday: Spain declared neutrality in the American Civil War but recognized the Confederate States of America as a belligerent.

US CIVIL WAR

June 18, Tuesday: Henry Thoreau was on the Minnesota steamboat with Governor Alexander H. Ramsey and Mrs. Anna Earl Jenks Ramsey:

June 18, 9 AM, a letter by Horace Mann, Jr.: "Dear Mother We are this moment stopping at Henderson on the Minnesota River.... We can see the water marks of this spring [flood] on the houses up above the first floor. There may be a hundred houses in the town, but they are much scattered and I cannot see more than half that number. We left St. Paul last night about 5 oclock with Governor Ramsey, the Governor of Minnesota, on board and about 25 volunteers on board going up to Fort Ridgely.... The Minnesota River is a very crooked one, and I suppose we have gone ten miles by water which would have been two or three in a straight line to go from one end of this town to where we are now stopping. We have to double on ourselves several times perhaps like this [a wavy line] and sometimes so sharp a bend that they have to reverse one wheel of the steamer while the other goes ahead and so turn round right where they are. The river is very narrow being in some places that we have come past not more than 7 or 8 rods wide and usually not more than 10 or 15, and it is full of snags. They have a band on board which is now playing a tune I do not know what one. There are I should think over a hundred passengers on board, and it is a small boat, so that a great many of them have to sleep wherever they can around on chairs, or on the floor, or on trunks, etc. It is a beautiful day, rather hot in the sun and as the river is so narrow we can see everything on the banks very easily.... 9:45 P.M. Since I wrote the above we have passed Le Sueur, Traverse des Sioux, St. Peter's and Mankato, & we are now stopping at South Bend and I do not know but what we may stay here all night as the water is pretty low and the river is full of sand bars and snags."

At Fort Ridgely, the "Soldiers' House" was being manned by volunteer troops. Primary reliance for the defense of the fort was being placed upon the "mountain" howitzers left behind by the regular troops who had marched off to fight in the Civil War.⁴⁷⁶

US CIVIL WAR

475. Actually, Governor Alexander H. Ramsey and Mrs. Anna Earl Jenks Ramsey. Ramsey had been the first governor of the territory, then a senator, then governor of the state. He had also recently violated Minnesota's sense of "nice" by refusing to pardon a white wife who had poisoned her husband with arsenic on behalf of her lover, and had then gotten religion in jail. He insisting on hanging her high in the saintly city (but you can bet we tied her dress around her ankles before we dropped the trap). Be sure to visit the Ramsey mansion if you come to Minnesota, for Ramsey became president of the Minnesota Historical Society and we give nice tours of his digs (265 Exchange Street, St. Paul MN, 296-8681).

476. Bronze barrel weight 884 pounds. Effective when firing 6-pound solid roundshot at ranges of 1,500 yards, with muzzle elevated some five degrees, but also effective with antipersonnel tin cannisters of grapeshot at 300 to 450 yards.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

August 9, Friday: The new song "John Brown's Body" was spreading rapidly through the Union Army. Few would realize that the "John Brown" being sung had been merely a short second tenor Scotts sergeant who had drowned while crossing a river, rather than the famous hanged traitor desperado "Captain" John Brown. (The verses we now have are later redactions in that they explicitly mention Harpers Ferry and Kansas and hanging, and date to a subsequent era in which the identification of John Brown of the song with the John Brown of Harpers Ferry had become complete; the song about the body of Sgt. Brown a'mouldering in its grave as it was initially being sung of course included no such topical references.)

John Brown's body lies a mouldering in the grave, While weep the sons of bondage, whom he ventured all
to save ;
But, tho' he lost his life in struggling for the slave,
His Soul is marching on.
Chorus : Glory, Glory Hallelujah !
Glory, Glory Hallelujah !
Glory, Glory Hallelujah !
His Soul is marching on.

John Brown was a Hero undaunted, true and brave ;
And Kansas knew his valor, when he fought her rights
to save ;
And now, though the grass grows green above his grave,
His Soul is marching on. Glory, &c.

He captured Harper's Ferry with his nineteen men so true,
And he frightened Old Virginny, till she trembled through and through.
They hung him for a traitor : themselves a Traitor crew ;
But his Soul is marching on. Glory, &c.

John Brown was John the Baptist of Christ we are to see,
Christ who of the bondman shall the Liberator be ;
And soon, throughout the Sunny South, the slaves
shall all be free :
For, his Soul is marching on ! Glory, &c.

The conflict that he heralded, he looks from Heaven to view
On the army of the Union, with his Flag, red, white and blue,
And Heaven shall ring with anthems o'er the deed :
they mean to do :
For, his Soul is marching on. Glory, &c.

Ye, Soldiers of Freedom, then strike, while strike ye may,
The death-blow of Oppression, in a better time and way ;
For, the dawn of Old John Brown has brightened into day,
And his Soul is marching on. Glory, &c.

US CIVIL WAR

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

November 30, Saturday: In New-York, Captain Nathaniel Gordon was convicted of the capital offense of having engaged in the international slave trade off the coast of Africa in violation of the capital federal ordinance of May 15, 1820, and was condemned to be hanged as a pirate:

Oops, my bad

(Mmmm, this looks dreadfully like the end of the road, doesn't it? –Sentenced to be hanged by the neck until you are dead dead dead? Actually, our nation had gotten itself into this situation a number of times before, and in each and every instance the problem been dealt with by means of a straightforward and automatic Presidential pardon. –So, you might suppose that the arrogant and selfrighteous Captain Gordon would have been in fear of his life at this point, but if you suppose that, you might be in error.)

UNITED STATES v. GORDON. 25 F.Cas. 1364
Circuit Court, S. D. New York.
Nov. 8, 1861; Nov. 30, 1861.

This was an indictment against the defendant [Nathaniel Gordon], under the 5th section of the act of May 15, 1820 (3 Stat. 601), for forcibly confining and detaining, on the 8th of August, 1860, on waters within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and out of the limits of any state or district, on board of the ship Erie, owned wholly or in part, or navigated for, or in behalf of, a citizen or citizens of the United States, certain negroes, not having been held to service by the laws of either of the states or territories of the United States, with intent to make such negroes slaves, he being, at the time of the commission of the crime, one of the ship's company of the ship, and a citizen of the United States, and the Southern district of New York being the district in which he was apprehended and

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

into which he was first brought. The trial took place before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and SHIPMAN, District Judge, and a jury.

E. Delafield Smith, Dist. Atty., for the United States.
Gilbert Dean, for defendant.

NELSON, Circuit Justice (charging jury).

The 5th section of the act of May 15, 1820, under which the prisoner is indicted, provides, "that if any citizen of the United States, being of the crew or ship's company of any foreign ship or vessel engaged in the slave trade, or any person whatever, being of the crew or ship's company of any ship or vessel, owned wholly or in part, or navigated for, or in behalf of, any citizen or citizens of the United States, shall forcibly confine or detain, or aid and abet in forcibly confining or detaining, on board such ship or vessel, any negro or mulatto not held to service by the laws of either of the states or territories of the United States," with intent to make him a slave, such person shall be adjudged a pirate, and, on conviction, shall suffer death. There are two counts in the indictment, to which we shall call your attention, and to which the observations that we shall make on the law of the case will be confined. The first count is, in substance, that the prisoner, one of the ship's company of the ship Erie, owned in whole or in part by American citizens, in the river Congo, did piratically, feloniously, and forcibly confine and detain eight hundred negroes on board, with intent to make them slaves. The third count is, that the prisoner, a citizen of the United States, one of the ship's company of the ship Erie, a foreign vessel, engaged in the slave trade, in the river Congo, did piratically and forcibly confine and detain eight hundred negroes on board such vessel, with intent to make them slaves. Under the statute which we have read to you, in order to make out the offence against the prisoner, it is necessary, on the part of the government, to prove, either that he is a citizen of the United States, or that the vessel on which he served, with which he was engaged in the slave trade, belonged, in whole or in part, to citizens of the United States. If the prisoner is a citizen of the United States, then the crime charged against him, of forcibly detaining these negroes, may be made out, if he was on board of a foreign vessel. But, if he was not a citizen of the United States, but a foreigner, then, in order to charge him with the crime, it must appear that it was committed upon an American vessel, or at least a vessel owned, in whole or in part, by citizens of the United States. Two questions, therefore, become material: 'First- Was the prisoner at the bar a citizen? Now, proof is given by two witnesses, that they knew both his father and his mother in Portland, Maine, before their marriage. They were both residents of that place. The witnesses also knew them after their marriage, in the same place, and knew the prisoner, the fruit of that marriage, when two or three years old. The question is, upon this testimony- Was the prisoner a native-born citizen, born in Portland or in the United States? It has been argued, by the counsel for the prisoner, that there is some evidence that the mother, after the marriage, was in the habit of going with her husband, who was a sea captain, upon foreign voyages; and it is insisted that, upon this state of facts, the prisoner may have been born abroad. Perhaps, the presumption being, upon the evidence, that he was born in Portland, a prima facie case being made out that he was born there, the burden would rest upon him, to show that he was born abroad. But we take it to be settled law, that, although he was born in a foreign country, yet if his father and mother were American citizens, and did not have the design of removing to the foreign country, but touched there in the course of a voyage which the father made as a sea captain, the child would still be regarded as an American citizen.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Next, gentlemen, as to the character of the vessel. Was she an American vessel, or owned, in whole or in part, by American citizens? It appears that she was built in the United States, and belonged to American citizens, and made a voyage from England to Havana; and, it is insisted that, after her arrival at Havana, she was sold and transferred by those American citizens. We have the account from Mr. Post, who owned three-fourths of her at the time of the sale. He states, that though he was not present at the time of the sale, yet one of the other part owners, Mr. Knudsen, was with the vessel as its master, and that he received from Havana, in March, 1860, the proceeds of the sale, and had no doubt that she had been sold and transferred. Perhaps, on this evidence, it would be difficult to deny that a sale and transfer was made of this vessel out of those American owners, so far at least as Mr. Post is concerned; and he says, also, that he accounted with the other part owners for their share of the price. The difficulty, in this part of the case, is, that it is not enough to show that the title to this vessel was conveyed by these American owners in March, 1860. That is not sufficient, because, before any change can be made in the character of a vessel, after it has been proved that she belonged to American owners, it must appear that the transfer was made to a foreigner. To whom this vessel was transferred, we have no evidence in the case. But, as I before said to you, gentlemen, it is not necessary, upon this branch of the case, that the prisoner should be a citizen, and, also, that the vessel should be an American vessel. It is sufficient, if either of these facts exists, for the commission of the crime charged in the indictment.

This brings us, gentlemen, to the merits of the case, and the question is, is the prisoner guilty or not, of forcibly confining or detaining the negroes on board of this vessel, in the Congo river, with the intent of making them slaves? This is the issue in the case, so far as the real merits are involved. Now, you have the evidence, on the part of the government, of Martin, Green, Alexander, and Hetelberg, four seamen on board of the Erie, who shipped in Havana, in April, 1860, a short time after this alleged sale and transfer. They have detailed to you the circumstances of their employment as seamen, the cargo with which the vessel was laden at that port — some 150 or more hogsheads of liquor, a number of barrels of pork and beef, bags of beans, barrels of bread and rice, and some 250 bundles of shooks, with a corresponding number of hoops, for the purpose of being subsequently manufactured into barrels or casks. Now, it may be material for you to inquire, in entering upon the consideration of this issue, whether this was a bona fide cargo, for lawful trade and commerce, or whether it was a cargo fitted out and intended to be used in the slave trade. The vessel was of some 500 tons. If this was a fitting out for the purpose of engaging in the slave trade, and the prisoner at the bar had a knowledge of this intended service of the vessel, then that fact would accompany him to the Congo river, and will have its weight and its influence upon your minds, as to the connection that he had with the transaction that occurred there, in receiving these negroes on board and detaining them. It may undoubtedly be assumed, without any injustice, as a matter of law, the prisoner being the master of the vessel at the port of Havana, and for her voyage to the Congo river, that if this cargo was fitted out for that purpose, if it was a cargo not only proper for that purpose, but intended for that purpose, he, as master, who had the control and charge of the vessel in procuring the cargo, in stowing it, and in shipping the seamen, is chargeable with a knowledge of these facts. Now, these four witnesses, whom you have seen on the stand, have detailed the progress of the voyage from Havana to the Congo river, and the taking of these negroes on board, and the starting from the river on the return voyage to Havana. Their testimony has been so frequently referred to by counsel, and commented upon by them, that I shall not take up your time in going over it. The four concur in the account which they have given of the voyage. They state that, after they had been out some thirty days, and had discovered the provisions and freight on board, a suspicion arose, in the minds of the sailors, that the vessel might be intended for the slave trade, and that they disclosed this suspicion to the captain, assigning to him the reason and grounds of it. The captain, however, disclaimed any such purpose, rebuked the suspicion, and ordered them forward. They all concur in stating that, after the vessel arrived in the Congo river, and while the persons connected with her, and those who furnished the cargo of negroes, were engaged in putting the negroes on board, the captain continued in command of her, so far as they saw, and exercised the same control over the vessel, and her management, and the putting on board of these negroes, as he had previously exercised in the course of the voyage. They also state that, after the negroes were put on board, they were called aft, and were applied to for the purpose of ascertaining whether they would continue to serve as seamen on the return voyage, and were told that, if they would, they should be paid a dollar a head for every negro landed at Cuba. They also state, especially some of them, that the prisoner gave a direction for hoisting the anchor, and directed the course of the vessel when she came out of the river. These are the material facts which have been testified to by the witnesses for the prosecution. On the part of the prisoner, you have the testimony of the first and second mates, who, in all these respects, with, perhaps, one exception, contradict these four witnesses. They state that, after the arrival of the vessel and the discharge of the cargo, the prisoner no longer exercised any control over the management of the vessel, and the control of the vessel and her navigation were passed over to the hands of another person, first, to Mr. Hill, who died, and afterwards to Mr. Manuel, whom they regarded as the captain of the vessel; and that subsequently the prisoner had no management or control of her. One of them, the mate, I think, states that he was present when the seamen were applied to, with the view of ascertaining whether they would serve on the return voyage, and his statement differs from the account given by the seamen in this: He says, that the prisoner applied to the seamen, on behalf of the owners of the vessel, and that, as agent, or on behalf of the owners, holding a letter in his hand at the time, which purported to be an authority, he made this offer to them, for the purpose of engaging them. This is the only discrepancy, so far as regards that fact testified to by the seamen.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Now, as I before stated to you, if the prisoner at the bar, as master of this vessel, at Havana, had a knowledge that she was fitted out, equipped, and provisioned for a voyage to the Congo river, on the coast of Africa, for the purpose of engaging in the slave trade, then, in view of the fact of his entering upon that voyage, conducting the vessel to a foreign coast, remaining in her, and coming back with her, or starting to come back with her, before she was captured, this previous knowledge of the prisoner, and his engagement to navigate the vessel for that purpose, will have its influence as to the purpose for which he was found upon the vessel in the Congo river, at the time the negroes were put on board; and it is entitled to whatever weight you may think it deserves, in aiding or supporting the testimony of the four seamen, and will raise the question, for your consideration and decision, whether or not the transfer was a part of the original plan of carrying out this engagement of the vessel in the slave trade, and, if such, colorable and not bona fide. This, however, is a question for your consideration and determination.

Now, we have said that, in order to sustain the charge against the prisoner, it must appear that these negroes were "forcibly" confined and detained on board of that vessel, for the purpose of making them slaves – for the purpose of bringing them to Cuba, or elsewhere, to make them slaves. This word "forcibly," which is a material element in the crime charged, does not mean physical or manual force. Even the crime of robbery, in which force is a peculiar element of the crime, it being the taking violently the property of another from his person, need not be accompanied with or consist of actual force. Any conduct, on the part of the robber, putting the person deprived of his goods in bodily fear and terror, is equivalent to actual force. And so in this case. These negroes were collected at the place where they were put on board, in barracoons, and were there under restraint by the persons who furnished them at the ship's side. They were in bondage at the time, and under the control of those persons, who transferred them to the vessel. They came upon the deck of the vessel in that condition, and it would be strange, indeed, if it was made necessary by the law, that it should be shown that they made personal, physical resistance at the time, against being put on board and detained on board, under all these circumstances. It is sufficient that they were under moral restraint and fear – their wills controlled by this superior power exercised over their minds and bodies; and any person participating in that forcible detention, that sort of detention, is a principal, participating in the guilt of the offence.

Then, as to the intent of making them slaves. This, undoubtedly, is a question of fact for the jury. You must find it, but you can find it as an inference from the surrounding circumstances attending their being put on board and forcibly detained on board. If any other purpose, any lawful purpose, had been shown to you by the evidence in the case, undoubtedly it would have been pertinent and satisfactory for the purpose of rebutting such a presumption of intent. But, in the absence of any such evidence, it is for you to say whether the inference is warranted by the testimony.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

These are all the observations that we deem in advisable to submit to you, but we will call back your minds to the material question, so that you may look into the case with intelligence and comprehend the real issue involved in the case, which is—Were these negroes, that were put on board of the Erie, in the Congo river, in August, 1860, forcibly detained or confined, with the intention of making them slaves, and did the prisoner, on board of that vessel, at the time, participate in that confinement and detention? If he did, he is guilty of this offence, under the statute. If he did not, he is innocent.

The jury found the defendant guilty. He subsequently made, before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and SHIPMAN, District Judge, a motion for an arrest of judgment and a motion for a new trial.

SHIPMAN, District Judge.

We have carefully considered the point submitted to us, on the motions for an arrest of judgment and for a new trial, and the arguments of counsel thereon. In disposing of these motions, we do not deem it important to discuss any exceptions taken to the form of the indictment, except such as apply to the first and third counts, inasmuch as it was upon those two counts that we put the case to the jury. If either one of those counts is good, the indictment is sufficient to support the verdict.

The only objection taken to the form of the first and third counts is, that they do not aver, in the precise words of the statute, the condition of the negroes, as "not held to service by the laws of either of the states or territories of the United States," at the time of the commission of the offence, the language of the indictment being, "not having been held to service, &c." It is argued that, if the defendant had been able to prove that they had been once held to service, at some time prior to the commission of the offence, this averment would have been negatived, and he would have been entitled to an acquittal. But this, we think, only proves that the language of the indictment, in this particular, is more comprehensive than was necessary. The indictment charges him with having forcibly confined and detained the negroes, they not having been held to service, &c., that is, not having been held to service at the time he so confined and detained them, or at any time previous. The fact that the terms of the averment are somewhat broader than those of the statute is not material, so long as they cover the offence described in the latter.

To the objection that there was no such proof that the vessel upon which the offence was committed, was "owned wholly, or in part, or navigated for, or in behalf of, any citizen or citizens of the United States," as would warrant a conviction on the first count, we cannot accede. The government proved that she was built in, and owned by citizens of, the United States. This fixed the national character of the vessel, and this character and ownership would be presumed to continue until they were shown to have been changed. To show such a change, the burden of proof was on the defendant. The evidence offered only tended to show that a sale was made of the vessel at Havana, but without showing to whom such sale was made. It is urged, by the defendant's counsel, that, inasmuch as the sale claimed to have been proved was made in a foreign country, the law will presume, until the contrary is shown, that it was made to foreigners. We think there is no foundation, in law or reason, upon which such a presumption can rest.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

In support of that part of the indictment which charges that the defendant was an American citizen at the time of committing the offence, the government proved that his father and mother were residents of Portland, in the state of Maine, for many years, both before and after their marriage, and before the birth of the defendant, and while he was a small child. It also appeared, from the testimony of the same witnesses, that his father was a sea captain, and that sometimes his wife, the defendant's mother, accompanied him on his foreign voyages. The defendant's counsel claimed, that it appeared, from this evidence, that he might have been born abroad, and that, if he was, he was not a citizen of the United States, and, therefore, not amenable to those criminal laws of the United States which are limited in terms to its citizens. The court instructed the jury, however, that, even if the defendant was born during one of those voyages which the father made as a sea captain, without any intention of removing to, but merely touching at, foreign countries, he would still be regarded in law as an American citizen, although thus born abroad, provided his parents were American citizens. The defendant's counsel excepted to this part of the charge, on the ground that it did not lay down the correct rule of law applicable to children of American parents, born in foreign countries. Without here discussing the general principles of law applicable to that subject, it is a sufficient answer to the exception taken in this case, that the charge on this point, taken in connection with the facts in evidence to which it was to be applied, clearly referred to a possible birth of the defendant on board of his father's American vessel, while the latter was in a foreign country, in the course of the voyage. We are clearly of opinion, that there was no error in this part of the charge.

The only remaining objection that we deem it necessary to notice, is, that, if the Erie was a foreign vessel, even admitting the citizenship of Gordon, this court has not the jurisdiction to try him for an act committed on the river Congo, in the Portuguese dominions, and not on tide waters. There are two answers to this objection: First. There is no proof that the Erie was a foreign vessel, but the proof is clear and uncontradicted that she was an American vessel, owned by American citizens. Second. The allegation, in the indictment, that the offence was committed "in the river Congo, on the coast of Africa, on waters within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court," is, we think, fully sustained by the proof. The proof is, that the negroes were taken on board in the Congo river, some distance from its mouth, but where it is several miles broad, and really an arm of the sea. The proof is clear and uncontradicted, that the offence of confining and detaining the negroes on board was continuous and uninterrupted, until her capture in the Atlantic Ocean, several miles from land. Of course, it was committed in the very mouth of the river, where its broad expanse is lost in the Atlantic, and where the jurisdiction of every nation, over its citizens or its ships, clearly extends. The other exceptions to these two counts and to the charge, are overruled.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Upon all these points, we are clearly of opinion, that there is no error in the indictment, and that none intervened on the trial, and that the jurisdiction of the court is beyond dispute. We are, therefore, constrained to deny the application for a certificate of division, which is asked for by the defendant, to enable him to carry the case to the supreme court. It is hardly necessary for me to add that these views are the result of consultation, and are fully concurred in by Mr. Justice NELSON.

Sentence of death being about to be passed on the defendant by Judge SHIPMAN, holding the court alone, in the absence of Mr. Justice NELSON, it was objected by the counsel for the defendant, that this could not be done, because the trial had taken place before both of the judges. Judge SHIPMAN stated, that he and Mr. Justice NELSON had agreed, on consultation, that it was competent for the court, when held by only one of the judges, to pass the sentence.

HDT

WHAT?

INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1862

For 5 years in a row England had hanged no women or girls. In this year it would hang 2, for murder:

WOMEN HANGED IN ENGLAND DURING 1862

Date	Name	Age	Place of execution	Crime
29/04	Mary Ann Reid (Timney)		Dumfries	Murder of neighbour
20/10	Catherine Wilson	40	Newgate	Murders (poisoning)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

March 8, Saturday: To avoid a one-on-one duel between the CSS Merrimac and the USS Monitor, the CSS Merrimac withdrew.

As the Confederate ironclad CSS Virginia steamed out of Hampton Roads, Virginia, it sank 2 Federal warships and ran 3 others aground.

Federal troops occupied Chattanooga and Knoxville, Tennessee as well as Leesburg, Virginia.

At Pea Ridge (Elkhorn Tavern), Arkansas, Federal troops defeated Confederate forces and Indians in the largest battle of the war west of the Mississippi River. 2,200 total casualties resulted, and the rebels would be forced to evacuate Arkansas.

US CIVIL WAR

Un ballo in maschera op.272, a quadrille by Johann Strauss, was performed for the initial time, in Pavlovsk.

President Abraham Lincoln –impatient with General McClellan’s inactivity– issued an order reorganizing the Army of Virginia and relieving McClellan of supreme command. McClellan was given command of the Army of the Potomac and ordered to attack Richmond. This marked the beginning of the Peninsular Campaign.

Harper's Weekly reported on the execution of Captain Nathaniel Gordon:

NOT the least important among the changes which are taking place in the current of national policy and public opinion is evidenced by the fact that on Friday, 21st February, in this city, NATHANIEL GORDON was hung for being engaged in the slave-trade. For forty years the slave-trade has been pronounced piracy by law, and to engage in it has been a capital offense. But the sympathy of the Government and its officials has been so often on the side of the criminal, and it seemed so absurd

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

to hang a man for doing at sea that which, in half the Union, is done daily without censure on land, that no one has ever been punished under the Act. The Administration of Mr. Lincoln has turned over a new leaf in this respect. Henceforth the slave-trade will be abandoned to the British and their friends. The hanging of Gordon is an event in the history of our country. He was probably the most successful and one of the worst of the individuals engaged in the trade. A native of Maine, he had engaged in the business many years since, and had always eluded justice. The particular voyage which proved fatal to him was undertaken in 1860. The following summary of the case we take from the Times:

It was in evidence (given by Lieutenant Henry D. Todd, U.S.N.) that the ship Erie was first discovered by the United States steamer Mohican, on the morning of the 8th day of August, 1860; that she was then about fifty miles outside of the River Congo, on the West Coast of Africa, standing to the northward, with all sail set; that she was flying the American flag, and that a gun from the Mohican brought her to.

It was shown by Lieutenant Todd that he went on board himself about noon, and took command of the prize. He found on board of the Erie, which our readers will remember was but 500 tons burden, eight hundred and ninety-seven (897) negroes, men, women, and children, ranging from the age of six months to forty years. They were half children, one-fourth men, and one-fourth women, and so crowded when on the main deck that one could scarcely put his foot down without stepping on them. The stench from the hold was fearful, and the filth and dirt upon their persons indescribably offensive.

FINAL EXECUTIONS
August 10, 1858	James Seale or Searle	Thomas Hardy watched last execution in Dorset in Dorchester, and final public execution in England
March 8, 1862	Captain Nathaniel Gordon	had been smuggling fresh slaves into the USA, hanged for this (classified as piracy)
August 7, 1862	John Doidge	hanged in the final public execution in Cornwall

EXECUTION OF GORDON THE SLAVE-TRADER, NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 21, 1862.

At first he of course knew nothing about them, and until Gordon showed him, he was unable to stow them or feed them – finally he learned how, but they were stowed so closely that during the entire voyage they appeared to be in great agony. The details are sickening, but as fair exponents of the result of this close stowing, we will but mention that running sores and cutaneous diseases of the most painful as well as contagious character infected the entire load. Decency was unthought of; privacy was simply impossible – nastiness and wretchedness reigned supreme. From such a state of affairs we are not surprised to learn that, during the passage of fifteen days, twenty-nine of the sufferers died, and were thrown overboard.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

It was proved by one of the seamen that he, with others, shipped on the Erie, believing her to be bound upon a legitimate voyage, and that, when at sea they suspected, from the nature of the cargo, that all was not right, which suspicion they mentioned to the Captain (Gordon), who satisfied them by saying that he was on a lawful voyage, that they had shipped as sailors, and would do better to return to their duties than to talk to him. Subsequently they were told that they had shipped on a slaver, and that for every negro safely landed they should receive a dollar.

The negroes were taken on board the ship on the 7th day of August, 1860, and the entire operation of launching and unloading nearly nine hundred negroes, occupied but three quarters of an hour, or less time than a sensible man would require for his dinner. As the poor creatures came over the side Gordon would take them by the arm, and shove them here or there, as the case might be, and if by chance their persons were covered from entire exposure by a strip of rag, he would, with his knife, cut it off, fling it overboard, and send the wretch naked with his fellows.

Several of the crew testified, all agreeing that Gordon acted as Captain; that he engaged them; that he ordered them; that he promised them the $1 per capita; that he superintended the bringing on board the negroes; and that he was, in fact, the master-spirit of the entire enterprise.

For this crime Gordon was arrested, tried, and, mainly through the energy of District-Attorney Smith, convicted, and sentenced to death. Immense exertions were made by his friends and the slave-trading interest to procure a pardon, or at least a commutation of his sentence, from President Lincoln, but without avail. He was sentenced to die on 21st. We abridge the following account of his last hours and execution [which we illustrate above] from the Herald and Times:

THE ATTEMPT TO COMMIT SUICIDE.

Nothing worthy of note occurred until about three o'clock A.M. on Friday morning, when the keepers were alarmed by the prisoner being suddenly seized with convulsions. At first it was supposed that he was trying to strangle himself; but on a close examination it was evident that he was suffering from the effects of poison. Dr. Simmons, the prison physician, was immediately sent for, and stimulants were freely administered for the purpose of producing a reaction. For the first half hour or so the efforts of the physician appeared to have but little effect. The patient became quite rigid under the influence of the poison, his pulse could scarcely be felt, and it was thought that after all the gallows would be cheated of its victim. Drs. James R. Wood and Hodgman, who were also in attendance upon the prisoner, labored hard to resuscitate the dying man, and finally, by means of the stomach-pump and the use of brandy, the patient was sufficiently recovered to be able to articulate. It was not until eight o'clock, however, that the physicians had any hope of saving Gordon's life. From that hour, however, the prisoner gradually recovered, although he was subject to fainting fits for hours afterward. When sensible he begged of the doctors to let him alone, preferring, he said, to die by his own hand rather than suffer the ignominy of a public execution. It has not been satisfactorily ascertained how or in what manner

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

the unfortunate man procured the poison with which he contemplated self-destruction. The symptoms were evidently those of strychnine, and the only way in which the keepers can account for the presence of the poison is its introduction in the cigars which Gordon had smoked so freely the night before. On Thursday the prisoner was compelled to undergo a rigid search, his clothing was changed entirely, and he was placed in a new cell, so that it would seem impossible almost for him to have procured the poison in any other way than that suggested by his keepers.

A few minutes after eleven o'clock, when it was apparent to Gordon that the execution would certainly take place, notwithstanding his attempt at suicide, he sent for Marshal Murray, and said he had something of a private nature to communicate. The Marshal repaired to the bedside of the culprit and asked if any thing could be done to alleviate his sufferings. Gordon raised himself slowly from his cot, and with much difficulty, said: "Cut a lock of hair from my head and give it to my wife." Then taking a ring from his finger, he requested that that also should be sent to his wife in remembrance of her husband. The request was cheerfully complied with, and the official, quite overcome with emotion, left the unhappy man to his fate.

THE EXECUTION.

At 12 o'clock, Marshal Murray notified Gordon, through Mr. Draper, that the hour had arrived. At this he expressed great surprise, and said he thought he had two hours more in which to live. The clergyman entered the cell and prayed with him, or rather for him. Deputy Marshal Borst aided him in dressing and gave him a large drink of clear whisky, when his arms were tied, the black cap was put carelessly on one side of his head, and he was carried on the deputy's shoulders to a chair in the corridor. The sight was simply shocking.

The man was not sober – that is, so powerful had been the effect of the poison that, in order to keep him alive till the necessary moment, they had been obliged to give him whisky enough to make an ordinary man drunk three times over. He sat lolling in the chair, gazing listlessly around, while the Marshal, with unaffected emotion, read the former reprieve to him. That done, he was helped to his feet, and held there while the Marshal read to him the death-warrant.

After this he looked around with a senseless smile, asked for some more whisky, which was kindly given him. The procession was then formed, Gordon stalking with a bravadoish air, upheld by the Marshals, toward the scaffold.

To a casual spectator it would appear that, exhausted by mental or physical suffering, Gordon was making a great effort to walk manfully to his fate. As it was, however, he had just sense enough left to endeavor to follow out the suggestion of the well-meaning deputy, who told him to die like a man, and to walk to the rope, so that no one could accuse him of fear. When he reached the scaffold, he said, "Well, a man can't die but once; I'm not afraid." The cap was drawn over the whitened, meaningless features, the noose-knot was carefully adjusted under his ear, and he stood, an unthinking, careless, besotted wretch waiting for he knew not what, when with a jerk he went high in air, and fell to the length of the rope, still senseless,

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

still unfeeling, still regardless of pain or pleasure. The body swayed hither and thither for a few moments, and all was quiet. No twitchings, no convulsions, no throes, no agonies. His legs opened once, but closed again, and he hung a lump of dishonored clay.

US CIVIL WAR

May 9, Friday: The Springfield, Massachusetts Daily Republican noted Henry Thoreau's demise:

Henry D. Thoreau, the recluse author, died of consumption at Concord, 7th inst. aged 44 years. His work entitled "Walden" and his magazine writings evinced great originality and keenness as a student of nature. He was a favorite disciple of Ralph Waldo Emerson.

(It intrigues me, that an obituary can be published by the popular press in such manner as to bear a suppressed final summation: "So that's it, that's all there was, that's everything it amounted to." And, nobody needs to be offended.)

The Confederates evacuated from Norfolk, Virginia.

David Hunter, commander of the federal government's Department of the South, proclaimed the manumission of all the slaves of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida.

Friend Daniel Ricketson went into Boston to Dunshee's to secure the ambrotype which he had had taken of his friend during his visit in August 1861, and then arranged as precious objects the 27 letters which Henry had written to him.

Edward Bonney (AKA Frank Bonney) was hanged in San Leandro, California for having killed a San Francisco man.

Captain Charles Henry Davis became the Acting Flag Officer in command of the Western Gunboat Flotilla.

US CIVIL WAR

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

June 29, Tuesday: As Southern forces attacked across the Chickahominy River, Federal troops withdrew to safety leaving behind 2,500 sick and wounded.

There was fighting at Savage's Station.

US CIVIL WAR

Waldo Emerson repeated his funeral oration on Henry David Thoreau for the benefit of the Reverend Theodore Parker's "Fraternity" in Boston.

After Thoreau's death Louisa May Alcott wrote a poem "Thoreau's Flute" for The Atlantic Monthly. According to Dr. Edward Waldo Emerson she wrote the poem while she was nursing in the military hospital in Washington DC where she had received the news of Henry Thoreau's death:

We sighing said, "Our Pan is dead—
His pipe hangs mute beside the river,
Around it friendly moonbeams quiver,
But music's airy voice is fled.
Spring comes to us in guise forlorn,
The blue-bird chants a requiem,
The willow-blossom waits for him,
The genius of the wood is gone"

Then from the flute, untouched by hands,
There came a low, harmonious breath:
For such as he there is no death.
His life the eternal life commands.
Above men's aims his nature rose.
The wisdom of a just content
Make one small spot a continent,
And turned to poetry life's prose

Haunting the hills, the stream, the wild,
Swallow and aster, lake and pine
To him seemed human or divine,
Fit mates for this large-hearted child.
Such homage nature ne'er forgets;
And yearly on the coverlid
'Neath which her darling lieth hid
Will write his name in violets.

To him no vain regrets belong
Whose soul, that finer instrument,
Gave to the world no poor lament,
But wood-notes ever sweet and strong.
Oh lonely friend, He still will be
A potent presence, though unseen,
Steadfast, sagacious and serene.
Seek not for him: he is with Thee.

At that time the magazine was withholding the names of contributors, and Louisa was informed by her father Bronson Alcott that one day while he was visiting Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, the poet had picked up the The Atlantic Monthly and had read aloud a few lines from her poem, and had asked her father whether he had read "Emerson's fine poem on Thoreau's Flute?"

THE ALCOTT FAMILY

HDT

WHAT?

INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Whittier-Holmes-Emerson-Motley-Alcott-Hawthorne-Lowell-Agassiz-Longfellow

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

In “Chiefly about War Matters,” edited and expurgated by Ticknor & Fields, Nathaniel Hawthorne revealed that he had been utterly at odds with Emerson’s and Thoreau’s attitude while John Brown was awaiting execution in 1859.

I shall not pretend to be an admirer of old John Brown, any farther than sympathy with Whittier’s excellent ballad about him may go; nor did I expect ever to shrink so unutterably from any apophthegm of a sage, whose happy lips have uttered a hundred gold sentences, as from that saying (perhaps falsely attributed to so honored a source), that the death of this blood-stained fanatic has “made the Gallows as venerable as the Cross!” Nobody was ever more justly hanged.

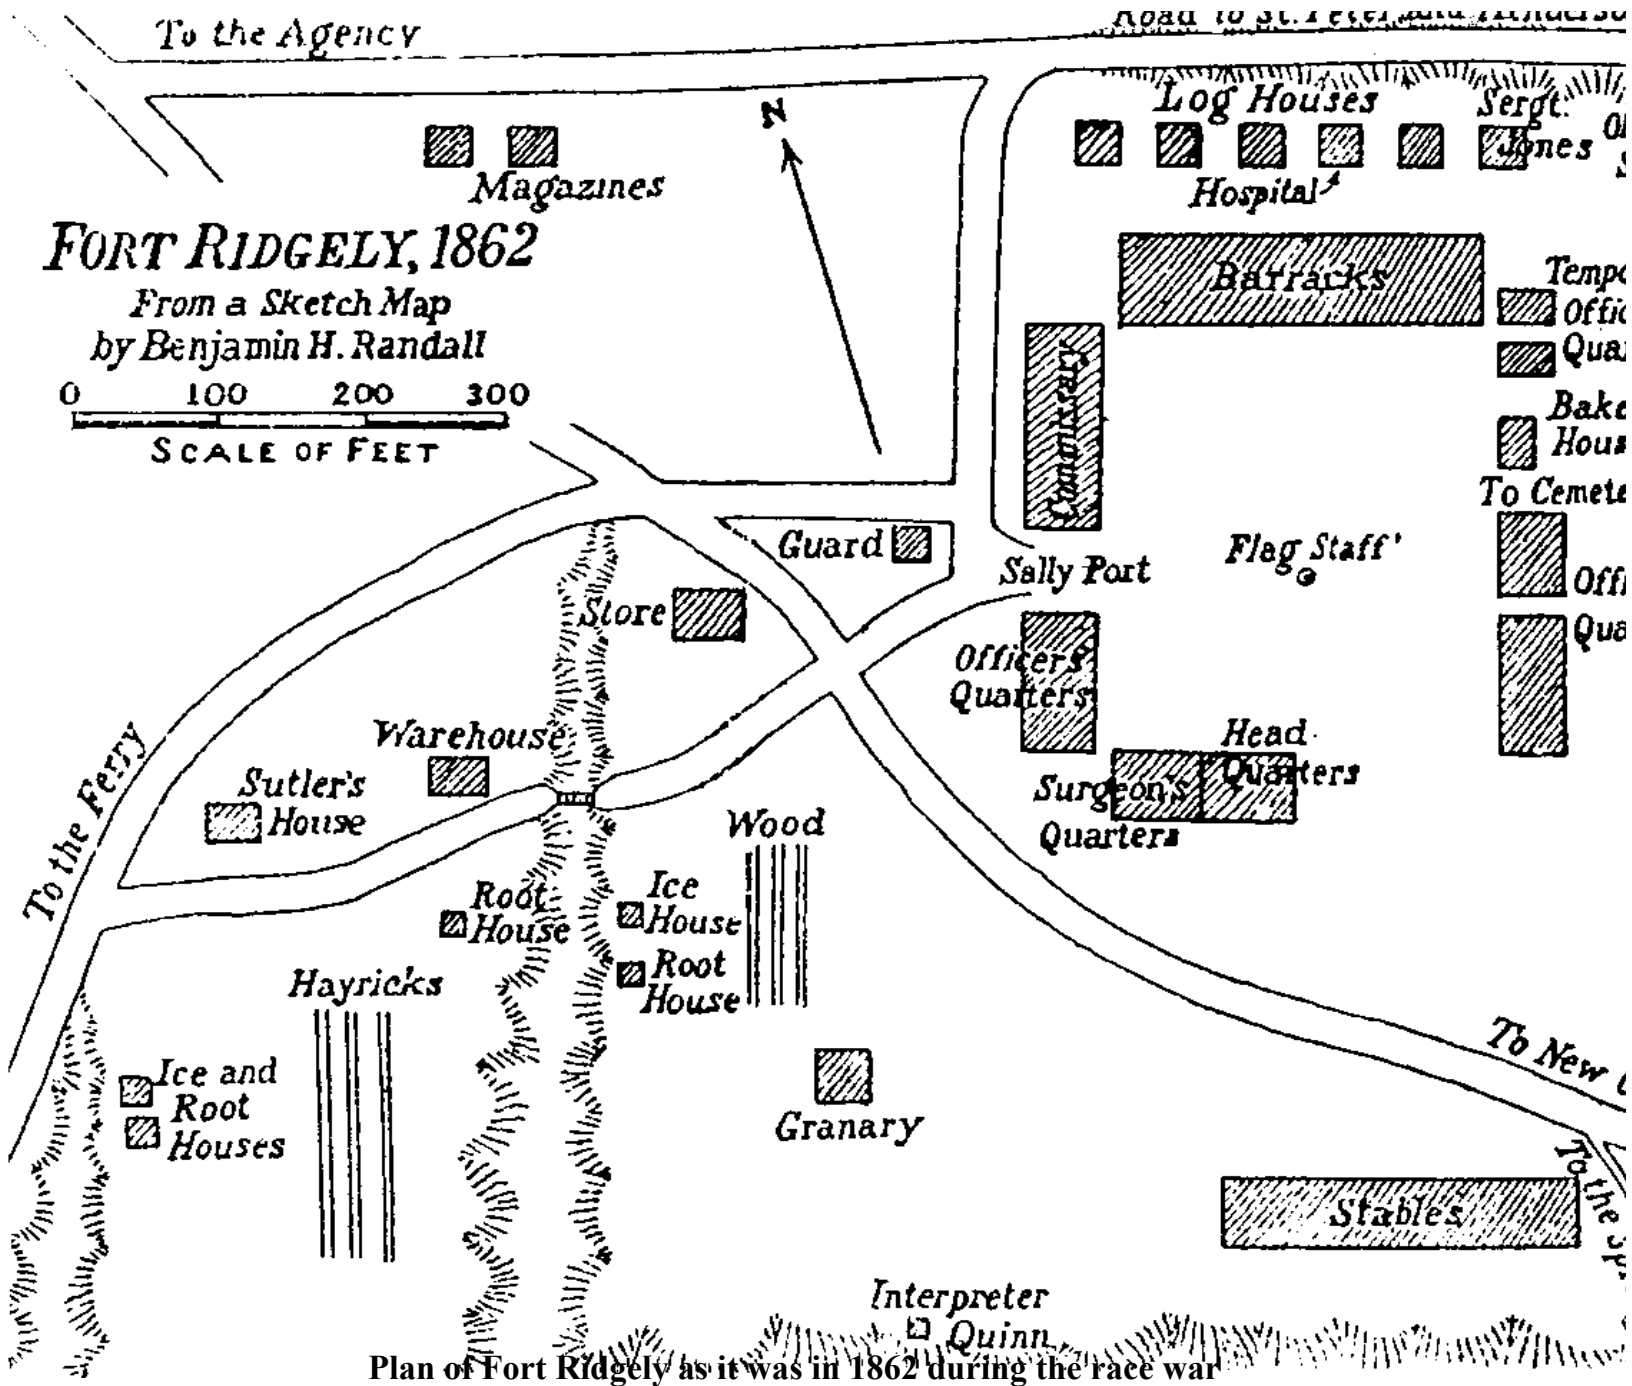

HANGING

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

July: The short Scots sergeant and 2d tenor, Sgt. John Brown, a putative subject of the song “John Brown’s Body,” was drowned while attempting to ford the Rappahannock River with his unit of the 2d Battalion of Boston Light Infantry, Massachusetts Volunteer Militia.

John Brown's body lies a mouldering in the grave,
While weep the sons of bondage, whom he ventured all
to save ;
But, tho' he lost his life in struggling for the slave,
His Soul is marching on.
Chorus : Glory, Glory Hallelujah !
Glory, Glory Hallelujah !
Glory, Glory Hallelujah !
His Soul is marching on.

John Brown was a Hero undaunted, true and brave ;
And Kansas knew his valor, when he fought her rights
to save ;
And now, though the grass grows green above his grave,
His Soul is marching on. Glory, &c.

He captured Harper's Ferry with his nineteen men so true,
And he frightened Old Virginy, till she trembled
through and through.
They hung him for a traitor : themselves a Traitor crew ;
But his Soul is marching on. Glory, &c.

John Brown was John the Baptist of Christ we are to see,
Christ who of the bondman shall the Liberator be ;
And soon, throughout the Sunny South, the slaves
shall all be free :
For, his Soul is marching on ! Glory, &c.

The conflict that he heralded, he looks from Heaven to view
On the army of the Union, with his Flag, red, white and blue,
And Heaven shall ring with anthems o'er the deed ;
they mean to do :
For, his Soul is marching on. Glory, &c.

Ye, Soldiers of Freedom, then strike, while strike ye may,
The death-blow of Oppression, in a better time and way ;
For, the dawn of Old John Brown has brightened into day,
And his Soul is marching on. Glory, &c.

(Note well that these gallows-humorous soldiers were already singing about the body of their sergeant lying a mouldering in the grave, while Sgt. Brown was still alive and kicking in their regiment.)

Nathaniel Hawthorne placed an essay on the civil war, “Chiefly about War Matters,” in The Atlantic Monthly. Some remarks he thought to make were censored by James Thomas Fields of Ticknor & Fields, the publisher of the magazine, with Hawthorne’s prior consent, as just too outrageous to publish during a war situation. Fields evidently had, however, no objection to Hawthorne’s revealing how utterly he had been at odds with Emerson’s and Thoreau’s attitude toward John Brown while his execution had been pending in late 1859.

I shall not pretend to be an admirer of old John Brown, any farther than sympathy with Whittier’s excellent ballad about him may go; nor did I expect ever to shrink so unutterably from any apophthegm of a sage, whose happy lips have uttered a hundred gold sentences, as from that saying (perhaps falsely attributed to so honored a source), that the death of this blood-stained fanatic has “made the Gallows as venerable as the Cross!” Nobody was ever more justly hanged.

HANGING

JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

In the course of this article Hawthorne alleged something we have no reason whatever to believe to be true, and indeed, something we have no reason to believe was ever suggested by any evidence, to wit, that after bringing over the white people, the Mayflower had been used as a black slaver, a negrero.

Hawthorne, whose politics had always been anti-negro and pro-slavery, was evidently the sort of guy who made up this sort of stuff up as he went along. At this critical juncture in the Civil War –the North toying with the idea of re-defining the war into a noble purpose in order to get it won– he was deliberately stirring the waters to make them muddier.

There is an historical circumstance, known to few, that connects the children of the Puritans with these Africans of Virginia in a very singular way. They are our brethren, as being lineal descendants from the Mayflower, the fated womb of which, in her first voyage, sent forth a brood of Pilgrims on Plymouth Rock, and, in a subsequent one, spawned slaves upon the Southern soil, – a monstrous birth, but with which we have an instinctive sense of kindred, and so are stirred by an irresistible impulse to attempt their rescue, even at the cost of blood and ruin. The character of our sacred ship, I fear, may suffer a little by this revelation; but we must let her white progeny offset her dark one, – and two such portents never sprang from an identical source before.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

August 7, Thursday: In England, when John Doidge was hanged in the final public execution in Cornwall, their necks being afflicted by a stiffness, two ladies persuaded the hangman to place the corpse's dead hands upon their stiff necks. This would be the last occasion on which a person was hanged in England in public, and also would be the final occasion (of record) on which that legendary and macabre cure for neck stiffness would be enacted.

THE MARKET FOR HUMAN BODY PARTS

FINAL EXECUTIONS
March 8, 1862	Captain Nathaniel Gordon	had been smuggling fresh slaves into the USA, hanged for this (classified as piracy)
August 7, 1862	John Doidge	hanged in the final public execution in Cornwall
April 2, 1868	Francis Kidder	last woman to be hanged at a place of public execution (as opposed to inside a prison) in England

August 8, Friday: At Weymouth on May 3d, 1860 the pregnant Betsy Frances Tirrell had ingested 10 grains of strychnine in preserved fruit, supplied to her by her fiancé George Canning Hersey under the pretense that this deadly poison would merely produce miscarriage. Tirrell had been convicted of murder.

TRANSCRIPT OF THE TRIAL

The accused was hanged in the rotunda of Dedham jail at about the center of the north side, between the wings, on this morning, on the same gallows upon which Washington Goode, James McGee, and John White Webster had been hung. The rope used was a small cord of Italian flax that had been tested with a weight of 3,400 pounds. Hersey declined to make a statement prior to execution but left a written confession protesting only that he had not also, as suspected, poisoned his wife Emeline Hersey, or poisoned Mary Tirrell. Hersey was 29 years of age at the point of his death.

“HISTORICAL PERSPECTIVE” BEING A VIEW FROM A PARTICULAR POINT IN TIME (JUST AS THE PERSPECTIVE IN A PAINTING IS A VIEW FROM A PARTICULAR POINT IN SPACE), TO “LOOK AT THE COURSE OF HISTORY MORE GENERALLY” WOULD BE TO SACRIFICE PERSPECTIVE ALTOGETHER. THIS IS FANTASY-LAND, YOU’RE FOOLING YOURSELF. THERE CANNOT BE ANY SUCH THINGIE, AS SUCH A PERSPECTIVE.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

October: After the last battle of the race war in Minnesota, Colonel Henry Hastings Sibley's white troops assembled at the Hazelwood Republic of farmer Dakotas who had taken no part in the fighting. You will remember Sibley, he was one of those who fed at the trough when the Dakotas were cheated in 1851. His cut had been $145,000.⁰⁰ so of course it would be much better if the people he had cheated were dead.

But these were not hostiles, these were the Christian Indians led by the Presbyterian missionary Riggs, by Mazakutemane "Walks Shooting Iron" and by his brother Man of the Clouds \(Ma-hpi-ya-wi-ca-sta\) \(L.O. Skyman\), the first Minnesota pacifist. These were farmers from the farmlands of the Hazelwood Republic of Christian Indians in the reservation on the south bank of the Minnesota River, who had sheltered white neighbors and had welcomed the arrival of Sibley's army of white men because this meant that their friends were safe.

The general ordered them to be loaded onto farm wagons and taken off to the Pike Island Aggregation Facility so they could be held under the grapeshot-loaded cannon of Fort Snelling as hostages against the good behavior of any hostiles not yet in captivity. Wikanhpiwastewin "Good Star Woman," a little girl hidden by her father under a buffalo robe on the floor of a wagon, peeked out as they passed through Henderson MN and later recorded that

The people brought poles, pitchforks, and axes and hit some of the women and children in the wagons.

Those who were killed or otherwise died on the way to Fort Snelling were buried at night in hidden graves, so the white farmers could not dig them up to obtain scalps for the State reward money.

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Coincidentally, or conveniently, Colonel Sibley had written to his wife that

My heart is hardened against them beyond any touch of mercy.

We may be pardoned for noting here that a better rôle for Henry Hastings Sibley, one which would have made his descendants here less ashamed for him, would have been for him to have comported himself in such a manner that the race war had not occurred.

His soldiers promptly organized a prisoner-of-war column to march all these people who were of the wrong

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

color for the new Minnesota, to the Pike Island Sequestration Facility⁴⁷⁷ that had just been established by building a high board fence around two or three acres of public land below the guns of Fort Snelling — land originally claimed by Zebulon Montgomery Pike on September 23, 1805 and about the only place remaining in the state of Minnesota where Dakotas could be reasonably safe from being murdered by bands of white settlers who were preparing to seize their farmlands without compensation.

477. I first termed this a “concentration camp,” only to be met by extreme hostility. Local people interrupted to demand how I could prove that the people in this compound were being intentionally exterminated, and I had to respond by arguing definitions. I tried to offer that a “concentration camp” was simply a place where people were put to get them out of circulation, en masse, on the basis of race or creed or ethnic background. But the hostility did not diminish—for evidently only the bad people full of hatred who are our enemies create concentration camps—so I am now using the term of choice employed by the Smithsonian Institution of Washington DC: “sequestration.”

STATE MURDER

White justice arrived, and as is usual in such cases, required exemplary executions from among captive ethnic leaders. The US Army would line up the heads of Dakota families and run them through the procedure in a log cabin at a rate of better than one every fifteen minutes, for a number of days. Some days they would process 40 prisoners. It was quite a scene at the “courthouse” of the Lower Sioux Agency, that Henry Thoreau had visited a couple of years before.

STATE MURDER

Although the missionary Riggs told them which ones to “try,” basically this court’s selection procedure was that they “tried” regardless of age and condemned to death whoever had stepped forward when heads of families to step forward and receive rations for their families, usually excusing the personages that a white man (man, not woman) spoke up for. Contrary to the usual procedure in courts martial, they didn’t bother to assign a junior officer to pretend to be counsel for the accused. The most obvious exception to this was a black man who had been living with the Dakotas and who, as an ex-slave, had enthusiastically taken part in the slaughters. Him they spared — for evidently they were only interested in killing Indians to frighten Indians and evidently they figured

• MAKERS OF MINNESOTA •

Sponsored by the Minnesota Historical Society

Zebulon M. Pike

SOLDIER, EXPLORER.

IN 1805 PIKE, A YOUNG ARMY OFFICER, WAS DIRECTED BY THE U.S. GOVERNMENT TO LEAD AN EXPEDITION TO THE MISSISSIPPI AT ITS SOURCE, MAKE PEACE BETWEEN THE SIOUX AND CHIPPEWA, AND SELECT SITES FOR MILITARY POSTS. HE ACQUIRED 155,220 ACRES OF LAND FROM THE INDIANS, PAYING $1.28 PER ACRE!

A BRONZE TABLET ON THE ROUND TOWER AT FORT SNELLING HONORS PIKE, WHO ON SEPT. 23 1805, ACQUIRED FOR THE GOVERNMENT, BY TREATY WITH THE SIOUX INDIANS, THE SITE OF FORT SNELLING!!

PIKE'S PEAK IN COLORADO WAS NAMED FOR ZEBULON PIKE WHO MADE AN UN-SUCCESSFUL ATTEMPT TO SCALE THE PEAK.

PIKE AND HIS PARTY ARRIVED AT RED CEDAR LAKE (NOW CASS LAKE) ON FEB. 12 1806. HE THOUGHT THIS WAS THE SOURCE OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

there wasn't any constituency they could frighten by offering the hemp to a black man.

In regard to the mistake by which Chaska was hanged instead of another [Chaskadon, who had killed a pregnant woman and ripped out her fetus], I doubt whether I can satisfactorily explain it.... I do not think anyone was to blame. We all regretted the mistake very much.

-The Reverend Stephen Riggs, in a letter to a white woman whose life Chaska had saved, who had indignantly and loudly spoken out in his defense but to no avail

At a prison in Mankato, the more than three hundred Indians whose death sentences had been commuted, plus those who had been given prison terms, also experienced a mass religious conversion. Dr. Thomas Williamson from the Upper Agency, the father of the missionary who was saving souls at Fort Snelling, preached every Sunday. During the week, Robert Hopkins, a Christian mixed-blood, held three daily prayer sessions. The guards were permitted to remove the chains from the Indians so they could participate in these services, and they prayed and sang for hours at a time. They studied the English language, as though by learning to read and write, they could absorb the white man's power.

Williamson and Gideon Pond, a Presbyterian minister, baptized 274 of the prisoners. Pond recalled that some of the Indians told him that "their whole lives had been wicked, that they had adhered to the superstitions of their ancestors until they had reduced themselves to their present state of wretchedness and ruin. They declared that they had left it all, and will leave all forever; that they do and will embrace the religion of Jesus Christ, and adhere to it as long as they live.... They say that before they came to this state of mind, this determination, their hearts failed them with fear, but now they have much mental ease and comfort." The Indians would soon need all the mental comfort they could muster.

November 5, Wednesday: President Abraham Lincoln named Ambrose E. Burnside as commander of the Army of the Potomac, replacing McClellan.

At the end of the Military Commission "trial" in Minnesota 303 of the 392 surrendered Dakota warriors had been condemned to be hanged.

RACE WAR IN MINNESOTA

The Hanging of the Sioux Murderers.

AFTER the battle of Wood Lake between the soldiers, under Gen. H. H. Sibley, and the Indians, under Little Crow, 2,000 Indians surrendered. The Sioux warriors were all arraigned before a military commission, consisting of Col. Wm. Crooks, Lieut. Col. Wm. R. Marshall and Capt. H.

P. Grant, with I. V. D. Heard as judge advocate. The commission completed its work November 5, 1862, and condemned three hundred and three of the culprits to death. They were at once removed to South Bend, on the Minnesota River. Their families and the other Indians were taken to Fort Snelling and confined all winter in a stockade. The condemned Indians were shortly removed to Mankato and confined in a large stone warehouse, which is shown at the left in the picture. President Lincoln was prevailed upon by Eastern people to mitigate the sentence of most of the murderers. He ordered that thirty-nine should be hung, and the others imprisoned.¹

1. Bear in mind that the term "Sioux warriors" here is a term of art that merely means "male Dakotas," for some of these captives were little boys who had accompanied their fathers but had taken no part whatever in the fighting.

December 5, Friday: President Abraham Lincoln issued execution orders on 38 out of the 303 Dakotas who had been condemned by the army to be hanged in Minnesota. This was set to be the largest mass execution in US history.⁴⁷⁸

RACE WAR IN MINNESOTA

Check your history books on this one, folks. You will find that you are being told that this was an act of kindness on the part of the President — by hanging many he was preventing his army from hanging all!

"...The conflicts of Europeans with American-Indians, Maoris and other aborigines in temperate regions ... if we judge by the results we cannot regret that such wars have taken place ... the process by which the American continent has been acquired for European civilization [was entirely justified because] there is a very great and undeniable difference between the civilization of the colonizers and that of the dispossessed natives...."

— Bertrand Russell,

THE ETHICS OF WAR, January 1915

Bertrand Russell

478. In the case of one of these 26 the sentence of death would be commuted upon the production of new evidence.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Ordered that of the Indians and Half-breed sentenced to be hanged by the Military Commission, composed of Colonel Crockett, Lt. Colonel Marshall, Capt. Sprunt, Captain Bailey, and Lieutenant Olmstead, sitting in Minnesota, you were to be executed on Friday the nineteenth day of December, instant, the following names, to-wit:

- "Ch-hu-haa-mu-chai" No. 3. by the record.
- "Sajo" alias "Pian-doo-tai" No. 4. by the record.
- "My-a-tah-to-wah" No. 5. by the record.
- "Kin-han-shoon-ko-yag." No. 6. by the record.
- "Muy-ga-kon-a-shi" No. 10. by the record.
- "Wah-pag-shi-tai" No. 11. by the record.
- "Na-ke-kuei" No. 12. by the record.
- "Anu-ma-mi" No. 14. by the record.
- "Ch-te-mi-ha" No. 15. by the record.
- "Paa-in-yau-kna" No. 19. by the record.
- "Do-wu-pai" No. 23. by the record.
- "Kau-pau" No. 24. by the record.
- "Shooi-kw-a-hu" (White dog). No. 35. by the record.
- "Sow-kow-a-chu-toy-mu" No. 67. by the record.
- "Lo-loy-hoo-loy" No. 68. by the record.
- "Hou-dai-chai" No. 69. by the record.
- "Kau-pau-dou-or, Kuum-mu-ho-tai" No. 70. by the record.
- "Mak-pa-o-kw-hu-jii" No. 96. by the record.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

"Henry Mierow" a Kuy. name.	Nº 115. by the name.
"Cheskey-awaw" or "Cheskey-chay".	Nº 121. by the name.
"Dupleto Camp" or "a Kuy. name."	Nº 138. by the name.
"Jah kar-kay-gay."	Nº 155. by the name.
"Kaw-pink-paw."	Nº 170 by the name.
"Koypolik Ango" a Kuy. name.	Nº 175 by the name.
"Kaw-pay-shiw."	Nº 178. by the name.
"Naw-Kaw-law Kai."	Nº 210. by the name.
"Tow-Kaw-Kaw-gay-a-naw-jin."	Nº 235. by the name.
"Mar-Kat-u-naw-jin."	Nº 254. by the name.
"Pa-yeu-koo-lay-mar-nai."	Nº 264. by the name.
"Ja-tay-haw-dow."	Nº 275. by the name.
"Na-She-Choon" or "Tow-kaw-shikaw-shikaw-maw-hay."	Nº 318 - by the name.

STATE MURDER

"A-e-cha-yai"
 "Haw-low-in-koo."
 "Chay-low-hoon-kaw."
 "Chaw-ka-koo."
 "Haw-hin-tuday."
 "O-yay-tay-a-koo."
 "May-hoo-way-wa."
 "Ho-kin-yow-hai."

"The other condemned prisoners you will hold subject to further orders, taking care that they neither escape, nor, ^{and} subjected to any unlawful violence.

Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States.

STATE MURDER

No 337 - by the record.
 No 338. by the record.
 No 342. by the record.
 No 351. by the record.
 No 373. by the record.
 No 377. by the record.
 No 382. by the record.
 No 383 by the record

Execution Instructions from "Executive Mansion"

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

December 26, Friday: Richard Wagner conducted music from his unperformed music-dramas Das Rheingold, Die Walküre, and Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg in Vienna in a concert attended by the Empress of Austria.

LISTEN TO IT NOW

Confederate President Jefferson Davis addressed the state legislature in Jackson, Mississippi.

US CIVIL WAR

Witnessing the 38 hangings of natives and half-breeds ordered by President Abraham Lincoln in Mankato, Minnesota, allegedly, was a worker in a traveling circus, Albert Woolson, 15 years of age, who would enlist as a drummer boy and would eventually become the last survivor of the Union Army, dying in 1956 at the age of 106 (allegedly, that is, unless all these memories were merely part of some elaborate extended circus con). The hangings were carried out to the cheers of a local crowd. After the mass murder the bodies were disposed of in a mass grave, but that night several local doctors would dig them back up as unprotected objects for dissection.⁴⁷⁹

RACE WAR IN MINNESOTA

The decomposing bodies of Indians evidently made the most excellent fertilizer, for in the panorama description of the aftermath of the Sioux War, white maidens in party dresses were only needing to shake the

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

479. The famous medico sons of Dr. William Mayo, in particular, would learn their osteology by studying the skeleton of Marpiya Okinajin, or “Cut Nose,” and a specimen of his skin would be preserved in a white museum.

Whether anyone learned more than osteology from this curious contact with the native Other is presently unknown.

THE MARKET FOR HUMAN BODY PARTS

HDT

WHAT?

INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

trees in order to produce a plentiful crop of white babies:

STATE MURDER

1863

Execution of women had somehow fallen out of favor in England. However, in this year 27-year-old Alice Holt would be hanged in Chester for having murdered her mother.

In California, the US Army hanged 5 native Americans all in a row.

Texas, a district not known for its compassion, executed Chipita Rodriguez for having murdered a horse trader. Texas, a district known for its chivalry, has not executed any woman since that point, that is, until Governor Bush recently executed by lethal injection Karla Faye Tucker:

COLDBLOODED MURDER

Famous Last Words:

"What school is more profitably instructive than the death-bed of the righteous, impressing the understanding with a convincing evidence, that they have not followed cunningly devised fables, but solid substantial truth."

— A COLLECTION OF MEMORIALS CONCERNING DIVERS DECEASED MINISTERS, Philadelphia, 1787

"The death bed scenes & observations even of the best & wisest afford but a sorry picture of our humanity. Some men endeavor to live a constrained life — to subject their whole lives to their will as he who said he might give a sign if he were conscious after his head was cut off — but he gave no sign Dwell as near as possible to the channel in which your life flows."

—Thoreau's JOURNAL, March 12, 1853

1932	George Eastman	Suicide note — he shot himself.	"My work is done. Why wait?"
1936	George V, King of England	It was suggested that he might recuperate at Bogner Regis	"Bugger Bogner."
1945	Franklin Delano Roosevelt	having a massive cerebral hemorrhage	"I have a terrific headache."
1945	Adolf Hitler	as hypothesized by Kurt Vonnegut	"I never asked to be born in the first place."
1946	Alfred Rosenberg	hangman asked if he had last words	"No."
1977	Gary Gilmore	being inventively executed	"Let's do it."
1997	Diana, Princess of Wales	per French police records	"My God. What's happened?"
1998	Karla Fay Tucker	Governor George W. Bush refused requests from Christian organizations based upon her alleged conversion	"I am going to be face to face with Jesus now.... I will see you all when you get there. I will wait for you."

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

... other famous last words ...

July 3, Friday: The end of the administration of Sir Edward Hay Drummond Hay as governor of St. Helena, and the beginning of the administration of Admiral Sir Charles Elliot.

Giacomo Meyerbeer received a letter from Cosima von Bülow asking him to become an honorary member of a new music society in Berlin (he would accept).

Slavimo slavno slaveni! for male chorus and organ by Franz Liszt to words of Pucic was performed for the initial time, in Rome, for the millennium celebration of St. Cyril and St. Methodius.

After the race war it was open season in Minnesota. Near Hutchinson, an Indian man and boy were detected by a Minnesota farmer picking raspberries in the dusk near a poplar grove adjoining Scattered Lake, so of course the farmer stalked them with a rifle. He was able to get one from ambush, first in the groin and then in the chest. The boy could be heard crawling through the bushes to him, giving him water, covering him with a blanket, and the farmer was able to hear him saying something to the boy. Later it became clear that they had been a 53-year-old father and his 16-year-old son, and that before crawling away through the bushes the boy had taken a fresh pair of moccasins from a pouch and placed them on his father's feet. No-one had been able to get a clear shot at him. The orphan would be soon caught starving by the army, after having managed with his last cartridge to kill a wolf to gnaw upon, and he would readily confess that he was Wowinape "The Appearing One" or "Thomas Wakeman," son of headman Taoyateduta Little Crow "Our Red Nation," and that it had been he, that dusk, who had been the other raspberry picker who had gotten away.⁴⁸⁰ The boy would turn 17 years old by the time he would be tried and sentenced by a military court to be hanged.⁴⁸¹ After being released from the Sequestration Facility to the Indian reservation, Thomas Wakeman, a Presbyterian, would 480. Wowinape's account is in the St. Peter Tribune of August 19, 1863.

481. He would then be reprieved as he had committed no offense other than being with his father when his father was killed. The crippled father also had committed no offense, having great difficulty holding a weapon and always having spoken for moderation and restraint and accommodation and negotiation — but then he was already dead and his name was already detested and his body parts were already objects of contempt and it didn't matter.

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

devote his life to the YMCA.

But the above is not important as it was not what was happening to white people. (Only what happens to white people is important.)

At 2:00PM after an artillery duel lasting an hour, 13,000 Confederate assaulted the Union center on Cemetery Ridge at Gettysburg and were repulsed with heavy losses. In the largest battle ever fought in the Western Hemisphere 7,058 people were lying dead and 33,264 had been wounded, and 10,790 were missing (many of these would have been prisoners).

US CIVIL WAR

A report from Walt Whitman:

"Specimen Days"

This forenoon, for more than an hour, again long strings of cavalry, several regiments, very fine men and horses, four or five abreast. I saw them in Fourteenth street, coming in town from north. Several hundred extra horses, some of the mares with colts, trotting along. (Appear'd to be a number of prisoners too.) How inspiring always the cavalry regiments. Our men are generally well mounted, feel good, are young, gay on the saddle, their blankets in a roll behind them, their sabres clanking at their sides. This noise and movement and the tramp of many horses' hoofs has a curious effect upon one. The bugles play – presently you hear them afar off, deaden'd, mix'd with other noises. Then just as they had all pass'd, a string of ambulances commenc'd from the other [Page 729] way, moving up Fourteenth street north, slowly wending along, bearing a large lot of wounded to the hospitals.

US CIVIL WAR

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

July 13, Monday through July 16, Thursday: Antebellum white anti-slavery people were forced to have categorically excessive positive feelings for the American black as victim, because the race issue was so troublesome and dangerous that the only alternative attitude available to them would have been an unacceptably bitter resentment of American blacks in all their troublesomeness. In fact this submerged resentment did from time to time come to the surface, as in the New-York anti-draft riot of this summer, and ever and again would need to be pushed down into the cultural unconsciousness.

US CIVIL WAR

During this 4-day period in steamy New-York, a largely Irish proslavery Copperhead mob attacked the Colored Orphan Asylum at 5th Avenue and 43d Street, driving the orphans into the street. One of the orphans, 10 year old, by the name of Jane Barry, was killed when the rioters were heaving a bureau out of a window and by accident it landed on top of her.

TIMELINE OF ACCIDENTS

During the 4 days in which this sort of thing would be going on, the mob would also lynch some citizens of African descent, lightening people up by hanging them from lamp-posts. Sometimes they lightened them up by cutting off their fingers and toes.

THE MARKET FOR HUMAN BODY PARTS

In regard to a Mr. William Jones whom they hanged from a tree on Clarkson Street, they lit a fire beneath him as he swung. After they had strongarmed a disabled black coachman by the name of Abraham Franklin from his home and strung him up in this manner, an 18-year-old Irishman by the name of Patrick Butler dragged the corpse of Abraham Franklin through the streets by its genitals, to general applause. The mob drove some blacks into the river, where they drowned. The Roman Catholic bishop there, John Joseph Hughes, who had been born in Ireland, helped bring this to a stop, but mostly, what brought it to a stop was the arrival of US

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Army troops still alive after an intense struggle which had taken place at Gettysburg PA (July 2d and 3d) to take military control over the streets of the city.⁴⁸² For these four days the city police made themselves very scarce –precisely as the white-dominated LAPD would make itself scarce while the 1992 riots in LA were starting, though perhaps for quite opposite tactical reasons– while these gangs of “outraged citizens” went into black neighborhoods and set them to the torch. The question of the day among these outraged whites was, “Is it not outrageous that Irish men are being drafted by the Union government in Washington DC, merely to send them off and endanger their precious lives in order to obtain freedom for these unworthy black people?” In other words, these race riots were draft riots, with anger directed against the distant government that was offering to let rich men escape the draft for a cash payment of $300, and yet were redirected against innocent and helpless local people.

482. This factoid has been offered by some in a demonstration that it is not categorically correct to presume that during this period, due to the intensity of the economic competition, the American Irish were hopelessly hostile to American blacks on a racial basis. If it makes you feel better to suppose this, fine, but factor into your thinking that once upon a time during a correspondence with the convert to Catholicism Orestes Augustus Brownson, Archbishop John Joseph Hughes declared himself as perplexed and frustrated at the insanity of a crusade to end human enslavement in America:

[S]ometimes it has appeared to us that abolitionism ... stands in need of a strait jacket and the humane protection of a lunatic asylum.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

The complex of events would be described by Herman Melville in “The House-Top: A Night Piece”:

No sleep. The sultriness pervades the air
And blinds the brain — a dense oppression, such
As tawny tigers feel in matted shades,
Vexing their blood and making apt for ravage.
Beneath the stars the roofy desert spreads Vacant as Libya. All is hushed near by.
Yet fitfully from far breaks a mixed surf
Of muffled sound, the Atheist roar of riot.
Yonder, where parching Sirius set in drought,
Balefully glares red Arson — there — and there.
The town is taken by its rats — ship-rats
And rats of the wharves. All civil charms
And priestly spells which late held hearts in awe —
Fear-bound, subjected to a better sway
Than sway of self; these like a dream dissolve
And man rebounds whole aeons back in nature.
Hail to the low dull rumble, dull and dead,
And ponderous drag that jars the wall.
Wise Draco comes, deep in the midnight roll
Of black artillery; he comes, though late;
In code corroborating Calvin's creed
And cynic tyrannies of honest kings;
He comes, nor parlies; and the Town, redeemed,
Gives thanks devout; nor, being thankful, heeds
The grimy slur on the Republic's faith implied,
Which holds that man is naturally good,
And — more — is Nature's Roman, never to be scourged.

The rioters, it would turn out, had been able to disrupt police communications merely by clipping single telegraph lines. This would have the effect of forcing the police to become intensely aware of their need to establish multiple independent routes for information flow: redundancy. And it was this sort of concern for the reliability which comes only through redundancy which would eventually lead to Dr. Douglas C. Engelbart's proposal in 1950 that we establish a national information network. Just as it was the police in 1863 that first grasped the need for local redundancy, it would be the military in 1950 that would first grasp the need for national redundancy. This was achieved by asking the military hard questions such as “How does the East Coast give orders to the West Coast after Castro has taken out the Midwest?” and the result would be an item in the development of ELECTRIC WALDEN technology, the military ARPAnet of 1969.

Commenting on the Scorsese movie “Gangs of New York”:
“In my own research of New York history, through first-person accounts and newspaper reports, I have found that our past was often at least as violent and squalid, if not more so, than the movie depicts.”

— Kevin Baker

Eric Foner refers to this event as “the largest civil insurrection in American history other than the South's rebellion. Nevertheless it has been the sort of non-event which Mary McCarthy, writing in 1946, would term, like Hiroshima and Nagasaki, the phenomenon of the “hole in human history.” There is such a hole in human history, it would seem, at every point at which an atrocity has been committed by some group which then “won.” —For instance, the hole in Concord history which resulted from the racial mass murder on the watershed of Walden Pond as of the Massachusetts race war in 1675-1676.—For instance, the hole in human history which resulted from the use of Christian Dakota as hostages during this race war of 1863. Writing thirty years after the fact of Hiroshima and Nagasaki, Ralph Lapp, who had worked on the A-bomb, would ask “If the memory of things is to deter, where is that memory?” He would add that “Hiroshima has been taken out of the American conscience, eviscerated, extirpated.” We might easily say “The New-York draft riot of 1863 has been taken out of the American conscience, eviscerated, extirpated.”

Speaking of holes in American history, one hole was left when the bulk of the private papers of Friend Isaac T. Hopper were destroyed in the sacking and torching of the home of his daughter Abby Hopper Gibbons. The home was known to the Copperhead rioters to have been one that had housed antislavery activists. Abby herself was not endangered by the proslavery New-York rioters because at the time she was nursing wounded at the front. However, we have been forced to reconstruct the detail of Friend Hopper's life out of what Lydia Maria Child had included in her 1853 biography of him.⁴⁸³

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Here are these New-York draft riots, as they would be described in Frederick Douglass's 1893 LIFE AND TIMES:

This [race prejudice] was especially true of New York, where there was a large Irish population. The attempt to enforce the draft in that city was met by mobs, riot, and bloodshed ... the Irish began to hang, stab, and murder the negroes in New York.

Douglass had come to detest the American Irish and lower-class Catholics in general. At one point he would become reflective, attempting to figure out why it was that these marginal whites were "among our bitterest persecutors." Here is his rumination, in which, to put the matter in the vernacular, his concept was simply that what had been going around had been coming around:

It is said that a negro always makes the most cruel negro driver.... The Irishman has been persecuted for his religion about as rigorously as the black man has been for his color.

* * *

They [the immigrant Irish, arriving as foreigners] are taught to believe that he [the native-born American negroes] eats the bread that belongs to them.

What Douglass had to say to Ireland in 1893, by way of amelioration of this hostile standoff, was utterly blunt and hostile:

[S]end no more such children here.

(For background, on the following screens appears the article "The Conscription a Great National Benefit"

483. Lydia Maria Child. ISAAC T. HOPPER: A TRUE LIFE (Boston: Jewett)

A TRUE LIFE

STATE MURDER

as it was printed on this day in The New-York Times.)

STATE MURDER

The New York Times
"May you live in interesting times."

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

The National Enrollment Act, the enforcement of which was commenced in this City on Saturday, will be carried into execution until the quota of the State of New York and of every State in the Union shall be raised and in the field. It may not be necessary that a man of those drafted shall ever go into line of battle during this war. Yet it is a national blessing that the Conscription has been imposed. It is a matter of prime concern that it should now be settled, once for all, whether this Government is or is not strong enough to compel military service in its defence. More than any other one thing, this will determine our durability as a Republic and our formidableness as a nation. Once establish that not only the property, but the personal military service of every able-bodied citizen is at the command of the national authorities, constitutionally exercised, and both successful rebellion and successful invasion are at once made impossible for all time to come. From that time it will be set down as a known fact that the United States is the most solidly based Government on the face of the earth.

The standing reproach against the Republican form of government hitherto has been, that its superior freedom was obtained at the expense of its security. It has been deemed a very comfortable sort of Government for fair weather, but quite unfit for a storm. A Federal Republic, made up like ours of distinct States, has been considered particularly weak. Every philosophical writer who has treated of our institutions, has put his finger upon the weakness of the central authority as the special reason for doubting their perpetuity. De Tocqueville himself, much as he admired our constitutional system, did not hesitate to say, "It appears to me unquestionable that if any portion of the Union seriously desired to separate itself from the other States, they would not be able, nor indeed would they attempt, to prevent it." and to illustrate the helplessness of the federal authority, he cites from a letter of Jefferson's to Lafayette the statement that, "during the War of 1812, four of the Eastern States were only attached to the Union like so many inanimate bodies to living men." Everybody knows that one of the chief embarrassments of that war was the unwillingness of some of the State authorities to surrender the control of their military forces to the Federal Executive. Another of these embarrassments was the great difficulty of keeping the armies up to the necessary figure, notwithstanding extraordinary bounties for the encouragement of the enlistments. The Secretary of War, at that period, in his strait for soldiers, proposed a Conscription system, but it was deemed by Congress dangerous and impracticable, and hardly obtained a hearing.

In fact, up to the last year the popular mind had scarcely bethought itself for a moment that the power of an unlimited Conscription was, with the sanction of Congress, one of the living powers of the government in time of war. The general notion was that Conscription was a feature that belonged exclusively to despotic Governments, and that the American reliance could only be upon volunteered effort, as prompted by patriotic feeling or pecuniary inducements. It was not until the second year of this terrible rebellion that the public mind began seriously to question whether it would answer to depend entirely upon these precarious stimulants; and even then it began to question only in a whisper. Even the boldest shrank; for they well understood how quickly the factious enemies of the Government would seize upon the old hated word Conscription, and do their best with it to make the war itself odious. But as the war lingered on without result, the Government gradually braced itself up to the responsibility of demanding under the mild name of a National Enrollment bill, what was in reality nothing less than a Conscription law on the European model. Congress, after deliberation, framed and passed such a law. The great practical question now to be determined is whether such a law can be sustained or not in other words, whether this American Republic has or has not the plenary power of its own defence which is possessed by a European monarchy.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

For a time after the act was passed, the chiefs of faction were free in their threats that any attempt to carry it out should be resisted by force and arms. In some few localities they succeeded in working up popular passion against its first processes, even to a fighting place; but it was very quickly made apparent that the people at large would never sustain any such resort to violence, and that it was worse than idle to contend thus with the Government. Since then, the talk of these factionists on the platform and in their newspaper organs has been that the appeal shall be carried to the ballot-box. They flatter themselves that, by working diligently upon the basest motives and meanest prejudices, they can secure popular majorities that will force a repeal of the measure, or at least deter the Government from carrying it out to its complete execution.

Well, let them do their worst. We want it determined whether the majority of the American people can be induced by any such influences to abandon the cause of their country. So far as the Government itself is concerned, we have no fear that it will fail to do its duty. Every day adds new evidence that it means to go straight on to the complete enforcement of the act. The world will now have a better chance to judge than ever before what the real strength of this Republic is. And unless we greatly mistake, it will be seen that an overwhelming majority of the people will stand by the Government in this exercise of the mightiest of its powers; and will show a proud satisfaction in demonstrating that freemen are as capable as subjects and serfs of abiding any needful requirements for the national safety. No people on the face of the earth have such reason to submit to the extremist sacrifices for the salvation of their Government; and, if conscription be necessary to replenish its struggling armies, no population, we undertake to say, has ever endured it with more patience or cheerfulness than the American people will now do. The Government is the people's Government, and the people will never consent that their Government shall suffer in a critical hour for the want of a power which is not grudged even the worse Government when its existence is threatened. When it is once understood that our national authority has the right, under the Constitution, to every dollar and every right arm in the country for its protection, and that the great people recognize and stand by that right, thenceforward, for all time to come this Republic will command a respect, both at home and abroad, far beyond any ever accorded to it before. It will be a new and priceless security against all future rebellion and wanton foreign attack.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

LABOR COMPETITION AND THE NEW YORK DRAFT RIOTS OF 1863

By Albon P. Man, Jr.

Journal of Negro History, Vol. XXXVI, No. 4, October 1951

The New York draft riots of July, 1863, had their origin largely in a fear of black labor competition which possessed the city's, Irish unskilled workers. Upon emancipation, they believed, great numbers of Negroes would cross the Mason-Dixon line, underbid them in the Northern labor market and deprive them of jobs. Similar fears helped produce mass anti-Negro violence in World Wars I and II, also periods of acute labor shortage. The movement of Negro strikebreakers into the East St. Louis, Illinois, area, for example, touched off the demonstrations which occurred there in July, 1917,⁴⁸⁴ while the upgrading of a few Negro employees signalled the start of the ugly Philadelphia transit strike of August, 1944.⁴⁸⁵

But the New York draft disturbances remain the bloodiest race riots of American history. Police figures on deaths among the white rioters ranged from 1,200 to 1,500, and it is impossible to know how many bodies of Negro victims of the lynch mobs were borne away by the waters on either side of Manhattan Island.⁴⁸⁶ Significantly, the Negro population of the metropolis dropped 20% between 1860 and 1865, declining from 12,472 to 9,945.⁴⁸⁷

This article will seek to answer some of the more important questions bearing upon the white workers' dread of labor competition from contrabands: What predictions as to the consequences of emancipation were made by pro-slavery politicians and journalists between the campaign of 1860 and the sultry week of July 12, 1863? How did abolitionists and Republicans try to allay the fear stirred up in the minds of white workers by opponents of emancipation? Did former slaves within Union lines in the South really wish to go northward at that time? Was there any appreciable migration to the North? In addition, this article will examine the actual, rather than anticipated, labor competition between whites and Negroes in various occupations in New York, with special attention to the crucial longshore field and to the anti-Negro violence which marked the waterfront strikes of 1855 and 1863.⁴⁸⁸ For that violence was to be repeated, intensified a thousandfold, in the draft riots immediately following the strikes of 1863.

At the outset, mention should be made of the fact that before the spurt in immigration in the decades of the forties and fifties, such occupations in New York as those of longshoremen, hod-carriers, brickmakers, whitewashers, coachmen, stablemen, porters, bootblacks, barbers, and waiters in hotels and restaurants had been almost wholly in the hands of colored men.⁴⁸⁹ Domestic maids, cooks, scullions, laundresses and seamstresses were generally colored women. They were secure in 484. Arna Bontemps and Jack Conroy, They Seek a City (Garden City, 1945), pp. 125-131.

485. New York Times, August 2-11, 14-18, 1944.

486. William Osborn Stoddard, The Volcano Under the City (New York, 1887), p. 293; New York Herald, July 18, 1863.

487. United States Census Office, 8th Census, 1860; Population of the United States in 1860 (Washington, 1864), pp. 335, 337.

488. For a preliminary but suggestive treatment of the subject of labor competition, see Williston H. Lofton, "Northern Labor and the Negro during the Civil War," Journal of Negro History, XXXIV (July, 1949), 251.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

these types of employment and earned relatively good wages. But with the huge influx of white foreigners, particularly after the Irish famine of 1846, their position changed radically.

The unskilled Irish swarmed into the menial occupations which had been monopolized by the colored. Offering to work for any wages they could obtain, they reduced the Negroes' earnings drastically and deprived many of employment.⁴⁹⁰

As Frederick Douglass wrote, admonishing Negroes to learn trades or perish: "Every hour sees the black man elbowed out of employment by some newly arrived emigrant whose hunger and whose color are thought to give him a better title to the place."⁴⁹¹ Thus the Irish themselves had earlier subjected Negroes to the same job rivalry that Democratic politicians and journalists prophesied would be offered to the Irish by former slaves from the South. To those dire predictions, especially as uttered during the election campaigns of 1860, 1861 and 1862 and after the Emancipation Proclamation and adoption of the draft act in March, 1863, we shall now turn.

At the Democratic rally on October 8, 1860, to ratify the coalition Douglas-Breckinridge-Bell slate of presidential electors in New York, James W. Gerard, prominent lawyer and candidate for Congress, ventured a typical prediction of intensified Negro-white labor competition in the event of emancipation.⁴⁹² He warned his listeners—above all, his "friends from Ireland" and immigrants from other countries—that the Republican party was an abolition party:

Abraham Lincoln, if honest to his party, means to do his best that the free men of the North shall make free the laboring population of the South. (Cries of "Never," and cheers.) ... I call upon all adopted citizens to stand up and vote against Abraham Lincoln, or you will have negro labor dragging you from your free labor.

Speaking again later in the month, Gerard returned to this theme, cautioning Irish and German laborers not to vote Republican lest in casting their ballots to exclude slavery, they "exclude bread from their own table."⁴⁹³

Likewise, General Leslie Combs, of Kentucky, declared at a Democratic mass meeting in New York during the campaign of 1860 that if the slaves in the South were liberated, they would come North and take away the jobs of white longshoremen and other laborers. He warned:

Let the four millions of slaves in the South be set at liberty, and left to their own free will and desires, and we should very soon have, not the great conflict so long predicted between free labor and slave labor, but a terrible conflict between white labor and black labor.

489. The New Moral World (Owenite newspaper), June 29, 1844, in John R. Commons et al., A Documentary History of American Industrial Society (Cleveland, 1910-1911), IX, 60, 61; G. E. Haynes, The Negro at Work in New York City (New York, 1912), pp. 67, 68, 97; A.A. Payne, "The Negro in New York prior to 1860," Howard Review, I (June, 1923), 1-64; Sterling D. Spero and Abram L. Harris, The Black Worker (New York, 1931), pp. 12, 13.

490. J.H. Harmon, A.G. Lindsay and C.G. Woodson, The Negro as a Business Man (Washington, 1929), p. 4; Lindsay, "The Economic Condition of the Negroes of New York Prior to 1861," Journal of Negro History, VI (April, 1921), 193-196; Charles E. Wesley, Negro Labor in the United States, 1850-1925 (New York, 1927), pp. 75-77.

491. Quoted in Charles E. Wesley, Negro Labor in the United States, 1850-1925 (New York, 1927), pp. 61, 62.

492. Herald, October 9, 1860.

493. Herald, October 28, 1860.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

*(Applause.) ... The unemployed slaves will be found among you in sufficient numbers to compete with you at your wharves and your docks, and in every branch of labor in which white people alone are now employed.*⁴⁹⁴

Pro-South business houses, too, brought pressure to bear upon their employees to vote for the fusion Democratic ticket, to preserve themselves from Negro competition.⁴⁹⁵

During the campaign of 1860, the virulently anti-Negro Herald also carried editorials foretelling catastrophe if Lincoln were elected. A wholesale exodus of four million Negroes from the South would occur. If they were anything like the fugitive slaves "of the most vicious and degraded, character" who had already emigrated to the North, it said on one occasion, they would refuse to work and would steal the fruits of Northern industry and burden Northern workers with taxes for their maintenance." The Herald did not hesitate to contradict itself in its arguments, however, for after dwelling one day upon the supposed laziness of freed Negroes, the tax burden for their support, and their criminal tendencies, on another day it would raise the spectre of job competition from apparently hard-working contrabands:

*Hundreds of thousands will emigrate to their friends - the republicans -- North, and be placed by them side by side in competition with white men. Are you ready to divide your patrimony with the negro? Are you ready to work with him in competition to work more than you do now for Less pay? If you are, vote for the republican candidate.*⁴⁹⁶

Similar to this was the final appeal of James Gordon Bennett, editor of the Herald, to Irish and German laborers on election day, 1860: "If Lincoln is elected to-day, you will have to compete with the labor of four million emancipated negroes.... The North will be flooded with free negroes, and the labor of the white man will be depreciated and degraded."⁴⁹⁷

Even the surge of patriotism which swept the city immediately after the attack on Port Sumter did not delete from Democratic newspapers the theme of Negro labor competition upon emancipation.⁴⁹⁸ It was reiterated by the demagogic Fernando Wood in campaigning for the office of mayor of New York in the fall of 1861. He charged that his Republican opponent was the candidate of a party which would fill regiments with Irish and German laborers and then bring Negroes North to take their jobs away.⁴⁹⁹ Wood also used the inconsistent argument that the support of contraband paupers in the North would be a crushing financial burden."⁵⁰⁰ He played upon fear of Negro labor competition most often in bidding for Irish votes.⁵⁰¹ In the mayoralty campaign of 1861 the Herald once more used its stock prediction of the displacement of white workers, notably the Irish, by black workers, should the Republicans prevail.⁵⁰²

494. Herald, October 25, 1860.

495. Basil Lea Lee, Discontent in New York City, 1861-1865 (Washington, 1943), p. 7.

496. Herald, October 1, 1860.

497. Herald, November 5, 1860.

498. Herald, November 6, 1860.

499. Herald, April 20, 1861; Irish American, May 24, 1861.

500. Herald, November 28, 1861; New York Tribune, November 28, 1861; Lee, op. cit., p. 289.

501. Herald, November 30, 1861; Tribune, November 30, 1861.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

In the interval between the campaigns of 1861 and 1862, there were few allusions by politicians and press to the danger of Negro labor competition in the event of emancipation. But with the appearance of the preliminary proclamation of emancipation in September, 1862, and the Seymour Wadsworth contest for the New York governorship that year, the old warnings were re-echoed. George Francis Train, the Irish nationalist, said that the abolitionists were "combining to manacle the white man" and were engaged in a "conspiracy against the Irish," whom they sought to degrade by placing Negroes to work beside the⁵⁰³ Another Irish-American leader, Richard O'Gorman, describing himself as "a sincere friend of the negro," spoke of the impolicy of freeing the black man from the civilizing restraints of servitude.⁵⁰⁴ "May not these poor people, joying their newly acquired freedom, swarm on us here in the North?" he asked.

Congressman Samuel S. Cox, of Ohio, felt sure that New Yorkers would elect the Democratic candidate for Governor, Horatio Seymour, because "they would never consent to have negroes compete with them. "I Indeed, he suggested that when whites and freed Negroes clashed in New York's labor market, blood would flow and colored men would get the worst of it.⁵⁰⁵ In his campaign pronouncements Seymour himself was more restrained in criticizing Lincoln's preliminary proclamation on the score of Negro labor competition.⁵⁰⁶ Of course, the Herald ran true to form editorials on the menace of Negro labor, addressed to Irish and German laborers. "The Irish and German immigrants, to say nothing of native laborers of the white race, must feel enraptured," Bennett wrote, "at the prospect of hordes of darkeys overrunning the Northern States and working for half wages, and thus ousting them from employment."⁵⁰⁷

Promulgation of the Emancipation Proclamation on January 1, 1863, and adoption of the conscription act on March 3, 1863, caused a new outburst. The rabid New York Weekly Caucasian rejoiced that the Proclamation had led the Metropolitan Record, which had been the official organ of the Catholic Archbishop of New York, to oppose the war and asserted that its course was generally approved by Irish Americans, who did not relish the thought of having Negroes on their economic level.⁵⁰⁸ The newly-formed Society for the Diffusion of Political Knowledge, an anti-emancipation propaganda group in New York City, published as its first pamphlet a letter written by Henry Clay twenty years before, depicting a horrible doom for white labor in the North if slavery were abolished. As Orestes A. Brownson, one of the few leading anti-slavery Catholics, wrote, Democratic leaders and journalists in this period convinced the Irish that in resisting the draft they were simply refusing to fight for their own economic suicide.⁵⁰⁹

How did Republicans and Abolitionists deal with these predictions of their opponents? In 1860 and 1861 they failed to 502. Harper's Weekly, V (December 21, 1861), 802, 803.

503. Herald, October 20, 31, November 27, 28, 1861.

504. Herald, September 24, 1862; Tribune, October 2, 1862; Irish American, October 11, 1862.

505. Herald, November 8, 1862.

506. Herald, October 29, 1862.

507. Herald, October 30, 1862; Tribune, October 30, 1862.

508. De Alva Stanwood Alexsinder, Political History of the State of New York (New York, 1906-1923), III, 27-29; Sidney D. Brummer, Political History of New York State during the Period of the Civil War (New York, 1911), pp. 238-240.

509. Herald, October 20, 1862; see also Herald, October 13, 21, November 1, 1862.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

answer them at all. In 1862, however, they began to grasp the fact that the labor competition argument was making a deep impression upon the working people of New York, particularly the Irish, and that it could no longer be allowed to go unchallenged. In fact, Horace Greeley declared on the eve of the election of 1862 that it was the most common argument advanced against the abolition of slavery.⁵¹⁰

From the summer of 1862 on, Greeley and other Republican and abolitionist leaders undertook to refute it on every possible occasion. Whatever Negroes had migrated to the North had done so to escape slavery, they said. Eliminate, slavery, and the movement northward would stop, the Negro having an exceptionally strong attachment to the locality in which he was born, according to General Hunter.⁵¹¹ Furthermore, with the terror of the auction block removed, the colored population of the North would go south, as it was by nature better suited to the climate there and more adept at raising cotton, tobacco, rice and sugar than earning a living at other pursuits in the North. It was therefore clearly to the interest of white workers, including Irish laborers, to support emancipation.⁵¹²

This was the approach of James S. Wadsworth, in his message in October, 1862, accepting the Union party's nomination for Governor of New York and defending Lincoln's preliminary proclamation against the Negro labor competition arguments. Daniel S. Dickinson, erstwhile Democratic leader, reasoned the same way, as did Secretary of War Stanton, Senator Charles Sumner, Governor John A. Andrew of Massachusetts, Major General Cassius M. Clay (who was most disturbed by the effect of the competition idea upon the Irish), and Robert Dale Owen.⁵¹³

Greeley also ridiculed the inconsistency of anti-emancipationists in contending that former slaves would work so hard and so cheaply that they would displace white men and then adding in the same breath that they would be indolent paupers whose upkeep would drain the public treasury.⁵¹⁴

In his extremely eloquent oration on the Emancipation Proclamation, on February 6, 1863, at the Cooper Institute, Frederick Douglass similarly heaped scorn upon such logic.⁵¹⁵ Once Greeley was bold enough to declare that even if there were an influx of fugitives into the North, it would not injure white workers, because the normal labor force of the North had been depleted by the demands of the army and needed supplementing.⁵¹⁶ The Negroes would produce as much as they would consume, he insisted, observing not very convincingly that they would, moreover, leave whites free to secure "higher, easier, better recompensed positions."⁵¹⁷

Lincoln himself took note of the Negro labor competition

510. New York Weekly Caucasian, March 28, 1863.

511. Society for the Diffusion of Political Knowledge, Papers (New York, 1863), no. 1.

512. Orestes Augustus Brownson, "Catholics and the Anti-draft Riots," Brownson's Quarterly Review, Third New York Series, IV (October 1863), 401.

513. Tribune, November 5, 1862.

514. Tribune, August 4, 1862.

515. Harper's Weekly, VI (August 23, 1862), 530, 531; Tribune, August 28, November 5, 1862; January 12, March 23, April 16, 1863; R. Dale Owen, J. McKays and Samuel G. Howe, Preliminary and also the Final Report of the American Freedmen's Inquiry Commission. United States Congress. Senate Executive Documents, No. 53, 38th Cong., 1st seas., p. 8, 1864.

516. Herald, October 6, 1862; Tribune, October 6, 23, 1862; Brummer, op. cit, pp. 238-240.

517. Tribune, October 7, 9, 22, November 24, December 5, 1862; Herald, October 8, 17, 1862.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

argument against the emancipation program in his message to Congress on December 1, 1862.⁵¹⁸ His answer was colonization: "Reduce the supply of black labor by colonizing the black laborers out of the country, and by precisely so much you increase the demand for, and the wages of, white labor." But Lincoln denied that even without the deportation of freed slaves there would be any mass migration northward and supplanting of white workers, since Negroes would no longer have to flee from bondage in the South.

Unfortunately, information on whether there was actually any movement of freed Negroes from the South to the Northeast is scanty, incidental and inconclusive.⁵¹⁹

There is a hint here and there buried in the fine print of a Civil War newspaper, a random suggestion in an obscure pamphlet, but no authoritative or extended treatment of this interesting problem. The Tribune would, at one time, admit unqualifiedly that Negroes were leaving the South in considerable numbers to escape slavery. "Were slavery dead tomorrow, the main current of negro migration would flow southward, not northward," wrote Greeley in January, 1863.⁵²⁰ To the same effect he declared in March: "There is at present a very general exodus of poor people from the region cursed by the Slaveholders' Rebellion ... Black men are fleeing to escape from Slavery to traitors."⁵²¹ Yet within a month of making this last assertion he said of liberated slaves: "It is quite certain that up to this time many thousands have been liberated, but as far as we can learn, very few have come among us."⁵²² This, however, was contradicted in January 1863 by Fincher's Trades Review, which stated that a large number of colored persons had already reached the Northern states and that many of them were filling positions formerly occupied by white men. The leading labor paper of its time then proceeded to demand that the government place restrictions on the ingress of emancipated slaves into the North.

It is doubtless true that by the summer of 1863 thousands of former slaves had left Missouri, Kentucky, Tennessee and Mississippi for Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Kansas and Minnesota, despite stringent laws passed by some midwestern states forbidding the immigration of contrabands lest whites be deprived of employment.⁵²³ So many Negroes left Missouri, in fact, that it was predicted that crops would perish or remain undeveloped for want of labor.⁵²⁴ The codes of these states which excluded former slaves but urgently needed agricultural workers to replace men serving in the army were hotly denounced by abolitionists as examples of the absurd lengths to which fear of Negro labor competition could carry white people.⁵²⁵ But the opposition to emancipation could still point to the northward movement of Negroes in the midwest and predict a similar influx 518. Tribune, July 5, August 6, 1862; March 27, 1863.

519. Tribune, February 7, 1863; National Anti-Slavery Standard, February 14, 1863.

520. Tribune, October 17, 1862.

521. The idea of giving Negroes land confiscated from rebels was hailed by Greeley and Roscoe Conkling as removing the apprehension of white workers that the North would be swamped by an influx of freedmen. Tribune, February 12, March 21, 1863; Loyal National League, Opinions of Loyalists Concerning the Great Questions of the Times ... Mass Meeting on Union Square, New York, on the 11th of April, 1863 (New York, 1863), p. 96.

522. Carl Sandburg, Abraham Lincoln - the War Years (New York, 1941), I, 620, 621.

523. Woodson is volume pioneered in this field. Carter G. Woodson, A Century of Negro Migration (Washington, 1918).

524. Tribune, January 12, 1863.

525. Tribune, March 27, 1863; Anti-Slavery Standard, March 7, 1863.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

into New York and consequent unemployment for white men.⁵²⁶

Into the Middle Atlantic states only a negligible migration of freed Negroes took place. The demand for colored labor in Washington, D.C., and on Maryland plantations exceeded the Supply.⁵²⁷ Three hundred contrabands did arrive in Washington in the summer of 1862 from various parts of Virginia, but the men among them were promptly hired about government hospitals and camps and on public works, while the women did washing for the soldiers.⁵²⁸ The advent of a small number of contrabands in Chester County, Pennsylvania, however, did cause some excitement, which was reported in the New York press. False rumors arose that they were so numerous that they took work away from whites and accepted employment for ten cents a day. These statements led to assaults upon Negroes in Northern cities.⁵²⁹ When about a hundred fugitives who came from the South by boat landed in Philadelphia in March, 1862, an immense crowd greeted them with shrieks of abuse.⁵³⁰ There was probably a trickle of Negroes into New Jersey also, for anti-administration forces there called upon the legislature early in 1863 to bar former slaves from the state.⁵³¹

Some migration of Negroes to New York City did unquestionably occur, at least enough to give an appearance of validity to the predictions of politicians and press and the fear of the Irish proletariat regarding black labor competition.⁵³² Refugees may well have settled in the Five Points neighborhood, in close proximity to the Irish.⁵³³ During the longshore strike a month before the draft riots it was reported that three carloads of contrabands had reached Jersey City and that the Negroes then took the ferry to New York.⁵³⁴ One source suggests that the colored workers used to break the strikes of longshoremen in 1863 were emancipated slaves, but there is no definite proof of that.⁵³⁵ It does, seem, though, that the Negroes sheltered in the Seventh Avenue Arsenal during the draft riots included contrabands,⁵³⁶ and not to be forgotten is that shout by "someone with an Irish accent" who interrupted Archbishop John Hughes's speech appealing to Catholics to abstain from rioting: "Let the niggers stay in the South!"⁵³⁷ The following day, speaking of Negroes "that float hither from the South," the Freeman's Journal and Catholic Register urged that they be "driven out again, imprisoned or exterminated."⁵³⁸ Such a furor could hardly have arisen without some pretext.

526. Tribune, April 16, 1863.

527. Fincher's Trades Review, June 13, 1863.

528. Tribune, August 4, October 30, 1862; Herald, September 22, 1862; Anti-Slavery Standard, January 30, June 30, 1863. On the fear of an influx of contrabands into Kentucky, see Governor Robinson's message to the Kentucky legislature upon the issuance of the Emancipation Proclamation. Tribune, January 12, 1863.

529. Anti-Slavery Standard, June 20, 1863.

530. Tribune July 9, 1862; Anti-Slavery Standard, May 9, 30, 1863. Minnesota farmers did employ contrabands in place of whites serving in the army. Anti-Slavery Standard, May 30, 1863.

531. Tribune, October 30, 1862.

532. Anti-Slavery Standard, January 10, 1863.

533. Tribune, August 11, 1862.

534. Tribune, July 11, August 6, 1862; Anti-Slavery Standard, March 28, 1863.

535. Tribune, April 3, 1862.

536. Tribune, January 12, 1863.

537. Woodson's work has an account of the migration of fugitives to New York City in the first half of the century. Woodson, op. cit., pp. 82-86.

538. Committee of Representatives of the New York Yearly Meeting of Friends upon the Condition and Wants of the Colored Refugees, Report (New York, 1862), P. 20.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

But that the pretext was small is apparent from the available information on whether the Negroes of the South did really wish to go north in 1862 and 1863. Although it was well known that General Hunter, commander of the army's Department of the South, at Port Royal, South Carolina, gave passes to the North to all Negroes seeking them, he stated in July, 1862, that not more than a dozen had applied to him for such passes since his arrival.⁵³⁹ Hunter branded the idea of a general migration of Negroes to the North a "carefully fostered delusion." The superintendent in charge of contrabands in Washington, D. C., made a special investigation into the supposed desire of former slaves to emigrate to the North and found it non-existent.⁵⁴⁰ Of those who came under his charge during his first four months in office, not thirty-five were willing to go farther north.

The most thorough attempt to ascertain whether Southern Negroes wished to move to the North was made by a special committee of the Emancipation League.⁵⁴¹ Late in 1862 this committee sent a questionnaire to the different superintendents of contrabands in the South containing the following query, among others: "Do they desire to go North? In the event of general emancipation, and fair treatment at home, would there, in your judgment, be any disposition to go North?" Even though the question was obviously loaded, the answers received leave little room for doubt that the contrabands did not wish to leave the South. The reply from Fortress Monroe, Virginia, was typical: Very few are willing to go North, except for safety. I have had applications from large numbers wishing servants, and offering good wages, lying over for months, because of the unwillingness of any to go." The results of this survey were confirmed by a report of the American Freedmen's Inquiry Commission in June, 1863, that there was no disposition on the part of Negro refugees within Union lines in South Carolina and Florida to go north.⁵⁴²

The preceding pages have described the manner in which political leaders and journalists in New York played upon the fear of white workers that freed Negroes would compete with them for jobs. They have also discussed the extent to which there was a movement of contrabands from the South who could compete with them. It is now appropriate to look into the competition actually taking place between Negroes and whites before the draft riots of July, 1863.

Such competition was omnipresent in the South, to be sure. It greatly heightened the tension between Negroes and poor whites, with slaves used in skilled capacities both on plantations and in towns and cities, as well, where their masters easily underbid white mechanics. It extended to almost all branches of manual labor.⁵⁴³ Everywhere the Southern white worker turned, the Negro seemed to deprive him of a job, except for the most dangerous occupations, in which it would be folly to expose a valuable slave to injury or death.⁵⁴⁴

In the North, some contrabands were competing with white workers by June, 1863, at least according to Fincher's Trades Review, 539. Tribune, June 10, 1863; Committee of New York Meeting of Friends, op. cit., p. 14.

540. Spero and Harris, op. cit., p. 17.

541. Tribune, July 18, 1863; Herald, July 18, 1863.

542. Herald, July 18, 1863; Daily News, July 18, 1863; Irish American, July 18, 1863.

543. Freeman's Journal and Catholic Register, July 18, 1863.

544. Tribune, August 4, 1862.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

and this development drew a cry for restrictions by the Federal government upon the movement of emancipated slaves into free states.⁵⁴⁵ Although our information about racial competition in the longshore field, which will be explored below, is rather plentiful, the press was not very specific about other areas in which the new rivalry was occurring. Random reports did tell of trouble in Washington, D. C., where navy yard workers showed hostility toward twenty or thirty colored calkers brought from Baltimore,⁵⁴⁶ and of the replacement of white domestic servants by Negro contrabands in St. Louis.⁵⁴⁷ The agitation throughout the North during the Civil War for state laws banning the immigration of Negroes from the South can also be taken as a probable indication of job competition between blacks and whites.

In New York, the ousting of the Democratic party from control of the Federal government in 1861 appeared ominously to bring even political patronage to Negroes. Colored men were appointed to positions in the custom house, replacing good Irish Democrats, said the newspapers, and depressing the wages paid custom house employees.⁵⁴⁸ When, in July, 1862, Negro workers were substituted for whites on a ferry line in New York harbor, and the press carried rumors of contrabands' taking away the jobs of white men in Pennsylvania by agreeing to work for ten cents a day, it seemed high time to stop this trend.⁵⁴⁹ The method of doing so which was applied by a mob of Irishmen in Brooklyn in August, 1862, may well have been suggested by attacks in recent weeks upon Negroes in Cincinnati and Toledo, Ohio, and Evansville, Indiana.⁵⁵⁰

In the midst of an Irish neighborhood in south Brooklyn stood two tobacco factories.⁵⁵¹ All the employees of one were colored, numbering from fifty to seventy-five and consisting mostly of women and children. About 250 persons, colored and white, were employed in the other and worked harmoniously side by side. The resentment against the employment of the Negroes that had been smoldering among the Irish in that area finally broke into flames on August 4, 1862, when a mob of from two to three thousand whites, stirred up by pothouse politicians I talk of competition from contrabands, smashed their way into one of the factories, shouting "Down with the nagurs!" Many were drunk from liquor dispensed at the neighborhood's numerous rum-shops, where the attack on the factory was planned. Failing to reach the Negro employees barricaded on the second floor, they prepared to set fire to the place and were prevented from doing so only by the arrival of a strong detachment of police, who quelled the riot, after a fashion, by clubbing the, Negroes.

The rioters may be said to have won their point, however. Although one tobacco factory closed down entirely, the proprietor of the other promised not to hire any more colored

545. Tribune, November 7, 1862.

546. Tribune, January 27, 1863; Anti-Slavery Standard, February 7, 1863.

547. R. Dale Owen et al, op. cit., p. 8.

548. Spero and Harris, op. cit., pp. 5-11. In an emancipation debate with George Francis Train in New York, Cassius M. Clay gave an excellent description of the underbidding of free labor by slave labor in the South. Herald, November 2, 1862. See also Charles Nordhoff, America for Free Working Men! (New York, 1865), p. 1.

549. Charles Nordhoff, America for Free Working Men! (New York, 1865), pp. 12, 13.

550. Fincher's Trades Review, June 13, 1863; Frank Tracy Carlton, History and Problem of Organized Labor (Boston and New York, 1920), p. 64.

551. Herald, September 26, 1862.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

workers.⁵⁵² Thus the effectiveness of mob violence in reducing black labor competition was fully demonstrated. Greeley raged, but his editorial lectures to the rioters were scarcely of a type which would cause them to repent, conceding the very competition that had incensed them in the first place. In a characteristic piece he flayed Democratic leaders for playing upon the Irishman's fear of black labor competition and then continued in this dubious manner:

*Least of all have the laboring white men of the United States, native or foreign, cause to hate the negro. He takes off from them the discredit of the lowest social place, and does offices which leave them free to compete for the higher rewards of industry.... The fugitive colored porter, waiter, or stevedore promotes some shrewd Irish lad to keep a shop, to become constable, or alderman, or to go to Congress.... The transformation of four million chattel slaves into four million free citizens ... will benefit no class so much as that whose tasks they assume and whose toils they relieve.*⁵⁵³

In the weeks following the attack on the tobacco factory, there were a number of cases in Brooklyn and New York City in which gangs of Irishmen beat up individual Negroes.⁵⁵⁴ A secret organization of workingmen formed in New York at this time inserted in its otherwise radical statement of principles a warning about the danger of emancipated slave labor.⁵⁵⁵ In refusing to work with Negroes, the longshoremen, whose strikes and anti-Negro violence will be discussed presently, were not unique. The Tribune cited the typical experience of a Negro cooper, a refugee from the South, who had just been refused work at several barrel-making establishments in New York. The employer at each place told him: "Yes, I have work; I would like to employ you; but my journeymen would all leave me if I did, and I cannot."⁵⁵⁶

Another movement of workingmen at this time expressed apprehension about Negro competition. It consisted of whites concerned over the importation of cheap labor from abroad by employers, with the cooperation of the Lincoln administrations Iron and shipbuilding workers, in particular, faced the prospect of wage reductions occasioned by an influx of foreigners. Early in February, 1863, they held a mass meeting at Tammany Hall, primarily to protest the importation of foreign labor. It is noteworthy, however, that they also adopted an angry statement denouncing steps by employers "to bring hordes of blacks from the South, as well as whites from Europe, to fill the shops, yards and other places of labor, and by that means compel -us to compete with them for the support of our families." To cope with this menace, they declared their intention "to effect a common organization of all the artisans and laborers throughout the country against the anticipated inundation of contrabands in Northern cities." One speaker at this gathering of ironworkers charged that their masters had already started to introduce contrabands in their midst.⁵⁵⁷

552. Freeman's Tourn, January 17, 1863.

553. Lee, op. cit., pp. 137, 138.

554. Lee, op. cit., p. 139; Tribune, August 6, 1862.

555. Tribune, August 8, 1862.

556. Tribune, August 5, 6, 1862; Lee, op. cit., pp. 139, 140.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

But the fiercest competition, with the most violent and far-reaching results, occurred in the longshore field. The remainder of this article will be devoted chiefly to an analysis of longshore work, labor organization among waterfront workers, their strikes of 1855, 1862, and 1863, and their violence against Negro strikebreakers.

Almost all longshoremen in New York City were Irish.⁵⁵⁸ Strictly speaking, it is incorrect to classify their work as unskilled labor.⁵⁵⁹ It required a degree of special competence to perform the more difficult branches of the work which could be acquired only by years of experience and which raised it above the level of what is ordinarily known as common labor. It was, however, an exhausting, hazardous, casual, and oversupplied occupation.⁵⁶⁰ The irregular employment of longshoremen resulted in unstable earnings which made a settled standard of living impossible.⁵⁶¹ One of the persistent complaints of striking longshoremen in 1855, 1862, and 1863 was that they averaged only three or four days of work a week. At the October, 1862, pay rate of $1.50 a day, this meant that they earned between $4.50 and $6.00 a week, which was low even according to Civil War wage standards.

Their irregularity of employment and hanging about piers in the hope of being hired also led longshoremen to drift into waterfront bars and encouraged drinking.⁵⁶² Many of the waterfront assaults on Negroes by longshoremen during the spring of 1863 and at the time of the draft riots planned in groggeries on West Street and South Street, across from the piers.⁵⁶³ Press reports to that effect were borne out by the testimony of the police captain in charge of stopping fights between whites and Negroes along the waterfront in April, 1863: "The trouble is due more to the influence of rum than anything else."⁵⁶⁴

Nevertheless, having no steady jobs to be endangered, longshoremen flared up at bad treatment more quickly than men in other trades. Hence their readiness to strike.⁵⁶⁵ The first longshore strike in New York of which there is record took place in February, 1836, when for several days the men paraded through the streets and before the docks in what amounted to a kind of picketing's.⁵⁶⁶ The strike of 1836 eventually became so violent that the civil authorities called out a regiment of soldiers, which, abundantly supplied with ammunition, established itself at City Hall, thereby intimidating the longshoremen.

The earliest permanent associations of New York longshoremen were formed for benevolent purposes. The Longshoremen's Union Benevolent Society, the organization of longshoremen most frequently mentioned by the press during the first two years of the Civil War, was founded in 1852 and had as its chief functions

557. Tribune, January 24, 1863.

558. Tribune, August 8, 1862.

559. Tribune, August 21, 22, 29, September 4, 6, 1862.

560. Tribune, August 8, 1862.

561. Tribune, November 25, 1862; January 24, 1863.

562. Weekly Caucasian, February 14, 1863; Tribune, February 7, 1863.

563. Nor were urban occupations the only ones in which there were complaints of racial competition. A few days before the draft riots, contrabands obtained from a Government agent were reported working for no pay on farms near New York City. Daily News, July 10, 1863.

564. Charles B. Barnes, The Longshoremen (New York, 1915), p. 5.

565. Charles B. Barnes, The Longshoremen (New York, 1915), pp. 51-54.

566. Charles B. Barnes, The Longshoremen (New York, 1915), pp. 129 ff.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

to provide relief to members who were injured or sick, to aid in the burial of deceased members, and to give financial assistance to their widows and orphans.⁵⁶⁷ It was overwhelmingly Irish in make-up. But although members complained at its meetings of the high cost of living during the war, calling for wage increases and threatening to strike, the Longshoremen's U. B. Society, as it was called, never had any power as a labor union in the present-day sense of the term.

Negro-white friction on the waterfront became pronounced in the middle fifties. In December 1854, the merchants of New York reduced the wages of longshoremen from $1.75 to $1.50, using as one reason for the slash the allegation that the Longshoremen's U. B. Society had "attempted to dictate to them."⁵⁶⁸ A strike, not led by the Society, broke out. Gangs of strikers visited ships from which other longshoremen were still unloading cargo, forced them to desist, and beat them as they came ashore. The merchants, however, called the police, under whose protection the work of loading and unloading vessels was resumed. When employers replaced striking Irishmen with colored labor, anti-Negro violence resulted, with the whites trying to prevent the blacks from working.⁵⁶⁹ But, handicapped by the fact that shipping was slow at the time, the strike petered out in the ensuing weeks.⁵⁷⁰ The Negroes, having served their strikebreaking purpose, were gradually discharged by the merchants, and by the middle of February, 1855, only a few were still working, in the employ of shippers who had taken the lead in the movement to reduce wages.

There is no evidence that the Longshoremen's U. B. Society called the strikes of 1862 and 1863. By the time of the Civil War it had evidently abandoned any pretense to trade union action and confined itself exclusively to benevolent, social and Irish functions, including annual balls and St. Patrick's Day parades.⁵⁷¹ Its members would turn out six hundred strong on the latter occasions, dressed in handsome green and gold regalia and carrying Irish and American flags and the Society's imposing banners.

Scattered items in the press in June and July, 1863, indicate the existence of one or two other organizations of longshoremen at the time of the draft riots. In June, 1863, a Longshoremen's Association was established and within a week enrolled three hundred members.⁵⁷² During the riots it was said that white workers, in driving the Negroes from the docks, were insisting that longshore jobs be held exclusively by members of the Longshoremen's Association and such other whites as they permitted upon the waterfront.⁵⁷³ The only other longshore labor organization mentioned during the strike of June, 1863, was a Joint Committee of the North and East Rivers, which agreed upon a general rate of wages to be asked of the shippers.⁵⁷⁴

In the interval between the winter of 1854-1855 and October, 567. Charles B. Barnes, The Longshoremen (New York, 1915), pp. 55-92; Tribune, January 19, 1855; Herald, October 22, 1862.

568. Barnes, op. cit., pp. 13 ff.

569. Herald, April 14, 1863; Anti-Slavery Standard, April 18, July 25, 1863.

570. Herald, April 16, 1863.

571. Barnes, op. cit., p. 93.

572. William Leete Stone, History of New York City (New York, 1872), pp. 486, 487.

573. Tribune, February 15, 1855; Irish American, March 22, 1862; March 28, 1863.

574. Tribune, January 18, 19, 1855.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1862, no major labor disputes occurred on the city's waterfront. In the autumn of 1862, however, the strain of having to buy with 1855 wages goods sold at war-inflated prices became too great for the longshoremen, who were then working only three days a week. On October 20 they struck. Through a representative committee they demanded that wages be increased from $1.50 a day to $1.75, overtime rates raised, and the working day reduced from nine to eight hours, giving as their reason for wanting more pay "the advanced prices of food, clothing, and other necessities."⁵⁷⁵ Alongside one editorial on the danger of an influx of Negro labor into the North, the Herald published another supporting the strike, which the next day brought fulsome praise from the chairman of a strikers' meeting at the Battery.⁵⁷⁶ What role, if any, Negro strikebreakers played in this dispute is not clear, but it appears that the longshoremen failed to win an increase in wages at that time.⁵⁷⁷

For late in January, 1863, workers in one section of the waterfront were informed that thenceforth their pay would be only $1.12 a day instead of the $1.50 they had been receiving previously.⁵⁷⁸ This action of the merchants started a labor war on the docks of New York which, except for brief truces, continued till the draft riots in July. Upon reduction of their wages the longshoremen went on strike. They were willing to go back at $1.25 a day provided they were employed permanently, claiming that their irregular work on the waterfront often compelled them to seek jobs elsewhere or remain idle much of the time. Press accounts of two longshore strikes in March, 1863, which refer to $1.12 a day as the prevailing rate of wages, indicate, though, that the cut was put into effect on a wide scale and that the January strike against it did not succeed.⁵⁷⁹ But on March 23, 1863, longshoremen working on the North River piers of the Erie Railroad Company, having previously won back part of the slash and restored their wages to $1.25 a day, struck for $1.50.⁵⁸⁰

When the company foreman refused to yield to their terms and announced that he would employ other workers in their places, a thousand men gathered in the street in front of the pier. No disturbances broke out until the foreman hired a gang of Negroes to move bales of cotton. Instantly the crowd fell upon the Negroes with sticks, stones, and fists and drove them from the waterfront. The company then agreed to pay $1.50 a day but declined to hire about half the strikers. At first some measure of solidarity was shown by the group, as those whom the company offered to take back held out for the reemployment of the others. By the next morning, however, this unity had disappeared. The company hired all but sixty of the most militant strikers, and work resumed under strong police protection.⁵⁸¹

575. Tribune, February 15, 1855; Charles Lionel Franklin, The Negro Labor Unionist of New York (New York, 1936), p. 25; Spero and Harris, op. cit., p. 197; Wesley, op. cit., pp. 79, 80.

576. Tribune, February 15, 1855.

577. Irish American, October 27, December 8, 1860; January 5, March 23, August 3, October 12, 10, November 2, 1861; February 15, March 15, 22, August 30, November 15, 1862; February 21, March 7, 14, 28, 1863.

578. Daily News, June 16, 1863.

579. Daily News, July 17, 1863. Speaking of the longshore and railroad workers strikes in 1863, McNeil says that "assaults were made upon the non-unionists who took the place of the men on strike." (Emphasis added.) George E. McNeil, The Labor Movement: the Problem of Today (Boston and New York, 1887), p. 126. This implies the existence of a union conducting the strike. See also United States Commissioner of Labor, Third Annual Report (1887), p. 1048.

580. Herald, June 10, 1863.

581. Tribune, October 21, 22, 1862; Herald, October 21, 22, 1862.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

The example set by the Erie Railroad longshoremens was immediately followed by employees of the Hudson River Railroad, who struck for an increase in wages from $1.12 a day to $1.50 and notified the company's directors that they would not allow any other persons to take their places for lower wages. Nevertheless, with a squad of police standing by, the company did hire both white and colored strikebreakers. Although here no violence actually broke out, the defeated workers seethed with resentment against those replacements whose dark skin made them stand out conspicuously and rendered them easy targets for revenge.

The next month, April, new strikes broke out among the longshoremens of lower Manhattan. Their exact wage demands are not clear, but for three days mobs of Irish longshoremens, inflamed by drink, beat up Negroes found working on the waterfront and chased them from the docks, shouting "Drive off the damn niggers" and "Kill the niggers."⁵⁸² "They were determined, they said, that the blacks should not drive white labor out of the market, and remonstrated against the employment of negroes along shore."⁵⁸³ Four or five hundred white longshoremens took part in these disturbances, and with difficulty the Metropolitan Police saved from lynching a couple of Negroes who tried to defend themselves. At least two hundred colored longshoremens were employed on the docks at that time, and according to police they did not receive less than the usual rate of wages. In the course of this outbreak, crowds of longshoremens also hunted down and stoned Negroes in other sections of lower Manhattan besides the waterfront, pursuing all the colored porters, cartmen and laborers within sight until routed by the locust batons of the police.

Greeley regarded the episode as the natural result of the persistent efforts of the pro-slavery press of New York to strengthen its readers' prejudices and to persuade them that "white men were to be cheated out of work by an immigration of negroes." Said he further:

*If longshoremens or any other class of laborers do not choose to work with negroes they need not. No law compels them. But the negro, as well as the white man, has a right to work for whoever will employ and pay him, and the law, and courts, and police, and public opinion ought to protect him in that right, and will.*⁵⁸⁴

May was a quiet month on the waterfront, but trouble flared up again early in June, when the longshoremens of New York stopped work en masse, demanding an increase in pay to twenty-five cents an hour during the regular working day and overtime of fifty cents an hour after 6 PM. Five hundred of them marched from pier to pier, inducing men who were still working to quit. Their number swelled as they proceeded. When non-strikers at one pier balked at leaving work, they were attacked by the strikers and compelled to desist until the police arrived and gave them protection.⁵⁸⁵

582. Tribune

583. Wesley, op. cit., pp. 99, 100.

584. Tribune, February 2, 1863.

585. Tribune, March 25, 1863; Herald, March 25, 1863.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

After a week of fruitless negotiation between committees of strikers and shipowners, the United States government stepped in. It was a now-familiar story: Army transports, supposed to sail with cargoes of ammunition and other supplies, were being held up by the strike.⁵⁸⁶ Accordingly, about 150 deserters from Governor's Island and sixty-five convalescent soldiers from Bedloe's Island were put to work loading the transports, as a detachment of regular troops stood guard with fixed bayonets and nearly five hundred policemen patrolled the waterfront.⁵⁸⁷

But the strike grew despite this formidable show of might opposing it. By the middle of June three thousand longshoremen were idle.⁵⁸⁸ On June 18, however, a group of important shipping firms gave notice that they would pay $2.00 for a day of nine hours and twenty-five cents an hour overtime, and that was probably the formula on which the strike ended. One thousand of the strikers accepted it by returning to their jobs the next day.⁵⁸⁹

While the longshoremen were thus engaged in June, 1863, (with the impassioned support, it might be noted, of the pro-slavery Daily News), occupational groups closely related to them struck successfully for higher pay.⁵⁹⁰ These included workers on canal boats and barges in the lower part of the city and freight handlers on the Hudson River Railroad and the New York Central. Another strike of Erie Railroad employees for a wage increase occurred.⁵⁹¹ Again the company hired strike breakers, although it is not certain that they were Negroes, and again the strikebreakers were assaulted by some of the old employees.

Similar work stoppages for higher wages took place in other northern cities during the Civil War. Negroes were often used as strikebreakers, with uniformly violent results.⁵⁹²

Such strikes are important as a partial explanation of the draft riots in those places. Perhaps the most serious disorders broke out in Buffalo. In August, 1862, striking Buffalo longshoremen demanded higher pay and sought to keep non-strikers from continuing to work at the former rates, but the racial aspect does not seem to have entered into their struggle at that time.⁵⁹³ The same is true of another strike of longshoremen and grain shovellers in Buffalo in May, 1863, when they won an increase in pay to $1.50 a day.⁵⁹⁴ Only a week before the draft riots, though, some Buffalo shippers tried to replace Irish longshoremen with colored workers, and violence ensued, with three Negroes slain and twelve badly beaten.⁵⁹⁵ Not only did Irish longshoremen seek to prevent Negroes from working on the docks, but, in addition, mobs of other whites attacked colored 586. Times, March 24, 1863; Tribune, March 24, 1863; Herald, March 24, 1863.

587. Herald, March 25, 1863; Tribune, March 25, 1863.

588. Herald, April 18, 1863.

589. Herald, April 16, 1863. See also Herald, April 14, 15, 1863; Tribune, April 13-16, 1863; Anti-Slavery Standard, April 18, 1863; Lee, op. cit., pp. 141, 142.

590. Tribune, April 14, 1863.

591. Herald, June 6, 9, 1863; Tribune, June 8, 9, 20, 1863.

592. Herald, June 15, 16, 1863; Herald, June 16, 1863.

593. Similar to the longshore situation in 1863 was the strike of New York longshoremen in October, 1945, at the end of World War II. At that time, Federal authorities, pleading the piling up of military cargoes on the docks, sent two platoons of Negro soldiers with longshore experience to unload mail and baggage from the British transport, Queen Elizabeth. Times, October 10, 11, 1945. The Negro troops performed this task amid the hissing and booing of the strikers.

594. Tribune, June 15, 1863.

595. Tribune, June 20, 1863; Herald, June 20, 1863; Daily News, June 20, 1863.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

inhabitants of the city generally. A prominent Democratic politician was heard to declare publicly that every Negro and every Black Republican ought to be driven out of town.⁵⁹⁶ More truthfully than they knew, the editors of Fincher's Trades Review commented on the Buffalo situation two days before the draft riots began: "This, we fear, is but the beginning of the end."⁵⁹⁷

The result of this labor strife was that when resistance to the draft started in New York on July 13, 1863, longshoremen formed the van of the mobs.⁵⁹⁸ Deputations recruiting rioters thoroughly canvassed the waterfront, so that by the second day of the upheaval the loading and unloading of ships in the harbor had stopped, except at a wharf here and there which happened to be under the guns of an armed vessel.⁵⁹⁹ No colored dockhands were to be found on any pier.⁶⁰⁰ Negroes who ventured on the streets near the waterfront or near saloons frequented by longshoremen were horribly tortured and beaten to death by bands of longshoremen and their bodies cast into the East River and Hudson River.⁶⁰¹ One reporter described conditions about the piers thus:

*So determined and bitter is the feeling of the 'longshoremen against negroes that not one of the latter dares show himself upon the docks or piers even when a regular employee of the place. The white workmen have resolved, by concerted action, to keep colored men from this branch of labor, and have evinced, by their conduct toward their former comrades in work, a spirit as murderous and brutal as it is illiberal and selfish. It is a prevalent rumor, to which the authorities give full credence, and which the 'longshoremen seem proud of, that scores of these unfortunates have been thrown into the river and drowned, for no other reason than that they were obnoxious to the sensitive-minded individuals of a lighter color.*⁶⁰²

Another observer likewise noted that longshoremen made *no attempt to conceal their determination to keep negroes ... from that sort of labor. They insist upon it that the colored people must and shall be driven to other departments of industry, and that the work upon the docks, the stevedoring, and the various job-work therewith connected, shall be attended to solely and absolutely by members of the 'Longshoremen's Association, and such white laborers as they see fit to permit upon the premises.*⁶⁰³

The mobs along the waterfront which attacked other Negroes besides dock workers consisted, in all likelihood, of white longshoremen.⁶⁰⁴ Next to the colored dock workers, waiters and 596. Tribune, June 16, 1863; Herald, June 16, 1863; Tribune, June 17, 1863.

597. Daily News, June 20, 1863.

598. Spero and Harris, Op., Cit., pp. 197, 198; Wesley, op. cit., pp. 99, 100. For an interesting account of anti-Negro violence in a Toledo, Ohio, longshore strike, during which the members of the local board of trade were sworn in as special police, see Tribune, July 11, 1862.

599. Tribune, August 13, 1862.

600. Tribune, May 14, 1863; Herald, May 14, 16, 1863.

601. Fincher's Trades Review, July 11, 1863; Tribune, July 8, 1863; Herald, July 8, 1863; Daily News, July 11, 1863.

602. Tribune, July 10, 1863.

603. Fincher's Trades Review, July 11, 1863.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

other Negro employees in downtown hotels and restaurants were the chief objects of the rioters' fury.⁶⁰⁵ One firm, fearful that its property might be destroyed by demonstrators who believed it to have employed colored persons, sought to avert that fate by placing in the window a sign in conspicuous capitals: "No niggers in the rear."⁶⁰⁶

It is not contended here that the competition of Negroes with whites ceased completely with the draft disturbances. Indeed, as early as Saturday, July 18, the last day of the riot week, a few colored workers began to pursue their usual vocations in public without being molested.⁶⁰⁷ On Monday, the 20th, more colored people, including waiters in several restaurants, summoned up enough courage to return to their jobs, and this trend continued in the succeeding days, to a point where even some Negro longshoremen returned to the docks of the Erie Railroad Company.⁶⁰⁸

But the committee of merchants formed to give relief to colored victims of the riots was forced to admit that after this civil war within a Civil War many Negroes discharged by employers who feared destruction of their property because they had hired colored workers were not taken back in their old positions, despite years of service. White workers who wished to drive their competitors from the city were responsible, said the merchants, for pressure upon employers not to reinstate Negroes. They also persuaded the street railway companies to refuse colored persons permission to ride on their cars, making it difficult for or them to travel to work.⁶⁰⁹

To alleviate these conditions, the committee kept its office open as an employment agency after it stopped dispensing financial relief,⁶¹⁰ in pursuance of a resolution, adopted at its first meeting, on July 18:

*That we will exert all the influence we possess to protect the colored people of this city in their rights to pursue unmolested their, lawful occupations.... That we will not recognize or sanction any distinction of persons of whatever nation, religion, or color, in their natural right to labor peaceably in their vocations in the support of themselves and those dependent upon them.*⁶¹¹

Brave talk this, but its implementation was another matter. As the more timorous merchants and transportation companies continued to withhold jobs from Negro former employees, their brethren connected with the committee could only shake their heads and repeat that the whole sorry mess was the result of the merchants' having tolerated months ago the dictation of striking 604. Emerson David Fite, Social and Industrial Conditions in the North during the Civil War (New York, 1910), pp. 189, 190; Spero and Harris, op. cit., pp. 197, 198.

605. Daily News, July 15, 1863; Weekly Caucasian, July 18, 1863; Stoddard, op. cit., p. 158.

606. Herald, July 17, 1863.

607. Daily News, July 17, 1863; New York Committee of Merchants for the Relief of Colored People Suffering from the Late Riots, 1863, Report (New York, 1863), pp. 20, 21; David M. Barnes, The Draft Riots in New York (New York, 1863), p. 24; Stoddard, op. cit., p. 239.

608. Times, July 17, 1863; Anti-Slavery Standard, July 25, 1863.

609. Daily News, July 17, 1863.

610. Tribune, July 17, 1863.

611. Barnes, op. cit., p. 34; Stoddard, op. cit., pp. 80, 81, 91; Alexander, op. cit., 111, 68. Colored servants in private homes were another large class assaulted by rioters. Herald, July 17, 1863.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

longshoremen as to whom they should employ and on what terms.⁶¹²

That many, Negroes were not restored to their old jobs is also clear from editorials in the Tribune after the riots. Greeley urged the merchants of New York to welcome Negroes back "to any work they are able and willing to do at a satisfactory price," and, in a thrust at the Irish, urged that colored persons -- "American born and bred" -- be protected in the exercise of this right.⁶¹³ Failure to do so meant capitulation to the demands of the rioters:

*The mob exults in the belief that, if it failed in its other objects, it [had?] at least secured possession of the labor of the city, and has driven the blacks to seek work elsewhere... . It is the duty of merchants and other employers to take pains to recall their workmen immediately, and assure them of permanent protection.*⁶¹⁴

Greeley observed, nevertheless, that reluctance to reemploy Negroes persisted.⁶¹⁵ Of course, the great decrease in the city's colored population by 1865 also indicated a drop in the employment of Negroes.⁶¹⁶

To review the main points of this article, Democratic leaders and newspapers in New York, from the secession crisis to the draft riots, constantly harped upon the note that if the slaves were freed, they would flock north and take away the jobs of Irish laborers. The election campaigns of 1860, 1861, and 1862 and Lincoln's emancipation program were the occasions for their heaviest barrages of propaganda on this score. Republicans and abolitionists were slow to answer their opponents' predictions. When they finally did reply, they argued that elimination of slavery would forestall any danger of an inundation of blacks.

Although information about the actual movement of Negroes during the Civil War is sparse, it appears that some northward migration of contrabands did take place. It was small, to be sure, but enough seemingly to give point to the warnings of anti-administration politicians and journalists and to alarm the New York proletariat, despite surveys proving that the great majority of former slaves had no desire to leave the South.

Rivalry for jobs between Negroes and Irishmen in New York had existed before the Civil War, and employers had occasionally hired black workers to break the strikes of white workers. During the war, with the numerous strikes for higher wages which it brought, the use of Negro strikebreakers by employers became much more frequent, particularly in the longshore field, dominated by the Irish. In the first half of 1863 the 612. Tribune, July 20, 1863. When the danger abated, this concern denied the charge that it had disclaimed having any Negro employees, asserting that it sheltered a number of colored refugees during the disorders. Tribune, July 21, 1863.

613. Tribune, July 20, 1863.

614. Tribune, July 21, 22, 1863; Herald, July 30, 1863; New York Committee of Merchants, op. cit., pp. 4-6. The claim of the committee that within a few weeks the demand for colored servants had increased tenfold must be treated with caution. Herald, p. 27. It is quite possible that new Negro domestics were being sought to replace those who had fled from the city during the riots.

615. Herald, pp. 12, 13.

616. Wesim op. cit., pp. 100, 101

136. Tribune, July 21, 1863.

137. Tribune, July 25, 1863.

138. Tribune, July 20, 1863.

139. Tribune, July 21, 1863.

140. Tribune, July 23, 1863.

141. See footnote 4 supra.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

longshoremen of New York went On strike after strike for increased pay, only to see their places filled by colored men working for less money under police protection. While longshore wages gradually rose, white labor on the waterfront was, obsessed with the fear of competition from Negroes which needed only the commencement of the draft to be transformed into wholesale murder. The violence inflicted upon black workers on the docks and in other occupations by the draft rioters did, in fact, result in a decline for some years to come in the job rivalry which the former had offered. Thus the rioters partially achieved their aims.

ALBON P. MAN, JR.

New York, New York

US CIVIL WAR

December 15, Tuesday: Confederate President Jefferson Davis was in consultation with General Robert E. Lee in Richmond, Virginia.

Both in the North and in the South, conscientious objectors had been facing difficulties. For instance, a southern Quaker, Friend Seth W. Laughlin, after more than a week of beatings, had been told that he was to be executed. As the firing squad prepared, Friend Seth repeated the words of Jesus: "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do," and the soldiers, hearing this, refused to fire (Friend Seth would succumb, however, a few weeks later, from beatings he had already sustained). The military both North and South had been forced to become aware that this sort of activity was a waste of their time and resources, and therefore on this day the Adjutant General signed an order directing that the holdouts who were refusing not only to fight but also to pay the fine –primarily Quakers– be released on their own parole (refer to Fernando G. Cartland's SOUTHERN HEROES; OR THE FRIENDS IN WAR TIME, Cambridge: Riverside Press, 1895, pages 211-13).

US CIVIL WAR

NEVER READ AHEAD! TO APPRECIATE DECEMBER 15TH, 1863 AT ALL
ONE MUST APPRECIATE IT AS A TODAY (THE FOLLOWING DAY, TOMORROW, IS BUT A PORTION OF THE UNREALIZED FUTURE AND IFFY AT BEST).

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1864

February 5, Friday: In California, George Colmere used a comb tooth to open a vein the night before he was to be hanged.

US Congressman Thomas Allen Jenckes received a letter from a private citizen who was, shall we say, generally in favor of standardized and liberalized federal bankruptcy legislation:

If the administration could know the feelings of the thousands who are tied in stronger chains than the Black man ever was, they would as a matter of policy (if not of justice) remove the shackles from off us.

Racist comparisons defined failure and rebuked the government for letting white men fall so low.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1865

November 10, Friday: Wicasa itancan or “chief” Shakpe II “Little Six” and his band’s pejuta wicasa or “traditional healer” “Medicine Bottle,” the current political and spiritual leaders of the Shakpe village –who had been drugged with opium by a US government agent and kidnapped in Canada, and brought into the United States bound and gagged, breathing chloroform vapors, on a dog sled at night, to stand trial before a US military commission, and who had of course been found guilty of something and sentenced to be hanged by the neck until they were dead Indians in spite of the uncontroverted fact that every piece of evidence that could be offered against them in that court had been a piece of hearsay⁶¹⁷ – had for a period of time been sweeping the walkways at Fort Snelling with chains and cannonballs welded to their ankles⁶¹⁸ to earn their keep while being stared at by local urchins and tourists, during their process of “judicial review” at War Department headquarter in Washington DC. Word finally got back to St. Paul, Minnesota that the sentence had been approved. On November 10th, the day before their sentence was to be executed, a St. Paul Pioneer editorial writer pointed out that

No serious injustice will be done by the execution tomorrow, but it would have been more creditable if some tangible evidence of their guilt had been obtained.... no white man, tried before a jury of his peers, would be executed upon the testimony thus produced. The general supposition that they are guilty, is very likely correct, but their execution will, nevertheless, establish the precedent of hanging without proving... About the only admirable element in the whole course of the cases was the serene and dignified behavior of the chiefs in their last hour.

The superintendent of the notorious Confederate prison at Andersonville, Georgia, Captain Henry Wirz, had been tried by a military commission presided over by General Lew Wallace from August 23rd to October 24th, and convicted of cruelty, and was on this date hanged in the yard of the Old Capitol Prison.

US CIVIL WAR

617. One would have thought they would have been more careful, after having hanged at least one man by attaching the wrong number to his nametag in 1863, and after having hanged one innocent boy merely because he had been in the care of his father. But no.

618. An actual ball and chain is not at all as represented in cartoons. When you visit Fort hanged Historical Landmark, ask the “blacksmith” to let you try on a ball and chain. Shakpe II and Medicine Bottle, in being hanged with hempen ropes, were “given hemp medicine” an old history book has said, evidently relying on old common knowledge that an infusion of hemp (marijuana) would induce sufferers to forget their cares. (Incidentally, to forget your cares, it will help if you visit the “Little Six Bingo Palace” at 2350 Sioux Trail in Prior Lake MN, telephone 445-9000.)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

November 11, Saturday: The two current political and spiritual leaders of the Shakpe village, Wicasa itancan or “chief” Shakpe II “Little Six” and his band’s pejuta wicasa or “traditional healer” “Medicine Bottle,” were hanged on a scaffold on the knob in front of Fort Snelling in sight of Pike Island and Pilot Knob: the good little Indians could see what happened to inconvenient little Indians and be wary. Being executed, the men could see the city of St. Paul in the distance. While a soldier was putting the bag over Chief Shakpe II’s head, a locomotive sounded its whistle and he commented

As the white man comes in the Indian goes out.

Wicasa Itancan Shakpe II “Little Six”

Pejuta Wicasa “Medicine Bottle”

This from the “Memories of Fort Snelling in Civil War Days” of Mary J. Newson, daughter of the fort’s

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

surgeon:

In our play about the parade ground we often watched with frightened delight the two captive Indians, leaders in the Sioux War, each dragging a cannon ball chained to his left leg, while under guard he swept the walks.... The gallows were erected outside the fort on a little knoll, commanding a view of the hills across the Minnesota River and Pilot Knob, now the Acacia Cemetery. All the children of the garrison, save only ourselves, were allowed to be present at the hanging. However, I recall most distinctly that from some vantage point I saw in the distance the crowds, the scaffold, and the swinging bodies.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1866

Execution of women had somehow fallen out of favor in England. However, in this year 45-year-old Mary Ann Ashford would be hanged in Exeter for having murdered her husband.

Formation, in England, of the Howard Association, a group led (of course) by Quakers in opposition to the death penalty for forgery. A thousand signatures from British bankers would persuade the Parliament.

José Martí wrote: “The US has never looked upon Cuba as anything but an appetizing possession with no drawback other than its quarrelsome, weak and unworthy population.” He warned Cubans that “to change masters is not to be free.”

It is clear, at least in retrospect, that Martí could have offered some useful stand-down counsel to John Rollin Ridge “Chee-squa-ta-law-ny” — for during this year Yellow Bird visited Washington DC with a delegation of Cherokee and unsuccessfully petitioned for statehood in the United States of America for the region allotted to them as their reservation.

Carleton Watkins photographed “Mirror Lake, Yosemite.”

In San Francisco, California, Sheriff Henry Davis decided to improve the protocol for hanging. He erected a makeshift gallows inside the county jail-house by dropping the rope from a cross-beam attached to rooftop windows and installing a hinged platform in a walkway in front of the 2d-floor cells. His invited spectators could stand along this walkway and witness the executed man disappear through the floor, or they could stand in the center aisle of the ground floor, in which case they could see the body as it came to its halt — as they preferred.

January 22, Monday: In San Francisco, California, Barney Howell was hanged for having shot a farmer, James Irwin, on January 13th, 1865 (Irwin had owed Howell $40).

April 28, Saturday: In San Francisco, California, Antonio Sassovich was hanged for having stabbed Edward Walter on June 3d, 1865 (Sassovich had felt Walter had laughed at and insulted him).

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

July 6, Friday: Edward Geoffrey Stanley, Earl of Derby replaced John Russell, Earl Russell as Prime Minister of the United Kingdom.

In San Francisco, California, Chung Wang (AKA Chu Wong) made himself the 1st person of Chinese descent to be hanged there for murder (he stabbed his mistress when she abandoned him for another man).

September 3, Monday: The Prussian Parliament, quite unconstitutionally, granted Chancellor Bismarck an indemnity to collect taxes. This marked the effective end of Prussian liberalism.

The Grand Duchy of Hesse transferred Mainz, Worms, and Hesse-Homburg to Prussia.

In San Francisco, California, Thomas Byrnes was hanged for having murdered Charles P. Hill in the course of a robbery during February 1865.

The 28th anniversary of Frederick Douglass's freedom, which we may well elect to celebrate in lieu of an unknown slave birthday.

Here is a Daguerreotype, by an unidentified photographer in the 1850-1855 timeframe.

"It has been a source of great annoyance to me, never to have a birthday."

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1867

Execution of women had somehow fallen out of favor in England. However, in this year 29-year-old Ann Lawrence would be hanged in Maidstone for the murder of a child.

During this year and the following one, Charles Dickens would be on a 2d reading tour of the United States. In his later years his personality seemed to have changed remarkably, perhaps due to his being sadly disappointed in the conduct of his children. Coming through Boston, the wife of his American publisher, James Thomas Fields, commented that for a sad man he seemed remarkably happy. He somewhat distressed his local tour guides when there was only one thing that interested him this 2nd time, about the Boston area:

I want to see where Dr. Parkman was killed.

Cleveland Amory would explain the incident in this way in 1957 in his THE PROPER BOSTONIANS (NY: E.P. Dutton & Co., Inc., page 226):

Tremors of the Parkman earthquake continued to be felt by Boston Society often at times when they were least desired. Twenty years later, when Boston was privileged to play proud host to Charles Dickens, there was a particularly intense tremor. Dickens was asked which one of the city's historic landmarks he would like to visit first. "The room where Dr. Parkman was murdered," he replied, and there being no doubt he meant what he said, nothing remained for a wry-faced group of Boston's best but to shepherd the distinguished novelist out to the chemistry laboratory of the Harvard Medical School.

(Don't go looking for this two-story brick building set on piers at the waterfront near Massachusetts General Hospital associated with the Professor John White Webster/Doctor George Parkman case. Harvard Medical College there was long ago relocated, and the old edifice demolished.)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1868

April 2, Thursday: Since the turn of the century in the British Isles (including Southern Ireland and the Isle of Man), a total of 205 women and girls had been taken to places of public execution and there hanged by their necks until they were dead. Francis Kidder, who had drowned a friend's daughter, became the 206th and final British woman to suffer this fate when she was hanged on this day by William Calcraft on the gallows set up outside the prison gates at Maidstone. Like many other of this executioner's clients, she "died hard."

(Now, you might suppose, from an incautious reading of the above paragraph, that no more women and girls would be executed in Britain, that Francis Kidder who had drowned a friend's daughter was the last one to be hanged. No, that's not what the paragraph says. The paragraph clearly indicates "taken to places of public execution." In fact such executions would continue, but would take place inside the prisons, which is to say, no longer "in public." A further 23 women would be hanged during the 19th Century, and a further 17 would be hanged during the 20th Century, up until 1955 when Ruth Ellis would be the 18th and final woman to suffer the death penalty during the 20th Century in Britain — cumulatively in total, the 247th since January 1800.)

(Why am I listing women and not men? The answer is that women represent well under 5% of the total: if I included all the men and boys, such a list would simply become unmanageable. In the whole of the British Isles, which until 1923 included Ireland, the total list of such events occurring between January 1800 and 1965, the year of the final hanging, would need to include at least 5,508 personal names and crimes and dates of execution and places of execution.)

FINAL EXECUTIONS
August 7, 1862	John Doidge	hanged in the final public execution in Cornwall
April 2, 1868	Francis Kidder	last woman to be hanged at a place of public execution (as opposed to inside a prison) in England
May 26, 1868	Michael Barrett	Fenian hanged outside London's Newgate Prison — the final public execution in Britain

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

May 26, Thursday: Naturalization Treaty between the United States of America and Bavaria.

READ THE FULL TEXT

President Andrew Johnson had been impeached. The US House of Representatives had voted for conviction. On this date the US Senate, having previously acquitted the President in regard to another section of the bill against him by one vote, again acquitted the President on the 2d and 3d Articles of Impeachment by one vote. The trial was over.

While a crowd of 2,000 sang “Rule, Britannia,” the Fenian Michael Barrett was hanged outside Newgate Prison in London for having bombed Clerkenwell Prison during the previous December. It was a grand send-off indeed, and would turn out to be the final public execution in Britain.

FINAL EXECUTIONS
April 2, 1868	Francis Kidder	last woman to be hanged at a place of public execution (as opposed to inside a prison) in England
May 26, 1868	Michael Barrett	Fenian hanged outside London’s Newgate Prison — the final public execution in Britain
February 14, 1890	Wong Ah Hing (AKA Ah Tee)	last hanging in San Francisco, California (subsequently, hangings would be at San Quentin, a new state prison across the bay)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1869

April: Settling in Basel, Friedrich Nietzsche became a Swiss citizen.

In California, Ah Kow, condemned to be hanged, hanged himself in his cell.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1870

Leon Berger, an assistant beheader and a carpenter, would over the next couple of years improve and develop a new head-chopping apparatus. Among his improvements would be a spring system, to stop the mouton at the bottom of the grooves, and a lock or blocking device placed at the lunette. He would also pioneer a new release mechanism for the blade. All subsequent apparatuses would be per his redesign.⁶¹⁹

HEADCHOPPING

619. Never trust anything that has moving parts.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1871

When the posts of the regional head-choppers were abolished, Jean-François Heindrecht became the 1st beheader for all of France. One of his assistants was Louis Deibler.

HEADCHOPPING

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

April 6, Thursday: Friedrich, Baron Lindelhof became prime minister of Hesse.

In Paris, National Guard units rolled out the guillotine apparatus and burned it, as onlookers cheered.

HEADCHOPPING

Death of Edward Thompson Taylor, the famous chaplain of the Methodist Seamen's Bethel on the Boston waterfront and prototype of Father Mapple in Herman Melville's MOBY-DICK.

The body would be placed beside the body of “Mother Taylor,” his wife Deborah D. Millett Taylor and the mother of his children, at Mount Hope Cemetery in Mattapan, Massachusetts.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1872

Nicolas Roch, grandson of Antoine Roch, had become at this point the beheader at Paris itself. Over the years of his career, he would have five assistants, among them Leon Berger, Henri Ganier, and Jules-Henri Desfourneaux.

HEADCHOPPING

In this year or the previous year, “The Apotheosis of War,” by Vassili Vereshchagin (1842-1904), a painting which now hangs in the Tretyakov Gallery in Moscow:

Since this painting has on occasion been used to illustrate the Armenian Genocide of the 1920s in Turkey, it should be recorded here that the painting was prior, and imaginative, and that there is no such connection.

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

Rhode Island attorney Thomas Allen Jenckes helped prosecute the railroad profiteers and the congressmen on-the-take of the “Crédit Mobilier” scandal.

There had been no death penalty in Rhode Island for three decades. At this point the General Assembly decided to re-enact the penalty of death by hanging, in the case of murder committed while under sentence of life imprisonment.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1873

Kintpuash “Captain Jack” led his Modoc band away from the California reservation of another tribe, to which they had been assigned, killed General Edward Canby and two US commissioners, and attempted to hole up in the California Lava Beds. Kintpuash and five other men were surrounded and besieged in the lava beds by the US army, and when they surrendered, a courts martial condemned them to be hanged. America, of course, was burning for revenge, and the white people in general were unwilling to pay regard to the laundry list of injustices the Modoc had accumulated prior to the massacre.

Only a week after the massacre, the Philadelphia Radical Club, a human-rights organization led by [Friend] Lucretia Mott, charged that the weakness of President [Ulysses S. Grant’s] peace policy “was a natural result of the war system.” A general of the Army, Canby, with the army at his back was not a suitable representative of the peace policy. In a remonstrance to the President, the club charged that [General] Sherman’s telegram expressing his hope that the Modocs “have met the doom they so richly have earned” was revengeful and unjust in its tone.⁶²⁰

Friend Lucretia had what she termed “a very satisfactory interview” with the man capable of executive clemency. He had pledged “Madam, they will not all be executed.” Ultimately he commuted the sentences of two of the six, and only Captain Jack and three others at Fort Klamath were hanged on October 3, 1873. The other 153 tribespeople ended up at the Quapaw Agency in Indian Territory (Oklahoma), where “under the supervision of the Quakers they were to be civilized and Christianized.” One Oregon newspaper declared the peace policy “a wretched farce, that was conceived in sin and iniquity by a few Indian sympathizers,” while another hoped the country would “hold these hypocritical Indian worshippers to a strict accountability.”

Body parts from the corpse of Kintpuash would be put on display in an Army museum in San Francisco.

THE MARKET FOR HUMAN BODY PARTS

May 14, Wednesday: In San Francisco, California, John “Shanghai Chicken” Devine was hanged inside the Broadway jail for shooting August Kamp during a robbery (see lengthy story about Chicken Devine in Shanghaiing Days, by Richard Dillon, 1961).

July 25, Friday: In San Francisco, California, Charles Russell was hanged for the murder of James Crotty (Russell had shot Crotty in the head and his explanation was that he was drunk at the time).

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1874

On numerous occasions in California a hanging had been botched, with the murderer's head being yanked off by the rope. In this year such an occasion happened again, in Contra Costa County, this time to Marshall Martin.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1876

Another edition of TWO YEARS BEFORE THE MAST was put out, with further changes. Richard Henry Dana, Jr. was serving as delegate-at-large to the Republican National Convention in Cincinnati, and thus playing his own minor role in the infamous “Hayes-Tilden” compromise whereby Ohio Republican Rutherford B. Hayes got to be President of the United States of America basically by promising to withdraw federal troops from the South in exchange for southern Democratic political support, thereby abandoning to a condition of “Jim Crow” apartheid the black Americans who had been freed as a result of the civil war.

(Note that at this point –since the federal legislature had not as yet enacted any legislative definition for the terms of art “slave,” “slavery,” and “enslavement,” and since subsequent to this it would not ever be politically possible to enact such a legislative definition– the XIIIth Amendment to the US Constitution, which had authorized the federal congress to regulate or prohibit this undefined “slavery,” was rendered essentially nugatory. There is simply no force whatever to a law which purports to prohibit something, when that “whatever it is” has been provided with no legal definition. If someone were to come before a federal court saying “You must protect me, I have been ‘enslaved’,” the court would be forced to respond “We are prepared to grant that it would be a crime to ‘enslave’ you, but there is simply no way for you to prove to us that you have been ‘enslaved’ because we have been provided with no legislative act or Common Law case precedent which would instruct us as to the meaning of this term ‘enslaved’ — and thus there is no way on earth by which we might be able to determine whether you have or have not in fact been subjected to a crime of having been ‘enslaved’.” This explains why it is that no American citizen has ever been arraigned or convicted or punished for the crime of having enslaved someone.)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1877

May 4, Friday: Chin Mook Sow was hanged for the stabbing murder of Ye Ah Chin, occasioned by a dispute over money. Sheriff of San Francisco, California Matthew Nunan oversaw Sow's execution inside the Broadway Street county jail. On the following day the San Francisco Examiner would report that "There gathered on Broadway, in front of the jail, nearly a thousand men and boys, and, we are sorry to say, women and young girls, drawn thither by this morbid appetite, although every one of them must have known that it would be impossible to satisfy it by the sight of the execution. This large crowd stood there in the street and upon the sidewalks, as near to the steps leading to the jail entrance as the lines of policemen, drawn up to make a clear passage-way for all who had permits, would permit them to come, and they held the place from two or three hours before the execution until it was all over. They could do no more than look up at the walls of the prison, or watch the going and coming out of those who were permitted to do either. They could see nothing whatever of the scenes inside, nor hear anything, except that which those who at last passed out told them. Yet there the multitude remained eagerly watching for any sign that might afford them information of the progress inside the jail toward the awful end, and meanwhile they indulged in rough jokes and unfeeling remarks. Many tarried until the coffined corpse of Chin Mook Sow was brought out and the wagon in which it was placed had been driven away. And even then the place seemed to have an overpowering fascination for them, as they slowly walked away and would stop and turn and look back upon the prison.... Between two hundred and three hundred persons, all told, were admitted on the occasion."

December 17, Monday: Jules-Henri Desfourneaux was born at Bar-Le-Duc.

HEADCHOPPING

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1878

Nicolas Roch installed a wooden shield that would mask the blade of the guillotine from the sight of an approaching victim (this novelty would in the next year be removed, when Roch died and was replaced by Louis Deibler).

HEADCHOPPING

Mrs. James wrote to the Historical Society of Connecticut, asking that they return to her possession the three trophy items that allegedly had been seized by Alderman at the site of his killing of Metacom, that allegedly had come to be her private property through purchase followed by a chain of inheritance.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1879

Walt Whitman reported on Western jurisprudence:

“Specimen Days”

ON TO DENVER — A FRONTIER INCIDENT

The jaunt of five or six hundred miles from Topeka to Denver took me through a variety of country, but all unmistakably prolific, western, American, and on the largest scale. For a long distance we follow the line of the Kansas river, (I like better the old name, Kaw,) a stretch of very rich, dark soil, famed for its wheat, and call'd the Golden Belt — then plains and plains, hour after hour — Ellsworth county, the centre of the State — where I must stop a moment to tell a characteristic story of early days — scene the very spot where I am passing — time 1868. In a scrimmage at some public gathering in the town, A. had shot B. quite badly, but had not kill'd him. The sober men of Ellsworth conferr'd with one another and decided that A. deserv'd punishment. As they wished to set a good example and establish their reputation the reverse of a Lynching town, they open an informal court and bring both [Page 855] men before them for deliberate trial. Soon as this trial begins the wounded man is led forward to give his testimony. Seeing his enemy in durance and unarm'd, B. walks suddenly up in a fury and shoots A. through the head — shoots him dead. The court is instantly adjourn'd, and its unanimous members, without a word of debate, walk the murderer B. out, wounded as he is, and hang him.

In due time we reach Denver, which city I fall in love with from the first, and have that feeling confirm'd, the longer I stay there. One of my pleasantest days was a jaunt, via Platte cañon, to Leadville.

Nicolas Roch, the beheader at Paris, died and was replaced by Louis Deibler, who tore off the wooden shield which Roch had installed to mask the blade of the guillotine from the sight of an approaching victim. During this year an attempt was made to elicit a reaction from the freshly severed head of the murderer Prunier, but the results were negative.

HEADCHOPPING

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1880

When, three hours after the decapitation of the rapist and murderer Menesclou, a doctor pumped blood from a living dog into the severed veins of the neck, the lips were observed to tremble, and the eyelids to twitch. Although the head seemed to onlookers to be about to speak, the lips formed no words.

HEADCHOPPING

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1883

March 2, Friday: In California, Sing Lum, condemned to hang, asked the deputy assigned to watch over him to fetch them both some tea, and while the deputy was absent hanged himself in his cell.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1884

January 23, Wednesday: Edmond François Valentin About was elected to the Académie française (he would die prior to the award ceremony).

Up to 2 o'clock on the afternoon the Sheriff's office in San Francisco, California was being besieged with applicants for invitations to the latest hanging at the jailhouse, that of George Wheeler, who had been found guilty of the murder of his sister-in-law, Delia Tillson, who had been attempting to break off her affair with Wheeler. The Examiner reported that "So great was the demand that Sheriff Patrick Connolly was obliged to seek shelter in the County Jail, while Undersheriff Cummings had to hide himself in the old City Hall to escape the mob so morbidly eager to see a human being meet a sudden and horrible death. In all there were some 2,000 applications, but only 350 cards were issued. Of this number 52 were sent to the Sheriffs of the different counties, of whom some eight or ten will probably be present. The other cards were distributed among the city officials and newspaper offices. The jail will not comfortably hold more than 250 spectators, and it is not likely that more than this number will attend."

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

January 24, Thursday: At the execution of George Wheeler in the San Francisco, California jailhouse, according to the Examiner, when the condemned prisoner was handed a small glass of whiskey he turned to Sheriff Connolly and “thanked him for the favors he had received at his hand, and said he would like to express his thanks from the gallows. The Sheriff replied: ‘If you wish to do me a favor George, say as little as possible and die like a man. Do not give us any trouble.’ ‘I promise you that,’ was the reply, shaking him by the hand.”

Frederick Douglass remarried, with Helen Pitts of Rochester, New York, his Irish American secretary,

20 years younger than Otilie Assing. The bride’s father, an abolitionist, would disown her. Douglass would

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

remark upon some occasion that his 1st wife had been the color of his mother, his 2d the color of his father.

September 12, Friday: Frank Hutchings was hanged in the San Francisco, California jailhouse for the murder by strangulation of Jeanette Simms, who had been trying to leave him for another man. According to the San Francisco Examiner on the following day, “The possessors of ... black-bordered sheets of notepaper [permits issued by Sheriff Patrick Connolly] had been clamoring for admission for an hour. The Sheriff had issued invitations to 400 persons, all the jail would hold, and there were at least 4,000 more hunting him high and low all over the town during the past two days seeking passes. So great was the clamor that the official has been obliged to keep himself locked up in jail for about forty-eight hours. The telephone in the Captain’s room was kept tinkling all morning by people who had discovered that they had been forgotten. Seven messenger boys at one time stood on the front steps with notes to the Sheriff requesting permits. The office on Kearny Street was crowded with applicants waiting for the Sheriff to come down from breakfast. He was compelled to go to a strange barbershop to get shaved, and was almost worried into a bad temper when a man with a pass attempted to ring in a couple of friends through the door. An old man who had successfully evaded the vigilant eyes of Captain Douglass and his squad of police, who were keeping clear the sidewalk, tried to shove himself through the door, but Chief Kirkpatrick stopped him. ‘Won’t you please let me in?’ he pleaded. ‘Can’t do it,’ said the Chief. ‘I’ll give you a dollar if you do,’ beseeched the individual. The bribe had no effect, and the old fellow was soon back in the crowd gazing pathetically at the walls.”

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1885

January 16, Friday: Edmond François Valentin About died.

During his 2d week in office, Sheriff Peter Hopkins hanged Wright Leroy inside the county jail of San Francisco, California for the strangling of Nicholas Skerrett (after strangling Skerrett, Leroy had made an attempt to transfer all of Skerrett's considerable assets to himself).

March 20, Friday: An African American, Stephen Jones, was hanged inside the Broadway county jail in San Francisco, California for the murder of a former lover, Agnes Riley (after shooting her several times, Jones had attempted to off himself but hadn't been able to get himself to pull the trigger).

HDT

WHAT?

INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1886

May 3, Monday: At the McCormick Harvesting Machine Company factory in Chicago, 176 policemen attempted to intervene in a fight between employees who were striking for an 8-hour workday and “scab” strikebreakers, and two of the crowd of 200 employees were killed.

Attention Workingmen!

MASS MEETING

TO-NIGHT, at 7.30 o'clock,

HAYMARKET, Randolph St, Bet. Desplaines and Halsted.

Good Speakers will be present to denounce the latest atrocious act of the police, the shooting of our fellow-workmen yesterday afternoon.

THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

Achtung Arbeiter!

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

May 4, Tuesday: Queen Victoria officially opened the Colonial and Indian Exhibition in Royal Albert Hall, London. Ode for the Opening of the Colonial and Indian Exhibition by Arthur Sullivan to words of Tennyson was performed for the initial time.

Chichester Bell and Charles Sumner Tainter received 3 patents to cover improvements on their graphophone (this would be the first practical phonograph).

During a protest rally at Haymarket Square in Chicago, about the police killings of the previous day, someone lobbed a bomb and the police opened fire. Many people were injured and there were at least 10 killed, including policemen. Eight of the activists would be singled out for prosecution and convicted of inciting to riot through “inflammatory speeches and publications.” One of the accused men would comment sarcastically to the trial judge that they ought to hang his wife and children with him — since in attending the Haymarket speeches these innocents had been doing exactly as much as he had. Four of these thought-criminals would be hanged, and another would commit suicide while awaiting hanging.

Lysander Spooner would write about these martyred workers in Boston’s anarchist magazine Liberty.

After passions had cooled and it had come to be recognized that no link had been established between them and the unknown person who had thrown the bomb, the three still surviving eventually would receive full pardons!

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

When the four men would be hanged, they would be hanged inside all-enveloping white shrouds with hoods, and short ropes would be used so that when they fell their necks would not snap. They were intended to hang there jerking, swinging from side to side and dying slowly by strangulation.

Those who know something about this sort of thing (I do, since I was trapped inside the Khomeini Revolution in Iran in 1977-1979) know that there is always the possibility of reverse responsibility, or what is known as a “false flag” maneuver. That is to say, just as it turned out to be SAVAK, the Shahanshah’s secret police, who were responsible for the Rex Theater tragedy in Abadan in which so many innocent families were burned to death rather than the fundamentalist revolutionaries who were the prime suspects at the time, so also, in the case of the Haymarket incident, it is at least theoretically possible that it was a policeman who threw the dynamite that set off the incident, in an attempt to make the Chicago anarchists more culpable and therefore more vulnerable to police action. That possibility should at least have been the cause to some investigation, and most definitely it was not.

Since we have suicide bombers today and most of them seem to be Muslim, there is a detail of these 19th-Century circumstances to which we now should be paying careful attention. It is that in this American labor situation is the origin of the idea of the suicide bomber despite the fact that there were zero Muslims on the scene. Nitroglycerin had been around since the 1840s, and Alfred Nobel had figured out a way to make the substance stable enough to be carried and handled by mixing it with an inert filler material. It was being speculated that if every worker had a few pounds of dynamite in his pocket, every worker would be being treated with respect: dynamite as the great equalizer. In this year, therefore, the wife of Albert Parsons, an anarchist, suggested that since there were always unfortunates who were contemplating drowning themselves, there was a better course that might be made available to them: they be rendered useful to society, and make their deaths meaningful, by becoming suicide bombers. By their death as a sacrifice they could make themselves a force of protest on behalf of justice in an otherwise out-of-all-control labor situation. Perhaps, if enough workers could be persuaded to make themselves suicide bombers, killing themselves in conjunction with the police and capitalists who were oppressing them, she speculated, it would be possible to get the average workweek down from 60 hours to, say, 48 — so that laborers could have some time to feel the sunshine and smell the flowers:

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

We want to feel the sunshine
We want to smell the flowers;
We're sure God has willed it,
And we mean to have eight hours.

November 19, Friday: Fong Ah Sing was hanged inside the county jail of San Francisco, California for having, on October 18th, 1881, shot dead Choy Cum, a Chinese courtesan (Choy Cum had spilled water on him).

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1887

September 23, Friday: John Kernaghan, the owner of a saloon, was hanged inside San Francisco, California's Broadway Street jailhouse for having beaten to death his sister-in-law Martha Hood, whom he felt had been humiliating him by talking about his financial troubles and general incompetence, with a hammer.

September 30, Friday: Robert Louis Stevenson boarded a train in New-York to Saranac Lake, New York, where a recently opened open-air treatment center for phthisis, the Trudeau Institute, seemed to offer some prospects of relief.

Sare Bo Lee was hanged for having on October 3d, 1882 caused the murder of Chu Ah Chuck. The victim had been ambushed by a couple of gunmen in the heart of Chinatown, apparently because he had been cooperating with the police. This was part of the "Tong Wars" that scarred San Francisco's Chinatown from the early 1880s through 1921. Many citizens, including the Chief of Police and the former District Attorney, had unsuccessfully sought clemency for him. Sare Bo Lee had protested his innocence throughout his trial and continued to plead his innocence while he was standing on the trap inside the county jailhouse of San Francisco, California.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1888

The State of New York took charge of all executions within its jurisdiction. It constructed its 1st “electric chair” with no purpose whatever to diminish the pain or indignity of the execution punishment for crime (this device would not be tried out on a human subject until 1890).

COLDBLOODED MURDER

By this point perhaps 15% of the newborn males of the US population were being circumcised. John Harvey Kellogg (the breakfast cereal freak!) offered a “pain and punishment are what is to be desired” attitude in a treatise on treatment for self-abuse and its effects:

A remedy for [masturbation] which is almost always successful in small boys is circumcision. The operation should be performed by a surgeon without administering an anesthetic, as the pain attending the operation will have a salutary effect upon the mind, especially if it be connected with the idea of punishment.

September 14, Friday: In the San Francisco, California jailhouse, Alexander Goldenson was hanged for having gunned down 14-year-old Mary Kelly on November 10th, 1886. There had been, during the trial, an attempt to lynch Goldenson, and then he had attempted to take his own life with poison in jail. Goldenson had been 18 years of age at the time of this murder. He had had a crush on this 14-year-old and she had rebuffed him. As he stood on the gallows trap he held a photo of Mary Kelly and an American flag. The Examiner would report on the following day that “Sheriff McMann erred on the side of generosity in the manner of distributing passes to the execution. There was also some lack of discrimination in the selection of the recipients. As a consequence the capacity of the jail was overtaxed, many with tickets were unable to get in, and the crowd was one of the noisiest and most turbulent that ever thronged Broadway in front of the old jail. The experiment of holding the Sheriff’s guests back until an hour before the execution also proved unfortunate, for there proved so many of them that the experienced ones promptly recognized the fact that the jail’s capacity was not equal to containing all, and began to make a fight for a position to command the jail steps when the ticket-takers put in an appearance. Their movement started the remainder of the crowd, and by 11 o’clock there was a brawling, sweating, swearing, yelling, laughing mob of 1,500 men, fighting shoulder to shoulder, every man against his neighbor, to advance toward a common goal – a commanding view of the death of a murderer.”

December 28, Friday: In San Francisco, California’s Broadway county jail, Leong Sing was hanged for the murder of his uncle Leong Chun at Chun’s restaurant at 830 Washington Street on March 30th, 1877. The uncle had been treasurer of the Leong Si Tong and the murderer had asked for his $5 membership fee back. When his uncle had refused Sing had shot him 3 times. This hanging would be one of the final official acts of Sheriff William McMann. The following sheriff, Charles Laumeister, had already been elected but had not yet assumed office. Nevertheless, the Sheriff-elect attended the execution along with his new Chief Jailer Michael Smith, and his new Undersheriff Peter Deveney.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1890

February 14, Friday: Wong Ah Hing (AKA Ah Tee), who had fatally stabbed his uncle Wong Ming See by whom he had felt humiliated, would be the final person hanged within the municipality of San Francisco, California. Future executions of this city's criminals would take place in a state prison across the bay, San Quentin.

FINAL EXECUTIONS
May 26, 1868	Michael Barrett	Fenian hanged outside London's Newgate Prison — the final public execution in Britain
February 14, 1890	Wong Ah Hing (AKA Ah Tee)	last hanging in San Francisco, California (subsequently, hangings would be at San Quentin, a new state prison across the bay)
February 2, 1905	Louis Crowie and Richard Crowie	final hangings on the island of St. Helena

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

August 6, Wednesday: New York introduced the electric chair for capital punishment. At Auburn State Prison at 6:00AM on this day it was used for the 1st time, to officiously murder one William Kemmler of Buffalo, who had whacked his common-law wife with a hatchet. It was hoped that electrocution by alternating current would be somewhat more humane than hanging, although Kemmler's lawyers appealed, terming such a manner of death to be both cruel and unusual. George Westinghouse, Jr., a backers of AC current, supported the convict's appeal, while Thomas Edison, a backer of the rival direct current, plumped for the use of Westinghouse's AC in the execution (we presume that Edison's intent was to demonstrate that our nation should standardize on the safer DC — and thus make him an even richer inventor).

After Westinghouse's AC had been fed to him for 17 seconds, the badly burned Kemmler was noticeably still alive — but the supply had been depleted. After allowing the generator to charge up again, an attempt was made to stop the man's moaning, this time with the voltage increased to 2,000 volts. After the AC had been on for more than a minute, smoke was rising from Kemmler's head and the stench of burning flesh made it obvious that the convict had indeed passed on.

Elsewhere in the state of New York on this day, "Cy" Young was pitching his 1st major-league baseball game.

SPORTS

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1891

Ida B. Wells started her lifelong anti-lynching campaign by establishing her own newspaper, the Memphis Free Speech, to draw attention to the brutal lynch-mob murders of African-Americans.

CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1893

February 1, Sunday: The newspapers were announcing that Martin Kellogg, who has been acting as president of the University of California, had just been formally elected by the regents to that position. Regent Bartlett had made the nominating speech and this had been seconded by Regent Martin. Several regents then offered strong and warm speeches in opposition, feeling a need for an infusion of new and young blood so that the university might achieve proper standing. Their last of the votes taken added up to 8 over 5.

José Martí offered Antonio Maceo a leading place in the new Cuban revolutionary movement (Maceo would not immediately respond).

Henry Smith, an American of color, had at some earlier point been arrested for drunkenness in Paris, Texas ("Pinhook," renamed in honor of then-Governor Mirabeau Buonaparte Lamar), and beaten with a nightstick by Henry Vance, a policeman, while in custody. This policeman's 3-year-old daughter Myrtle subsequently disappeared. Although there were no clues, Smith obviously had motivation to seek revenge so the white people of the town naturally had presumed that he probably was responsible, and then when he had learned he was being accused he had fled to near Hope, Arkansas — which more or less confirmed in the minds of the white townspeople that they must indeed have identified the perpetrator. A special lynching platform was prepared, decorated as we can see with the word JUSTICE:

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

The accused was transported to this venue atop a specially prepared carnival float. Naked and tied to a post, he was tortured with red-hot irons from bottom upward for 50 minutes by the father of the little girl, several uncles, and her 12-year-old brother, with a crowd of good Christians from all surrounding towns, extending 600 yards in every direction, cheering them on. After the irons had finally been shoved into his eyes and down his throat, kerosene was poured on the body, cottonseed hulls were dumped around him, and he was set afire. Smith succeeded several times in rolling himself out of the flames and was shoved back in. Afterward bones, teeth, and pieces of char would be in demand as souvenirs of the occasion.

Soon there would be offerings of “phonographic entertainment” on city streets across America. For a fee pedestrians could listen while, purportedly, Henry Smith screamed, and pleaded to be put immediately to death — four or five paying customers at a time through multiple sets of earphones connected by air-tubes to a rotating cylinder. However, in this year no adequate electric microphone had as yet been developed and thus recording could only be achieved by use of the same horn from which the sounds were then reproduced. For this cylinder to have been an authentic Edison recording, such a recording horn would have needed to have been positioned up on the platform directly in front of the condemned man, where he could see that he was being recorded for the idle amusement of his torturers, and knowing that he was being thus recorded, it seems most unlikely that he would have cooperated. In addition, there are no photographs that contain any evidence of the presence of such an apparatus, and no 1st-hand descriptions of the lynching ceremony made any reference to such sound-recording activities. It seems, therefore, that this cylinder, labeled “Burning of Smith at Paris, Texas” in the 1899 catalog of the Talking Machine Company of Chicago — no copies of the cylinder still exist — must have been a studio dramatic recreation of memories of the sounds of the torture — pleading and screams performed by professional singers who were accustomed to the needs of the recording device. Of course, the interesting information revealed by this history is that idle passers-by in the city streets of America were willing to pay a coin and stand and listen in public to such dubious and disgusting material. There would seem to have been no sense of shame.

Toward the end of this year, one of the very 1st films would be made and copyrighted — a short one of Fred Ott sneezing for the moving picture camera. The film would be titled “The Edison Kinetoscopic Record of a Sneeze.” That film was, of course, silent — although it is perfectly possible that a hidden performer produced a suitable sound effect.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

March 3, Friday: Legislation had been passed in 1891 redirecting all California executions to the State Prison. The 1st such State Prison execution took place in San Quentin prison when Jose Gabriel, a Native American, was hanged for a murder that had been committed in San Diego county. There would be only a few more hangings in individual California counties.

April 14, Friday: An American of color, name unknown, was lynched in Paris, Texas by being burned at the stake.

COLDBLOODED MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1894

January: Still majestic in his wrath, Frederick Douglass delivered “The Lessons of the Hour” at a church in the District of Columbia, carefully detailing the ways in which color prejudice worked to keep blacks down. “A white man has but to blacken his face and commit a crime,” he said, “to have some Negro lynched in his stead. An abandoned woman has only to start to cry that she has been insulted by a black man, to have him arrested and summarily murdered by the mob.” More than 850 Southern blacks had been executed by officials or lynched by mobs between 1890 and 1892.

COLDBLOODED MURDER

The usual trumped-up charge of sexual assault on white women, Douglass offered, was shrewdly calculated to drive from the suspect “all sympathy and all fair play.” Moreover, it was a charge not merely against the individual but against all blacks: “When a white man steals, robs or murders, his crime is visited upon his own head alone.... When [a black man] commits a crime the whole race is made to suffer.” The so-called race problem, Douglass said, “cannot be solved by keeping the Negro poor, degraded, ignorant and half-starved.... It cannot be solved by keeping the wages of the laborer back by fraud.... It cannot be done by ballot-box stuffing ... or by confusing Negro voters by cunning devices. It can, however, be done, and very easily done.... Let the white people of the North and South conquer their ... race prejudice. Banish the idea that one class must rule over another. Recognize ... that the rights of the humblest citizen are as worthy of protection as are those of the highest, and ... your Republic will stand and flourish forever.”

On the following screen is an illustration of the races of humankind, prepared during this year:

March 3, Saturday: Lou Tye, an American of color, was lynched in Harlan County, Kentucky by being burned at the stake.

COLDBLOODED MURDER

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1895

May 19, Sunday: At Dos Ríos in eastern Cuba, José Martí was killed from ambush as he made his 1st appearance on the battlefield. He had reached 42 years of age. The rebels were unable to recover the body.

Three American men of color, Echols, Crowley and Brooks, given names unknown, were lynched near Madison, Florida by being burned at the stake.⁶²¹

COLDBLOODED MURDER

October 29, Sunday: Henry Hillard, an American of color, was lynched in Tyler, Texas by being burned while chained to an iron stake before a white crowd of perhaps 5,000 citizens. Afterward, scorched mementos were distributed to those who desired them.

COLDBLOODED MURDER

621. Pardon me, but you know how sardonic I am! This reminds me of a joke told during the recent “Compassionate Conservative” Presidential campaign, to the effect that although a Liberal would give a man a fire that would keep him warm for merely an hour, Compassionate Conservatives know that when you set a man on fire, he will be warm for the rest of his life. (Bearing in mind that a Bush was in charge of the State of Florida, and that he apparently helped engineer the election of another Bush, his Compassionate Conservative brother, as President, and that he achieved this in part by disenfranchising a large number of black Florida voters through having them falsely accused at the polling places of being ex-convicts ineligible to cast a ballot — this sardonic humor may unfortunately not be too far afield.)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1896

January 12, Sunday: Letter from Lev Nikolævich Tolstòy to Ernest Howard Crosby about Christian nonresistance as exemplified for fully half a century by the Reverend Adin Ballou, as translated by Professor Leo Wiener in 1905:

My Dear Crosby: — I am very glad to hear of your activity and that it is beginning to attract attention. Fifty years ago Garrison's proclamation of non-resistance only cooled people toward him, and the whole fifty years' activity of Ballou in this direction was met with stubborn silence. I read with great pleasure in Peace the beautiful ideas of the American authors in regard to non-resistance. I make an exception only in the case of Mr. Bemis's old, unfounded opinion, which calumniates Christ in assuming that Christ's expulsion of the cattle from the temple means that he struck the men with a whip, and commanded his disciples to do likewise. The ideas expressed by these writers, especially by H. Newton and G. Herron, are beautiful, but it is to be regretted that they do not answer the question which Christ put before men, but answer the question which the so-called orthodox teachers of the churches, the chief and most dangerous enemies of Christianity, have put in its place.

Mr. Higginson says that the law of non-resistance is not admissible as a general rule. H. Newton says that the practical results of the application of Christ's teaching will depend on the degree of faith which men will have in this teaching. Mr. C. Martyn assumes that the stage at which we are is not yet suited for the application of the teaching about non-resistance. G. Herron says that in order to fulfil the law of non-resistance, it is necessary to learn to apply it to life. Mrs. Livermore says the same, thinking that the fulfilment of the law of non-resistance is possible only in the future.

All these opinions treat only the question as to what would happen to people if all were put to the necessity of fulfilling the law of non-resistance; but, in the first place, it is quite impossible to compel all men to accept the law of non-resistance, and, in the second, if this were possible, it would be a most glaring negation of the very principle which is being established. To compel all men not to practise violence against others! Who is going to compel men?

In the third place, and above all else, the question, as put by Christ, does not consist in this, whether non-resistance may become a universal law for all humanity, but what each man must do in order to fulfil his destiny, to save his soul, and do God's work, which reduces itself to the same.

The Christian teaching does not prescribe any laws for all men; it does not say, "follow such and such rules under fear of punishment, and you will all be happy," but explains to each separate man his position in the world and shows him what for him personally results from this position. The Christian teaching says to each individual man that his life, if he recognizes his life to be his, and its aim, the worldly good of his personality or of the personalities of other men, can have no rational meaning, because this good, posited as the end of life, can never be attained, because, in the first place, all beings strive after the goods of the worldly life, and these goods are always attained by one set of beings to the detriment of others, so that every separate man cannot receive the desired good, but, in all probability, must even endure many unnecessary sufferings in his struggle for these unattained goods; in the second place, because if a man even attains the worldly goods, these, the more of them he attains, satisfy him less and less, and he wishes for more and more new ones; in the third place, mainly because the longer a man lives, the more inevitably do old age, diseases, and finally death, which destroys the possibility of any worldly good, come to him.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Thus, if a man considers his life to be his, and its end to be the worldly good, for himself or for other men, this life can have for him no rational meaning. Life receives a rational meaning only when a man understands that the recognition of his life as his own, and the good of personality, of his own or of that of others, as its end, is an error, and that the human life does not belong to him, who has received this life from some one, but to Him who produced this life, and so its end must not consist in the attainment of his own good or of the good of others, but only in the fulfilment of the will of Him who produced it. Only with such a comprehension of life does it receive a rational meaning, and its end, which consists in the fulfilment of God's will, become attainable, and, above all, only with such a comprehension does man's activity become clearly defined, and he no longer is subject to despair and suffering, which were inevitable with his former comprehension. "The world and I in it," such a man says to himself, "exist by the will of God. I cannot know the whole world and my relation to it, but I can know what is wanted of me by God, who sent men into this world, endless in time and space, and therefore inaccessible to my understanding, because this is revealed to me in the tradition, that is, in the aggregate reason of the best people in the world, who lived before me, and in my reason, and in my heart, that is, in the striving of my whole being.

"In the tradition, the aggregate of the wisdom of all the best men, who lived before me, I am told that I must act toward others as I wish that others would act toward me; my reason tells me that the greatest good of men is possible only when all men will act likewise.

"My heart is at peace and joyful only when I abandon myself to the feeling of love for men, which demands the same. And then I can not only know what I must do, but also the cause for which my activity is necessary and defined.

"I cannot grasp the whole divine work, for which the world exists and lives, but the divine work which is being accomplished in this world and in which I am taking part with my life is accessible to me. This work is the destruction of the discord and of the struggle among men and other beings, and the establishment among men of the greatest union, concord, and love; this work is the realization of what the Jewish prophets promised, saying that the time will come when all men shall be taught the truth, when the spears shall be forged into pruning-hooks, and the scythes and swords into ploughshares, and when the lion shall lie with the lamb."

Thus, the man of the Christian comprehension of life not only knows how he must act in life, but also what he must do.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

He must do what contributes to the establishment of the kingdom of God in the world. To do this, a man must fulfil the inner demands of God's will, that is, he must act amicably toward others, as he would like others to do to him. Thus the inner demands of a man's soul coincide with that external end of life which is placed before him.

And here though we have an indication which is so clear to a man of the Christian comprehension, and incontestable from two sides, as to what the meaning and end of human life consists in, and how a man must act, and what he must do, and what not, there appear certain people, who call themselves Christians, who decide that in such and such cases a man must depart from God's law and the common cause of life, which are given to him, and must act contrary to the law and the common cause of life, because, according to their ratiocination, the consequences of the acts committed according to God's law may be profitless and disadvantageous for men.

Man, according to the Christian teaching, is God's workman. The workman does not know his master's whole business, but the nearest aim to be attained by his work is revealed to him, and he is given definite indications as to what he should do; especially definite are the indications as to what he must not do, in order that he may not work against the aim for the attainment of which he was sent to work. In everything else he is given complete liberty. and so for a man who has grasped the Christian conception of life the meaning of his life is clear and rational, and he cannot have a moment of wavering as to how he should act in life and what he ought to do, in order to fulfil the destiny of his life.

According to the law given him in the tradition, in his reason, and in his heart, a man must always act toward another as he wishes to have done to him: he must contribute to the establishment of love and union among men; but according to the decision of these far-sighted people, a man must, while the fulfilment of the law, according to their opinion, is still premature, do violence, deprive of liberty, kill people, and with this contribute, not to union of love, but to the irritation and enagement of people. It is as though a mason, who is put to do certain definite work, who knows that he is taking part with others in the building of a house, and who has a clear and indubitable command from the master himself that is to lay a wall, should receive the command from other masons like him, who, like him, do not know the general plan of the structure and what is useful for the common work, to stop laying the wall, and to undo the work of the others.

Wonderful delusion! The being that breathes today and disappears tomorrow, that has one definite, incontestable law given to him, as to how he is to pass his short term of life, imagines that he knows what is necessary and useful and appropriate for all men, for the whole world, for that world which moves without cessation, and goes on developing, and in the name of this usefulness, which is differently understood by each of them, he prescribes to himself and to others for a time to depart from the unquestionable law, which is given to him and to all men, and not to act toward all men as he wants others to act toward him, not to bring love into the world, but to practise violence, to deprive of freedom, to punish, to kill, to introduce malice into the world, when it is found that this is necessary. and he enjoins us to do so knowing that the most terrible cruelties, tortures, murders of men, from the Inquisitions and punishments and terrors of all the revolutions to the present bestialities of the anarchists and the massacres of them, have all proceeded from this, that men suppose that they know what people and the world need; knowing that at any given moment there are always two opposite parties, each of which asserts that it is necessary to use violence against the opposite party, – the men of state against the anarchists, the anarchists against the men of state; the English against the Americans, the Americans against the English; the English against the Germans; and so forth, in all possible combinations and permutations.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Not only does a man of the Christian concept of life see clearly by reflection that there is no ground whatever for his departure from the law of his life, as clearly indicated to him by God, in order to follow the accidental, frail, frequently contradictory demands of men; but if he has been living the Christian life for some time, and has developed in himself the Christian moral sensitiveness, he can positively not act as people demand that he shall, not only as the result of reflection, but also of feeling.

As it is for many men of our world impossible to subject a child to torture and to kill it, though such a torture may save a hundred other people, so a whole series of acts becomes impossible for a man who has developed the Christian sensitiveness of his heart in himself. A Christian, for example, who is compelled to take part in court proceedings, where a man may be sentenced to capital punishment, to take part in matters of forcible seizure of other people's property, in discussions about the declaration of war, or in preparations for the same, to say nothing of war itself, finds himself in the same position in which a good man would be, if he were compelled to torture or kill a child. It is not that he decides by reflection what he ought not to do, but that he cannot do what is demanded of him, because for a man there exists the moral impossibility, just as there is a physical impossibility, of committing certain acts. Just as it is impossible for a man to lift up a mountain, as it is impossible for a good man to kill a child, so it is impossible for a man who lives a Christian life to take part in violence. Of what significance for such a man can be the reflections that for some imaginary good he must do what has become morally impossible for him?

How, then, is a man to act when he sees the obvious harm of following the law of love and the law of non-resistance, which results from it? How is a man to act –this example is always adduced– when a robber in his sight kills or injures a child, and when the child cannot be saved otherwise than by killing the robber?

It is generally assumed that, when they adduce such an example, there can be no other answer to the question than that the robber ought to be killed, in order that the child be saved. But this answer is given so emphatically and so quickly only because we are not only in the habit of acting in this manner in the case of the defence of a child, but also in the case of the expansion of the borders of a neighbouring state to the detriment of our own, or in the case of the transportation of lace across the border, or even in the case of the defence of the fruits of our garden against depredations by passers-by.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

It is assumed that it is necessary to kill the robber in order to save the child, but we need only stop and think on what ground a man should act thus, be he a Christian or a non-Christian, to convince ourselves that such an act can have no rational foundations, and is considered necessary only because two thousand years ago such a mode of action was considered just and people were in the habit of acting thus. Why should a non-Christian, who does not recognize God and the meaning of life in the fulfilment of His will, kill the robber, in defending the child? To say nothing of this, that in killing the robber he is certainly killing, but does not know for certain until the very last moment whether the robber will kill the child or not, to say nothing of this irregularity: who has decided that the life of the child is more necessary and better than the life of the robber?

If a non-Christian does not recognize God, and does not consider the meaning of life to consist in the fulfilment of God's will, it is only calculation, that is, the consideration as to what is more profitable for him and for all men, the continuation of the robber's life or that of the child, which guides the choice of his acts. But to decide this, he must know what will become of the child which he saves, and what would become of the robber if he did not kill him. But that he cannot know. And so, if he is a non-Christian, he has not rational foundation for saving the child through the death of the robber.

But if the man is a Christian, and so recognizes God and sees the meaning of life in the fulfilment of His will, no matter what terrible robber may attack any innocent and beautiful child, he has still less cause to depart from the law given him by God and to do to the robber what the robber wants to do to the child; he may implore the robber, may place his body between the robber and his victim, but there is one thing he cannot do, — he cannot consciously depart from the law of God, the fulfilment of which forms the meaning of his life. It is very likely that, as the result of his bad bringing up and of his animality, a man, being a pagan or a Christian, will kill the robber, not only in the defence of the child, but also in his own defence or in the defence of his purse, but that will by no means signify that it is right to do so, that it is right to accustom ourselves and others to think that that ought to be done.

This will only mean that, in spite of the external education and Christianity, the habits of the stone age are still strong in man, that he is capable of committing acts which have long ago been disavowed by his consciousness. A robber in my sight is about to kill a child and I can save it by killing the robber; consequently it is necessary under certain conditions to resist evil with violence.

A man is in danger of his life and can be saved only through my lie; consequently it is necessary in certain cases to lie. A man is starving, and I cannot save him otherwise than by stealing; consequently it is necessary in certain cases to steal.

I lately read a story by Coppee, in which an orderly kills his officer, who has his life insured, and thus saves his honour and the life of his family. Consequently in certain cases it is right to kill.

Such imaginary cases and the conclusions drawn from them prove only this, that there are men who know that it is not right to steal, to lie, to kill, but who are so loath to stop doing this that they use all the efforts of their mind in order to justify their acts. There does not exist a moral rule for which it would be impossible to invent a situation when it would be hard to decide which is more moral, the departure from the rule or its fulfilment. The same is true of the question of non-resistance to evil: men know that it is bad, but they are so anxious to live by violence, that they use all the efforts of their mind, not for the elucidation of all the evil which is produced by man's recognition of the right to do violence to others, but for the defence of this right. But such invented cases in no way prove that the rules about not lying, stealing, killing are incorrect.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

"Fais ce que doit, advienne que pourra, -do what is right, and let come what may,"- is an expression of profound wisdom. Each of us knows unquestionably what he ought to do, but none of us knows or can know what will happen. Thus we are brought to the same, not only by this, that we must do what is right, but also by this, that we know what is right, and do not know at all what will come and result from our acts.

The Christian teaching is a teaching as to what a man must do for the fulfilment of the will of Him who sent him into the world. But the reflections as to what consequences we assume to result from such or such acts of men not only have nothing in common with Christianity, but are that very delusion which destroys Christianity.

No one has yet seen the imaginary robber with the imaginary child, and all the horrors, which fill history and contemporary events, have been produced only because men imagine that they can know the consequences of the possible acts.

How is this? Men used to live a beastly life, violating and killing all those whom it was advantageous for them to violate and kill, and even eating one another, thinking that that was right. Then there came a time, when, thousands of years ago, even in the time of Moses, there appeared the consciousness in men that it was bad to violate and kill one another. But there were some men for whom violence was advantageous, and they did not recognize the fact, and assured themselves and others that it was not always bad to violate and kill men, but that there were cases when this was necessary, useful, and even good. And acts of violence and murder, though not as frequent and cruel, were continued, but with this difference, that those who committed them justified them on the ground of usefulness to men. It was this false justification of violence that Christ arraigned. He showed that, since every act of violence could be justified as actually happens, when two enemies do violence to one another and both consider their violence justifiable, and there is no chance of verifying the justice of the determination of either, it is necessary not to believe in any justifications of violence, and under no condition, as at first was thought right by humanity, is it necessary to make use of them.

It would seem that men who profess Christianity would have carefully to unveil this deception, because in the unveiling of this deception does one of the chief manifestations of Christianity consist. But the very opposite has happened: men to whom violence was advantageous, and who did not want to give up these advantages, took upon themselves the exclusive propaganda of Christianity, and, preaching it, asserted that, since there are cases in which the non-application of violence produces more evil than its application (the imaginary robber who kills the child), we must not fully accept Christ's teaching about non-resistance to evil, and that we may depart from this teaching in the defence of our lives and of those of other men, in the defense of our country, the protection of society from madmen and malefactors, and in many other cases. but the decision of the question as to when Christ's teaching ought to be set aside was left to those very men who made use of violence. Thus Christ's teaching about non-resistance to evil turned out to be absolutely set aside, and, what is worse than all that, those very men whom Christ arraigned began to consider themselves the exclusive preachers and expounders of His teaching. But the light shineth in the dark, and the false preachers of Christianity are again arraigned by His teaching. We can think of the structure of the world as we please, we may do what is advantageous and agreeable for us to do, and use violence against people under the pretext of doing good to men, but it is absolutely impossible to assert that, in do so, we are professing Christ's teaching, because Christ arraigned that very deception. The truth will sooner or later be made manifest, and will arraign the deceivers, even as it does now.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Let only the question of the human life be put correctly, as it was put by Christ, and not as it was corrupted by the churches, and all the deceptions which by the churches have been heaped on Christ's teaching will fall of their own accord.

The question is not whether it will be good or bad for human society to follow the law of love and the resulting law of non-resistance, but whether you -a being that lives today and is dying by degrees tomorrow and every moment- will now, this very minute, fully do the will of Him who sent you and clearly expressed it in tradition and in your reason and heart, or whether you want to act contrary to this will. As soon as the question is put in this form, there will be but one answer: I want at once, this very minute, without any delay, without waiting for anyone, and without considering the seeming consequences, with all my strength to fulfil what alone I am indubitably commanded to do by Him who sent me into the world, and in no case, under no condition, will I, can I, do what is contrary to it, because in this lies the only possibility of my rational, unwretched life.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1897

November 27, Saturday: Nathan Willis, an American of color, was lynched in South Carolina by being burned at the stake.

COLDBLOODED MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1898

June 3, Friday: William Street, an American of color, was lynched in Doyline, Louisiana by being burned at the stake.

COLDBLOODED MURDER

August 6, Sunday: Richard Coleman, an American of color, was lynched in Maysville, Kentucky by being burned at the stake.

COLDBLOODED MURDER

October 21, Saturday: “Joe” Leflore, an American of color, was lynched in St. Ann’s, Mississippi by being burned at the stake.

COLDBLOODED MURDER

December: At the urging of Estrada-Palma, El Partido Revolucionario Cubano, the Cuban Revolutionary Party, founded by José Martí, was dissolved.

Louis Deibler abdicated as the beheader of the French, in favour of his son Anatole Deibler.

HEADCHOPPING

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1899

January 2, Monday: Anatole Deibler carried out his 1st beheading of a Frenchman.

HEADCHOPPING

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1900

The US Census indicated that Charles Wesley Moffet or Moffett was living in Iowa.

During the previous century, of course, the human population had been exploding:

As of 1790 the center of the human population of the USA had been a little town just about a day's travel inland

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

from Maryland. By this period the center of population had relocated.

(Nowadays, of course, we've all been coming from one or another center in Missouri.)

The 12th US national census counted 12 million Roman Catholics, 6 million Methodists, 5 million Baptists, 1.5 million Lutherans, 1.5 million Presbyterians, 1 million Jews, 700,00 Episcopalians, 350,000 Mormons, 80,000 Christian Scientists, and 75,000 Unitarians.

Here is a period statistic in regard to cause of death which did not appear in our federal census, a statistic

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

allegedly tabulated by John Edward Bruce (Bruce Grit) of the Chicago Tribune: during this year 117 black Americans were lynched, which would make it that a lynching was occurring about every third day.

One strange fact that appears, in this record of one year's lynchings, is that accusations of sexual misconduct play a remarkably small role. Whereas the usual story told about lynching was that it was motivated by a desire of the white man to restrict the black man's access to white females, this usual story is not at all corroborated by the statistic for the year 1900.

The Holy Roman Catholic Church resolved once and for all in this year the vexing issue of contesting official foreskin relics of Jesus Christ (there had been some 8 to 18 such contending objects scattered across Europe) by warning that anyone who thenceforward wrote about or spoke about a Holy Prepuce would be excommunicated.

January 9, Tuesday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Ripley, Tennessee, Henry and Roger Giveney, suspected of murder, were lynched.

January 11, Thursday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in West Spring, South Carolina, Rufus Salter, suspected of arson, was lynched.

The Imperial Chinese government issued a decree to local authorities, that seemed to suggest that they ought not to interfere with the Boxers.

January 16, Tuesday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so — because of this list we know what happened on this day in Henning, Tennessee to a man, Anderson Gause, who was under suspicion of having aided a murderer to escape.

Edith Holländer (who would be Anne Frank's mother) was born in Aachen, Germany. She was a Jew.

ANTISEMITISM

JUDAISM

February 17, Saturday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Basket Mills, South Carolina, William Burts, accused of having made a threat to commit murder, was lynched.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

March 4, Sunday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Clyde, North Carolina, George Ratliffe, accused of having committed rape, was lynched, and that on this day in Selo Hatchel, Alabama, James Crosby, accused of making threats, was lynched.

March 10, Saturday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Hernando, Mississippi, Thomas Clayton, accused of having committed rape, was lynched.

March 11, Sunday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Jennings, Nebraska, a black American man, name unknown, accused of having committed murder, was lynched.

March 18, Sunday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Marietta, Georgia, John Bailey, accused of having attempted an assault, was lynched, and in Lee County, Alabama, Charles Humphries, also accused of having attempted an assault, was lynched.

March 22, Thursday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Canhaft, North Carolina, George Ritter, accused of being an informer, was lynched.

Of all lynchings, however, the states of Virginia and North Carolina had by far the fewest, at least on record, of any of the states of the Old South. They have arrived at 100 recorded lynchings each (the overwhelming majority of these having been of course of non-white individuals). Here is how that raw statistic contrasts with other regions of our nation in which various lynchings have been recorded over the years to have occurred.

	White Victims	Non-White Victims	Total
Montana	82	2	84
Colorado	66	2	68
Nebraska	52	5	57
Kansas	35	19	54
West Virginia	20	28	48
Indiana	33	14	47
California	41	2	43
New Mexico	33	3	36

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Wyoming	30	5	35
Illinois	15	19	34
Arizona	31	0	31
Maryland	2	27	29
South Dakota	27	0	27
Ohio	10	16	26
Washington	25	1	26
Oregon	20	1	21
Idaho	20	0	20
Iowa	17	2	19
North Dakota	13	3	16
Minnesota	5	4	9
Michigan	7	1	8
Pennsylvania	2	6	8
Utah	6	2	8
Nevada	6	0	6
Wisconsin	6	0	6
New York	1	1	2
Delaware	0	1	1
New Jersey	0	1	1
Vermont	1	0	1

March 23, Friday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Ripley, Tennessee, Luis Rice, accused of having given testimony, was lynched.

March 24, Saturday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Emporia, Virginia, Walter Cotton, accused of having committed murder, was lynched.

Construction began on the New York city subway system.

March 26, Monday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Belair, Maryland, Lewis Harris, accused of having committed rape, was lynched.

March 27, Tuesday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Deer Creek Bridge, Mississippi, William Edward, accused of having committed murder, was lynched.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

April 3, Tuesday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Berryville, Georgia, Allen Brooks, accused of having committed rape, was lynched.

April 5, Thursday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Southampton County, Virginia, a black man whose name is not of record, accused of having committed arson, was lynched.

The St. Helena Guardian advised that:

In a few days the troopship Milwaukee escorted by the HMS Niobe will arrive with prisoners of war. No unauthorized person will be allowed on the Wharf at the time of disembarkation. The Police will assist, as far as they can, the Military acting under the orders of the Officer Commanding the Troops in keeping order. His Excellency the Governor expresses the hope that the Inhabitants will treat the prisoners with that courtesy and consideration which should be extended to all men who have fought bravely in what they have considered the cause of their Country and will help in repressing any unseemly demonstration which individuals might exhibit.

April 16, Monday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day near Tunica, Mississippi, Moses York, accused of having committed murder, was lynched.

April 19, Thursday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Brownsville, Mississippi, Henry McAfee, accused of having attempted assault, was lynched.

April 20, Friday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Tazewell, West Virginia, John Peters, accused of having committed rape, was lynched.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

April 22, Sunday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Allentown, Florida, John Hughley, accused of having plotted to kill white people, was lynched.

Julian Hawthorne acknowledged in an article "Famous American Authors / Henry David Thoreau" for the Denver Sunday Post that: "Thoreau died two years after I returned to Concord, so that my personal knowledge of him was not great" (this may well be counted as the final true sentence the guy would utter, in which the name "Thoreau" would appear).

April 26, Thursday Charles Francis Richter was born.

April 28, Saturday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Marshall, Missouri, Mindee Chowgee, accused of having committed murder, was lynched.

April 30, Monday Casey Jones was killed in a train wreck in Vaughn, Mississippi while trying to get the Cannonball Express up to schedule.

May 1: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Gloucester, Mississippi, Henry Ratcliff, accused of having attacked a white man, was lynched, and that on this day in Albin, Mississippi, George Gordon, accused of having attacked a white man, was lynched.

May 4: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Douglas, Georgia, Marshall Jones, accused of having committed murder, was lynched, and that on this day in Liberty, Maryland, Henry Darley, accused of having committed rape, was lynched.

May 7, Friday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Geneva, Alabama, a black man whose name is not on the record, accused of having committed rape, was lynched, and that on this day in Amite, Mississippi, a black man whose name is not on the record, accused of no offense, was lynched.

May 9, Sunday: Franklin Benjamin Sanborn read a paper at the semiannual meeting of the Social Science Association.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

May 11, Saturday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Hinton, West Virginia, William Lee, accused of having attempted assault, was lynched.

May 13, Sunday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Harlem, Georgia, Alexander Whitney, accused of having committed murder, was lynched.

May 14, Monday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Grovetown, Georgia, William Willis, accused of having committed murder, was lynched, and that on this day in Brooksville, Florida, two black men whose names are not on the record, accused of having committed murder, were lynched.

May 15, Tuesday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Lena, Louisiana, Henry Harris, accused of having attempted assault, was lynched.

May 16, Wednesday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Cushtusha, Mississippi, Samuel Hinson, accused of having committed an assault, was lynched.

Senator Augustus O. Bacon of Georgia rose in the federal Senate to oppose US occupation of Cuba. He accused the military government of spending many times more for the comfort of American soldiers on the island than would have been the case had they been quartered in the US. This, he offered, was an extravagant and wasteful use of funds. Such a large occupation was not merely unnecessary, it was in fact illegal. He charged that the delay (there has been peace for almost two years) was due to a secret agenda of annexation.

May 22, Tuesday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring more or less every 3d day. Because of this list we know that on this day in Pueblo, Colorado, Calvin Hilburn, accused of having committed murder, was lynched.

May 26, Saturday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring more or less every 3d day. Because of this list we know that on this day in West Point, Arkansas, a black man whose name is not on the record, accused of being a robber, was lynched.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

June 3, Saturday: Her Majesty's ships Lizard, Mohawk, and Wallaroo, from the British Royal Navy's Australian Squadron, were dispatched from Sydney to China to join the squadron commanded by Admiral Sir E.H. Seymour that was being assigned to help put down the Boxer Rebellion.

For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Tutwiler, Mississippi, Dago Pete, accused of having committed rape, was lynched.

June 5: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Newport News, Virginia, W.W. Watts, accused of having committed rape, was lynched.

June 9, Friday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day near Columbia, Georgia, Simon Adams, accused of attempted assault, was lynched.

Muslim troops of General Tung Fu-tsiang entered Peking, and with them large numbers of Boxers.

NOBODY COULD GUESS WHAT WOULD HAPPEN NEXT

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

June 10, Saturday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Snead, Florida, a black man whose name is not on record, accused of having committed murder, and John Sanders, accused of complicity in murder, were lynched, and that on this day in Mississippi City, Mississippi, a black man whose family name was Askew and another black man whose family name was Reese, both suspected of having committed murder, were lynched.

An allied (United Kingdom/Russia/Germany/France/United States/Japan/Italy/Austria) relief force of 2,129 departed Tientsin by train for Peking. Shortly after a telegram was sent to Peking announcing this to the legations, the telegraph line was cut.

The 116th Psalm for women's chorus and orchestra by Franz Schreker was performed for the initial time, as part of the composer's graduation ceremony from Vienna Conservatory.

June 11, Sunday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Metcalf, Georgia, Senny Jefferson, accused of attempted assault, was lynched.

The chancellor of the Japanese legation in Peking, Akira Sugiyama, was killed by regular troops of General Dong Fuxiang (Tung Fu-tsiang).

The relief force reached Langfang, still a distance from Peking, and drove off Boxers destroying the tracks.

The Royal Navy landed 150 troops in Tientsin to help protect foreigners there.

NO-ONE'S LIFE IS EVER NOT DRIVEN PRIMARILY BY HAPPENSTANCE

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

June 12, Tuesday: In the German Reichstag, a 2d Naval Bill authorized construction of 38 battleships over the following two decades.

For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Deyall's Bluffs, Louisiana, Seth Cobb, accused of making threats, was lynched, and that on this day in Lee County, Arkansas, John Brodie, accused of an attempt to do murder, was lynched.

June 17, Saturday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Earl, Arkansas, Nat Mullins, accused of having committed murder, was lynched, and that on this day in Searcy, Arkansas, S.A. Jenkins, suspected of robbery, was lynched.

The Dowager Empress of China ordered the governors of the provinces to send troops to Peking. She was preparing for war against the foreigners. About 1,000 troops from six countries seized the Taku forts on the China coast to restore access from Peking to Tientsin. Chinese artillery opened fire on foreigners in Tientsin.

June 19, Monday: Upon hearing that foreign fleets had demanded the Taku forts, the Dowager Empress ordered all foreign legations out of Peking by 4:00PM of the following day.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

June 20, Tuesday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Panasoffkee, Florida, James Barco, who had been accused of some offense now unknown to us, was lynched.

The German minister to China, Baron Klemens von Ketteler, was killed by a member of the Imperial army. All foreigners were besieged in the legations area. The number within the legations was about 4,000 from 18 countries, the great majority of them Chinese Christians. The relief force was still fighting its way back to Tientsin.

Isänmaalle (To My Country) for chorus by Jean Sibelius to words of Cajander was performed for the initial time, in Helsinki. Also performed, perhaps for the initial time, were Sibelius' Tiera, a tone poem for brass septet and percussion, and Preludio for winds.

THE FUTURE IS MOST READILY PREDICTED IN RETROSPECT

June 21, Wednesday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Mulberry, Florida, Robert Davis, accused of having committed murder, was lynched.

An edict from the Imperial Chinese government announced the opening of war against foreigners and the embracing of the Boxers.

Ernesto Rodolfo Hintze Ribeiro replaced José Luciano de Castro Pereira Corte-Real as prime minister of Portugal.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

June 22, Thursday: Believing their position imperiled, the military contingents from Italy, Austria, France, Germany, Japan, Russia and the US fell back in disorder into the British legation in Peking. Order was restored and the soldiers were sent back to their posts, but not before the Italian legation was destroyed. The Chinese began an artillery assault on the Peitang Cathedral. The retreating foreign relief column captured a Chinese arsenal at Hsiku and there awaited rescue from Tientsin.

THE FUTURE CAN BE EASILY PREDICTED IN RETROSPECT

June 23, Friday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Livingstone Parish, Louisiana, Frank Gilmore, accused of having committed rape, was lynched.

Chinese attempted to destroy the foreign legations in Peking by setting fire to adjacent districts. The fire did not spread to the legations. A foreign (Russia/United Kingdom/United States/Italy) force moving from Taku to Tientsin fought their way through fierce Chinese resistance into the city. Imperial troops, aided by Boxers, counterattacked against the foreign army in Hsiku but were beaten back.

The dome of Sacre-Coeur was inaugurated in Paris, France.

A sketch of the defenses of the legation compound at Peking was prepared by US Marine Captain John T. Myers.

June 27, Tuesday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Live Oak, Florida, Jock Thomas, accused of attempted assault, was lynched, and that on this day in Molina, Georgia, Jordan Hines, who had been accused of some offense now unknown to us, was lynched.

The Central London Electric Tube Railroad was opened between Bank and Shepard's Bush.

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

July 6, Friday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Columbia, Alabama, John Roe, accused of having attempted assault, was lynched.

Western forces retreated from Tientsin after a 6-hour battle with Chinese troops.

At the Headquarters Saloon in Willcox, Arizona, Warren Earp was shot and killed. He had reached the age of 45.

CHANGE IS ETERNITY, STASIS A FIGMENT

July 9, Monday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Greene's Bayou, Louisiana, Jefferson Henry, an unpopular black man, was lynched.

After being promised that they were being escorted to safety, the Christian missionary families of Taiyuan were brought before Governor Yu-Hsien of Shantung Province. Their minister, the Reverend George Farthing, was first to be beheaded, then the other men, then the minister's wife and three young children, and the remaining foreigners along with some Chinese converts (a total of 34 Protestants and 12 Catholics).

A constitution for the Commonwealth of Australia, having received the approval of the British Parliament and voters in each of Australia's colonies, was given royal assent by Queen Victoria.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

July 12, Thursday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Creswell, Georgia, John Jennings, accused of having committed murder, was lynched.

While vacationing at his home in Canton, Ohio, William McKinley was formally advised that the Republican Party had renominated him for President of the United States of America.

A. Goldenweiser's record of a story he had been told by Lev Nikolævich Tolstòy, while arguing that it would be a mistake to introduce expensive and complicated agricultural equipment to Russia:

You know, there was a famous American writer, Thoreau, who departed from urban life and began to earn his living with his own hands. When his friends began to tell him that he lived just a few hours away from a beautiful lake and never intended to go there, even if a trip by train would be only two dollars, Thoreau argued with them saying that he felt very well at home; but if he would ever have intended to go to the lake he would rather walk there since he would have to work four days in order to earn two dollars while a walk could take him only two days.

HENRY THOREAU

July 23, Monday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Huntsville, Alabama, Elijah Clark, accused of having committed rape, was lynched.

In Serbia, the king announced an intention to get married with one of the servants of his queen. The participants in this domestic drama were 1.) King Alexander I, 2.) Queen Natalie, and 3.) Dara Maschin. Dara would indeed become a bride, in August, but her bridegroom would be assassinated, in 1903.

A memorial service scheduled in London for today to honor the memory of the Peking legations was canceled at the last minute due to growing awareness that they might still be alive.

A few months after his father's death Alban Berg suffered his first asthma attack, a condition which would continue through his life — the number 23 would come to have for him a mystical significance.

THE FALLACY OF MOMENTISM: THIS STARRY UNIVERSE DOES NOT CONSIST OF A SEQUENCE OF MOMENTS. THAT IS A FIGMENT, ONE WE HAVE RECOURSE TO IN ORDER TO PRIVILEGE TIME OVER CHANGE, A PRIVILEGING THAT MAKES CHANGE SEEM UNREAL, DERIVATIVE, A MERE APPEARANCE. IN FACT IT IS CHANGE AND ONLY CHANGE WHICH WE EXPERIENCE AS REALITY, TIME BEING BY WAY OF RADICAL

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

CONTRAST UNEXPERIENCED — A MERE INTELLECTUAL CONSTRUCT.
THERE EXISTS NO SUCH THING AS A MOMENT. NO “INSTANT” HAS EVER FOR AN INSTANT EXISTED.

July 24, Tuesday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Knoxville, Georgia, Jack Hillsman, accused of having committed rape, was lynched.

In China, revolutionaries signed a document titled “Regulations for Peaceful Rule” authored by Kai Ho. The signatories included Sun Yat-sen, Yang Chu-yun, and Xie Zhantai (Tse Tsan Tai). This document would be presented to Hong Kong Governor Henry Arthur Blake as part of a request for British help in transforming the government of China into a parliamentary system (with an advisory group composed of foreign ambassadors).

BETWEEN ANY TWO MOMENTS ARE AN INFINITE NUMBER OF MOMENTS, AND BETWEEN THESE OTHER MOMENTS LIKEWISE AN INFINITE NUMBER,
THERE BEING NO ATOMIC MOMENT JUST AS THERE IS NO ATOMIC POINT
ALONG A LINE. MOMENTS ARE THEREFORE FIGMENTS. THE PRESENT
MOMENT IS A MOMENT AND AS SUCH IS A FIGMENT, A FLIGHT OF THE
IMAGINATION TO WHICH NOTHING REAL CORRESPONDS. SINCE PAST
MOMENTS HAVE PASSED OUT OF EXISTENCE AND FUTURE MOMENTS
HAVE YET TO ARRIVE, WE NOTE THAT THE PRESENT MOMENT IS ALL
THAT EVER EXISTS — AND YET THE PRESENT MOMENT BEING A MOMENT IS A FIGMENT TO WHICH NOTHING IN REALITY CORRESPONDS.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

July 25, Wednesday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in New Orleans, Louisiana, a mob of enraged white citizens went on a rampage and indiscriminately lynched (among other black Americans) Baptiste Fileau, Silas Jackson, Louis Taylor, August Thomas, and Anna Mabry.

General Leonard Wood's order for the election of delegates to a Cuban Constitutional Convention restricted voting to males over 21 years of age who had become Cuban citizens under the terms of the peace treaty and who had fulfilled at least one of the following: ability to read and write; ownership of property; service in the Cuban rebel army (much of the citizenry was of course disfranchised).

July 26, Thursday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in New Orleans, Louisiana, Robert Charles, accused of having committed murder, was lynched.

The US Postal Service took action to increase the delivery of magazines and newspapers to rural addresses, by preventing additional charges from being made for delivery to such destinations.

August 13, Monday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Corinth, Mississippi, Jack Betts, accused of having committed rape, was lynched.

General Leonard Wood was on a campaign tour promoting the election of men of "science and experience" as delegates to the Constitutional Convention. The Cuban public should not select "the disturber and malcontent" and needed to "bear in mind that no Constitution which does not provide a stable government will be accepted by the US." Cisneros responded: "General Wood, on the eve of an election in the US, would not have dared to utter such words before a body of electors. Why should he, in Cuba, endeavor to restrict the free suffrage, insult the people, and wound their just sense of dignity and manhood by such a threat?"

August 19, Sunday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Arrington, Virginia, a black man of unknown name, accused of having committed rape, was lynched.

August 26, Sunday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Pittsburg, Tennessee, a black man of unknown name, accused of having committed rape, was lynched.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

September 7: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Tunica, Mississippi, Frank Brown, accused of murder, was lynched.

September 8, day: A hurricane struck New Orleans, Galveston, and Houston. Some 6,000 Texans were killed.

For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Thomasville, Georgia, Grant Weley, accused of having attacked a white man, was lynched.

On this day an indignant retort appeared in the New York Times Saturday Review, in response to an unsavory allegation that had been made in a letter to the editor on the previous Saturday against our memory of Henry.

STATE MURDER

Thoreau. A previous writer had alleged that actually Thoreau had had no discernible involvement or interest in the antislavery crusade of the pre-civil-war era: “From my recollection of Thoreau’s life and writings I do not think he ever took any active part or ever showed any special interest in the slavery question.”

This must have been a poor reader indeed, it was pointed out. So who was this poor reader, Mr. George J. Manson of Brooklyn? –We know him as the thoughtful author of a series of articles in the New York Christian Union under the title of “Work for Women,” and then in a published volume of the same title, in which he had attempted to “enlighten the would-be woman-worker as to the practical points of interest connected with each occupation” in which persons of “the gentler sex” were at that point being accepted.

STATE MURDER

Thoreau and Slavery.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

In the issue of THE SATURDAY REVIEW for Sept. 1 I find Mr. George J. Manson of Brooklyn takes exception to a passage in Tolstol's "Ressurrection" regarding Thoreau's attitude toward injustice and slavery. In the life of Henry David Thoreau by H. E. Salt (Richard Bentley & Son, London; 1890,) may be found, on Page 100, the passage alluded to, quoted almost exactly by Tolstol. It reads as follows:

"One afternoon, when Thoreau chanced to have gone in from Walden to the village to get a shoe from the cobbler's, he was intercepted and lodged in the town jail. 'Henry, why are you here?' were the words of Emerson when he came to visit his friend in his new place of retirement. 'Why are you not here?' was the answer of the prisoner, who held that, under an unjust Government, a prison cell was the right abode for a just man."

Mr. Manson further says: "From my recollection of Thoreau's life and writings I do not think he ever took any active part or ever showed any special interest in the slavery question."

This looks very black for Mr. Manson's "recollections;" for it is quite impossible to read anything about Thoreau without knowing that, next to nature, slavery was uppermost in his thought. He lectured on the subject frequently, and it is broadly hinted by those who knew him best that many a fugitive slave was helped toward the "north star" by way of Walden. It is very easy to misunderstand; and Tolstol has such an uncomfortable way of telling the truth, anyway!

VIOLA DEY HALLIDAY.

Avondale, N. J., Sept. 1, 1900.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

September 10, Monday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Forest City, North Carolina, a black man of unknown name, accused of murder, was lynched, and that on this day in Duplex, Tennessee, Logan Reoms, accused of attempted assault, was lynched.

Philip Van Doren Stern was born in Wyalusing, Pennsylvania to Isidor Stern (1863-1944) and Annie Fisher Van Doren Stern (1869-1946). He would grow up in New Jersey.

September 11, Tuesday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Forest City, North Carolina, a black man of unknown name, accused of murder, was lynched, and that on this day in Cheneyville, Louisiana, Thomas J. Amos, accused of murder, was lynched.

September 14, Friday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Tunica, Mississippi, the town where another such lynching had already occurred on September 7th, David Moore and William Brown, accused of murder, were lynched.

September 12, Wednesday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Forest City, North Carolina, a black man of unknown name, accused of murder, was lynched, and that on this day in Wetumpka, Kansas, Zed Floyd, accused of attempted assault, was lynched.

September 21, Friday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Ponchatoula, Louisiana, George Bickham, Charles Elliott, Nathaniel Bowman, Charles Elliot, and Isaiah Rollins, accused of burglary, were lynched.

October 2, Tuesday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Eclectic, Alabama, Winfield Townsend or Thomas, accused of having attempted an assault, was lynched by being burned at the stake.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

October 8, Monday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Tiponville, Tennessee, a black man named Williams, accused of robbing, was lynched.

October 9, Tuesday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Baton Rouge, Louisiana, Wiley Johnson, accused of murder, was lynched.

LORD JIM by Joseph Conrad appeared in book form in London.

October 18, Thursday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Elkton, Kentucky, Fratur Warfield, accused of attempted assault, was lynched.

October 19, Friday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Wellaston, Georgia, Frank Hardeneman, accused of rape, was lynched.

Marquis Hirobumi Ito replaced Prince Aritomo Yamagata as prime minister of Japan.

October 23, Tuesday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day near Vicksburg, Mississippi, Gloster Barnes, accused of murder, was lynched.

Marcelo de Azcárraga y Palmero replaced Francisco Silvela y Le Vielleuze as Prime Minister of Spain.

Dr. Walter Reed of the US Army informed a meeting of the American Public Health Association in Indianapolis, Indiana of his recent experiments in Cuba indicating that Dr. Carlos Juan Finlay had been correct in his 1879 hypothesis and that it was the Aedes aegypti mosquito that was transmitting yellow fever.⁶²²

622. You need to bear carefully in mind the fact that, although we now fully grasp the mode of transmission of this disease and thus can more effectively take prior action to prevent epidemics, the treatment for this ailment once it has been contracted remains merely the keeping of the patient as comfortable as possible, and of course ensuring that dehydration does not set in. Although nowadays we no longer attempt to cure the disease by such harmful techniques of medical science as bloodletting, this viral ailment remains as untreatable today as ever it has been.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

October 24, Wednesday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Liberty Hill, Georgia, James Suer and James Calaway, men who had been selected on account of their race rather than for any other alleged offense, were lynched.

October 30, Tuesday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Duke, Alabama, a black man named Abernathy, accused of assault, was lynched.

Ragnar Granit was born, who as a Finnish/Swedish neurophysiologist would be awarded the Nobel prize in 1967 for work on the physiology of color vision. Granit would identify “dominator” and “modulator” cells in the retina, responsible respectively for brightness and color perception. He would also perform pioneering studies of how motion and form are coded in the retina and transmitted to the brain.

PSYCHOLOGY

November 15, Thursday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list has 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Jefferson, Texas, three black Americans of unknown names who had been accused of an attempt to murder were murdered spectacularly by a white mob.

November 16, Friday or 17, Saturday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Limon or Lymon, Colorado, Preston Porter, Jr., an American of color accused of murder, was lynched by being burned at the stake, while protesting his innocence, with some 5,000 white people in attendance. The account of this in the New-York Herald had it that while the flames were licking at his body Preston was heard to have been repeated the 23rd Psalm.

The frank opinion of the minister from China in Washington DC, Wu Ting-Fang, on this lynching in Colorado, was solicited by a reporter, and this ambassador's carefully considered response would be published in the Cleveland, Ohio Leader:

What do I think of lynching? Well, that is strictly an American institution. China has been accused of many barbarities, but lynching is not one of them. Burning that poor fellow at the stake, Ugh! The very idea makes me shudder. And he died protesting his innocence. Guilty men don't do that. But I don't understand it at all. You brought the black here against his will. You made him free, or the great Lincoln did. Then you declared him equal to the white man, but you denied him equality. He cannot hold office; that is, you seldom elect him to one. He can't serve on a jury, though he has the right, and he is still a slave socially. The difficulty seems to me to be that you regard him as a savage and treat him as such. He feels himself an outlaw and acts accordingly.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

...the American officers -these sheriffs you call them- seem to help these mobs instead of protecting their prisoners. The law permits them to kill the mob, but they let the mob kill their prisoner, whom they have sworn to protect. In China an officer who did that would forfeit his life. He would kill himself rather than suffer such disgrace. In China prisoners are not guaranteed a trial, but they always get it. Then, if they are guilty, they suffer. Nations that permit lynching cannot call themselves Christian nations. This habit, and it is a habit here, is a blot upon the nation's good name.... You must face this problem sooner or later, and the sooner you face it the better for you and for the Negro. And I believe you will find the only solution of the problem is to assimilate the colored man by intermarriage.

The Chicago Tribune, in commenting on this, of course drew the line at the yellow ambassador's suggestion that white Americans assimilate black Americans by intermarriage, pointing out that assimilation through miscegenation was a solution that had already been attempted and that had already failed:

There was scarcely a plantation in the length and breadth of the South in the halcyon days of slavery, on which there was not a brood of bastards, the result of the pollution of black women by their masters and their masters' sons. And there courses through the veins of the Negroes of this country the blood of some of its proudest names which are held up to the emulation of American youth. The white man who morally demoralized the Negro race when it was in his power can hardly be expected at this late day to make reparation by legitimatizing the fruits of these unholy unions, or to marry the black women whose mothers and their relatives were the helpless victims of his lustful passions. The white men of the South understand better than Mr. Wu why the assimilation of the two races cannot be made to do duty in solving the problem of the centuries.

December 8, Saturday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Wythe County, Virginia, Daniel Long, accused of rape, was lynched.

Mother Mary Alphonsa Lathrop (Rose Hawthorne Lathrop) made her vows as a Dominican nun, taking the name Mother Mary Alphonsa. With her first companion, Sister M. Rose, she would found the Dominican Congregation of St. Rose of Lima, later called the Servants of Relief for Incurable Cancer.

CATHOLICISM

December 16, Sunday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Rockford, Indiana, Bud Rowland and Thomas Henderson, accused of murder, were lynched.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

December 17, Monday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Booneville, Indiana, John Rolla, accused of complicity in murder, was lynched.

December 19, Wednesday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Arcadia, Mississippi, a black American of unknown name, accused of murder, was lynched.

December 20, Thursday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Gulf Port, Mississippi, a black American known as Lewis, accused of murder, was lynched.

December 21, Friday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Arkadelphia, Arkansas, a black American of unknown name, accused of rape, was lynched.

December 27, Thursday: L'hiver op.8/2 for voice and piano or orchestra to words of Banville was performed for the initial time, in Paris, with the composer Charles Koechlin himself at the keyboard.

Carrie Nation led a march on the Carey Hotel in Wichita, Kansas, smashing all the liquor bottles she could find.

December 28, Friday: For most years we don't have any record, but early in 1901 someone at the Chicago Tribune made up a list of the lynchings which had occurred in America during the previous year. The list had 117 entries — a lynching, typically a white mob of some size hanging an adult black male, had been occurring every three days or so. Because of this list we know that on this day in Marion, Georgia, George Faller, accused of arson, was lynched.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1901

January 15, Tuesday: Fred Alexander, an American of color, was burned at the stake in Leavenworth, Kansas.

LYNCHING

October 29, Tuesday: Leon Czolgosz was electrocuted in Auburn, New York for having assassinated President William McKinley.

October 31, 1901 Piece for organ op.59/2 by Max Reger is performed for the first time, in Zwickau.

Come, gentle night, a song by Edward Elgar to words of Bingham, is performed for the first time, in Royal Albert Hall, London.

1905

February 2, Thursday morning: At 7:30AM, Louis Crowie and Richard Crowie were hanged in the Customs back shed for having murdered signalman Robert Samuel Gunnell at St. Helena's Prosperous Bay Signal Station during the previous November. Quicklime was placed in the coffins with these bodies (these would turn out to be the final executions on this island).

FINAL EXECUTIONS
February 14, 1890	Wong Ah Hing (AKA Ah Tee)	last hanging in San Francisco, California (subsequently, hangings would be at San Quentin, a new state prison across the bay)
February 2, 1905	Louis Crowie and Richard Crowie	final hangings on the island of St. Helena
July 16/17, 1918	Tsar Nicholas II	gunned down along with Tsarina Alexandra and their children Olga, Tatiana, Maria, Anastasia, and Alexei, plus Eugene Botkin, Anna Demidova, Alexei Trupp, and Ivan Kharitonov

June 28, Wednesday: When the murderer Languille was decapitated at 5:30AM, Dr. Beurieux cried out his name. He would allege that the freshly severed head then opened its eyes and focused on him for a few seconds, then closed its eyes, so he cried out his name once more and the eyes again opened and closed, but the 3d time he cried out the man's name, nothing was observed. Can you believe that?

HEADCHOPPING

March 12, Saturday: Some men endeavor to live a constrained life, to subject their whole lives to their wills, as he who said he would give a sign if he were conscious after his head was cut off, — but he gave no sign.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1906

February 13, Tuesday: With the hanging of William Williams at the county jail in St. Paul, capital punishment in Minnesota came officially to an end.⁶²³

COLDBLOODED MURDER

August 6, Monday: On East Council Street near the courthouse in Salisbury, North Carolina, a photographer captured a gelatin silver-print image that Kluttz's Studio would be offering for sale as a 3 1/2 x 5 1/2 postcard. The postcard displays the bodies of Nease or Neuce Gillepsie, John Gillepsie, "Jack" Dillingham, Henry Lee, and George Irwin, along with some onlookers still lingering at the scene of a lynching that had occurred during the night of August 3d. The initial report in the New York Times was that these men had been tortured with knives prior to the lynching, and that their hanging bodies had afterward been used as gun targets by the mob of several thousand. There would also be reports that some fingers and other body parts were severed as souvenirs of the occasion.

THE MARKET FOR HUMAN BODY PARTS

The men had been arrested on suspicion of participation three weeks earlier in the killing of members of the local Lyerly family. The mayor and sheriff had been able to hold back the local crowd only until the arrival of an additional 500 white men from nearby Whitney. George Hall would be sentenced to 15 years at hard labor in the North Carolina penitentiary for his activities as a leader of this lynch mob.

Here is how this region's experience after the civil war stacks up in comparison with other regions of the Old South:

	White Victims	Non-White Victims	Total
Mississippi	40	538	578
Georgia	39	491	530
Texas	141	352	493
Louisiana	56	335	391

623. "Came officially to an end" is a phrase of art. It does not imply that capital punishment came to an end, but only that it was supposed to not happen anymore. In fact, however, we know that one of the motivating factors for the lynching murders of three innocent black victims in Duluth in 1920 would be an awareness on the part of the general white public, that if these innocent men—who, they supposed, had raped a white girl—were allowed to go through the Minnesota legal system, they would not be put to death.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Alabama	48	299	347
Arkansas	58	226	284
Florida	24	257	282
Tennessee	47	204	251
Kentucky	63	142	205
South Carolina	4	156	160
Missouri	53	69	122
Oklahoma	82	40	122
North Carolina	15	85	100
Virginia	17	83	100

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1908

It had been conventional, up to this point, for white people to send picture postcards through the US postal service, that commemorated a lynching. In this year it was made illegal to post such picture postcards, although the posting of such cards would not cease. Here is one such postcard, that would be produced in the Year of Our Lord 1920:

From 1907 to 1917, six of our states would be completely outlawing even capital punishment imposed by the court system, and three would be limiting it to the rarely committed crimes of treason and first degree murder of a law enforcement official. (However, by 1920 five of the six abolitionist states would have reinstated their death penalty.)

COLDBLOODED MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

During the hot summer of 1908, racial tension heightened in Springfield, Illinois. On the night of July 4th, Independence Day, Clergy Ballard, a respectable mining engineer, was awakened by a strange noise. Investigating, he found a stranger at the bedside of his young daughter. The intruder ran out of the house and the father gave chase and caught him. He had a straight razor. The father died the next morning from a slashed throat. The people of Springfield were led by the local press to infer that the crime was a thwarted attempt at sexual assault. Before the father died he identified his assailant as Joe James, a local black man with a long police record of minor criminal offenses, and James was beaten unconscious by a band of angry whites. The police rescued James and carted him off to jail charged with murder and attempted rape.

One month later, on August 14th, unsuspecting readers of the Illinois State Journal opened their eyes to a shocking headline screaming, “DRAGGED FROM HER BED AND OUTRAGED BY NEGRO.” The readers were again faced with the story of a “heinous crime” that had been committed the night before. Mabel Hallam, the 21-year-old wife of a city street car conductor, allegedly had been snatched from a peaceful sleep and sexually assaulted by a black fiend. The outraged Hallam identified her attacker as George Richardson, a caretaker who worked odd jobs in the her neighborhood. By Friday, August 14th, two blacks sat in jail, Joe James and George Richardson both accused and assumed to have raped white women.

Whites gathered at the southwest corner of 7th and Jefferson, where the Sangamon County Jail housed the hated individuals, James and Richardson. As the temperature soared into the high 90s, the crowd demanded that the two be released to them. Sheriff Charles Werner devised a plan to transport the two to safety. A false fire alarm diverted the crowd’s attention while the prisoners were being escorted out the back of the jail to a car owned by a local restaurateur, Harry Loper. By 5PM the two prisoners were on the train to safety in Bloomington, 60 miles to the north.

Kate Howard, a rooming-house owner notorious for her race hate, was at the center of this white mob. When they found out they had been tricked, they moved from the county jail down to Harry Loper’s restaurant when they learned that it had been his car that had been used in the escape. Harry Loper stood in the doorway of his restaurant with a rifle, but then left by the back door as the mob preceded to trash and destroy the restaurant. They consumed the liquor, broke the plate glassed windows, demolished the interior, and torched his $5,000 automobile.

Springfield Mayor Roy Reece was in hiding but State Governor Charles Dedeene was in town and he called out the militia.

The crowd headed toward the black commercial section of the city called the Levee and broke into Fishman’s pawn shop, a Jewish-owned business, and stole weapons. The mob, now with guns, ammunition, and ropes, moved through the Levee, destroying black businesses. The crowd destroyed two or three blocks of the Levee and moved north heading toward the black residential section, the Badlands.

Scott Burton, a black man with a white wife, attempted to protect his barbershop with a shotgun. He fired once, ineffectively, and was killed by return fire. The barber shop was set on fire and the body was paraded to a saloon several blocks away. The corpse hung from a tree outside the saloon, riddled by bullets, until the militia could cut it down.

In the “Badlands” residential district, the rioters avoided the homes with white handkerchiefs tied outside, which signified that these were homes owned or inhabited by whites, and when firemen arrived, the crowd hindered their progress and cut the hoses. It was estimated that nearly 12,000 people had gathered to watch the Badlands burn. Some blacks found safety at the State Armory, while others fled the town. Those that went to surrounding towns were met by signs that read, “All Niggers are warned out of town by Monday, 12 Sharp!”. By midnight some national guard units arrived and dispersed the mob and the violence ended for Friday night. On Saturday there was a troubled sort of peace, but at the same time mass migrations of people out of and into of the city was taking place. Fleeing out of Springfield were an estimated 2,000-3,000 Negro residents.

A number would never return.

However, the peace ended on Saturday evening, August 15th. A mob gathered once again at the Old Court House Building and then began to move in the direction of the State Arsenal Building. A small group attempted to enter the State Arsenal where displaced blacks were being housed. The group was stopped by a militia guard, but the mob merely changed direction and proceeded to march across the capitol grounds and headed for the home of William Donnegan. He was a cobbler, 84 years of age, and a long-time resident of Springfield, married to a white woman. He had cobbled the shoes of Abraham Lincoln. The mob approached Donnegan’s home. When he came out to find what they were up to, they grabbed him, cut his throat, dragged his body across the street, and lynched him in the Edwards School yard. He was still alive when the national guard cut him down, but died early the next morning. After this lynching the rioters dispersed.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

By Sunday morning, much of Springfield laid in ruins. On Sunday more national guard troops arrived and in general the day was peaceful. The official death total was reported to be seven, two blacks and five accidental whites. There were rumors of many more deaths. Property damage was in excess of $200,000. Forty homes were destroyed and others were damaged while twenty-four businesses were forced to close their doors either temporarily or permanently.

Immediately after the riot, city officials expressed deep regret for the mob's actions and called for swift justice. A special grand jury returned 107 indictments but these achieved only one conviction, of someone who had stolen a saber from one of guards. The murderers of Scott Burton and William Donnegan were left unpunished, as were the arsonists who had set fire to the homes in the Badlands. Kate Howard, one of the ringleaders of the mob, committed suicide rather than face charges. Mabel Hallam confessed that she had made up her story of being raped in order to cover up an affair she was having, and George Richardson was therefore released from jail, but Joe James was convicted of the murder of Clergy Ballard.

The Springfield Race Riot of Summer 1908 had been sparked by Mabel Hallam's false accusation and fueled by economic and racial tensions already brewing in the black and white communities. This riot also marked the last conflict between the races in which blacks did not form up as a group to defend themselves.

FAMOUS LASTS
November 11, 1906	Catherine S. Damon	widow of US veteran of American Revolution, age 92
Summer 1909	Springfield race riot	final occasion on which black Americans did not form up as a group to resist a white race riot
April 25, 1911	Phoebe M. Palmeter	dependent of US veteran of American Revolution, age 90

This would prompt the creation, in New York City, of a National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1909

January: Jules-Henri Desfourneaux made his debut as an aide at French beheadings, his introduction to this profession being by way of a grand uncle, Edouard Mathieu Desfourneaux, who had himself been an aide to Heidenreich. Another relative, Leopold Desfourneaux, would be an aide to Anatole Deibler.

HEADCHOPPING

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1910

July 30, Saturday: A mob of 200 whites in Palestine, Texas opened fire on a group of unarmed blacks outside a dancehall. There would be 18 black bodies.

NOT A LYNCHING

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1914

November 6, Friday: Australian forces occupied the German island of Nauru.

Japanese troops breached the final German defenses at Tsingtao.

France declared war on the Ottoman Empire.

Russian forces made advances toward Koprukeui, east of Erzurum. Meanwhile, Russian ships mined the entrance to the Bosphorus and bombard Zonguldak, Turkey.

WORLD WAR I

Austria-Hungary launched a major offensive across the Drina into Serbia.

Four of the songs for voice and piano op.137 by Max Reger were performed for the 1st time, in Meiningen: Dein Wille, Herr, geschehe!, Am Abend, Klage vor Gottes Leiden and O Jesu Christ, wir warten dein. The composer performed at the piano.

The Camp was Hushed...Reposez vous, vous chevaliers! for men's chorus by Arthur William Foote to words of Aldrich, was performed for the initial time, in Boston.

Carl Hans Lody was executed by firing squad in a wooden chair at the end of a 100-foot target practice shed at the Tower of London, the 1st German spy to be shot during the war and, it has been said inaccurately, the 1st person executed on the grounds of the Tower of London itself as opposed to such venues as Tower Hill, since 1601, when Robert Devereux, 2nd Earl of Essex had been the 7th of 7 with royal connections (including Anne Boleyn, Catherine Howard, and Lady Jane Grey), to get the axe — inaccurately, because in fact during 1743 various Scottish deserters had been done in at the Tower by firing squad. In all, 11 German spies would be executed at the Tower during World War I: Carl Hans Lody, Haicke Janssen, Willem Roos, Francis Buschman, Carl Muller, Ernst Melin, Augusto Roggen, George Breeckow, Irving Ries, Albert Meyer, and Ludovico Hurowitz-y-Zender (the shed and its chair to which they were strapped for execution are of course no longer in existence):

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1915

July 30, day: A mass arrest of Armenians in the city of Angora was carried out. Those arrested would be slain the following day at a place six hours distance from the city.

ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

The withdrawal of the Russian Army from the city of Van began.

Haicke Janssen and Willem Roos, German spies, were executed by firing squad in the moat area of the Tower of London. Janssen was strapped into the wooden chair at 6AM, and his corpse had been removed and replaced by the living body of Roos by 6:10AM.

WORLD WAR I

September 19, Sunday: German forces captured Lublin.

Francis Buschman, a German spy, was executed by firing squad in a wooden chair at the end of a 100-foot target practice shed at the Tower of London. The shed, and its chair to which spies were strapped, are no longer in existence:

STATE MURDER

October 12, Tuesday: 6AM. In Belgium, Germans executed English nurse Edith Cavell by firing squad, whose only crime had been tending to wounded British soldiers and helping them get back home. Executed next to her was Philippe Bauqc, an architect who had assisted her.⁶²⁴

WORLD WAR I

Orders were issued forbidding Turkish men to intermarry with Armenian women.

ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

October 13, Wednesday: In Berlin it was announced that a story going around, of “Armenian massacres,” was an Allied fabrication.

ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

London was bombarded by Zeppelins killing 55 and injuring 114.

WORLD WAR I

624. Some would consider helping wounded men get back home to be an unproblematic hobby. Some would consider shooting nurses and architects to be unsportsmanlike.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1916

Spring: There was a lynching, of four black men, at Rices Point in Duluth.⁶²⁵

MINNESOTA
COLDBLOODED MURDER

May: 72,000 Armenian deportees were reported in Der-el-Zor (Deir el-Zor) District.

ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

US naval forces began to maintain order in the Dominican Republic during a period of chronic and threatened insurrection (to September 1924).

US MILITARY INTERVENTIONS

At some point during the late spring or early summer of this year –according to a footnote in a sociological report at the Hay Library (not presently locatable)– in Duluth, Minnesota four blacks were lynched.⁶²⁶

COLDBLOODED MURDER

625. Presumably what we have here are two reports of the same event, one saying “May” and the other saying “Spring,” although I don’t have the evidence on that.

626. Presumably what we have here are two reports of the same event, one saying “May” and the other saying “Spring,” although I don’t have the evidence on that.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1917

June 6, Wednesday: Desirous of peace, sailors aboard the German warship Prince Regent Leopold staged a hunger strike. Similar actions followed on other German ships. On September 5th the leaders of the strike would be executed by firing squad.

Georges Auric, Louis Durey, and Arthur Honegger organized an homage to Erik Satie in Salle Huyghens. This was the beginning of the group of young composers organizing itself around Satie, soon to be called Nouveaux Jeunes.

The US 5th Marine Regiment sailed for France.

WORLD WAR I

October 15, Monday: Margaretha Geetruida Zelle, also known as “H21” and as “Mata Hari” (which in Malay means “Eye of the Dawn”) was suspected of being a double agent spying both for the French and the Germans. It is fakelore that she threw open her fur coat and flashed the 12-man French firing squad at Vincennes. Her body was taken to be dissected by University of Paris medical students and her head went to the Museum of Anatomy in Paris (where in the year 2000 it would be stolen).

WORLD WAR I

THE MARKET FOR HUMAN BODY PARTS

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1918

Conscientious objectors in World War I numbered more than 4,000.

CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE

The US law of conscription was encapsulated during 1918 in Selective Draft Law Cases, 245 US 366. There was less tolerance of conscientious objection than even during the US Civil War. At Alcatraz, 17 of these draft resisters would die of maltreatment.

MILITARY CONSCRIPTION

This is not a photograph of Alcatraz while it was being used to house the American COs who died of maltreatment, but of a British prison in use for the same purpose of the isolation and neutralization of attitudes

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

of conscientious objection, in this same period (I do not know of any Brits who died of maltreatment):

“In the course of one year of conscription, 64,693 made application to be excused from combatant status, and of this number, 3,989 desired exemption also from non-combatant duty. Of this number, 99 consented to be sent to France and to engage in reconstruction activities, 1,200 worked on farms, and in other ways their number was reduced to 503, who were given prison sentences.”

“A total of 1,461 [were found to be sincere]. Those found to be insincere numbered 103. The remaining cases were disposed of by various means.” Here is a group of WWI conscientious objectors, photographed in prison:

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

In Illinois during this year, German-born American Robert Prager failed to stand during our national anthem. Stripped of most of his clothes, he was forced to kiss the American flag. He was bound with strips of cloth torn from an American flag and lynched before a cheering crowd of some 500 or more people. When those responsible were brought to trial, their defense was the “unwritten law” and the jury acquitted in less than an hour, characterizing what had happened as “patriotic murder.”

COLDBLOODED MURDER

FIGURING OUT WHAT AMOUNTS TO A “HISTORICAL CONTEXT” IS WHAT THE CRAFT OF HISTORICIZING AMOUNTS TO, AND THIS NECESSITATES DISTINGUISHING BETWEEN THE SET OF EVENTS THAT MUST HAVE TAKEN PLACE BEFORE EVENT E COULD BECOME POSSIBLE, AND MOST CAREFULLY DISTINGUISHING THEM FROM ANOTHER SET OF EVENTS THAT COULD NOT POSSIBLY OCCUR UNTIL SUBSEQUENT TO EVENT E.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

July 17, Monday: The Communists executed Tsar Nicholas II, along with Tsarina Alexandra and their children Olga, Tatiana, Maria, Anastasia, and Alexei, plus Eugene Botkin, Anna Demidova, Alexei Trupp, and Ivan Kharitonov.

FINAL EXECUTIONS
February 2, 1905	Louis Crowie and Richard Crowie	final hangings on the island of St. Helena
July 16/17, 1918	Tsar Nicholas II	gunned down along with Tsarina Alexandra and their children Olga, Tatiana, Maria, Anastasia, and Alexei, plus Eugene Botkin, Anna Demidova, Alexei Trupp, and Ivan Kharitonov
August 14, 1936	Rainey Bethea	22-year-old black American hanged in public in Owensboro, Kentucky before a crowd of 20,000 including more than 200 visiting sheriffs and deputies; last person publicly executed in the USA

September 5, Thursday: Due to world war the “World Series” started a month early.

The Massachusetts Department of Health alerted area newspapers that an influenza epidemic was underway. Dr. John S. Hitchcock of the state health department warned that “unless precautions are taken the disease in all probability will spread to the civilian population of the city.”

Rupert Blue, Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service, dispatched advice to the press on how to recognize the influenza symptoms. Blue prescribed bed rest, good food, salts of quinine, and aspirin.

Lieutenant Colonel Philip Doane, head of the Health and Sanitation Section of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, speaking in Washington DC, provided fuel for rumor and speculation by suggesting that the enemy was responsible for the deadly influenza that was striking Americans. Said Doane: “It would be quite easy for one of these German agents to turn loose Spanish influenza germs in a theater or some other place where large numbers of persons are assembled. The Germans have started epidemics in Europe, and there is no reason why they should be particularly gentle with America.”

Sweeping powers were granted to the Cheka, beginning the “Red Terror” in areas controlled by the Bolsheviks. Mass executions began. As part of this Józef Lutoslawski, father of Witold, and his brother Marian, were executed by firing squad by the Bolsheviks outside Moscow (they had been arrested in Murmansk in April and charged with counter-revolutionary activities for trying to organize the transportation of Polish troops).

Sonata for violin and piano op.27 by Hans Pfitzner was performed for the initial time, in München at the 1st event of the newly founded Hans-Pfitzner-Vereins für deutsche Tonkunst.

The Massachusetts Department of Health announced that an Spanish influenza epidemic was occurring in the state.

Two songs by Charles T. Griffes were performed for the 1st time, in National Thurston Auditorium, Lockport, New York, with the composer himself at the piano: Come, Love, Across the Sunlit Land op.4/2 and La fuite de la lune op.3/1.

WORLD WAR I

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1920

The people of South Carolina didn't want to forget the way things used to be. Marking the formal beginning of organized historic preservation, Susan Pringle Frost and others therefore formed a Society for the Preservation of Old Dwellings, later to be renamed the Preservation Society of Charleston.

65 people were lynched in the United States of America during the course of this year. 57 of them were black men. One was a black woman. 7 were not black. The Duluth Publishing Company put out a pictorial booklet, MOB VIOLENCE, that sold for 35¢.

MINNESOTA

By this point tobacco had become an important crop in North Carolina and yet the economy was being primarily driven by the state's cheap-labor manufacturing capacity. The three major labor-intensive industries, tobacco products, cotton textiles, and furniture, had come to be largely concentrated in an area roughly the shape of a scythe: Raleigh as the tip, with the blade curving west and then southwest along the route of the Southern Railway through Durham, Greensboro, and Winston-Salem to Charlotte, and its handle stretching westward from Charlotte.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

April 16, Friday: The Minnesota legislature created a statewide Commission for Public Safety⁶²⁷ so that the state could “protect itself against those at home whose behavior tends to weaken the war capacity” (such a group had already been in operation, at least locally in Duluth, for some years). This 7-man panel was formally granted the arbitrary power to take anticipatory, preventive action and was implicitly exempted from any obligation to make use of the legal system. This Commission would take steps to eliminate the teaching of the German language in the public schools, and when the elected mayor of the town of New Ulm would opinion that the US Army ought to be made up of volunteers rather than relying on draftees, they would dismiss him from his municipal office. The existence of this Commission would create, throughout the state, an atmosphere of righteous vigilante justice conducive to mob violence. Trainloads of men would travel from place to place, to invade towns and beat up on their alleged “draft dodgers.” The distinction between this sort of vigilantism and lynch mobs would be, of course, a matter of the degree of violence applied and a matter of the choice of targets for this violence. (Of course, eventually the statute would be discovered to be unconstitutional.)

⁶²⁷ Would this choice of name indicate a lack of familiarity with the French Revolution and the sad events of the year 1793,  or would it indicate great familiarity with that historical material?

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

June 14, Monday: By early afternoon the Big Top of the John Robinson Show circus in Duluth, Minnesota was 80% full. Outside the main tent, hundreds of Minnesotans were enjoying sideshow performances such as that of Madame X, the incredible snake handler, and the Nelson Family of bareback riders. Around 9PM, as the circus crew began to strike the animal tents, a crowd gathered to watch the loading of the animals and equipment into their special boxcars, on their way toward two performances scheduled for the Iron Range.⁶²⁸

Among this crowd were a 19-year-old white stenographer high-school dropout with an advanced case of gonorrhea and an 18-year-old white boy who after being a High School basketball hero had gone on to get a local night job.⁶²⁹ Apparently these two denizens of the low-rent district of West Duluth drifted off beyond the crowd behind the wagons and tents, across the railroad tracks and behind a cook tent where a number of the 120 black employees of the circus were eating or relaxing. The two proceeded beyond this tent about 50 yards into a nearby field, followed and observed it would seem by a few of these circus people. Whatever it was that the duo were up to in that dark field that night, whether it was consensual sex between themselves for fun or whether it was the girl having sex with the negroes for ready cash, would never be openly discussed in Duluth. The two parted, the girl going to her home and the boy to his job on the graveyard shift at the Duluth Mesabi and Northern Ore Docks.

LYNCHING

628. The forests of northeastern Minnesota had been virtually erased by the start of the 20th Century, but exploitation of the state's iron-ore deposits was beginning. Three linear formations of rich iron ore had been identified in northeastern Minnesota in the 1860s and 1870s. Mining on the Vermillion Range began in 1884, the Mesabi Range in 1892, and the Cuyuna Range in 1911. Production levels rose and fell in response to changing market conditions. When our white armies returned from France after WWI, the survivors of the war and of the flu epidemic that followed it discovered that the mining companies had largely replaced them with cheap black labor — and they were of course enraged. Extraction levels would peak during and right after World War I and World War II, but plunge in the early 1930s, and to a lesser extent in the 1960s as high-grade ores that were economical to extract finally became scarce. New technology, however, would then permit the processing of taconite, a lower-grade rock found in abundance along the Mesabi. By the turn of the 20th Century, the Iron Range had been transformed from a sparsely-populated wilderness into an industrialized landscape inhabited by immigrants from almost every nation of Europe. When iron-ore production increased dramatically in the early 20th Century, the population of the Iron Range also soared. The advent of collective bargaining agreements between labor and management during the late 1930s and early 1940s eventually made iron-ore miners among the highest paid blue-collar workers in the nation. Periods of economic decline and depression have now brought disproportionately great hardship to the Iron Range. The finite nature of the iron-ore resource ultimately led to depletion and the abandonment of mine sites, leaving the miners and their support communities substantially adrift in the ebb and flow of economic change.

629. Neither this male nor this female ever gave a convincing and consistent account of what they had been up to that night. They lived quietly in the city for the remainder of their lives, and despite the fact that both are now long deceased, the convention has been that in the telling of this story their names are never given. (If I knew their names, I'd tell you.)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

June 15, Tuesday: The white boy who had during the previous evening been with the white girl behind the circus tent had worked nearly an hour of his graveyard shift before he told his father, who was the night superintendent, that a girl he had been with at the circus had gotten raped by a gang of blacks. The father immediately phoned Police Chief John Murphy at home to pass on his son's story. Chief Murphy drove to the police station and then to the ore docks, where he drew out the story in full detail from the son. The teenager told him that, as he and the girl had been leaving, six black men had blocked their way and one had slipped behind him and grabbed his arms, while another had placed a pistol in back of his ear. The story was that the four other men had taken the girl behind a clump of bushes by the railroad tracks — and that they had made him watch while they took turns sexually assaulting her. What a story!

Chief Murphy telephoned and had this circus train detained by the yardmaster of the DW&PRR. Chief Murphy, Captain Fiskett, and Lieutenant Schulte rousted the black circus employees from their sleeping cars at 4:30AM, so the two teenagers could make identifications. Thirteen black men were detained and the train was allowed to proceed. The blacks were put in cells at the downtown police headquarters.

After more questioning, seven of the thirteen were released. Of the remaining six, Chief Murphy suspected that Elias Clayton, Nate Green, Elmer Jackson, Loney Williams, and John Thomas had committed rape, with the sixth, Isaac McGhie, as a material witness. All suspects were between 19 and 21 and had worked for the circus for only a few months. Shortly after 7AM, the chief released all his policemen to go back to their homes. The white girl's mother phoned the family physician, Dr. David Graham, to make an immediate house call and examine her daughter. Although Dr. Graham found the teenager to be suffering from a slight case of nervous exhaustion, he saw nothing to indicate that she had just been sexually assaulted. Aware that the story of a rape had probably been concocted, he did not at this time communicate this to anyone.

There hadn't been any news reporter around during the night and the Duluth morning newspaper, the News-Tribune, had missed the entire story. By noon, however, word of mouth had spread the news widely through West Duluth of a gang rape, that it had been done by armed negroes, that the victim was a white teenage girl. Stories like this just don't lose anything in the retelling!⁶³⁰ A 38-year-old businessman from West Duluth, Louis Dondino, was outraged. He jumped in his truck and began to collect other white men who were outraged. Between noon and 6PM, rumors were spreading through town of a mob that was marching on the police headquarters. The police had hooked up fire hoses at their front and rear entrances, and had stationed a detail of police at each entrance. Around 8:30PM, about two dozen citizens tried to infiltrate by way of the garage in the rear of the building, and had to be chased off by six officers, including Sergeant Oscar Olson, waving billy clubs. Ten minutes later, the mob of somewhere between 5,000 and 10,000 white people (a large percentage of the population of the city!) was breaking out all of the windows on the first floor of the building

630. An example of how these stories build: The mother responded to a question about the girl by saying "She's in bed," and this was misheard and reported to the white mob as "She's dead." (A comparison situation has occurred more recently, in the 1970s in San Jose, California. A black man named John Smith had been a member of a Parents Without Partners club, and had been visiting white women. Two white police officers were also members of that Parents Without Partners club. They caught John Smith visiting a white woman in an apartment complex, and somehow Smith was beaten to death with a tire iron that matched the car of one of the two policemen, but did not match Smith's car, and then the policemen radioed to the police station that they had been confronted by "an angry NMA," meaning Negro Male Adult, wielding a tire iron, and that they had been forced to take the tire iron away from him and subdue him with it. A San Jose police reporter, listening to this, thought he had heard "an angry enemy," which added significantly to the confusion. The two white policemen would not be charged with the murder of John Smith. The police reporter would be further instructed in police operational terminology, and would apologize abjectly for having misunderstood.)

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

with bricks and surging into the station.

STATE MURDER

LYNCING

The police called for help from the Minnesota National Guard. The mob was kept away from the black prisoners for almost an hour, but at around 9:30PM, it began to batter at the two heavy steel doors of the cellblock, and to saw at the steel bars. Isaac McGhie was dragged from his cell upstairs and beaten before being dragged downstairs. Thrown into a wall and pummeled, he lost a tooth. He was attempting to shield his broken nose with his hand. Downstairs, Loney Williams was sitting on a cot in a cell, cradling his head in his hands and whispering silent prayers and vomiting. The crowd was unable to get at him and moved to where Elias Clayton was being held. The mob eventually broke into all the cells and beat all six of the black prisoners. These black men were denying any knowledge of what they were being accused of, which was making the white men even more hostile. Finally, McGhie and Jackson were hustled outside and dragged up a block to the corner of 2nd Avenue East and 1st Street, where there was a light pole near the Shriners Auditorium.

Ropes obtained gratis from the hardware store across from the police department were heaved over the light fixture. The Reverend W.J. Powers climbed onto this light pole to beg the mob to stop, but someone grabbed him and pulled him down. The crowd began to chant and sing as the noose was put around the neck of Isaac McGhie, the material witness, and he was hoisted off the ground. Then it was the turn of 19-year-old Elmer Jackson.

The crowd was cheering as the two men choked. Back at the station, the other four were still being questioned, and the mob went back and grabbed Elias Clayton. Needing to see more clearly the blood dripped from the mouths of the three hanging men, a car with a searchlight was pulled up. Photographs were taken for keepsakes (at least two postcards would be created out of these).

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

In these photos you can notice a few white men with blank expressions, and others who are grinning — but we don't see anyone with an expression on his face that you would want to describe as shocked. By the time Major Beecher's militia arrived with its rifles and bayonets, and formed into a crowd-control line, the show was over. The mob of citizens simply evaporated.

Do you suppose anyone is going to be guilty of murder?

WEST DULUTH GIRL VICTIM OF NEGROES

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

June 16, Wednesday: Giovanni Giolitti replaced Francesco Saverio Nitti as prime minister of Italy.

Puerto Rican brothers Sosthenes and Hernand Behn incorporate International Telephone and Telegraph Corporation to hold Puerto Rico Telephone Company, the Cuban Telephone Company, and one-half of the Cuban American Telephone and Telegraph Company.

Near the Duluth police station, at 1AM, the three black bodies were finally cut down. Sheriff Magie asked the state governor to provide a battery of state militia and a machine gun detachment, and despite rumors that there were to be more lynchings, an additional 14 black men would be brought to the county jail for questioning. There was never any hard evidence produced, that there had been an actual rape or inter-racial assault. All the actual evidence was consistent, rather, with a presumption that the two white teenagers had simply gone out into the dark of the field to hump each other as teenagers will, but had been noticed there by an idle group of young black men — who had found that situation rather amusing and had made some comments. Only 19 members of the lynch mob would ever be charged in the riot, and only 3 would ever be convicted, and not for murder but for mere rioting. After three or four others would be acquitted of all charges by the juries, charges against the remainder would have to be simply dropped. After the lynching, one of the surviving black prisoners, Max Mason would be tried and convicted and sentenced to 30 years in the Minnesota state penitentiary at Stillwater. The evidence against him at his trial was that the alleged rape victim had an advanced case of gonorrhea, and allegedly he also had gonorrhea. It would appear that the legal system would not comment on the fact that if having gonorrhea were proof of a man's having raped someone, then a very significant percentage of the white population of the city were rapists. Mason continually demanded to be tested for gonorrhea —alleging that in fact he did not have it— but his demands for testing were ignored. However, after three years in the pen without any treatment for this alleged case for gonorrhea, an entirely unusual and totally unexplained event would occur — the state parole board would suddenly without preserving any records of their decision release him from the prison, on parole! “Go thou and sin no more.”

August 5, Thursday: Four black men accused of raping a white woman were taken from the local jail in McClenny, Florida and lynched.⁶³¹

631. The film Rosewood would be based on this Florida history of the 1920s.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1921

February 12, Saturday: A black man in Wauchula, Florida was lynched for allegedly having attacked a white woman.⁶³²

May 30, Monday: The US Navy transferred the Teapot Dome oil reserves to the Department of the Interior.

GOVERNMENT SCANDALS

Meanwhile there was a distraction in Tulsa, Oklahoma, in the Drexel Building, in the elevator being operated by employee Sarah Page. Dick Rowland, a black man, got on the elevator in this day and, it would appear, may have stumbled over the white woman's foot. For whatever reason, this white woman screamed, and when she screamed, this black man of course fled. We're not sure of details: for instance, it is conceivable that the black man would have reached out to prevent the white woman from falling. However, the word that would circulate was of an interracial sexual assault. On the following day, Rowland was being held in the town's courthouse when a white lynch mob formed, and the black citizens of Tulsa, a significant number of whom had served under arms in WWI, began to dig defensive trenches around their section of town. A group of 75 armed black men mustered outside the courthouse to offer their services to prevent a lynching, but the white Sheriff would of course refuse this offer. Instead, a white man tried to disarm one of the black men, and while they were wrestling, his gun discharged. A massive racial conflict broke out. The armed blacks were outnumbered by the armed whites, ten to one, and black homes and stores were throughout that night being looted and burned. Firefighters could not get at the blazes because they were prevented by the white mobs. The mayor, T.D. Evans, asked the state's governor for the National Guard. The last stand of this race conflict occurred on June 1st, in a cloud of smoke covering the northern districts of Tulsa, at the foot of Standpipe Hill. When the National Guard mounted two machine guns and fired into the area, the black men surrendered, were disarmed, and were marched in columns to confinement in Convention Hall, at a baseball field, at the fairgrounds, and at an airstrip. The official estimate was that 10 whites and 26 blacks had been killed but, in actuality, there may have been as many as 300 bodies. Many of Tulsa's black residents, their homes gone, their lives shattered, would abandon the city. No charge would ever be brought against Dick Rowland. The official report of the incident soon would disappear from the records.

COLDBLOODED MURDER

CHANGE IS ETERNITY, STASIS A FIGMENT

632. The film Rosewood would be based on this Florida history of the 1920s.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1922

Henri-Desiré Landru, a serial wife-killer, became yet another victim of a serial killer, the guillotine.

HEADCHOPPING

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1923

Jefferson Monroe Levy, a nephew of Uriah Phillips Levy, had repaired and restored Monticello. In this year he transferred the property to a Thomas Jefferson Memorial Foundation, that would present the property as a house museum honoring President Thomas Jefferson.⁶³³

By changing sides 3 times during World War I and managing to end up on the victorious side, Romania had greatly profited, and had come to include large areas from defeated Russian and Hungary and Austria which included great numbers of Jews.

FAMOUS LASTS
November 11, 1918	Private Henry Gunther of Baltimore, Maryland	killed as news arrived in his unit of the signing of the World War I armistice at 11:00AM
1923	Jews became citizens, in Romania	Romania made itself the final European nation to grant citizenship to its Jews
1924	California grizzly bear in the Sierra Nevada mountains	extinct

In this year Romania became the last European nation to grant citizenship to its Jews — but do not suppose for a moment that this meant that Romania would love or respect its Jewish “citizens.” Only about half of them would survive the pogroms of World War II. For instance, in Bucharest in early 1941, a line of these Jewish citizens would be forced to strip and get down on all fours and crawl one by one into a slaughterhouse where they were being beheaded, and their skin stamped “fit for human consumption.”

HEADCHOPPING

January 1, Monday: In Rosewood, Florida in the early morning a white woman, Fannie Taylor, reported an attack by an unidentified black man. That afternoon a black man, Aaron Carrier, was apprehended by a white posse and Sheriff Walker spirited him out of the area to protect him from being lynched. Later that afternoon a group of white vigilantes apprehended and killed a black man, Sam Carter.

January 2, Tuesday: Armed white men begin gathering in Sumner, Florida.

633. The foundation, which would adopt the same animus toward Jews and Judaism as had been in fact held by President Jefferson, would for many years choose to suppress facts about the manner in which Monticello had been preserved for our nation.

ANTISEMITISM

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

January 4, Thursday: In the late evening in Rosewood, Florida, white vigilantes attacked the home of Aaron Carrier and it was defended. Two of the white attackers were killed and several were wounded. A black woman, Sarah Carrier, was killed and others inside the house were either killed or wounded. Rosewood's black residents fled into the swamps. A black church and several unprotected homes were also burned. Lexie Gordon was murdered.⁶³⁴

January 5, Friday: Approximately 200-300 armed whites from surrounding areas in Florida converged on Rosewood. They murdered Mingo Williams. When Governor Cary Hardee was notified, Sheriff Walker reported to him that he anticipated "no further disorder." The Sheriff of Alachua County arrived in Rosewood to assist Sheriff Walker. The vigilantes murdered James Carrier.

January 6, Saturday: A train evacuated refugees from Rosewood, Florida to Gainesville, Florida.

January 17, Wednesday: A black man in Newberry, Florida, convicted of stealing cattle, was taken from his cell by local white Americans and lynched.

January 19, Friday: Germany proclaimed a policy of passive resistance to occupation.

February 11, Sunday: A Grand Jury was convened in Bronson, Florida to investigate the Rosewood riot.⁶³⁵

February 15, Thursday: The Grand Jury in Bronson, Florida found "insufficient evidence" to prosecute anyone for riots and lynchings and property destruction in Rosewood.

May 27, Sunday: In the Ruhr, Albert Leo Schlageter, a German freebooter and saboteur, was executed by a French firing squad. Adolf Hitler would be proclaiming that Schlageter had been a hero and that the German volk had proven unworthy of him.

NAZISM

634. The film Rosewood would be based on this Florida history of the 1920s.

635. The film Rosewood would be based on this Florida history of the 1920s.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1924

February 7, Thursday: The use of cyanide gas was introduced with the execution of Gee Jon, a 29-year-old member of the Hop Sing Tong, born in China, who had in an outbreak of tong warfare killed Tom Quong Kee in Mina, Nevada. First the government of the state of Nevada in its compassion attempted to pump cyanide gas into this prisoner's cell while he slept, but this didn't work so they needed to construct a gas chamber.

During this decade and the following one in the United States of America, there would be a resurgence in capital punishment. (There would be an average of 167 executions per year here during the 1930s, adding up to more than in any other decade in American history.)

May 23: The USSR renounced most treaties made by the Tsarist government with China.

May 31: China recognized the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Lauri Johannes Ingman replaced Aimo Kaarlo Cajander as prime minister of Finland.

Kaleidoscopic Changes on an Original Theme for piano by Ruth Crawford was performed for the initial time, in Kimball Hall, Chicago, by the composer.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1927

August 22, Monday: 15,000 people gathered in New York City's Union Square in a death vigil for Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti as the shoemaker and the fish peddler were being prepared for the electric chair in Charlestown, Massachusetts.

ANARCHISM

August 23, Tuesday: Six years after their conviction for bank robbery and murder, despite international protests and substantial evidence that they were elsewhere at the time of the crime (including a confession by one of the true perpetrators), a few minutes after midnight Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti were electrocuted in Charlestown, Massachusetts.

ANARCHISM

Public outrage over the crime had been, it might seem exacerbated by prejudice against Italian immigrants in general.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

November 23, Wednesday: Guy Davenport was born in Anderson, South Carolina. There in the foothills of Appalachia, his father was an agent for the Railway Express Agency.

Otis Chandler was born in Los Angeles. He would straighten out the Los Angeles Times, that had been a rabid right-wing newspaper, transforming it into one of the nation's finest.

Eric Rotheim obtained a Norwegian patent for an aerosol spray can.

Vocalist Flora McCrea Eaton recorded "By the waters of Minnetonka" on the Victor label.

In Berlin, Vom Tod im Wald, a ballad for bass and ten winds by Kurt Weill to words of Brecht, was performed for the initial time, in the Philharmonic Hall.

In Mexico, execution by firing squad of Padre Miguel Augustin Pro, S.J. as he shouted "Viva Christo Rey!" (he has since been beatified).

An US Army pilot, Rusty Rowell, located the Nicaragua mountain base being used by the Sandinista rebels for raids against National Guard troops and American troops occupying Nicaragua.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1930

ELECTRIC
WALDEN

H.G. Wells lamented that, while the world was becoming smaller and moving at increasing speed, the way information was distributed remained old-fashioned and ineffective, and prescribed a “world brain,” a collaborative, decentralized repository of knowledge that would be subject to continual revision. More radically –with “alma-matricidal impiety,” as he put it– Wells indicted academia; the university was itself medieval. “We want a Henry Ford today to modernize the distribution of knowledge, make good knowledge cheap and easy in this still very ignorant, ill-educated, ill-served English-speaking world of ours.”

There would be more executions in the USA during the 1930s than in any other decade in American history, an average of 167 per year.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT
COLDBLOODED MURDER

August 7, Thursday: In Marion, Indiana, two black men, Thomas Shipp and Abram Smith, were suspected of robbing a white couple, Claude Deeter and Mary Ball, and raping the woman:

The crowd of white people attending the lynching was estimated at 10,000. Since the incident would not in any serious manner be investigated, we do not know whether there was any Ku Klux Klan organizational connection with this populist race retribution.

Was the federal Bureau of Investigation in any way concerned about this? –No, of course not, for this was merely a matter of local custom and local law enforcement. The robbery of the white people would be recorded as a robbery, among the robbery crime statistics, and the rape of the white woman would be recorded as a rape, among the rape crime statistics, but there would be no entry in the murder crime statistics and of course there would be no such thing at all as race lynching crime statistics.

FBI

On one framed copy of this photograph, a lock of the curly hair of one of these men has been preserved.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1932

Collier Cobb's NICHOLAS MARCELLUS HENTZ (Chapel Hill: U of North Carolina).

Lynching a man named Rick Read for allegedly raping and murdering an 8-year-old had not helped the good people of Oberlin, Kansas manage their anger issues. They remained so angry that at his burial there was no local man of the cloth willing to deliver a sermon. "But at the last minute a preacher showed up who believed that every man was entitled to a Christian burial," one of these good Kansans would remark in after years. "He preached the most beautiful sermon I ever heard. He said, 'If you had a man in your community as crippled in body as this man was in spirit you would all have so much pity on him you'd take him into your homes and care for him.' Our source for this would go on to describe how "All the women started to weep and I cried myself and some men cried, too, and you could feel all the hatred and violence just dissolve up into the air." Finally the good Christians were able to forgive him for having obliged them to lynch him.

(Please notice that there's an important difference, in these files, for the period of the 1930s and 1940s. The important difference is that, during the lengthy regime of President Franklin Delano Roosevelt, there's absolutely no mention at the national level of the Southern Democrat practice of the lynching of black Americans. During the FDR regime, these lynchings would be going on entirely uninterrupted, and the federal executive branch would be sponsoring zero zip nada niente anti-lynching legislation. Roosevelt was a Democrat, and it was an uneasy alliance between "liberal" Northern Democrats and "conservative" Southern Democrats that, election after election, was keeping him in power. For him to have supported anti-lynching legislation would have been for him to have split his support base, which was made up in roughly equal parts of white Northerners who did not much care what was happening to black Americans down south, and white Southerners who cared not at all that bad things would occasionally happen to the "uppity" among their black neighbors. —How do we know this? —We know this because FDR himself clearly explained his situation to the NAACP's Walter White: saving the lives of these black men would cost him more, in terms of support, than their lives were worth to him.)

May 7, Saturday: At the Santé prison, André Baillard was granted clemency as the assistants of Anatole Deibler were in the process of strapping him to the bascule — now there's something that'd raise the hairs on the nape of your neck!

HEADCHOPPING

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1933

During this year 42 black Americans would be offed by white lynch mobs. The federal government, including the FBI, would do absolutely nothing about this because our president, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, was a Democrat. It was an uneasy alliance between “liberal” Northern Democrats and “conservative” Southern Democrats that, election after election, would be keeping him in power. For him to support anti-lynching legislation would be for him to split his support base, which was made up in roughly equal parts of white Northerners who did not much care what was happening to black Americans down south, and white Southerners who cared not at all that bad things would occasionally happen to the “uppity” among their black neighbors. (How do we know this? –We know this because FDR himself clearly explained his situation to the NAACP’s Walter White: saving the lives of these black men would cost him more, in terms of support, than their lives were worth to him.)

John R. Kellam attended a long lecture by the new Director of the federal Bureau of Investigation, later to become known as the FBI, named J. Edgar Hoover, and was for the time being suitably impressed:

He was full of what a wonderful organization that was and he was seeing to it that it was increasing in efficiency and effectiveness, catching only the bad guys, only doing that when their evidence was straight and true and sufficient for convictions. If you were innocent, you’d welcome the FBI coming to ask about anything. If you were guilty, you’d better not see the FBI.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

OURS...to fight for

FREEDOM FROM FEAR

John would have occasion, later in life, to adjust this favorable first impression:

All that good first impression was blown away in January 1945, during my own trial in Toledo federal district court without benefit of in-court counsel and representation, when two of J. Edgar Hoover's FBI operatives would easily resort to entirely unnecessary lies in order to "prove" all but one of my character witnesses wrong about my reasons for claiming to be a conscientious objector.

HDT

WHAT?

INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

February 27, Monday: A young Dutch socialist, Marinus van der Lubbe, a member of a tiny Communist splinter group opposed both to Stalin and to the German Communist Party, was found wandering dazed near the burning German Reichstag building. He would be accused of having committed this arson as a protest against Nazism, despite the greatest difficulties in putting together a crime scenario in which one person acting alone could conceivably have started, without any accelerants, all those simultaneous blazes in various parts of the building. On January 10, 1934 in Leipzig his head would be chopped off with an ax but that would do nothing to resolve the controversy — which has persisted ever since.

HEADCHOPPING

Having become involved in the Communist Party of the United States, Edward Dahlberg would be going to Germany at the point at which Adolf Hitler was coming to power after this torching of the Reichstag (this event being for Hitler in Germany what the Twin Towers attack would become for George W. Bush in America — the golden moment that begged to be seized).

After establishing his credentials by being beaten by a Nazi officer who had either had too much to drink or disliked Communists or perhaps both, Dahlberg would return to Greenwich Village and be offered a commission to write a book on some anti-Nazi theme. This would be published under the title THOSE WHO PERISH and would be the 1st book of its kind to reach the public eye in the United States.

WORLD WAR II

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

November 26, Sunday: In San Jose, California, two low-level mob figures had kidnapped the son of a local businessman, and had been caught. The mob was afraid they would sing, implicating others in an attempt to get off, and so they got in contact with the governor of the state, in Sacramento, and organized a group ostensibly made up of outraged citizens. The two accused men were taken from the San Jose jail with only minimal police resistance, and hanged and burned in St. James Park across the street. It was made to look as if they had been lynched for the crime they had committed, rather than out of a desire to shut their mouths. The event was commemorated by items for sale, such as the following which includes a prior snapshot of Thomas Thurmond:

When this image of the lynched John Holmes appeared on the front page of the local newspaper, the entire issue was confiscated from the newstands by the police — because it featured male nudity:

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1934

January 10, Wednesday: On February 27, 1933 a young Dutch socialist, Marinus van der Lubbe, had been found wandering dazed near the burning German Reichstag building. He had been accused of having committed this arson as a protest against Nazism. On this day in Leipzig, his head was chopped off with an ax.

HEADCHOPPING

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1936

April 3, Friday: Bruno Richard Hauptmann was electrocuted as the kidnapper and murderer of Charles Lindbergh III.

July 12, Sunday: 13 army officers and 4 civilians, leaders of the February 26th insurrection in Japan, were executed by firing squad.

Falangists murdered Lt. José Castillo, a member of the Spanish Republican Guard.

August 14, Friday: A 22-year-old black American, Rainey Bethea, was hanged in public in Owensboro, Kentucky before a crowd of 20,000 including more than 200 visiting sheriffs and deputies.

FINAL EXECUTIONS
1918	Tsar Nicholas II	executed with his family
August 14, 1936	Rainey Bethea	22-year-old black American hanged in public in Owensboro, Kentucky before a crowd of 20,000 including more than 200 visiting sheriffs and deputies; last person publicly executed in the USA
June 17, 1939	Eugen Weidman	public execution by guillotine , at Versailles

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1939

February: In this month God, who has a sense of humor, struck the executioner of the French, Anatole Deibler, with a heart attack, in the métro station, as he was setting off for Rennes, to truncate a man named Pilorges, and his life was cut off.

HEADCHOPPING

In this month our poet Robinson Jeffers composed for us a poem:

Nerves

You have noticed the curious increasing exasperation
Of human nerves these late years? Not only in Europe,
Where reasons exist, but universal; a rope or a net
Is being hauled in, a tension screwed tighter;
Few minds now are quite sane: nearly every person
Seems to be listening for a crash, listening...
And wishing for it, with a kind of enraged
Sensibility.

Or is it that we really feel
A gathering in the air of something that hates Humanity; and in that storm-light see Ourselves with too much pity and the others too clearly?

Well: this is February, nineteen-three-nine.
We count the months now; we shall count the days.
It seems time that we find something outside our Own nerves to lean on.

The poet was already beginning to arrive at his concept “inhuman” — which eventually he would use to name his peculiar philosophical attitude as that of Inhumanism. (He had not read Thoreau and thus had no idea that he was merely echoing the life philosophy of another poet. During his life, no-one would ever alert him to this fact.)

“It appears to me that to one standing on the heights of philosophy mankind & the works of man will have sunk out of sight altogether. Man is altogether too much insisted on. The poet says the proper study of mankind is man— I say study to forget all that —take wider views of the universe— That is the egotism of the race. What is this our childish gossiping social literature — mainly in the hands of the publishers? When the poet says the world is too much with us —he means of course that man is too much with us— In the promulgated views of man —in institutions —in the common sense there is narrowness & delusion. It is our weakness that so exaggerates the virtues of philanthropy & charity & makes it the highest human attribute— The world will sooner or later tire of philanthropy —and all religions based on it mainly. They cannot long sustain my spirit.

In order to avoid delusions I would fain let man go by & behold a universe in which man is but as a grain of sand— I am sure that my thoughts which consist or are contemporaneous with social personal connections — however humane are not the wisest & widest —most universal— What is the village —city state —nation —aye the civilized world — that it should so concern a man? It is a comfortable place to nestle no doubt & we have friends — some sympathizing ones it may be, & a hearth, there – but I have only to get up at midnight – aye to soar – or wander a little in my thought by day – to find them all slumbering– Look at our literature what a poor puny social thing seeking sympathy– The author troubles himself about his readers – would fain have one before he dies.– not satisfied with defiling one another in this world, we would all go to heaven together.– To be a good man (that is a good neighbor in the widest sense) is but little more than to be a good citizen. Mankind is a gigantic institution – it is a community to which most men belong. It is a test I would apply to my companion – can he forget man? Can he see this world slumbering?

ROBINSON JEFFERS

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

I do not value any view of the universe into which man & the institutions of man enter very largely & absorb much of the attention– Man is but the place where I stand & the prospect (thence) hence is infinite. it is not a chamber of mirrors which reflect me –when I reflect myself –I find that there is other than me. man is a past phenomenon to philosophy – the universe is larger than enough for man's abode. Some rarely go outdoors – most are always at home at night – very few indeed have stayed out all night once in their lives – fewer still have gone behind the world of humanity –seen his institutions like toad-stools by the way-side. Now the author stands too near his printer. He corrects the proofs.”

–Thoreau's JOURNAL, April 2, 1852

June 17, Saturday: In the final head-chopping to take place in public in France, Eugen Weidman, who had murdered 6 times, became a victim of the guillotine outside the prison at Versailles.

FINAL EXECUTIONS
August 14, 1936	Rainey Bethea	22-year-old black American hanged in public in Owensboro, Kentucky before a crowd of 20,000 including more than 200 visiting sheriffs and deputies; last person publicly executed in the USA
June 17, 1939	Eugen Weidman	public execution by guillotine , at Versailles
August 15, 1941	Corporal Josef Jakobs	German spy executed by firing squad at the Tower of London

June 24, Saturday: George Verhaghen committed suicide by jumping off the Golden Gate Bridge.

According to a new law state head-choppings were no longer to be conducted in public, but were to take place in Paris within the yard of the Santé prison.

HEADCHOPPING

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1940

September 16, Monday: British carrier planes attacked Benghazi, Libya.

WORLD WAR II

The Daniel Chester French postage stamp was issued.

The United States military conscription bill, the Selective Training and Service Act of 1940, was signed by President Franklin Delano Roosevelt, creating this country's initial peacetime draft and formally establishing a Selective Service System as an independent Federal agency.⁶³⁶

WORLD WAR II

All males 21-36 were required to register for the draft. The FBI became responsible for locating draft evaders

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

and deserters. Conscientious objectors were allegedly to be exempted on the basis of training and belief.

For the first time they would be required to serve their country doing “work of national importance under civilian direction.” This was to be the case regardless of whether the person in question was a citizen of the state of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations and as such protected from all such conscription ever since the 17th Century by Rhode Island’s charter of religious liberty of conscience, a charter that had never before been gainsaid.

636. Don’t you feel so much safer? What if they gave a war and nobody came?

Please notice that there’s an important difference, in these files, for the period of the 1930s and 1940s. The important difference is that, during the lengthy regime of President FDR, there’s absolutely no mention at the national level of the Southern Democrat practice of the lynching of black Americans. During the FDR regime, these lynchings would be going on entirely uninterrupted, and the federal executive branch would be sponsoring zero zip nada niente anti-lynching legislation. Roosevelt was a Democrat, and it was an uneasy alliance between “liberal” Northern Democrats and “conservative” Southern Democrats that, election after election, was keeping him in power. For him to have supported anti-lynching legislation would have been for him to have split his support base, which was made up in roughly equal parts of white Northerners who did not much care what was happening to black Americans down south, and white Southerners who cared not at all that bad things would occasionally happen to the “uppity” among their black neighbors. (How do we know this? –We know this because FDR himself clearly explained his situation to the NAACP’s Walter White: saving the lives of these black men would cost him more, in terms of support, than their lives were worth to him.)

HDT

WHAT?

INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

MILITARY CONSCRIPTION

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1941

March 13, Thursday: The Boston Bruins defeated the New York Americans, 8-3, becoming the 1st hockey team to win the divisional championship four times in a row.

15 members of the Dutch resistance were executed by firing squad.

WORLD WAR II

August 4, Monday: Royal Fleet Auxiliary ship HMS Darkdale, a new oil tanker, arrived at St. Helena Island to be Fleet Oiler there, loaded with 3,000 tons of fuel oil, 850 tons of aviation spirit, 500 tons of diesel oil, and some lubricating oil. Prior to coming to anchor it caused slight damage to a Norwegian tanker M.V. Nyholm.

Japan ended all steamship traffic with the United States.

Josef Jakobs, a German who had been found injured in the English countryside wearing civilian clothing underneath a flying suit, was taken before a court-martial at the Duke of York Headquarters in Chelsea, charged with “Committing treachery in that you at Ramsay in Huntingdonshire on the night of 31 January 1941/1 February 1941 descended by parachute with intent to help the enemy.” The inquiry took two days. He asked whether he would be shot or hanged if found guilty, and was informed that since this was a military rather than a civilian court, he would be shot. He admitted to being an officer in the Intelligence Section of the German General Staff. He was found guilty and sentenced to execution by firing squad. He would petition the King, alleging that he was a friend of England who had come to this county to help her in her fight against Germany. He asked to be held until the end of the war, when he would be able to prove his innocence of the charge. This would get him exactly nowhere, of course.

WORLD WAR II

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

August 15, Friday: 600 Jews were shot in Stawiski, northeast of Warsaw.

ANTISEMITISM

Germans decree that all Jews in occupied Russia would wear two yellow badges, they would receive only food surplus to the needs of gentiles and they must join public works crews.

WORLD WAR II

The United States reduces by 10% the amount of gasoline that can be delivered to filling stations in 17 states.

In the Pacific, the US Marine Corps established a Naval Air Station on Palmyra Island and a Naval Air Facility on Johnston Island.

Early in the morning, Corporal Josef Jakobs was taken to an old miniature .22 rifle range within the grounds of the Tower of London (where spies had also been executed during the 1st World War), placed in a brown Windsor chair (not the same one used during World War I) because with his broken leg he could not stand, and at 7:12AM executed by firing squad. One of the eight men in the squad shot him in the head rather than the heart. (All other persons convicted and executed under the Treachery Act of 1940 and the High Treason Act of 1351 were hanged, at either Wandsworth or Pentonville Prisons. His unmarked civilian grave at St. Mary's Roman Catholic Cemetery in northwest London has since been re-used. This would be the sole spy to be executed at the Tower during this war. It now appears rather likely that his will be the last execution ever to take place at the Tower.)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

FINAL EXECUTIONS
June 17, 1939	Eugen Weidman	public execution by guillotine , at Versailles
August 15, 1941	Corporal Josef Jakobs	German spy executed by firing squad at the Tower of London
January 31, 1945	Private Edward Donald "Eddie" Slovik	General Dwight David "Ike" Eisenhower ordered his execution by firing squad for desertion during World War II by his own unit, the 28th Infantry Division, in a small town in northeast France

December 8, Monday: Croatia declared war on the United States and the United Kingdom. Soviet forces retook Tikhvin, 180 kilometers southeast of Leningrad. Führer Adolf Hitler announced the suspension of military operations against the Soviet Union due to severe weather conditions.

A German policy of killing Jews by gas was put into effect. 700 Jews from Kulmhof (Chelmo), 60 kilometers northeast of Lodz, were taken by van (with the exhaust system hooked into the van) to a nearby wood. By the time they arrived, they were dead. From this day on, Jews from the surrounding district were daily transported to Kulmhof for the same purpose. This was the first death camp to begin operations. The region would be emptied of its 360,000 Jews.

ANTISEMITISM

This was the day on which the US Pacific fleet had been ordered to steam out of Pearl Harbor to seek battle engagement with the Japanese fleet, but the hulls of many capital vessels of this US fleet were resting on a bed of mud in the warm shallow waters of Pearl Harbor, awaiting recovery and salvage efforts, and oil slicks were glistening upon the surfaces of these waters. On the California seacoast, the 4th Interceptor Command spotted two formations of enemy planes near San Francisco, heading toward Los Angeles.

After Japanese soldiers made a quick lunch of the defenses of the British crown colony of Hong Kong, Governor Mark Young was restricted to his quarters in the Peninsula Hotel. British civilians were rounded up and some 20,000 Chinese per month would be deported to the mainland.

US Marines and other Allied nationals were interned at Shanghai, Beijing, and Tientsin.

Striking Force, Asiatic Fleet (Rear Admiral W.A. Glassford) departed Iloilo, Philippine Islands for Makassar Strait, Netherlands East Indies.

The river gunboat Wake (PR-3) was surrendered to Japanese at Shanghai after an attempt to scuttle it failed (The Wake would be the sole United States ship to surrender during this war).

The Potomac River Naval Command, with its headquarters at Washington DC, and the Severn River Naval Command, with its headquarters at Annapolis, Maryland, were established.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

The SS President Harrison, en route to evacuate US Marines from Chingwangtao, China, ran aground at Sha Wai Shan, China, and was captured by the Japanese.

Japanese aircraft bombed Guam, Wake, Hong Kong, Singapore, and the Philippine Islands. Extensive damage was inflicted on United States Army aircraft at Clark Field, Luzon, Philippine Islands.

Japan interned US Marines and nationals at Shanghai and Tientsin, China.

A United States naval vessel was sunk by a horizontal bomber: the minesweeper Penguin (AM-33), near Guam in the Marianas Islands.

Japan invaded Thailand, which capitulated.

Japanese troops landed unopposed at Victoria Point, the southern tip of Burma.

Japanese landed on Bataan Island north of Luzon, Philippine Islands, and on the east coast of the Malay Peninsula. (At some point during their occupation of the Philippines, on Luzon, 14 Filipino resistance fighters would be forced to surrender because they ran out of ammunition. Other POWs were required to dig 14 foxholes for them and were then executed. These resistance fighters were forced into the foxholes and earth shovelled around them and stamped down, until only their heads and necks were above ground, so that the Japanese officer could use them for his sword practice. Some of the soldiers having defecated onto banana leaves, shit was stuffed into their mouths with considerable hilarity before the officer drew his sword.

HEADCHOPPING

The Chelmno death camp near Lodz, Poland opened for business.

In a conversation with Rosenman, one of his speechwriters, President Franklin Delano Roosevelt spoke of Führer Adolf Hitler as his first target, and “feared that a great many Americans would insist that we make the war in the Pacific at least equally important with the war against Hitler.” He was, however, saying nothing of the sort to the American people.

Instead we were receiving, on this day that will live in infamy, a lie that would send more than 16 million US citizens to war:

TO THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES:

Yesterday, December 7, 1941 -a date which will live in infamy- the United States of America was suddenly and deliberately attacked by naval and air forces of the Empire of Japan.

The United States was at peace with that Nation and, at the solicitation of Japan, was still in conversation with its Government and its Emperor looking toward the maintenance of peace in the Pacific. Indeed, one hour after Japanese air squadrons had commenced bombing in Oahu, the Japanese Ambassador to the United States and his colleague delivered to the Secretary of State a form reply to a recent American message. While this reply stated that it seemed useless to continue the existing diplomatic negotiations, it contained no threat or hint of war or armed attack.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

It will be recorded that the distance of Hawaii from Japan makes it obvious that the attack was deliberately planned many days or even weeks ago. During the intervening time the Japanese Government had deliberately sought to deceive the United States by false statements and expressions of hope for continued peace. The attack yesterday on the Hawaiian Islands has caused severe damage to American naval and military forces. Very many American lives have been lost. In addition American ships have been reported torpedoed on the high seas between San Francisco and Honolulu.

Yesterday the Japanese Government also launched an attack against Malaya. Last night Japanese forces attacked Hong Kong. Last night Japanese forces attacked Guam. Last night Japanese forces attacked the Philippine Islands. Last night the Japanese attacked Midway Island. Japan has, therefore, undertaken a surprise offensive extending throughout the Pacific area. The facts of yesterday speak for themselves. The people of the United States have already formed their opinions and well understand the implications to the very life and safety of our Nation.

As Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy I have directed that all measures be taken for our defense.

Always will we remember the character of the onslaught against us. No matter how long it may take us to overcome this premeditated invasion, the American people in their righteous might will win through to absolute victory.

I believe I interpret the will of the Congress and of the people when I assert that we will not only defend ourselves to the uttermost but will make very certain that this form of treachery shall never endanger us again. Hostilities exist. There is no blinking at the fact that our people, our territory, and our interests are in grave danger. With confidence in our armed forces - with the unbounded determination of our people - we will gain the inevitable triumph - so help us God.

I ask that the Congress declare that since the unprovoked and dastardly attack by Japan on Sunday, December seventh, a state of war has existed between the United States and the Japanese Empire.

— Franklin D. Roosevelt

DECLARATION OF WAR

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

The British declared war upon Japan. Declarations of war upon Japan were issued by Nicaragua, Honduras, El Salvador, Guatemala, Haiti, the Dominican Republic, the Netherlands, the Free French, and Panama. Mexico, Colombia, Belgium, and Egypt did not declare war, but did sever diplomatic relations with Japan. (The USSR would neither declare war upon Japan nor sever diplomatic relations, until that nation lay prostrate and devastated in the very last moments of the hostilities.)

WORLD WAR II

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Pearl Harbor

I

Here are the fireworks. The men who conspired and labored
To embroil this republic in the wreck of Europe have got their bargain, —
And a bushel more. As for me, what can I do but fly the national flag from the top of the tower, —
America has neither race nor religion nor its own language: nation or nothing.

Stare, little tower,
Confidently across the Pacific, the flag on your head. I built you at the other war's end,
And the sick peace; I based you on living rock, granite on granite; I said,
"Look, you gray stones:
Civilization is sick: stand awhile and be quiet and drink the sea-wind, you will survive
Civilization."

But now I am old, and O stones be modest. Look, little tower:
This dust blowing is only the British Empire; these torn leaves flying
Are only Europe; the wind is the plane-propellers; the smoke is Tokyo.
The child with the butchered throat
Was too young to be named. Look no farther ahead.

II

The war that we have carefully for years provoked
Catches us unprepared, amazed and indignant. Our warships are shot
Like sitting ducks and our planes like nest-birds, both our coasts ridiculously panicked,
And our leaders make orations. This is the people
That hopes to impose on the whole planetary world
An American peace.

(Oh, we'll not lose our war: my money on amazed Gulliver
And his horse-pistols.)

Meanwhile our prudent officers
Have cleared the coast-long ocean of ships and fishing-craft, the sky of planes, the windows of light: these clearings
Make a great beauty. Watch the wide sea; there is nothing human; its gulls have it. Watch the wide sky
All day clean of machines; only at dawn and dusk one military hawk passes
High on patrol. Walk at night in the black-out,
The firefly lights that used to line the long shore
Are all struck dumb; shut are the shops, mouse-dark the houses. Here the prehuman dignity of night
Stands, as it was before and will be again. Oh beautiful Darkness and silence, the two eyes that see God; great staring eyes.

— Robinson Jeffers

At the home of Helen Clarke Grimes, in Spragueville near Smithfield northwest of Providence, Rhode Island, as in many homes in America, the radio was being kept constantly on, not for the soap operas that filled the daytime airwaves, but for the sporadic news flashes about the war situation. Helen made notes for her diary:

Dec. 8 — This Monday morning we face a turquoise and coral sunrise with the sick realization that we are at war, and that the radio bulletins are not something by Orson Welles.
We had turned the radio off at eleven o'clock last night, worn dull by hours of incessant listening, and were about to go to bed when Charlie and Harriett who had spent the day at his mother's, came home with two copies of the War Extra.
We talked until twelve, soberly with no fine frenzy to fire us.
Constance and Oliver phoned, but there was nothing to say.
It is 8AM and the news is pouring in over the radio.
Hongkong has been bombed, and there is a report of 200 casualties suffered at Singapore. Ford Wilkins in Manila says there has been no violence in that city as yet. He tells of Japanese

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

landing on some parts of the Phillipines, of the round-up and internment of Japanese in Manila; of the evacuation of Manila, and of a naval battle reported in the Pacific.

A Washington commentator says our losses are far more serious (in Hawaii) than given out. Hangers have been flattened, planes destroyed, there has been torpedo damage – altogether a heavy naval defeat.

At night the lights burned in embassy windows along Massachusetts Avenue in [Washington DC].

In Providence, the State Guard has been mobilized, and roving guards placed at industrial plants, at the airport, and along the waterfront.

On the West Coast few went to bed last night, excitement running high the thoroughfares crowded.

Charles Collingwood in a report from London, speaks of grey parliament buildings, and of Churchill in his black Homburg hat. Arthur Crock, in writing of the American reaction in the "N.Y. Times," says one can almost hear national unity clicking into place.

This is a grim day. Here, in one of the smallest communities in the smallest state in the union, the stark branches of the apple trees are bleak and cold against a lowering sky.

Mother is having an asthma attack.

Twelve o'clock noon – The sun is out, the sky a thin wash of blue.

Japanese planes are only forty miles from Manila.

12:30 – President Roosevelt spoke to the joint session of House and Senate, a short address of five hundred words, at the end of which he asked "that Congress declare that since the unprovoked and dastardly attack by Japan on Sunday Dec. 7th, a state of war has existed between the United States and the Japanese Empire."

The "President Pierce" reported to have been torpedoed, was the first dollar liner on which Oliver sailed to the Orient.

A news flash breaks into a concert of chamber music to tell of an air raid now in progress over Manila.

2:30 – The Phillipines direct. At 1:30 a terrific air attack had begun over Manila. It is thought that twenty-five American bombers have been destroyed. As the announcer broadcasts there is the sound of Japanese planes overhead.

An N.B.C. announcer on the roof of an eight story building reports a great fire which is destroying the gasoline supply dump on Nichols Field, a base airfield in the heart of Manila. He is panting from his run up eight flights of stairs, the elevator boy having deserted his post.

The stars were shining over the city and a bright moon rides directly over head. Galvanized iron rooftops stand out like mirrors, the black-out rendered futile by the moon.

3:30 PM – Prime Minister Churchill has delivered a solemn speech in a tired, husky voice.

4:30 PM – The tires of the news boy's bicycle grit on the gravel as he wheels up to the door. There is a thud as the "Providence Bulletin" hits the door. Its headlines have no power to shock those already benumbed by the radio.

9:35 PM – There is a report from the "San Francisco News

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Chronicle" that fifty unidentified planes have been sighted flying from the south west toward San Francisco. The city is blacked-out to a depth of ten miles.

10:00 PM — An air raid siren is blowing in San Francisco. All radio stations but one are off the air. Planes are said to have been seen off the Golden Gate. The man in the street is wondering if this is an air raid test or the real thing.

A copy of the November "Atlantic Monthly" lies on the table, the back page given over to a vacation ad: "Hawaii. Standing two thousand miles out in the gentle latitudes of the South Pacific ..."

San Francisco motorists are driving without headlights.

The all-clear signal has been given. False alarm or practice work-out?

11:00 PM — A summary of to-day's events — and so ends the first day of this war. We go to bed wondering why, when for months there has been a strong possibility of war with Japan, our forces were caught napping.

Will close this with two lines from Shakespeare. King John, I think.

"For when you should be told they do prepare
The tidings come that they are all arrived."

It goes on: "O where hath our intelligence been drunk? Where hath it slept?" Oh, where indeed!

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1942

January 15, Thursday: Senator Harry S Truman's Truman Committee presented its 1st Annual Report to the Senate. This would help induce President Franklin Delano Roosevelt to replace his Office of Production Management with a new, more powerful War Production Board.

American-British-Dutch-Australian Supreme Command was established. Field Marshall Sir Archibald Wavell, British Army assumed supreme command of all forces in area, while Admiral T.C. Hart, United States Navy had command of the naval forces under Field Marshall Wavell.

Japanese forces attacked a new Allied (Britain-India-Australia) defense line along the River Muar, Malaya, eventually forcing further retreat.

Jawaharlal Nehru succeeded Mohandas Karamchand Gandhi as head of the All-India Congress Party.

The initial batch of United States servicemen arrived in Britain ("overfed, oversexed and over here").

Singapore surrendered to the Japanese. The 130,000 British and Indian prisoners of war would be sent to labor on the Burma-Siam railway.

Singapore's Princess Alexandra Hospital was being guarded by a detachment of Gurkha troops. When commanded by a Japanese officer to lay down their arms, their NCO replied that this was a civilian hospital, not a military target. The Japanese gave an order and his men killed 24 of the Gurkhas. They then entered the hospital and began to slaughter its patients, which included a number of survivors from the Prince of Wales and the Repulse. The doctors and medical orderlies were killed, and the nurses were raped and then killed.

The Japanese made a determined effort to exterminate the entire Chinese population of Singapore, and managed to kill 9,000-12,000. After interrogation by the Kempetai the ethnic Chinese were obliged to hand over all their personal possessions, rings, watches, jewelry, money, etc., before being forced onto captured British lorries and driven to the Tanjong Pagar Wharf and beheaded.

HEADCHOPPING

This went on for 12 days while boats from Singapore Harbour brought more and more Chinese civilians to that execution site. In the Geylang district, 3,600 Chinese were herded into the grounds of the Teluk Kurau English

STATE MURDER

School and interrogated by the Kempetai. At the completion of interrogation, in groups of 200, they were taken by truck to the crest of a hill off Siglap Road and shot, beheaded, or bayoneted. One person present within the Teluk Kurau English School grounds that day would survive to tell the tale. In another such action, 700 Chinese were taken to an area just east of Changi where mass graves had already been dug, and the heads of these victims were piled up in a waiting lorry and during that night would be installed on bamboo stakes around and about Singapore. (A British military court would sentence Lieutenant-General Takuma Nishimura, commander of the Japanese troops in Singapore, to life imprisonment, but an Australian Military Court would then try him for other crimes and he would be hanged on June 11, 1951.)

WORLD WAR II

In case you wondered, this is what the cross-section of the human neck, revealed by this interesting practice, actually looks like:

October 16, Friday: Coastal Command, a film with music by Ralph Vaughan Williams, was shown for the initial time, in the Plaza Cinema, Piccadilly Circus, London.

Rodeo, a ballet by Aaron Copland to a scenario by De Mille, was performed for the initial time, at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. This was a glittering sold out event and a great success. In the audience, Richard Rodgers and Oscar Hammerstein II decide to hire Agnes de Mille to choreograph their next project, Oklahoma!

The second of 18 patriotic fanfares for brass and percussion commissioned by Eugene Goossens and the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, A Fanfare for Russia by Deems Taylor, was performed for the initial time, in

STATE MURDER

Cincinnati.

A two-day cyclone over the state of Bengal, India killed 40,000 people.

British troops captured Ambositra, Madagascar, 225 kilometers south of Tananarive (Antananarivo).

50 Polish communists were publicly hanged in Warsaw and their bodies displayed as a warning.

Carrier task force (Rear Admiral G.D. Murray) struck Japanese troops on Guadalcanal, Solomon Islands, and enemy seaplanes at Rekata Bay, Santa Isabel, Solomon Islands.

The US Submarine Thresher (SS-200) laid mines in northern Gulf of Siam.

United States Seaplane Tender McFarland (AVD-14) was damaged by dive bombers in the Solomon Islands, 9 degrees 24 minutes South, 160 degrees 2 minutes East.

Japanese Destroyer Oboro was sunk by US Army aircraft in the vicinity of the Aleutian Islands.

WORLD WAR II

An all-time record river crest for the Shenandoah Valley. In the Lower Town of Harpers Ferry, floodwaters reached 33.8 feet.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

December 22, Tuesday: Soviet troops captured Morozovsk, west of Stalingrad.

In Krakow, six members of the Jewish Fighting Organization blew up two cafes frequented by members of the S.S. and Gestapo. At least 20 and perhaps 50 people were killed. The leader, Adolf Liebesand, who died in the attack, was reported to have said, "We were fighting for three lines in the history books."

ANTISEMITISM

Japanese Patrol Boat #35 was sunk by US Submarine Greenling (SS-213) in the vicinity of the Solomon Islands, at 5 degrees 5 minutes South, 156 degrees 4 minutes East.

WORLD WAR II

December 23, Wednesday: German relief forces came within 50 kilometers of the Sixth Army besieged in Stalingrad.

WORLD WAR II

December 24, Thursday: Admiral Jean François Darlan, commander-in-chief of French forces in North Africa, was murdered in Algiers by Donnier de la Chapelle, a radical royalist.

The Germans successfully launched a flying bomb from Peenemünde.

Germans entered Bialowieza, Poland and murdered 300 Poles as a reprisal for partisan activity.

Japanese troop-laden barges were attacked heavily by aircraft from Henderson Field, Guadalcanal, Solomon Islands.

United States Transports Florence Nightingale (AP-70) and Thurston (AP-77) collided and went under on the North African coast, at 34 degrees 41 minutes North, 7 degrees 25 minutes West.

WORLD WAR II

December 25, Friday: Allied forces occupied Sirte (Surt), Libya.

WORLD WAR II

December 26, Saturday: Convicted in a court-martial of murdering Admiral Darlan, 20-year-old Bonnier de la Chapelle was executed by a French firing squad.

Japanese transports at Wickham Anchorage, New Georgia, Solomon Islands were attacked by US naval aircraft (the strike would be repeated on December 29th).

WORLD WAR II

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1943

February 9, Tuesday: Organized Japanese resistance on Guadalcanal in the Solomon Islands ended when General Patch's Cape Esperance envelopment force joined with the force making the western advance. XIV Corps headquarters announced that the Allies had secured the island of Guadalcanal.⁶³⁷

The Japanese had captured Ambon Island from the Australians. Two circular pits were dug, about five meters apart, six meters in diameter and three meters in depth, in a wooded area near the Laha airstrip. Soon after 6PM a group of Australian and Dutch prisoners of war were brought to the site with their arms tied securely behind them. The first prisoner was pushed to his knees at the edge of a pits and Warrant Officer Kakutaro Sasaki enacted the initial Samurai-sword beheading. The eager crew-members of a Japanese minesweeper that had been blown up by a mine in Ambon Bay a few days earlier were allowed to perform the next four beheadings.

HEADCHOPPING

As dusk descended, the Japanese needed to point their battery torches at the necks of their victims so they could see where to strike. Meanwhile, at the other pit, the men of a Dutch mortar unit were being similarly processed. In all on this evening, 55 Australian and 30 Dutch soldiers were beheaded. (The details of this would be revealed by a civilian interpreter, Suburo Yoshizaki, who had been attached to the Kure No.1 Special Navy

637. The American boys who had died in the long battle for Guadalcanal had not, of course, died in vain. By sacrificing their lives they had enabled the US to portray the struggle in the Pacific Ocean region as one long resistance to Japanese aggression, rather than allowing it to be portrayed as one war of aggression initiated by Japan followed by a period of peace followed by another war of aggression initiated this time by the United States of America. They had given their lives to seize and hold for us the moral high ground.

(If you suppose I couldn't possibly have meant what I wrote above, please read the paragraph again — and this time allow the thought to sink home. The island of Guadalcanal was a mere token serving for us no easily determined military or logistic purpose.)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Landing Party, at that time stationed on Ambon.) A few days later, on February 24th, in the same wooded area, another such group execution/sword practice event would be taking place. The SS Henry R. Mallory, a 6,063-ton American ex-passenger liner built in 1916, was part of a 69-ship North Atlantic convoy, SC-118, bound for the British Isles, when it was torpedoed by U-boats U609 and U625.

WORLD WAR II

Of the 494 passengers and crew on board the Mallory, including 381 US troops, 34 armed guards, 2 civilians and 77 crewmen, 270 died. 224 floaters were collected 4 hours later, some by the Coast Guard cutter Bibb, 3 of whom soon died, and others by the destroyer Ingham, 2 of whom soon died. (U609 would later be sunk by the French escort corvette Lobelia, and the 46 inside it would die. Kapitän-Leutnant Hans Benker's U625 would be destroyed on March 10, 1944 by depth charges from a Canadian Sunderland flying boat, and the 53 inside it would die.)⁶³⁸

638. That those who live by the sword will die by the sword is of course a mere rule of thumb, so there have been some notable exceptions — but as rules of thumb go this one seems fairly accurate.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

February 16, Tuesday, 6.57PM: Professor Mildred Elizabeth Fish-Harnack was beheaded at the Plötzensee Prison in Berlin on personal order of Führer Adolf Hitler (her German husband had already been strangled and hung from a meat hook). This would be the only time an American woman would be executed for treason during World War II. (The couple had been part of a resistance organization that had passed information to the United States and the USSR, and had painted "Down with Hitler" on walls. Her final words, allegedly, were "Und ich hatte Deutschland so geliebt." By September all 51 members of the German "Red Orchestra" group would be dead, 2 by suicide, 8 by hanging, and 41 by guillotine.)

February 22, Monday: Immortality for chorus by John Ireland to words of Crompton was performed for the initial time, over the airwaves of the BBC originating in Bedford.

The Red Army took Sumy, 300 kilometers east of Kiev.

Saudi Arabia broke relations with Italy.

The German offensive in Tunisia was halted by British and American forces north of Qasserine.

Vidkun Quisling ordered the mobilization of the entire civil population of Norway for public works projects in support of the military.

Bulgaria agreed to deport 11,000 Jews from Bulgaria, occupied Greece, and Yugoslavia to Treblinka.

ANTISEMITISM

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Hans Scholl and his sister Sophie Scholl, 22 years of age, who like Professor Mildred Elizabeth Fish-Harnack had been implicated in the “White Rose” student movement at München University, were likewise guillotined. Sophie’s crime had been the sentence “Every word that comes from Hitler’s mouth is a lie.” The bodies of the Scholls would be buried outside München, in the Perlach Forest Cemetery.

The Battleship Iowa (BB-61) was commissioned at New York, New York.

German Submarine U-606 was sunk by US Coast Guard cutter Campbell (PG-32) and Polish destroyer Burza in the North Atlantic, at 47 degrees 44 minutes North, 33 degrees 43 minutes West.

WORLD WAR II

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1944

January 27, Thursday: The Germans had a point to make, and hanged 102 Poles publicly in Warsaw.

The British had a point to make, and Royal Air Force bombers struck again at Berlin, killing 656 more Berliners. Point made.

Argentina severed relations with Germany.

The Moscow-Leningrad Railroad was cleared. Soviet troops occupied Tosno to the south of Leningrad and Shpola to the north of Kirovgrad in the Ukraine. The city of Leningrad (or what was left of it) had been relieved after a 900-day siege that had produced the deaths of 750,000.

WORLD WAR II

July 20, Thursday: A German assassination attempt against Führer Adolf Hitler failed — although it did cripple one of his arms.

(He would have the people who did this hanged on meathooks and view their dying struggles on film.)

Soviet troops liberated the Majdanek concentration camp.

WORLD WAR II

September 21, Thursday: The transport Toyofuku Maru was carrying British and Dutch POWs from Singapore to Japan, and had stopped at Manila to offload the sick and dying, and had come out of the port of Manila in a convoy which had been at sea for three days. At this point it was engaged by US torpedo bombers. It took only a few minutes for the ship to go down and for approximately 1,000 POWs trapped in the prisoner holds to drown. There were fewer than 200 floaters.

Aircraft from 12 carriers (Vice Admiral M. A. Mitscher) commenced a 2-day attack against Japanese shipping and airfields on Luzon, Philippine Islands.

American planes bombed the Manila area destroying 200 Japanese planes and much shipping in Manila Bay, at the cost of 15 planes.

Urho Jonas Castren replaced Antti Verner Hackzell as prime minister of Finland.

The new government of Bulgaria proclaimed equality of women, religious freedom, civil marriage, and separation of church and state.

STATE MURDER

Josip Broz Tito flew in a Soviet airplane to Romania and thence to Moscow. He would sign an agreement allowing Soviet entry into Yugoslavia with the proviso that they needed to depart as soon as their task was completed and the proviso that they would have no control over the partisans.

Roman Chief of Police Pietro Caruso, found guilty of providing execution lists to the Germans, was shot to death by a firing squad.

Canadian and Greek forces captured Rimini on the Adriatic coast, 11 west of Florence.

Japanese naval vessels sunk, Philippine Islands area:

- Destroyer Satsuki, by carrier-based aircraft, Manila Bay Oiler Sunosaki, by carrier-based aircraft, Manila Bay
- Surveying ship Katsuriki, by submarine Haddo (SS-255) west of Manila, 13 degrees 35 minutes North, 119 degrees 6 minutes East
- Coast defense vessel #5, by carrier-based aircraft, north of Masinloc, 15 degrees 25 minutes North, 119 degrees 50 minutes East
- Auxiliary submarine chaser #39, by carrier-based aircraft, 12 degrees 18 minutes North, 122 degrees 46 minutes East
- Minesweeper #7, carrier-based aircraft, 12 degrees 18 minutes North, 122 degrees 46 minutes East

WORLD WAR II

November 30, Thursday: The Gloeden family, a husband and wife and the wife's mother, had helped shelter in their flat some people who were being sought by the Nazis, and had been arrested by the German Gestapo and of course tortured. On this day, at the Plotzensee Prison in Berlin, the 3 were guillotined at 2-minute intervals (we don't know who got to go 1st and who had to wait until last).

HEADCHOPPING

WORLD WAR II

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1945

January 31, Wednesday: By order of General Dwight David "Ike" Eisenhower, Private Edward Donald "Eddie" Slovik, having been hidden away by a French girlfriend, was put before a firing squad at Ste. Marie-aux-Mines. He was the 1st American so executed since the Civil War and the only one in World War II.

FINAL EXECUTIONS
August 15, 1941	Corporal Josef Jakobs	German spy executed by firing squad at the Tower of London
January 31, 1945	Private Edward Donald "Eddie" Slovik	General Dwight David "Ike" Eisenhower ordered his execution by firing squad for desertion during World War II by his own unit, the 28th Infantry Division, in a small town in northeast France
May 9, 1947	Edward Gertson and Philip Bellino	last to be electrocuted in Massachusetts

Soviet tanks crossed the River Oder, the last natural barrier to Berlin.

US Army troops were landed at Masugbu, southwest of the entrance to Manila Bay, Luzon, Philippine Islands by naval attack group (Rear Admiral W.M. Fechteler) with support by carrier-based aircraft (Rear Admiral W.D. Sample). A United States naval vessel was sunk by a Japanese suicide boat in the vicinity of the Philippine Islands: Submarine chaser PC-1119, at 14 degrees 5 minutes North, 120 degrees 30 minutes East. Meanwhile, a Japanese destroyer was sunk by US Army aircraft off Formosa: Destroyer Ume, at 22 degrees 30 minutes North, 120 degrees 0 minute East.

Friend Agnes Carol Zens Kellam wrote from Washington DC to her husband, Friend John R. Kellam, who was being held in a federal penitentiary for refusing to kill:

Dearest:

I've received two swell letters from thee, but have been so busy and consequently so tired, this is the first chance I've had to write thee. I didn't know what the rules were, anyway. Thee says thee is permitted to write two letters each week. I think thee can write three. At least, it says in item 13, "Instructions to be followed in corresponding with prisoners." "13.7. Inmates are permitted to send 3 letters per week, and to receive a total of 7. Letters in excess of 7 in any week will be returned to the writer." Let me know how many I should write to thee each week. And when thee needs more money....

Gee, Johnny, the Calverts have been so swell. I don't know how to thank them. Money would be an insult, although I thought of sending $5 to the Toledo Friends Group. Should I? The Calverts took me in, and fed me, helped me pack, and took me to the station. They're wonderful Friends. How does thee suggest I thank them?....

I received the box from the prison.... Thy shoes and coat are being repaired. The suit is being cleaned and pressed, and I think I shall give it to the Friends. It's not worth keeping for thee, especially when less fortunate people can make good use of it. I gave a good many of thy old clothes to the Friends group in Toledo. Mrs. Calvert said they could cut up the old pants and make little skirts and pants from them.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

I miss thee terribly, my dearest. All my love to thee. I feel fine except a little bit sickish now and then.

Carol Z. Kellam

NEVER READ AHEAD! TO APPRECIATE JANUARY 31ST, 1945 AT ALL ONE MUST APPRECIATE IT AS A TODAY (THE FOLLOWING DAY, TOMORROW, IS BUT A PORTION OF THE UNREALIZED FUTURE AND IFFY AT BEST).

February 3, Saturday: Fighting moved into Manila.

Soviet troops captured Landsberg (Wielkopolski), east of Berlin.

American and French forces took Colmar, France, south of Strasbourg.

The Allies announced that all Germans had been expelled from Belgium.

Peace talks began between the warring Greek factions.

An American bomb hit a Berlin courthouse, killing Roland Freisler, president of the Volksgerichtshof court that sentenced any German suspected of any resistance to the authority of the Nazi state to be immediately taken out and hanged. (You may well have seen one of the various attempts to do artistic justice to Judge Freisler's courtroom antics: in 1984 Rainer Steffen portrayed him in the television film "Wannseekonferenz," in 1989 Roland Schäfer portrayed him in the film "Reunion," in 1996 Brian Cox portrayed him in the television film "Witness Against Hitler," in 2001 Owen Teale portrayed him in the television film "Conspiracy," in 2005 André Hennicke portrayed him in the film "Sophie Scholl – The Final Days," and in 2008 Helmut Stauss portrayed him in the film "Valkyrie." It seems really difficult for an actor to make his actual recorded behaviors come across to a contemporary audience as other than merely ridiculous.)

The Lindenoper in Berlin was destroyed by bombs.

Marshall Chiang Kai-Shek demanded the immediate departure from Burma of all Chinese forces in order that they could be used against the Communist Army in China.

WORLD WAR II

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

March 19, Monday: Caroline Hazard died in Santa Barbara, California.

Aircraft from the fast carrier task force of Vice Admiral M. A. Mitscher bombed airfields on Kyushu, and shipping at Kure and Kobe, Honshu, Japan.

American troops captured Bauang, Luzon south of San Fernando on Lingayen Gulf.

British troops captured Mogok, 115 kilometers northeast of Mandalay.

Chaim Hirszman, one of only two survivors of Belzec death camp, gives testimony to a war crimes investigation in Lublin. On his way home he was murdered by Poles because he was a Jew.

ANTISEMITISM

General Friedrich Fromm, former Commander of the Reserve Army, was shot by firing squad for his dubious connection to the plot to kill Führer Adolf Hitler the previous July.

American forces captured Saarlouis, 20 kilometers northwest of Saarbrücken.

The house in Zwickau where Robert Schumann spent his childhood years from age seven to 17, was totally destroyed. It would not be rebuilt.

Captain Gehres's aircraft carrier USS Franklin (CVE-13) was engaged by Japanese planes off Samar Island off Kyushu, Japan, 32 degrees 1 minute North, 133 degrees 57 minutes East, and took a couple of direct hits by 550-pound bombs from a horizontal bomber. Of the 3,450 on board, 725 died and 265 were injured. There were fires and there were internal explosions and the ship was a real mess but they would manage to make their way back to Ulithi Atoll in the Caroline Islands and finally to the US. After the war 393 bravery decorations would be handed out, including a Congressional Medal of Honor for the heroism of Lieutenant-Commander Joseph O'Callahan, its chaplain.

Other United States naval vessels damaged off Shikoku, Japan:

- Carrier USS Essex (CV-9), accidentally by United States naval gunfire, 32 degrees 10 minutes North, 134 degrees 20 minutes East
- Carrier USS Wasp (CV-18), by dive bomber, 32 degrees 16 minutes North, 134 degrees 5 minutes East

A Japanese naval vessel was sunk by a US Army mine: River gunboat Suma, off Shanghai, 32 degrees 0 minute North, 120 degrees 0 minute East.

WORLD WAR II

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

August 11, Saturday: Speaking for the Allies, United States President Harry S Truman responded to the Japanese message of the previous day. They would allow the Emperor to remain on the throne only if he ensured the surrender of all Japanese military forces and then subjected himself to the supreme Allied military commander. The form of the government for Japan would be one that would be chosen by the people themselves. The President ordered a halt to atomic bomb production until further notice.

At a crematorium on Kyushu in Fukuoka, eight US airmen were beheaded.

United States Destroyer Mcdermut (DD-677) was damaged by naval gunfire in the vicinity of the Kurile Islands, at 49 degrees 30 minutes North, 155 degrees 1 minute East. Soviet naval forces bombarded southern Sakhalin Island.

Friend Agnes Carol Zens Kellam wrote from Washington DC to her husband, Friend John R. Kellam, who was being held in a federal penitentiary for having refused to participate in the killing:

My Dearest:

Still no signs of Junior's debut. I think he's waiting till the war's over and people stop officially murdering each other. I hope that news comes any minute now, although I shan't celebrate "victory" - It's been too horribly costly. I don't know what it will mean to the two of us personally and the others in our positions - that depends, I guess, on how vindictive our government is. Yesterday, the boy next door had his radio on listening to the "man in the street" program, from various large cities all over the U.S., on the Japanese surrender offer. I surely was surprised at the many bloodthirsty people who said we should continue fighting until the "Japs" surrendered unconditionally, or until all were killed, and the emperor bagged for a war criminal. I heard only one lady (I didn't listen to the whole program) who had a son fighting in the Pacific, say that we should accept the surrender terms, and as for the emperor, why, in the words of Jesus, "What is that to thee? Follow thou me."

... As I look out of my window and see the beauties of God all around I am made to wonder why is there so much sin in this beautiful land. The tall stately hollyhocks are lovely in all their different colors and the roses have been lovely with their pink, red and yellow clusters and this morning I can see the gladiolus begin to throw out their long spirals in all colors....

Well, darling, I guess thy eyes are getting tired, not to mention the poor censor's. [This letter amounted to six pages, typed single-space.] If this comes back, I'll send it to thee piece-meal, unless I'm in the hospital. But I haven't had any letter-writing instructions from Lewisburg.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

All my love to thee, Thy Cary

WORLD WAR II

CHANGE IS ETERNITY, STASIS A FIGMENT

August 19, Sunday: A Japanese delegation in Manila was informed of the terms of their surrender as dictated by General Douglas MacArthur.

Near Hankow in northeast China, a civilian group of Chinese managed to capture 26 Japanese soldiers. They beheaded the initial 4, then tied 4 to posts and shot them in the back of the head, then broke and crudely amputated the arms and legs of the next 4, and cut off the hands and feet of 4 and stuffed their genitals into their mouths.

Then with the remaining 10, they gouged their eyes and used them for bayonet practice. (Were these dudes trying to prove that Chinese can be as inventive as Japanese?)

HEADCHOPPING

1932

1934

1941

The war being over, the American newspapers revealed that there had been in January 1945, while John R. Kellam was in the Toledo jail awaiting his big day in court, a possibility that Japan might surrender before the A-bomb, a possibility upon which then-President Franklin Delano Roosevelt had simply refused to follow up. The following appeared in the Chicago Tribune and the Washington DC Times Herald, on page 1:

WORLD WAR II

BARE PEACE BID
U.S. REBUFFED
7 MONTHS AGO

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

BY WALTER TROHAN

Chicago Tribune Press Service

Washington, D.C. Aug. 19 - [1945]

Release of censorship restrictions in the United States makes it possible to announce that Japan's first peace bid was relayed to the White House seven months ago.

Two days before the late President Roosevelt left for the Yalta conference with Prime Minister Churchill and Dictator Stalin, he received a Japanese offer identical with the terms subsequently concluded by his successor, President Truman.

The Jap offer, based on five separate peace overtures was relayed to the White House by Gen. MacArthur in a 40-page communication. The American commander, who had just returned triumphantly to Bataan, urged negotiations on the basis of the Jap overtures.

All Acting for the Emperor

Two of the five Jap overtures were made thru American channels and three thru British channels. All came from responsible Japanese, acting for Emperor Hirohito.

President Roosevelt dismissed the general's communication, which was studied with solemn references to Deity, after a casual reading with the remark, "MacArthur is our greatest general and our poorest politician."

The MacArthur report was not taken to Yalta. It was preserved in the files of the high command, however, and subsequently became the basis of the Truman-Attlee Potsdam declaration calling for surrender of Japan.

News Kept Secret

This Jap peace bid was known to THE TRIBUNE soon after the MacArthur communication reached here. It was not published, however, because of THE TRIBUNE'S established policy of complete cooperation with the voluntary censorship code.

Now that peace has been concluded on the basis of the terms MacArthur reported, high administration officials prepared to meet expected congressional demands for explanation of the delay. It was considered certain that charges would be hurled from various quarters of congress that the delay cost thousands of American lives and casualties, particularly in such costly offensives as Iwo Jima and Okinawa.

It was explained in high official circles that the bid relayed by MacArthur did not constitute an official offer in the same sense as the final offer, which was presented thru Japanese diplomatic channels in Bern and Stockholm for relay to the four major allied powers.

War Lords Feared

No negotiations were begun on the basis of this bid, it was said, because it was feared that if any were undertaken the Jap war lords, who were presumed to be ignorant of the feelers, would visit swift punishment on those making the offer.

It was held possible that the war lords might assassinate the emperor. Officials said Mr. Roosevelt felt that the Japs were not ripe for peace, except for a small group, who were powerless to cope with the war lords, and that peace could not come until the Japs had suffered more.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

The offer, as relayed by MacArthur, contemplated surrender of everything but the person of the emperor. Japanese quarters making the offer suggested that the emperor become a puppet in the hands of American forces.

Full Surrender Offered

Jap proposals in the MacArthur communication contemplated:

1. Full surrender of Jap forces on sea, in the air, at home, on island possessions, and in occupied countries.
2. Surrender of all arms and munitions.
3. Occupation of the Jap homeland and island possessions by allied troops under American direction.
4. Jap relinquishment of Manchuria, Korea and Formosa, as well as all territory seized during the war.
5. Regulation of Jap industry to halt present and future production of implements of war.
6. Turning over of Japanese the United States might designate war criminals.
7. Release of all prisoners of war and internees in Japan proper and in areas under Japanese control.

In fact the idea that the Japanese would never surrender had been little more than an American wartime myth, and rather than being a piece of useful realism had constituted the primary obstacle to negotiation toward a Japanese surrender. How do we know this? Well, we can trust the attitude of the Sinologist George Edward Taylor of the University of Washington on this one, because he was a cold warrior on the inside and anything but a bleeding-heart liberal — he would become a Nixonian reactionary and support the Vietnam War on the campus of the University of Washington. Questioning the wisdom of using atomic weapons against Japanese civilians to end the war in the Pacific, it appears, had not been a position reserved for the softhearted: before the dropping of the atom bombs there had been embedded conservative members of the military-intelligence community, international men of intrigue, hawks, who had viewed this as an unnecessary atrocity. During WWII Taylor worked with Rand Corporation, with the Department of State, and with other articulations of the revolving door of American intelligence institutions private and public. As the Deputy Director for the Far East of the Office of War Information, he supervised a small army of anthropologists who were, basically, weaponizing anthropology against the Japanese. It was Taylor's team that crafted the leaflets dropped from airplanes on Japanese soldiers and civilians. His team of government anthropologists had access to 5,000 diaries seized from captured and killed Japanese soldiers and studied such documents carefully for clues as to Japanese behavior tendencies. At the beginning of the war Taylor had viewed his psychological warfare programs as a means of ending the war by helping the Japanese overcome all the cultural obstacles preventing their surrender, but as the war progressed and it became abundantly clear that the American side would triumph he began to see his job as being one that needed to be done at home: he needed to convince US civilian and military leaders that they did not in order to end the war need to engage in any acts of genocidal annihilation. He came to perceive the War Department and the White House as in the grip of racist stereotypes of maniacal Japanese soldiers and citizens fighting to the death, and he and his staff began to struggle against this domestic attitude as a prime obstacle to peace. In the typescript of a speech that he probably delivered in 1944, we find him arguing that "If we accept, as we must, the view that Japanese soldiers, in spite of their indoctrination, are as human as other troops, we shall be the less surprised at the mounting evidence of their very human reactions to defeat. We are taking more and more prisoners. Two years ago it would have been very unusual for 60 men to allow themselves to be picked up out of the water when their transport had been sunk. In New Guinea and Burma stragglers are coming in out of the jungles to surrender without a struggle. We have known for a long time that many Japanese officers have been evacuated from indefensible positions and that their reaction on places such as Attu, where escape was impossible, was not to fight to the last man." Such thinking would be ignored by the War Department and White House. President Franklin Delano Roosevelt insisted on including the demise of the Japanese Emperor as part of America's demand for unconditional surrender, and it was not until after this man had collapsed and died that the government was able to communicate a more relaxed position on this point to the Japanese. A May 11, 1945 communication intercept being studied inside the US government had supported the attitude of Taylor and others at the Office of War Information that the Japanese military were ripe for surrender: "Report of peace sentiment in Japanese armed forces: On 5 May the German Naval Attaché in Tokyo dispatched the following message to Admiral Doenitz: 'An influential member of the Admiralty Staff has given me to understand that, since the situation is clearly recognized to be hopeless, large sections of the Japanese armed forces would not regard with disfavor an American request for capitulation even if the terms were hard, provided they were halfway honorable.'" To this communication intercept, someone in US military intelligence had appended the following: "Previously noted diplomatic reports have commented on signs of war weariness in official Japanese Navy circles, but have not mentioned such an attitude in Army quarters." A July 20, 1945 communication intercept had revealed that Japanese Ambassador Sato was advocating a Japanese surrender providing that the United States would assure the Japanese that the "Imperial House" would remain in existence. Like many others, regardless of how hawkish they were, Taylor would come to consider that what President Harry S Truman's decision to use of nuclear weapons probably had to do with was "scaring the hell out of the Soviet Union," and that the idea of saving American lives during an invasion of the Japanese homeland islands was a mere cover story that of course the American public would readily buy into in order to avoid the thought that we had committed a war atrocity.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

"MAGISTERIAL HISTORY" IS FANTASIZING: HISTORY IS CHRONOLOGY

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

October 15, Monday: Pierre Laval, prime minister in the Vichy government, was executed by firing squad at the prison of Fresnes, Paris. Shortly before the execution, Laval attempted suicide by ingesting poison.

The Allies eliminate Hessen-Pfalz. Its constituent parts go to create Rheinland-Hessen-Nassau and Pfalz.

Peru and Poland ratify the Charter of the United Nations.

This woman (her name we do not know — she was not Mrs. Enola Gay Tibbets), who had been burned by the heat flash at Hiroshima at 8:16AM local time but had for 71 days been a survivor, died:

WORLD WAR II

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

April 9, Monday: American troops land on Jolo Island in the Sulu Archipelago, Philippines.

After four days of heavy fighting, Soviet forces captured Königsberg (Kaliningrad).

The Allies renewed their attacks on the Gothic Line across the River Senio in northern Italy. Taking part were soldiers from Great Britain, the United States, Poland, India, New Zealand, South Africa, and Brazil, as well as Jewish volunteers.

Soviet troops reach the center of Vienna.

American forces took Essen.

Pastor Dietrich Bonhoeffer and five others were hanged by the Nazis at Flossenburg.

The Mauthausen concentration camp was evacuated.

GERMANY

A US shipload of bombs exploded at Bari, Italy and not fewer than 360 died.

TIMELINE OF ACCIDENTS

Army troops supported by destroyer gunfire and air strikes land on Jolo in the Sulu Archipelago, Philippine Islands.

United States naval vessels damaged, Okinawa area:

- Escort carrier Chenango (CVE-28), by crash of friendly aircraft.
- Destroyer Sterett (DD-407), by Kamikaze suicide plane, 26 degrees 47 minutes North, 128 degrees 42 minutes East
- Destroyer Porterfield (DD-682), accidentally by United States naval gunfire, 26 degrees 34 minutes North, 128 degrees 28 minutes East
- High-speed transport Hopping (APD-51), by coastal defense gun, 26 degrees 15 minutes North, 127 degrees 55 minutes East
- LST557, by coastal defense gun, 26 degrees 14 minutes North, 127 degrees 57 minutes East

Japanese naval vessels sunk:

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

- Submarine RO-46, by destroyers Mertz (DD-691) and Monssen (DD-798), Okinawa area, 26 degrees 9 minutes North, 130 degrees 21 minutes East
- Minesweeper #3, by submarine Parche (SS-384), off Japan, 39 degrees 6 minutes North, 141 degrees 57 minutes East

WORLD WAR II

April 20, Friday: American forces completed the conquest of the Motobu Peninsula and most of the northern part of Okinawa.

11AM. On Führer Adolf Hitler 56th birthday, Soviet artillery began pounding Berlin.

Soviet troops took Prötzel, east of Berlin.

On approximately this day, as Soviet troops set the town of Neubrandenburg aflame, approximately 600 German civilians committed suicide.

American forces occupied Nürnberg, taking 17,000 prisoners.

Allied bombers did a final carpet bombing of Berlin.

French forces cleared Bordeaux of German resistance.

With British troops only a few kilometers away, 20 Russian POWs and 20 Jewish children were hanged by the Germans at Bullenhuser Damm, near Neuengamme, Netherlands.

ANTISEMITISM

French troops captured Royan, northwest of Bordeaux.

Sonatina for piano by Karel Husa was performed for the initial time, in Prague.

Two works by Vincent Persichetti were performed for the initial time, in Philadelphia: Pastoral op.21 for woodwind quintet, and Fables op.23 for speaker and orchestra by Vincent Persichetti was performed for the initial time, in Philadelphia.

Army troops supported by naval vessels and Army aircraft landed on Catanduanes Island, Philippine Islands.

Submarine Guitarro (SS-363) laid mines off northeast coast of Sumatra, Netherlands East Indies.

United States naval vessels damaged in operations against Japanese forces:

- Battleship Colorado (BB-45), by explosion, Okinawa area 26 degrees 10 minutes North, 127 degrees 20 minutes East
- Destroyer Ammen (DD-527), by horizontal bomber, Okinawa area, 27 degrees 13 minutes North, 128 degrees 16 E.
- Submarine chaser SC-737, by grounding, Sulu Sea, 9 degrees 45 minutes North, 118 degrees 44 minutes East

WORLD WAR II

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

October 25, Thursday: The Philharmonia Orchestra gave its 1st concert in Kingsway Hall, London, conducted by Sir Thomas Beecham.

Serenade for flute, harp and strings op.35 by Howard Hanson was performed for the initial time, in Boston.

Taiwan was returned to China after 50 years of Japanese rule.

General Douglas MacArthur ordered Japan to break all diplomatic relations with other countries, recall their diplomats and turn over all diplomatic property to Allied control.

The Inner Mongolian Peoples Republic was annexed to China.

Japanese troops at Thaton, Burma, 135 kilometers east of Rangoon, surrendered to the British.

Dr. Robert Ley, head of the German Labor Front, hanged himself in his Nürnberg cell.

The Soviet Union demanded $79,000,000 in reparations from Finland, rather than the $50,000,000 previously agreed to in the armistice between the two countries.

Greece ratified the United Nations Charter.

December 20, Thursday: 7 Germans were hanged in Smolensk before 50,000 people of the murder of 135,000 people.

Karl Renner becomes the first president of a reconstituted Austria. He names Leopold Figl to replace him as prime minister.

Nordwürttemberg-Nordbaden was renamed Württemberg-Baden.

Charles Ives was notified that he has been elected to the National Institute of Arts and Letters, even though most of the music he wrote during his most fertile period, 1896-1918, has never been performed.

Musicians Wrestle Everywhere for chorus and strings by Elliott Carter to words of Dickinson, was performed for the initial time, over the airwaves of WNBC radio.

United Nations Participation Act. At an early point, there was some speculation that it might be appropriate to situate this international organization in Concord, Massachusetts.

WORLD WAR II

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1946

January 3, Thursday: William Brooke "Lord Haw-Haw" Joyce was hanged for treason on the gallows in Wing "E" of Wandsworth Prison in London.

WORLD WAR II

The Polish government nationalizes all industries with over 50 workers and all businesses formerly owned by Germans.

Evelyn Waugh's BRIDESHEAD REVISITED.

At the US Marine Barracks in Washington DC, Concerto for clarinet and orchestra op.230 by Darius Milhaud was performed for the initial time. The work had been commissioned by Benny Goodman.

January 10, Thursday: Former Hungarian Prime Minister Laszlo de Bardossy was hanged in Budapest for treason.

The initial human contact with the moon took place when a US Army team at Evans Signal Laboratory in Belmar, New Jersey led by Lieutenant Colonel John H. Dewitt bounced a radar signal off of it.

ASTRONOMY

In the Central Hall of Westminster, London, the General Assembly of the United Nations met for the initial time, electing Paul-Henri Spaak of Belgium as its 1st president.

At William Schuman's request, Aaron Copland returned an invitation to teach at the Juilliard School.

January 17, Saturday: President Harry S Truman proposed that the dispute between U.S. Steel and the United Steel Workers union be settled by an 18.2¢-per-hour wage increase. A walkout was not prevented but it and most major strikes in 1946 would be settled somehow on the basis of residual patriotism and this 18.2¢.

Ba Maw, who headed the government of Burma during the Japanese occupation, surrendered to the Allies in Rangoon.

Lieutenant General Hermann Winkler and 6 other Germans were hanged for their war crimes before 65,000 people in Nikolaev, USSR.

WORLD WAR II

Nadia Boulanger disembarked in La Pallice after 5 years of exile in the United States. She had recently been appointed to the faculty of the Paris Conservatoire.

Off Haifa, 900 Jewish immigrants were captured by British vessels.

ANTISEMITISM

STATE MURDER

January 30, Wednesday: 14 Germans, including 3 generals, were hanged in Minsk for their part in the murder of millions of Soviet civilians and prisoners of war.

WORLD WAR II

Clarinet Concerto by Darius Milhaud was performed for the initial time, at the US Marine Barracks in Washington DC.

February 23, Saturday: Lieutenant General Tomoyuki Yamashita and two other Japanese were hanged as war criminals in Los Baños, south of Manila.

WORLD WAR II

Indonesian leader Sutan Sjahrir rejected proposal made by the Dutch on February 10th.

A mutiny in the Indian Navy ended when the British commander promised amnesty. Rioting continued in Bombay. In the fighting 266 people had been killed and 677 injured.

May 7, Tuesday: Masaru Ibuka and Akio Morita founded the Tokyo Telecommunications Engineering Corporation with 20 employees (in 1958 the name would be changed to Sony Corporation).

Anton Mussert, founder of the Dutch Nazis Party, was hanged in The Hague.

WORLD WAR II

Six of Les chants de Nectaire for flute op.199 by Charles Koechlin were performed for the initial time, at the Ecole Normale de Musique, Paris.

May 22, Wednesday: Shigeru Yoshida replaced Baron Kijuro Shidehara as prime minister of Japan.

In Prague, Karl Hermann Frank, former chief of police in Bohemia and Moravia who had ordered the liquidation of the town of Lidice, was hanged before a crowd of 5,000 people.

The British Trade Disputes And Trade Unions Act 1946 received royal assent (this repealed a 1927 act that had outlawed general and sympathetic strikes).

El duende azul, an operetta by Joaquín Rodrigo to words of Castell and Villaseca, was performed for the initial time, in Teatro Calderón, Madrid.

WORLD WAR II

May 29, Wednesday: Chinese Nationalist forces captured Kirin.

For their activities at the Dachau Concentration Camp, 14 more Nazis were hanged in Landsberg.

WORLD WAR II

One week after President Harry S Truman seized the coal mines, and two months after the strike began, US coal miners reach a settlement with the government. Workers would receive pay increases and retirement benefits. (On this day he was attending the graduation exercises of his daughter Margaret at George Washington University, and there being awarded the honorary degree of LL.D.)

Haj Amin al-Husseini, Grand Mufti of Jerusalem, leaves his villa near Versailles and, with a fake passport, flies from Paris to Damascus.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

June 3, Monday: In Suzhou in Jiangsu, China, Ch'en Kung-po, collaborationist president of the pro-Japanese Nanjing Nationalist Government during World War II, was put before a firing squad as a traitor.

STATE MURDER

The United States Supreme Court, in Morgan v. Virginia, outlawed segregation by race on interstate bus lines.

September 30, Monday: During the afternoon, Lieutenant General Takashi Sakai, who commanded the Japanese troops that had captured Hong Kong, was put in front of a firing squad in Nanking.

WORLD WAR II

October 15, Tuesday: President Harry S Truman ended price controls on meat.

In the course of that night the swordsman Hermann Göring, former Reichsmarshall and head of the Luftwaffe, offed himself with a capsule of cyanide a couple of hours before they were to come get him out of his cell for hanging.

GERMANY
WORLD WAR II

War-Guilt Trials⁶³⁹

The mumble-jumble drones on, the hangman waits; the shabby surviving Leaders of Germany are to learn that Vae Victis
Means Weh den Gesiegten. This kind of thing may console the distresses
Of Europeans, but for us! — Also we've caught
A poet, a small shrill man like a twilight bat,
Accused of being a traitor to his country. I have a bat in my tower
That knows more about treason, and about her country.

— Robinson Jeffers

EZRA POUND

October 16, Wednesday: Wilhelm Frick, Hans Frank, Walther Funk, Fritz Saukel, Alfred Rosenberg, Julius Streicher, Ernst Kaltenbrunner, Alfred Jodl, Wilhelm Keitel, Arthur Seyss-Inquart, and Joachim von Ribbentrop were hanged.

WORLD WAR II

Famous Last Words:

"What school is more profitably instructive than the death-bed of the righteous, impressing the understanding with a convincing evidence, that they have not followed cunningly devised fables, but solid substantial truth."

— A COLLECTION OF MEMORIALS CONCERNING DIVERS DECEASED MINISTERS, Philadelphia, 1787

639. This poem was entirely suppressed by the publisher, Random House — even after the war was in the history books.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

“The death bed scenes & observations even of the best & wisest afford but a sorry picture of our humanity. Some men endeavor to live a constrained life — to subject their whole lives to their will as he who said he might give a sign if he were conscious after his head was cut off — but he gave no sign Dwell as near as possible to the channel in which your life flows.”

—Thoreau’s JOURNAL, March 12, 1853

1932	George Eastman	Suicide note — he shot himself.	“My work is done. Why wait?”
1936	George V, King of England	It was suggested that he might recuperate at Bogner Regis	“Bugger Bogner.”
1945	Franklin Delano Roosevelt	having a massive cerebral hemorrhage	“I have a terrific headache.”
1945	Adolf Hitler	as hypothesized by Kurt Vonnegut	“I never asked to be born in the first place.”
1946	Alfred Rosenberg	hangman asked if he had last words	“No.”
1977	Gary Gilmore	being inventively executed	“Let’s do it.”
1997	Diana, Princess of Wales	per French police records	“My God. What’s happened?”
1998	Richard Feynman	unsolicited comment	“I’d hate to die twice, It’s so boring.”
1998	Karla Fay Tucker	Governor George W. Bush refused requests from Christian organizations based upon her alleged conversion	“I am going to be face to face with Jesus now.... I will see you all when you get there. I will wait for you.”
... other famous last words ...

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1947

April 2, Wednesday: In Singapore, a British military court sentenced 2 Japanese to death and 5 to life in prison for their parts in the deaths of 5,300 Chinese on that island in 1942.

The Supreme National Tribunal in Poland sentenced Obersturmbannführer Rudolf Franz Ferdinand Höss, commander of the Auschwitz concentration camp, to be hanged.

The British government referred the Palestine question to the United Nations.

The United Nations appointed the United States as trustee of the northern Pacific Islands formerly held by Japan.

April 26, Saturday: Tani Hisao, who had commanded many of the Japanese troops who had committed hundreds of thousands of killings and rapes in Nanking in 1937, was led through the streets of the city past thousands of survivors of the horrors and then, south of the city, was put before a firing squad.

WORLD WAR II
STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

May 9, Friday: The final men to be executed through electrocution in Massachusetts were Edward Gertson and Philip Bellino. Their electric chair is not on display (tastes about this sort of think have obviously changed somewhat since the gallows used to turn off house burglar Samuel Smith had been placed on display in the Concord courthouse in 1800), but a photo would be taken of it in a storage room at the state prison in Walpole in 1974:

FINAL EXECUTIONS
January 31, 1945	Private Edward Donald “Eddie” Slovik	General Dwight David “Ike” Eisenhower ordered his execution by firing squad for desertion during World War II by his own unit, the 28th Infantry Division, in a small town in northeast France
May 9, 1947	Edward Gertson and Philip Bellino	last to be electrocuted in Massachusetts
June 7, 1951	7 leaders of the Nazi SS such as Oswald Pohl, Otto Ohlendorf ...	hanged in Landsberg Prison, München as the final batch of German war criminals executed by the United States

Since 1820, in the British Isles nobody had been being drawn and quartered for treason. At this point such a punishment was removed from the legal code.

December 18, Thursday: Two Japanese lieutenants were found guilty of killing more than 150 people, each, during the Rape of Nanking in 1937. They would be executed.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1948

June 2, Wednesday: Israeli troops attacked an Egyptian column north of Ashdod but were repulsed with heavy losses.

In Landsberg Prison, München, 7 former SS and death camp staff were hanged.

WORLD WAR II

November 12, Friday: On the final day of the Japanese War Crimes trials former prime minister Hideki Tojo, General Iwane Matsui (who had overseen the “Rape of Nanking”), Lieutenant General Akira Muto (commander in the Philippines), General Kenji Doihara (commander in Malaya and Indonesia), Koki Hirota (former prime minister), General Heitaro Kimura (vice-minister of war) and General Seishiro Itagaki (responsible for having starved prisoners in Indonesia) were sentenced to death, 16 defendants receive life sentences, and 2 others received lesser sentences. The court pronounced that Japan bore a “national guilt” for its aggressions since 1928.

15 former guards at Mauthausen were hanged in Landsberg Prison, München.

WORLD WAR II

Umberto Menotti Maria Giordano died in Milan at the age of 81.

All 45,000 longshoremen on the east coast of the United States went on strike.

December 23, Thursday: At the Sugamo prison in Tokyo those convicted of war crimes, such as General Tojo Hideki, General Iwane Matsui, Lieutenant-General Akira Muto, General Kenji Doihara, Koki Hirota, General Heitaro Kimura, and General Seishiro Itagaki, were escorted one by one from their cells to an in-prison gallows.

WORLD WAR II

After three Egyptian counterattacks, the Israelis were driven from Hill 86 south of Gaza.

The House of Representatives’s Un-American Activities Committee termed 20 US unions “communist-controlled” and described 13 high union officials as communists.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1949

February 12, Saturday: Major-General Yoshitaka Kawane and Colonel Kurataro Hirano were hanged at Bugamo prison in Tokyo for having been associated with the Bataan death march, in addition to a Japanese lieutenant and five enlisted men who had been responsible for the torture of prisoners in French Indo-China.

WORLD WAR II

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1950

In the United States during this decade, public sentiment would begin to turn away from “capital punishment.” Many allied nations had either abolished or limited the death penalty, and here the number of executions would drop dramatically. Whereas there had been 1,289 executions during the 1940s and 715 in the 1950s, the number would plunge even lower, and add up to only 191 between 1960 and 1976. Support for capital punishment would reach an all-time low in 1966 with a Gallup poll showing support for the death penalty at but 42%.

COLDBLOODED MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1951

January 1, Monday: In France, beheader Jules-Henri Desfourneaux died. With the post of beheader at Bourreau vacant, there would be more than 400 applicants for the job of beheader at Bourreau — nice work if you can get it. André Obrecht would be chosen to be the new beheader of the French at Bourreau.

HEADCHOPPING

Communist Chinese Forces and North Korean Forces began a major offensive along the 38th Parallel.

KOREAN WAR

The announcement came from Buckingham Palace that William Walton was to be made Knight Bachelor. Later, Walton would write to his father-in-law: “I should never have accepted the knighthood, only I wanted to make Sue a lady.”

June 7, Thursday: A group of 7 leaders of the SS were hanged by the United States in Landsberg Prison, München. Among them were Oswald Pohl, who oversaw the goods taken from those killed in the death camps (including gold teeth), and Otto Ohlendorf, who oversaw death squads in the occupied Soviet Union which accounted for 90,000 deaths, mostly Jews. This would be the final batch of Nazi war criminals executed by the United States. 600,000 Germans had petitioned that they be spared.

WORLD WAR II

ANTISEMITISM

FINAL EXECUTIONS

May 9, 1947	Edward Gertson and Philip Bellino	last to be electrocuted in Massachusetts
June 7, 1951	7 leaders of the Nazi SS such as Oswald Pohl, Otto Ohlendorf ...	hanged in Landsberg Prison, München as the final batch of German war criminals executed by the United States
July 13, 1955	Ruth Ellis	hanged in a thick pair of calico knickers at Holloway prison in London

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

September 8, Saturday: Jürgen Stroop, who commanded the SS troops that had suppressed the Warsaw Ghetto uprising, was executed on the site of the ghetto.

WORLD WAR II

In San Francisco, Japan signed a peace treaty with 48 nations at war with it. The USSR, Czechoslovakia, and Poland refused to sign while India and Burma did not attend. In the treaty Japan regained sovereignty by formally renouncing war. It was reduced to the 4 home islands and agreed to negotiate reparations agreements with the various allied powers. Then, 5 hours after this Peace Treaty had been signed, representatives of Japan and the United States of America signed a defense treaty calling for the stationing of US forces on these islands.

READ THE FULL TEXT

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1953

February 15, Sunday: Faced with the issue of what to do about policies with clauses freeing the life insurance company from payout if the insured was killed in war, the Pennsylvania Supreme Court decided that the insurance needed to pay — because the present conflict in Korea was officially a peace action of the United Nations and not a declared war of the United States of America.

KOREAN WAR

It was pointed out in the US Senate that it would be cheaper to put federal maximum security prisoners up at the Waldorf Astoria in New York City, than it was costing us to house them at Alcatraz in San Francisco Bay.

President Dwight David “Ike” Eisenhower warned the American people that the current arms race with the USSR, including nuclear weapons, was going to be expensive and long-term.

Condemned prisoners Julius Rosenberg and Ethel Rosenberg, awaiting electrocution at Sing Sing in Ossining, New York, were allowed to spend two hours with their sons Michael, age nine, and Robert, age five.

Friend Susan Gower Smith, Clerk of the Durham, North Carolina monthly meeting of the Religious Society of Friends, wrote to Friend Kenneth L. Carroll mentioning the new meetinghouse on the grounds of the Moses Brown School in Providence, Rhode Island, and experiments on the impact of intercessory prayer on the sprouting of seeds by Professor Joseph Banks Rhine of the Parapsychology Laboratory at Duke University (it was being suggested that 3 years of experiments had been inconclusive and positive results unrepeatable simply because the lima beans, sweet peas, and corn kernels being prayed over had been planted too close to the seeds not being prayed over, so that some of the control seeds not being prayed over had sprouted due to their beneficial closeness to prayer activity for the sprouting of the test seeds):

Your letter about your wonderful meeting should have been answered immediately. It was greatly appreciated and read to the meeting. I'm sure we felt almost as happy over it as you did. Now I want to tell you about our meeting last Sunday. We've been dragging along with seldom more than 10 present, more often just six or eight. Last Sunday afternoon Prof. Bennington (Eng. Dept.) called to say that a very dear friend of theirs was visiting them. He is a Quaker and has expressed a desire to attend our meeting. He was a wonderful person John Alford (an artist I think) from the Providence R.I. meeting. He brought greetings and special sympathy. They have recently either bought or built a new Meeting House and they had heard via the grape vine that we were up to the same thing. All told we had 22 present at the meeting and about six spoke. It was one of the most meaningful meetings we've ever had. It gave us great hope after going through a period of great discouragement. One member who has come recently is most interesting viz — Laurel Glass who is doing some work on Prayer with Glenn Clark. He was in Durham last Tues and she invited me along with all who stayed to our Business Meeting to attend an informal gathering at her house that evening. People came from Chapel Hill, Raleigh and Greensboro. He sat in a comfortable chair and talked for at least an hour and a half without stopping. I thot he was quite interesting and a rare personality of unusual spiritual depth. Apparently she (Laurel Glass) is working in Dr. Rhine's Dept. and they are actually experimenting with intercessory prayer. I feel that she is going to be a great addition to our meeting.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Have you hears the bad news that Helen and Ed Kraybill have removed their membership completely to the Trinity Ave Pres. church. We miss them and it looked for a while as if we could not replace Helen as treas. Finally we asked Stanley Guise, a graduate student and an exceedingly fine person to take it and he accepted with graciousness and enthusiasm. He is young but a rock of Gibraltar!

Ever good wishes,

Susan Gower Smith

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1954

December 7, Tuesday: 6 members of the Muslim Brotherhood were hanged for plotting to overthrow the government of Egyptian Prime Minister Gamal Abdel Nasser.

December 28, Tuesday: 5 members of the Muslim Brotherhood were sentenced to hang for conspiring to kill Prime Minister Gamal Abdel Nasser of Egypt and take over the government.

A Wreath for Waits for chorus by Ulysses Kay to anonymous words was performed for the initial time, in Ann Arbor, Michigan.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1955

July 13, Wednesday: Ruth Ellis was hanged in a thick pair of calico knickers at Holloway prison in London. She would be the last woman executed in the United Kingdom.

FINAL EXECUTIONS
June 7, 1951	7 leaders of the Nazi SS such as Oswald Pohl, Otto Ohlendorf ...	hanged in Landsberg Prison, München as the final batch of German war criminals executed by the United States
July 13, 1955	Ruth Ellis	hanged in a thick pair of calico knickers at Holloway prison in London
January 8, 1960	David Cooper Nelson	initial and final person to die in New Mexico's gas chamber (because that state was in transition from the electric chair to lethal injection)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1956

June 19, Tuesday: President Gamal Abdel Nasser ended press censorship and martial law in Egypt (this had been the rule ever since the revolution of 1952).

President Josip Broz Tito of Yugoslavia spoke to an audience in Dynamo Stadium, Moscow, saying the split with the USSR was over and a mutual understanding had been reached.

Two Algerian terrorists were guillotined by French authorities in Algiers.

HEADCHOPPING

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

August 2, Thursday: The French National Assembly denounced Gamal Abdel Nasser as “a permanent menace to peace.” British and French nationals began to exit Egypt. The governments of Great Britain, France, and the United States of America called for a conference, to create an international body to control the Suez Canal.

Albert Woolson, the final surviving member of the Union Army, died in Duluth at the alleged age of 109. This was the former drummer boy who had claimed to have witnessed the 38 hangings by the US Government which occurred in Mankato, Minnesota in 1862 (there’s no substantiation for this!) and yet had drawn no moral whatever from this mass racial hanging — but who had eventually delivered the old-age piece of wisdom about our Civil War, that it had been peculiarly wrong because instead of this struggle pitting race against race as would be proper or folkish, this struggle had pitted “brother” against “brother”:

We were fighting our brothers. In that there was no glory.

This memorial to the Grand Army of the Republic, denominated “The Last Survivor,” is located near the end of the Gettysburg Battlefield auto tour. It depicts Albert Woolson, the last Union Army Veteran. Upon hearing of his death President Dwight David “Ike” Eisenhower said, “the death of Mr. Woolson brings sorrow to the hearts of Americans. The American people have lost the last personal link with the Union Army.” The body, however, would be interred not at the site of this bronze statue but in the Park Hill Cemetery of Duluth, Minnesota.

FAMOUS LASTS
1955	Ruth Ellis	hanged in England
August 2, 1956	Albert Henry Woolson	claimed to have been a veteran of the US Civil War , claimed age 109
March 16, 1959	John B. Salling	falsely claimed last Confederate veteran of the US Civil War, falsely claimed to be age 112

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

An oil portrait of Woolson, paid for with the pennies of schoolchildren, hangs in the city council chamber of Duluth.

Albert Woolson

Last Union Army Veteran Dies; Drummer at 17, He Lived to 109

Albert Woolson of Duluth Also Was Sole Survivor of Grand Army of Republic

DULUTH, Minn., Aug. 2 — Albert Woolson, the last member of the Civil War's Union Army, died today at the age of 109.

Mr. Woolson, who answered President Lincoln's call to arms and marched off to war as a drummer boy when he was 17, had been hospitalized for nine weeks with a recurring lung congestion condition. He lapsed into a coma early Saturday and did not regain consciousness. Since then, he had been fed intravenously and received oxygen through a nasal tube.

Members of his family were at his bedside when he died in St. Luke's Hospital.

Full-scale military funeral services will be conducted at the National Guard Armory here Monday at 2 P.M. Burial will be in the family lot at Park Hill Cemetery here.

Only three veterans of the Civil War, all members of the Confederate forces, survive. They are Walter W. Williams, 113, of Franklin, Tex.; John Salling, 110, of Slant, Va.; and William A. Lundy, 108, of Laurel Hill,

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Fla. Informed of Mr. Woolson's death, Mr. Lundy said "I regret very much the passing of Mr. Woolson."

Mr. Woolson's last comrade of the Union Army, James A. Hard of Rochester, N.Y., died in 1953 at the age of 111.

In Washington, President Eisenhower said today the death of Mr. Woolson "brings sorrow to the hearts" of Americans. The President said:

"The American people have lost the last personal link with the Union Army.

"His passing brings sorrow to the hearts of all of us who cherished the memory of the brave men on both sides of the War Between the States."

With Mr. Woolson's death, only the Confederate veterans will get a medal being prepared for the last survivors of the Civil War unless the law is changed or broadly interpreted. Last month Congress passed a law directing the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare gold medals with suitable inscriptions honoring the remaining veterans of the North and South.

Representative John A. Blatnik, Democrat of Minnesota, pushed for a quick award of the decoration to Mr. Woolson when the old soldier became critically ill. But Mr. Blatnik's office said today the Treasury would be unable to get the medal finished before Oct. 1. There is no definite provision in the law for a posthumous award.

Mr. Woolson married Sarah Jane Sloper in 1868. She died in 1901. Three years later he married Anna Haugen, who died in 1948. Survivors include six daughters, Mrs. John Kobus, Mrs. Arthur Johnson and Mrs. Robert Campbell, all of Duluth; Mrs. Adelaid Wellcome, Mrs. F.W. Rye and Mrs. J.C. Barrett, all of Seattle, and two sons, Dr. A.H. Woolson of Spokane, Wash., and R.C. Woolson of Dayton, Wash.

The Kobus family had lived with Mr. Woolson for several years. Mrs. Kobus said late today that instead of floral memorials the family preferred contributions to the Albert Woolson Scholarship Fund at the Duluth Branch of the University of Minnesota.

Outlasted 2,200,000

Mr. Woolson was the sole officially listed survivor of the more than 2,200,000 men of the Union armed forces. He also was the last survivor of the Grand Army of the Republic, an organization of Union veterans that exerted wide influence in American politics for many years after the Civil War.

Mr. Woolson's great age carried him into what was virtually another world of warfare as well as of politics. As a boy, he could have spoken with venerable men who had fought in the Revolutionary War. Veterans of the War of 1812 were numerous in his youth. When the war in which he served began in 1861, the commanding general of the Army was Winfield Scott, a hero of the War of 1812.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

The War with Mexico started in 1846, the year before Mr. Woolson was born. Last year, when he was 108, several dependents of veterans of that conflict still were receiving Government benefits.

This year, Mr. Woolson could include himself among the more than 19,000,000 living persons who had served in the United States armed forces. Of these, as of May 2, 2,715,896 were receiving cash compensation or pension payments from the Government. This included some but not all of the 826,657 former members of the armed forces receiving education benefits.

Mr. Woolson, who had been a bugler-drummer rather than a rifleman, might have been excused if, in his later years, he had only a passing interest in the progress made in the art of war between the period of his Civil War service and the middle of the twentieth century. In 1865 the most expert rifleman could kill no more than two or three persons in a minute. In 1945, when Mr. Woolson was in his nineties, an estimated total of 100,000 persons were killed by atomic bombs.

Civil War Still a Live Topic

In 1956, ninety-one years after Appomattox, popular interest in the war in which Mr. Woolson had fought showed few signs of diminishing. Biographical studies of Civil War figures from Lincoln down to generals such as "Fighting Joe" Hooker were in bookstores, and a dramatic reading of Stephen Vincent Benet's "John Brown's Body" had been presented successfully on Broadway within a year or two.

Mr. Woolson fought in no Civil War battles, although he drummed to their graves many who had. When he was 106 he remembered it all pretty well. He recalled himself as a drummer boy of 17 in a rakish blue forage cap in the precise line of drummers who beat out the resonant slow step on muffled drums or, again, thudded the quick step — most likely "The Girl I Left Behind Me."

"We went along with a burying detail," he said. "Going out we played proper sad music, but coming back we kinda hit it up. Once a woman came onto the road and asked what kind of music that was to bury somebody, I told her that we had taken care of the dead and that now we were cheering up the living."

Mr. Woolson was born in the New York farm hamlet of Antwerp, twenty-two miles northeast of Watertown, on Feb. 11, 1847, the same day Thomas Alva Edison, the inventor, was born. James K. Polk, the dark horse Democrat, was in the White House and the issues that were to bring about the Civil War were being drawn into focus.

Willard Woolson, his father, was a carpenter in Watertown and apprenticed his son to this trade. The senior Woolson had, however, a second vocation. He was a musician in the band of a traveling circus. When President Lincoln called for 75,000 volunteers in 1861, the father and his fellow musicians enlisted as a body.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Traced Father to Minnesota

When his family did not hear from him for more than a year they traced him through Army records to a hospital in Minnesota. The younger Woolson and his mother undertook the difficult journey by Great Lakes boat and stage coach to Windom, where they found the father suffering from a leg wound received at the battle of Shiloh. Shortly after the family was reunited his leg had to be amputated and he died.

Mr. Woolson and his mother remained in Windom and the boy went to work as a carpenter. But it was wartime. The sound of drum and bugle was in the air and it was agony for a spirited boy —mostly especially one in the drummer-bugler tradition— not to be in uniform.

Minnesota's manpower was stretched thin to furnish its quota for the Union forces and at the same time to hold back the Sioux Indians, who went off the reservation in 1863. Mr. Woolson recalled the day he left for the Army he had seen thirty-eight Sioux hanged in Mankato.

In the South, the war was dragging out its course. It had been a war of maneuver and field entrenchment, but by 1864 the Confederates were beginning to dig in to save manpower and the Union needed heavy artillery. Col. William Colville organized a Minnesota heavy artillery regiment of 1,800 men. Mr. Woolson got his mother's consent and was accepted into Company C, First Minnesota Volunteer Heavy Artillery. His military service dated from Oct. 10, 1864.

Enlisted as a rifleman, he wanted to be assigned as drummer and bugler, but Company C already had its quota of one field musician.

"I got the job by knocking his block off," Mr. Woolson recalled many years later.

Late in 1864, the regiment joined the Army of the Cumberland in Tennessee. It was commanded by Maj. Gen. George H. Thomas, known to history as "The Rock of Chickamauga," but more familiarly to his men as "Pap."

Recalled Firing Cannon

Minnesota's ponderous cannon and their north-country cannoneers waited hopefully at Fort Oglethorpe to be called into action, but the call never came. Mr. Woolson got to fire a cannon, though. It was the outstanding recollection of his Civil War service.

The bored gunners of the First Minnesota Heavy Artillery prepared to fire one of their pieces just to hear the noise. Mr. Woolson recalled it thus:

"The colonel handed me the end of a rope and said:

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

'When I yell you stand on your toes, open your mouth wide, give a yell yourself and pull the rope.' I yanked the lanyard and the cannon went off and scared me half to death."

The First Minnesota sat out the spring and early summer of 1865 in the shadow of Lookout Mountain, near Chattanooga, and in August the regiment was ordered home. Mr. Woolson received his discharge on Sept. 7, 1865. He again practiced carpentry.

Veterans of both the Union and Confederate armies were returning to their homes or perhaps seeking new homes in the West. He was but one of thousands returning to civilian life and, in the case of Union veterans, an organization was soon formed that was to make the former wearers of the blue the most potent force in their country's politics for the next twenty years.

This organization was the Grand Army of the Republic, of which Mr. Woolson became the last member in 1953. He had been named senior vice commander in chief in 1950. The first G.A.R. post was formed at Decatur, Ill., in April, 1866.

Mr. Woolson was still in his 'teens when the G.A.R. was founded, and it is probable that, in common with most of the younger veterans, he did not join it for many years. The G.A.R. had a tinge of the secret society popular in the day. There was an oath and a ritual, and the organization was ostensibly free from politics and dedicated to good works. In a few years, however, it became one of the principal instruments for keeping the Republican party in power and for obtaining pensions and Government job preferences for Union veterans.

The G.A.R., as Mr. Woolson first knew it, was dominated by such figures as Maj. Gen. John A. Logan, a swarthy Illinois politician nicknamed "Black Jack." A gallant and successful general and a thundering orator with a black mane, he never failed to remind his hearers that while "not all Democrats were rebels, all rebels had been Democrats."

Mr. Woolson was a member of the G.A.R. in 1890, when it reached its peak of membership of 408,489. Its political influence had declined in the Eighties, although it was a force to be reckoned with until the turn of the century.

Mr. Woolson did not receive a pension until 1900. Immediately after the Civil War, pensions were limited to men who had suffered physical disability, but in time they were extended to all with recognized Civil War service with the Union forces. Unsuccessful attempts were made from time to time to obtain Federal payments for Confederate veterans. In the South the states paid small pensions to their Civil War veterans.

At his death, Mr. Woolson was receiving a pension of $135 a month. He was then getting no other benefits, but was entitled to hospitalization and out-patient care.

In May, records showed that 5,784 widows and children of Union veterans were receiving pensions or payments under special acts of Congress.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Formed Drum Corps

Mr. Woolson and Robert Rhodes, an old friend who had been bandmaster of the Second Minnesota Volunteer Infantry, formed a drum and bugle corps in 1867. Mr. Woolson beat his old Civil War drum. "We played fine lively music," he said. "Nothing sad."

With the passing of years, the G.A.R.'s, as they came to be called, became older men and finally old men. Their fellow countrymen seemed to recall them only on Memorial Day, which their organization had helped to establish. The National Encampments of the G.A.R., lively and often more or less rowdy affairs in the early days, became quiet get-togethers.

Mr. Woolson and his comrades wore the blue uniform coat and slouch hat of the G.A.R. and marched in the Memorial Day parades as long as they could. Finally they became very old men sitting quietly in the sun. There were other veterans of later wars to tell of the deeds they had done.

Mr. Woolson was one of six Union veterans attending the last National Encampment of the G.A.R. in Indianapolis in August, 1949. Here these last survivors of the organization voted to disband it.

With Mr. Woolson's death the Grand Army of the Republic passed out of existence. Its records will be turned over to the Congressional Library in Washington, and its flags, badges and official seal to the Smithsonian Institution.

In the Nineties, Mr. Woolson moved to Duluth and it was there that he discovered he had a knack for storytelling to supplement his brisk bugle and drum. He would drop into a nearby school, tell a couple of fanciful tales, give a little lecture on thrift and pass out a few bright, new pennies.

In 1952 the children of Duluth's schools turned the tables on him. They collected 27,652 pennies and commissioned an oil portrait of Mr. Woolson that was hung in the City Council chamber.

The aged veteran liked to say that he was born a Republican. He voted for President Lincoln when he was 17 under a special dispensation that gave the ballot to soldiers. He admitted he voted for the Democratic ticket once. That was for Franklin D. Roosevelt in his first bid for the Presidency. Mr. Woolson did not retire until 1930.

In his later years, Mr. Woolson liked to recite poetry and his favorite poem was "After the Battle, Mother." And it is unlikely that his school children friends for several generations let him forget that great sentimental poem of the post-Civil War period, "The Blue and the Gray," by Frances Niles Finch. It ends:

 "Under the sod and dew, waiting the judgment day,
 Love and tears for the Blue,

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Tears and love for the Gray."

December 15, Saturday: Budapest Radio announced that the rebel Janos Soltesz had been hanged.

Zeitmasze no.5 for woodwind quintet by Karlheinz Stockhausen was performed for the initial time, in Paris, conducted by Pierre Boulez.

Over this night, December 15th/16th, Egyptian troops would attack the withdrawing British and French forces at Port Said (27 Egyptians would be reported killed).

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1957

Albert Camus participated with Arthur Koestler in a symposium RÉFLEXIONS SUR LA PEINE CAPITALE and wrote REFLECTIONS ON THE GUILLOTINE (RÉFLEXIONS SUR LA GUILLOTINE).

A punishment that penalizes without forestalling is indeed called revenge. It is a quasi-arithmetical reply made by society to whoever breaks its primordial law. That reply is as old as man; it is called the law of retaliation. Whoever has done me harm must suffer harm; whoever has put out my eye must lose an eye; and whoever has killed must die. This is an emotion, and a particularly violent one, not a principle. Retaliation is related to nature and instinct, not to law. Law, by definition, cannot obey the same rules as nature. If murder is in the nature of man, the law is not intended to imitate or reproduce that nature. It is intended to correct it. Now, retaliation does no more than ratify and confer the status of a law on a pure impulse of nature. We have all known that impulse, often to our shame, and we know its power, for It comes down to us from the primitive forests.

COLDBLOODED MURDER

HEADCHOPPING

July 25, Thursday: A policeman had been murdered, and a man who we suppose was probably innocent of this crime, Jacques Fesch, on this day got his head chopped.⁶⁴⁰

HEADCHOPPING

640. It's something known in the legal profession as "irreversible error."

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1960

January 8, Friday: David Cooper Nelson had the honor of being the initial and final person to die in New Mexico's gas chamber (because that state was in transition from the electric chair to lethal injection).

FINAL EXECUTIONS
July 13, 1955	Ruth Ellis	hanged in a thick pair of calico knickers at Holloway prison in London
January 8, 1960	David Cooper Nelson	initial and final person to die in New Mexico's gas chamber (because that state was in transition from the electric chair to lethal injection)
September 10, 1977	Hamida Djandoubi	nonpublic execution by guillotine at Baumettes Prison in Marseilles

October 11, Tuesday: Peace negotiations chaired by Prince Souvanna Phouma began in Vientianne between the right-wing leader Phoumi Nosavan and the communist Pathet Lao.

The UN command in Léopoldville refused Congolese demands for the arrest of Patrice Lumumba.

5 anti-Castro rebel leaders were executed by firing squad in Santa Clara, Cuba.

The British government's Monckton Commission recommended that power in the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland be devolved to more local levels and that each part of the federation be given the right to secede. They also recommended increased African representation in the Assembly.

October 14, Friday: The Cuban government nationalized about 400 private companies, including foreign banks.

Walter Piston's Violin Concerto no.2 was performed for the initial time, in Pittsburgh.

October 16, Sunday: 2 US citizens were executed by firing squad for their part in an invasion by anti-Castro forces of Oriente Province in Cuba.

Two new works were performed for the 1st time, in Donaueschingen: Anaklasis for strings and percussion by Krzysztof Penderecki and Chronochromie for orchestra by Olivier Messiaen. The audience required that Anaklasis provide an encore.

Concerto for violin, cello, ten winds, and percussion by Leon Kirchner was performed for the initial time, in Baltimore.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

October 13, Thursday: Cambridge Friends Monthly Meeting minutes: “A request was received from the Acton Meeting that they be recognized as a Preparative Meeting under our care.”

General Secretary Nikita Khrushchev of the Soviet Union departed New York for home.

In Cuba, 382 locally owned firms, including the sugar mills, banks, and large industries, were nationalized.

Seven Cubans and a US citizen were executed by firing squad in Santiago de Cuba after being convicted of invading Oriente Province. 18 others received jail terms.

Il pigmalione, a scena drammatica was performed for the initial time, in the Teatro Donizetti, Bergamo (this had been Gaetano Donizetti’s 1st stage work, written during his student days in 1816).

December 31, Saturday: The Massachusetts legislature had enacted S.708 reorganizing the Steamship Authority and dropping New Bedford from the line. On this day the last sailing of an Authority ferry from New Bedford took place, with the departure of the Nobska. The special relationship between the islands and “The City,” as it had been affectionately known, was no more.

4 of the 11 who had been sentenced to death in Amman on December 29th for the killing of Prime Minister Hazza al-Majali on August 29th were publicly hanged in Amman.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1961

March 11, Saturday: On his 85th birthday, today was declared Carl Ruggles Day in Vermont.

An American, William Alexander Morgan, who had fought in the mountains alongside the Cuban revolutionaries and become one of their comandantes, had fallen under suspicion of counter-revolutionary attitudes and in consequence needed to face a firing squad at La Cabana prison.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1962

May 31, Thursday: Adolf Eichmann and his high Kantian principles were hanged on account of his conduct during World War II, using a short rope.

ANTISEMITISM
GERMANY

This litterateur had left behind 1,300 pages of elucidation as to why he felt no guilt for his wartime conduct: "I reject as arrogant duress your attempted pressure on me to admit guilt on my part ... where none exists."

Two people were killed in Algiers by terrorists.

Great Britain dissolved the Federation of the West Indies with the constituent entities resuming their former colonial status: Antigua, Barbados, Cayman Islands, Dominica, Grenada, Jamaica, Montserrat, St. Christopher-Nevis-Anguilla, St. Lucia, St. Vincent, Trinidad and Tobago, and the Turks and Caicos Islands.

Invocation à l'ange Raphaël op.395 for women's chorus and orchestra by Darius Milhaud to words of Claudel was performed for the initial time, in Paris.

A concert of "symphonic jazz" took places in Constitution Hall, Washington when Duke Ellington and his Orchestra joined the National Symphony Orchestra conducted by Howard Mitchell and Gunther Schuller.

July 6, Friday: The "Operation Plowshare" agenda had become to use a series of 5S thermonuclear explosions to dig an artificial harbor at Cape Thompson, Alaska. On this date there was a "Sedan" proof-of-concept earthmoving blast at the north end of Yucca Flats in Nevada, that managed to loft more than 12,000,000 tons of earth into the skies (after the expenditure of more than $770,000,000, it would be concluded that radiation issues would prevent this sort of earthmoving from ever becoming practical).

Talduwe Somarama Thero was hanged for the murder of Prime Minister SWRD Bandaranaike of Ceylon in 1959.

A 3d conservative terrorist was put before a firing squad near Paris for complicity in the May 31st, 1961 murder of Roger Gavoury, police commissioner for Algiers.

William Faulkner died in Oxford, Mississippi at the age of 64.

A conference of 17 nations on disarmament resumed in Geneva after a month-long recess.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

September 5, Wednesday: Sputnik 4 launched on May 15th, 1960, a Soviet mockup of a manned spaceship, fell out of orbit after 843 days. Along the orbital path in which the craft disintegrated, what was believed to have been a fragment weighing approximately 20 pounds hit the ground at the intersection of North 8th Street and Park Street in Manitowoc, Wisconsin.

“Cedar Hill,” that had been the home of Frederick Douglass at 1411 W Street S.E. in Washington DC, and “Glenmont,” that had been the home and laboratory of Thomas Edison in West Orange, New Jersey, were put under the jurisdiction of the US National Park Service.

The composition of new American pennies became 95% copper and 5% zinc (this would be the case until 1982, when they would begin to be 97.5% zinc and 2.5% copper).

An Indonesian Islamic mystic and rebel leader, Sekarmadji Maridjan Kartosuwirjo, was executed by firing squad at the age of 57.

A couple of East German workers successfully rammed a truck through a barrier, climbed a fence, and swam a canal to West Berlin — all under a hail of bullets.

October 3, Wednesday: About 20 telephone workers were killed by a boiler explosion beneath the cafeteria at 5030 Broadway in New York City.

8:15AM Walter Schirra blasted off from Cape Canaveral, Florida inside a Mercury capsule that would orbit the Earth almost 6 times and return him to the surly bonds of Earth 9 hours and 13 minutes later, 530 clicks northeast of Midway Island.

About 50 white University of Mississippi students, protesting near the residence of James Meredith, burned him in effigy. Wow, a pretend lynching, what fun! —Then federal troops persuaded them to call it a day.

Orchesterstück 2 by Gottfried Michael Koenig was performed for the initial time, in Palermo.

December 11, Tuesday: The 3-week-old West German cabinet crisis ended when the CDU and FDP factions agreed on a lineup for a new government.

Chorale Prelude: So Pure the Star op.91 for band by Vincent Persichetti was performed for the initial time, in Durham, North Carolina, with the composer conducting.

At the Don Jail in Toronto two convicted murderers, Ronald Turpin, 29, and Arthur Lucas, 54, were hanged. Lucas had murdered two people in 1961 and Turpin had during February 1962 murdered a Toronto constable. The noose almost yanked off Turpin’s head, it remaining attached to the body by but a few tendons.

For the 15th time in the history of our nuclear program, this time at the Los Alamos Scientific Laboratory, some fissile material unexpectedly went beyond criticality into prompt-criticality, the final stage before an

STATE MURDER

atomic explosion.

TIMELINE OF ACCIDENTS

Not to worry, however, for in the more than half century of our nuclear era there have been only a couple of dozen such incidents that we know of. We are told that a full A-bomb nuclear-weapon-like blast is a real engineering success story and very difficult to create, and therefore it is really really unlikely that any such prompt-criticality incident will ever produce a full A-bomb nuclear weapon-like blast without our really having intended for that to happen (even at Chernobyl the molten “corium” stuff in the “Elephant’s Foot” formation in the basement failed to go off like a bomb). Just about the worst thing that might happen in a prompt-criticality situation is that the nuclear material in question goes off like what one might term a big “dirty” bomb –which is not at all in the same ballpark in terms of blast-effect although it is in the same ballpark in terms of contamination-effect– except that we must bear in mind that at the Fukushima Daiichi site, unfortunately, there are some 2,000 tons of such materials available within a few thousands of yards, in the six reactor cores and seven cooling pools.

WALDEN: If we read of one man robbed, or murdered, or killed by accident, or one house burned, or one vessel wrecked, or one steamboat blown up, or one cow run over on the Western Railroad, or one mad dog killed, or one lot of grasshoppers in the winter, –we never need read of another. One is enough.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1963

By this point capital punishment was still mandatory in the USA only in a few jurisdictions, and only for a small number of rarely committed crimes.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1965

July 14, Wednesday: Radio Lhasa reported that 5,000 Chinese troops had been dispatched to Tibet to quell widespread revolts.

The British House of Commons voted 200-98 to abolish the death penalty.

The United States space probe Mariner 4 passed behind Mars after coming as close as 10,000 kilometers to the red planet. Mars became the initial planet, other than Earth of course, to be photographed close up.

ASTRONOMY

Adlai Stevenson experienced a heart attack while walking on a London street and died at St. George's Hospital.

July 20, Tuesday: After 16 years of residence in the United States, former President of the Republic of China Li Tsungjen arrived in Peking, having defected to the People's Republic of China.

The British House of Lords voted 204-104 to abolish the death penalty.

Returning from his 6th visit to South Vietnam, Secretary of Defense Robert Strange McNamara reported that in spite of massive intervention by US troops, the Viet Cong were stronger than ever and their operations had become wider and more successful — therefore the United States of America would take whatever steps were necessary to dig its hole deeper and deeper until eventual victory (as they say, we will overcome some day).

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1970

At Madame Tussaud's in London, a plastic toy "Aurora" guillotine was made available for sale to interested children:

HEADCHOPPING

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

In this year Pogo, a possum's possum, declared "We have met the enemy, and he is us."

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1971

The brick multistory structures of The Riverside Press on Blackstone Street in Cambridge, Massachusetts had become inadequate for the volume of production. The Press increasingly had to find storage facilities off premises. The firm merged with Rand McNally and moved its operation to Taunton, Massachusetts. The 500 employees (80% were unionized) were offered new jobs in that non-union shop. With the closing of this, and other local manufacturing plants (Lever Brothers, Boston Woven Hose, Blake and Knowles Steam Pump, Simplex Wire and J.W. Squire, etc.) the dominate proportion of the workforce in Cambridge and in the Riverside community changed from blue-collar to white-collar.

When Robert Sullivan's THE DISAPPEARANCE OF DR. PARKMAN about the Professor John White Webster/Doctor George Parkman case was published in Boston in this year, it was published by Little, Brown & Company.

When Helen Thomson's MURDER AT HARVARD about that famous case was published in Boston in this year, it was published by Houghton Mifflin.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1972

November 28, Tuesday: Martial law was lessened in South Korea, enough to allow schools and universities to reopen.

The Irish Republican Army began a new offensive with rocket attacks in Belfast, Londonderry, and at the border with the Irish Republic.

In the Santé prison in France at 4:45AM, Roger Bontemps and Claude Buffet, who had during a mutiny at the Clairvaux prison slain guard Guy Girardot and nurse Nicole Comte, were walked toward the guillotine.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1973

June 26, Tuesday: The Rhode Island General Assembly enacted Public Law Chapter 280 (RI General Laws 11-23-2), making capital punishment by lethal gas mandatory for murders committed by persons while under confinement in the state correctional institutions. (Such an execution would however be determined, in 1979, to be in violation of the US Constitution.)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1976

Marcel Chevalier, the last beheader of Frenchmen, succeeded André Obrecht. He would serve until the 1981 abolition of the death penalty.

HEADCHOPPING

In the Year of Our Lord 1676, three hundred years earlier, there had been a plot among certain white men of Lynn MA, about 30 or 40 in number, to attack the starving unarmed internees of the Deer Island racial concentration camp a few yards off their shore. The idea seemed to be that they were fighting the red men, and, well, here were some red people ready to hand, defenseless, –so let’s kill ’em. The proposition, current in Europe at that time, that belligerents ought to make a “separation between the guilty and the innocent,” was an innovation which needed in New England to be supported by argument and reasoning. Fortunately, one Thomas Sheppard of Charlestown, Massachusetts had gotten wind of this proposed slaughter expedition and had informed the Legislative Council in Boston in time to forestall it. So the following is what a popular current paperback tour book of Boston Harbor⁶⁴¹ had to say on this tricentennial about that island racial concentration camp. The tour book included no references or authentication, but it did most bluntly make the

641. Kales, Emily and David. ALL ABOUT THE BOSTON HARBOR ISLANDS. THEIR GEOGRAPHY, ECOLOGY, HISTORY AND FUTURE, THEIR LORE AND ROMANCE. WITH UPDATED INFORMATION ON HOW TO GET TO THEM, WHAT TO WEAR, WHERE TO PICNIC ... WHERE TO MOOR, RENT, OR CHARTER A BOAT; WHERE, WHEN, HOW AND WHAT FISH TO CATCH; HARBOR CRUISES, SWIMMING. 4th and Revised Edition, 1983 [1st edition 1976]. Maps and sketches by Deborah Warren. Hingham MA: Hewitts Cove Publishing Company, Ltd., Hingham Shipyard, 349 Lincoln Street. Page 28.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

following assertions, which in subsequent editions have not been muted:

NATICK

The island's resources were not adequate to feed them, and no assistance was rendered from the mainland. At least two hundred perished from starvation and disease during the first two months of internment. Prisoners of war were also brought to Deer Island and later sold into slavery. The memory of these Native Americans is honored each year through a re-enactment of the trip from the old Natick village site to Deer Island. The group, which includes descendants of Deer Island internees, gathers on the South Natick common on October 30 and traces the route taken more than three hundred years ago. Members of the Native American community have expressed concern that their ancestral gravesites on Deer Island have been disrupted by the construction of the Massachusetts Water Resources Authority wastewater treatment plant. With the construction of a quarantine hospital in 1847, Deer Island again provided a holding area for the displaced. Almost 5,000 Irish immigrants were admitted to Deer Island between 1847 and 1849. Many were taken ill during their long voyage from Ireland. 750 died and were buried on the island.

We can well understand what is meant by the remark from the tour book quoted above, "Prisoners of war were also brought to Deer Island and later sold into slavery," since in fact in the Year of Our Lord 1676 all captured warriors were being immediately executed upon the Common.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT
COLDBLOODED MURDER

What was meant by this 1976 guidebook to the harbor islands, obviously, by this guilty expression "prisoners of war," is that any persons with any degree of native American ancestry who had been so entirely inoffensive that they could not be executed upon the Boston Common, such as the women and the children and the aged men and the infirm, had been being driven down to this exposed and barren island and incarcerated temporarily with the "Eliot's Indians" already being held captive there, until whatever survivors there might be could be sold into the foreign slavery of field labor in the plantations of the Azore Islands of the far Atlantic. But there is an additional implication to this material from today's guidebook to the harbor, an implication for which I know of no available supporting evidence. That additional implication would be that (Hypothesis A) the distinction between the survivors of the Deer Island concentration camp who were later sold into foreign enslavement, and those survivors of the concentration camp who would not be sold into foreign enslavement, had been a distinction between, on the one hand, the inhabitants of the Christian villages, the "Eliot's Indians" with their prayer books who had early in the race war been herded down onto the exposed island tied together at the neck with rope, and, on the other hand, the various anonymous persons of color who were being swept up by the white armies later on in the race war. Although the latter would be sold into slavery, reading between the lines in today's guidebook to the harbor would imply, the former would not. And here's the rub: I know of no evidence that that was the way things went down on the ground at the time, that that was the Selektion that was in fact made. Even if someone "in charge," sitting in a comfortable room in Boston, had intended such a benevolent Selektion, had ordered such a benevolent Selektion — it is unlikely to have been something which mere good intentions could obtain. I would offer as a contrary hypothesis, that (Hypothesis B) the actual white

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

“underlords” actually out there on that island making that Selektion after the race war would not have been particularly scrupulous or careful later as to how they make the Selektion between those whom they could then enslave and those whom they needed to put on their own recognizance — that in fact what they probably did with their helpless hostages after their won race war was claim for service in their white households whatever red children seemed comely and alert and undiseased (unprotected children make marvelous household sex objects), then sell anyone among the residue for whom they could get a halfway decent price, and then set loose on their own recognizance only those redskins who for reason of age or illness could not be turned to the satisfaction of any white victor’s greed. How might the actual process have been otherwise? –Do people engage in a successful genocide and then come out on the other side of this successful genocide being decent and caring people?

“The Whites, by law of conquest, by justice of civilization, are masters of the American continent, and the best safety of the frontier settlers will be secured by the total annihilation of the few remaining Indians.”

– Lyman Frank Baum, author of the Oz books

HDTWHAT?INDEX

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Now the question becomes: who is going to provide some evidence, amounting to something more than simple self-serving opinion, as to whether Hypothesis A, the guidebook's implicit hypothesis, or Hypothesis B, my own somewhat more likely story, is a more accurate description of what actually went down, there in secrecy and silence in Boston Harbor so long ago?

Is it not curious, that the most sustained treatment of this human disaster which we have presently available to us is this two-paragraph “retreating admission” mention which any police interrogator would disbelieve, and that this two-paragraph “retreating admission” which we are supposed to accept is to be found buried in a popular guidebook of no substantial authority? Is it not curious, that even this two-paragraph “most sustained treatment presently available” amounts to an implicit claim that what happened hadn’t been all that bad, because 1.) although “hundreds of friendly Christian Indians” had died of starvation and exposure, this seems to have happened through mere neglect rather than through white maliciousness, and then because 2.) the only people who were subsequently enslaved had been “prisoners of war,” which is to say, implicitly, by supposition, captured male warriors? Is it not curious, that in such a tourist treatment we find anonymous writing about the disturbing of sacred graves of victims by “wastewater treatment,” when the fluid actually indicated by this innocent term “wastewater” would be made up not only of Boston’s gray dishwater but also of its shit and piss and cigarette butts and condoms and dead babies? Is it not curious that a mass grave would be being referred to as “their ancestral gravesites” (plural rather than singular) as if to suggest falsely that these hundreds of people who died at once of starvation and exposure would have received decent individual and singular, respectful, separate burials? Is it not curious that the guidebook prepared for our general public refers to “their ancestral gravesites” (the collective third person possessive “their” in distinction from the collective first person possessive “our”) as if to suggest falsely that any and all readers of this guidebook would of course be the descendants of the white intrusives, and as if to suggest falsely that descendants of the surviving red indigenes have no use for this book, perhaps do not yet know how to read or at least are not likely to go on holiday tours of the islands in the Boston harbor, have nothing to do but march on the indicated annual protest days and “express concern”?

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

March 11, Thursday: In written testimony by unconditionally pardoned former President Richard Milhous Nixon to a committee of the United States Senate, he acknowledged that while President he had ordered efforts to undermine the presidency of Salvador Allende of Chile.

Brigadier General Abdel Aziz al-Ahdab proclaimed himself the military governor of Lebanon and sided with the Muslim dissidents. Broadcasting to the nation, he demanded that the president and prime minister resign.

29 army officers and a civilian were publicly executed by firing squad in Lagos, Nigeria. They had been found guilty of being involved in the attempted coup and the murder of the head of state during the previous month.

Mikka “S” for violin by Iannis Xenakis was performed for the initial time, in Orléans.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1977

January 17, Monday: The decade-long moratorium on criminal executions that had begun with the Jackson and Witherspoon decisions of the United States Supreme Court ended with the execution by firing squad in Utah of Gary Gilmore, who had not challenged his death sentence. That same year, Oklahoma would make itself the first state to adopt lethal injection as a means of execution (though it would be five more years before Charles Brooks would become the first prisoner executed in such a manner, in Texas on December 7, 1982).

STATE MURDER

September 10, Saturday: Hamida Djandoubi had the honor of going down in our history books as the last victim of the guillotine, in a nonpublic execution at Baumettes Prison in Marseilles. Way to go, Hamida!

HEADCHOPPING

FINAL EXECUTIONS
July 13, 1955	Ruth Ellis	hanged in a thick pair of calico knickers at Holloway prison in London
January 8, 1960	David Cooper Nelson	initial and final person to die in New Mexico's gas chamber (because that state was in transition from the electric chair to lethal injection)
September 10, 1977	Hamida Djandoubi	nonpublic execution by guillotine at Baumettes Prison in Marseilles

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1979

Michael W. Fedo's "THEY WAS JUST NIGGERS" (Ontario CA: Brasch and Brasch).

This would be reprinted as MOB VIOLENCE, and then reissued in 2000 as THE LYNCHINGS IN DULUTH.

MINNESOTA

In 1973 the Rhode Island General Assembly had made capital punishment by lethal gas mandatory for murders committed by persons while under confinement in the state correctional institutions. In this year, however, the Rhode Island Supreme Court determined that such a mandatory death sentence provision violated the cruel and unusual punishment prohibitions of the 8th amendment to the US Constitution (State v. Anthony, 398 A.2d 1157 and State v. Cline, 397 A.2d 1309).

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1981

September 2, Wednesday: Philippe Maurice, who had been sentenced to be separated neatly into two pieces of meat at the guillotine, was granted the privilege of living the remainder of his life as one piece of meat, in prison, by President François Mitterrand — in France, which had decided that it owed it to itself to become a civilized nation, the death penalty was being abolished.

HEADCHOPPING

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1982

January: Sister Helen Prejean became a pen pal to a prisoner on death row; she later would compose a powerful memoir of her experience, DEAD MAN WALKING, which would be made into an award-winning movie.

CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE

December 7, Tuesday: Huntsville, Texas led us on our journey toward human decency: Charles Brooks became the first prisoner in the United States of America to be executed in the compassionate manner known as lethal injection (before they stuck in the needles, to make sure he didn't get an infection, he watched as his elbow pit was scrubbed with a disinfectant pad).

The Danish parliament froze payments toward the deployment of US nuclear missiles in Europe.

The US House of Representatives cut funding for deployment of the MX missile.

Aaron Copland made his final appearance as a conductor, with the New Haven Symphony Orchestra. He directed two of his early works: An Outdoor Overture, and Symphony for Organ and Orchestra.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1984

May 9, Wednesday: The Rhode Island General Assembly removed the mandatory capital punishment language from its General Law section 11-23-2. No crime in Rhode Island would make possible a coldblooded execution.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1987

July 25, Saturday: A Cardinal of the Roman Catholic Church alleged that Jacques Fesch, who had had his body divided neatly into two pieces thirty years before on this day, had probably been innocent of the murder of a policeman, the crime for which he had been condemned. He did not plead for President François Mitterand to put the pieces of this man back together — but he did plead for the President of France to give this man back his honor.

HEADCHOPPING

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1991

The city officials of Duluth, Minnesota had never publicly acknowledged the graves of the three young men they had allowed to be lynched by a white-citizens' mob in 1920.  In this year, however, some markers were placed above these previously anonymous gravesites at the Park Hill Cemetery. The engraving placed on the stones was:

DETERRED BUT NOT DEFEATED

Louis Farrakhan declared that the Gulf War was going to turn out to be the “War of Armageddon which is the final war” (Abanes, Richard. END-TIME VISIONS. NY: Four Walls Eight Windows, 1998, page 307).⁶⁴² Just prior to Operation Desert Storm, a US Marine attorney provided the following decency-for-idiots description of the law of war: “All the laws of war boil down to these 3 fundamentals. 1. If it needs to be killed, kill it. 2. If it doesn’t need to be killed, don’t kill it. 3. If you see somebody killing something that doesn’t need to be killed, try to stop them. Any questions?”

Exemplifying a more “Rashomon-like” what-is-truth frame of mind, Alfred A. Knopf of New York, a subsidiary of Random House, published Simon Schama’s DEAD CERTAINTIES (UNWARRANTED SPECULATIONS) in regard to the famous Professor John White Webster/Doctor George Parkman case.

642. Armageddon = the place (possibly to be identified with Har Megiddo, the Mount of Megiddo, near Tel Aviv, near which many battles were fought) designated in REVELATION 16:16 as the scene of the final battle between the kings of the earth at the end of the world. Here is the layout of the Battle of Megiddo as won by the pharaoh Thutmose III over the Canaanites in 1482 BCE:

STATE MURDER

There are no facts, only interpretations — so maybe the butler did it.

The bulk of the reviews of this book characterize Simon Schama's speculations as unwarranted.

By the time of the Gulf War cease-fire, Iraq had weaponized anthrax (using strains of the microorganism that had been collected in Texas and supplied to Saddam Hossein by the United States federal government), botulinum toxin, and aflatoxin and had several other lethal agents in development. Inspectors from the UN Special Commission (UNSCOM) would spend frustrating years chasing down evidence of the scope of this program, the very existence of which Iraq would indignantly deny. The UNSCOM team would find that Iraq's stockpile included Scud missiles that had been pre-loaded with disease organisms.

GERM WARFARE

On January 18th, President George Herbert Walker Bush reported that he had directed US armed forces to commence combat operations on January 16th against Iraqi forces and military targets in Iraq and Kuwait, in conjunction with a coalition of allies and UN Security Council resolutions. On January 12th Congress had passed the Authorization for Use of Military Force against Iraq Resolution (P.L. 102-1). Combat operations would be suspended on February 28th.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

On May 17th, President Bush stated in a status report to Congress that the Iraqi repression of the Kurdish people had necessitated a limited introduction of US forces into northern Iraq for emergency relief purposes.

On September 25-27th, after widespread looting and rioting broke out in Kinshasa, US Air Force C-141s transported 100 Belgian troops and equipment into Mnshasa. US planes also carried 300 French troops into the Central African Republic and hauled back American citizens and third country nationals from locations outside Zaire.

US MILITARY INTERVENTIONS

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1993

Michael W. Fedo's play Trial by mob (Duluth MN: Theatre in the State, Inc.)⁶⁴³

In Duluth, Minnesota during this year, Elmer Glenn died. He had been the last surviving member of the generation of black people who had lived through the 1920 lynchings there. He had been 14 years of age at the time. He recollected for us before his death, how his white neighbors had vowed to his family that they were going to protect them, should the angry mob begin to seek general targets of opportunity among the black population.

There was so much hate that nobody could have stopped those nuts. We were scared. There was a lot of talk that the whites were going to wipe out all the blacks.

643. After I saw this play I urged the fellow members of my monthly meeting of the Religious Society of Friends to also see it. To the best of my information, not one of these Minnesota Quakers would accept this advice.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1998

Chancellor John R. Silber and his wife Kathryn Underwood Silber donated $1,000,000 toward full-tuition scholarships for graduates of Texas public schools who would attend Boston University's College of Arts and Sciences.

Texas, a district known for its chivalry, has not since the execution of Chipita Rodriguez in the Year of Our Lord 1863 (for the murder of a horse trader) executed any woman — until, in this Year of Our Lord 1998, Governor George W. Bush sent the repentant Karla Faye Tucker to Heaven.

The Department of Botany at The University of Texas at Austin was dismantled, following the 3-decade trend in major research universities to redistribute biological sciences based on descriptive and organismic studies versus molecular, biotechnological, and microbiological.

John S.D. Eisenhower's AGENT OF DESTINY: THE LIFE AND TIMES OF GENERAL WINFIELD SCOTT (NY and London: The Free Press, reviewed for H-SHEAR by James M. McCaffrey <McCaffreyJ@zeus.dt.uh.edu> of the University of Houston-Downtown):

Winfield Scott entered the U.S. Army in 1808 as a captain of artillery and spent most of the next fifty-three years on active duty. Scott's long and notable career, as John Eisenhower relates in this book, encompassed the War of 1812, the Seminole Wars, the Mexican War, and the early phases of the Civil War. It is difficult to imagine another American soldier, with the possible exception of Douglas MacArthur, who had such a long and colorful career.

Scott's career was almost stillborn, however. He was dissatisfied with his first assignment, under General James Wilkinson near New Orleans, and submitted his resignation from the army in 1809. When war with England began to appear more and more likely, Scott had second thoughts and asked for reinstatement. Secretary of War William Eustis complied with his request, but then sent him right back to his original unit where his outspoken criticism of General Wilkinson earned him a court-martial. Finding him guilty of unofficer-like conduct, the court ordered Captain Scott suspended for twelve months.

Captain Scott was reinstated in 1811, in time for our second war with England beginning the following year. The major theater of operations for most of the war was along the border with Canada, and American land forces there had a spotty record at best.

Scott's conduct, however, was one of the bright spots in an otherwise disappointing series of campaigns. His personal bravery under fire was an inspiration to his men, and his dedication to the benefits of training soon bore fruit at Chippewa and at Lundy's Lane. By the end of the war, Winfield Scott wore the star of a brigadier general.

During the 1820s, Scott completed work on a set of general regulations for administering the army and also compiled a drill manual for the troops which, with periodic updating, remained in use until the eve of the Civil War. He also continued feuding with other high-ranking military leaders, including Andrew Jackson and Edmund Gaines.

The early 1830s saw an outbreak of Indian troubles on the northwestern frontier. Scott led a contingent of troops against

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Black Hawk and his band, but cholera struck the soldiers before they reached the seat of war. By the time the disease had subsided enough for Scott to continue, the short war was over. With the onset of the Second Seminole War in late 1835, however, Scott again faced armed combat. American troops were not very successful against Osceola's warriors, and this lack of success gave General Scott an opportunity to lash out at fellow officers. His intemperate language led to a court of inquiry in which his old nemesis General Edmund Gaines placed General Scott on the same level as Benedict Arnold.

Upon the death the general-in-chief of the army, in 1841, General Scott unabashedly put himself forward to fill the void. "I take it for granted," he wrote to the secretary of war, "that my name will be sent, in a day or two, to fill the vacancy [resulting from] the death of Major-General Macomb" (p. 208). His assumption proved correct, and for the next twenty years Winfield Scott would be the nation's highest ranking soldier. War with Mexico saw Scott take active command of one of the major armies that the United States put into the field. Following the steps of Hernando Cortez several centuries earlier, Scott put his force ashore near Veracruz and led it in a successful march on the enemy capital, bringing the war to an end within six months. Americans seem to like to reward military leaders with high political office, and Winfield Scott was more than ready to accept such rewards. Unfortunately, it was General Zachary Taylor who rode his own military reputation into the White House immediately following the Mexican War. Scott willingly ran for that office in 1852 as the dying Whig Party's last such candidate, but was defeated by Franklin Pierce who had led volunteer troops in the late war.

The secession of some of the Southern slave states from the Union in early 1861 found General Scott almost seventy-five years old. He was bothered by various health problems and was no longer in any shape to take to the field. After contributing some thoughts on the Union's potential grand strategy, Winfield Scott left the actual military leadership to younger men. The old general left active service in November 1861 and died almost five years later. He had been a major player in much of the development of the nation in the first half of the nineteenth century, and Mr. Eisenhower's characterization of him as an "Agent of Destiny" seems fitting. In fact, a more appropriate title might be AGENT OF MANIFEST DESTINY.

In reading this life of an American general, I was struck by what, to me, were the striking similarities between this soldier's life and that of one who came along a century later — Douglas MacArthur. Each reached flag rank at a relatively young age and maintained a strong influence on American military affairs for a long time. Each was foiled in his attempt to secure the presidency. Each left the army in the midst of a war. Each had a monumental ego.

It has been a long time since a full-blown biography of Winfield Scott has been published, and John Eisenhower does a fine job of bringing him alive. Eisenhower, as fits his pattern, consulted a vast array of published sources in preparing this book but virtually no unpublished works. I cannot help but wonder what information there might be in untapped manuscript sources that would have enhanced the story told here. Surely there are diaries or collections of letters left behind by

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Scott's contemporaries that might shine new light on the character of the man himself. Perhaps there are unpublished letters between Scott and his wife that would yield interesting insights.

This book also contains a fair number of factual errors of varying degrees of importance. For example, Eisenhower tells us that the British government rescinded the despised Orders in Council on the very day in 1812 that the United States declared war on England, when in fact the British decision was announced two days earlier (p. 25). Several other dates, such as the fall of the Alamo, are incorrectly given (p. 154). Lake of the Woods, Minnesota appears in Michigan (p. 214). General Scott, rather than Navy Lieutenant George M. Totten, receives credit for having designed the surfboats used to get the troops ashore at Veracruz in 1847 (pages. 234, 239). Gideon Pillow appears, incorrectly, as President James K. Polk's former law partner (pages. 254, 316). Henry Clay, rather than Stephen Douglas, was credited with breaking the Compromise of 1850 up into its component parts to win passage in the Congress (p. 323).

In spite of these, and other lapses, I would still commend this book to college history professors looking for something to bolster their textbooks in courses such as U.S. Military History, Representative Military Leaders, or the U.S. to 1865/1877.

April 3, Friday: The UN Commission on Human Rights condemned the United States of America for arbitrary and racist application of the death penalty.

Concerto for Six for bass clarinet, electric guitar, prepared piano, percussion, cello, and double bass by Tan Dun was performed for the initial time, in Durham, North Carolina.

Hallelujah Junction for piano duo by John Adams was performed for the initial time, in Los Angeles.

April 4, Saturday: Drei Gedichte von Monique Thoné for voice and piano by Wolfgang Rihm was performed for the initial time, in Borgerbout.

April 5, Sunday: The Akashi Kaikyo bridge over the Akashi Strait opened to traffic. It connected Kobe with Awaji Island. At 1,991 meters this had the longest central span of any suspension bridge.

April 6, Monday: Pakistan successfully tested its Ghauri medium-range missile at the Kahuta nuclear facility northeast of Islamabad. With a range of 1,500 kilometers this could easily descend upon targets well inside India.

France and Great Britain became the initial nuclear powers to ratify the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty. Be of good cheer as you view the impact of this on the following video animation:

TIMELINE OF EXPLOSIONS

Travelers Group Inc. and Citicorp merged to form the holding company "Citigroup Inc.," valued at $83,000,000,000. At the time this amounted to the largest merger in history, creating the largest financial services company. "Do you suppose we're too big to fail yet?"

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

1999

Although at least 2,400 racist lynchings have been documented in the United States of America, as yet in point of fact there are precious few roadside markers commemorating such events of torture and murder, the very 1st such roadside marker being dedicated in this year (many years after the indicated lynching, which is still unsolved) on US Highway 78 near Monroe, Georgia — and this sign happens to be entirely undecipherable and unalarming unless you actually get out of your car and walk right up to it and put on your reading glasses! We are such selective people.)

Douglas R. Egerton's HE SHALL GO OUT FREE: THE LIVES OF DENMARK VESSEY (American Profiles Series. Madison: Madison House, 1999)

H-NET BOOK REVIEW

Reviewed for H-Net by Jeffrey Robert Young <jryoung@gasou.edu>, Department of History, Georgia Southern University

Mythology and Heroism in the Slave South

Once upon a time, white historians of Southern slavery argued that African Americans accepted and even appreciated being held in bondage. U.B. Phillips, the eminent authority on such matters for the first half of the twentieth century, pointed to the "natural amenability of the blacks" as a "decisive factor in their initial enslavement" and suggested that the institution reflected "gentleness, kind-hearted friendship and mutual loyalty" between the races.⁶⁴⁴ This flawed white scholarship was built upon the proslavery myths manufactured by the slaveowners themselves and was echoed by twentieth-century novelists such as Margaret Mitchell. In the white reading of slavery, slaves seldom seemed to plot insurrection because they were viewed, by whites, as having been largely content in their subordinate social station.

Not until the publication (in 1979) of Eugene Genovese's

644. Ulrich Bonnell Phillips, AMERICAN NEGRO SLAVERY: A SURVEY OF THE SUPPLY, EMPLOYMENT AND CONTROL OF NEGRO LABOR AS DETERMINED BY THE PLANTATION REGIME (New York, 1918), 454 and 514. Phillips does offer a chapter on "slave crime" which surveys the evidence from a number of slave insurrection plots; however, he ultimately argues that slaveowners were correct to express "confidence that no great disasters were to be feared" (page 488).

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

masterful comparative work, FROM REBELLION TO REVOLUTION, did scholars appreciate the extent to which demography and geography limited Southern slaves' ability to employ widescale violence against their masters.⁶⁴⁵ Outnumbered by white Southerners and without widespread access to a hinterland conducive to the construction of autonomous maroon societies, African-American slaves adopted alternative strategies of resistance. The uncovering of this slave culture of resistance surely constitutes one of the magnificent achievements of professional scholars in post-World-War-II America.⁶⁴⁶

But what of the small number of black revolutionaries who disregarded the impossibly long odds and plotted warfare against their white oppressors? Their willingness to employ violence against white women and children as well as white men has rendered them controversial figures. Since the colonial era, the idea of blacks plotting to slit the throats of their owners has generated tremendous discomfort in white America. Even in 1976, efforts to memorialize Denmark Vesey with a portrait in Charleston's Galliard Municipal Auditorium sparked bitter complaints from the local press.⁶⁴⁷ White Charlestonians likened Vesey to Adolf Hitler and Attila the Hun, and some residents disliked the memorial enough to steal it.

More recently, popular filmmaker Mel Gibson refused to incorporate images of African Americans turning on the white master class during the Revolution, despite a wealth of evidence suggesting that slaves flocked to the Tory cause in the hopes of gaining their freedom. Gibson's film The Patriot countenanced the white American revolutionaries' use of violence against the 645. Eugene D. Genovese, FROM REBELLION TO REVOLUTION: AFRO-AMERICAN SLAVE REVOLTS IN THE MAKING OF THE MODERN WORLD (Baton Rouge, 1979).

646. For an overview of this historical literature, see Charles B. Dew, "The Slavery Experience," in INTERPRETING SOUTHERN HISTORY: HISTORIOGRAPHICAL ESSAYS IN HONOR OF SANFORD W. HIGGINBOTHAM, eds. John B. Boles and Evelyn Thomas Nolen (Baton Rouge, 1987), 120-161.

647. Edward A. Pearson, DESIGNS AGAINST CHARLESTON: THE TRIAL RECORD OF THE DENMARK VESEY SLAVE CONSPIRACY OF 1822 (Chapel Hill, 1999).

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

British, even fetishizing it through scenes in which the film's hero –a figure loosely based on "the Swamp Fox" Francis Marion– shoots, slices, and skewers a series of fantastically evil British soldiers. Yet the filmmakers rejected the possibility that such tactics might be employed by African American slaves against their white oppressors.⁶⁴⁸

And how could this mainstream Hollywood film have done otherwise when imagery of black slaves smiting their masters would have rankled white America's mythology of the Revolution as a justifiable struggle between moral and aggrieved colonists and tyrannical British imperialists? To admit that slaves were eager to fight their white oppressors is to acknowledge that many white revolutionaries were themselves tyrants who deserved to die gruesome deaths. Simply put, the myth of the American nation's heroic origins is contradicted by the thought of black violence directed toward white men and women of substance.

Of course, the legacy of black revolutionaries poses problems for contemporary African Americans as well as whites. When the white novelist William Styron attempted to portray Nat Turner's life in a work of historical fiction, black intellectuals responded with outrage at his presumption. Leaving aside the merits of their various complaints about Styron's depiction of Turner's emotional state, one discerns in their responses a common sense of outrage over a white author's efforts to address the human foibles of a black hero. The life of Turner offered these thinkers the promise of unbridled black heroism in the face of bondage. In the context of the ongoing struggle for black civil rights, Turner's potential political uses as a black icon mattered far more than any historical or artistic imperative to reconstruct the man, warts and all.⁶⁴⁹

For these reasons, revolutionaries such as Gabriel Prosser, Denmark Vesey, and Nat Turner are difficult figures to address with any measure of scholarly detachment. Any historian seeking to recapture the life of such figures cannot help but think of the reception awaiting Styron who, we should keep in mind, was not even claiming to be writing an accurate history of his subject. Certainly Douglas Egerton's biography reflects a tension between the historian's responsibility to dissect mythologies and the socially-conscious individual's desire to respect African American heroes who challenged slavery at its core.

Egerton begins his work with an event that transpired more than four decades after Denmark Vesey's death by execution in 1822. Upon the defeat of the Confederacy in April 1865, black Charlestonians set about constructing a new African Methodist Episcopal Church – an institution that had been decimated when whites learned of Vesey's conspiracy to rebel against slavery. The building project illustrated the extent to which African Americans could unite behind a project and see it to fruition relying only upon members of their own race. The architect of the new building, moreover, was Denmark Vesey's son, Robert Vesey (xxiii–xxiv).

Egerton's use of this episode as the launching point for his narrative provides an early hint as to how he chooses to situate Vesey against the swirling claims of white and black mythologies about slavery. Although Vesey's plot was revealed before a 648. Kenneth Turan, "Give Him Liberty or Give Him Death – Lots of it," Los Angeles Times, June 28, 2000, Section F, page 1.

649. John Henrik Clarke, ed., THE SECOND CRUCIFIXION OF NAT TURNER (Baltimore, 1997 ed.).

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

single master could be attacked and although Vesey was put to death along with thirty-four fellow conspirators, Egerton begins his book on a positive note. Between the horrors of the slave experience and the bitter disappointments of Reconstruction, African Americans emerged from the Civil War with pride and optimism. Vesey's life, we are led to expect, somehow contributed to and reflected a vibrant sense of African American racial solidarity.

Chapter One pieces together the first fifteen years of Vesey's life. Here, Egerton displays his considerable talents as a researcher and a writer. From shards of evidence most likely provided by Vesey's former master and from diligent inquiry into recent scholarship on slavery in the Caribbean, Egerton presents his readers with a very plausible chronology of events in Vesey's childhood. Most likely born on the small island of St. Thomas, the young slave apparently encountered a broad array of cultural influences. Controlled by the Danish, the island population included "Jewish Tradesmen," "French shopkeepers," "Spanish adventurers," "Scots-Irish overseers," and "German landowners" (page 6).

Slaves raised in this diverse cultural environment managed to create a Creole culture in which elements of traditional African spiritual practices were combined with New World strategies for resisting the most dehumanizing aspects of chattel slavery. Past scholars have suggested that Vesey was of mixed racial origins – perhaps even the progeny of his owner. Egerton persuasively undermines this assumption, replacing it with a more significant point about the young boy's Creole background. As a member of the island's Creole slave community, Vesey was no doubt well-prepared to master new languages and to acclimate himself to new environments.

Upon reaching the age of fourteen, Vesey found himself sold to slave traders who intended to ship him to Saint Domingue, an island with a far more robust and far deadlier plantation economy than St. Thomas. The ship's captain, Joseph Vesey hailed from Bermuda and had recently contributed skills as a pilot to the cause of the American revolutionaries. In 1781, he renewed his participation in the slave trade and encountered the boy who would one day take his name. Struck by the slave boy's "beauty, alertness, and intelligence," Joseph Vesey and his sailors turned him into the "ship's pet and plaything." Although Egerton points to the literature on homosexual activity on English sailing vessels, he shies away from the obvious conclusion that the boy was spared imprisonment below decks in order to service the crew's sexual needs. Egerton instead claims that "the child's later attachment to the tall mariner suggests that he was not raped or otherwise ill-used, at least by the captain." (page 16)

Yet this later "attachment" was the slave's best and only chance to advance his position in life and he most likely would have cultivated it even had their relationship begun through coerced sex. Moreover, a longstanding grievance against the captain might help to explain why the slave might one day become one of the few free Blacks in Charleston who was willing to risk his status in an unlikely bid to overturn slavery by force. I cannot help but wonder if Egerton, on some level, shied away from this conclusion because he was wary of sullyng the heroic stature of his subject.⁶⁵⁰

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Whatever the nature of this initial relationship between the captain and the slave boy, the boy was sold along with the rest of the human cargo when the ship arrived at Saint Domingue. There, he acquired fluency in French and discerned that a short, miserable life was in store for him if he remained a plantation laborer. Accordingly, he suddenly manifested symptoms of epilepsy – symptoms that disappeared after his tenure on the sugar plantation ended. Returned to Vesey as unfit merchandise, the boy became a permanent member of Vesey's crew. As such, the captain deigned to name him Telemaque, a classical reference to the son of the wandering Greek hero Odysseus.⁶⁵¹ Vesey's allusion to an ancient Greek poem underscored the multi-cultural dynamic to the Atlantic plantation system. Telemaque already spoke Creole Dutch, Dutch and French. He quickly mastered English as well and no doubt employed his linguistic skills to communicate with his fellow sailors and with the slaves whom the ship proceeded to transport over the next year.

During this point in the young slave's life, the future revolutionary witnessed the horrors of the Middle Passage from the relatively favorable vantage point of crew member instead of human cargo. Still a slave, he lacked the resources to do more than empathize with the Africans below decks; but this experience likely fixed itself in Telemaque's memory and might have contributed to his future decision to challenge slavery at its very core. By 1783, Joseph Vesey had resettled in Charleston with his teenaged slave who had survived his brush with bondage in Saint Domingue by his own cleverness and his new master's attraction to him. Whether he maintained an "abiding faith in the gods of Africa" (as Egerton claims) does not seem clear from the evidence presented by the author (page 26).

Over the next decade, Telemaque adjusted to an urban life that afforded him an unprecedented degree of autonomy in his daily work routine. As Captain Vesey continued his involvement in the slave trade, Telemaque traveled through the city, collecting shipments (including slaves) and paying duties at the Charleston custom house. Such involvement in his master's distasteful business ventures has led some historians to speculate whether Vesey would one day be filled with "self-disgust for his former status as the eager henchman of a [slave] trader" (page 37). Egerton wisely notes that "there is no evidence, of course, that Telemaque was at any time an 'eager' participant in the captain's business" (page 37).

Yet Egerton himself is reluctant to frame Telemaque's relationship with Captain Vesey in starkly adversarial terms (page 16), suggesting that their exchanges contained "equal parts love and loathing" (page 36). This reading, however, appears to be equally unsupported by the evidence presented by the author, and my own sense is that Telemaque was biting his tongue on any occasion when he seemed to interact affectionately

650. To establish the place of homosexual relations in seafaring culture, Egerton cites B. R. Burg, SODOMY AND THE PIRATE TRADITION: ENGLISH SEA ROVERS IN THE SEVENTEENTH-CENTURY CARIBBEAN (New York, 1995 ed.). For a revisionist approach to this issue, see Hans Turley, RUM, SODOMY, AND THE LASH: PIRACY, SEXUALITY, AND MASCULINE IDENTITY (New York, 1999).

651. This is the stuff that biographer's metaphors are made of, but Egerton seems to get the plot of the Odyssey wrong when he mines it for literary parallels to Telemaque's life. For example, Egerton claims that Telemachus "was shipwrecked on the perilous island of Ogyia, from whence he was rescued by Calypso" (page 21) when, in fact, it was his father Odysseus who experienced that fate. He then refers to Calypso as "a savior who treated him kindly," thereby overlooking her subsequent decision to keep him imprisoned for years as her sexual slave. On this level, Egerton's use of Calypso as a metaphor for Captain Vesey strikes me as more apt than he knows on several counts. See THE ODYSSEY, Book 5.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

with the man who quite possibly used him for sexual sport and most certainly deposited him on a sugar plantation to meet his death.

Relative to slaves laboring in the fields, Denmark -as Telemaque came to be called in Charleston- certainly led a life of considerable autonomy. But that autonomy came with the price of doing his master's bidding in the slave trade. Beyond that, Denmark's autonomy was severely constrained by the standards of the free, white men with whom he interacted constantly. As Egerton suggests, the slave could not even share a household with his wife, a slave named Beck who lived a few blocks from the Veseys (pages 47-52). Still, a slave in Denmark's position could take some comfort in the possibility that this oppressive racial hierarchy might disappear in a flash of revolutionary violence. Charleston in the 1790s was a city wracked with fears of slave insurrection. The bloody and successful slave uprising in Haiti led to an influx of slaveowning refugees into Charleston. Native white Southerners saw, in this migrant population, their worst fears coming to pass. And as Denmark witnessed the master class's nervousness and interacted with witnesses to racial warfare, he likely began to imagine a better future for himself and his family.

In chapter three, Egerton fleshes out the work routines of urban slaves such as Denmark. Skilled slave workers hired out to jobs around Charleston could earn significant income for their owners. But they also created an underground economy in goods that they sold for their own profit, and this economy could potentially serve as "an illicit network of communication available to shrewd slaves" (page 68). Here, Egerton introduces us to some of the slaves who would serve as Denmark's co-conspirators. Slaves such as Polydore Faber enjoyed numerous opportunities for illicit interaction as they wandered from tavern to tavern, drinking, gambling, and conniving with a motley assortment of fellow slaves, free blacks, foreign sailors, and local white businessmen, artisans, and criminals. Large plantation owners struggled, with good reason, to isolate their bondservants from the potentially incendiary influences of this urban environment. Like so many successful merchants before him, Captain Vesey did purchase a plantation on the Ashley River, but he did not seek entry into the regional aristocracy. Rather than attempting to marry into the ranks of the slaveholding elite, the captain openly initiated a sexual relationship with "a free East Indian," eventually marrying her in 1796 (page 72).

It would be tempting to read into this interracial union the possibility that Captain Vesey oversaw a household in which people of color could be treated with fairness and respect. I see evidence, however, of no such thing. Over the years, Vesey was deepening his involvement with plantation slavery. Despite his wealth and his legal ability to do so, he demonstrated no inclination to liberate Denmark from bondage. More disturbing, Vesey's interracial marriage confirms that his sexual tastes were oriented toward people of color thereby increasing the probability that his early relationship with Denmark had involved coerced sex. Egerton presents no persuasive reason why Denmark might have been kindly disposed to his master. Indeed, when fate intervened and Denmark won a lottery prize of fifteen hundred dollars, his owner forced him to pay full market value for his freedom in 1799 (page 73). At the age of thirty-three, Denmark Vesey had managed to enter the ranks of Charleston's free black population.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

He now faced a choice. He could distance himself from the slave population to better secure his standing as a free man, or he could use the privileges of his free existence to struggle for the slave population's liberation. To be sure, Vesey took steps to solidify his economic prospects in white society. His adoption of his former owner's surname no doubt assisted his transition into the free economy of Charleston (page 90). As a carpenter, he distinguished himself through his "great strength and activity," although Egerton points out that rumors of his wealth were apparently exaggerated.

Whatever his success as a black artisan in a white-dominated economy, Vesey remained emotionally vested in the slave community. Whereas the "Brown Society" of Charleston mulattoes struggled to ingratiate itself with the white elite, Vesey developed friendships with slaves such as Rolla Bennett, Peter Poyas, and Monday Gell (page 97). Far from avoiding the slaves who filled Charleston's busy streets, Vesey preached to them a message of equality and defiance toward white authority. His enormous physical presence and powerful intellect emboldened him to denounce slavery in public.

Egerton demonstrates the complicated ways in which Christianity factored into Vesey's defiance of the slaveholders' regime. Rejecting the slaveholding white ministry's message of obedience and humility, Vesey and his circle of friends filled the pews of the African Methodist Episcopal church on Cow Alley (pages 110-111). Assuming the responsibilities of a class leader, Vesey invoked the Old Testament, likening African Americans to the Hebrews marked by God for liberation. In his analysis of this theological development, Egerton makes a fascinating case for the convergence between the Hebrew Bible and traditional African cosmology — an affinity personified by Vesey's close relationship with the East African priest Jack Pritchard (pages 118-21).

White authorities, for obvious reasons, disapproved of the AME congregations. Their predictions that autonomous black worship would lead to insurrection became self-fulfilling in 1818, when white authorities burst into the African church and arrested a number of influential African American worshippers. Embittered and driven underground, spiritual leaders such as Vesey were now in a position to push an ever more radical message of rebellion to the city's slave population.

After spending some three and a half decades in Charleston, Vesey plotted the destruction of the city. Eyeing the barely guarded arsenal, Vesey planned for bold and decisive action against white authority. The black revolutionaries intended to arm themselves and flee for the republic of Haiti, taking with them as many slaves as they could liberate. Befitting his Caribbean background, his experience at sea, and his awareness of contemporary political developments, the scheme reflected Vesey's knowledge of the broader Atlantic world. Egerton contends that Vesey read of the Missouri Controversy and sought to convince Charleston slaves that the U.S. Congress had already liberated them from bondage (page 130).

Seeking to frame his own revolution in the broader context of global democratic sentiment, Vesey scheduled the day of uprising

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

to take place on July 14th. Although slaves' efforts to violently gain their freedom fared poorly both before and after the Vesey scheme was uncovered, Egerton takes pains to emphasize that this was one plot that might well have worked. He notes the black majority residing in Charleston (page 128); he accepts as plausible the white authorities' estimate that nine thousand slave conspirators were privy to the plot (page 140); and he maintains that Vesey and his men could well have departed the United States before white forces could retake the city (page 136). Egerton unflinchingly portrays Vesey's willingness to employ violence against white women and children as well as men (pages 146-47). In sum, Vesey springs to life in this biography as a race-conscious radical who was clever enough to succeed in striking a blow against slavery.

White authorities in Charleston, however, learned of the conspiracy in May 1822. Peter, a trusted slave of John C. Prioleau, informed his master that he had been invited to join in racial warfare against lowcountry whites. The slaveowners' responses to the Vesey conspiracy, suggests Egerton, conveyed the conflicted psychology of the planter elite. On the one hand, white planters needed to take seriously the threat of insurrection, lest they lose control over their slaves. On the other hand, to maintain their collective sanity in the face of the lowcountry's black majority, white planters invested in the proslavery fiction of an obedient and happy slave workforce.

Hence, when Governor Thomas Bennett received news that his trusted slave Rolla had joined the conspiracy, Bennett's mind reeled. Despite the magnitude of the accusation, the governor believed his slave when he, not surprisingly, denied any knowledge of the Vesey plot (page 162). Even as the white elite became progressively more convinced that their slaves meant them harm, Bennett had a difficult time grasping that slaves wanted to be free. Notwithstanding the governor's inaction, the white elite roused itself to prevent the plot's enactment. The leading conspirators were rounded up, tortured, tried, and in thirty-five cases, executed – but not before their owners' paternalistic pretensions were decimated by the slaves' bloody intentions (page 183).

And yet, once they removed the threat posed by Vesey and the would-be revolutionaries, the slaveowners reconstructed their proslavery fantasies about plantation life. They had no choice unless they wanted to acknowledge their fear of the people whom they had enslaved. Prominent Baptist minister Richard Furman had been rebuffed by Vesey when he attempted to offer spiritual counsel in Vesey's cell. But after Vesey's execution, Furman campaigned among white politicians such as Bennett, urging them not to blame the plot on slave exposure to Christian doctrine. In the end, whites believed that the plot sprang from black distortion of biblical teachings. As such, white authorities further restricted African Americans' abilities to worship autonomously. The AME church was knocked to the ground, but the slaves' desire for freedom remained intact.

Throughout the work, Egerton emphasizes the heroic undercurrent to the waves of tragedy that washed through Vesey's life. Fittingly, the biography of Vesey ends not on the scaffolds but with the demise of the slaveowners' quest to protect their institution of unfree labor. When the American flag was once again raised at Fort Sumter, one of Vesey's children was on hand to witness the historic moment. Although Vesey's plot had failed in its short term goal of armed assault against the planters, his spirit of resistance lived on in the troops who struggled successfully against the Confederacy. Notwithstanding the personal tragedies and unhappy ending to Vesey's life, Egerton presents his biography as a story of hope.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

I do not wish to quibble with this approach since I too see tremendous heroism in Vesey's life story. Still, there are moments in Egerton's book that leave me wondering if the author does not try too hard to emphasize Vesey's positive attributes. Responding to the charge that Vesey was a domineering polygamist, for example, Egerton suggests that he did not have more than one wife at the same time and that he loved and looked after his children. The evidence for any such reading is sketchy at best. I do not necessarily disagree with his speculations about Vesey playing the part of loving father; yet I wonder if Egerton is not searching for ways in which to build up his subject as a role model worthy of admiration in modern America. Certainly, a polygamist who beat his wives makes for a less sympathetic figure around which to build a story of black courage and hope.

In similar fashion, Egerton discounts the slave confessional testimony suggesting that some of the revolutionaries intended to gain sexual access to white female prisoners (page 168). To be sure, Egerton offers logical reasons for concluding that the black revolutionaries had more important strategic goals to pursue than the enjoyment of forbidden sexual pleasures. Yet, his analysis on this point leaves me wondering if Egerton is willing to accept the slave confessional testimony as sound except in places where it cast the conspirators in a less than favorable light according to contemporary standards for heroism. Egerton, for example, rejects out of hand the possibility that all of the slave testimony was tainted because it was extracted through torture and the threat of imminent death. To reason otherwise is to open the door to the revisionist argument that the plot itself was more the product of white hysteria than black subterfuge – a possibility that Egerton forcefully discounts. Having raised these concerns, let me make clear that Egerton has tackled a difficult scholarly task with aplomb. It is no mean feat to reconstruct Vesey's life in a manner that is intelligible to undergraduate and lay readers while at the same time engaging the rich historiography of slavery. With masterful prose and a command of the vast recent literature on slavery in the Atlantic world, Egerton succeeds at his task. In the near future, I look forward to assigning this book in my courses. I imagine that I will be dealing with the book's larger issues for many years to come.

Copyright (c) 2001 by H-Net, all rights reserved. This work may be copied for non-profit educational use if proper credit is given to the author and the list. For other permission, please contact H-Net@H-Net.MSU.EDU.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

February 25, Thursday: In retaliation for Macedonia's recognition of Taiwan, China vetoed the extension of the UN peacekeeping mission in Macedonia.

When a jury in Jasper County, Texas sentenced John King to be sexecuted for having murdered James Byrd, by dragging him some 5 kilometers attached by a chain to the back of a pickup truck, this was almost but actually not quite a precedent — for in fact in the course of Texas history 1-count-'em-1 other white man had already been condemned for having murdered an African-American.

Quintet for trumpet and strings by Peter Maxwell Davies was performed for the initial time, in Mitchell Hall of the University of Aberdeen.

Glenn Theodore Seaborg, discoverer in 1940 of plutonium, died.

ATOM BOMB

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

2000

The cat having been well out of the bag for more than two decades, the Minnesota Historical Society Press decided to reprint Michael W. Fedo's 1979 work on THE LYNCHINGS IN DULUTH.

DULUTH

COLDBLOODED MURDER

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

2003

July 14, Monday: Robert Novak's column "Mission to Niger" in the Washington Post and elsewhere disparaged former Ambassador Joseph Wilson and destroyed the CIA career of his wife, Valerie Plame. What had happened was that the CIA had delegated this former ambassador, as well as the deputy commander of the United States European Command, General Carlton Fulford, Jr., to figure out whether Iraq had actually been seeking supplies of uranium "yellowcake" there, and they had returned to described this report as a fabrication. Nevertheless, the report fitted the convenience of President George W. Bush and so he relied on it in his State of the Union Address of January 28, 2003, in making a case for attacking Iraq. Former ambassador Wilson had then gone public in the New York Times, pointing out that the report so touted by the President was considered by the intelligence community to have been a fabrication. Vice-President Dick Cheney was using his chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, to sic the journalistic hounds, such as Novak, on Joseph Wilson and his wife Valerie Plame. Truth-tellers, whistle-blowers, beware, the Bush Administration has no principles, the Bush Administration has no restraint, the Bush Administration has no regard for the truth, the Bush Administration will destroy its enemies (such as you)!

(In a related piece of news, on this day the US federal government acknowledged the existence of Area 51.)

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

Season 15, Episode 13 of “The American Experience” was on TV, entitled “Murder at Harvard,” written by Melissa Banta and Simon Schama and directed by Eric Stange.

Doctor Parkman was played by the actor Sean McGuirk and Professor Webster by Timothy Sawyer. The TV dramatization emphasized a “Plan B” scenario according to which the swamp-yankee janitor Ephraim Littlefield –who had originally alerted investigators into Dr. Parkman’s disappearance on the basis of his and his wife’s suspicions about Professor Webster’s conduct, and for this had received a $3,000 reward that allowed him to retire– had for some unknown motive himself perpetrated the murder — and had then succeeded in foisting his own guilt onto the high-status Harvard prof.⁶⁵²

Failing to stick to the facts of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts v. John White Webster case, in addition the acting has been reviewed as “unsufferable.”

652. While such a “Plan B” defense of “somebody else did the deed” might have been appropriate during the trial, the possibility of an injustice would subsequently be problematized by a “retreating confession” made to the Unitarian minister, the Reverend George Putnam, a confession recorded in the jail cell after Professor Webster had been condemned to death by hanging, we learn that another account of what happened that Friday afternoon at the Harvard Medical College was that Doctor Parkman had been waving a copy of the letter of recommendation which he had originally prepared to help Doctor Webster obtain an appointment on the Harvard faculty many years before, and had been taunting Professor Webster with such remarks as “I got you into your position and now I will get you out of it.” –Whereupon Doctor Webster became enraged and fearful and, grabbing up a stump of grapevine from the stovewood, had whacked Doctor Parkman once solidly along the side of the head, which blow had killed him instantly.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

October 9, Friday: In downtown Duluth, a block from the famous lamp post at which three innocent young black men, Elias Clayton, Elmer Jackson and Isaac McGhie, had been lynched in 1920 by a mob of between 5,000 and 10,000 white people, a mingled crowd of only 2,500 turned out to dedicate a memorial. The images on the memorial are not those of the three victims but of three black stand-in volunteers from today's Duluth — since we have no record of what the victims looked like before they were hanged by the neck until they were dead dead very dead. “Today, Duluth is a light in the world,” Catherine Ostos orated, “Today, as a community, we tell the truth.... Today, we make history right.”

Let us trust that the white racists of Minnesota will be able to restrain themselves from defacing this memorial.

[The statistics inform us that the states of the lower 48 states of the USA that now sentence the most criminals to death tend to be those that in the past had the most lynchings. The number of death sentences for all criminals, black and white, tends to be higher in states with a history of lynchings. Significantly, confining the statistic to death sentences for black criminals made this correlation even more emphatic. Up to a certain point, the number of death sentences in states with the most lynchings increases as a state's population of African Americans grows larger. Then, when a state's population reaches a threshold of about 20-22% and blacks acquire enough votes to achieve local political influence, the number of black executions tends to decrease. There is more of a correlation here, than there is with such parameters as the overall crime and murder rates, unemployment rates, and even fundamentalist church memberships. Clearly, the death penalty has been functioning sociologically for us as a legal continuation of the tradition of lynchings from the past. Our violent past is still with us in a way we have difficulty in appreciating: it is still linked to current legal decisions about who will live and who will die. There is nothing here to suggest that the manner in which we administer the death penalty, in states that still have the death penalty, is color-blind.]

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

COPYRIGHT NOTICE: In addition to the property of others, such as extensive quotations and reproductions of images, this "read-only" computer file contains a great deal of special work product of Austin Meredith, copyright ©2013. Access to these interim materials will eventually be offered for a fee in order to recoup some of the costs of preparation. My hypercontext button invention which, instead of creating a hypertext leap through hyperspace –resulting in navigation problems– allows for an utter alteration of the context within which one is experiencing a specific content already being viewed, is claimed as proprietary to Austin Meredith – and therefore freely available for use by all. Limited permission to copy such files, or any material from such files, must be obtained in advance in writing from the "Stack of the Artist of Kouroo" Project, 833 Berkeley St., Durham NC 27705. Please contact the project at <Kouroo@kouroo.info>.

"It's all now you see. Yesterday won't be over until tomorrow and tomorrow began ten thousand years ago."

- Remark by character "Garin Stevens" in William Faulkner's INTRUDER IN THE DUST

Prepared: September 26, 2017

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

ARRGH AUTOMATED RESearch REPORT

GENERATION HOTLINE

This stuff presumably looks to you as if it were generated by a human. Such is not the case. Instead, someone has requested that we pull it out of the hat of a pirate who has grown out of the shoulder of our pet parrot "Laura" (as above). What these chronological lists are: they are research reports compiled by ARRGH algorithms out of a database of modules which we term the Kouroo Contexture (this is data mining). To respond to such a request for information we merely push a button.

Commonly, the first output of the algorithm has obvious deficiencies and we need to go back into the modules stored in the contexture and do a minor amount of tweaking, and then we need to punch that button again and recompile the chronology – but there is nothing here that remotely resembles the ordinary “writerly” process you know and love. As the contents of this originating contexture improve, and as the programming improves, and as funding becomes available (to date no funding whatever has been needed in the creation of this facility, the entire operation being run out of pocket change) we expect a diminished need to do such tweaking and recompiling, and we fully expect to achieve a simulation of a generous and untiring robotic research librarian. Onward and upward in this brave new world.

STATE MURDER

STATE MURDER

First come first serve. There is no charge.
Place requests with <Kouroo@kouroo.info>. Arrgh.